encyclopedia of human services and diversity

edited by
Linwood H. Cousins

Encyclopedia of

HUMAN SERVICES
AND
DIVERSITY

Encyclopedia of
HUMAN SERVICES
AND DIVERSITY

VOLUME 1

Linwood H. Cousins
EDITOR
Western Michigan University

SAGE reference

Los Angeles | London | New Delhi
Singapore | Washington DC

SAGE

Los Angeles | London | New Delhi
Singapore | Washington DC

FOR INFORMATION:

SAGE Publications, Inc.
2455 Teller Road
Thousand Oaks, California 91320
E-mail: order@sagepub.com

SAGE Publications India Pvt. Ltd.
B 1/I 1 Mohan Cooperative Industrial Area
Mathura Road, New Delhi 110 044
India

SAGE Publications Ltd.
1 Oliver's Yard
55 City Road
London EC1Y 1SP
United Kingdom

SAGE Publications Asia-Pacific Pte. Ltd.
3 Church Street
#10-04 Samsung Hub
Singapore 049483

Executive Editor: Jim Brace-Thompson
Cover Designer: Candice Harman
Reference Systems Manager: Leticia Gutierrez
Reference Systems Coordinators: Laura Notton
Anna Villasenor
Production Manager: Eric Garner
Marketing Manager: Carmel Schrire

Golson Media
President and Editor: J. Geoffrey Golson
Production Director: Mary Jo Scibetta
Author Manager: Michele Chase
Layout Editors: Jennifer Harris, Susan Kauffman,
Mary Sudul, Amy Weiss
Copyeditors: Rebecca Kuzins, Sandra Rush,
Pam Schroeder
Production Editor: TLK Editing Services
Proofreaders: Suzanne DeRouen, Kathy Hix,
Rebecca Kuzins
Indexer: J S Editorial

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of human services and diversity / Linwood H. Cousins, editor.
volumes cm
Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 978-1-4522-8748-5 (hardcover : alk. paper)
1. Social service--United States. 2. Social work with minorities--United States. I. Cousins, Linwood H., 1955-
HV95.E58 2014
361.97303--dc23
2014018720

14 15 16 17 18 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

Volume 1

Articles

Volume 2

Articles

Volume 3

Articles

List of Articles

D

E

F

Multiracial Children
Multiracial Individuals and Families
Multisystemic Therapy
Muslim Americans

N

National Alliance for Hispanic Health
National Assessment Governing Board
National Center for Children in Poverty
National Center for Cultural Competence
National Center for Hate Crime Prevention
National Center for Missing and Exploited Children
National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities
National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System
National Congress of American Indians
National Database for Autism Research
National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey
National Healthcare Disparities Reports
National Institute of Mental Health
National Institute on Aging
National Mental Health Association
National Minority AIDS Council
National Organization for Human Services
National Survey of Family Growth
National Urban League
National Youth in Transition Database
Native Americans
Native Americans, Suicide Among Natural Disasters, Services for Naturalized Citizens
Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation
Neighborhood Watch Programs
NeighborWorks America
Neonatal Care
Neurodiversity
No Child Left Behind Act
Nursing, Public Health
Nursing Home Care
Nutritional Services and Assessment

O

Occupational Therapy
Office for Civil Rights
Office for Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships, White House
Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention
Office of Refugee Resettlement
Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools
Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services
Outpatient Medical Care
Overweight and Obese Adults and Children

P

Pacific Islanders
Pain Management
Palliative Care
Pandemics
Parenting Skills Training
Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in
Partial Care Services for Adults, Mental Health
Partial Care Services for Children, Mental Health
Partner Notification Programs in HIV/AIDS
Paternity, Establishing
Peer Pressure
Peer Support and Counseling Services
People of Color: Service Delivery, Psychological Assessment, Cultural Issues
Personal Practice, Model of Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act
Pharmaceuticals, Access to Pluralism
Policing and Safety
Postpartum Depression
Poverty
Power, Race/Ethnicity and Pregnancy and Parenting Services
Prejudice, Theories of Prenatal Care
Primacy of Place
Prisoner Reentry Programs
Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners
Probation and Parole Officers
Profile of Parenting Study
Protective Services for Adults
Protective Services for Children
Providers, Institutional Racism and Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment
Public Health
Puerto Ricans

Q

Quality of Life, Measurement of Reader's Guide

Children and Youth Services

Abandonment
Abduction
Abuse and Neglect
Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview
Adoption: Infants, International, and Older/Special Needs Children
Adoption, Special Needs
Adoption Agencies and Services
Aftercare Services for Children Aging Out of Foster Care
Aggression Replacement Training
AMBER Alert
Ansell-Casey Life-Skills Assessment
At-Risk Youth Services
Behavior Modification and Residential Treatment Facilities
Behavior Support and Management
Biracial Children
Boarder Babies
Boot Camps
Bullying
Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of
Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths
Child Protective Services
Child Support Agencies and Services
Child Welfare Services
Children, Youth and Human Trafficking
Children in Foster Care
Children in Special Living Arrangements
Children of Incarcerated Parents
Children of Substance Abusers
Children of Undocumented Aliens
ChildStats
Continuum of Care
Daniel Memorial Institute System Independent Living Skills
Day Care for Children
Disposition of Juvenile Records
Early Childhood Development
Early Childhood Literacy
Education and Training Vouchers
Educational Support Services
Families, Nontraditional
Family Crisis Intervention Planning
Family Permanency Planning
Fetal Alcohol Syndrome and Drug-Exposed Infants
Foster Care Agencies
Gangs in Schools
Genogram
Group Homes for Children
Head Start and Prekindergarten Programs
Immunization Campaigns
Infant Mortality/Sudden Infant Death Syndrome
Infant/Toddler Development
Intelligence Testing
Interethnic Adoption Provision
Jail Diversion Programs for Children and Adolescents

Juvenile Justice System
KIDS COUNT
Kinship Care
Life Book
Life Skills Training
Maternity Homes
Monitoring the Future
Multicultural Education Journals
Multiracial Children
Multisystemic Therapy
National Center for Children in Poverty
National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System
National Survey of Family Growth
National Youth in Transition Database
Parenting Skills Training
Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in Paternity, Establishing
Peer Pressure
Profile of Parenting Study
Protective Services for Children
Runaway Youth
School Counselors
School Mental Health Project
School Psychologists School Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for Special Education
State Children's Health Insurance Program
Status Offense
Substance Abuse Treatment for Children and Adolescents
Targeted Case Management
Truancy
Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System
Zero Tolerance Approach in Schools

Community Development

Administration for Community Living
After-School Services
Business Incubator
Community Action Agencies
Community Corrections
Community Development Block Grants
Community Development Corporations
Community Health Centers
Community Organizing
Community-Based Services
Cultural Services
Educational Services
Eminent Domain
Enterprise Zone
Fair Lending Practices
Gentrification
Grassroots Leadership
Habitat for Humanity
Health Promotion Services
Housing Services
Microlending Programs
Neighborhood Watch Programs
NeighborWorks America
Policing and Safety
Primacy of Place
Prisoner Reentry Programs
Recreation Services
Redlining
Section 8
Senior Services
Transportation Services
Volunteer Services

Cultural Competence in Human Services

American Academy of Social Work and Social Welfare
Changing the Client Versus Changing the Environment
Childhood Trauma
Code of Ethics of the National Association of Social Workers
Colonialism, Lingering Effects of
Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in Community-Based Participatory Research
Council on Social Work Education
Critical Race Theory
Cross-Cultural Knowledge
Cross-Cultural Service Models
Cross-Cultural Skills
Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and Cultural Competence, Measuring and Assessing
Cultural Competence, Model of
Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of Cultural Competence, Training in Cultural Humility, Model of
Cultural Paradigms
Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of Culturally Diverse Practice, Theories of Culturally Specific Services

Culture-Specific Services

Universal Access/Universal Design
Victim Services
War and Terrorism, Survivors of Women, Battered

Family Services
Alloparenting, Cultural Aspects of
Co-Parenting, Cultural Aspects of Counseling and Psychotherapy Services
Divorce
Domestic Violence, Victims of Economic Support and Services
Emergency Fuel Services
Employment/Career Assistance Services
Family Planning Services
Family Preservation Services
Family Services
Family Violence Prevention and Services
Food Support
Housing Support and Homeless Services
Kinship Care, Cultural Aspects of Legal Services
Respite Services
Wraparound Services/Systems of Care

Hospitals, Health Care, and Cultural Competence
Adult Day Care
AIDS/HIV Programs
Case Management Services
College and University Health Services
Communication Disorders, Services for Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Dental Services
Directly Observed Therapy
Do Not Resuscitate Order
Emergency Medical Care
Harm Reduction Programs
Health as a Human Right
Health Care, Disparities in Health Care Delivery, Models of Health Insurance
Home and Community Services
Home Care Services
Hospice Services
Hospitals
Immunization
Maternal/Infant Health Services
Medicaid
Medical Necessity
Medical Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for Medical Supplies, Access to Medical Transportation
Medicare
Meditation/Yoga
Midwifery
National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey
National Healthcare Disparities Reports
Neonatal Care
Nursing, Public Health
Nursing Home Care
Nutritional Services and Assessment
Occupational Therapy
Outpatient Medical Care
Overweight and Obese Adults and Children
Pain Management
Palliative Care
Partner Notification Programs in HIV/AIDS
Pharmaceuticals, Access to Pregnancy and Parenting Services
Prenatal Care
Public Health
Quality of Life, Measuring of Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health
Rehabilitative Services
Respite Care
School Health Services
Telecommunications Devices for the Deaf
Workplace Health Services

International Cultural Competence
Alcohol Consumption, International Variations in Attitudes Toward Alternative Medical Systems
Child Labor, International Variations in Attitudes Toward Children, International Variations in Attitudes Toward
Children and War
Chronic Diseases Common in Developing Countries
Coca-Colonization
Communicable Diseases Common in Developing Countries
Cultural Appropriation
Diaspora

Disabilities, International Variations in Attitudes Toward
Domestic Violence, International Variations in Attitudes Toward Family, International Variations in Definitions of Family Reunification
Female Genital Mutilation
Gender Issues and Roles in Developing Countries
Gender Issues and Roles in Non-Western Countries
Global Burden of Disease
Health and Sickness, Differing Attitudes Toward Help-Seeking Behavior, Cultural Differences in Honor Killings
Human Trafficking
ICE Detention Centers, Services in Infanticide, International Variations in Attitudes Toward International Adoptions and Families
International Federation of Social Workers Mental Health, International Variations in Attitudes Toward Missionary Work and Workers
Natural Disasters, Service for Naturalized Citizens
Pandemics
Poverty
Rape as an Instrument of War
Refugee Assistance
Reparations
Rites of Passage
Role Flexibility, International Differences in Sweatshop Laborers
Tobacco Use, International Variations in Attitudes Toward Traditional Medicine

Legislation and Regulations
Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System
Adoption and Safe Families Act
Americans with Disabilities Act
Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990
Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act
Community Reinvestment Act (1977)
Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, United Nations
Cultural and Linguistically Appropriate Services Standards
DREAM Act, The
Equal Pay Act of 1963
Fair Labor Standards Act
Family Violence Prevention and Services Act
Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008
Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1966
Indian Child Welfare Act
Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968
Individuals with Disabilities Education Act
Interstate Compact for Juveniles
Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children
McKinney-Vento Homeless Education Assistance Improvements Act of 2001
Multiethnic Placement Act of 1994
No Child Left Behind Act
TRIO Programs
United Nations Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide
United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child
United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Universal Declaration of Human Rights
Voting Rights Act of 1965

Mental and Behavioral Health Services
Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services
Autism Diagnostic Observation Schedule
Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations
Case Management
Chemical Restraints
Conflict Resolution and Diversity
Crisis Services
Day Treatment Centers
Deinstitutionalization
Developmental Disabilities, Attitudes and Myths in Services for Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Cultural Responsiveness of Drug and Alcohol Screening
Eating Disorders, Cultural Aspects of Employee Assistance Programs
Ethnic Groups and Drug and Alcohol Use
Face-Blindness (Prosopagnosia)

Family Therapy
Gambling Addictions
Genetic Counseling, Cultural Aspects of Group Homes for Adults
Group Therapy
Information and Referral
Interpersonal Violence
Long-Term Residential Care
Marriage Counseling
Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics
Mental Health Services, Adult
Mental Health Services, Child
Mental Health Services, Ethnic Models and Multicultural
Military Families
Military Personnel
Military Veterans
National Database for Autism Research
National Institute of Mental Health
Native Americans, Suicide Among
Partial Care Services for Adults, Mental Health
Partial Care Services for Children, Mental Health
Peer Support and Counseling Services
Postpartum Depression
Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment
Rehabilitation Centers
Restorative Justice
Self-Harm, Cultural Aspects of Smoking and Smoking Cessation, Cultural Aspects of Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration
Suicide, Cultural Aspects of Suicide Prevention Services
Supported Housing
Trauma-Focused Services
Twelve-Step Programs
Veterans Services

Organizations, Programs, Government Agencies, and Departments
Administration for Native Americans
Administration on Children, Youth and Families
Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities
Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality
American Correctional Association
Asian and Pacific Islander American Health Forum
Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development
Association of Administrators of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children
Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators
Child Welfare League of America
Children's Defense Fund
Court-Appointed Special Advocate, National Association
Department of Education, U.S.
Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.
DiversityRx
Enterprise Community Partners
Human Capital Development Initiative
Institute of Education Sciences
International Mental Health Research Organization
John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program
Joint Commission, The Low-Income Housing Tax Credits
Mental Health Gap Action Program
National Alliance for Hispanic Health
National Assessment Governing Board
National Center for Cultural Competence
National Center for Hate Crime Prevention
National Center for Missing and Exploited Children
National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities
National Congress of American Indians
National Mental Health Association
National Minority AIDS Council
National Organization for Human Services
Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation
Office for Civil Rights
Office for Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships, White House
Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention
Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools
Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services
Social Security Administration
TuDiabetes
United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees
U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services

Race and Ethnicity

Regional Cultural Competence

Isolated Communities and Cultural Competence
Migrant Workers
Regional Cultural Competence
Rural Communities
Southern Communities and Cultural Competence
Urban Communities and Human Services
U.S. Cultural Regions
Western Communities and Cultural Competence

Socioeconomic Status and Cultural Competence

Adult Education Programs and Services
Adult Literacy Programs
Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Historical Role of Blue Collar/Pink Collar/White Collar
Cultural Capital, Role of
Dual Income, No Kids
Educational Status and Service Delivery
Environmental Justice Family Structure, Diversity of Financial Literacy Programs
Food Desert
Food Insecurity
Health Disparities, Role of Homelessness
Linguicism
National Urban League
Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act
Single Parents
Social and Economic Justice
Social Capital, Role of Social Security, Services Funded by Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in Social Welfare Programs, Cultural Competence in Socioeconomic Status
Supplemental Security Income, Services Funded by Temporary Aid to Needy Families
Uninsured Clients
War on Poverty Programs Welfare Reform, Role of Yuppies and Buppies

About the Editor

Linwood H. Cousins, Ph.D., is a social worker and cultural anthropologist who studies the cultural characteristics of race, ethnicity, and social class primarily among African American families and communities, with an emphasis on how culture interacts with social class, race, ethnicity, and other diversity factors to influence schooling and racial identity. He has disseminated his work on human diversity in the context above and more broadly via numerous workshops for human service organizations; presentations at local, regional, and national academic and nonacademic conferences; and via numerous scholarly publications in refereed and nonrefereed journals and books.

Cousins currently serves as professor in the School of Social Work at Western Michigan University. Prior to his career in teaching, research, and administration in university settings since 1994, he worked as a social worker with children, adolescents, and families in urban and rural communities. He has also served as a consultant to human services organizations and public schools, and has served on boards of directors of many community agencies and organizations.

List of Contributors

Charles Frederick Abel
Stephen F. Austin State University
Lalatendu Acharya
Purdue University
Randall Adams
LaGrange College
Alexis Adams-Clark
Butler Hospital and Brown University
A. Christson Adedoyin
East Carolina University
Paula Adkins
Lindsey Wilson College
Apryl A. Alexander
Auburn University
Alisha Ali
New York University
Chynna O. Allen
Tulane University
Gordon Alley-Young
Kingsborough Community College
Amanda L. Almond
University of Rhode Island
Le'Marus Alston
North Carolina Central University
Swathi Anantha
University of Texas Medical Branch
Taj Y. Artis
Court Appointed Special Advocates for Children
Larry Ashley
University of Nevada, Las Vegas
Allison Momilani Atkinson
St. Mary's University
Sheri Atwater
California State University, Los Angeles
Hasan Aydin
Yildiz University
Hakan Aydogan
Rutgers University
Jessica Bacon
Lehman College
Lina Baghal
Northeastern State University
Courtney N. Baker
Tulane University
Hudaverdi Balci
Rutgers University
Tundi Balogh
Morrison Child & Family Services
Linda Barley
York College, University of New York
Barbara Barton
Western Michigan State University
Kate N. Battoe
Syracuse University
Melissa Bayne
California State University Sacramento
Amy Beck
Northeastern State University

Diana L. Beck
Knox College
Joan Beder
Yeshiva University
Barbara Giovanna Bello
University of Milano
Rosalyn M. Bertram
University of Missouri–Kansas City
Magdalena Bielenia-Grajewska
University of Gdansk, Poland
Shanondora Billiot
Washington University in St. Louis
Lloyd Glen Bingman
The Bingman Group
Corey Lynn Black
Tulane University
Jessica Black
Washington University in St. Louis
Kristen C. Blinne
University of South Florida
Daniel A. Boamah
University of Louisville
Karmen Boehlke
University of Nevada, Las Vegas
Hillary Bohler
Northern Ontario School of Medicine
Christina Borel
University of Southern California
Sarah E. Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University
Quenika Boston
Crisis Prevention Institute
Suzanne Boyd
University of North Carolina at Charlotte
Kaelen Boyd
York University
Sheryl Brissett Chapman
National Center for Children and Families
Lisa M. Brown
University of South Florida
Kathryn Martinelli Brzozowski
Temple University
Shanna L. Burke
Nonotuck Resource Associates, Inc.
Noël Busch-Armendariz
University of Texas at Austin
Leon James Bynum
Columbia University
Paul E. Calarco, Jr.
Hudson Valley Community College
Daniel J. Calcagnetti
Fairleigh Dickinson University
Ann M. Callahan
Middle Tennessee State University
Kelli E. Canada
University of Missouri
Mary Caplan
University of Georgia
Richard K. Caputo
Yeshiva University
Baris Cayli
University of Stirling
Ibrahim Cetinkaya
Independent Scholar
Padmaja Chalasani
Aneurin Bevan Health Board, Wales
Pajarita Charles University of Chicago
Derek Chechak
Memorial University of Newfoundland
Felix O. Chima
Prairie View A&M University
Kurt Choate
Northeastern State University
Hye Jeong Choi
University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston
Sunkyung Chung
St. Mary's University
Irfan Çiftçi
Rutgers University
G. Arzum Ciloglu
Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health
Christine Clark
University of Nevada, Las Vegas
Lisa Clifton
Cedarville University
Sarah E. Colonna
University of North Carolina at Greensboro
Laurie Cook Heffron
University of Texas at Austin
Veronica L Coriano
Tulane University
Carole Cox
Fordham University
Michelle Cox
Azusa Pacific University

Laurie M. Craigen
Old Dominion University
O. Shawn Cupp
U.S. Army Command and General Staff College
Emirhan Darcan
Rutgers University
Rachel Diana Davidson
University of Wisconsin–Milwaukee
Cynthia Davis
Florida A&M University
Deanna Davis
George Washington University
Lenna Dawkins-Moultin
Texas A&M University
Angelique G. Day
Wayne State University
David DeIuliis
Duquesne University
Omobolade (Bola) O. Delano-Oriaran
St. Norbert College
Irfan Demir
Independent Scholar
Gulay Demir
Yildiz Technical University
Robert A. Dice
Old Dominion University
Catherine A. Dobris
Indiana University–Purdue University Indianapolis
Joanna Doran
California State University, Los Angeles
Davia Cox Downey
Grand Valley State University
Jennifer Drummelsmith
Laurentian University
Aileen Duldulao
Independent Scholar
Kerry Dunn
University of New England
David G. Dunning
University of Nebraska Medical Center
Roxanna Duntley-Matos
Western Michigan University
Jill C. Dustin
Old Dominion University
LaToya E. Eaves
University of Connecticut
Christopher Levon Edwards
Duke University Medical Center
el-Sayed el-Aswad
United Arab Emirates University
Meredith Eliassen
San Francisco State University
Dalia El-Khoury
Virginia Commonwealth University
Rebecca Elkins
University of Cincinnati
Sothy Eng
Lehigh University
Jeremy Ernst
University of Nevada School of Medicine
Lorraine Escribano
Morrison Child & Family Services
Kathleen Coulborn Faller
University of Michigan
Mardi Fallon
University of Cincinnati
Jeniimarie Febres
University of Tennessee–Knoxville
Miriam Helen Feliu
Duke University Medical Center
Ralph Fertig
University of Southern California
Laura Finley
Barry University
Dale Fitch
University of Missouri
Jackie Flaherty
Northeastern State University
Courtney V. (Vail) Fletcher
University of Portland
Olakunle Michael Folami
University of Ulster
Shelby Forbes
University of South Florida
David Julius Ford, Jr.
Old Dominion University
Stephenie Foster
American University
Kimberly Frazier
Texas A&M University
Krystal Freeman
Old Dominion University
Ron Fritz
Independent Scholar
Christine Fulmer
Cedarville University

Megan E. Gandy
Virginia Commonwealth University
James Garbarino
Loyola University Chicago
Charles Garvin
University of Michigan
Catherine Regina Gayle
Tuskegee University
James I. Gerhart
Rush University Medical Center
Dashiel Geyen
Texas Southern University
Camille Gibson
Prairie View A&M University
Sulaimon Giwa
York University
Joy Goldsmith
University of Memphis
Todd Gomez
Northeastern State University
Nirit Gordon
New York University
Shell Gosztyla
Independent Scholar
Kathryn Grimsley
University of North Carolina at Charlotte
Matthew J. Gritter
Angelo State University
Ellen Gutowski
Boston University
Zaid M. Haddad
University of Nevada, Las Vegas
Janet S. Hahn
Western Michigan University
Barbara J. Haile
Florida A&M University
John Handal
Rutgers University
Nasim Haque
York University
Kayla Harris
Pennsylvania State University
Joy L. Hart
University of Louisville
Francis Frederick Hawley
Western Carolina University
Thomas L. Head
Edith Cowan University
Jason A. Helfer
Knox College
Lisa Hines
Wichita State University
Michael P. Hoerger
Tulane University
Jun Sung Hong
Wayne State University
Rana Hong
Loyola University Chicago
Elaine Hsieh
University of Oklahoma
Andrew Jon Hund
United Arab Emirates University
Anh-Luu Huynh-Hohnbaum
California State University
Fatih Irmak
Independent Scholar
Frank Jacob
City University of New York
Kirk Anthony James
University of Pennsylvania
Diederik Floris Janssen
Independent Scholar
J. Jacob Jenkins
California State University, Channel Islands
Joseph Johnson
University of Florida
Kaprea F. Johnson
Old Dominion University
Keith R. Johnson
Oakton Community College
Mark Johnson
De Montfort University
Jenny Jones
Florida A&M University
Celucien L. Joseph
Indian River State College
Grace Karuga
University of Oklahoma
Jasmeet Kaur
University of Texas
Mandeep Kaur
University of Texas–Austin
Ahmet Kaya
Independent Scholar
Ali Kazemi
University of Skövde
Thomas Kelley
Wayne State Universtiy
Robert Wade Kenny
Mount Saint Vincent University

Brianna Kent
Nova Southeastern University
Anna Kern
Emerson College
Nazilla Khanlou
York University
Shenila Khoja-Moolji
Teachers College, Columbia University
Chorong Kim
University of Texas Medical Branch
Peter A. Kindle
University of South Dakota
Claire Kirkland
Kennesaw State University
Eileen Klein
Ramapo College
Andrzej Klimczuk
Warsaw School of Economics, Poland
Wanda B. Knight
Pennsylvania State University
Murat Koçak
Independent Scholar
Rosalind Kopfstein
Western Connecticut State University
Onur M. Koprulu
Rutgers University
Jeffrey Kraus
Wagner College
Lynn C. Kronzek
Independent Scholar
Bill Kte'pi
Independent Scholar
Mailee Kue
University of Rhode Island
Elisabeth Kylberg
University of Skövde
Johanne I. Laboy
North Carolina State University
Lindsay Labrecque
Butler Hospital and Brown University
Carolyn Lagoe
University of New Haven
Christopher Larrison
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign
Shonda Lawrence
Jackson State University
Vi Donna Le
University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston
Chris Lee
University of Calgary
Allyson Leggett Watson
Northeastern State University
George Leibowitz
University of Vermont
James A. Leja
Western Michigan University
Lara Lengel
Bowling Green State University
Christopher Leslie
Polytechnic Institute of New York University
Elizabeth Levin
Laurentian University
Kathleen Levingston
Old Dominion University
Cathleen A. Lewandowski
George Mason University
Jordan Lewis
University of Washington
Kathryn Lewis Ginebaugh
Western Michigan University
Laura A. Lewis
University of Buffalo
Sara Lichtenwalter
Gannon University
Rupali Limaye
Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health
Christine Limone
Fordham University Graduate School of Social Services
Ben Felixavier Linton
Independent Scholar
Shentelle Livan
North Carolina Central University
Alisa Lobaugh
Northeastern State University
Amy Locklear Hertel
University of North Carolina–Chapel Hill
Hector E. Lopez
Inter American University of Puerto Rico
Kim Lorber
Ramapo College of New Jersey
Tamikia S. Lott
Old Dominion University
Stefano Luconi
University of Naples L'Orientale
David Luke
University of Kentucky

Zana Marie Lutfiyya
University of Manitoba
Joan Luxenburg
University of Central Oklahoma
Tracey Mabrey
DePaul University
Tiffany Maglasang
Southern Illinois University Edwardsville
James E. Mahon
Washington and Lee University
Marie L. Mallet
Harvard University
Kathleen Malley-Morrison
Boston University
Michael Mancini
Saint Louis University
Ronald J. Mancoske
Southern University at New Orleans
Susan Marcus-Mendoza
University of Oklahoma
Michelle E. Martin
DePaul University
Kathryn Martinelli Brzozowski
Temple University
Tina Maschi
Fordham University
Amanda Mathisen
Rutgers University
Jeremy Matuszak
University of Nevada, Reno
Philip McCallion
State University of New York, Albany
Susan McCarter
University of North Carolina at Charlotte
Adam McCormick
University of Texas at El Paso
Rob McCusker
Teesside University Business School
Andrea McDonald
Texas A&M University
Kimberly K. McFarland
University of Nebraska Medical Center
Tarryn E. McGhie
University of Nevada, Las Vegas
E. Lisako J. McKyer
Texas A&M University
Monique N. Mercado
St. Mary's University
Jacquelyn C. A. Meshelemiah
Ohio State University
Rachel Messer
Oklahoma State University
Elizabeth Metcalf
Syracuse University
Candace Meyer
Southern Illinois University Edwardsville
Greg A. Meyer
Northeastern State University
Shari Parsons Miller
Independent Scholar
Tammi Milliken
Old Dominion University
Gena Minnix
St. Mary's University
Patit Paban Mishra
Sambalpur University
Prafulla K. Mishra
HelpAge International
Lauren Mizus
University of Vermont
Manoranjan Mohanty
University of the South Pacific
Diane M. Monahan
Saint Leo University
Sharon E. Moore
University of Louisville
Janice M. Moreland
Nationwide Children's Hospital
Jennifer J. Moreland
OhioHealth, Riverside United Methodist Hospital
Devon Morrow
Laurentian University
Terry A. Morrow
Nova Southeastern University
Ruby Morton Gourdine
Howard University
Angela Movileanu
Instituto Universitario de Lisboa
Randolph Mowry
New York University
Tony Murphy
Sheffield Hallam University
Felicia Murray
Texas Woman's University
William N. Myhill
Syracuse University
Laura Nabors
University of Cincinnati

Joel Nadler
Southern Illinois University Edwardsville
Murali D. Nair
University of Southern California
Nicoletta C. Nance
Beacon College
Monica Nandan
Kennesaw State University
Michelle Napierski-Prancl
Russell Sage College
Denese M. Neu
National Louis University
Edward S. Neukrug
Old Dominion University
Ethel Nicdao
University of the Pacific
Maura Nsonwu
North Carolina A&T State University
Kathleen Nthakomwa-Cassidy
Coventry University
Martin Nthakomwa
Coventry University
Lynn M. Nybell
Eastern Michigan University
Elizabeth R. O'Brien
University of Tennessee at Chattanooga
Keisha-Gaye N. O'Garo
Womack Army Medical Center
Robert M. Ortega
University of Michigan
Barbara Cook Overton
Louisiana State University
Murat Ozkan
Rutgers University
Adem Ozkara
Hitit University Ankara
Alessandra Padula
Independent Scholar
Kristin Page
University of Florida
Ione N. Paiva
Old Dominion University
Maria-Carmen Pantea
Babes Bolyai University
Hyejoon Park
University of Illinois
Stacey A. Passalacqua
Rollins College
David Patterson
Washington University in St. Louis
Sue Patterson
Lindsey Wilson College
Desmond Upton Patton
University of Michigan
Ben R. Patty
Independent Scholar
Roger H. Peters
University of South Florida
James E. Phelan
VA Healthcare System
Daniel Webster Phillips
Lindsey Wilson College
Doshie Piper
University of Incarnate Word
Dyah Pitaloka
University of Oklahoma
Maribel Plasencia
Butler Hospital and Brown University
Cynthia Cannon Poindexter
Fordham University
David Porter
Northeastern State University
Miriam Potocky
Florida International University
Daniel Preston
Syracuse University
Adele Proctor
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign
Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar
Eloise Rathbone-McCuan
University of Missouri–Kansas City
Stella Resko
Wayne State University
Wylene Rholetter
Auburn University
Karen Rich
Marywood University
David John Rieker
Long Beach Memorial Medical
Gina Marie Robertiello
Felician College
Cara Robinson
Tennesee State University
Jacqueline Briditte Robinson
Virginia Commonwealth University

Sylvia Rohlfer
Colegio Universitario de Estudios Financieros
Miriam Rollhaus
Hunter College
Jaroslaw Richard Romaniuk
VA Healthcare System
Danielle Roth-Johnson
University of Nevada, Las Vegas
Richard Ruth
George Washington University
Joseph P. Ryan
University of Michigan
Amber E. Salazar
Arizona State University
Stephanie Salerno
Bowling Green State Unviersity
Lorriane A. Samuels
Huston Tillotson University
Mary Sanderfer
Old Dominion University
Natalie Sappleton
Manchester Metropolitan University
Stephanie Elias Sarabia
Ramapo College
Juliann C. Scholl
Texas Tech University
Stephen T. Schroth
Knox College
Karen D. Schwartz
University of Manitoba
Roy Schwartzman
University of North Carolina at Greensboro
Alan M. Schwitzer
Old Dominion University
Cathy Scott
University of Tennessee Chattanooga
Julian Scott
Prairie View A&M University
Kristen D. Seay
Washington University in St. Louis
Blerim Shala
Nova Southeastern University
Marya L. Shegog
University of Nevada, Las Vegas
Jennifer Shepard Payne
University of Illinois Chicago
Ledric D. Sherman
Transdisciplinary Center for Health Equity Research, Texas A&M University
Michael E. Sherr
University of Tennesee Chattanooga
Michael J. Simonton
Northern Kentucky University
C. Dennis Simpson
Western Michigan University
Alka Singh
University Lucknow
Parminder Singh
University of Texas, Austin
R. P. Singh
University of Lucknow
Shweta Singh
Loyola University Chicago
Christine Skubisz
Emerson College
Christine Small Platt
University of Memphis
Laura Smith
Columbia University
Vicki Smith
University of California, Davis
Kevin C. Snow
Old Dominion University
Kayce Solari-Hall
Texas A&M University
Narketta Sparkman
Old Dominion University
Mary Burkhead Spencer
Independent Scholar
Diana Stark Ekman
University of Skövde
Desiree Stepteau-Watson
University of Missssissippi
Lisa M. Stewart
California State University, Monterey Bay
Paul G. Stiles
University of South Florida
Justin Streater
Northeastern State University
Julie A. Strentzsch
St. Mary's University
John Struth
Nonotuck Resource Associates, Inc.
Gregory L. Stuart
University of Tennessee–Knoxville
Nimit Sudan
City of Hope

Mia K. Swan
Old Dominion University
Whitney Szmodis
Lehigh University
Joyce Tang
Queens College of the City University of New York
Ken B. Taylor
New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary
Jeff Temple
University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston
Sachiko Terui
University of Oklahoma
Jennifer Albertha Thompson
Prairie View A&M University
Melva Thompson-Robinson
University of Nevada, Las Vegas
Alma Trinidad
Portland State University
Paige Mayleen True
California State University, Monterey Bay
Celeste T. G. Tuman
Independent Scholar
Karen VanDeusen
Western Michigan University
Melanie Varney
University of Florida
Leticia Villarreal Sosa
Dominican University
Melvin Wade
University of Rhode Island
Nelseta Walters
University of Maryland Eastern Shore
Kaori Mori Want
Shibaura Institute of Technology
Edwina Washington
University of Memphis
Jerry Watson
University of Mississippi
Michelle Taylor Watts
Independent Scholar
Adele Weiner
Metropolitan College of New York
Suzie S. Weng
University of North Florida
Doe West
Wayne State University
Shantel West
Wayne State University
Cirecie West Olatunji
University of Cincinnati
Ray Wetherell
Southern Illinois University Edwardsville
Ashley Whittenton
Northeastern State University
Fay Williams
Northern Caribbean University
Lindsey W. Phillips Wilson
Lindsey Wilson College
Michael Wolf Branigin
George Mason University
Warren Taylor Wolfe
Rockingham Memorial Hospital–Sentara Network
Caitlin Wolford Clevenger
University of Tennesse
Mickie Wong-Lo
Northeastern Illinois University
Kira Woodrow
Old Dominion University
Kenneth Woodson
University of Cincinnati
Stephanie Woodward
Syracuse University
Jody A. Worley
University of Oklahoma
Danielle Wozniak
University of New England
Paul Wright
California State University, Monterey Bay
Abigail Wyche
Northern Michigan University
Philip Q. Yang
Texas Woman's University
Melda N. Yildiz
Kean University
M. Scott Young
University of South Florida
Sostene Zangari
Politecnico di Milano
Marsha Zibalese-Crawford
Temple University
Jade Zimpfer
University of Edinburgh
Yacov Zobel
Independent Scholar
Lorna Lueker Zukas
National University

Introduction

Human services are part and parcel of the evolution of people everywhere in the world. Whether formal or informal, grassroots or indigenous, geo-globally Western or Eastern, religious or secular, public or private, what we call human services is the result of the actions of individuals, families, organizations, communities, villages, cities, states, and countries to prevent and solve problems of living in an ever-changing world. Likewise, human diversity—when not reduced to biological differences or truncated into simplistic categories solely along the lines of race, ethnicity, and gender—is an intrinsic part of such an evolution, even while it is growing in scope and awareness and, it is our hope, acceptance. Indeed, human diversity has an intricate and intimate relationship with human services whether in terms of a small village town in Iowa, across the globe in a village in east Africa, or in a large metropolis such as New York City or Mumbai, India. In the end, the problems on which human services and diversity focus are universal, and the social, economic, and political inequities and related causes and effects increasingly overlap and are growing. But perhaps within this shared destiny lay the answers and the hope for progressive human services.

Recently I conducted an observation of Hispanic parents and Hispanic and non-Hispanic school staff and human services workers as they interacted in a workshop focused on increasing parent involvement in students' knowledge and preparation for college or university. Set in a midsize midwestern city with a rapidly increasing Hispanic population, my goal was to evaluate the effectiveness of a community-based human services agency in increasing parent–child involvement in order to improve educational and social-behavioral outcomes. Aside from language, ethnicity, race, educational status, gender, family structure, and age, diversity issues in this case include immigration status and processes, homeland security and law enforcement, and socioeconomic-status challenges related to earning a living wage and securing adequate food, transportation, health care, and shelter. This circumstance is more or less typical of contemporary human services, with remnants of the past and future. Indeed, it anticipates some of the challenges that must be addressed as the field moves forward. However, before addressing the challenges and future of human services and diversity, human services and diversity need to be defined.

Human Services Definition and History

Holding in mind the power and hegemony of developed and industrialized nations both to define realities and enforce scientific uniformity, and taking into consideration less powerful counterparts that are also engaged in human services, human services, in my view, can be only arbitrarily defined. As such, we use as a foundation for a definition the National Organization for Human Services, which says, "The field of Human Services is broadly defined, uniquely approaching the objective of meeting human needs through an interdisciplinary knowledge base, focusing on prevention as well as remediation of problems, and maintaining a commitment to improving the overall quality of life of service populations." Human services encompass a broad array of professional activities to prevent and ameliorate social, emotional, psychological, economic, political, and related difficulties in living faced by individuals, families, and small groups. Some services are delivered in and address neighborhoods and communities and beyond. Many services are interdisciplinary and interprofessional because they involve psychologists, social workers, nurses, and health care and allied health workers, educators, and the like. Many of the entries in this encyclopedia are evidence of the variety and complexity of the field alluded to here.

Historically speaking, the foundation of contemporary human services is built on the tradition of helping and support people have provided to one another in different circumstances across the world. The distribution of food; the provision of security, shelter, education, child care, and medical care; indigenous interventions for mental and social ills and so forth from prehistory to the well-documented Elizabethan Poor Laws of 1601, which codified services for the able-bodied and nonable-bodied poor, are precursors and provided a template for human services in the early United States. The emergence of increasingly formal and complex human services organizations and services could include the YMCA; YWCA; Catholic, Jewish, and Protestant Aid Societies; and penitentiaries and juvenile justice services and reforms of the 1700s and 1800s. Added to this is the development of social, medical, and economic services in postwar periods of the late 1800s to the 1930s (Civil War, World War I, and World War II, for example), leading up to the emergence of the modern welfare state in terms of the U.S. Social Security Act of 1935.

The development of medical interventions and social science theory from the 1950s forward opened pathways for the more deliberate infusion of science into social welfare policy and human services in terms of mental health diagnosis and intervention; intelligence tests; poverty management through nutritional projects, job training, and housing programs (large and small public housing projects); and the eventual attempts to draw research-based correlations among social, economic, and behavioral conditions to prevent, manage, or eliminate undesirable social and behavioral outcomes.

In recent years, the field of human services has grown to include a complex mix of public and private, philanthropically and publically funded, faith-based and volunteer-driven organizations and services. Services are still provided in neighborhoods, communities, states, and at national levels. However, international human services have seen a tremendous increase, based in Western traditions and with sensitivity to the human diversity (e.g., Peace Corps, Oxfam, the United Nations initiatives, etc.). Such changes may be appreciated in terms of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Cultural Diversity and United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) membership in the late 1940s (1948 and 1945, respectively). Nonetheless, long-standing and emergent inequities in economic resources and political stability suggest the need for a system of complex and globally responsive human services. Cases in point include economic, social, and political inequality in countries such as Russia and China; the need for clean water, sustainable food sources, disease control, education, and reproductive health in developing countries; the emergent and dire needs for social, psychological, and economic services for people in war-torn places such as Afghanistan, Iraq, and various other countries and regions in Africa; and countries such as Haiti that have been torn by natural disasters.

In short, if there is a common thread running through contemporary human services it would be vast human diversity, but with overlapping social, economic, and political problems. However, if there is a common need it is to develop and deliver services around the notion of political advocacy—what some might call social justice work in human services, centered in "evidence-based" services and "best practices," with sensitivity and knowledge regarding human diversity and social and economic development. This encyclopedia includes entries on such threads and needs.

Diversity and Human Services

Directly connected to the history and practice of human services are the realities of human difference we call here diversity. The conceptualization and delivery of human services is impacted by human diversity in constructive and nonconstructive ways. Diversity has to include simple and complex differences based on place (i.e., different continents, nations, countries, and states and based in rural, urban, and suburban environments), but also based in different traditions, customs, and worldviews aligned with differences of race, ethnicity, age, gender, religion, language, sexual orientation, physical characteristics, socioeconomic status, cognitive and emotional abilities, and the like. It is increasingly clear that human services are most effective in preventing and ameliorating problems when they are delivered in terms of such sensibilities. The entries in this encyclopedia cross the globe and go deep within the dominant Western traditions in the United States and, to a lesser extent, Europe, Asia, Africa, and elsewhere, to provide an array of views on diversity in human services. For example, there are entries on services to groups immigrating to the United States; entries on international variations in attitudes toward issues such as alcoholism, parenting, conflict resolution, and help-seeking; entries on honor killings, the "stolen generation" of children in Australia, and human trafficking; and entries on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the United Nations (UN) Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Challenges and the Future

One of the challenges of human services can be thought of in terms of quality that is based on best practices, but with a caveat. This is about reaching those who need services, but who need them delivered competently, which is to say in the context of both human diversity and our best knowledge of the conditions of living on which human services focus. In particular, human services providers and researchers must continue to study and mediate the biases we seem reluctant to overcome as people (e.g., religious, ethnic, socioeconomic-status derived, gender, sexual orientation), especially the biases we continue to propagate through political processes that intentionally and unintentionally divide people in ways that are harmful for humankind no matter the place. Entries on child labor, the lingering effects of colonialism, sweatshop laborers, U.S. citizenship and immigration services, female genital mutilation, migrant workers, and the UN High Commissioner for Refugees point in that direction.

Although I consider diversity a long-standing and current challenge facing human services, a concomitant challenge is technology. The world is flatter and thus there are more cross-continent and cross-border interactions, exposure of commonalities and differences, and the increasing, rapid, and unpredictable emergence of complexities that grow from such interactions. Technology can assist by increasing opportunities to share knowledge as well as modes of services and service providers. For example, the American Public Human Services Association (APHSA) suggests human services can go beyond computer-based determination of eligibility and problem identification to an integrated service delivery process versus the single-service process of the past. Integrated service delivery includes assessing eligibility, determining and planning services, providing case management, and monitoring services and outcomes. It can provide research-based, best practices through comprehensive services, service monitoring, and the measurement of outcomes and impact. It also means making connections between a client's behavioral outcomes and the broader impact on well-being in families, neighborhoods, schools, communities, and the like. The Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, the International Mental Health Research Organization, and the Youth Risk Behavioral Surveillance System, among many others, point in this direction.

Organization of Entries

The entries in this encyclopedia are wide-ranging and overlap in many areas. We do not cover all areas of human services and diversity, but we do cover many traditional areas as well as many areas that have emerged in recent years. Our arbitrary categorization includes the following:

- Populations such as infants, children, adults, and families, women, various racial and ethnic groups, religious groups, the incarcerated, the elderly, the poor, and so forth.

- Fields of Focus/Practice such as mental health, health care, education, aging and adult services, adoption, alternative medicine, and child abuse and neglect.
- Systems/Organizations, which includes the Administration on Children, Youth and Families, the Administration for Community Living, the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, and the Office of Refugee Resettlement.
- Practices and Competencies, which includes adult literacy programs, alcohol and substance abuse services, needs of child abuse and neglect victims, needs of children involved in war, and cultural humility and cultural competence.
- Processes/Policies related to acculturation, cultural assimilation, adoption and foster care, Native American/American Indian youth, and the rights of persons with disabilities, veterans, immigrants, and many others.

In sum, the reader will find that all entries in this encyclopedia address to some extent diversity in human services, although there is wide variation in their levels of relevance, significance ,and application. How one views the entries likely depends on one's worldview, experience, and location in the world of human needs and issues. But then there is the future. And in addition to addressing human diversity and evidenced-based services and other needs identified earlier, the future calls for more cross-global entries. The future also calls for entries that address the technological needs of service providers and organizations. In both cases responses must be based in the best of what is known about human needs and issues, but the application must always take into consideration the on-the-ground contexts.

Linwood H. Cousins
Editor

Chronology

1619: A group of 20 Africans are brought to Jamestown, Virginia, making them the first Africans in the Western Hemisphere.

1657: One of the first self-help groups in colonial America, the Scots Charitable Society of Boston, is founded by 27 individuals; by 1690, it has 180 members.

1775: The first abolitionist society in the United States, the Pennsylvania Society for the Abolition of Slavery, is founded.

1833: Oberlin College, in Oberlin, Ohio, becomes the first coeducational college in the United States, allowing men and women to study together.

1848: As part of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo at the conclusion of the Mexican American War, thousands of Mexicans become Mexican American citizens of the United States.

1849: In Roberts v. City of Boston, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court rules that racial segregation in the public school system is permissible.

1849: In Tuolumne County, California, the first anti-Chinese violence recorded in the United States occurs as about 60 Chinese miners are chased out of a mining camp; similar anti-Chinese actions follow in other mining camps.

1850: California enacts a tax on foreign miners, aimed at limiting competition following the migration of large numbers of people following discovery of gold at Sutter's Mill; the new law first applies primarily to Mexicans, but later the Chinese become the focus of the most enforcement.

1850–80: The Chinese population of the United States increases from 7,520 to 105,465.

1851: Harriet Beecher Stowe publishes Uncle Tom's Cabin, a novel denouncing the evils of slavery that was influential in bringing more people to the abolitionist cause.

1863: The Emancipation Proclamation declares that slaves in Confederate states are free, although in practice they will not be freed until the Civil War ends in 1865.

1864: The Children's Aid Society, led by Charles Loring Brace, begins putting orphans, and children whose parents are willing to give them up, on "orphan trains," which will take them from New York City to small towns and rural areas that are believed to provide a better atmosphere in which to grow up.

1866: The Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is ratified, giving former slaves equal protection and rights under the law, including, for men, the right to vote.

1868: The American Missionary Association founds the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute, a school headed by General Samuel Chapman Armstrong to educate African Americans in the manual trades; the first Native Americans are admitted to the school in 1878.

1869: The first Charity Organization Society in the United States is founded in Buffalo, New York, modeled on a similar organization in London; by 1912, there will be 154 charity organization societies in the United States.

1870: The U.S. Census shows that almost all (96 percent) of foreign-born residents came from Scandinavia, the British Isles, and other countries in northern Europe.

1870: The first federal appropriations are made to support schools specifically for Native American children, and by 1899, almost 20,000 Native American children are being educated in 148 boarding schools and 225 day schools.

1870s: The U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs begins establishing boarding schools for Native American children, in the belief that such schools will be more efficient in assimilating the children to the dominant American culture and separating them from the culture of their families.

1874: In New York City, Henry Bergh, the leader of the local chapter of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, intervenes to remove a young girl, Mary Ellen Wilson, from her abusive caregivers; this case leads to the establishment of the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

1874: Founding of the Chautauqua Movement by John H. Vincent and Lew Miller; originally an outgrowth of a summer Bible camp in western New York, the Chautauqua Movement will grow to include correspondence courses, touring exhibitions, and reading circles.

1879: Captain Richard Pratt obtains support to open a school for Native Americans, the Carlisle Indian Industrial School, in Carlisle, Pennsylvania; the school is financially supported by Congress and continues in operation until 1918, enrolling over 1,000 students in its peak years.

1879: The German Protestant Orphan Asylum Association is founded in Washington, D.C., to assist orphans and half orphans of German descent.

1880s–1924: The first major wave of immigration to the United States of people from Arab-speaking countries, many of whom are Christians from what is now Syria, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, and Palestine. This first wave of immigration ends with the passage of the National Origins Act.

1881: Spelman College is founded in Atlanta as the Atlanta Baptist Female Seminary to educate African American women who had been slaves, and to prepare women to serve as good homemakers and mothers, as well as educating them to be teachers and missionaries.

1882: The Chinese Exclusion Act restricts Chinese citizens from immigrating to the United States for 10 years; it is renewed and extended many times.

1883: Connecticut makes it illegal to create a boarding school for African American students without obtaining the permission of the civil authorities of the town in which the school is located. This so-called Black Law is aimed at a girl's school run by the abolitionist Prudence Crandall in Canterbury, Connecticut, which accepted both white and African American students.

1887: Under the Dawes Severalty Act, Native Americans can become voting citizens if they become farmers and live apart from other members of their tribe, and shares of reservation land are allocated to families and individuals. Both measures are aimed at destroying the group identity of Native Americans, dispersing them across the country, and breaking the power of the tribe as the key social organization for Native Americans.

1889: Jane Addams founds Hull House, a social settlement house, in Chicago; Addams is involved in a Protestant evangelical church, but sees Hull House as an alternative to traditional churches because it does not divide people based on their religion.

1890: The U.S. Census reveals that 21 percent of European immigrants to the United States are from southern and eastern Europe, an increase from the 5.4 percent found in the 1880 census, but fewer than the 49 percent in the 1900 census.

1891: The U.S. federal immigration bureau has only 28 staff members, a number that will increase by 4,200 percent to 1,200 by 1906.

1893: Hallie Q. Brown founds the Colored Woman's League, a self-help organization for African American women; in 1896, the league joins with the National Federation of Afro-American Women to form the National Association of Colored Women.

1893: The National Council of Jewish Women is founded in Chicago to address the needs of female Jewish immigrants.

1895: In Boston, the infant mortality rate is 216 per 1,000 live births, an extremely high rate attributed in part to poor living conditions in the poor and crowded areas of the city.

1895: The Eight Ward Settlement House is established in Philadelphia specifically to assist African Americans.

1896: The U.S. Supreme Court declares in Plessy v. Ferguson that states can require public facilities to be segregated by race, as long as the facilities provided to each race are equal.

1896: The National Association of Colored Women (NACW) is formed by merging the Colored Women's Clubs and the National Federation of Afro-American Women; the NACW will hold its first convention in 1897, and biennially thereafter.

1898: Mary Richmond founds the first professional training program for social workers.

1898: Victoria Earle Matthews establishes the White Rose Mission in New York City to serve the needs of the African American community; it continues in operation until the 1960s.

1899: In Colorado and Illinois, legislation is passed to create the first juvenile courts, a reform effort based on the realization that juveniles in trouble with the law might be better served outside the adult court system.

1900: Thirty-three U.S. cities have populations of 100,000 or more, a substantial increase from 1860, when only eight cities had populations of 100,000 or more.

1900: The U.S. Census includes only two categories for race: white and colored, with the latter category including Native Americans and Asians. About 88 percent of the U.S. population is classified as white, with most of the rest (11 percent) made up of African Americans.

1900s: The first wave of Korean immigration to the United States; most of these immigrants are agricultural laborers, picture brides, students, or political refugees.

1902: John D. Rockefeller creates the General Education Board (GEB), a philanthropic organization designed to improve education in the south without discrimination among students on the basis of race, gender, or religion; the GEB is chartered by Congress in 1903.

1902: Texas adopts a poll tax to discourage Mexican Americans from voting.

1903: The Pensionado Act of 1903 creates a program providing funds to enable Filipino students to study in the United States as a means of fostering goodwill between the United States and the Philippines, and providing impetus for the Philippines to seek its own independence; the program continues until 1928.

1908: Colonel Allen Allensworth founds the town of Allensworth, California; the town, whose population was entirely African American, remains in existence until 1930.

1908: Berea College, in Berea, Kentucky, is convicted of violating a state law by accepting both white and black students; the decision is upheld by both the Kentucky State Supreme Court and the U.S. Supreme Court.

1908: Israel Zangwill's play The Melting Pot puts forth the concept that immigrants to the United States, no matter their race or geographic origin, will all unite to form a new type of person—the American—and a new nation.

1909: W. E. B. Du Bois founds the National Association for the Advancement for Colored People (NAACP); the organization grew out of the Negro National Committee, adopting the NAACP name in 1910.

1911: The Phelps Stokes Fund is created by the will of Caroline Phelps Stokes in order to offer improved educational opportunities to the poor as well as African Americans, Africans, and Native Americans.

1913: California passes the Alien Land Act, prohibiting Japanese individuals from purchasing land or allowing children to inherit land already owned; Japanese individuals are allowed to lease land for three years.

1915: The NAACP pickets showings of D. W. Griffith's feature film Birth of a Nation, which glorifies the Ku Klux Klan and presents African Americans in extremely stereotypical fashion.

1915: American educator Abraham Flexner declares, in a speech at the National Conference of Charities and Corrections, that social work is not a profession.

1917: The Jones-Shafroth Act makes all Puerto Ricans U.S. citizens and creates a senate in Puerto Rico.

1917: Race riots, aimed at African American residents, break out in East St. Louis, Illinois, and many other U.S. cities, including Chicago; a second wave of brutal mob violence will sweep many American cities in 1919.

1917: In Social Diagnosis, M. E. Richmond describes alcoholism as a disease, an opinion that is later adopted in medicine and social work.

1917–20: Hundreds of thousands of African Americans move from the south to the cities of the north, in part to take advantage of jobs available in war industries.

1919: The Jamaican-born African American leader Marcus Garvey founds the Black Star Line, a shipping line intended to transport African Americans back to Africa.

1919: A group of white men found the Commission on Interracial Cooperation in Atlanta, aiming to bring together African American and white leaders and to defuse tensions caused by the return of African American soldiers from World War I; in 1920, the commission begins involving women as well and holds its first interracial women's conference in Memphis in October 1920.

1919: Passage of the Volstead Act, a federal law that enables implementation of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, which prohibits the production and consumption of alcohol; the Volstead Act is repealed in 1933.

1920: On August 26, the Nineteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is ratified, giving women the right to vote; this day is celebrated around the country as Equality Day.

1920: About 1 percent of the population of Kansas is Mexican American; the 13,770 Mexican Americans in the state represent a substantial increase from the 71 recorded in 1900, and the 8,429 in 1910.

1921: The Quota Act imposes a 3 percent quota on the number of people immigrating from a given country who were in the United States in 1910. This quota is changed in 1924 to 2 percent of the population in the country in 1890, a change that favors northern European individuals as they were heavily represented among the immigrants in 1890.

1923: The U.S. Supreme Court in Meyer v. Nebraska overturns a Nebraska law banning the teaching of foreign languages to students below the eighth grade.

1925: The Neighborhood House, a settlement house in Gary, Indiana, votes to begin serving Mexican Americans and begins offering sermons in Spanish.

1927: In Farrington v. Tokushige, the U.S. Supreme Court rules that parents have the right to send their children to Japanese-language schools.

1927: In Gong Lum v. Rice, the U.S. Supreme Court rules that a Mississippi school district may prohibit Chinese students from attending public schools for white children.

1929: The League of Latin American Citizens (LULAC) is founded in Corpus Christi, Texas, to improve the conditions of Latinos in the United States, including education, economic conditions, and health and well-being.

1929–34: An estimated 400,000 persons of Mexican descent, some of them U.S. citizens, are escorted out of the United States, voluntarily or involuntarily, as part of a repatriation program.

1930s: The number of social workers in the United States approximately doubles, to about 30,000.

1931: Rowland Hazard, a business executive, is advised by Carl Jung that his best hope for curing his alcoholism is through spirituality. Hazard joins the Oxford Group upon his return to the United States, and the principles of that organization influence the formation of Alcoholics Anonymous in 1935.

1932: Beginning of the Tuskegee Syphilis Experiment, an observation study by the U.S. Public Health Service of the progression of untreated syphilis in African Americans; the study continues until 1972, long after effective treatments for the disease have become available.

1932: Myles Horton establishes the Highlander Folk School, later the Highlander Center for Research and Education, in Tennessee to help adults work together to implement strategies to address local concerns such as poverty and bigotry.

1934: The Service Bureau for Intercultural Education is founded by Rachel Davis DuBois to foster the development of cultural pluralism and understanding among different racial and ethnic groups.

1935: The National Council of Negro Women (NCNW) is formed to improve the status of African American women and to help coordinate the activities of other African American women's organizations; Mary McLeod Bethune is the first NCNW president.

1935: Bill Wilson, a recovered alcoholic, begins holding Oxford Group meetings in his home; the spiritual and self-improvement philosophy of the Oxford Group heavily influences the creation of Alcoholics Anonymous.

1939: Bill Wilson and Robert Smith, known within the movement as Bill. W. and Dr. Bob, publish the first edition of Alcoholics Anonymous: The Story of How Many Thousands of Men and Women Have Recovered from Alcoholism, also known as "The Big Book"; among other things, this volume describes the 12-step program, which is a cornerstone of Alcoholics Anonymous.

1940: Founding of the National Federation of the Blind, an advocacy group and membership organization; it is the first civil rights organization in the United States organized around a disability.

1942: Executive Order 9066, signed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, authorizes the removal and internment of persons of Japanese ancestry (including U.S. citizens) living in some western states; about 120,000 Japanese and Japanese Americans are incarcerated under this order.

1943: The bracero program allows Mexicans to work temporarily in the United States in order to alleviate the wartime shortage of labor.

1943: The Magnuson Act repeals the Chinese Exclusion Act and allows 105 Chinese to immigrate to the United States each year.

1946: In Mendez et al. v. Westminster School District of Orange County, the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles rules that segregating Mexican American students from white students in the public school system is a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of equal protection under the law.

1946: The U.S. Supreme Court rules in Morgan v. Commonwealth of Virginia that interstate buses must not be segregated. The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) stages a deliberate test of this ruling in 1947, by sending a bus with eight white and eight black passengers through the south, which results in several passengers being arrested in North Carolina.

1947: The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit rules in Mendez et al. v. Westminster School District of Orange County that requiring Mexican American children to attend different schools from white students is a violation of their rights.

1947: In Everson v. Board of Education, Irving Township, the U.S. Supreme Court rules that using public funds to bus children to private schools, including those run by religious organizations, is not a violation of the First Amendment.

1948: The U.S. Supreme Court rules in Sipuel v. Board of Regents of the University of Oklahoma that law schools may not discriminate on the basis of race in admissions decisions.

1948: The U.S. Supreme Court rules in McCollum v. Board of Education that public schools may not hold religion classes during the regular school day.

1948: The U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas rules in Delgado v. Bastrop Independent School District that public schools cannot segregate Mexican American students in separate schools, although they can provide separate classes as needed for language enrichment.

1948: On July 26, President Harry Truman officially prohibits segregation in the U.S. Armed Forces by signing Executive Order 9981.

1950: In Sweatt v. Painter and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, the U.S. Supreme Court rules that African Americans have the right to attend and receive full financial benefits from state graduate schools.

1950–64: The second wave of Korean immigration to the United States, mostly war orphans and wives of American servicemen.

1952: E. M. Jellink publishes "Phases of Alcohol Addiction" in Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol; this influential article promotes the concept of alcoholism as a disease.

1954: The U.S. Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education overturns the "separate but equal" standard established in Plessy v. Ferguson.

1954: In Hernandez v. Texas, the U.S. Supreme Court acknowledges that Hispanics are a separate class of people who suffer discrimination in the United States

1955: The Daughters of Bilitis, a lesbian organization, is founded in San Francisco. It becomes a voice for both lesbian and women's rights and begins publishing a magazine, The Ladder, in 1960.

1955: On December 1, African American Rosa Parks refuses to give up her seat on a Montgomery, Alabama, public bus to a white man. She is arrested, and on December 5, African Americans begin boycotting the city bus system, an action that plays a key role in the Civil Rights movement.

1955: Creation of the National Association of Social Workers (NASW) through the consolidation of seven organizations; the NASW will become the world's largest membership organization for social workers.

1957: The Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) is founded in Atlanta to work for civil rights, including voter registration for African Americans.

1959: The United Nations General Assembly adopts the Declaration of the Rights of the Child;

among the rights specified are the right to healthy development, education, protection from neglect, freedom from discrimination, and appropriate care and treatment for handicapped children.

1959: The Board of Supervisors in Prince Edward County, Virginia, suspends all public schools rather than comply with the demand to end segregation. The schools are reopened in 1964 by order of the U.S. Supreme Court, as articulated in Griffin v. School Board of Prince Edward County.

1960: A sit-in by a group of African American students at a whites-only lunch counter in Greensboro, North Carolina, is given wide publicity and is followed by similar demonstrations in over 50 other cities.

1960: The National Association of Social Workers (NASW) publishes its first code of ethics; as of 1999, the NASW Code of Ethics has been revised six times.

1961: The White House Conference on Aging recommends that the states develop adult protective services, through the cooperation of the medical profession, social service agencies, bar associations, and legal aid societies, to protect vulnerable adults from abuse, neglect, and self-neglect.

1961: President John F. Kennedy establishes the Peace Corps on a trial basis with Executive Order 10924; R. Sargent Shriver serves as the first director, developing programs in 55 countries by 1966.

1962: The political scientist Michael Harrington publishes The Other America, drawing attention to the large numbers of Americans living in poverty.

1962: In California, Cesar Chavez creates the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, now known as the United Farm Workers of America; in 1965, it organizes a successful national boycott against the Delano, California, grape growers.

1962: In Engel v. Vitale, the U.S Supreme Court rules that beginning a public school day with a prayer is a violation of freedom of religion, even if students are free to not participate in the prayer.

1963: The Equal Pay Act of 1963, a federal law, requires employers to pay men and women equally for comparable work.

1964: The federal Civil Rights Act of 1964 bans discrimination on the basis of race, ethnicity, gender, religion, or national origin and applies to many spheres of life, including education and voting.

1964: The Head Start program is created as part of the Office of Economic Opportunity to provide enhanced educational opportunities and health and nutrition programs for preschool children from poor families; it will become the largest federal program to assist poor children.

1965: Chinese immigration to the United States expands substantially following passage of the McCarran Act of 1950, increasing from 237,393 in 1965, to 1.6 million in 1995, and 2.9 million in 2000.

1965: The federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 prohibits discriminatory voting practices and establishes federal oversight of elections in regions that have a history of restricting some individuals' right to vote.

1965: Beginning of the second wave of immigration from Arab-speaking countries to the United States; these immigrants come from all over the Arab world, and most are of the Muslim faith.

1965: Following passage of the Older Americans Act and the creation of the Administration on Aging, there is substantial growth in the services provided for senior citizens and their families, including establishment of senior centers and adult day care centers, provision of services such as home-delivered meals, and outreach, referral, and case management services.

1966–73: About 10 percent of the population of Cuba migrates to the United States.

1967: The National Welfare Rights Organization (NWRO) is founded to represent the needs of welfare recipients, primarily women with dependent children; goals of the NWRO include a guaranteed annual income for all Americans and increased dignity, justice, and democracy for welfare recipients.

1968: The federal Fair Housing Act bans discrimination in housing on the basis of race, color, gender, religion, national origin, handicap, or familial status; among the barred actions are the refusal to rent or sell, the creation of different terms for rental or sale, and blockbusting.

1968: A Ford Foundation grant of $2.2 million helps found the Mexican American Legal Defense Fund (MALDEF), which aims to protect the civil rights of Latinos.

1968–69: Students and faculty at San Francisco State College strike and present the administration with a number of demands, including increasing minority enrollment and creating ethnic studies programs.

1971: President Richard M. Nixon declares a War on Drugs, motivated in part by the number of military veterans returning from Vietnam with drug addictions; creation of the Drug Enforcement Administration was part of this "war," as were creation of the Special Office for Drug Abuse Prevention and the establishment of methadone treatment facilities across the United States.

1972: Title IX of the Educational Amendments to the Higher Education Act requires that women be treated equally in colleges and universities; the most visible manifestation of Title IX is the creation of many women's sports programs, but it also applies in matters such as academic employment and student scholarships (e.g., the Rhodes Scholarships, formerly for men only, are now available to both men and women).

1973: Founding of the Children's Defense Fund (CDF), a private organization that advocates for the rights of children.

1973: In Keyes v. School District No. 1, the U.S. Supreme Court rules that Latinos are a minority group and must be considered in desegregation decisions, and that segregation created by gerrymandering of school districts is illegal.

1974: The Council on Social Work Education (CSWE) implements the first standards to accredit bachelor's programs in social work.

1974: In Milliken v. Bradley, the U.S. Supreme Court strikes down a lower court decision ordering the suburbs of Detroit to integrate with urban schools; part of this decision was the ruling that de facto segregation (segregation in fact, but not by force of law) was beyond the jurisdiction of the courts, while de jure segregation (ordered and maintained by the legal system) was not.

1974: Passage of the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, the first federal law to enforce national standards in measures to prevent and treat child abuse.

1974: U.S. District Court Judge W. Arthur Garrity orders the public school system of Boston to begin busing students to achieve desegregation.

1974: The federal Equal Educational Opportunity Act requires public schools to create bilingual programs and additional assistance in learning English for students who need it.

1975: Large numbers of Vietnamese begin immigrating to the United States following the end of the Vietnam War.

1975: The Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act gives Native Americans more control over the education of their children, provides funds to build public schools on reservations, and creates preferences for Native Americans in the granting of subcontracts.

1975: A group of African American students at the University of Mississippi file a lawsuit in federal court, arguing that the state should provide more equitable funding to traditionally black colleges.

1976: In Tarasoff v. the Regents of the University of California, the California Supreme Court rules that preventing harm to third parties may overrule the usual presumption of privacy between a psychotherapist and patient, and that the psychotherapist has the responsibility to inform others (e.g., the police, the patient's family) if there is a reasonable threat that the patient will harm someone.

1978: Two pieces of federal legislation, the American Indian Religious Freedom Act and the Indian Child Welfare Act, recognize the importance of Native American culture to tribal members.

1978: The U.S. Supreme Court in University of California Regents v. Bakke prohibits universities from establishing racial quotas for admissions.

1980s: Companies take advantage of the free trade zone or macquila along the United States/Mexico border, and begin building factories (maquiladoras) there to take advantage of low-cost Mexican labor and proximity to the United States.

1982: The federal Job Training Partnership Act provides summer youth employment programs and funding for training programs for poor adults and young people.

1982: The U.S. Supreme Court rules in Plyler v. Doe that undocumented immigrant children have the right to a free and equal public education.

1984: Passage of the Carl Perkins Vocational Education Act, which provides federal funds to develop vocational and technical education programs for young people and adults in order to prepare them for employment; the Perkins Act is reauthorized in 1990 and 1998.

1987: P. B. Baltes publishes "Theoretical Propositions of Life-Span Developmental Psychology: On the Dynamics Between Growth and Decline" in Developmental Psychology, putting forth the theory that development is a multidimensional process that continues throughout the life span.

1988: The Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) is created to help coordinate federal government research, health policy, security, and legislation relating to drugs.

1988: The Civil Liberties Act, signed by President Ronald Reagan, awards reparations of $20,000 to each survivor of the Japanese internment camps set up in the United States during World War II.

1989: Walter Kopp, a student at Princeton University, creates Teach for America to provide an opportunity for graduating college and university students to teach in underserved schools in rural and urban areas.

1990: Passage of the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA), a federal law stating that every child has a right to an appropriate public education, and providing funds to states to improve their educational programs for children with emotional, mental, or physical disabilities.

1990: Secondary school educator Kevin Jennings founds the Gay, Lesbian and Straight Education Network to advocate for the rights of individuals of all sexual orientations and gender identities to feel safe and respected in elementary and secondary schools.

1990: Fifty American college graduates form the first corps of Teach for America; as of 2013, about 33,000 people have taken part in the program, which places college graduates as teachers in low-income areas.

1992: Tony Grasso publishes the edited collection Research Utilization in the Social Services, arguing for the importance of agency-based research, that is, research conducted within a social service agency and carried out by the agency's staff.

1992: President Bill Clinton raises the position of director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, also known as the "Drug Czar," to Cabinet status.

1993: Increased attention is focused on human smuggling following the death of eight Chinese immigrants aboard the New Venture, a ship attempting to bring them illegally into the United States.

1994: The North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), creating a trade bloc consisting of the United States, Canada, and Mexico, goes into effect.

1994: The International Federation of Social Workers (IFSW) publishes its first code of ethics, Ethics in Social Work: Statement of Principles; the IFSW code is revised in 2004.

1996: In Hopwood v. State of Texas, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit rules that colleges and universities may not use race or national origin as a factor in admissions decisions; the plaintiff, Cheryl Hopwood, is a white student who claimed she was discriminated against in the admissions process at the University of Texas Law School because of her race.

1999: Passage of the Foster Care Independence Act, a federal law providing funding to the states to develop programs to help young adults aging out of the foster care system (typically at age 18) make the transition to independent adulthood.

2002: Kevin Kumashiro coins the term antioppressive education to refer to practices and strategies teachers can draw on to counter what he sees as oppressive characteristics of schools.

2002: The Education Sciences Reform Act of 2002 creates the Institution of Education Sciences (IES), a federal organization within the U.S. Department of Education, replacing the Office of Educational Research and Improvement; the IES includes the National Center for Education Research, the National Center for Education Statistics, and the National Center for Evaluation and Regional Assistance.

2004: The National Association of Social Workers (NASW) establishes the NASW Center for Workforce Studies to collect information about the social work labor force, enhance professional development, and disseminate information about evidence-based practices.

2004: Jose Spring publishes Deculturalization and the Struggle for Equality: A Brief History of the Education of the Dominated Cultures in the United States, a book arguing that American schools have systematically devalued and disrupted minority cultural values and forced a curriculum, language, and cultural practices based in Anglo-American values on students.

2006: The National Association of Social Workers issues "Standards for Cultural Competence in Social Work Practice"; areas covered include language diversity, cross-cultural leadership, service delivery, empowerment and advocacy, self-awareness, and ethics and values.

2008: The U.S. Census Bureau predicts that minority groups taken collectively will constitute a majority in the United States by 2042, earlier than the previously projected date of 2050.

2010: President Barack Obama signs the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, an overhaul of the U.S. healthcare system intended to make health insurance accessible to most or all Americans, with changes to be phased in over a period of years.

2010–20: According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the U.S. Department of Labor, the social work profession is expected to grow by 25 percent between 2010 and 2020.

2011: According to a report from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), diabetes continues to disproportionately affect African Americans, with 18.7 percent of non-Hispanic blacks estimated to have diabetes, as compared to 10.2 percent of non-Hispanic whites.

2012: A report by the Pew Institute finds that over half (54 percent) of American Hispanics prefer to be identified by their family's country of origin rather than by the Hispanic label.

2013: In March, the National Association of Social Workers holds a national forum in Washington, D.C., on the "feminization of poverty," a term coined by social work researcher Diana Pearce 35 years earlier.

2013: In June, the National Association of Social Workers issues a statement commending the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in U.S. v. Windsor, which ruled that the Defense of Marriage Act was unconstitutional.

2013: In July, an analysis by Erkan Gören at the University of Oldenburg, Germany, finds the United States near the middle of all nations in terms of ethnic diversity, ranking between Russia and Spain.

2013: In August, the exemption granted to religious organizations that provide health care under the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, in which they were temporarily freed from being required to provide contraceptive coverage, expires.

2013: In September, the exhibit "Health Is a Human Right: Race and Place in America" opens at the David J. Sencer CDC Museum, exploring health disparities in the United States.

2013: In October, people begin enrolling in state health insurance exchanges established as part of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act passed in 2010.

2013: According to data released by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) in 2013, the United States ranked fifth among OECD countries in attainment of a tertiary (post-high school) degree, but only 12th in the 25 to 34 year age group, indicating that other OECD countries are catching up to or surpassing the United States in the percentage of young people attaining a tertiary degree.

2014: According to the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) World Factbook, the United States ranks 55th among 224 countries with an infant mortality rate of 6.17 deaths per 1,000 live births; by way of comparison, the lowest rate was 1.81 per 1,000 (Monaco). The United Kingdom had a rate of 4.44 per 1,000, and the rate was 4.71 in Canada.

2014: The National Association of Social Workers requests public input for an updated version of its Standards for Social Work Practice in Health Care Settings, with the comment period closing on August 15, 2014.

2014: According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in the United States was 6.1 percent, down from 7.5 percent in June 2013, with unemployment higher among teenagers (age 16 to 19; 21.0 percent), blacks and African Americans (10.7 percent), and Hispanics and Latinos (7.8 percent).

2014: In June, the U.S. Department of State releases the Trafficking in Persons Report 2014, noting that victims, prosecutions, and convictions for human trafficking have increased each year since 2008, with 44,758 victims of human trafficking identified in 2013.

2014: According to a report issued in July by the Department of Health and Human Services, the Affordable Care Act (also known as Obamacare) has produced $9 billion in savings on health insurance premiums for Americans since 2011.

Sarah E. Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University

A

Abandonment

Over the past few decades, the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) has made substantial advancements in ensuring the public health, safety, and well-being of the American people, and children in particular. Children and youth depend on the adults in their lives to keep them safe and to help them achieve their full potential. However, this has not prevented a plethora of children and youth (who are considered the future workforce), parents, and civic leaders from being at risk of poor outcomes, including low educational attainment, teen pregnancy, ill health, violence, lack of labor market success, premature death, and abandonment. HHS collaborates with state, local, tribal, urban Indian, and other service providers to sustain an essential safety net of services that protect children and youth, promote their emotional health and resilience in the face of adversity, and ensure their healthy development until adulthood is reached.

The global phenomenon of child abandonment has been around for many years. Child abandonment occurs when a parent, guardian, or person in charge of a child leaves a child without any regard for the child's well-being and with the intention of solely abandoning the child. In some cases of abandonment, the person responsible for the child fails to provide necessary care. One of the earliest surviving stories of child abandonment is that of Oedipus, who was left to die as a baby in the hills by a herdsman ordered to kill the baby. Abandonment is a cruelty to children that leaves them vulnerable to abuse and manipulation. Many youth who face abandonment must learn to survive on the streets and take care of their own needs. Stealing, selling illegal materials, and prostitution are a few illustrations of crimes committed by young people who have had the hardship of learning how to take care of their own needs. Along with criminal activities, abandoned children often develop antisocial personality traits. There are many reasons for child abandonment, including poverty, unemployment, and inadequate housing, although many people successfully raise children in these situations. Other examples of abandonment happen when mothers do not believe they have the ability to care for a child or when fathers deny parenthood or do not know of siring any children.

In recent years, there have been cases where abandoned newborn babies are left to die in trashcans and dumpsters. People who heard the babies crying called the authorities and some of the babies survived. Unfortunately, not all abandoned children and babies survive on their own. For these reasons, many U.S. states created laws that allow a parent to leave a baby at a hospital without facing criminal charges. It is difficult to know exactly how many abandoned children live in the United States. Various factors make estimates difficult, including cases where children manage to live on their own without adult care. Estimates have suggested anywhere from 7,000 to 15,000 children annually face abandonment. These estimates include children who now live within government agencies and foster homes. State laws and agencies work together to help families that struggle with basic needs for children. Newly enacted laws help protect children from abandonment and have created stricter penalties for parents who abandon their children.

Assessments for abandoned children and youth should remain sensitive to diverse cultural approaches, while still ensuring that the child's needs are met. In cases where cultural differences play a role in understanding a caregiver's behavior, the protection of the child should remain vital. Research suggests that respecting diverse cultural approaches to caregiving is important, but professionals still need to be able to distinguish between practices that can cause harm and those that are beneficial to the development of a child's cultural identity.

Impact of Abandonment

Children suffer lifelong scares from abandonment. Usually they are not able to trust easily or properly. Trust issues usually develop from the fear that they will be abandoned again. There may also be a feeling of shame that will cause the child to believe the abandonment was their fault. While child abandonment typically involves physical abandonment—such as leaving a child at a stranger's doorstep when no one is home—it may also include extreme cases of emotional abandonment, such as when a "workaholic" parent offers little or no physical contact or emotional support over long periods of time. Unfortunately, abandoned children (also called "foundlings") who do not get their needs met often grow up with low self-esteem, emotional dependency, helplessness, and other issues. A person charged with child abandonment may face felony or misdemeanor charges and other consequences.

Abandoned child syndrome is a behavioral or psychological condition that results from the loss of one or both parents. Parents who leave their children, whether with or without good reason, can cause psychological damage to the child. This damage is reversible but only with appropriate assistance. Abandoned children often may also suffer physical damage from neglect, malnutrition, starvation, and abuse.

The abandoned child syndrome is not recognized as a mental disorder in any of the well-known medical manuals. Symptoms may be physical or mental and may extend into adulthood and perhaps throughout a person's life. These symptoms include but are not limited to alienation from the environment—withdrawal from social activities or resistance toward others; guilt—the child believes that he/she did something wrong that caused the abandonment (often associated with depression), fear and uncertainty—"clinginess" and insecurities; sleep and eating disorders—malnutrition, starvation, disturbed sleep and nightmares; and physical ailments—fatigue, depression, lack of energy and creativity, anger, and grief.

State Statutes on Abandonment

Child abandonment laws vary from state to state. Many states include child abandonment within their child abuse laws and vice versa, while some states have laws specifically targeting the act of child abandonment. Approximately 17 states and the District of Columbia include abandonment in their definitions of abuse or neglect, generally as a type of neglect. Approximately 18 states, Guam, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands provide definitions for abandonment that are separate from the definition of neglect. In general, it is considered abandonment of the child when the parent's identity or whereabouts are unknown, the child has been left by the parent in circumstances in which the child suffers serious harm, or the parent has failed to maintain contact with the child or provided reasonable support for a specified period of time. Not all states define child neglect and abandonment in the same manner, as some states do not even use the terms neglect or abandonment. A few states include within their definition of "child abuse" or "child endangerment" the concepts of neglect and abandonment. Many states include the definition of abandonment in their neglect laws or vice versa.

All states have some form of statute criminalizing the underlying facets of neglect and abandonment, except the state of Maryland.

- Mandatory reporting laws: Because child abandonment is considered child abuse in some states, certain people may be required to report known or suspected cases of child abandonment to the proper authorities.

- Safe Haven law exception: Most jurisdictions have exceptions to child abandonment in the form of Safe Haven laws. Safe Haven laws allow mothers to safely abandon their newborn infants in safe locations—such as churches, hospitals, and fire stations—without fear of being charged with the crime of child abandonment.
- Leaving a child at home alone: While it is necessary in some instances to leave a child at home alone, states typically offer age guidelines to help parents avoid child abandonment charges. Under some state statutes, leaving a child at home alone may constitute child abandonment, depending on a number of factors, including the age of the child, duration of time the child was left without adult supervision, and economic hardship or illness of the parent or guardian.

Child Abandonment Penalties and Punishment

Depending on the state, a person charged with criminal child abandonment faces a wide range of penalties and sentencing options, depending on whether the state makes it a felony or misdemeanor. Most states classify child abandonment as a felony, which may include situations where a parent or guardian physically abandons a child in any place with the intent of relinquishing all rights and responsibilities to the child. Other states classify child abandonment as a misdemeanor (with lesser penalties), including situations that involve nonphysical acts of abandonment. A court will take the factors listed above into consideration, but the penalties may include fines, termination of parental rights, supervised access to the child, and jail time. In addition, a person may face reckless abandonment charges of a greater penalty if a child dies as a result of the abandonment.

In the criminal context, child abandonment is defined as physically abandoning a child, but may also include emotional abandonment such as failing to provide the necessary needs to a child. In some states, a parent may be guilty of abandonment if they fail to provide necessary clothing, food, shelter, or medical care for their child. In other states, however, parents are only punished for deserting a child with the intention to abandon.

Establishing Child Abandonment

The term child abandonment is broadly categorized and used to describe a variety of behaviors. Specific examples of child abandonment vary, but common actions that may lead to child abandonment charges may include leaving a child with another person without provision for the child's support and without meaningful communication with the child for a period of three months; making only minimal efforts to support and communicate with a child; failing for a period of at least six months to maintain regular visitation with a child; failing to participate in a suitable plan or program designed to reunite the parent or guardian with a child; leaving an infant on a doorstep, in trash cans and dumpsters, and on the side of the road; being absent from the home for a period of time that created a substantial risk of serious harm to a child left in the home; failing to respond to notice of child protective proceedings; or being unwilling to provide care, support, or supervision for the child.

Conclusion

Child abandonment is a time-sensitive issue, with state laws differing on what amount of time actually constitutes abandonment. In some states, it is considered abandonment to leave a child for two consecutive days without providing for his or her care. In Minnesota, it is considered abandonment if the child is under 2 years of age and is left in a way that indicates the parent does not intend to return.

Child abandonment is not simply a matter of leaving a child unattended. The age of the child, the time of day or night the child is left, the mental and physical capacity of the child, and whether or not a parent leaves adequate provisions for the child all factor into determining abandonment. The courts may also consider whether or not a child has a way to reach a parent, or whether the child is able to dial 911 in case of emergency.

Tamikia S. Lott
Old Dominion University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System; Adoption and Safe Families Act; Adoption: Infant, International, and Older/Special Need Children: Child Welfare Services; Childhood Trauma; Juvenile Justice System.

Further Readings

Legal Information Institute. Cornell University Law School. “Child Custody: An Overview” (2005). http://topics.law.cornell.edu/wex/Child_custody (Accessed August 2013).

Live Strong. “What is Considered Child Abandonment?” http://www.livestrong.com/article/152571-what-is-considered-childabandonment/#ixzz2gtjuElpj (Accessed August 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. “Advance the Health, Safety, and Well Being of theAmerican People.” http://www.hhs.gov/secretary/about/goal3.html (Accessed December 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Child Welfare Information Gateway. “Definition of Child Abuse and Neglect.” https://www.childwelfare.gov/systemwide/laws_policies/statutes/define.cfm (Accessed August 2013).

Abduction

Abduction is a heinous crime that can happen to any person or their loved ones in a diverse society. Depending on culture, time, and geography some form of abduction has been an issue of concern across countries and societies throughout history. Statistics indicate that abduction is a serious crime not only because of its direct impact on victims and relatives, but also because of the manner in which it changes the perception of security and promotes the fear of crime. A majority of abduction victims are children. Parental abductions in divorce cases are followed by difficult and long legal disputes that often damage a child’s perceptions and expectations of life. Children can also suffer harms after they have been abducted by strangers or acquaintances.

Definition and Differentiation

The term abduction technically refers to the act of taking a person away from where he/she belongs by any form of force or deception for various reasons. Abduction is sometimes interchangeably used with the word kidnapping. However, though not clear cut, there are differences between the two concepts. Kidnapping is usually committed to receive some kind of gain such as ransom. Kidnappers make their demands in exchange for the release of the captive.

Abduction differs from kidnapping in that abductors typically do not make demands and usually try to hide their actions. An abductor is mostly interested in the abductee for different reasons, while the kidnapper’s focal point is not the captive, but some other gains through the captive. Even though both actions are considered crimes, punishments may vary depending on the jurisdiction.

The types of abduction vary based on the identity of the abductor, the purpose of the abduction, and other factors. Examples may vary from the abduction of a mature person to claim a ransom to bride abduction and child abduction. Cultural factors may play an important role in the act of abduction, but in general there seems to be a negative correlation between victimization and ability to protect oneself.

According to National Crime Information Center (NCIC) statistics, around 661,500 people were reported missing in the United States in 2012. More than 75 percent of these persons were children under 18, which approximately equals 500,000 individuals. This means an average of 1,370 children per day, or one child every 63 seconds, are reported missing. David Finkelhor and Richard Ormrod found that 49 percent of abductions are committed by family members, while 27 percent are perpetuated by acquaintances and 24 percent by strangers. Most family abductions are committed by parents and abductees are generally younger than 6 years of age. Acquaintance kidnappings are mostly committed by juveniles against teenage females at residences and involve sexual or physical assault and frequently injury. Victims of stranger abductions generally are teenage females or school girls. These crimes primarily occur at outdoor locations and involve sexual assaults and the use of firearms.

Four out of five child abductions by strangers happen around a child’s home. Nearly three-quarters of victims are girls. Kenneth Hanfland, Robert Keppel, and Joseph Weis indicate that most victims of abduction who are found dead are murdered within a short period of time, with 44 percent of victims killed within only one hour after abduction, 74 percent murdered within three hours, and 91 percent killed within 24 hours. Therefore, it is imperative for law enforcement to act quickly in child abduction cases.

Bride Abduction

Bride abduction is the act of abducting a woman for the purpose of marriage. The practice existed in the Americas, Europe, Africa, Australia, and Asia in the past and continues to exist in some places today.

Based on the existence of an abductee's consent, bride abduction can be divided into two basic types: consensual and nonconsensual. Barbara Ayres makes a more detailed categorization with four distinct types of bride abduction: wife raiding, genuine bride theft, mock bride theft, and ceremonial capture. In the first category, wife raiding, men jointly abduct women from a different community. The second category, genuine bride theft, refers to stealing a woman from one's own community. In this case the groom's family offers various forms of compensation to the woman's family and a marital relationship is established. The third type, mock bride theft, is simply a planned elopement of a girl, who pretends to be helpless and resisting against her abductor(s). Ceremonial capture is a cultural ritual in which all family members are fully aware of the "abduction."

Some of these categories of bride abduction still exist today in different cultures across different parts of the world. Cynthia Werner's field study provides detailed examples of bride abduction in post-Soviet central Asia.

Abduction for Adoption

Abduction for the purpose of adoption is relatively rare compared with other forms of abduction, and the first case of this practice was reported in 1987 in Albuquerque, New Mexico. Victims of this abduction are newborn or unborn babies, and abduction usually happens shortly after birth. This crime is often committed so that a woman who is unable to have children of her own can obtain someone else's child. In such cases, the woman abductor usually fakes a pregnancy so people will not suspect anything after the abduction, which proves that such cases are preplanned.

There are two types of abduction for adoption. In the first, a newborn baby is abducted at a residence, hospital, or other maternity facility. In the second type, called "fetal abduction," a pregnant woman is abducted to force her to have an early cesarean section to remove the baby from her womb. A woman who is a fetus abductor differs from typical child abductors. She typically wants to have children of her own but cannot give birth, and therefore attempts to deliver another woman's baby by performing the cesarean section herself in poor conditions, risking the lives of the baby and mother,

A child abduction alert displayed on an electronic traffic-condition sign above a highway in Pittsburg, California, 2006. In the United States, AMBER alerts (which stands for America's Missing: Broadcast Emergency Response) began in 1996. The alerts were named for Amber Hagerman, a 9-year-old who was abducted and murdered in Texas that year.

as described in a study by Ann Burgess, Timothy Baker, Cathy Nahirny, and John Rabun. The fetus abductor is often a friend or acquaintance of the pregnant woman victim.

Child Abduction

Child abduction accounts for a majority of abduction cases. Children are easier to deceive and exploit by ill-intentioned strangers than are adults, and by their nature are less likely to protect themselves, making them more vulnerable to abduction by both parents and strangers. As the number of divorces has increased, child custody often becomes a subject of dispute between parents, sometimes resulting in one parent abducting their child(ren).

However, not all child abductions are triggered by custodial disputes. There are cases involving other motives, such as ransom. The first ransom case to receive nationwide attention in the United States happened in 1932, when Charles Lindbergh's baby son was kidnapped for ransom and found dead soon after the abduction. There are also numerous cases involving sexual exploitation. Nine-year-old Amber Hagerman was abducted by a man while she was riding her bicycle outside her house, sexually assaulted, and murdered in 1996. The AMBER Alert, which seeks to recover abducted children, was named for her. This system enables all relevant government agencies and the news media to work together to publicize child abductions in the hope of recovering victims.

U.S. Abduction and Kidnapping Laws

Several U.S. laws have been enacted in response to abduction cases. The Federal Kidnapping Act was passed following the Lindbergh kidnapping and paved the way for federal agencies to get involved in certain abduction and kidnapping cases. Another law, the 1968 Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA), aims to prevent parents' manipulation of court orders regarding child custody by simply moving to a different state. The Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act was passed in 1980 in an effort to bolster the UCCJA. The Missing Children Assistance Act of 1984 (MCAA) created a nationwide clearinghouse to better handle the issue of missing children.

As the number of marriages between citizens from different countries increased, abduction assumed an international dimension. In order to deal with abduction cases extending outside U.S. borders, the government passed the International Child Abduction Remedies Act ratifying the Hague Convention. Six years after the MCAA, the National Child Search Assistance Act (NCSAA) was passed; this law was a more comprehensive initiative that required relevant agencies to report all cases of missing children to the National Crime Information Center. The 2003 Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to End the Exploitation of Children Today Act, more commonly called PROTECT, has enabled significant progress to be made in the fight against abductions and resulted in the creation of the AMBER (America's Missing: Broadcast Emergency Response) alert system.

International Aspects

Ease of transportation, new communication technologies, and extensive use of the Internet have made the world a global village, making physical borders of countries almost obsolete. As a result, the number of international marriages has increased both in the United States and abroad. This increase, combined with the availability of international travel, seems to have had considerable impact on the rise of child abduction at an international level. Custody disputes between spouses from different nationalities, cultures, and religions result in international abductions.

Cultural differences also play an important role in shaping the abduction problem at an international level. For example, it is perfectly normal for an American father to keep in touch with and support his child after a divorce, while in Japan a divorce creates the definitive end of a father's relationships with his children, and even his former wife, for the rest of his life. If the mother is a Japanese national in a custody dispute who abducts the child to her homeland, cultural diversity can turn into a child custody dilemma. Statistics indicate that as of 2009, many children of divorced parents were abducted from the United States to Mexico, Canada, the United Kingdom, Germany, India, Japan, and Brazil. A study by the American Bar Association of about 100 families indicated that at least 46 countries had been the sites of child abductions. The Hague Convention aims to resolve these international custody disputes.

Hague Convention

The Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction is a multilateral agreement signed by 89 countries as of 2013. As specified in Article 1, the convention aims to do the following:

> (a) to secure the prompt return of children wrongfully removed to or retained in any Contracting State; and (b) to ensure that the rights of custody and of access under the law of one Contracting State are effectively respected in other Contracting States.

However, dealing with child abduction issues involving countries that have not signed the convention can be difficult both for individuals and governments. In an effort to fill this gap in the United States, Congress passed the International Parental Kidnapping Crime Act (IPKCA) in 1993. It should be noted that the IPKCA is not a substitute for the Hague Convention and has been rarely used in cases of international child abduction after its enactment.

Irfan Demir
Independent Scholar

See Also: AMBER Alert; Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act; Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Childhood Trauma; Human Trafficking; Interethnic Adoption Provision; National Center for Missing and Exploited Children; National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System; Sexual Abuse Survivors; Torture, Survivors of; Trauma-Focused Services; United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Further Readings

Aiyar, Smita. "Comments International Child Abductions Involving Non-Hague Convention States: The Need for a Uniform Approach." Emory International Law Review, v.21 (2007).
Allender, David M. "Child Abductions Nightmares in Progress." FBI Law Enforcement Bulletin (July 2007).
Ayres, Barbara. "Bride Theft and Raiding for Wives in Cross-Cultural Perspective." Anthropological Quarterly, v.47 (1974).
Finkelhor, David and Richard Ormrod. "Kidnaping of Juveniles: Patterns from NIBRS." Juvenile Justice Bulletin (June 2000).
Greif, Geoffrey L. "The Long-Term Aftermath of Child Abduction: Two Case Studies and Implications for Family Therapy." American Journal of Family Therapy, v.37 (2009).
Nahirny, Cathy, Ann Wolbert Burgess, Timothy Baker, and John B. Rabun. "Newborn Kidnapping by Cesarean Section." Journal of Forensic Science, v.47/4 (2002).
Schuz, Rhona. "The Relevance of Religious Law and Cultural Considerations in International Child Abduction Disputes." Journal of Law and Family Studies, v.12 (2010).
Walker, Lara. "The Impact of the Hague Abduction Convention on the Rights of the Family in the Case Law of the European Court of Human Rights and the UN Human Rights Committee: The Danger of Neulinger." Journal of Private International Law, v.6/3 (2010).
Werner, Cynthia. "Bride Abduction in Post-Soviet Central Asia: Marking a Shift Towards Patriarchy Through Local Discourses of Shame and Tradition." Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute, v.15 (2009).

Ableism

Disability impacts roughly 10 percent of the population; thus, it is vital that human service providers view disability as a positive aspect of human diversity, while understanding societal prejudice toward people with disabilities. Ableism describes the discrimination toward a person or people with disabilities, while simultaneously privileging the able-bodied and is analogous to terms such as racism, sexism, heterosexism, or ageism. Ableism stems from the belief that being able-bodied or "normal" is more desirable than being disabled or "abnormal." Ableist views about disability result in day-to-day reactions, including fear, pity, discriminatory attitudes, and structural barriers that lead to oppression, segregation, and inequitable access to resources.

History

Historically, larger societal contexts have contributed to ableism. Religious views of disability contribute to ableism when disability is seen as a result of amorality, witchcraft, God's displeasure, or holy innocence. Disability has been regarded as something that should be eliminated, healed by God, pitied, or acted upon through mercy and charity.

As medicine and eugenics were legitimized, disability became primarily viewed as a medical problem. Statisticians alongside medical experts quantified the able-bodied/disabled binary, proliferating deficit views of disability while solidifying notions of who could be categorized as disabled. The goal of medicine was to cure or eliminate disability and the only hope for the disabled individual was to become more "normal." Under the medical model, people with disabilities are not the experts of their own bodies, often leading to painful medical procedures, segregation, or an overemphasis on remediation.

Alongside other civil rights movements, people with disabilities identified their own discrimination influenced by medical and moral conceptions about disability and identified and defined ableism. Instead of viewing disability as something to be pitied or seen as a medical deficit, people with disabilities fought to be seen as equal citizens. The disability rights movement centered on the idea that bodily difference itself was not the problem of disability; instead, major hurdles came from ableism, systemic barriers, inaccessibility, exclusion, and negative attitudes. This movement has succeeded in promoting the rights of people with disabilities through the deinstitutionalization of many people with disabilities, the passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act, and the inclusion of many people with disabilities in schools and communities. Although progress has made, ableism persists. Fortunately, human services providers can reduce ableism.

Combating Ableism

High expectations. People with disabilities are often baselessly viewed as being less able than others. Even though disability is only one small aspect of who an individual is (like race, gender, favorite food, eye color), ableist ideas about disability often spread and become the primary focus for how others view the capabilities of the person. When it is understood that all people excel in some areas and need support in others, deficits are no longer the focus and the person with a disability is seen as a whole and complex person with potential.

Example: A professional is working with a child who does not speak verbally, but shows many nonverbal signs of understanding. The professional assumes that the child is capable and diligently works to find a communication system for the child. The child begins to learn to use her new assistive technology device and becomes academically and socially successful.

Removing barriers. Many people feel that the best way to help a person with a disability is to aid them in remediating deficits to become "normal." Assumptions prevail that life for the disabled person will be easier if the person is "fixed" through therapies or medicine. However, many people with disabilities would rather have support in eliminating barriers that prohibit full participation in their community.

Example: An individual diagnosed with dyslexia is looking for employment at an advertising firm. The job description requires that the individual have proficient writing skills. The applicant for the job is a successful writer when given appropriate accommodations. The employer who removes barriers offers to purchase the speech-to-text software requested by the employee.

Break down stereotypes. Many unfounded and negative stereotypes exist about people with disabilities. Disability labels tell little about the strengths, support needs, and individuality of a person. In order to break down harmful stereotypes, people with disabilities should be portrayed as important, productive, and competent members of their communities.

Example: A neighborhood group protests an incoming family who have a child with autism because they fear the child will be violent and disruptive. A sympathetic neighbor explains that all children who have autism are unique and that there are benefits for the other neighborhood children in befriending a child with autism. The neighbors welcome the family.

Promote inclusion. When people with disabilities live, work, learn, and play around others, people with and without disabilities benefit. People with disabilities benefit because they become competent and important members of their communities. They also learn skills and find opportunities when natural connections are made. People without disabilities make new friends, learn to value interdependence, and have a greater appreciation for human diversity.

Example: A teacher advocates for a child with intellectual disabilities when her principal rationalizes that the child would better have his needs met in a self-contained classroom. The teacher explains that the child will excel by emulating his typical peers, will make more friends, and will benefit from higher expectations common in general education classrooms. The teacher shows her knowledge of universal design for learning and differentiation as teaching tools. The child is very successful in her class and earns a standard education diploma.

Conclusion

Ableist ideas and attitudes continue to hinder the civil rights of people with disabilities; however, professionals have opportunities to mitigate the negative ramifications.

Jessica Bacon
Lehman College, City University of New York

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Developmental Disabilities, Attitudes and Myths in Services for; Disability Services; Disability Studies; Individuals With Disabilities Education Act; Reasonable Accommodations; Sociology of Disability.

Further Readings

Campbell, Fiona Kumari. Contours of Ableism: The Production of Disability and Abledness. Victoria, Australia: Palgrave MacMillan, 2009.
Hehir, Thomas. "Eliminating Ableism in Education." Harvard Educational Review, v.72/1 (2002).
Loja, Ema, et al. "Disability, Embodiment, and Ableism: Stories of Resistance." Disability & Society, v.28/2 (2012).

Abuse and Neglect

The National Organization for Human Services promotes social justice with the ability to recognize and support physical, mental, emotional, and spiritual health through an interdisciplinary knowledge base. The human services profession focuses on the prevention and remediation of wellness in all members of the community. Those operating in the field of human services should be educated on the diversity of abuse and neglect. Abuse can be defined as "the infliction of suffering or harm on vulnerable populations," while neglect is the "failure to fulfill a caretaking obligation" of a vulnerable individual. A vulnerable person is one who is capable of being physically or emotionally wounded; they tend to not have the capability of defending themselves in their own environment. Knowledge of the diversity of abuse and neglect requires an awareness of its forms as well as its differences.

The definition of abuse and neglect is influenced by the mores and values in a given time period. Not only is this influenced by legal and contemporary standards but the culture of the individuals should also be considered. Abuse and neglect take many different forms and can involve children, adults, the elderly adults, and anyone with disabilities. It is important for those in the field of human services to be able to recognize and report abuse and neglect in the individuals they serve. The following sections outline the awareness of and aspects of intervention, prevention, and recognizing and reporting of abuse and neglect in vulnerable populations.

Child Abuse and Neglect

Federal legislation defines child abuse and neglect as "any act or failure to act on the part of a parent or caretaker which results in death, serious physical or emotional harm, sexual abuse or exploitation; or an act or failure to act which presents an imminent risk of serious harm." Although physical abuse is the most recognizable, other types of abuse can also have lasting effects. Physical abuse, emotional abuse, and neglect are all forms of child abuse.

Health professionals are required by law to report any suspicion of abuse or neglect of children to legal authorities. Many professionals experience challenges in the reporting process. Some of the difficulties include education and training to recognize abuse and to understand the reporting process. Table 1 describes some signs to help professionals recognize the presence of abuse and neglect in children.

Adults and Elderly Abuse and Neglect

Abuse and neglect is never okay. It can be seen in adults as well as children. As adults become older, their physical abilities change and they are less able to defend themselves against abuse and neglect. An elder person can be someone between the ages of

Table 1 Signs that may signal the presence of child abuse or neglect

The child	The parent
• Shows sudden changes in behavior or school performance	• Denies the existence of—or blames the child for—the child's problems in school or at home
• Has not received help for physical or medical problems brought to the parents' attention	• Shows little concern for the child
• Is always watchful, like something is going to happen	• Demands a level of physical or academic performance the child cannot achieve
• Lacks adult supervision	• Looks primarily to the child for care, attention, and satisfaction of the parent's emotional needs

60 and 65, depending on the jurisdiction. Abuse is defined as "the infliction of suffering or harm on vulnerable populations"—whereas neglect is the "failure to fulfill a caretaking obligation" of a vulnerable individual. A vulnerable elder adult is someone with an impairment that prevents him or her from adequate self-care and protection. Abuse and neglect can take many forms. The different types of elder abuse include physical abuse, emotional abuse, sexual abuse, neglect or abandonment by caregivers, financial exploitation, and health care fraud and abuse. Recent estimates indicate between 1 and 2 million people over the age of 65 have been abuse, harmed, or exploited by those they depend on. Abuse and neglect of elderly adults can take place in their own home, a relative's home, and facilities responsible for their care. Those working in the field of helping professionals must educate themselves with the skills to prevent and recognize abuse. While recognizing abuse is important, the following three things will help prevent elder abuse and neglect: listening to the elderly and the caregivers responsible for their care, intervening and reporting any suspicion of abuse or neglect, and educating others in the community on how to recognize and report elder abuse and neglect.

Additionally, elderly abuse and neglect tend to go unidentified by clinical professionals—because of a lack of appropriate screening and assessment. A human services agency should report any suspicion of abuse or neglect if (1) there is any evidence of mistreatment without sufficient clinical explanation; (2) there is a subjective complaint by the elder; (3) the human services professional believes there is high risk of probable abuse, neglect, exploitation, or abandonment. Finally, history has shown that individuals with disabilities are frequently discriminated against. They are seen by society as incapable and helpless—denied opportunities for jobs and education. Discrimination and discrimination by the community puts individuals with disabilities at risk of abuse and neglect. The law requires the reporting of abuse and neglect of adults with developmental and physical disabilities.

Working With the Abused and Neglected Population

Individuals tend to seek services when they are in a state of distress. They often seek help when they are unaware of how to help themselves and need assistance from social service professionals. This is a vulnerable time for anyone who may have admitted they cannot navigate their own lives and their own healing. Problems and issues come up later in life and it is sometimes difficult to share these with other people, especially when an individual is unclear about how to deal with the core issues. Before getting to core issues, it might sometimes be helpful to decrease arousal if the client is experiencing fear during the session. Paying attention to where an individual is in terms of their needs while being aware of the social service worker's own needs is also important to decreasing arousal.

Professionals who work successfully with this population have learned to honor individual needs and the desire to keep a lid on his or her feelings at times. The most effective process can involve swinging back and forth between uncovering feelings and covering them back up again, and it is precisely this ability to modulate their feelings. People must feel secure that their ability to close their emotions down will never be taken away from them but instead will be honored as an important tool for living.

The initial goal of human services professionals is to advocate for individuals while helping them move more freely through their difficulties with the assurance that they can find distance from them again if they begin to be overwhelmed. Once an individual receives the help they are seeking and becomes confident that the human services professional will not strip them of their survival mechanisms, they are most likely to allow their feelings to emerge.

Monique N. Mercado
St. Mary's University

See Also: Abandonment; Adoption and Safe Families Act; Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act; Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Childhood Trauma.

Further Readings

Douglass, R. L. "Domestic Neglect and Abuse of the Elderly: Implications for Research and Service." Family Relations, v.32/3 (1983).

Halphen, J. M., G. M. Varas, and J. M. Sadowsky. "Recognizing and Reporting Elder Abuse and Neglect." Geriatrics, v.64/7 (2009).

Herr, S. "Ten 'Must Read' Articles on Physical Child Abuse." Acta Medica Academica, v.37/1 (2008).

Accommodation

Accommodation can be generally understood as a set of behaviors or strategies aimed at adjusting to conditions, situations, or norms characteristic of groups of people or individuals. Accommodation can take place with regard to verbal and nonverbal behavior, with communication being simultaneously the determinant and outcome of accommodative processes. Thus, communication not only shapes adjustment processes but also is influenced by accommodation taking place between interlocutors. The methodology of accommodation is described in communication accommodation theory (CAT), a cross-disciplinary framework developed by Howard Giles that explains how adjustments in communication are created and how they influence communication flows and distance between discourse participants. CAT is applied in various disciplines and is used in different contexts to study how people change their behavior in communication.

Functions of Accommodation

Accommodation helps establish a common set of rules since it facilitates the negotiation of a system of norms meeting the needs and expectations of diversified participants. In addition, accommodation helps understand various approaches and attitudes, as well as facilitates the exchange of knowledge between participating entities. Looking at the issue of accommodation from an individual's perspective, it broadens one's ability to perform successfully in diversified environments.

Types of Accommodation

Accommodation can be divided into different categories by taking into account an individual's attitude toward accommodation. Voluntary accommodation takes place when someone wants to accommodate to another person's verbal and nonverbal behavior and supports the processes of accommodation. Involuntary accommodation occurs when someone is against accommodative activities that are conducted against his or her will. Neutral accommodation takes place when someone is neither for nor against accommodation; the processes of adjustment are of no importance to the individual.

Accommodation can also be divided into linguistic and nonlinguistic accommodation, and some subtypes of linguistic accommodation can be enumerated. Literal linguistic accommodation concerns the linguistic processes of adjustment encompassing the choice of nouns, verbs, adjectives, and pronouns in order to absorb to some extent one's way of communicating. Figurative linguistic accommodation concerns situations in which one uses symbolic language, such as idioms and metaphors, to accommodate to the repertoire of the interlocutor. In using metaphors, one is relying on well-known domains in the presentation of new concepts and ideas to facilitate the processes of knowledge flows and interactions. In addition, technological linguistic accommodation concerns the linguistic adjustment to conditions taking place in the online setting. It may involve using such forms of communication as emoticons as well as focusing on the economical and short forms of expression.

Accommodation can also be divided by taking into account the level on which it operates. Accommodation at the microlevel functions at the word level and seeks to find the term that makes one accommodated in a social situation. An example can be the use of vocabulary strictly connected with a specific industry, domain, or profession, in which the application of a specialized term is used to facilitate knowledge exchange. Accommodation at the mesolevel operates at the text level and is concerned with choosing a type of text that would accommodate the needs of the target audience. Accommodation at the macrolevel encompasses communication styles and languages.

Taking into account the role of identity in modern discourse, accommodation can be studied through the perspective of calibrated linguistic identity proposed by Magdalena Bielenia-Grajewska. Calibrating in the case of linguistic repertoire involves copying the linguistic behaviors of others and adding some new language-related elements (also subconsciously) to the individual linguistic personae. The notion of calibrated linguistic identity is especially important nowadays, when interactions often involve people from different countries and cultures and the processes of accommodation are important for efficient intercultural communication. The mentioned linguistic image from the perspective of accommodative processes can also be studied from the perspective of hybrid linguistic identity researched by Bielenia-Grajewska. This form of identity enables one to highlight how accommodation leads to the coexistence of different linguistic identities and the formation of a more complex linguistic entity benefiting from different linguistic codes.

Accommodation can also be divided by taking into account the personal-group dichotomy. Individual accommodation encompasses the verbal and nonverbal activities conducted by a person to accommodate to the environment. Group accommodation focuses on the way a given community adjusts its communicative behaviors to the conditions present in the environment.

Professional Accommodation

Professional accommodation can be divided into workplace and consumer accommodation. Workplace accommodation encompasses actions that are related to accommodation taking place in professional settings. It is an important part of organizational learning because employees master the corporate culture and its norms by observing others and to some extent imitating their behaviors. Workplace accommodation may involve accommodation to speakers' knowledge and experience. Thus, when speaking with a person who is not familiar with a given industry, a specialist will calibrate the message to make it understandable to the target audience by using terminology or syntax recognized by the interlocutors. Accommodation at work also concerns the characteristics of some professional situations. For example, speaking with a customer or negotiating involves different communicative behaviors than taking part in informal chats in the lunchroom during breaks at work.

Consumer accommodation consists of all the communicative behaviors aimed at meeting customers' needs and expectations. Thus, in advertising and direct communication a linguistic repertoire is selected that aims to facilitate the cognition of merchandise and increase the sale of products.

Educational Accommodation

Adjustments can be observed in learner-teacher interactions because teachers have to accommodate to learners' abilities and needs. Information has to be adjusted to the interlocutors' knowledge, abilities, and needs. For example, in the case of teaching English for special purposes, teachers have to focus on the aspects of specialized terminology that are needed by the professionals who attend the course. Teachers also have to accommodate to the conditions they face in their teaching environment. Thus, when some equipment is missing, teachers have to conduct classes with only the tools available. Accommodation may also concern the linguistic skills of the class. Thus, in the case of conducting lessons or training in foreign languages, the level of language used in instruction should correspond with the abilities of learners. Accommodation in education also concerns the method of instruction, since online and off-line schooling involve different teaching methods. When providing instruction in cyberspace, teachers have to accommodate to the characteristics of a given setting, taking into account the economical aspects of exchanging data on the Internet or in the different time zones of the students participating in a Webinar.

Media Accommodation

Accommodation can also be observed in contemporary media. Those participating in online interactions have to adjust themselves to the codes valid in Web discourse. Taking into account the notions of similarity and difference in group formation, accommodation leads to both homophily and heterophily in online networks. Homophily, or being represented in forming communities with people who are similar in terms of education, background, profession, hobbies, or age, is visible by forming homophilic relationships as a result of accommodative activities. On the other hand, heterophily in online settings is exemplified by sustaining individual communication preferences and perceiving personal communicative tools as superior to those of other people in the processes of accommodation.

Magdalena Bielenia-Grajewska
University of Gdansk

See Also: Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in; Cross-Cultural Skills; Linguicism.

Further Readings

Bielenia-Grajewska, Magdalena, "Business Performance Management from the Systemic Communicative and Linguistic Side." In Cultural Variations and Business Performance, B. Christiansen, ed. Hershey, PA: IGI Publishing, 2012.

Bielenia-Grajewska, Magdalena. "Linguistic Aspects of Informal Learning in Corporate Online Social Networks." In Virtual Professional Development and Informal Learning via Social Networks, V. P. Dennen and J. B. Myers, eds. Hershey, PA: IGI Publishing, 2012.

Bielenia-Grajewska, Magdalena. "The Linguistic Dimension of Expatriatism: Hybrid Environment, Hybrid Linguistic Identity." European Journal of Cross-Cultural Competence and Management, v.1/2-3 (2010).

Bielenia-Grajewska, Magdalena. "The Role of Metaphors in the Language of Investment Banking." Ibérica, v.17 (2009).

Gallois, Cindy and Howard Giles. "Communication Accommodation Theory." In Encyclopedia of Language and Social Interaction, K. Tracy, ed. New York: Blackwell/Wiley (in press).

Giles, Howard and Jordan Soliz. "Communication Accommodation Theory." In Engaging Interpersonal Theories, D. Braithewaite and P. Schrodt, eds. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage (in press).

Acculturation

Acculturation was originally defined as a change or shift in a person's or a racial/ethnic group's behavior, language, and beliefs when continuous, firsthand contact with a differing culture occurs. Acculturation can occur willingly among those who have selected to immigrate or migrate to a region that maintains a culture different from their origins. It can occur through force when dominance and/or subjugation is exerted over another differing culture. The act of acculturation over time, regardless whether it is voluntary or by force, results in the modification of a person's or group's language, behaviors, beliefs, and perceptions; ultimately, acculturation has an impact on a person's or group's life, health, and ability to thrive in the new culture and will result in the changing of health risk and protective factors. Specifically in the context of human services, providers must consider the level of client acculturation and its influence on perceived benefit of services, cultural appropriateness of services, and compliance with recommendations. Level of acculturation is influenced by the individual's beliefs, feelings, and connectedness to the dominant culture. Individuals who perceive their interactions with the dominant culture to be temporary or forced are less likely to demonstrate high levels of acculturation and may continue to identify primarily with their native culture.

Assimilation

Assimilation occurs when the act of acculturation eclipses the originating culture and there is a loss of cultural heritage, language, behaviors, and beliefs. It is a complete loss of the originating culture and results in the loss of associated risk and protective factors that are attributed to the originating culture. The total erasure of the originating culture is often perceived as deleterious and has been found to be associated with familial stress, negative health impacts, a disenfranchisement of the person who is perceived to assimilate, and health disparities in the United States. Often assimilation occurs through generational exposure; the primary generation does not assimilate but the next generation born in a differing culture more readily accepts the behaviors, beliefs, and perceptions and this results in the aforementioned outcomes.

Adaptation

Adaptation occurs when there is a mixing of the cultural beliefs, behaviors, and perceptions of historical culture and the newly exposed. Adaptation provides a platform for reconciliation of the past culture and the current culture in which a group or person currently exists. It is the seamless combining of multiple cultures and provides the platform for acceptance and feelings of belonging among those who have migrated and those of the culture they are being exposed to. However, because adaptation is a merging of multiple cultures, it has been hard to identify and employ as a construct in behavioral or mental health research and has been employed in discussions relating to communication and the linguistic modification of instruments utilized in research.

Reaction

Reaction is interconnected with oppression and the subjugation of the group that is being newly exposed to another culture. Reaction is a rejection of the new culture and compensation for the perceptions of superiority forced upon the adopting culture to their past culture. The people who have rejected the new culture often display zealous pride in their heritage and adopt or reemploy behaviors of their originating culture. Additionally, generations removed from the initial inoculation of the current culture often return to the cultural behaviors and beliefs of past generations. The pride in one's originating culture to the point of rejecting the current culture is often called ethnocentrism. The return to a person's culture of origin or of their heritage, when associated with subjugation and oppression, has proven to increase feelings of belonging and self- esteem and often a reduction of health risk behaviors among youth.

In current behavioral and health research, acculturation has become a variable based on the perceived cultural norms of the race or ethnicity. The validity of the variable has been challenged; however, there remains empirical evidence that the maintaining of a person's originating culture has a significant impact on physical and mental health, as well as their socioeconomic status. Specifically how acculturation is defined within the context of specific research determines whether acculturation has a positive or negative effect on the measured outcome. The interaction between all of these constructs in the current globally centered society has great implications for social services. Porous ethnic and cultural boundaries combined with geographic flexibility have resulted in many people working through various levels of acculturation, assimilation, adaptation, and reaction. The current porous and flexible society can result in individuals being faced with the challenges of each construct at various times and simultaneously throughout the life span. As a result, practitioners are charged with demonstrating adequate cultural competence. It is important to note that acculturation, assimilation, or adaptation should not be directly associated with language acquisition and/or expressive language fluency. Host language acquisition is best viewed as a key component in measuring the aforementioned constructs.

Marya L. Shegog
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

See Also: Assimilation; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cultural Paradigms; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Ethnicity, Definition of; Ethnocentrism; Race, Social Definitions.

Further Readings

Abraído-Lanza, A. F., et al. "Toward a Theory-Driven Model of Acculturation in Public Health Research." American Journal of Public Health, v.96/8 (2006).

Berry, J. W. "Acculturation and Adaptation in a New Society." International Migration, v.30 (1992).

Center on AIDS & Community Health. "DEBI Diffusion of Effective Behavioral Intervention" (2006). http://www.effectiveinterventions.org (Accessed June 2014).

Gonzales, N. A., et al. "Family Mediators of the Relation Between Acculturation and Adolescent Mental Health." Family Relations, v.55/3 (2006).

Herdman, M., J. Fox-Rushby, and X. Badia. "A Model of Equivalence in the Cultural Adaptation of HRQoL Instruments: The Universalist Approach." Quality of Life Research, v.7.4 (1998).

Hunt, L. M., S. Schneider, and B. Comer. "Should 'Acculturation' Be a Variable in Health Research? A Critical Review of Research on US Hispanics." Social Science & Medicine, v.59/5 (2004).

Johnson, B. B. "Arguments for Testing Ethnic Identity and Acculturation as Factors in Risk Judgement." Risk Analysis, v.24/5 (2004).

Kimbrough, R. M., S. D. Molock, and K. Walton. "Perception of Social Support, Acculturation, Depression, and Suicidal Ideation Among African American College Students at Predominantly Black and Predominantly White Universities." Journal of Negro Education, v.65/3 (1996).

Marks, Gary, et al. "Health Behavior of Elderly Hispanic Women: Does Cultural Assimilation Make a Difference?" American Journal of Public Health, v.77/10 (1987).

Martinez, C.R., Jr. "Effects of Differential Family Acculturation on Latino Adolescent Substance Use." Family Relations, v.55/3 (2006).Noels, K., G. Pon, and R. Clement. "Language, Identity, and Adjustment: The Role of Linguistic Self-Confidence in the Acculturation Process." Journal of Language and Social Psychology, v.15/3 (1996).

Redfield, R., R. Linton, and M. J. Herskovits. "Memorandum For The Study Of Acculturation." American Anthropologist, v.38/1 (1936).

Ruben, B. D. and D. J. Kealey. "Behavioral Assessment of Communication Competency and the Prediction of Cross-Cultural Adaptation." International Journal of Intercultural Relations, v.3/1 (1979).

Sobre-Denton, M. and D. Hart. "Mind the Gap: Application-Based Analysis of Cultural Adjustment Models." I*nternational Journal of Intercultural Relations*, v.32/6 (2008).

Webb, T. T., E. J. Looby, and R. Fults-McMurtery. "African American Men's Perceptions of Body Figure Attractiveness: An Acculturation Study." Journal of Black Studies, v.34/3 (2004).

ADHD, Services for Individuals With

Individuals who display symptoms of attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) typically have significant difficulty attending to and completing tasks, or they may act impulsively and have extreme overactivity in their behavior, or they may display both types of symptoms. These behaviors are normally evident in individuals prior to starting school and must cause significant impairment in two or more settings, such as the home/family setting, the community setting, the educational setting, the vocational setting, or any other setting in which attention to staying on task is required for success.

These various symptoms of ADHD tend to interact, furthering the difficulties of the individual to perform well in school, interact appropriately with others, and behave in a socially acceptable manner. Also, research has indicated that children do not "grow out of" ADHD and that these symptoms create significant lifelong problems with individuals' perceptions of their self-worth, which can lead to further psychological and behavioral difficulties. Therefore, individuals diagnosed with this disorder must have a treatment plan that adjusts to their own development throughout the life span and is sensitive to their individual backgrounds and diversity. Environmental factors, such as culture and social norms, should always be taken into account to effectively plan for the lifelong treatment of these difficulties. The most common approaches for treatment of individuals with ADHD are drug therapy and/or behavioral therapy.

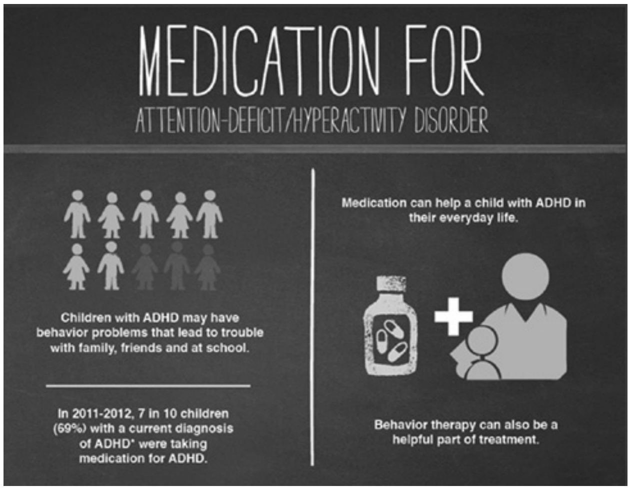
Drug Therapy

A majority of children, adolescents, and adults with ADHD are treated medically with stimulant medication, such as methylphenidate or other stimulants, which is prescribed by a medical doctor. These medications are known to improve the maladaptive behavior of individuals with ADHD and improve their functioning in a variety of environments. In addition, drug therapy has the effect of calming individuals, allowing them to focus, improving their performance at school and work, and controlling aggressive and fidgety tendencies. Furthermore, children with ADHD who have not been treated with stimulant medication are more likely than their medicated peers to suffer from social problems, have problems with the law, and use illicit drugs as they grow older. Treatment with stimulant medications is not without risk, however. Research has indicated that stimulant medication stunts a child's physical growth, requiring the use of "drug holidays" to allow the child to catch up to his or her peers. In addition, some individuals, especially those with high blood pressure, should not take stimulant medication because of risk of heart attack.

Behavior Therapy and Educational Services

Behavior therapy has been shown to be useful in many cases of ADHD. Typically, teachers and parents are trained to reward behavior that is adaptive to the environment, such as paying attention to class lectures or doing homework until completion. Behavioral techniques require target behaviors to be clearly defined, excellent communication among all the individuals, and delivering reinforcement consistently across all environments. Although behavioral treatment can be successful by itself, most research has indicated better outcomes when combined with drug therapy.

Besides behavior therapy, some individuals who are diagnosed with ADHD have symptoms severe enough to impact their educational progress in the classroom. If the symptoms of the diagnosis are significantly interfering with their attainment of educational goals, students can be classified for special education and receive services in the school setting. Typically, in addition to academic goals and objectives, behavior plans are put in place to help provide positive reinforcement for staying on task, completing tasks, and complying with teacher requests. In addition, these students can be given extra time to complete tasks and reminders about homework assignments due.



Individuals with attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder, a condition that is typically diagnosed at a young age, are often treated with a combination of drug and behavioral therapy.

Cultural Disparity in Diagnosis and Treatment

Drug therapy is currently the treatment of choice for ADHD, and the number of children and adults receiving stimulant medication for this disorder is increasing, although recent research indicates that ADHD is overdiagnosed in the United States. Moreover, there appears to be a significant discrepancy between minority children and white children. Research indicates that white children are more likely to be evaluated for and receive a diagnosis of ADHD and be treated for this disorder. In addition, for those minority children who do receive an ADHD diagnosis, they are more likely not to receive treatment needed to be successful in their day-to-day environments.

It appears that this disparity between ethnicities concerning diagnosis and treatment stem from economic issues. Recent studies reveal that those children who come from a family of lower socioeconomic status are less likely to be identified as having ADHD or to be treated for this disorder. Moreover, research indicates that stereotyping and bias may play a part in the racial differences in diagnosis and treatment. One recent study argues that teachers may view symptoms of ADHD in white children as a medical problem, while the same symptoms displayed by African American or Hispanic American children may be seen as behaviors related to poor parenting skills, low IQ, substance use, or violence.

Kurt T. Choate
Northeastern State University

See Also: Children With Special Needs; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Educational Services; Educational Support Services; Intelligence Testing; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment; Special Education.

Further Readings

Barkley, Russell A. Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder, 3rd ed. New York: Guilford Press, 2006.
Goldstein, Sam and Cecil R. Reynolds, eds. Handbook of Neurodevelopmental and Genetic Disorders in Children, 2nd ed. New York: Guilford Press, 2011.

Teeter, Phyllis Anne. Interventions for ADHD: Treatment in Developmental Context. New York: Guilford Press, 1998.

Administration for Community Living

The U.S. Administration for Community Living (ACL) is the federal agency responsible for increasing access to community support and focusing attention and resources on the unique needs of older Americans and people with disabilities across the life span. It was formed in 2012 from three previously existing federal agencies: the U.S. Administration on Aging, the Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities, and the Department of Health and Human Services Office on Disability.

The ACL is part of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, and its mission is to, "Maximize the independence, well-being, and health of older adults, people with disabilities across the lifespan, and their families and caregivers." The ACL's Web site states the agency's vision is that, "All people, regardless of age and disability, live with dignity, make their own choices, and participate fully in society."

ACL comprises three units that focus on specific populations; the administrator of each unit reports to the ACL administrator, who in turn reports to the U.S. secretary of health and human services. The units are the Administration on Aging, the Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities, and the Center for Disability and Aging Policy. Each unit is supported by the ACL Center for Management and Budget and the ACL Office of Regional Operations.

Administration on Aging

The Administration on Aging (AoA) assists older adults and caregivers by providing services and information including: elder rights services; health, prevention, and wellness programs; culturally sensitive programs for Native and Tribal communities; a National Family Caregiver Support Program; a National Clearinghouse for Long-Term Care Information; nutrition services; and support services to help older adults live independently in their communities. The majority of these services are provided through the National Aging Network consisting of local units called Area Agencies on Aging and State Units on Aging.

AoA services are primarily authorized by the Older Americans Act of 1965 (OAA). OAA was enacted with the aim of creating nationally coordinated services to support the dignity and welfare of older persons. The Aging Network of Area Agencies on Aging provides a method for distributing federal funds to local agencies that support services such as information and assistance, meals at senior centers, home-delivered meals, health and homemaking services in the home, and wellness programs. AoA supports the national Eldercare Locator service, which can be accessed online or by phone.

Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities

The Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities (AIDD) funds services and is an advocate for individuals with intellectual and developmental disabilities and their families. AIDD's responsibilities were specified in the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights of 2000.

AIDD programs include: state councils on developmental disabilities; state protection and advocacy systems; national projects to enhance individual opportunities; a national network of university centers for excellence in developmental disabilities education, research, and service; the President's Committee for People with Intellectual Disabilities; and grants to make polling places accessible to voters with disabilities. The 57 U.S. protection and advocacy systems work at the state level to empower individuals with developmental disabilities to advocate for themselves. These systems provide legal support for the protection of civil rights, especially for those in underserved populations. The state councils provide planning, training, and coalition-building to promote self-determination, integration, and inclusion. The university centers advance research, training, and community services to address the needs of individuals with developmental disabilities and their families.

Center for Disability and Aging Policy

The Center for Disability and Aging Policy (CDAP) provides planning and support to advise the ACL administrators. CDAP includes the Office of Integrated Programs; the Office of Policy Analysis and Development, which provides technical assistance; and the Office of Performance and Evaluation.

The Office of Integrated Programs focuses on common concerns for older adults and individuals with disabilities. It coordinates the Aging and Disability Resource Centers Program, which focuses on streamlining access to long-term care services and support. The centers are a collaborative effort of the Administration for Community Living, the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, and the Veterans Health Administration. These facilities strive to create a person-centered, community-based environment to offer resources and services for individual and family caregivers. Much of the work of the centers has focused on care transitions, especially the transition from a hospital to the community.

CDAP also supports a program for veterans at risk of being placed in skilled nursing homes that attempts to keep these people in their homes and provide them with community-based services. The CDAP Lifespan Respite Care program is also available in some areas to assist family caregivers. Additionally, CDAP supports research on coordinated transportation systems for people with disabilities and older adults. The Office of Performance and Evaluation offers the public online information on evidence-based programs for older adults and individuals with disabilities. This information is intended to help individuals and service providers determine the services that best meet their needs. Interventions are in the categories of caregiver and family support; employment; health and wellness; legal, justice, and elder abuse; long-term care services and support; and mental health promotion.

Janet S. Hahn
Western Michigan University

See Also: Adult Day Care; Aging and Adult Services; Developmental Disabled Individuals; Disability Services; Home and Community Services; Home Care Services; National Institute on Aging; Senior Services.

Further Readings

Payne, Ruby. A Framework for Understanding Poverty. Highland, TX: Aha Process, 2005.

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Administration for Community Living. “About ACL.” http://www.acl.gov/About_ACL/Index.aspx (Accessed September 2013).

Administration for Native Americans

The Administration for Native Americans (ANA) is a division of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Established in 1974 through the Native American Programs Act, the ANA encourages social and economic independence for all Native American populations. The ANA does so through community-based funding and technical training for American Indians, Alaska Natives, Native Hawai‘ians, and Native Pacific Islanders.

Groundwork for the ANA was first laid by President Lyndon B. Johnson. In 1964, Johnson declared a War on Poverty, which resulted in the Revenue Act of 1964 and the Economic Opportunity Act. Shortly after the Economic Opportunity Act was signed into law, the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) began awarding grants, with Native Americans being among the primary beneficiaries. One particularly successful grant resulted in the formation of the Rough Rock Demonstration School located in Rough Rock, Arizona. Rough Rock was awarded nearly $550,000 by the OEO during its first two years of existence and became the first modern U.S. school system to be controlled entirely by Native Americans. The success of Rough Rock Demonstration School resulted in the formation of Navajo Community College, which eventually led to the formation of more than 30 similar institutions of higher education. The OEO was eventually abolished; however, its positive impact on the Native American population laid a foundation for the ANA.

The ANA was officially founded in 1974 as part of the Native American Programs Act. Its mission is to promote self-sufficiency among Native American children and families in order to reduce their long-term dependency on public assistance. The ANA does so via grant funding in three distinct areas: Social and Economic Development Strategies, Environmental Regulatory Enhancement, and Native American Language Revitalization/Continuation. ANA’s Social and Economic Development

Strategies use competitive grants to focus on locally determined community goals. Environmental Regulatory Enhancement provides resources for Native Americans to protect their native lands and water, and Native American Language Revitalization/Continuation promotes the survival and continued vitality of Native American dialects. The initiative to preserve Native American languages also resulted in the Esther Martinez Native American Languages Preservation Act in 2006. The law amended the original Native American Programs Act of 1974 to involve elders in language immersion and restoration projects.

Today, the ANA is viewed as a prominent leader in the Native American community. The ANA currently represents more than 5 million people, spanning the continental United States, Alaska, Hawai'i, American Samoa, Guam, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands. The organization's guiding philosophy is based on three core beliefs: the belief that self-sufficiency is necessary in order to meet the needs of its members, the belief that such sufficiency must be founded on local leadership and community-based governance, and the belief that progress toward self-sufficiency should be consistent with the community's long-range goals. In recent years, this philosophy has resulted in numerous partnerships with federal agencies and other nonprofit organizations, including the Interagency Working Group on Indian Affairs, Intradepartmental Council on Native American Affairs, Administration for Children and Families Native Affairs Work Group, and Tribal Law and Order Act Interagency Working Group.

In summation, the Administration for Native Americans (ANA) was founded in 1974. As a division of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, and stemming from Lyndon B. Johnson's War on Poverty, the ANA encourages social and economic independence for American Indians, Alaska Natives, Native Hawai'ians, and Native Pacific Islanders. It does so by offering community-based funding and technical training for over 5 million Native Americans. As a result, the ANA is now well established in the Native American community, with interorganizational partnerships spanning the United States and its territories.

J. Jacob Jenkins
California State University Channel Islands

See Also: Alaskan Natives; American Indian Movement; Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Hawai'ian Native Americans; Indian Boarding Schools; Life Skills Training; National Congress of American Indians; Native Americans; Native Americans, Suicide Among; Pacific Islanders; Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act; Tribal Social Services; Tribal Sovereignty; United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples; War on Poverty Programs.

Further Readings

Administration for Native Americans. "About." http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/ana/about (Accessed November 2013).

Brayboy, Bryan McKinley Jones, Amy J. Fann, Angelina E. Castagno, and Jessica A. Solyom. Postsecondary Education for American Indian and Alaska Natives: Higher Education for Nation Building and Self-Determination. New York: Jossey-Bass, 2012.

Jackson, Kelly F. and David R. Hodge. "Native American Youth and Culturally Sensitive Interventions: A Systematic Review." Research on Social Work Practice, v.20 (2010).

Roessel, R. A. "An Overview of the Rough Rock Demonstration School." Journal of American Indian Education, v.7 (1968).

Ross, Jeffrey Ian and Larry Gould. Native Americans and the Criminal Justice System. St. Paul, MN: Paradigm Publishers, 2006.

Administration on Children, Youth and Families

An agency of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), the Administration on Children, Youth and Families (ACYF) handles issues related to children, youth, and families. An office of the Administration for Children and Families, ACYF is headed by a commissioner who is appointed by the president. ACYF is divided into two bureaus—the Children's Bureau and the Family and Youth Services Bureau—each of which is headed by an associate commissioner. Together, these two bureaus help service providers by offering research support as well as evaluations of the effectiveness of various programs.

Background

The Administration for Children and Families is the federal agency within HHS that provides leadership to assist families in leading economically and socially productive lives. To that end, the agency supports a variety of programs, each of which is intended to assist children in developing into healthy adults. The agency also works with communities so that they can become more prosperous and supportive of their members. With a budget of nearly $60 billion, the Administration for Children and Families runs 65 programs that provide assistance with a broad range of issues, including adoption, child abuse, child care, child support enforcement, foster care, and welfare. ACYF is an office of the Administration for Children and Families that is charged with administering and evaluating certain programs within the larger agency.

ACYF works to ensure that a variety of federal programs are run as smoothly and effectively as possible. Programs under the agency's control include social services, protective services, and adoption services. Social services agencies receive encouragement and support to promote the positive development of children, youth, and families. Protective services groups are assisted in their efforts to provide shelter and other services to children, youth, and families in at-risk situations. In addition, adoptions of children with special needs are buoyed by material and logistical support provided by the ACYF.

ACYF supports these goals via a variety of methods. It provides financial assistance to academic institutions, community-based groups, and states for a variety of activities. These activities include demonstration and educational programming, research, and specific services. Funds from the ACYF also allow the dissemination of information related to effective practices, technical assistance, and training of personnel employed by numerous federal, state, and local agencies. ACYF operates two bureaus, the Children's Bureau and the Family and Youth Services Bureau. Each of these bureaus is headed by an associate commissioner and each divides the United States into ten regions. These regions each have an office responsible for administering bureau programs in that area.

Children's Bureau

Founded in 1912 by President William Howard Taft, the Children's Bureau was the first federal agency that worked to improve the lives of children and families. Since its founding, the Children's Bureau has engaged in a number of projects aimed at benefiting children. These projects involved issues such as abuse and neglect, child labor, delinquency and juvenile courts, family economic security, foster care, health and recreation, infant and maternal death, and orphanages. As a result of the bureau's work, great improvements have been made in each of these areas. To achieve these goals, the Children's Bureau has collaborated with private and government agencies to ensure children's welfare, provided assistance to collaborating agencies to support their programming, funded research and the analysis of data to learn the best approaches to problems, disseminated this information to interested stakeholders, and provided leadership to all who are working to improve conditions for children.

The changes effected as a result of Children's Bureau activities have been many. The infant mortality rate in the United States, for example, was approximately 1 in 10 in 1912; 100 years later that rate had dropped to fewer than 7 per 1,000. Juvenile courts, which were rare in 1912, are now present in all 50 states and the District of Columbia, providing children with a different judicial experience than adults. While orphanages once allowed children to be used as laborers by farmers and manufacturers, today child welfare agencies work so that every child is placed with a permanent family. Child labor, which was common at the beginning of the 20th century, similarly has been practically abolished as a result of Children's Bureau efforts.

Family and Youth Services Bureau

The Family and Youth Services Bureau works to provide stability and to promote safety and well-being for families and children. Charged with working especially with those at risk as a result of neglect, trauma, or violence, the bureau supports state and local agencies that provide children, adults, and families with community services, prevention education, and shelter. Focusing on positive youth development, the Family and Youth Services Bureau works to support positive influences in the homes, communities, and schools where at-risk children are present. As a result of these positive influences, the bureau helps children to overcome obstacles and prepare effectively for college, work, and life.

To achieve its goals, the Family and Youth Services Bureau administers three grant programs through two divisions. The Division of Family Violence Prevention and Services administers the Family Violence Prevention and Services Program. This program is the primary federal funding source to assist victims of domestic violence and their children. The program funds emergency shelters and provides other assistance, such as counseling and emergency funds, to women and children affected by domestic violence. A national domestic violence hotline is maintained, which permits anyone dealing with domestic violence to have access to advice, crisis interventions, and local service providers.

The Division of Adolescent Development and Support similarly works to administer two national grant programs, the Runaway and Homeless Youth Program and the Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Program. The Runaway and Homeless Youth Program works to assist children who are either asked to leave their homes or those who leave on their own accord. To that end, the program provides a street outreach program, transitional housing, maternity group homes, and a model and funding support for basic center services, such as medical care, shelter, counseling, recreation programs, and aftercare.

The Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Program works to curtail pregnancies and sexually transmitted diseases among adolescents. This is done through a variety of approaches, including distribution of birth control, emphasizing the importance of personal responsibility, and promoting abstinence. While all groups of adolescents are served, the program especially targets those who are living in foster care, homeless, from minority groups, or living in rural areas. As a result of these programs, children, youth, and families have been able to lead healthier and safer lives.

Stephen T. Schroth
Jason A. Helfer
Knox College

See Also: Adoption Agencies and Services; Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Child Support Agencies and Services; Foster Care Agencies; Home and Community Services.

Further Readings

Blau, G. M. and P. R. Magrab. The Leadership Equation: Strategies for Individuals who are Champions for Children, Youth, and Families. Baltimore, MD: Paul H. Brookes Publishing, 2010.

Dryfoos, J. G. Full-Service Schools: A Revolution in Health and Social Services for Children, Youth, and Families. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 1994.

Pickford, J. Youth Justice: Theory and Practice. London: Cavendish Publishing, 2000.

Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities

The Developmental Disabilities Act enforced by the Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities (AIDD) authorized major initiatives to institutionalize resources for significant federal activities along with financial support for individuals and families living with developmental disabilities. Originally authorized in 1963 and last updated in 2000, AIDD's stated purpose is to ensure that families have access to and fully participate in all aspects of their family members' school, daily life, and vocational activities by providing individual intervention plans and the resources essential in fulfilling these ideals. The AIDD specifically refers to "self-determination, independence, productivity, and inclusion in all facets of community life." The AIDD represents a federal system that funds, coordinates, and advocates best practices in the field of developmental disabilities. It is a key decision maker whose priorities are to identify future trends in the field by sponsoring research and analysis.

AIDD solidified federal programs for persons with developmental delays and their families to ensure best treatment practices, to protect human and civil rights, and to create opportunities for a better quality of life. Although services and programs were available for this population in the United States for many decades, only when President John F. Kennedy created the President's Panel—then Committee—on Mental Retardation did the field become a major focus for any administration to advocate for the needs of families and individuals with developmental disabilities.

The Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities was created from federal programs offered under a number of departments within the federal system of health and human services, health and welfare, rehabilitation services, and Office of Human Development; the AIDD remains under the umbrella of the Department of Health and Human Services Office of Children and Youth Services.

The attitudes and culture changed as parents became strong voices for their children. At the same time, the voices of people with developmental disabilities were also heard fighting for equal protections and for equitable treatment and more resources. These efforts emulated those from the civil rights and disabilities rights movements of the 1960s, recognizing that the worth of people with developmental disabilities was emerging. During this time period, the way in which care and treatment were provided was also shifting from the medical model of treatment in which the patient was never in charge of his/her care to a social model in which the individual had a voice in treatment practices. At the same time, large institutional models also evolved into opportunities for more family-like homes in community settings. Other federal legislation greatly enhanced the lives of people with disabilities, including special education laws, the Rehabilitation Acts, Social Security programs, funding of supportive housing, protecting civil rights through Bill of Rights mandates, and access to work initiatives titled the Ticket to Work program.

The Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act of 2000 (DD ACT) created key organizations in each state with the primary tasks to establishing standards of practice, providing human rights protections and family resources, sponsoring research in the field, and ensuring full community inclusion for vocational opportunities. The following organizations were established:

- State councils on developmental disabilities
- National Network of University Centers for Excellence in Developmental Disabilities Education, Research and Service
- Projects of national significance to create opportunities for people with developmental disabilities and their families to contribute to and participate in all facets of community life
- The President's Committee for People With Intellectual Disabilities (DD ACT)
- Protection and advocacy systems

State councils, appointed by the governors, were formed in each state and territory, with a mandate to include people with developmental disabilities and their families. The councils' role is to be a voice for people with developmental disabilities, to identify the most pressing needs for this constituency, to offer comprehensive program planning, and to advocate and be a change agent within the system of state care. Areas of concern may include the rights and dignity of the consumer, educational resources, access to health care, and employment opportunities. State councils form networks to work for integration and inclusion in all aspects of the community.

Protection and advocacy systems (P&As) are mandated to empower, protect and advocate for the human and civil rights of persons with disabilities. There are 57 P&As in the federal system and they are independent of any service provider. P&As review incidents of rights abuses and conduct assessments to determine whether the rights of an individual have been violated; they then recommend resolutions to the problems reviewed. They also provide training to organizations and to self-advocates to facilitate the voice of the individual or family being served. Lastly, they advocate for special education systems to obtain the least restrictive program and inclusive settings available. P&As are strong voices for those unable to defend their own rights.

University Centers for Excellence have a primary purpose to comprehensively assess the needs of the consumer and his/her family and to identify specific goals to meet these needs. University centers work in interdisciplinary models with students and professionals to ensure that needs of consumers and their families are effectively and efficiently met. These centers are usually affiliated with university systems, where they provide research, facilitate staff training and technical assistance, conduct research, and share research and information findings.

Projects of national significance denote federal government–sponsored discretionary funding to meet specific needs within states. Projects may include conferences as well as development of federal and state policy. Family support programs are also funded. Individuals with developmental disabilities typically live with their families; as families age, different levels of support are needed. The family support programs help coordinate resources for in-home care.

Other projects have collected and disseminated data concerning access to employment, residential information, and ongoing data collection to evaluate and compare public financial programmatic trends in developmental disabilities services and supports.

The Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities identifies the federal system that funds, coordinates, studies, and advocates best practices within the field of developmental disabilities.

Rosalind Kopfstein
Western Connecticut State University

See Also: Developmental Disabilities, Attitudes and Myths in Services for; Developmental Disabled Individuals.

Further Readings

Administration for Community Living. http://www.acl.gov/gov/programs/aidd/Program_Resource (Accessed April 2014).

"The ARC Fact Sheet: Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act." http://www.thearc.org/document.doc?id=2925 (Accessed April 2014).

Braddock, D. Federal Policy Toward Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities. Baltimore, MD: Paul H. Brookes Publishing, 1987.

Croser, M. D. "Federal Disability Legislation: 1975–1999." In Embarking on a New Century: Mental Retardation at the End of the 20th Century, R. Shalock, P. Baker, and M. D. Croser, eds. Washington, DC: Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities, 2002.

DD Act: Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act of 2000. P.L. 106-402. http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/aidd (Accessed December 2013).

DeWeaver, K. "Developmental Disabilities: Definitions and Policies." In NASW Encyclopedia of Social Work, 19th ed. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 1995.

Gettings, R. M. Forging a Federal-State Partnership: A History of Federal Developmental Disabilities Policy. Washington, DC: American Association on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities and the National Association of State Directors of Developmental Disabilities, 2011.

Mansell, J. "Deinstitutionalization and Community Living: Progress, Problems and Priorities." Journal of Intellectual and Developmental Disability, v.31/2 (2006).

National Council on Disability. "Rising Expectations: The Developmental Disabilities Act Revisited, February 2011." http://www.ncd.gov/publications/2011/Feb142011 (Accessed December 2013).

"Rising Expectations: The Developmental Disabilities Act Revisited." http://www.ncd.gov/publications/2011/Feb142011 (April 2014).

Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview

Prevention, treatment, and wellness promotion for young people 11 to 25 years old has been a growing objective for U.S. social service, education, juvenile justice, child welfare, and medical fields for the past century.

These services target the emotional health; substance abuse; and the social, behavioral, academic, and/or vocational functioning of adolescents and young adults. Improving the ability of youth to attain success in school; promoting mental, social, and emotional health and well-being; facilitating growth-fostering relationships; and equipping youth to achieve developmental milestones including the establishment of a stable and sustainable living environment are common goals among adolescent and youth service providers.

Historical Context

Mental, emotional, and behavioral health services for adolescents and youth in the United States share an intimate relationship with juvenile corrections services. Their common history dates back to the late 1800s, when the state of Illinois established the nation's first juvenile court in Chicago. In the years that followed, a group of concerned women on the board of directors of Jane Addams's Hull House began investigating juvenile delinquency and, in 1909, created the Juvenile Psychopathic Institute to study adolescent brain functioning, IQ, and psychological factors impacting troubled youth. Their approach inspired the opening of many child guidance centers across the United States in the early-to-mid-20th century.

The Child Study Center at Yale School of Medicine was created in 1911 and served as an innovator in the study of child and adolescent development. During World War II, the drafting of teenagers and young adults from diverse ethnic and socioeconomic backgrounds contributed to data on the relationships between a youth's mental health and ability to function in the world. This spawned a new interest in adolescent health and wellness, and in 1948, a nationwide collaboration of child guidance clinics organized to form the American Association of Psychiatric Clinics for Children (AAPCC) to advocate for effective adolescent/youth services. In 1953, the American Academy of Child Psychiatry was founded, and in the 1960s the National Institute of Health awarded its first grant to study pediatric psychopharmacology.

In 1982, Jane Knitzer released a groundbreaking study, Unclaimed Children: The Failure of Public Responsibility to Children and Adolescents in Need of Mental Health Services. The study was the first of its kind examining on a large scale the effectiveness of mental health services for children and adolescents in the United States. A key finding of the Knitzer study highlighted the importance of family and parent inclusion as an essential component to the success of youth services. In 1984, the National Institute of Mental Health established a Child and Adolescent Service System Program, which was later shifted to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA). The program encourages states to develop a more comprehensive system of care for troubled adolescents, prioritize community-based treatment, facilitate collaborative efforts among state agencies and stakeholders, and increase parent and family involvement in adolescent services.

The Special Education Pupils Program, enacted in California in 1984, provided a new framework for youth mental health care by mandating that special education students be provided adequate mental health services in a collaborative manner between educators and mental health providers. This significantly increased access to mental health services for youth through school individualized education programs (IEPs) and enabled troubled teenagers to remain in home and in their home school, while building necessary services into their weekly schedule.

In 1988, an Alabama court case, R.C. v. Hornsby, placed a spotlight on youth in state custody who were committed to psychiatric hospitals, despite never having received any diagnoses. Parents and families in these instances were often denied visitation rights. The legal agreement in this case mandated the creation of a system of care for young people currently experiencing mental health disorders or at risk of being involved with the child welfare system, and established family preservation as a priority for these youth.

The Federation of Families for Children's Mental Health was established in 1989 to promote a family-driven, youth-guided system for adolescent mental, social, and behavioral services. A decade later, in 2001, the Jason K. v. Eden settlement in the state of Arizona further galvanized these improvements to the provision of child behavioral health. In the settlement, the state adopted a vision that placed youth and families at the center of care delivery systems. Principles established by this settlement included (1) collaboration with the child and family; (2) adoption of evidence-based practices; (3) cross-system collaboration; (4) maximizing service accessibility; (5) strength-based, family and youth-tailored services; (6) a focus on stable child placement; (7) respect for youth and family cultural background; and (8) anchoring and connection to natural supports.

In 2003, Katie A. v. Bonta further challenged the detrimental and common practice of placing foster children with mental health problems in hospitals and residential facilities when instead they could be enabled to remain in homes in their communities if adequate services were available. The settlement of this lawsuit provided the framework for the expansion of wraparound services and evidence-based practices being made available to foster children with the intention of preventing future institutionalization.

Terminology

An "adolescent" is generally defined as a young person 11 to 17 years of age. "Family-driven care" indicates that families take a primary role in making decisions regarding the mental, social, emotional, and behavioral services their children need and receive, as well as contributing to the formation of the policies and procedures governing the larger systems responsible for funding, driving, and providing those services. "Youth-guided care" refers to an emphasis on the rights of adolescents and young adults receiving mental, social, emotional, and/or behavioral care to be educated, informed, and empowered to take a decision-making role in their own services, and to contribute to the formation of the policies and procedures governing the larger systems providing those services. "Evidence-based practice" refers to a service approach that has been evaluated using a criteria base to determine the level of its empirically demonstrated effectiveness with a certain population. In order to be considered an evidence-based practice (EBP), the approach must have documented outcomes in two or more randomized, controlled outcome studies comparing the target approach to an appropriate alternative where a significant advantage was found.

"System of care" refers to comprehensive community-based services and supports consisting of research-informed programs, strong interagency collaboration, and sustained funding. "Least restrictive environment" is a standard established by the 2004 Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) that dictates that youth be served when at all possible in their home school, permitted to reside at home with their family, and receive services in the most natural, diverse, and culturally relevant setting possible. "Custody relinquishment" refers to the practice of "voluntarily" giving up one's child or children to the child welfare system, juvenile department, and/or state in order to access mental health services for them. "Wraparound services" refers to a concept established in the 1980s to prevent out-of-home placements and promote care in the least restrictive environment. The aim of wraparound services is to provide youth with serious and/or complex mental, emotional, or behavioral problems an intensive, individualized care plan involving collaboration between the adolescent, family, natural supports, service providers, and community agencies that enables them to remain in their homes and communities.

Differentiation From Adult Services

Historically, adolescent/youth services such as behavior modification and substance abuse intervention mimicked the psychodynamic and aggressive/confrontational approaches being applied to adults with similar presenting problems. Psychiatric, psychological, corrective, and substance abuse recovery programs initially designed for adults were liberally applied to adolescents with little alteration. The Stockton Developmental Center, which functioned as an insane asylum for the state of California in the 1800s, is an example of the institutions that placed children in the same hospital wards as adults, with no separate accommodations.

In the 1950s, certain U.S. medical and social service facilities began to recognize that adolescent behavior problems such as substance abuse and delinquency did not necessarily mirror those of adults. Despite a growing understanding of the unique features of the adolescent brain, youth were still subjected to the same service approaches as adults through the 1980s. Currently, youth service providers recognize the now large body of research demonstrating that adolescent and adult mental, emotional, social, and behavioral problems manifest differently and are best treated differently. Owing to their unique developmental stage—socially, physiologically, and neurologically—adolescents in need of services cannot be treated as merely younger versions of adults. Reinforced by research on the most effective ways of serving teenagers and their families, treatment programs developed specifically for youth emerged slowly in the 1990s.

Settings

Youth services in the United States are provided in a variety of community-based settings including home-based services, school-based services, juvenile correction departments, community clinics, foster-care homes, and medical and residential facilities. Based on statistics from 2007, 3.1 million youth or almost 13 percent of 12- to 17-year-olds in the United States annually receive counseling or psychotherapy intervention in a specialized mental health setting—either outpatient, inpatient, and/or with a combination of in-home services. Another 12 percent receive services in a school-based setting.

Statistics show that approximately 13 percent of 12- to 17-year-olds receive some form of psychotherapy intervention and more than 2 million become part of the juvenile justice system.

Approximately 3 percent receive mental health services in a general medical setting, and over 5 percent receive services in multiple settings.

In 2002, the American School Counseling Association established a framework for the provision of youth treatment and prevention services in school-based settings. School counselors utilize evidence-based approaches to provide individual, group, and family-oriented interventions to students through high school, designed to promote academic, social, emotional, and behavioral health.

Currently, more than 2 million U.S. teenagers annually become formally involved with the juvenile justice system and millions more benefit from prevention services aimed at deterring youth from needing juvenile correction involvement. The vast majority of youth enter the juvenile corrections system with at least one diagnosable mental health need. In some communities where access to mental health care and preventative care is limited, children are referred to the juvenile justice system because general mental health services for youth are unavailable or limited in their area.

Evidence-Based Practices for Youth Services

Adolescent/youth services include a variety of different approaches depending on the preferences of the youth and family, the diagnosis, the level of severity of the problem, and the availability of equipped service providers. Common prevention services include group therapy, psychosocial support, peer and adult mentoring, psycho-education, and prosocial extracurricular activities. Typical intervention services may include individual, group, and/or family therapy with an array of evidence-based practices and possible psychiatric evaluation and medication, along with care coordination/case management.

Empirical research on the effectiveness of youth services has contributed to a growing body of literature on evidence-based practices for prevention and intervention for adolescents. Cognitive behavioral therapy, motivational enhancement therapy, multidimensional family therapy, multisystemic therapy, and brief strategic family therapy are a few examples out of dozens of empirically supported approaches for providing effective services for adolescents and their families. The Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration maintains a list of evidence-based practices and programs in the delivery of effective youth services in the United States.

Obstacles to Accessing Effective Youth Services

Studies of service access and effectiveness consistently reveal ongoing disparity between youth of different racial/ethnic and socioeconomic backgrounds, as well as gender differences. At present, African American youth are more likely to be placed out of home and discharged from residential treatment into foster care than their peers. Males are consistently found more likely to be placed in residential facilities than their female peers. An estimated 40 percent of the boys and nearly 30 percent of the girls placed in residential treatment could have been treated effectively in their home community, based upon their level of risk severity, if adequate community services were made available.

Controlling for risk factors and all other variables equally, adolescents treated in residential facilities and out-of-home placements are more likely than their peers to have suicidal tendencies, comorbid mental health conditions, and experience abuse and neglect. Research indicates that in the United States as much as 75-80 percent of children and adolescents in need of mental health services do not receive them at all, or receive them in an inadequate manner or frequency. Barriers to accessing adolescent/youth services can include stigma preventing the youth and/or family from seeking help; lack of culturally relative services available; language barriers between youth, families, and service providers; inadequate funding; transportation difficulties; and/or shortage of trained providers.

Current Trends

In 2006, the National Center for Children in Poverty released findings from Unclaimed Children Revisited, an initiative highlighting the best state policy practices across the nation in adolescent/youth service delivery, including an emphasis on developmentally and culturally appropriate services, family and youth engagement, and evidence-based services. The study revealed the following trends in U.S. youth services: (1) increased inclusion of parents and families in policy, procedure, and implementation of youth services; (2) decreased funding and practice of approaches shown to be harmful or ineffective for youth; (3) increased use of evidence-based practices and best-practice approaches informed by research on youth health and wellness; and (4) a growing focus on prevention and promoting protective factors that lead to resiliency for youth and families.

The growing interest in protective factors and resiliency development represents a shift in the field of youth services away from a concentration on mental illness and toward strength and wellness. Closely related to this shift is a growing awareness of the importance of language and culture-specific services—adolescents and their families can be best understood and served within the context of their home culture. Resiliency is a strength-based concept that emphasizes the promotion of relationships, activities, skills, and values that serve to prevent and protect a youth from negative consequences, risky behaviors, and environmental challenges.

Stress-relieving and resiliency-building activities can include spiritual practices; problem-solving; practicing positive interactions with family members, teachers, and peers; service to the community; leadership development; team sports; and the arts. Family-based treatment interventions, often provided in the home, outpatient clinics, and/or school, can serve to facilitate positive interactions between troubled youth and their parents, siblings, and extended family and tend to consistently demonstrate good empirical outcomes. Evidence-based practices empower families and youth to learn relational skills, practice creative approaches to solving conflict, reflect on their family culture and values, and identify natural strengths the youth and family can draw upon to achieve their health and wellness goals.

Julie Strentzsch
Gena Minnix
St. Mary's University, San Antonio, Texas

See Also: At-Risk Youth Services; Mental Health Services, Children; Wraparound Services/Systems of Care.

Further Readings

Kazdin, Alan and John Weisz, eds. Evidence-Based Psychotherapies for Children and Adolescents. New York: Guilford Press, 2003.

Poncin, Yann and Joseph Woolston. "Systems of Care, Wraparound Services, and Home-Based Services." In Mina Dulcan, ed. Textbook of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry. Arlington, VA: American Psychiatric Publishing, 2010.

Santrock, John. Adolescence, 14th ed. Columbus, OH: McGraw-Hill, 2011.

Sells, Scott. Treating the Tough Adolescent: A Family-Based, Step-by-Step Guide. New York: Guilford Press, 2004.

VanDenBerg, John, Eric Bruns, and John Burchard. "History of the Wraparound Process." Focal Point: A National Bulletin on Family Support and Children's Mental Health: Quality and Fidelity in Wraparound, v.17/2 (2003).

Adoption: Infants, International, and Older/Special Needs Children

Adoption is not a new phenomenon; it is spoken about in the Bible and there are accounts of adoption thousands of years ago in Greece, Rome, and Egypt. The history of adoption in the United States can be traced to the 1850s with the passage of the first adoption law in Massachusetts in 1851. This law, the Adoption of Children Act, recognized adoption as a social and legal activity based on children's welfare rather than on adults' self-interest. The law directed judges alone to ensure that adoption rulings were "fit and proper." The 1850s were also the era of the orphan trains, which relocated children from New York to live with families throughout various states and within Canada. In the early history of adoption in the United States, adoption records were not confidential and, thus, there were no legal protections for the adoptive families and biological parents. In the 1930s through 1950s, birth and adoption records were sealed for the first time, and thus, the adopted children had no legal recourse to access information about their birth parents.

Current adoption practices distinguish between closed and open adoptions. In the past, most adoptions were closed. However, closed adoptions are relatively rare in contemporary society. Closed adoptions occur when the adoptive parent(s) do not know the adoptee's birth parents. In closed adoption, files are generally physically sealed. Despite this, many states have created procedures and protocol for family members to "open" a closed adoption file (the procedures vary from state to state).

Open adoptions are increasingly more common in the United States; they are also most likely to involve adoptions of infants either independently or through a private organization. In open adoptions, the adoptive parents usually meet and stay in contact with the birth parents. Today, many adoption agencies encourage open adoptions, but the degree of openness varies according to the needs and desires of the adoptive parents and birth parents. For example, contact can differ in terms of frequency and duration of birth parents' visits. Further, families can decide on different forms of contact (i.e., information, pictures, gifts, letters, phone calls, face-to-face visits). Adoption is a common phenomenon in the United States. It is estimated that more than 1.5 million children live with adopted parents and between 2 to 4 percent of American families have adopted a child. This figure includes children who are adopted as infants, children adopted internationally, and adoptees that are older and/or have special needs. Additionally, some adoptions are considered transracial adoptions.

Infant Adoption

Researchers maintain that 2 percent of adoptions are of children who are 1 year old or younger, while 45 percent are of children 1 to 5 years old. A majority of adoptive parents may prefer to adopt an infant.

The orphan train mural in Delmar, Iowa. The history of adoption in the United States can be traced to the 1850s with the passage of the first adoption law in Massachusetts in 1851. The 1850s were also the era of the orphan trains, which relocated children from New York to live with families throughout various U.S. states and within Canada.

However, the waiting time for a healthy infant can be as long as two years or more. Adoptions of healthy infants commonly are arranged with private agencies and can cost from $5,000 to more than $40,000. Evidence shows that strong attachments, solid families, and positive communication about adoption issues contribute to the success of adopted infants. This evidence remains true independent of the child's age or the race of the family and child.

International Adoptions

Every year, U.S. citizens adopt children from other countries and families from other countries adopt U.S. children. International adoptions are popular in the United States but they usually come with additional costs, longer waiting periods, and strict regulations. Wait times for international adoptions can range from approximately three months to two years. The costs associated with international adoptions vary considerably, ranging from nothing to over $60,000. The regulations for international adoptions are largely based on the Hague Convention on the Protection of Children and Co-operation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption. This is an international agreement to safeguard international/intercountry adoptions. The United States signed the convention in 1994 and it became enforceable in 2008. The convention applies to every adoption involving the United States and any other country that has also signed the convention.

Older/Special Needs Children

Recent reports indicate that two-thirds of the children in foster care are over the age of 5, and many of these children may have additional health problems and/or special needs. Adopting an older child or a child with special needs may bring additional stressors and/or challenges. The older the child, the more likely the chance of a disrupted adoption; thus, adoptive parents are encouraged to have realistic expectations. Additionally, adoptive families with older children are urged to make use of postplacement family counseling early in the adoption process, maintain sibling bonds, make all transitions gradually, and allow the children to bring their own customs and personal choices to their new family. An unhealthy integration often occurs with the adoption of older children when the family makes minimal changes and compromises and expects the adoptee to change. In the context of adoption, the term special needs takes on a unique definition. The term does not necessarily refer to medical, physical, or emotional disabilities. In adoption, special needs is the term used to determine eligibility for federal financial assistance. While definitions of special needs vary by state, a child with special needs may have one or more of the following factors or conditions: having a particular ethnic or racial background; being an older child; being a member of a sibling group needing to be placed together as one unit; and having medical conditions and/or physical, mental, or emotional disabilities, and/or any condition that makes it more difficult to find a potential adoptive family.

Transracial Adoption

Transracial, transcultural adoption refers to the placement of a child who is of one race or ethnicity with an adoptive parent of another racial or ethnic group. The majority of transracial adoptions within the United States involve African American or interracial children adopted by Caucasian parents and/or the adoption of interracial children by African American or other parents of color. Conversely, the transracial adoptions of Caucasian or Native American children are relatively uncommon. Researchers argue that children adopted transracially do as well as same-race adoptions when parents are aware of the unique issues these children may encounter. For example, transracial adopted children are likely to thrive when the adoptive parents provide information and education and expose the child to his or her racial background and heritage.

Summary

The policies and procedures related to adoption have changed considerably over the years. Infant adoptions, international adoptions, the adoption of older/special needs children, and transracial adoptions are common in contemporary culture. Each of these adoptions creates an opportunity for a child to thrive with their adoptive parents.

Laurie Craigen
Kathleen Levingston
Old Dominion University

See Also: Adoption, Special Needs; Adoption Agencies and Services; Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System; Adoption and Safe Families Act; Families, Nontraditional; International Adoptions and Families; Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children.

Further Readings

Adoption.com. "Adopting a Newborn in the United States" (2013). http://infant.adoption.com/newborn/adopting-a-newborn-in-the-united-states.html (Accessed November 2013).

AdoptUsKids. "Common Myths About Adoption" (2013). http://www.adoptuskids.org/for-families/how-to -adopt/common-myths-about-adoption#special-needs (Accessed November 2013).

FindLaw. "Open vs. Closed Adoption" (2013). http://family.findlaw.com/adoption/open-vs-closed -adoption.html (Accessed November 2013).

Herman, E. "Adoption Timeline: The Adoption History Project" (2012). http://darkwing.uoregon.edu/~adoption/timeline.html (Accessed November 2013).

Lancaster, K. Keys to Parenting an Adopted Child. Hauppauge, NY: Barron's, 1996.

Research ETC. "The History of Adoption" (2009). http://www.researchetcinc.com/historyofadoption.html (Accessed November 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services "History of Adoption Practices in the United States" (2013). https://www.childwelfare.gov/Adoption/history.cfm (Accessed November 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "'Special Needs' Adoption: What Does it Mean?" (2013).https://www.childwelfare.gov/pubs/factsheets/specialneeds (Accessed November 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "Transracial and Transcultural Adoption" (2013). https://www.childwelfare.gov/pubs/f_trans.cfm (Accessed November 2013).

Adoption, Special Needs

The term special needs adoption refers to the adoption of children who are considered hard to place for a variety of circumstances. Typically, hard to place children are those with physical handicaps, mental handicaps, or behavioral issues; from large sibling groups; older children (often identified as age 7 or above); and children from racial minorities. Historically, such children were kept in orphanages or institutions and little to no effort was made to place them. Currently, laws have been enacted to secure the rights of such children to obtain permanent homes, if at all possible.

History

Before the late 1940s, children identified with special needs were often housed in orphanages or other institutions and little to no attempt was made to have them placed in families. However, after World War II there was a shift in ideology and a move to have children placed in homes within a community rather than an institution.

Social service agencies were expected to develop a foster care system in which the children could be placed out in the community and to identify permanent homes for children who could not be reunified with their biological families. At this time, the focus was on reunifying children with their biological families and the right of the parent to regain custody of the child was the primary concern.

In 1997, the Adoption and Safe Families Act (AFSA) was enacted. AFSA addressed the difficulties involved in adopting children with special needs. Prior to this law, the states attempted to reunify children with their biological families, and children could spend years in foster care before parental rights were terminated and the children were identified as ready for adoption. AFSA provided time limits of up to two years for biological parents to regain custody of their children, at which point the children would be ready for adoption. AFSA also provided extensions in support and health care coverage, which was a major concern for families of special needs children. AFSA formalized the shift in focus to the rights of the children to be in loving homes over the rights of the parents to regain custody.

In 2008, the Fostering Connection to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act became law. This law enabled children in foster care to find permanent homes through providing support and improvements in education and health care to support adoptions. The law also included support for children up to age 21 and provided help for these young people to be successful once they were ready to leave foster care. Families that adopted special needs children typically needed extra time and support services to get their children to a point of optimal functioning.

Special Concerns

Families that adopt special needs children require some form of preparation for what they are going to do. This often takes the form of foster care training, in which the parents are prepared to be foster-to-adopt parents. They also are assigned a case manager who meets with the families and seeks to help them identify and connect with a special needs child. When placing a special needs child in a permanent home, community supports are vital to help the family provide the kind of intervention the child will need in order to do well.

Children who have physical disabilities require medical treatment, with parents who are prepared to take care of such things as tube feeding, hospital visits, and support services such as physical and occupational therapies. Parents might need to have their home adapted for a wheelchair, understand how a blind child navigates a room, or learn sign language in order to meet the needs of the child placed with them. The local school would need to develop an individualized education program (IEP), or a more specialized school program would need to be identified to help the child grow and fully develop.

Children with mental or developmental delays require parents who are able to help them develop their skills in a supportive fashion. Adoptive parents who take in such a child will need to work with the school to develop an IEP and advocate for the child if needed. Such children often have physical disabilities and might require specialized medical care as well. As the child gets older, some form of transitional program might be needed to help him or her to become as independent as possible.

Children with emotional or mental health disabilities/behavioral issues require therapy, psychiatric care, and support services and may need hospitalization. Such children often appear to be fine, but may have serious mental health issues that can lead to disruptive or troubled behavior. Parents of such children will need support and training in how to handle and manage a difficult child. Because of their troubled behavior, such children often need IEPs and may end up in trouble with the law when they become teens. Parents might have to be prepared to go to court, the police station, or juvenile detention agencies and facilities with such children. There might be a need to place the child in a residential mental health or behavioral facility for extended period, as well. This presents very difficult challenges for parents in loving homes who want to remain involved with their child.

Older children who are adopted might have difficulty trusting or bonding with their adoptive family. They also will need to be prepared for the adult world (getting a job, learning to drive, finishing school, etc.). However, older children often are motivated to attain their goals and often do not provide much difficulty for the adoptive family.

Sibling groups require adoptive parents who can effectively handle two or more children who may have some other special needs. The needs of two or three (or more) children will have to be addressed and met. Two-parent homes or a home in which the parent does not need to regularly leave might be more successful with a larger sibling group.

Children who are minorities often face the challenge of being placed in homes that do not match their own racial or ethnic heritage. They might have to adapt to a different culture and may have identity issues related to being in a home so unlike their biological one. They may have to live in communities where they do not look like the other children and might face bullying or some form of stigma or low self-esteem because of this. The adoptive family would need to make sure the children remain in touch with their heritage and culture and provide opportunities for the children to celebrate their racial or ethnic heritage.

Conclusion

Adopting a child with special needs can be a very rewarding and positive experience if the adoptive family is given guidance and support by the adoptive or social service agency making the placement. The school, community, and professionals involved in the care and welfare of each child need to work in a cooperative fashion to meet that child's needs. Children with special needs can become loving members of a family and often thrive in a healthy, balanced home.

Mardi Fallon
University of Cincinnati

See Also: Adoption: Infants, International, and Older/Special Needs Children; Adoption Agencies and Services; Adoption and Safe Families Act; Biracial Children; Case Management; Children in Foster Care; Children With Special Needs; Disabled Clients; Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008; Multiracial Children; Special Education.

Further Readings

Child Welfare Information Gateway. "Special Needs' Adoption: What Does it Mean?" (2010). https://www.childwelfare.gov/pubs/factsheets/specialneeds (Accessed November 2013).

University of Oregon Adoptions History Project. "Special Needs Adoption" (2013). http://pages.uoregon.edu/adoption/topics/specialneeds.html (Accessed November 2013).

Adoption Agencies and Services

Adoption is a process whereby a person inherits permanent and full parental rights, as well as responsibilities, for a child. Whereas guardianship or other systems designed for the care of children are temporary, adoption is permanent custody, which warrants public recognition. Contemporary systems of adoption are for the most part governed by thorough statutes and regulations. Most recently, adoption serves the needs of homeless, neglected, abused, and runaway children. Adoption is noted as being a social, emotional, lifelong, and legal process in which children who will not be raised by their birth parents become complete and permanent legal members of another family. While the practice of adoption has been around for decades, the recent history of adoption in the United States can be traced to the 1850s, with the passage of the first adoption law in Massachusetts that recognized adoption as a social and legal process based on the child's well-being rather than the adult's interests.

Transracial or transcultural adoption means placing a child who is of one race or ethnic group with adoptive parents of another race or ethnic group. Adoptive parents choose to adopt transracially or transculturally for a variety of reasons. Some prospective adoptive parents feel connected to a particular race or culture because of their ancestry or through personal experiences such as travel or military service. Others simply like the idea of reaching out to children in need, no matter where they come from. A number of sources have provided statistical estimates, which reveal the percentage of transracial or transcultural adoptions in the United States is significant. For instance, one source estimates that Caucasian families adopt 1,000 to 2,000 African American children each year. Data from the Immigration and Naturalization Service show that U.S. families adopted 7,088 children from other countries in 1990. This means that there were roughly 8,500 transracial or transcultural adoptions in 1990. In that same year, there were almost 119,000 adoptions of all kinds. Since approximately half of the adoptions in any year are stepparent or relative adoptions, in 1990 there were about 59,500 nonrelative adoptions. The percentage of transracial/transcultural adoptions (8,500 of 59,500) then comes out to more than 14 percent.

Essentially, preparation for adoption is important for all families considering this life-changing commitment. It is more crucial for parents considering transracial or transcultural adoption because it will introduce these parents to all aspects of adoptive parenthood, help the adoptive parents learn about adoption issues, and help them identify the type of child desired to parent. Any adoption agency that conducts and supervises transracial or transcultural adoptions should provide this important service. For those independent adoptive parents, they should seek counseling and training in these areas. Independent adoptive parents should also read as many articles and books as possible on the subject.

Forms of Adoption

Open adoption allows distinguishing facts to be transferred between adoptive and biological parents, as well as interaction between the two parties. In most cases, adoptees have the right to access their birth records. Open adoption can be an informal arrangement subject to termination by adoptive parents who have sole authority over the child. In some jurisdictions, the biological and adoptive parents may enter into a legally enforceable and binding agreement concerning visitation, exchange of information, or other interaction regarding the child.

Closed adoption seals all identifying information, maintaining it as secret and preventing disclosure of the identities of adoptive parents, biological parents, and adoptees. Nevertheless, closed adoption may allow the transmittal of nonidentifying information, such as medical history and religious and ethnic background. In states that honor the "safe haven" law, infants can be left, anonymously, at hospitals, fire departments, or police stations immediately following birth. Closed adoption, lack of medical history, and the broken thread of family continuity can have a disadvantageous effect on an adoptee's mental, emotional, and physical health.

Ethical Issues in Adoption

Adoption involves the rights of the birth parents, the child, and the adoptive parents. It is imperative that professionals working in adoption are ethical to ensure the rights of everyone involved as the adoption develops. Professionals working with birth parents involved through either voluntary relinquishment or involuntary termination of parental rights must ensure that relinquishments are truly voluntary and that ethical standards and procedures are followed in all termination of parental rights proceedings. Ethical adoptive family recruitment requires that accurate information about a child's background, to the extent allowed by law, be shared from the beginning. This information should be shared first during the initial introduction as permitted, before the family's final decision to adopt. Ethics are also important after an adoption is legally confirmed. Ethical practice in balancing the birth parents' right to privacy with an adopted person's desire to know their history is imperative in postadoption practice.

Types of Adoption

Most probable adoptive parents have to decide whether to adopt on a national or international level. Some of the considerations in deciding between domestic and global adoption include the importance of having access to the child's medical and biological history and the amount of contact with the child's birth family. The following elaborates on the various types of adoptions.

Domestic adoption may allow services with a public agency, a licensed private agency, an attorney, or an adoption facilitator or an unlicensed agency. Public and licensed private agencies are regulated by state laws and have more supervision to guarantee quality services. Many public and private adoption agencies provide free orientations, which allow the adoptive parents to gain an overview of their available services before the adoptive parents are obligated to retain services. Whether an infant or an older child is adopted, likely a more extensive history and background about the child who lives in the United States than the child who lives in another country is shared with the adoptive parents. Domestic adoptions make it more likely that adoptive families will be able to arrange for some degree of contact between the two families (birth family and adoptive family) after the adoption. This practice of adoption is known as openness. The numerous categories of domestic adoptions (public agency adoption, licensed private agency adoption, independent adoption, and facilitated/unlicensed agency adoption) and intercountry adoptions (Hague Convention adoption and non–Hague Convention adoption) are described below.

To begin, public agency adoption primarily deals with the adoption of children in state custody (foster care). There are multiple reasons why foster children can be removed from their families, which involve abuse or neglect. Most foster children have experienced trauma because of the separation from their biological family. These children range in age from infants to teens. Licensed private agency adoption involves causes for the birth parents to relinquish their parental rights to the agency and adoptive parents to receive adoption services from the agency. These agencies are required to adhere to licensing and procedural standards. Many prospective parents work with licensed private agencies in order to adopt healthy infants. The length of time required to adopt an infant is unpredictable—some adoptive parents have waited for years. In the United States, agency criteria for prospective adoptive parents are often more restrictive for infant adoptions than for adoptions of older children, mainly because fewer infants are available.

In independent adoption, attorneys assist prospective parents with the adoption process, which usually involves the adoption of an infant. Families adopting independently identify the expectant parent(s) without an agency's help. Some adoptive parents and expecting mothers find each other and make a plan within a week, while other adoptive parents search for years. This adoption process allows the adoptive parent to interact with the expectant parents or their attorney. Birth parents typically provide a written consent for the adoption that must be approved by the court.

Facilitated/unlicensed agency adoption is an adoptive process that is accelerated by facilitators and unlicensed agencies. A facilitator is any person who links prospective adoptive parents with expectant birth mothers for a fee. Facilitators may or may not be regulated in their state and may have varying degrees of expertise in adoption practice. Some states prohibit adoptions by paid facilitators.

Intercountry adoption differs in several substantial ways from domestic adoption. Children who qualify for intercountry adoption are faced with the restriction of having lost their birth parents to death or abandonment. Intercountry adopted children can also qualify if their birth parents can prove that they are incapable of meeting their basic needs. For example, some children adopted through intercountry adoption may have been raised in orphanages or institutional settings. Children adopted from another country, especially older children, require cultural responsiveness with respect to the changed environment (i.e., language, food, customs, societal expectations). The permanency process for intercountry adoption fluctuates, based on the agency. The country in which the child was born and the country's Hague Convention status should be considered. Often, adoptive families are asked to take several trips to the child's country of origin to actually gain custody of the child.

The Hague Convention on Protection of Children and Co-operation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption (Hague Convention) was sanctioned in 2008. The ratification of the Hague Convention amended a number of requirements for adoptions of children from international countries that are members of the Hague Convention. The Hague Convention was enacted to safeguard children and families involved in intercountry adoption. It includes but is not limited to requirements for adoption agencies, home studies, and parent training. Adoptive parents who decide to proceed with a Hague Convention country must use the services of a provider who is approved or accredited specifically to provide Hague Convention adoption services. Parents need to identify the desired country before obtaining a home study, and they will have to complete at least 10 hours of approved training. Children adopted from Hague Convention countries must be qualified by their country of origin and must meet the definition of a Hague Convention adopted person. Before entering the United States, the child must obtain an immigrant visa.

Parents adopting from a non-Hague Convention country may obtain a home study before choosing the country from which to adopt as long as the home study meets state and federal requirements. The adoption agency must be licensed in their home state. Parents may or may not be required to complete training before adopting. The child identified for adoption must meet the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services definition of an orphan and must obtain an immigrant visa before entering the United States.

Tamikia S. Lott
Old Dominion University

See Also: Abandonment; Adoption, Special Needs; Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System; Adoption and Safe Families Act; Child Welfare Services

Further Readings

Brooks, Dorothy Elizabeth. "Black/White Transracial Adoption: An Update." OURS, v.24/4 (July–August 1991).

Child Welfare Information Gateway. "Adoption Options." https://www.childwelfare.gov/pubs/f_adoptoption.cfm (Accessed September 2013).

Child Welfare Information Gateway. "Trends in Foster Care and Adoption." http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/stats_research/afcars/trends.htm (Accessed September 2013).

Flango, Victor Eugene and Carol R. Flango. "Adoption Statistics by State." Child Welfare, v.72/3 (May–June 1993).

Mintzer, R. Yes, You Can Adopt!: A Comprehensive Guide for Parents. New York: Da Capo, 2002.

Pertman, A. Adoption Nation: How the Adoption Revolution Is Transforming America. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System

The Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System (AFCARS) collects case-level evidence from state and tribal Title IV-E agencies on all children in foster care and those who have been adopted with title IV-E agency involvement. AFCARS is managed by the Children's Bureau, a federal agency under the supervision of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' Administration for Children, Youth, and Families. Examples of data reported to AFCARS include demographic information on the foster child as well as the foster and/or adoptive parents, the number of removal episodes a child has experienced, the number of placements in the current removal episode, and the current placement setting. Title IV-E agencies are required to submit AFCARS data twice a year by a set deadline. Title IV-E agencies that fail to meet any of the standards set forth in federal regulation 45 CFR 1355.40 (a-d) are considered noncompliant with the requirements of the Title IV-E plan and are notified in writing of their noncompliance.

The Children's Bureau provides national leadership and direction in planning, managing, and coordinating the administration and financing of a broad range of comprehensive and supportive programs for children and families, including child welfare programs. These programs are, in large part, carried out by state, tribal, and local agencies. The Children's Bureau retains responsibility to monitor and evaluate the programs to ensure they are being operated in compliance with federal law and regulation. This includes the assessment of statutorily required data and automated information systems operated by Title IV-E child welfare agencies that support the programs under Titles IV-B and IV-E of the Social Security Act.

AFCARS Assessment Reviews

The purpose of the AFCARS assessment review (AAR) is to conduct an in-depth assessment and evaluation of how an agency gathers, records, extracts, and submits its AFCARS data. AAR is an arduous process, which examines Title IV-E agencies' information systems and allows a review team to identify problems, investigate the causes, and suggest solutions during the review. The "Guide to an AFCARS Assessment Review" offers detailed information on the AAR process and can help Title IV-E agencies prepare for a review. It can assist Title IV-E agencies with developing or redesigning a case management information system. The guide can also be used as a technical assistance document and self-assessment tool to support the development of the business requirements needed to create the AFCARS data file.

The Children's Bureau is committed to providing assistance to Title IV-E agencies in order to support the collection of high-quality adoption and foster care data. To this end, the AAR was developed to evaluate the accuracy and reliability of the foster care and adoption data. The Title IV-E agency's methodology for collecting and reporting AFCARS data is assessed against the AFCARS requirements in the federal regulation, issued policies, and AFCARS technical bulletins. A second focus of the AAR is to assess timeliness, accuracy, and quality of data entry by caseworkers.

Background and History

In 1982, the American Public Human Services Association implemented the Voluntary Cooperative Information System (VCIS) to annually collect aggregate information about children in foster care and special needs adoption from state child welfare agencies. Despite efforts by states to report data, by 1986 underwriters recognized there were a number of challenges in VCIS. To be precise, VCIS was criticized by the states for intermittent reporting, the use of a variety of reporting periods, the lack of common definitions for data elements, the lack of timeliness and the poor quality of the data, and the collection of aggregate data with limited analytic utility. To address these challenges, President Ronald Reagan on October 21, 1986, signed legislation that added Section 479 to Title IV-E of the Social Security Act.

Section 479 described the series of steps that the Department of Health and Human Services was required to take to establish a national data collection system for adoption and foster care. The department was mandated to develop a system that avoided unnecessary diversion of resources from agencies responsible for adoption and foster care. This mandate was meant to ensure that data would be collected with standardized definitions and methodologies and would be reliable and consistent over time. Ultimately, the mandate required the data collection system to offer inclusive demographic physiognomies of adopted and foster children and their parents (biological, foster, and/or adoptive). The sought-after data included the status of the foster care population (e.g., the number of children in foster care, length of placement, type of placement, availability for adoption, and goals for ending or continuing foster care). The data also included the number and characteristics of children placed in or removed from foster care, children adopted or with respect to whom adoptions have been terminated, children placed in foster care outside the state that has placement and care responsibility, and the extent and description of aid provided by all authorities.

The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1993 was enacted on August 19, 1993. A provision of this act offered states the opportunity to obtain Title IV-E funds to plan, design, develop, and implement a Statewide Automated Child Welfare Information System (SACWIS). An AFCARS ruling required states to submit to AFCARS on a semiannual basis certain data about children in foster care and adoptions that involve the state agency. The rule required states that chose to develop a SACWIS to ensure that their system could report information to AFCARS. States were obligated to report the first AFCARS data in 1995. Nevertheless, AFCARS's financial penalties for a state not complying were not implemented until 1998, at which point the data became stable enough to use for a variety of reasons.

The Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997 required the use of AFCARS data for two specific activities: the calculation of adoption incentive payments (Section 473A of the Social Security Act) and the child welfare outcomes annual report (Section 479A of the Social Security Act). Since that time, data from AFCARS also have been utilized to provide samples for child and family services reviews (CFSR) and title IV-E reviews. Furthermore, the data are utilized to develop outcome and performance measures for the CFSR, the Office of Management and Budget's Program Assessment and Rating Tool (PART), and the Government Performance and Results Act (GPRA). The data from AFCARS are also utilized to calculate state allocations for the John Chafee Foster Care Independence Program (Section 477 of the Social Security Act), to generate budget projections, to conduct trend analyses for program planning, and to respond to requests for information about children in foster care and children being adopted. In early 2002, the practice of withholding federal funds for a state's failure to comply with AFCARS requirements was halted because of a settlement of numerous states' appeals of AFCARS penalties. Nonetheless, in 2003 the Adoption Promotion Act of 2003 was signed into law, which required specific financial penalties for a state's noncompliance with AFCARS requirements.

Child Welfare Outcomes

To some extent, AFCARS was created because of apprehensions regarding the scarce national information available on children in the child welfare system. The data required by AFCARS are information that would normally be collected during the course of a child welfare assessment, planning, and service provision, so that additional information does not need to be collected solely for the purpose of meeting AFCARS requirements. The Children's Bureau prepares child welfare outcomes data and makes it available online, and publishes an annual Child Welfare Outcomes Report to Congress, a requirement of the Adoption and Safe Families Act. The report highlights each state's performance in seven outcome areas. Data from AFCARS offer an opportunity to examine how states use foster care and adoption subsidies to help achieve goals of permanency, safety, and well-being for children.

Tamikia S. Lott
Old Dominion University

See Also: Administration on Children, Youth and Families; Adoption: Infants, International, and Older/Special Needs Children; Adoption Agencies and Services; Adoption and Safe Families Act; Case Management; Center for Native American Youth; Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act; Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths; Child Welfare Services; Children in Foster Care; ChildStats; Family Pregnancy Planning; Family Services; Foster Care Agencies; Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008.

Further Readings

Collins, R. "The Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System: Implications for Foster Care Policy." In P. A. Curtis, D. Grady, and J. C. Kendall, eds. The Foster Care Crisis: Translating Research Into Policy and Practice. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

Dalberth, B., D. Gibbs, and N. Berkman. "Understanding Adoption Subsidies: An Analysis of AFCARS Data" (2005). U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation. http://aspe.hhs.gov/hsp/05/adoption-subsidies (Accessed September 2013).

National Resource Center for Child Welfare Data and Technology. "About Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System (AFCARS)." http://www.nrccwdt.org/2011/10/about-adoption-and-foster-care-analysis-and-reporting-system-afcars (Accessed September 2013).

U.S. Children's Bureau. "AFCARS." http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/research-data-technology/reporting-systems/afcars (Accessed September 2013).

Adoption and Safe Families Act

The Adoption and Safe Families Act (ASFA) was passed in 1997 in an attempt to address a number of problems that had existed in the child welfare system for decades. The passage of the Adoption and Safe Families Act marked a significant shift in child welfare thinking, placing a much stronger emphasis on the safety of children as opposed to previous child welfare policies that emphasized family reunification. Rising rates of poverty, teen pregnancy, and substance abuse disorders contributed to a significant rise in the number of foster children in the 1980s and 1990s. In addition, children remained in foster care longer, many eventually emancipated from care at age 18. The central aim of the ASFA is to address these larger caseloads and longer stays in foster care by adopting measures that would achieve timely permanency, moving children from foster care to more permanent families.

The ASFA has had and will continue to have strong implications for the human services field. While the act eventually passed with bipartisan support, the strict permanency measures and stronger emphasis on terminating parental rights continue to be a source of contention among many child welfare policy makers and practitioners. Many professionals and policy makers have expressed concerns that many African American and Hispanic families are disproportionately impacted by the emphasis on expediting the permanency process; therefore, this policy has strong implications for human services and diversity.

The ASFA contains a number of major provisions, addressing numerous areas of child welfare policy. The major provisions in the policy include (1) moving children promptly to permanent families, (2) ensuring that a child's safety is a primary concern, and (3) improving innovation and accountability throughout the child welfare system.

Moving Children Promptly to Permanent Families

Prior to the signing of the ASFA there had been no comprehensive attention to federal child welfare policy in nearly two decades. Authors of the legislation were most concerned with the safety of children, and many expressed concerns that the previous policies requiring states to make "reasonable efforts" to keep families together often resulted in reuniting children with parents who could potentially harm them. At the same time, lawmakers wanted to ensure that the law did not go too far the other way, leading to arbitrary removals of children from their families. Among the most notable provisions in this act seeking to "fast track" permanency for children is the requirement that states seek termination of parental rights of children who have been in foster care for 15 of the previous 22 months. A number of circumstances were identified in which exceptions could be made to this requirement, including instances in which the child is being cared for by another relative, the state has not provided necessary services to the child and family to return home, and instances when the state feels it is not in the child's best interest to file for termination of parental rights.

In an effort to efficiently establish a plan of permanency for children placed in foster care, the Adoption and Safe Families Act requires permanency hearings to be held no later than 12 months after a child is initially placed in foster care. In these hearings states are required to address the question of whether a child would be returning home, placed for adoption, or referred for legal guardianship. Furthermore, it is the intention that this provision will ultimately end long-term foster care as an acceptable permanency goal.

Another seminal provision of the ASFA is its expansion of the adoption incentive program. In an attempt to address the rising number of older children who have been in the foster care system for a number of years, authors of the legislation doubled the incentive payments for older children and for adoptions of special needs children. Similarly, it provided additional incentives to states that improve their rates of adoption. Several analyses of the ASFA suggest that the legislation has been effective in increasing rates of adoption of all children in foster care, including older children and children with special needs.

Ensuring That a Child's Safety and Well-Being Are Primary Concerns

Among the most prominent provisions to emphasize children's safety as a vital concern in child welfare decision making is the clarification of the term reasonable efforts, as well as the identification of exceptions to the reasonable efforts requirements. The most notable of the exceptions includes instances in which a child's safety could be at risk; therefore, reasonable efforts are not required.

The act also includes a provision aimed at ensuring that the policy does not disrupt family life inappropriately, intrude upon reasonable parental discipline, or prescribe a method of parenting. This is referred to as the preservation of reasonable parenting provision.

In addition to children's safety, the law also seeks to make children's well-being a significant focus. Requirements are outlined to ensure that states provide children in foster care with quality services to protect their health and safety. Furthermore, states are required to create health coordination plans for children in foster care, as well as education coordination plans designed to ensure that all children in foster care are in school full time or have completed secondary school.

Improving Innovation and Accountability Throughout the Child Welfare System

A long-standing critique of the child welfare system prior to the passage of the Adoption and Safe Families Act was the system's inability to adequately and efficiently track the outcomes of the children and families who were served. Two key provisions were created in an effort to better track outcomes and evaluate programs. A universal set of outcome measures is included to evaluate each state's performance in the areas of child protection and child welfare. Furthermore, each state's funding is tied to its performance in these outcome areas.

In addition to developing outcome areas to assess state performance, the Adoption and Safe Families Act set out to shift the outcomes to be more positive and empowering for children and families. Similarly, outcomes are geared to fit more closely with the goals of permanency, safety, and well-being. States are also required to document their efforts to move children into adoptive placements.

Adam McCormick
University of Texas at El Paso

See Also: Administration on Children, Youth and Families; Child Welfare Services; Children in Foster Care; Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008; John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program.

Further Readings

Center for the Study of Social Policy and the Urban Institute. "Intentions and Results: A Look Back at the Adoption and Safe Families Act" (2009). http://www.urban.org/UploadedPDF/1001351_safe_families_act.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Child Welfare Information Gateway. "Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997, P.L. 105-89." https://www.childwelfare.gov/systemwide/laws_policies/federal/index.cfm?event=federalLegislation.viewLegis&id=4 (Accessed December 2013).

National Data Archive on Child Abuse and Neglect, Cornell University. "Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System" (AFCARS) 2003 (2005). [NDACAN Dataset #118—FC2003v1], cited in Patricia E. Allard and Lynn D. Lu, Rebuilding Families, Reclaiming Lives: State Obligations to Children in Foster Care and Their Incarcerated Parents. New York: Brennan Center for Justice, 2006.

Adult Day Care

The provision of adult care during daytime periods was initially implemented as an innovative approach to meet the needs of psychiatric patients moving from hospitals to the community during the midcentury era of large-scale public mental hospital deinstitutionalization. Adaptation of this program concept as a care option for frail, chronically ill elderly and disabled adults began limited implementation in the 1970s. Throughout the following decades this type of community-based long-term supportive service (LTSS) expanded to typically offer some health and many social services in a group setting as this service became ever more available to disabled individuals residing with family members or other informal caregivers.

The concept has proven to be highly flexible and adaptable in meeting the needs of very diverse participant groups. Program activities to satisfy cultural diversity among center clients is one of the greatest challenges to programs in large urban areas with immigrant populations and economically marginal persons with access restrictions that preclude their enrollment in alternative services. Adult day care centers (ADCC) operate as either nonprofit or for-profit entities. They are typically open during all weekdays for participants transported to the site according to an individual participation schedule. At the center, participants engage in a wide range of therapeutic socialization activities, share meal times with foods that meet dietary requirements, and enjoy leisure and needed rest. Each person has an individual care plan structured according to personal physician orders as well as the results of an in-depth initial biopsychosocial assessment and taking into account family caregiver needs. Center staff members give personal care as part of the daily routine of hygiene, dispense medications, provide cognitive stimulation, and frequently make available specialized physical and other therapies as prescribed. A prevailing care philosophy is participant-centered with effective and efficient care in a safe and nurturing environment supportive of personal independence and choice.

In the United States there are 5,000 or more adult day care centers (a current estimated number given by the National Adult Day Service Association) that serve adults across the disability spectrum with a combination of physical, sensory, cognitive, and/or developmental impairments. The prevalence of dementia, often in combination with other serious chronic illnesses among participants over 70 years of age, is very high. Each center establishes its own admission criteria as related to the degree and type of disability that can be appropriately accommodated. Final admission decisions are usually made after participation capacity has been observed and evaluated. Sometimes participation extends over many years, while in other cases attendance is very brief. Participant satisfaction and that of their caregiver tend to increase as the environment becomes more familiar to the participant and caregiver expectations are met. Sometimes the availability of day care is the only viable alternative to residential placement.

Increasing Diversification of Adult Day Care Centers

When the first adult day care centers offering geriatric care opened, a few received federal funds designated as cost-effectiveness demonstration projects. There was much interest in comparing day care center per diems with nursing home daily costs. Approaches for calculating costs were difficult because a participant's time at a center was approximately eight hours, compared to the 24-hour care of a residential facility. There was considerable confusion over the distinction between senior citizen centers providing structured recreation and meals and adult day care centers providing health and social services. As different types of organizations started day care centers, distinctions were made among social, health, and medically oriented programs. Centers were identified as "freestanding," operating as independent single organizations, or "affiliated," operating under a parent organization such as a health/medical facility, social service agency, or within a church/synagogue setting. Some centers are now highly specialized and provide emphasis on rehabilitation, serve only persons with Alzheimer's disease and dementia, or outreach to specific underserved cultural and linguistic groups. Major urban centers have a sufficient population base to support many centers of varying types. Smaller communities are often served by centers that have more diverse participant groups who share needs for health and social services. Rural communities continue to be seriously underserved because of the very limited adult day care center availability.

Service Costs and Payment

Current national estimates for the average daily cost of adult day care are not yet available. The 2009 average daily cost was $67, and throughout the United States there was a wide cost range—between $27 and $150. The annual cost increase for this service is generally lower than a nursing home, assisted living, and home care. Centers vary in the extent to which they have "add-on" charges that are determined by a participant's usage of special services.

For example, a center may add a transportation cost into the daily per diem or may charge for daily or bill separately for special therapeutic services available through a contractual arrangement. Family members costing-out day care center charges before making an enrollment decision should be clear about such costs as admission deposits, billing arrangements, cancellation fees, sliding fee schedules, and minimum weekly enrollment requirements. Throughout the country, Medicaid is the single greatest source of center participation coverage. While each state develops its own Medicaid coverage plan, always approved at the federal level by the Center for Medicaid within the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, there is wide variability in the reimbursement rate paid by each state. Many state Medicaid plans apply a Medicaid Home and Community-Based Waiver (HCBS) payment option because adult day care participation helps participants with higher levels of functional impairments to remain in the community. At the present time Medicare does not cover this long-term care service option. Centers also provide private-pay participants short family respite periods of longer-term participation.

Future Growth of Adult Day Care

The enactment of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (PPACA) provides states with several new options for Medicaid coverage under the HCBS category. Each state determines which new PPACA option(s) may be negotiated in order to take advantage of the additional federal funding. As more employers make long-term care insurance a provided or at least available health benefit, it will become an expanded source of adult day care center care. Throughout the country, well-organized advocacy efforts are under way to encourage states to take advantage of the greater amount and funding flexibility. Throughout the country, there continues to be strong advocacy to pass federal legislation that would amend federal Medicare coverage when adults are making the transition from hospital to home.

Eloise Rathbone-McCuan
University of Missouri–Kansas City

See Also: Aging and Adult Services; Developmental Disabilities, Attitudes and Myths in Services for; Medicaid; Medicare; Respite Care.

Further Readings

Anderson, Keith A., Holly I. Dabelko-Schoeny, and Sarah D. Tarrant. "A Constellation of Concerns: Exploring the Present and the Future Challenges for Adult Day Services." Home Health Care Management Practice, v.24 (2012).

Jones, Katherine R., et al. "Expanded Adult Day Program as a Transition Option From Hospital to Home." Public Policy and Nursing Practice, v.12 (2011).

Adult Education Programs and Services

Adult education programs and services include a wide variety of formal and informal continuing education programs designed to promote the personal, educational, and professional development of adult learners. Adult education is voluntary and requires both self-motivation and a willingness to participate in an ongoing learning process.

Culture, globalization, and productivity demands create culturally and economically mandated educational requirements. Adult learners often attend adult education programs as an employment requirement (e.g., work-related training and workshops), to meet basic employment standards (e.g., college degree), or to compensate for an incomplete education (e.g., high school diploma or general education diploma). The development of newer, more complex technologies and information systems require a more skilled and educated populace. Therefore, individuals must seek continuing education in order to adapt to these innovations and thrive economically. Gaining economic and personal advantages are a driving force behind adult education programs. Economic advantages include better job opportunities, higher wages, and a more competitive skill set. Personal advantages include higher self-efficacy, higher self-esteem, increased knowledge, and goal attainment. At a societal level, a highly educated population brings about economic and technological developments that lead to advantages such as increased global competiveness.

Lifelong learning is a form of sustained adult education and is a highly valued concept among industrialized countries. It focuses less on economic competition and more on personal development and inquiry. Many traditional colleges and universities offer lifelong learning programs for those who have reached retirement age, while others offer schools of continuing education open to any adult learners who wish to complement their formal education with noncredit courses, certificate, and licensure programs.

Federal- and State-Implemented Adult Education Programs

With educational standards rising, it has been a concern that many are not prepared to meet these standards. Government-funded adult education programs arose from President Lyndon B. Johnson's War on Poverty. As part of his Great Society program, Johnson called for an expansion of educational opportunities as one way to help reduce the national poverty rate and combat illiteracy. This initiative led to the passage of the Economic Opportunity Act (EOA) of 1964. Through this legislation the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) was authorized to provide federal grants to states in order to provide basic adult education programs that would allow adults to overcome their educational deficits and increase job skills and competencies.

In 1981, during the Ronald Regan administration, both the EOA and the OEO were repealed and abolished. However, individual states have created OEOs that continue to provide grants for adult education and other social welfare programs. Currently, various state education departments provide basic adult education services and provide adult learners with community resources in order to address the many educational challenges faced by adult learners. Basic adult education services often address English as a Second Language (ESL), literacy, mathematics skills, writing, and adult secondary education.

Participation in adult education programs saw an overall decline from 46 percent in 2001 to 44 percent in 2005. Work-related courses composed 27 percent of adult education participation, followed by personal interest courses (21 percent), part-time college/university courses (5 percent), and other adult education activities (3 percent). Overall, females participated in more personal interest (24 percent) and work-related (29 percent) adult education programs than did males (18 percent and 25 percent, respectively). Individuals aged 16 to 24 participated in more adult education programs than other age groups. African Americans and Caucasians had higher rates of participation than their Hispanic counterparts. Individuals with higher levels of education (bachelor's degree or higher) and professional or managerial occupations had higher rates of adult education participation (70 percent) than those with some college or high school diplomas, those who work in service/support positions (48 percent), and trade positions (34 percent).

Other Adult Education Programs

Many adults hold full-time jobs, have families, and/or lack the resources necessary to attend classes in a traditional format. Community colleges, traditional colleges, and universities offer night and online classes in order to provide more flexibility for adult learners. E-learning is a major asset to adult education programs and services. Online educational programs can provide adult learners with convenient opportunities to further their education. Traditional colleges and universities offer many e-learning educational programs, which can be asynchronous or synchronous, and allow the adult learners to participate in a more self-directed learning process.

Distance learning is a way for adult learners who have transportation issues or wish to attend classes in another state to take part in continuing education. Recent developments in distance learning include massive open online course (MOOC) providers that partner with traditional universities and offer free online courses in order to promote knowledge, community, and open access of information. While many of these courses are not for traditional college credit, they do promote the essence of lifelong learning and continuing education.

Ione N. Paiva
Laurie M. Craigen
Kathleen Levingston
Old Dominion University

See Also: Education and Training Vouchers; Educational Services; Educational Support Services.

Further Readings

Eyre, G. "History of the Adult Education Act." http://www.naepdc.org/issues/aeahistort.htm (Accessed March 2014).

Merriam, Sharan B. and Ralph G. Brockett. The Profession and Practice of Adult Education: An Introduction. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2007.
National Center for Education Statistics. “Fast Facts: Adult Learning.” https://nces.ed.gov/fastfacts/display.asp?id=89 (Accessed March 2014).
United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) Institute for Lifelong Learning. “Global Report on Adult Learning and Education” (2009). http://nuczv.sk/wp-content/uploads/grale_en.pdf (Accessed March 2014).
U.S. Department of Education. Department of Adult Education and Literacy. http://www2.ed.gov/about/offices/list/ovae/pi/AdultEd/index.html (Accessed March 2014).

Adult Literacy Programs

While literacy skills remain a key factor in the economic well-being of many adults, those who lack these competencies often find themselves at a severe disadvantage when competing for employment, housing, or other goods or services. In an effort to remedy these inequities, adult literacy programs attempt to provide students a grounding in both the foundational competencies required for reading as well as life skills training. While of great importance to both those who struggle with reading and the society in which they live, adult literacy programs often struggle for funding, as the groups they serve often lack strong advocates. Although adult literacy programs are important for all populations, this is especially true for members of diverse populations, especially as defined by race and ethnicity, those with a home language other than English, adult learners, and those who live in rural and urban settings. Adult literacy programs, when successful, provide a tremendous service, as they assist individuals in getting jobs and making sense of credit applications, and with skills related to basic citizenship, such as voting.

Background

Reading and writing skills are crucial in enabling an individual to negotiate employment and daily living tasks. Illiteracy is the inability to read or write sentences in any language, whereas functional illiteracy involves the inability to negotiate these tasks in a manner that permits management of one’s personal and vocational life. Many consider the inability of an adult to read above the fourth-grade level to be an indication of functional illiteracy. The consequences of being functionally illiterate are harsh, as this greatly increases the chances that an individual will live in poverty or be incarcerated. Over 40 percent of adults who are functionally illiterate live below the poverty level as defined by the U.S. government. Of adults who are incarcerated, over 60 percent are functionally illiterate, a figure that increases to over 85 percent for juvenile inmates. Those who perform below basic levels of literacy have somewhat different characteristics than the general population. African Americans, Latinos, women, those over 65, and those from low socioeconomic backgrounds are overrepresented in the group that is deemed to perform below basic proficiency levels on literacy assessments. Individuals with lower levels of educational attainment also struggle disproportionately at tasks demanding proficiency with literacy.

The problems with illiteracy are often evident at an early age—nearly 70 percent of children who are not proficient readers by the end of the fourth grade will end up receiving government assistance or will be incarcerated as adults. Teenage girls from low socioeconomic backgrounds who are not proficient readers are six times more likely to have a child out of wedlock than are their counterparts who are more literate. Over time the situation has improved: in 1820, 20 percent of the Caucasian and 80 percent of the African American population in the United States were illiterate, while by the late 20th century these rates had narrowed, but concerns about the achievement gap continued. Beginning in 2001, the No Child Left Behind Act directed additional resources to K–12 schools in an effort to raise reading achievement. Despite these efforts, many adults remain functionally illiterate, and private and public adult literacy programs exist to help these individuals improve their ability to read.

Adult Education

Adult education involves programs and practices to educate those who are no longer eligible to be involved in K–12 education programs. Formal or informal, adult literacy programs are run by volunteers and paid professionals and may take place in a variety of settings. These settings include libraries, the workplace, colleges and universities, churches, social organizations, and public schools. Adult literacy programs focus specifically upon improving students' ability to read, write, and communicate orally. The specifics of each program vary, although certain commonalities exist across various efforts.

Targeting native-English-speaking nonreaders, English language learners (ELLs), and those who seek to improve their proficiency, adult literacy programs seek to balance individual and group norms. Adult literacy programs that focus upon individuals who read at the sixth-grade level or lower, for example, concentrate upon offering one-on-one tutoring as well as small group sessions that focus upon the fundamentals of reading. The fundamentals of reading instruction may consist of phonemic awareness, phonics, fluency, vocabulary, or text comprehension, depending upon the needs of the learners. Adult literacy programs also place a strong emphasis upon integrating practical skills with the literacy instruction, as many learners prefer to see immediate benefits from their investment.

The emphasis of adult literacy programs will generally vary based upon the desired outcomes of participants. Some adult literacy programs focus upon basic literacy, others upon teaching English as a second language, and still others upon preparing students for the General Educational Development (GED) exam, a high school diploma equivalency program. The backgrounds and readiness levels of students enrolled in each of these types of adult literacy programs may vary greatly. For example, while most students enrolled in a basic literacy class will have low levels of proficiency, some of these will have not had much, if any, prior exposure to literacy instruction or education, while others will have specific learning disabilities, often undiagnosed, that have impeded their previous experiences with schooling.

While some ELLs have a great deal of formal education, and thus high levels of literacy in their primary language, others will begin English as a second language classes while still struggling with literacy in their home language. Similarly, some GED candidates will have left high school for personal reasons that have little if anything to do with their academic aptitude, while others will have failed to obtain a diploma because of educational deficiencies.

Many adult literacy programs are staffed by volunteers and others without a formal teaching background. A variety of national and local organizations, including the Council for Advancement of Adult Literacy (CAAL), ProLiteracy, Literacy Chicago, and others, exist to support those working with adult literacy programs. This support can involve training for tutors and instructors, certification programs for volunteers, and accreditation for programs. Some colleges and universities have also developed programs that permit those interested in working as adult literacy teachers to be trained and certified. Generally, those programs that have better-trained teachers enjoy better results, making instructors' previous preparation and ongoing professional development opportunities goals for most adult literacy programs.

Many adult literacy programs are formed in an effort to appeal to the needs of special populations: persons of color, ELLs, women, parents, the elderly, and other groups that have higher than normal literacy problems. When appealing to such diverse groups, special considerations often are required. For example, classes are often offered in locations such as churches and community centers that are convenient to and comfortable for the desired student population. While teachers need not be members of the target population, they must have skills in working with such groups and understand the special needs of each group. Because success for diverse groups in adult literacy programs is frequently reliant upon their continued attendance at these classes, special consideration must also be made to assure that the classes are convenient, relevant, and focused upon their needs.

In addition to their primary goals, many adult literacy programs offer ancillary classes to support the needs of their students. These ancillary classes may focus upon computer literacy, financial literacy, health literacy, or other topics of interest to the students enrolled in the program. Such ancillary programming is offered both to support the language and literacy offerings provided by the adult literacy program and to meet other needs of the adult learners. Adult learners differ from their younger counterparts in many ways, and it is important that adult literacy programs take these differences into account. Adult learners have accumulated prior knowledge and experience that add to their learning. Because most adult literacy programs are voluntary in nature, the participants in these programs are generally more motivated than students in K–12 classrooms. Another difference in educating adults is their need to be able to apply knowledge learned in a practical fashion. Because adult learners have an expectation that attending an adult literacy program will assist them in accomplishing certain goals, well-run programs will allow students to see that this is happening. As more attention is paid to adult literacy programs, the best practices of the more successful endeavors are likely to be adopted by others.

Stephen T. Schroth
Jason A. Helfer
Knox College

See Also: Adult Education Programs and Services; After-School Services; Department of Education, U.S.; Life Skills Training; Literacy Testing; No Child Left Behind Act.

Further Readings

Fingeret, H. A. and C. Drennon. Literacy for Life: Adult Learners, New Practices. New York: Teachers College Press, 1997.
Lear, B. W. Adult Programs in the Library, 2nd ed. Chicago: American Library Association, 2013.
Wepner, S. B. and D. S. Strickland, eds. The Administration and Supervision of Reading Programs, 4th ed. New York: Teachers College Press, 2008.

African Americans

African Americans are unique as a group, in part because their historical roots were tied to involuntary immigration. Africans endured centuries of capture and enslavement from the 17th through the 19th centuries. These oppressive, intergenerational experiences have served as a basis for complex behavioral and psychological trauma as well as resilience. An understanding of African Americans' rich and complicated history is warranted among human services professionals.

From Africa to the United States

The transatlantic slave trade brought an array of different cultures and ethnicities to the United States from Africa. The African American population that developed from the slave trade has been in the United States for over 350 years, first arriving in Virginia and surrounding areas. This population now lives in all regions of the United States; however, the majority of the African American population lives in the southern region of the country.

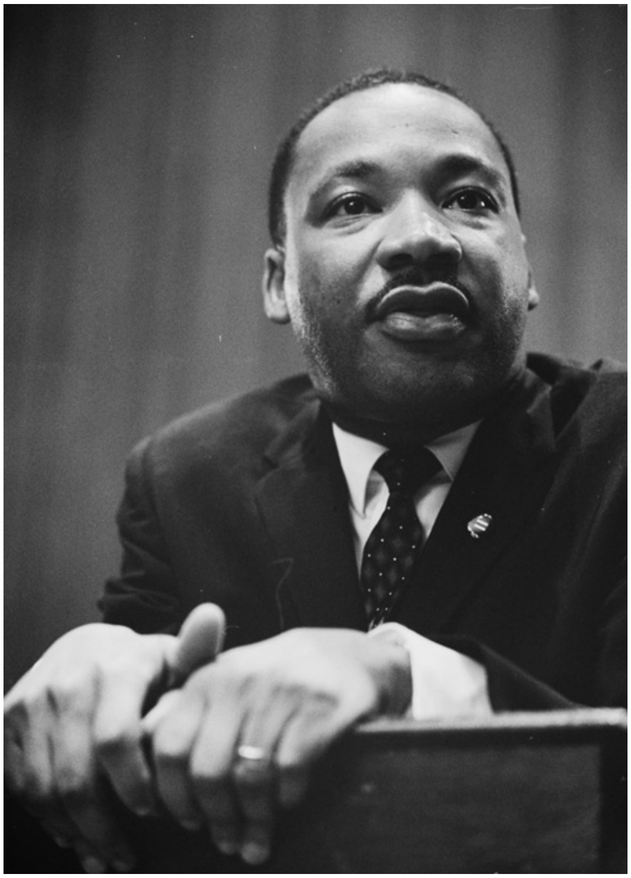
The term African American describes a population of people who are of African descent. This term derived in the 1970s, when many blacks began to remove themselves from the negative connotation of the words colored and Negro. Often, the term black is interchangeably used to describe this population and other populations of the African diaspora (i.e., Afro-Caribbean, Afro-Latin Americans, and black Canadians).

Throughout history, this population faced many issues. However, issues with income, employment, and education continued to cause many hardships for African Americans. Slaves worked for their masters for free and were threatened to be killed if they attempted to educate themselves. In 1865, after passage of the Thirteenth Amendment, which outlawed slavery in all states and territories, the literacy rate for African Americans was around 10 percent and employment was scarce because of racism and continued oppression. Although educational attainment, employment, and the ability to gain income has slightly changed for the better, gaps throughout each of these areas continue to exist in the African American community.

Although there is documentation of an African presence in the Americas well before Europeans initiated the slave trade, the sociopolitical narrative about African Americans is dominated by the slave experience and subsequent outcomes. West African empires, such as the Songhay and Mali civilizations, and entrepreneurial Moors spread scientific knowledge throughout the Mediterranean and the Americas during the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries. The massive capture and enslavement of Africans that became known as the transatlantic slave trade fueled economies in the New World. Sometimes referred to as the ma'afa (a Kiswahili word for "horrific trauma"), slavery in the Americas, a centuries-long oppression, is believed to be the foundation for transgenerational effects, such as social marginalization, community disempowerment, health disparities, familial disconnections, and educational underachievement.

However, even with these challenges African Americans have been shown to demonstrate effective coping mechanisms to counter the pervasive acts of oppression. Records of slave narratives reveal acts of resistance: flights to freedom, attempts to take over ships to return home, and slave revolts. Following emancipation, during the Reconstruction era African Americans amassed wealth and developed commerce in major U.S. cities, such as Memphis, Tennessee, and Tulsa, Oklahoma.

Rather than view African Americans from a deficit-oriented perspective, human service professionals should consider their strengths. Despite centuries of oppression, African Americans have been attributed with significant scientific patents, architectural contributions, business expansions, and major influences in the performing arts. More important, African Americans have demonstrated resilience in their ability to maintain a sense of community and to organize family life in order to endure. Other forms of resilience are seen in African Americans' involvement in the political arena. From the slave revolt of Rev. Nat Turner to the work of civil rights activist Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., religious leaders have been at the forefront of resistance efforts within the African American community. Human service professionals should incorporate African American clients' strengths into their conceptualization of presenting problems.



Martin Luther King, Jr., was one of a number of leaders who spearheaded African American resistance efforts. Religious leaders like King have often been at the forefront of such efforts.

Throughout history the African American population has experienced many forms of oppression. Oppression can be defined as the exercise of authority or power in a burdensome, cruel, and unjust way. Beginning with slavery, African Americans have been denied education, access to resources, equal employment and pay opportunities and lack of physical and mental health care, and have experienced a voting discrimination. These different levels of oppression have led to health disparities, family and education issues, and an overall disenfranchisement of this population.

With the many negative implications of slavery and the history of African Americans, there were many leaders among this population that empowered others to push toward a better life. Well-known figures such as Harriet Tubman, Sojourner Truth, and Frederick Douglass have become the faces of slavery, but there were many other freedom fighters that helped empower others to seek a more prosperous life.

There were also major historic events that impacted the African American community in the past and present. These events include the Emancipation Proclamation in 1863, which modified some of the laws on slavery; Brown v. Board of Education (1954), the U.S. Supreme Court decision which desegregated schools; and the Civil Rights movement, which fought for equality for all. Although each event was significant, the African American community continues to struggle with different systems of oppression. Graduation rates from high school and college continue to fall short of other ethnic groups, the incarceration rate of many African Americans continues to rise, and their economic status is not equivalent to other racial groups.

African-Centered Mind-Set

As stated earlier, history has created a platform for many outside and within the African American community to view this population from an inferior or deficit lens. For years this population was told they were intellectually, physically, and mentally inferior to whites. The message was received that African Americans were also deficient in regard to intelligence, family structure, and cognitive styles. However, many African American scholars began to question the validity of these claims and to rewrite the understanding of the African American community using a new lens, with African culture and ideals as the center of their analysis.

This new African-centered approach made its way into research, counseling, and the overall wellness of the African American community. Scholars such as Joseph White, Asa Grant Hilliard III, Molefi Kete Asante, Na'Im Akbar, Thomas A. Parham, and many others have all written about and/or adopted this critical lens.

The African-centered approach unifies African principles, values, and traditions. It believes the spirit permeates everything; the universe is an interrelated, communal consciousness and the collective ancestral element. When scholars use this perspective in research and clinical practice, they must take into consideration history, culture, social context, client/participant perspective, and an understanding that a deconstruction of learned Eurocentric perspectives may be present. African-centered ideology allows one to answer the question, "Who am I," while acknowledging African culture and behavior, which for so long were neglected and placed behind Eurocentric values.

Given prior work in the area of culture-centered counseling, several African-centered counseling theories have emerged. NTU psychotherapy, the African self-consciousness model, Daudi Ajaniya ya Azibo's nosology, and the transcendence model offer alternatives to conventional Western or Eurocentric counseling approaches. Frederick K. Phillips's NTU (pronounced in-too) psychology focuses on authenticity and balance, while K. K. K. Kambon's African self-consciousness model focuses on countering oppression. Azibo presents an alternative to the American Psychological Association's diagnostic system, suggesting that the Diagnostic and Statistical Model of Mental Disorders is flawed in its Eurocentrism. Wade W. Nobles proposed a model for interventions with African American clients that involves three phases: improvisation, transcendence, and transformation.

Facilitating client empowerment is a core task for human service professionals to address African Americans' presenting problems. Client-focused interventions help clients toward a speedy resolution of their concerns.

More information about African Americans as culturally diverse clients can be found in resources across several disciplines that disseminate the unique experiences of this client population. In particular, Born in Slavery: Slave Narratives From the Federal Writers' Project, 1936–1938, located in the Library of Congress, provides accounts from 2,300 emancipated African Americans about their enslavement experiences.

Additionally, human service professionals can learn more from books written by clinical researchers that disseminate evidence-based practices reflecting the cultural mores of African Americans as a group. Finally, it is useful to identify community referents who are willing to share personal information about the strengths and challenges of local communities and how those issues influence individuals and their day-to-day challenges. In general, human service professionals need to be aware of the sociopolitical contexts when working with African American clients.

Cirecie West-Olatunji
University of Cincinnati
Joseph Johnson
University of Florida

See Also: Critical Race Theory; Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Ethnicity and Clients; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; Rites of Passage; Slavery and Lasting Cultural Effects of Social Biology/Biological Determinism.

Further Readings

Belgrave, Faye Z. and Kevin W. Allison. African American Psychology: From Africa to America, 2nd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2010.

West-Olatunji, Cirecie A. and William Conwill. Counseling and Diversity: Counseling African Americans. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 2011.

Wynn, Richmond and Cirecie A. West-Olatunji. "Culture-Centered Case Conceptualization Using NTU Psychotherapy With an African American Male Gay Client." Journal of LGBT Issues in Counseling, v.2 (2008).

African Immigrants

People immigrate to other countries for a variety of reasons. Some people migrate for economic reasons and are typically referred to as voluntary migrants. Some people immigrate because they have to, often because protracted civil conflict forces them to leave their homes and prevents them from returning. These migrants are often referred to as forced migrants. Many of the world's immigrants originate from Africa, and most of the immigration from that continent is the result of forced migration, so a majority of African immigrants are thus considered refugees. But Africa is a large continent, with 56 countries (two of which are not officially recognized) and nine territories, and the people who live on the continent represent a wide range of cultures, with divergent histories, traditions, and norms; speak different languages; and practice a range of religions.

African immigration is typically organized by time (or era) and region. The earliest wave of African migration to countries in the Global North was during the African slave trade, which occurred from the 16th to 19th centuries. Subsequent waves of African immigration were generated for a variety of reasons, including economics, natural disaster, and conflict. The most recent wave of African immigration is often considered the fourth wave of migration, which began after colonization ended. Many Africans have migrated to countries in the Global North for better education and labor opportunities. This trend is often referred to as the "brain drain" because many bright and competent people in developing countries leave because of limited educational and career opportunities.

Many African immigrants were forced to leave their home countries because of conflict. Many countries in central Africa and the Great Lakes Region, in east Africa and the Horn of Africa, and in west Africa have experienced numerous cycles of protracted violence that have resulted in millions of people migrating to safer regions—either within Africa or to countries in the Global North, such as the United States. For instance, in 2011, over 2.5 million people in Africa became refugees, 1.5 million of whom were from east Africa and the Horn of Africa, which includes Sudan, South Sudan, Ethiopia, Eretria, Djibouti, and Somalia. About 500,000 refugees came from central Africa and the Great Lakes region, which includes Kenya, Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC).

Africans who have migrated to countries in the Global North have needs that are as varied as the cultures they represent. Voluntary migrants from north and south African countries that have not experienced as much conflict as countries in sub-Saharan Africa, and that tend to be more "Westernized," may need only minimal assistance in the resettlement process. However, African immigrants who have migrated because of violence in their home countries may need significant assistance, particularly if they have experienced severe trauma and loss.

African refugees who are resettled to countries in the Global North because of homeland conflict are likely to need the most assistance from human services providers, particularly if they lived in refugee camps prior to migrating to their final host country. This is because of the trauma and loss many refugees have experienced, both in their home countries and in refugee camps. Many African immigrants have been caught in a cycle of migration and resettlement, being forced out of their home countries because of conflict, going back home and being repatriated when conditions allowed, only to be forced out of their communities when conflict erupted again. Many individuals who are caught in the crossfire of protracted civil conflict and are forced to leave their communities are resettled into refugee camps until a more permanent solution can be found. Many refugees remain in refugee camps for generations and permanent solutions are elusive because of the nature of the conflict, limited resources, and the large number of refugees generated from various conflicts in certain African countries. For instance, hundreds of thousands of people were forced into refugee camps because of conflict in Burundi in 1972, and three decades later these refugees remained in camps in Tanzania waiting a permanent solution. Similar dynamics can be found throughout Africa, such as Rwandan refugees in the DRC and Somali and Sudanese refugees who were in Kenya for decades.

When Africans from conflict zones who have lived for decades in refugee camps are relocated to the United States and other nations in the Global North, human service agencies provide much-needed practical assistance, such as teaching recently arrived refugees how to operate a Western-style stove, how to enroll their children in public school, and how to navigate the new nation's social service system. Human service providers also offer important mental health services, such as providing trauma counseling, which is a particularly vital service since many African immigrants have experienced significant trauma, including being victims of physical and sexual violence, as well as the loss of family members and friends through conflict and life-threatening environmental conditions (e.g., lack of food, disease, etc.).

Human service providers working for immigration and refugee resettlement agencies also provide much-needed services in the area of legal advocacy, which is often needed when immigrants migrate outside of the refugee program. Providers also need to help immigrant families adjust to the significantly different cultures of their host countries. For example, immigrants from cultures in which women have few rights and violence against women is permitted, may have to adapt to the United States, where domestic violence is illegal, and human service providers can help families learn new ways of relating that are egalitarian in nature.

In summary, African immigrants constitute a heterogeneous population with a wide range of needs. Human service providers assist immigrants with all aspects of the resettlement process, which may include help finding housing and employment and learning the English language. Human service providers also provide more in-depth assistance to immigrants with histories of violence and trauma in order to address their wide-ranging psychosocial needs.

Michelle E. Martin
DePaul University

See Also: Diaspora; Displaced Persons; Refugee Assistance.

Further Readings

Dole, T. R. "Intergenerational Transmission of Trauma in African Immigrants" (2011). ETD Collection for Fordham University, Paper AAI3495886. http://fordham.bepress.com/dissertations/AAI3495886 (Accessed April 2013).

Fagen, P. W. "Refugees and IDPs After Conflict: Why They do not go Home" (2011). United States Institute of Peace, Special Report 268. http://www.usip.org/files/resources/SR268Fagen.pdf (Accessed April 2013).

Gavin, B. E., B. D. Kelly, E. O'Callaghan, and A. Lane. "The Mental Health of Migrants." Instructions for Authors, v.106/5 (2013).

Rosenthal, L., D. P. Scott, Z. Kelleta, A. Zikarge, M. Momoh, J. Lahai-Momoh, M. W. Ross, and A. Baker. "Assessing the HIV/AIDS Health Services Needs of African Immigrants to Houston." AIDS Education and Prevention, v.15/6 (2003).

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. "Evaluation of Protracted Refugee Situations (PRS) in Burundi and Tanzania" (2010). http://www.oecd.org/countries/sudan/47164501.pdf (Accessed April 2013).

U.S. Department of State, Bureau of Populations, Refugees and Migration. "Protracted Refugee Situations" (2011). http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/157337.pdf (Accessed April 2013).

Aftercare Services for Children Aging Out of Foster Care

Over the last decade, there has been considerable debate about the long-term benefits and impact of foster care, including residential group care and independent living programs, because of reports of poor adult outcomes for youth who have "aged out." In most state jurisdictions, this occurs at age 18, although many states continue to provide some level of independent living services. In 2011, however, 26,000 of 407,000 children in care were youths "aging" out of the foster care system. Lagging behind their peers who are reared and transitioned into adulthood by their families, many of these young persons are likely to require tailored social supports and aftercare services as they chronologically move into adulthood once the caretaking role of government programs ends.

Numerous studies suggest that youth who experience out-of-home placement because of child maltreatment or other family limitations, and who transition out of the foster care system as young adults, do not experience success. Perhaps because of a history of multiple and temporary placements, extended length of stay in out-of-home care, the instability of their biological family, or lack of adult involvement, these youth do not have the crucial opportunity to test their interdependence or establish self-sufficiency through an appropriate trial and error process. Developmentally, they are not able to take the risk to "push off" from their own family, a normative phase of growing up. As a result, many do not possess a viable sense of adult identity, values, and vision of how they will take care of themselves in the future by the time they are legally adults. Transition planning, in most instances, has been too little, too late. Not surprisingly, and too often, after discharge from the system these young people are confronted with housing instability, unwanted pregnancy, under- or unemployment, poor academic or vocational progress, and lack of quality health and mental health care. These young people are at risk for incarceration and welfare dependency, homelessness, substance abuse, domestic violence, and poor parenting. Research regarding the efficacy of aftercare services for these graduates of the child welfare system is inconclusive and suggests that more emphasis should be placed on identifying and addressing the individualized needs of such youth postdischarge.

Transition Planning for Youth Exiting Care

Focus on transition and aftercare services began with the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985 (Public Law 99-272), which targets services for older youth. Section 477 of the act provides funding for independent living programs. The Foster Care Independence Act of 1999 (Public Law 106-169) enables services to be provided to youth who exit care at age 18 but have not reached 21. Adolescents receiving these services directly participate in designing their own activities to prepare them for independent living and are required to accept personal responsibility for their part in this process. The Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008 (FCA; Public Law 110-351) provides states with federal support for older youth in high school or who are engaged in postsecondary education, an employment program, or working for at least 80 hours monthly, or who are incapable of any of these activities because of a medical condition. FCA also requires a transition plan at least 90 days before a youth's emancipation from the system. Because of the documented lack of adequate preparation of older youths for their full transition into self-sufficiency, public policy groups advocate allowing older youth to have an extended stay in foster care to developmentally prepare them for transition into adulthood, with permanent adult connections.

Key Elements of an Aftercare Services Model

Older youth aging out of foster care may be discharged from a variety of settings. These placements include traditional family foster care, therapeutic family foster care, group homes, therapeutic group homes, independent living programs, residential or drug treatment facilities, psychiatric hospitals, and secure detention facilities. In addition to the variations in these placements' restrictiveness, both the youth and the family of origin vary in their service needs, access to personal and community resources, and their level of resiliency. Aftercare services may be designed within a positive youth development (PYD) framework that emphasizes a strengths- and needs-based assessment process directed by the young person, whose own influence in the planning balances the professional contribution. This increases the likelihood that the youth will take responsibility and ownership of plans she or he created with adults. In addition, a trauma-informed approach takes into account the impact of not only the history of child maltreatment that the youth may have experienced, but also the trauma of separation from the family and the need to grieve over the loss. The youth must feel sufficiently safe, with at least one adult to share concerns about his or her transition into adulthood; the nature of the designated aftercare supports; and what may be required for his or her success, including addressing challenges to self-esteem, personal confidence, and effective decision making.

Aftercare Services Domains

Transition planning is an individualized process that relies on not just the adolescent's motivation and initiative, and the availability of organizational and community resources, but also on culturally competent, highly skilled, and collaborative professionals who work together to support the youth. The following areas are typically addressed:

Education. Youth who are on track educationally and are involved in postsecondary college or vocational training have considerably enhanced life outcomes. In contrast, youth without a high school education or who have not passed the General Educational Development (GED) Test are at high risk for involvement in illegal activity and incarceration. Identifying specific barriers to educational/vocational achievement is a high priority.

Employment. Workforce readiness and job placement supports are indicated for most youth exiting the public child welfare system. Former foster care youth are less likely to be employed, and typically earn less income than young people who have not been in this system.

Housing. Locating and retaining affordable housing, selecting and living with roommates (or family members), understanding tenant rights, adhering to community living standards, and managing landlord relations are fundamental for sustaining housing stability.

Life skills. Basic living skills that must be mastered include: household maintenance, grocery shopping, cooking, cleaning, navigation of community resources, and parenting and child care (when applicable).

Financial literacy. Youth must possess basic money-management skills, such as budgeting, paying bills, credit repair and maintenance, and utilizing checking and savings accounts.

Health. Includes concerns that are key to overall physical well-being, such as health insurance, preventive health care and self-care, reproductive health, and diet and nutrition education.

Mental health. Youth aging out of the foster care system are at an elevated risk for substance abuse, depression, anxiety, and post-traumatic stress disorder. Access to affordable, quality, community-based mental health services may be a necessary aftercare service.

Social support and recreation. A network of trustworthy adults and friends encourages prosocial behavior, prevents social isolation, and cultivates a healthy lifestyle, which involves stress reduction, physical activity, emotional support, and appropriate entertainment.

Sheryl Brissett Chapman
National Center for Children and Families

See Also: Child Welfare Services; Foster Care Agencies; Group Homes for Children.

Further Readings

Jim Casey Youth Opportunities Initiative. "Foster Care to 21: Doing it Right" (2013). http://jimcaseyyouth.org/foster-care-21-doing-it-right (Accessed November 2013).

Mallon, Gerald P. "After Care, Then Where? Outcomes of an Independent Living Program." Child Welfare, v.77/1 (1998).

Trout, Alexandra L., et al. "The Departure Status of Youth From Residential Group Care: Implications for Aftercare." Journal of Child and Family Studies, v.19/1 (2010).

Walters, Dianna, et al. "Transition Planning With Adolescents." National Resource Center for Youth Development and the University of Southern Maine, Muskie School of Public Service (2010). http://www.nrcyd.ou.edu/publication-db/documents/transition-planning-with-adolescents.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

After-School Services

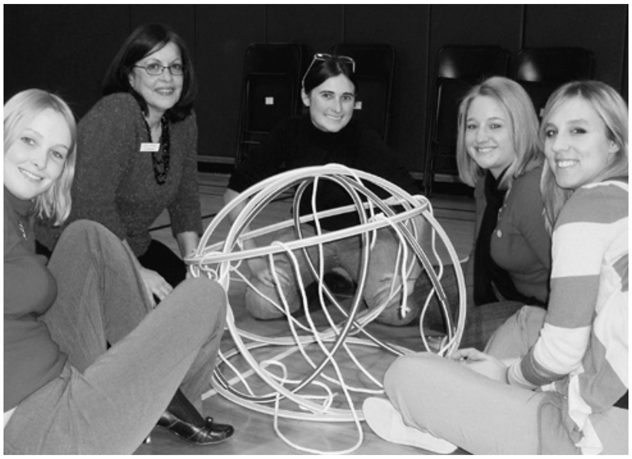
After-school services are safe and structured programs for kindergarten through high school–age children. These programs are designed to positively develop children's socioemotional well-being and academic performance by providing extracurricular activities before and after school, on weekends, during school holidays, and during the summer school break. Most after-school services operate approximately two to three hours per day, four to five days per week. The following terms—school-age care, out-of-school time, and expanded learning opportunities—are interchangeably used with "after-school."

After-school services are typically organized by public schools, private schools, community organizations, for-profit businesses, or government agencies, such as municipal parks and recreation departments. They provide structured curriculum activities, healthy snacks, academic assistance, and/or various enrichment activities (e.g., physical recreation, arts, and music). High-quality after-school services offer a variety of programs and activities in an adult-supervised environment.

After-school hours can be very risky for children who are left unsupervised. Children living in high-risk environments are more likely to be exposed to violence, delinquency, sexual activity, smoking, and alcohol and drug abuse—all of which can compromise their academic performance and achievement. After-school services prevent these children from developing behavioral problems and experiencing academic failure by supplying supervised and constructive activities. Funding for the services or programs typically comes from the federal, local, and state government as well as private foundations. In 2009, the U.S. Department of Education spent approximately $1 billion for after-school activities.

Types of After-School Services

There are two types of after-school services: community-based and school-based. Community-based services are implemented by organizations, such as the YMCA/YWCA, 4-H, public agency-sponsored programs, libraries, youth organizations, religious institutions, and cultural centers. Some programs have specialized goals, such as to improve youth development, promote social skills, increase community involvement, or combat substance abuse problems.



Staff at the Just for Kids after-school program in Buffalo, New York, receive education training and team building activities to support children and encourage holistic youth development.

The YMCA is the most recognized after-school service. Historically, the YMCA has provided access to physical activities such as swimming pools, karate lessons, and sports facilities. In recent years, however, the YMCA has begun to recognize the importance of children's academic development and has subsequently implemented programs designed to assist children with academic difficulties. Additionally, the Boys and Girls Club, similar to the YMCA, is a federation of local chapters with independent boards and largely self-financed. This organization provides recreational centers and activities in urban areas

Community and religious organizations offer after-school activities in their neighborhoods. These organizations establish joint collaborative efforts with other agencies (e.g., parks department, public schools) to obtain loans for facilities. In collaboration with religious institutions, some after-school services also provide religious activities and education. Physical facilities hosting after-school programs vary widely, and many after-school activities take place in buildings that were not initially designed for after-school activities. In general, community-based services aim at encouraging holistic youth development.

School-based arrangements have been used extensively for the purpose of child care or youth development under initiatives of the No Child Left Behind Act. In addition, 21st Century Community Learning Centers, which have been supported by governmental funding, have increased the number of after-school services. In particular, because No Child Left Behind emphasizes narrowing the achievement gap in public schools, school-based after-school services have put a lot of emphasis on improving children's academic levels. School settings are the preferred location for after-school services for families because schools are conveniently located and have many resources on hand, such as computer labs, books, and other school materials.

Suggestions for Improving the Quality of Services

In order to further after-school services' success, a system of continuous evaluation should be put into place. Using this system, partners are able to discuss the activities' quality and success, which leads to better decision making on matters concerning program design and funding. Consistently monitoring and understanding service goals enables staff to maintain focus, improve effectiveness and accountability, ensure parent and participant satisfaction, and identify necessary changes. Therefore, designing effective evaluations, including multiple and rigorous testing measures, leads to the success and meets the goal of the service. Furthermore, special attention should be given to evaluating both community-based and school-based services separately.

In addition, building affordable, high-quality after-school care in economically disadvantaged communities is imperative. After-school services have significant and positive effects on children from low-income families, particularly low-income minority children who do not have as many opportunities to participate in extracurricular activities or enrichment programs as children from middle- and higher-income families. Through after-school services and programs in the community, economically disadvantaged children are able to participate in various activities that would otherwise not be available.

Hyejoon Park
University of Illinois

See Also: Educational Support Services; No Child Left Behind Act; Recreation Services.

Future Readings

Behrman, R. The Future of Children: When School Is Out. Washington, DC: David and Lucile Packard Foundation, 1999.

Brecher, C., C. Brazill, B. C. Weitzman, and D. Silver. "Understanding the Political Context of 'New' Policy Issues: The Use of the Advocacy Coalition Framework in the Case of Expanded After-School Programs." Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory, v.20/2 (2009).

Committee on Community-Level Programs for Youth. After-School Programs to Promote Child and Adolescent Development: Summary of a Workshop. Washington, DC: National Academy Press, 2000.

Dryfoos, J. G. "The Role of the School in Children's Out-of-School Time." The Future of Children, v.9/2 (1999).

Durlak, J. A., J. L. Mahoney, A. M. Bohnert, and M. E. Parente. "Developing and Improving After-School Programs to Enhance Youth's Personal Growth and Adjustment: A Special Issue of AJCP." American Journal of Community Psychology, v.45 (2010).

Fashola, O. S. Building Effective Afterschool Programs. Thousand Oaks, CA: Corwin Press, 2002.

Gottfredson, D. C., G. D. Gottfredson, and S. A. Weisman. "The Timing of Delinquency and Its Implications for After-School Programs." Crime and Public Policy, v.1 (2001).

Little, P. M. D., C. Wimer, and H. Weiss. Issues and Opportunities in Out-of-School Time Evaluation. Cambridge, MA: Harvard Family Research Project, 2008.

Riggs, N. R. and M. T. Greenberg. "After-School Youth Development Programs: A Developmental-Ecological Model of Current Research." Clinical Child and Family Psychology Review, v.7 (2004).

U.S. Department of Education. "No Child Left Behind Act" (2000). http://www.ed.gov/nclb/landing.html (Accessed November 2013).

Zill, N. C., C. W. Nord, and L. S. Loomis. Adolescent Time Use, Risky Behavior, and Outcomes: An Analysis of National Data. Rockville, MD: Westat, 1995.

Age and Clients

Understanding developmental factors is integral in the accurate assessment of client needs and resources. To identify medical, social, and emotional issues, it is necessary for human service professionals to know what is normal and healthy at each stage of development and to maintain an adequate store of interventions to address developmental deficits.

Overview of Development

Since 1950, Erik Erikson's theory of psychosocial development has been the template for understanding development in stages. Erikson, building upon Sigmund Freud's psychoanalytic theory, purported that a psychosocial crisis occurs at every stage of development, and if that crisis is adequately resolved through a prescribed central process, a prime adaptive-ego quality results. Unresolved crises result in the emergence of core pathologies. Erikson conceptualized the stages of psychosocial development with each stage building upon another, but this continuous model has not stood the test of time. Healthy life expectancy has increased significantly since his seminal work, so later life has broken into distinct substages. Furthermore, in Western culture the tasks of adolescence described by Erikson are not accomplished until the 1920s and early 1930s.

In addition to the age-related factors described by the developmental theorists, history-related factors have a heavy impact on development. Age cohorts refer to groups that have lived through the same era together. Historical events, advances in science and technology, and social cultural dynamics affect how people of all ages develop. A 50-year-old from the baby boom cohort, for instance, is different than a 50-year-old in an older generation. Urie Bronfenbrenner's ecological theory considers these contextual factors in a model of near-to-far influences, from the microsystem of family and community to the overarching influences of culture and society in the macrosystem.

The life span development theory goes beyond development to adulthood and promotes the concept of development throughout the life span until death. Life span theorists do not regard development as a continuous sequence of stages building upon another, but rather as a discontinuous process, in which many aspects of development progress independently. The life span theory accounts for acceleration in some areas of development and normal or delayed progression in others.

Many prominent developmental theorists focused on a single factor in development. Freud, for example, focused upon psychosexual development in his identification of oral, anal, phallic, latent, and erogenous stages. Jean Piaget identified the sensorimotor, preoperational, concrete, and formal operational stages of cognitive development. Lawrence Kohlberg identified preconventional, conventional, and postconventional stages of moral development. Considering the child as apprentice, Lev Vygotsky defined a zone of proximal development, which is the difference between the maximum a child can achieve independently and the maximum the same child can achieve with the guided participation by an adult. He identified this process as scaffolding. Parents, teachers, peers, and human service workers can provide scaffolding.

Age-Appropriate Services

Every age group has specific strengths and specific risk factors. Effective human service providers are capable of conducting assessment, intervention, treatment, case management, and follow-up services for clients of all ages. Access to the entire spectrum of human services is critical for vulnerable populations. Advocating for clients is often within the human service providers' scope of practice. In addition, many human service providers are in a position to teach clients who are capable how to advocate for themselves. Effective human service providers help mobilize resources in their clients' immediate and extended families, neighborhoods, communities, and cultures. When more than one age group is represented, developmental factors in all members of the identified client's system can affect outcomes.

Before Birth

Whenever a client is pregnant, her unborn child is a silent consumer of professional services. The health and well-being of the prenatal client often sets the stage for his or her entire life. Critical factors to the unborn child are the age of the mother, teratogens, and socioeconomic status. Older mothers have more risk of Down's syndrome, and younger mothers have a higher risk for poor nutrition, trauma, and preterm birth. Teratogens, which are toxic agents, also place the development of the fetus at risk. Maternal exposure to tobacco, alcohol, prescription and recreational drugs, and pollution can have a profound effect on a child's birth weight and subsequent health. The extent of risk to the fetus is a product of the length of exposure and the number of teratogens. Socioeconomic status also has an effect on the unborn child, owing to the availability of nutrition and medical care, and resources for coping with stress. Intervention with expectant mothers is the key to assisting the unborn child. Human services workers often encounter the unborn child as a secondary client when working with adolescents, substance abusers, and victims of domestic violence. Crisis workers, counselors, and social workers have an opportunity to serve the unborn child by providing the mother education, support in stress management, and referral to medical and nutritional services.

Infancy

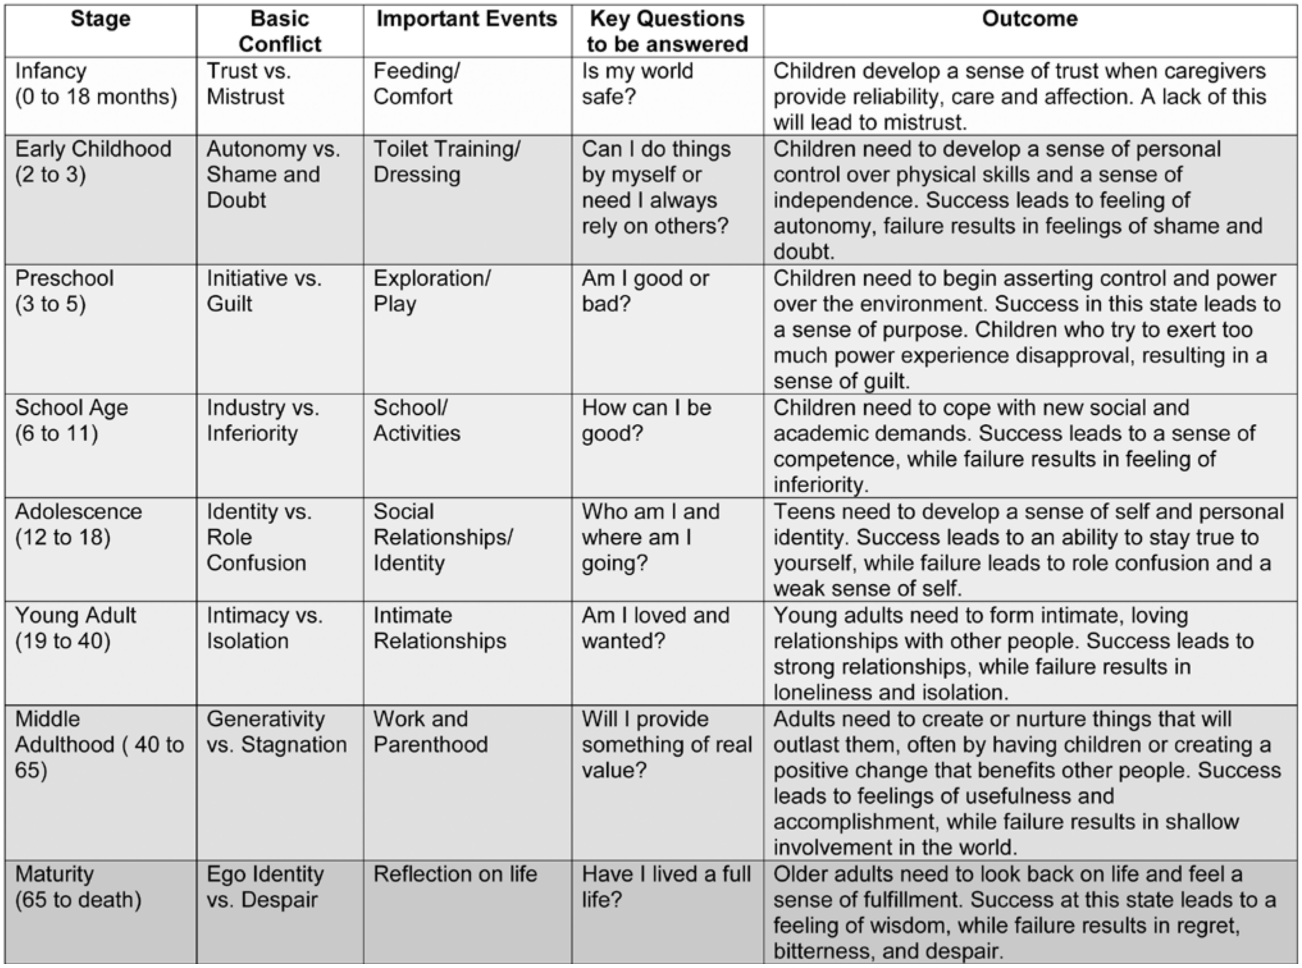
Infancy is a critical period in development. Erikson identified the developmental crisis of infancy as trust versus mistrust. Facilitated by the primary caregiver's involvement, infants who successfully negotiate this stage develop the capacity to hope.

Those who are unsuccessful withdraw. Although the infant client cannot verbally communicate, professionals handling their cases can assist in the negotiation of this important phase. Trust is the ability to predict, and teaching primary caregivers to be consistent in their interactions with the infant can make the difference between hope and withdrawal.

Synaptic exuberance refers to the abundant production of neural connections in a baby's brain in preparation for learning. If this experience of expectant learning does not occur during optimal periods of exuberance, the synaptic connections are pruned from the brain. For example, humans are programmed to acquire language before the age of 6, after which new language acquisition becomes more difficult. Affordances are learning opportunities. In infancy, contact, stimulation, and variety stimulate learning. Although not all parents have the resources to provide new toys or colorful environments, even disadvantaged parents can be instructed on using what is available to give an infant experiences that promote and sustain development. Referring poorly prepared parents to parenting programs promotes infant development, as does involving extended family for support and direction. Additionally, social workers, case managers, and counselors working with at-risk groups can include materials for infant development in their offices, using teachable moments to promote caregiver engagement.

Early Childhood

According to Erikson, toddlers face the psychosocial crisis of autonomy versus shame and doubt, during which they develop a sense of personal control.



Stage	Basic Conflict	Important Events	Key Questions to be answered	Outcome
Infancy (0 to 18 months)	Trust vs. Mistrust	Feeding/ Comfort	Is my world safe?	Children develop a sense of trust when caregivers provide reliability, care and affection. A lack of this will lead to mistrust.
Early Childhood (2 to 3)	Autonomy vs. Shame and Doubt	Toilet Training/ Dressing	Can I do things by myself or need I always rely on others?	Children need to develop a sense of personal control over physical skills and a sense of independence. Success leads to feeling of autonomy, failure results in feelings of shame and doubt.
Preschool (3 to 5)	Initiative vs. Guilt	Exploration/ Play	Am I good or bad?	Children need to begin asserting control and power over the environment. Success in this state leads to a sense of purpose. Children who try to exert too much power experience disapproval, resulting in a sense of guilt.
School Age (6 to 11)	Industry vs. Inferiority	School/ Activities	How can I be good?	Children need to cope with new social and academic demands. Success leads to a sense of competence, while failure results in feeling of inferiority.
Adolescence (12 to 18)	Identity vs. Role Confusion	Social Relationships/ Identity	Who am I and where am I going?	Teens need to develop a sense of self and personal identity. Success leads to an ability to stay true to yourself, while failure leads to role confusion and a weak sense of self.
Young Adult (19 to 40)	Intimacy vs. Isolation	Intimate Relationships	Am I loved and wanted?	Young adults need to form intimate, loving relationships with other people. Success leads to strong relationships, while failure results in loneliness and isolation.
Middle Adulthood (40 to 65)	Generativity vs. Stagnation	Work and Parenthood	Will I provide something of real value?	Adults need to create or nurture things that will outlast them, often by having children or creating a positive change that benefits other people. Success leads to feelings of usefulness and accomplishment, while failure results in shallow involvement in the world.
Maturity (65 to death)	Ego Identity vs. Despair	Reflection on life	Have I lived a full life?	Older adults need to look back on life and feel a sense of fulfillment. Success at this state leads to a feeling of wisdom, while failure results in regret, bitterness, and despair.

Figure 1 Erik Erikson's Psychosocial Stages of Development. Since 1950, Erikson's theory, which built upon Sigmund Freud's psychoanalytic theory, has been the template for understanding development in stages.

Through the central process of imitation, the child who successfully negotiates this stage develops the quality of will. Those who are unsuccessful develop the core pathology of compulsion. In early childhood, through the central process of identification, young children develop the prime adaptive-ego quality of purpose. Failed negotiation of this stage results in the core pathology of inhibition. Strong central figures to imitate and identify with are crucial to healthy development in early childhood.

Toddlers and young children often become clients because of the lack of competent caregiving. As clients, young children are incapable of understanding their problems, and they lack the cognitive abilities to benefit from verbal intervention. They build skills, express emotions, and resolve problems through play. Play therapy is the standard intervention for young children, in that it offers them freedom to choose materials, act out traumatic events, and experience a safe, steady relationship with an adult. Family therapy can lead to the identification of family dynamics that are troublesome to young children and the generation of strategies to build a more healthy system.

Young children often present in therapy for behavioral issues, poor emotional modulation, or learning difficulties. Caregivers may make a lay diagnosis of attention deficit disorder when, in fact, anxieties, inadequate sleep, neglect, or abuse might better account for the behavior. Stress can stall development or cause regression to bed-wetting, thumb sucking, or other behaviors associated with an earlier stage of development. Social problems that precipitate childhood problems include domestic violence, parental incarceration, homelessness, parental substance abuse, or family disruption. Professionals providing services for any of these social issues have an opportunity to intervene. Effective intervention for this vulnerable population is contingent upon obtaining an accurate diagnosis, mobilizing family and community resources, and providing adequate follow-through.

Middle Childhood

The central process of education lays the groundwork for children from ages 6 through 12 to be evaluated against their peers. During the psychosocial stage of industry versus inferiority, successful children develop the ego quality of competence. Relationships with schoolmates facilitate this process. School-age children who become clients require support in maintaining a sense of competence even as they receive social services. Contemporary social issues often precipitate failure at this stage. Homelessness, divorce, poverty, substance abuse, abandonment, and domestic violence often require a child to miss school or change schools, interrupting education and disrupting essential peer relationships, fueling a sense of inferiority and the core pathology of inertia. Mastery builds self-esteem, so task-based interventions for presenting problems may also provide developmental support. Effective behavioral interventions for children often involve token economies, earned privileges, and physical challenge programs.

Frequently, school-age children present for services because of behavior problems, attention deficit disorder, and learning difficulties. When parents or teachers report behavioral and cognitive problems, school-age clients should also be assessed for co-occurring anxiety, depression, and substance use. Bullying, abuse, neglect, and parental substance use can precipitate clinical and behavioral issues. Family engagement is critical for school-age children. If parents are not available, efforts should be made to mobilize the extended family and community resources.

Adolescence

Identity versus role confusion is the psychosocial crisis of adolescence. Peer relationships are extremely important through adolescence and lay the groundwork for developing fidelity, the ego quality associated with successful negotiation of this stage of development. Adolescents normally explore a number of identities before making a commitment to a single, stable identity. Identity diffusion occurs when an individual has not yet formed his or her identity or determined a life path. Identity foreclosure is when an individual commits to an identity and life path with minimal consideration in deference to familial or cultural expectations.

Increasing freedom and poor impulse control often bring adolescents into the human services system. The prefrontal cortex, which governs judgment, is not fully developed in the adolescent brain, putting adolescents at risk for accidents, substance abuse, sexually transmitted diseases, and pregnancy. Most adolescents harbor an infallibility fable, believing they are indestructible, irresistible, and omnipotent. Hormone production in both males and females causes a high level of emotionality. Depression in adolescent males manifests as anger and may be difficult to identify in adolescent clients who enter the human services system for violent or illegal behaviors. When adolescents present with multiple problems, it is essential to treat what is most lethal first.

Brief strategic family therapy and cognitive behavioral approaches are most effective for adolescents. In treatment, adolescents often appear to understand and agree with a treatment plan, but fail to follow through. Human services providers, therefore, should assure that a network of family, friends, and community programs are in place to support compliance with treatment recommendations.

Young Adulthood

Erikson identified intimacy versus isolation as the psychosocial crisis of young adulthood. Clients in their 20s often are facing issues surrounding family relationships, intimate relationships, and parenthood. When young adults are unprepared for the challenges of adult life, they may benefit from cognitive therapy, interpersonal skill building, and referral to community agencies to assist with educational and occupational issues. Protracted issues of adolescence often extend into the 20s, and an understanding of the four identity statuses can be useful when serving a client in this age group.

Identity diffusion is the status in which an individual has not formed an identity or determined a life path. For the identity-diffused client, ego strengthening will be a precursor to determination of a life course. The identity status of foreclosure indicates that the individual has settled upon an identity and life path in deference to familial or cultural expectations, and without personal processing. A young adult who has foreclosed may need support in resolving issues of cognitive dissonance. Identity moratorium occurs when a young person has an identity crisis. Unable to determine an identity, the young adult is often stalled in determining a life course. A skilled worker will assist the client in defining the emerging identity before promoting life course decisions. Young adults who have reached the status of identity achievement are more likely to become clients when their chosen path is blocked, or when psychosocial stressors have exceeded their coping resources.

Mental disorders often emerge during the early 20s; therefore, anxiety, depression, schizophrenia, or bipolar disorder may be the focus of clinical attention. Rates of alcohol and recreational drug use, as well as prescription drug abuse, are highest among young adults, so all clients in this age group should be screened for drug and alcohol use. Mental disorders and substance abuse are chronic conditions that persist throughout adulthood.

Middle Adulthood

As life expectancy increases, the issues of middle adulthood become more complicated. The developmental crisis of adulthood is generativity versus stagnation. Clients aged 30 to 70 often require support in maintaining a productive life as they continue to struggle with chronic conditions and life challenges. From a sociocultural standpoint, delivering services to clients in later-middle adulthood is an emerging crisis. When the baby boomers began reaching middle age, an already taxed human services system became overburdened. Baby boomers are historically large consumers of mental health services.

As people age, physical and mental problems increase and often exceed the diminishing resources of the aging individual. Delivering effective services to middle-aged clients requires an understanding of complicating social factors. Even though 10,000 baby boomers per day reach retirement age, a fluctuating economy has forced many middle-aged persons to postpone their retirement, challenging their physical health and increasing their levels of stress. Millions of grandparents are raising their grandchildren because of the parents' deployment, incarceration, or addiction. In many areas, an adequate spectrum of social services is not available to accommodate the demand created by these population dynamics. Many middle-aged people are part of the generation sandwich in their responsibility for taking care of their children and grandchildren during the same years they are taking care of their parents and grandparents.

Although almost half of the people seeking mental health treatment have substance-related disorders, substance abuse problems are often undiagnosed in middle-aged clients. Baby boomers are historically large consumers of recreational drugs, and as such have a higher risk of substance-related disorders throughout life. It is relatively easy for a middle-aged person to obtain addictive medications for anxiety, pain, and sleeplessness. Middle-aged patients often see many physicians without coordination of care or monitoring of medications. They often present themselves at pain management clinics, urgent care centers, and emergency rooms for the sole purpose of obtaining drugs. Drug-seeking clients can be difficult to identify and difficult to treat, indicating a need for human services workers in all areas to receive training in the areas of both aging and substance abuse.

Old Age

The aging baby boomers will cause an unprecedented demand on human services in the next 30 years. Although older adults will experience more years of healthy life, the number of elderly people requiring assistance with housing, transportation, health care, and activities of daily living still grows at a rate that is bound to overwhelm social services. Serving the aging client is complicated by ageism among human service professionals. The assumption that the elderly are in fast decline diminishes others' expectations of them, and may even prevent acknowledgement of individual differences in the aging process. Health care providers believing that deterioration is inevitable with advanced age might overlook other causes of declining functioning, such as illness, depression, or social factors. Ageism, therefore, diminishes how younger people regard and treat older people. In that younger generations provide care for the elderly, the misconceptions associated with ageism can prevent accurate diagnosis and effective treatment.

Cognitive impairments caused by dementia and Alzheimer's disease have a gradual onset and slow progression that requires several phases of intervention. Wernicke and Korsakoff syndromes are cognitive impairments associated with alcohol dependence. Advanced age tends to decrease suspicion of substance abuse in older clients, resulting in errant diagnoses of dementia or mental illness. Ideally, physicians, nurses, social workers, counselors, and caregivers work in concert to accurately diagnose elderly clients and execute care that aids the elderly in remaining independent as long as possible, and eases the transition from independence to total dependence.

Older people often have difficulty adjusting to change in the period of life when change is imminent. Human service professionals not only orchestrate the changes but also facilitate the associated adjustment to a loss of independent living. When resources for assisted living and skilled nursing are limited, families may assume the caregiving responsibilities. Education and support to caregivers creates another area of needed services in an already taxed service arena.

End-of-life services include palliative care for the dying person and supportive services to the families. Families have difficult decisions about whether to have terminal care in the home or at a facility. The issue of life support, if not made in advance by the patient, is often difficult for family members to agree upon and accept. All family members become clients at this critical time, and the professionals who serve them best assist all members of the family in supporting the dignity of the dying patient.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Beacon College

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Aging and Adult Services; Drug and Alcohol Screening; Early Childhood Development; Infant/Toddler Development; Life Course Approach.

Further Readings

Berk, Laura E. Development Through the Lifespan. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2014.
Hillier, Susan M. and Georgia M. Barrow. Aging, the Individual, and Society. Florence, KY: Cengage, 2010.
Strauch, Barbara. The Primal Teen: What the New Discoveries About the Teenage Brain Tell Us About Our Kids. New York: Doubleday, 2003.
Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. "Substance Abuse Among Older Adults: An Invisible Epidemic." http://www.samhsa.gov/data/2k5/olderadults/olderadults.htm (Accessed August 2013).

Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality

The Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality (AHRQ) was established in 1989, and its mission, according to its Web site, "is to improve the quality, safety, efficiency, and effectiveness of health care for all Americans." AHRQ is housed within the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. The agency's budget for the 2012 fiscal year was $405 million, with about 80 percent of this amount dedicated to supporting contracts and grants with an emphasis on improving health care. AHRQ comprises four offices and five centers: Center for Delivery, Organization, and Markets; Center for Financing, Access, and Cost Trends; Center for Outcomes and Evidence; Center for Primary Care, Prevention, and Clinical Partnerships; and Center for Quality Improvement and Patient Safety. The AHRQ annual conference, launched in 2007, is one platform in which AHRQ works to fulfill its mission. The annual conference was held consecutively through 2012. However, AHRQ suspended its 2013 and 2014 conferences to enable the agency to leverage its experience from the prior conferences in order to examine both the features and design of the 2015 conference and the best means to further the agency's mission.

Portfolios of Research: Comparative Effectiveness Research

AHRQ focuses on seven "portfolios" of research: comparative effectiveness research, cross-agency communications, health information technology, innovations and emerging issues, patient safety, innovation and care management, and value. The comparative effectiveness research (CER) portfolio is especially of use to both professionals and consumers. CER is designed "to inform health-care decisions by providing evidence on the effectiveness, benefits, and harms of different treatment options. The evidence is generated from research studies that compare drugs, medical devices, tests, surgeries, or ways to deliver health care." The results of the research are shared through effectiveness and comparative research summary guides for consumers, clinicians, and policy makers. These guides provide an overview of the research findings, specifically on the harms and benefits of different treatment options.

Web Site Educational Resources

The most striking feature of AHRQ's Web site is the vast array of information available to a variety of audiences—consumers, clinicians, and policy makers, with separate tabs for each audience on the organization's home page. An array of health research information tools is available, including one called State Snapshots. These summaries provide an overview of health care quality information and disparities for a specific state and offer suggestions for various ways to improve each state's health care delivery. These summaries are derived from information collected for the National Healthcare Quality Report (NHQR). A map of the United States appears on AHRQ's home page and users may click on a specific state to access the state snapshot.

Fact sheets for a variety of health topics are provided under the Research, Tools & Data section. Examples of topics include aging, children's health, coronary heart disease, diabetes, health information technology, Medicare and Medicaid, mental health, minority health, patient-centered care, quality, and women's health. Full research reports are also available, such as "Guide to Patient and Family Engagement," and various outcome reports on pharmaceutical outcomes research, such as "Race, Ethnicity, and Language Data: Standardization for Health Care Quality Improvement: Institute of Medicine Report."

Another Web site resource of interest is the Comparative Effectiveness Portfolio, featuring 123 reviews outlining the benefits or harms associated with different treatment options. These reviews are based on the results of research studies that compared various health care interventions. In 2007, AHRQ initiated a new consumer-oriented program called Healthcare 411. This program provides audio news on AHRQ's most recent research information, news, and findings. Podcasts and videos are available, both in English and Spanish, on a number of health topics, such as featured podcasts on autism, chronic hepatitis C, and monitoring blood sugar.

The Funding and Grants tab includes funding opportunity announcements; research policies; funding priorities and contacts; the grant application, review, and award process; and postaward grant management. National Advisory Council meeting summaries, transcripts, and presentation slides from meetings are also available. In addition, users can learn about recent AHRQ news and events, including access to newsletters, conferences, and columns, under the News & Events tab.

A. Suzanne Boyd
University of North Carolina at Charlotte

See Also: Health Care, Disparities in; Health Care Delivery, Models of; National Healthcare Disparities Reports.

Further Readings

Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. "About Us" (August 2013). http://www.ahrq.gov/about/index.html (Accessed September 2013).

Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. "AHRQ Annual Conferences: Conference Materials" (June 2013). http://www.ahrq.gov/news/events/nac/index.html (Accessed September 2013).

Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. "Centers and Offices" (August 2013). http://www.ahrq.gov/centers/index.html (Accessed September 2013).

Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. "Innovations and Emerging Issues Portfolio" (September 2012). http://www.ahrq.gov/cpi/portfoilos/innovations/index.html (Accessed September 2013).

Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. "National Advisory Council: Meeting Summaries" (October 2012). http://www.ahrq.gov/news/events/nac/index.html (Accessed September 2013).

Healthy People 2020. "2020 Topics and Objectives–Objectives A-Z." http://www.healthypeople.gov/2020//topicsobjectives2020/default.aspx (Accessed June 2013).

Leapfrog Group. "AHRQ Launches Health Audio News Service for Consumers" (March 2007). http://www.leapfroggrooup.org/news/leapfrog_news/4414808 (Accessed September 2013).

National Center for Biotechnological Information. "AHRQ Comparative Effectiveness Reviews" (2005). http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/books/NBK42934 (Accessed September 2013).

Wilkinson, Richard and Michael Marmot, eds. Social Determinants of Health: The Solid Facts 2013, 2nd ed.

World Health Organization (2003). http://www.who.int/gho/publications/world_health_statistics/EN_WHS2013_Full.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Aggression Replacement Training

Over time, significant efforts by several entities within the field of human services have been devoted to forming effective approaches and systems to control antisocial, delinquent, and illegal conduct. There have been many attempts to develop techniques and programs to improve self-control, especially among children and adolescents. Aggression Replacement Training (ART) is a cognitive-behavioral intervention program to aid children and adolescents convalesce social aptitude and moral reasoning, convalesce anger management, and diminish aggressive behavior. The program was initially designed for habitually aggressive children and adolescents aged 12–17. Drs. Arnold P. Goldstein, Barry Glick, and John Gibbs developed ART. ART has been implemented in schools and juvenile institutions, and is being introduced to adult correctional institutions on a national and international level. The program is offered for 10 weeks, which includes 30 sessions of intervention training, and encompasses three components. The three components offer training in social skills, anger control, and moral reasoning. On a weekly basis, participants engage in a one-hour session in each of these modules (components). Layered knowledge, confirmation schemes, and facilitated group discussions enrich skill attainment and reinforce the modules in the curriculum. ART is currently a model program for the U.S. Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention and the United Kingdom Home Office. The U.S. Department of Education has categorized ART as a promising approach to address students who struggle with aggression.

Culturally responsive treatment holds the most promise for reduced recidivism. It is often defined as interventions that maintain respect for, and attention to, diversity in both people and programming. Gender, age, and ethnic origin intersect to produce consistent statistical patterns of offending. At a minimum, ART facilitators should be aware of their personal cultural identifications and biases, always showing respect and understanding for client diversity and differences in social learning experiences.

Conducting research in the field of human services with diverse populations is an effective method to determine the cultural responsiveness of a model of treatment. For example, the Wilder Research Center conducted an evaluation summary of ART between fall 2002 and fall 2004 with 295 youth who received ART. Four agencies provided the services, including a residential program, a school-based program, and two community-based programs. The youth were racially and culturally diverse (39 percent black, 28 percent white, 24 percent Asian, 6 percent Latino, and 3 percent of another or mixed race). A total of 92 percent were male, mostly between the ages of 14 and 17. According to this research study, positive feedback was received from the youth and their families concerning their satisfaction with the services and staff who provided ART.

History

Starting within the school setting, ART was considered a psychoeducational approach to working with students who displayed antisocial behavior. ART originated as Skillstreaming by Goldstein, and it transpired into a three-component model. Goldstein recognized that the complex problems of youth could not be addressed by a one-dimensional approach. With Glick and Gibbs, he formulated a three-part multimodal approach to address problems in behavior, emotions, and thinking. Skillstreaming targets behavior, Anger Control Training focuses on emotions, and Moral Reasoning is a cognitive intervention. Goldstein and his colleagues encouraged the extension and modification of the program to new settings, client populations, and causes. The program is now accessible in revised forms for other types of antisocial behaviors and populations, for instance, adult violent offenders.

Social learning theory was a vital inspiration because it relates to theoretical viewpoints, which influenced the design of ART. This theory seeks to understand the complex interactions between an individual's thoughts, emotions, and actions within a given social environment. Social learning theory is parallel with cognitive behavioral methods. In addition, the ecological perspective inspired the blueprint of ART, describing aggression as a person-environment combination. The ecological theory influence can be understood as macrolevel aggression displayed at the national or regional level; mesolevel violence at the neighborhood level; and microlevel aggression found in settings such as the home, school, and peer groups. Both the theory and practice underpinnings of ART are comprehensive and accomplished a variety of criteria for evidence-based practice. Research shows that the three major areas of Skillstreaming, Anger Control Training, and Moral Reasoning address key dimensions in helping participants acquire prosocial behavior, thinking, and values.

ART as a multimodal program with three modules was first implemented and appraised in schools and juvenile delinquent residential facilities in 1978. Since that time, an extensive progression of studies has validated its skill-learning, anger-control, and recidivism-reducing influence. It has gained popularity in schools, juvenile complexes, and other agencies concerned with the reduction of school violence and aggression by youth. In 1981, ART evolved in the United States and is now used in human service systems, including juvenile justice and adult corrections systems throughout North America, Europe, South America, and Australia. The revolutionary curriculum is known as an empirical-based, effectual methodology for working with perplexing youth. The revised and expanded edition is the culmination of over 30 years of use in schools, community agencies, juvenile institutions, and other milieus. The developers expound on the procedures and tactics for each of ART's three modules, illuminating the theory behind the interventions and offering practical recommendations for optimal results. They present program strategies in the form of sessions, including systematic instructions for leading each group meeting.

Three Components

ART introduces three synchronized and assimilated modules. The first module is Skillstreaming, which educates youth on what to do, helping them to replace antisocial behaviors with positive substitutes. The next component is Anger Control, which imparts to youth what not to do, helping them to react to anger in a socially acceptable manner, without aggression, and to reconsider anger-provoking circumstances. The last module, Moral Reasoning, increases youths' levels of fairness, justice, and concern for the needs and rights of others. ART consists of a 10-week, 30-hour intervention, administered to groups of eight to 12 participants three times per week. The program relies on repetitive learning and transfer-training techniques to teach participants to control impulsiveness and anger so that they can choose to use more appropriate and prosocial behaviors. In addition, facilitated group discussion addresses destructive thinking. All three interrelated components come together to promote an inclusive aggression-reduction curriculum. Each module concentrates on a distinctive prosocial behavioral technique, including action, affective/emotional, or thought/values.

Skillstreaming (the action component) is intended to teach social skills through social interaction and skills are disseminated using direct instruction, role play, practice, and performance feedback. This is expected to give participants the opportunity to practice prosocial responses to potentially arduous situations, such as responding to failure, handling accusations, and responding to others' emotions. This method derived from the social learning theory of Albert Bandura. The curriculum offers a skill checklist of 50 preferred skills to identify skills that the participants are missing, sequentially; the program targets those lacking skills. Each skill is broken down into its behavioral components, which the trainer demonstrates, and participants role-play during the session. A skill such as comprehending someone's feelings is considered complicated, whereas priming for a difficult conversation is less challenging.

Anger Control Training (the affective/emotional component) helps participants recognize external and internal triggers for aggression signals and how to control anger using various techniques. Participants bring to each session one or more descriptions of recent anger-arousing encounters (agitations), and over the duration of the program they learn to use exclusive skills to better control angry impulses. The anger control training has its foundation in the early anger control work of R. Novaco and D. Meichenbaum. Anger control training is a multistep sequence in which participants are taught to understand how they typically perceive and construe the behavior of others in ways that arouse anger. Therefore, in the first lesson, attention is directed toward identifying the external and internal triggers that initiate the anger. The self-control sessions identify triggers and likely consequences of anger and aggression. The self-awareness of triggers and arousing feelings of anger is then used to cultivate replacement prosocial strategies. The trainer demonstrates the proper use of anger reduction techniques, such as deep breathing and backward counting.

Moral Reasoning Training (the thought and values component) is expected to address the reasoning aspect of aggressive behavior, and is specifically designed to enhance values of morality in aggressive participants. Techniques in this component allow participants to learn to reason in a more advanced manner concerning moral and ethical dilemmas, providing participants with opportunities to discuss their responses to issues, taking perspectives other than their own that represent a higher level of moral comprehension. This component derived from Lawrence Kohlberg's model of moral development, with the purpose of raising the individual's level of moral reasoning in order to make more mature decisions in social situations. In ART, moral reasoning is stimulated by in-group discussions of moral dilemmas. The trainer presents a moral problem, in which the participants can choose between various options. The participants choose one position each, and discuss their position with the group. The curriculum provides 10 problem situations designed to create opportunities for participants to consider the perceptions of others.

Intervention Programs

Goldstein and colleagues emphasized that aggressive behavior and other forms of antisocial behavior can be discovered in three factors. Those three factors are the lack of prosocial behavior (personal, interpersonal and social-cognitive skills), poor anger control, and undeveloped morals. ART teaches an array of prosocial and psychological skills to participants who have specific areas of need. Training is delivered in a series of structured learning groups, where participants are shown examples of expert use of the behaviors that constitute the skills in which they are deficient (i.e., modeling). In addition, participants are given guided opportunities to practice and rehearse these competent behaviors (i.e., role-playing). Participants are provided with reinforcement, reinstruction, and performance feedback on how well they perform their role-playing enactments. Furthermore, participants are encouraged to engage in a series of activities designed to increase the chances that skills learned in the intervention setting will endure and transfer in real-world settings, such as home, neighborhood, and school. The authors proclaim that these components together provide a platform that will help the participants to function prosocially.

ART concentrates on the development of individual competencies to address various emotional and social aspects that contribute to aggressive behavior. Program techniques were designed to teach clients how to control their angry impulses and take perspectives other than their own. The main goal is to reduce aggression and violence by providing them with opportunities to learn socially acceptable skills in place of aggressive behavior. The multicomponents of ART promote prosocial behavior by addressing factors that contribute to aggression, including limited interpersonal social and coping skills, impulsiveness, overreliance on aggression to meet daily needs, and egocentric and rigid values. A cost-benefit analysis by the Washington State Institute for Public Policy finds that this program results in reduced illegal behavior and cost reductions. An outcome evaluation from Washington State showed, for example, that when completely delivered, ART has positive outcomes, with estimated reductions in 18-month felony recidivism of 24 percent, compared to the control group.

The ART program is aimed at individuals with a history of serious aggression and antisocial behavior and can be applied across several different populations. Some potentially eligible populations include incarcerated juvenile offenders and youths with clinical behavioral disorders. Recommendations suggest that potential participants be screened for risk and severity of aggressive/antisocial behavior before implementation to assess eligibility for inclusion. This type of assessment often includes the use of clinical instruments to examine the degree of problematic behavior. In the juvenile court setting, ART can be implemented by court probation staff or private contractors after they receive formal ART training. A juvenile offender is eligible for ART if it is determined from the results of a formal assessment tool administered by juvenile court staff that the youth has a moderate to high risk for reoffense, and has a problem with aggression or lacks skills in prosocial functioning.

ART is a long-standing intervention program. Since the 1990s, it has been provided across the world within a wide variety of social, educational, and correctional services, secure units, community services, and prisons. Teachers, counselors, youth care workers, social workers, and correctional officers are examples of people who become trainers. Using repetitive learning techniques, participants develop skills to control anger and use behaviors that are more appropriate. In addition, facilitated group discussion is utilized to modify antisocial thinking, which precedes dilemmas that can be problematic.

Tamikia S. Lott
Old Dominion University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; At-Risk Youth Services; Childhood Trauma; Educational Support Services; Juvenile Delinquents.

Further Readings

Amendola, M. and R. Oliver. "Aggression Replacement Training Stands the Test of Time." Reclaiming Children and Youth Journal, v.19/2 (2010).

Andrews, D. A. and J. Bonta. The Psychology of Criminal Conduct. 3d ed. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson Publishing, 2003.

Gundersen, K. and F. Svartdal. "Aggression Replacement Training in Norway: OutcomeEvaluation of 11 Norwegian Student Projects." Scandinavian Journal of EducationResearch, v.50/1 (2006).

Moynahan, L. and B. Stromgren. "Preliminary Results of Aggression Replacement Training for Norwegian Youth With Aggressive Behaviour and With a Different Diagnosis." Psychology, Crime & Law, v.11/4 (2005).

Sherman, L. W., D. P. Farrington, D. L. MacKenzie, and B. C. Welsh. Evidence-BasedCrime Prevention. New York: Routledge, 2006.

Aging and Adult Services

Historically, older adults and adults with developmental disabilities faced limited community-based service options. Services were largely available through institutionalized settings, which often required people to leave their homes and live within state-run hospitals or nursing homes. With the passing of federal legislation, advocacy from stakeholders, and social change movements like deinstitutionalization, services for health, mental health, and daily living needs are now more widely available through community-based providers, thus allowing older adults and adults with disabilities to safely remain in their homes as long as possible. For a portion of people who are unable to live independently, specialized interventions such as Alzheimer's units in nursing homes, assisted living, group homes, and short-term rehabilitation are available to meet the unique long-term and short-term needs of this population.

Many of today's community-based services for older adults emerged out of the passing of the Older Americans Act of 1965 and for adults with developmental disabilities out of the Rehabilitation Act Amendments of 1978, which are federal legislation that, in part, supported the development of population-specific community-based social services. The Administration on Aging, Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities, and Administration for Community Living are federal departments that disseminate grants to states that aim to create and improve services within the community as a means of providing older adults and adults with disabilities with the resources they need to live independently. Although federal funds support a large portion of these services, states have the flexibility to design systems of care and allocate funding in accordance with the unique needs of their communities.

Health and Mental Health Services

Health and mental health services are generally provided in-home or through community-based clinics and local hospitals. Adults who are able to safely live independently and are relatively mobile may choose to access health care services through clinics and local hospitals. Gerontologists—doctors who specialize in treating diseases and conditions that impact older adults—are available for ongoing health care maintenance for aging adults. Community clinics and hospitals provide a multitude of health care services including routine physicals, consultation with specialists, management of chronic diseases, physical therapy, chronic disease management, occupational therapy, and surgery. Clinics and hospitals are also equipped to serve the mental health care needs of older adults and adults with disabilities by conducting mental health assessments and providing mental health therapy, supportive counseling, family therapy, substance use treatment, psychiatric medication management, and case management.

Some people living in the community are homebound or have difficulty traveling to clinics and require in-home health care services. Home health care is prescribed by a physician and can include nursing, social work services, and physical and occupational therapy. Homebound adults can access a number of services offered in clinics in-home through home health agencies. For example, wound care, medication management, short-term physical and occupational therapy, speech therapy, mental health therapy, and podiatry are a few examples of health care services that can be provided in-home. Home health is beneficial for many homebound adults because it expands access to services for this vulnerable population; people who are homebound may be at risk of falling if they leave their homes without assistance. Further, home health allows providers to see people in their home environment. Although there are a number of benefits to in-home care, the drawback is that many services cannot be provided in-home, such as invasive surgical procedures and the use of nonportable technologies.

For a portion of older adults and adults with disabilities, living independently is not possible. Assisted living and nursing home facilities offer longer-term services for people who cannot live in their own homes but who do not need 24-hour skilled nursing care. Assisted living facilities generally provide a small studio apartment for residents and an array of services that may include meal preparation, assistance with cleaning the apartment and clothing, self-care, coordination of medical care, medication management, and transportation. Many assisted living facilities coordinate with medical providers who provide routine care at these facilities. Although the assisted-living staff are available 24 hours a day, most facilities transport residents in need of urgent medical attention to the hospital or a connected skilled nursing facility.

A 2013 St. Patrick's Day party at a nursing home. The Older Americans Act of 1965 led to many community-based services, such as nursing homes and assisted living facilities.

Alternatively, for people who require extensive care and/or rehabilitation, nursing homes provide skilled nursing services 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Nursing homes have general medical floors and may also offer specialized care on floors for people with neurocognitive disorders or Alzheimer's disease. Nursing homes are equipped to provide many health care services within the facility; however, for more urgent care, residents may be transported to a local hospital for assistance.

Finally, federal funding also supports state-run ombudsman programs for older adults and their families. Ombudsmen advocate for the protection and safety of older adults living in long-term care facilities, such as nursing homes and assisted living. If residents, families, or advocates are concerned about the services provided by a long-term care facility or the conduct of long-term care facility staff, a report can be submitted to the ombudsman for investigation.

Community Services

A number of nonhealthcare-related community resources are also available for older adults and adults with disabilities. These services are intended to maximize self-sufficiency, health, and in-home safety so that people can continue living in their homes and within their communities despite physical or mental limitations that could interfere with independent living. One of the most common services is homemakers. Homemakers are people who work with older adults or adults with disabilities who need assistance with activities of daily living. Homemaker services are individualized so that supportive services are offered in the areas of daily living that a person most needs. Homemakers can assist with cleaning homes and laundry; self-care activities like getting dressed, meal preparation, and shopping; and running errands like going to the post office or picking up prescription medications. Homemakers can also accompany their clients to the doctor's office or out in the community for walks.

In addition to homemakers, a number of services intended to assist older adults and adults with disabilities are available to help improve quality of life; reduce financial stressors related to low, fixed-incomes; and improve safety within the community. For example, many communities provide lower-income, older adults and adults with disabilities reduced bus fare, discounted license plates, subsidized taxi vouchers, discounted legal services, and free or low-cost tax preparation. Low-income adults may also be eligible for the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program, which provides eligible individuals with a small grant to help cover the cost of electric bills. Although not available in all states, circuit breaker or benefit access programs also provide low-income older adults and adults with disabilities a return of a portion of their property taxes or rent paid per calendar year. Many community senior centers also provide socialization opportunities with dinner clubs, sponsored activities like game night, and light physical and mental exercise.

State departments on aging offer home-delivered meals for individuals who are homebound or have difficulty preparing nutritious meals independently. Many state departments also provide adult day care services. Adult day care promotes social interactions and provides mental stimulation, therapy, educational activities, and exercise in a structured environment. Many people attending adult day care have caregivers in their home; the day program allows participants a chance to engage socially and offers a break from caregiving. State departments also run adult protective services, which investigate abuse and neglect allegations for older adults and people with disabilities. Finally, in an effort to promote in-home safety, many states also subsidize in-home emergency response systems for low-income, older adults. In the event a person falls and is unable to phone someone for assistance, emergency responders are notified when a person in need pushes a button on a necklace worn around his or her neck. When a button is pushed, an operator speaks through an intercom within the person's home and asks if emergency personnel should be dispatched for assistance.

Funding for Health and Mental Health Services for Aging Adults

Medicare, Medicaid, and private insurance largely cover the cost of health and mental health services. Older adults who do not qualify for Medicaid often opt for insurance policies called Medigap plans, which are offered through a number of private insurance companies to help cover the cost of medical care that is not covered by Medicare. A combination of Medicare and private insurance covers a portion of the cost of nursing home care. People with lower incomes can apply for Medicaid coverage for the remaining cost of nursing home care, but people with assets and higher income often pay for a portion of skilled nursing services out of pocket. Most people residing in assisted living facilities must pay out of pocket; however, some states offer financial support through Medicaid to low-income individuals in need of assisted living. The cost of assisted living varies considerably from facility to facility. Funding for community-based services for older adults and adults with disabilities is largely supported by a combination of federal and state funding.

Kelli E. Canada
University of Missouri

See Also: Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Case Management Services; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Home Care Services.

Further Readings

Administration on Aging, "AoA Programs." http://aoa.gov/AoARoot/AoA_Programs/index.aspx (Accessed August 2013).

Rothrauff, Tanja C., Amanda J. Abraham, Brian E. Bride, and Paul M. Roman. "Substance Abuse Treatment for Older Adults in Private Centers." Substance Abuse, v.32/1 (2011).

Tucker, Dee, Gail Bechtel, Carol Quartana, Naadede Badger, Donna Werner, Ilisher Ford, and Larry Connelly. "The OASIS Program: Redesigning Hospital Care for Older Adults." Geriatric Nursing, v.27/2 (2006).

Wacker, Robbyn R. and Karen A. Roberto, eds. Community Resources for Older Adults: Programs and Services in an Era of Change, 4th ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2013.

Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Historical Role of

Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) is a former public assistance program established under Title IV of the Social Security Act of 1935 as Aid to Dependent Children (ADC). The program was funded and administered by the federal and state governments to provide short-term financial assistance for needy children. More than half (55 percent) of the total cost of AFDC payments are funded by the federal government, leaving the remaining balance to be covered by the states. Each state managed its own program and determined who received benefits and the amount families received. As a means-tested program, AFDC recipients' eligibility status was based on the following: (1) having a dependent child who is under age 18 and living with the family (an 18-year-old who is expected to complete secondary school or its equivalent before turning 19 could also be covered); (2) being deprived of financial support from one parent because of the parent's death, continued absence, or incapacity (this includes children in two-parent families in which the principal family earner was unemployed); (3) being a resident of the state they lived in; and (4) being a U.S. citizen or an immigrant who is permanently and lawfully residing in the United States.

Historical Timeline

AFDC program grew out of the passage of the Social Security Act of 1935 as Aid to Dependent Children (ADC). The 1935 Social Security Act, however, was not the first government income support provided to poor children in the United States. In most cases, ADC added federal aid to state mothers' pension programs, which were already assisting poor mothers. These local and state-funded mothers' pensions programs were established to provide cash aid to help children remain in their homes when mothers experienced financial hardships. Both programs (mothers' pension and ADC) were designed to be short term in nature and to address a specific need.

Several features of the new ADC program kept states from abandoning their efforts following the passage of the Social Security Act. Federal ADC aid was contingent on state contributions, and states were given considerable discretion to determine ADC eligibility and grant levels. For example, a state could continue to require that only children living in "suitable homes" could receive assistance. The "suitable home" criteria was very subjective and often used to exclude potentially eligible families on the basis of race, ethnicity, language, religion, and country of origin. States also introduced the "man-in-the-house rule" to regulate or enforce the morality of public aid recipients. The rule was based on the belief that women receiving public assistance might allow able-bodied men to spend time in their homes without assuming any responsibility for the well-being of their children. This lack of responsibility and the perception that these men were also indirectly benefiting from the ADC aid were viewed as immoral and illegal and enraged those who wanted to ensure that benefits were being spent only to care for needy children. This rule resulted in the practice of "midnight raids" or home visits to welfare recipients late at night. These raids were to ensure that no able-bodied adult male resided in the household, even if the man in question was a blood relative of the mother, such as her father or her brother. Until these rules and practices were struck down in 1960, these requirements were used to exclude "undesirable" families from aid, particularly children of women who had never married.

During the 1960s several important modifications to the program were made: the name was changed to Aid to Families and Dependent Children (AFDC) to include the family as a unit, and AFDC-Unemployed Parents (AFDC-UPS) was enacted. This program came about primarily because of the recession and lack of work resulting in the parent's unemployment. This change addressed concerns that the program's eligibility criteria discouraged the establishment and maintenance of two-parent households in poor communities. This criticism was never adequately resolved, in part because of the fact that half the states, particularly in the south, failed to implement the AFDC-UPS program.

Another significant criticism levied against the AFDC program for many years was the inherent lack of attachment to work for benefit recipients. For nearly four decades, several programs were implemented to encourage work and job readiness for AFDC recipients. In 1968, Congress established the Work Incentive (WIN) program, which provided education, training, and subsidized employment for AFDC participants. The Jobs Opportunities and Basic Skills Training (JOBS) program was established in 1988 to prepare welfare recipients for work and reinforce social services support to families. Each program encountered many challenges and did not yield many positive outcomes. The lack of success can be partly attributed to the "hard to serve" or core group of recipients who were dealing with enduring limitations related to illiteracy and/or limited English proficiency, mental and physical health issues, as well as simply not having minimum job skills.

In the 1990s criticism of AFDC continued, supported by a body of research that highlighted conservatism (specific to family values, individual responsibility, and the value of work), that led to sweeping changes in legislation that forever changed the face of public assistance. In 1996, the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program was eliminated as a federal program and ended the highly criticized entitlement to means-tested cash assistance for poor families in the United States. The Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) program replaced AFDC.

Cynthia Davis
Jenny Jones
Florida A&M University

See Also: Family Services; Poverty; Temporary Assistance to Needy Families.

Further Readings

DiNitto, D. M. Social Welfare: Politics and Public Policy. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2010.
Nadasen, Premilla, Jennifer Mittelstadt, and Marisa Chappell, eds. Welfare in the United States: A History with Documents, 1935–1996. New York: Routledge, 2009.
Trattner, Walter. From Poor Law to Welfare State: A History of Social Welfare in America. New York: Free Press, 1999.

AIDS/HIV Programs

HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) is an infectious agent, a human retrovirus causing a lifelong, life-threatening condition (HIV disease, HIV infection, or HIV illness), the final stage of which is AIDS (acquired immunodeficiency syndrome). HIV is responsible for a worldwide devastating plague, and its effects concern all human services workers and organizations. Since the existence of the pandemic was realized in 1981, more than 75 million people worldwide have tested positive for HIV and almost 36 million have died of HIV-related causes.

HIV can infect any person, regardless of age, origin, ethnicity, occupation, religion, sexual orientation, gender, or gender identity, so it is vital that respectful, appropriate services be available for persons with HIV at every health care or social service organization. No matter the setting or population, human services workers should assume that they are or will be working with persons who have HIV (whether they know it or not), are at risk of becoming infected with HIV, have friends and family members with HIV, or have questions about HIV. Every human services worker should ask about HIV concerns as part of general helping and be prepared to listen nonjudgmentally to experiences and fears, make appropriate referrals, and educate people about how to avoid getting HIV or passing it on to others.

HIV Transmission

A man, woman, teenager, or child can get HIV through the infusion of specific infected fluids (blood, semen, vaginal secretions, or breast milk) into his or her bloodstream. The most common forms of passing HIV from one person to another are (1) vaginal or anal intercourse without a condom; and (2) sharing syringes (some blood remains in the syringe). It is possible for a fetus or newborn to get HIV from the mother. HIV will not pass through air, clothing, or unbroken skin. Tears, perspiration, saliva, and urine do not transmit HIV. No one has ever been infected with HIV through casual contact, such as hugging, holding hands, or sharing food, beverages, dishes, or linens.

HIV Disease

A person learns whether he or she is HIV-positive through a blood or saliva test. HIV attacks the immune system, diminishing the body's ability to fight infections and cancers. A person with HIV can live for years without having any symptoms of the illness. When persons develop HIV symptoms, they can maintain good health and functioning for years if they have good medical care, nutrition, stress management, and social support. Much progress has been made with medical care and anti-HIV medicines, so where and when health care is available, people with HIV are living longer and fuller lives than possible before. Still, there is no cure, so HIV remains a serious, chronic, life-threatening, difficult-to-manage illness.

History

The retrovirus was probably undetected among humans for over a century before the symptoms were noticed and reported in the United States in 1981 by physicians who were treating young gay and bisexual men who were dying rapidly from mysterious infections and cancers. At the same time, scientists from all over the world reported similar unexplained life-threatening illnesses in men, women, and children. In the United States, the disease initially became associated primarily with gay men. Because traditional medical, governmental, pharmaceutical, and charitable organizations were not appropriately serving people with HIV, early AIDS service organizations (ASOs) were founded and run by men and women in the gay community; many of the men were themselves ill from HIV complications. The early response to HIV in the United States is a model for community organization and policy advocacy.

Language

An HIV-positive person can also be referred to as an HIV-infected person or a person living with HIV (or AIDS). The last term is generally preferred. At a Denver conference in 1983 (before the causative agent HIV had been discovered), an advisory committee of persons living with AIDS developed the Denver Principles, which remain important in HIV services. The writers of the document condemned labels that put the disease before the person, asking to be called "people with AIDS." In the HIV field it is considered respectful to use words such as "person," "man," and "woman" rather than "client" or "patient."

Treatment

It is important for a person with HIV to have and keep up with good medical care, with a specialist if possible. With careful monitoring, anti-HIV medications (antiretrovirals or ARVs), wellness strategies for the immune system, and medicines to prevent infections, HIV can be better managed. Treatments can cause side effects that, at best, make life unpleasant and, at worst, make it almost impossible for people to continue taking the medicines. Good medical care, along with social support and social services, can help people address side effects and stick to (adhere to) the medications. Adherence to the medicines as prescribed is critical because HIV will become resistant to a medicine that is not taken as prescribed and the drugs will not be able to keep HIV in check.

Psychosocial Concerns

HIV disease carries a stigma (social disgrace), so people with HIV may be hesitant to tell others about the diagnosis out of a fear of being judged, rejected, or shunned. HIV stigma may keep people from learning about transmission risks, getting an HIV test, seeking medical care, approaching a human services or mental health agency, asking friends and family for help, or disclosing to sexual or drug partners.

Living with HIV can cause ongoing emotional turmoil and multiple crises. Most people with HIV experience periods of stress, fear, uncertainty, depression, grief, and feeling out of control. Often HIV comes as an additional blow on top of previous traumas or ongoing challenges (e.g., extreme poverty, physical and sexual abuse, addiction) and the person can be too overwhelmed to address HIV at all.

Human Services Roles

A helper must be prepared to provide information about HIV transmission and prevention, HIV testing, and HIV services and counseling. Preparation might mean seeking more education, doing more reading, or honestly exploring one's own attitudes.

Because of HIV stigma, people with HIV as a whole are an oppressed group. In addition, people with HIV are an enormously diverse group, and having HIV is a very personal experience. Working with people with HIV requires that one be respectful, nonjudgmental, and culturally humble. Human services workers must keep a high level of confidentiality when working with persons with HIV, and must be prepared to assure people repeatedly about their privacy rights and the agency's protections.

Human services workers should work in partnership with persons with HIV and, from the beginning and at every step, ask what the person needs to be well and safe at a basic level. These individuals may need s services such as HIV testing, health insurance, medical care, medication, support to adhere to ARVs, shelter, food, employment assistance, mental health care, support groups, family or couple counseling, addiction services, or legal aid.

One of the worker's toughest jobs, but one of the most important, is to help maintain a delicate balance between hope and despair. Unrealistic hope can lead to ignoring the seriousness of having HIV and thus, to doing nothing about it; unrealistic despair can lead to paralyzing fear and depression.

Cynthia Cannon Poindexter
Fordham University

See Also: Bias in Service Delivery; Cultural Humility, Model of; Health as a Human Right; Pandemics; Partner Notification Programs in HIV/AIDS.

Further Readings

American Foundation for AIDS Research. "Statistics Worldwide" (2013). http://www.amfar.org/about-hiv-and-aids/facts-and-stats/statistics--worldwide (Assessed November 2013).

Bielefeld, W., R. K. Scotch, and G. S. Thielmann. "National Mandates and Local Non-Profits: Shaping a Local Delivery System of HIV/AIDS Services." In Strategies of Community Organization: A Book of Readings, F. M. Cox, J. L. Erlich, J. Rothman, and J. E. Tropman, eds. Ithaca, IL: Peacock, 2000.

Brief, D. J., A. R. Bollinger, M. J. Vielhauer, J. A. Berger-Greenstein, E. E. Morgan, S. M. Brady, L. M. Buondonno, and T. M. Keane. "Understanding the Interface of HIV, Trauma, Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, and Substance Use and Its Implications for Health Outcomes. AIDS Care, v.16/1 (2004).

Denver Principles. "Statement from the Advisory Committee of the People with AIDS" (1983). http://www.actupny.org/documents/Denver.html (Accessed March 2013).

Kalichman, S., D. Ntseane, K. Nthomang, M. Segwabe, M. O. Phorano, and L. Simbayi. "Recent Multiple Sexual Partners: HIV Transmission Risks Among People Living With HIV and AIDS in Botswana." Sexually Transmitted Infections, v.83/1 (2007).

Mugavero, M. J., W. E. Norton, and M. S. Saag. "Health Care System and Policy Factors Influencing Engagement in HIV Medical Care: Piecing Together the Fragments of a Fractured Health Care Delivery System." Clinical Infectious Diseases, v.52/2 (2011).

Poindexter, C. C., ed. Handbook of HIV and Social Work: Principles, Practice, and Populations. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2010.

Rowan, D. Social Work With HIV and AIDS: A Case-Based Guide. Chicago: Lyceum, 2013.

Alaskan Natives

Alaska is the 49th state in the United States and became a state on January 3, 1959. It is home to over 700,000 people, of whom 15 percent identify as Alaska Native. The majority of Alaska is surrounded by water. The northern part of the state is surrounded by the Arctic Ocean, (e.g., Beaufort Sea and the Chukchi Sea). The Gulf of Alaska and Pacific Ocean are to the south and the Bering Sea is to the west of the state. In addition, eastern and southern Alaska is bordered by Canada. The total area Alaska covers is 656,425 square miles, making it the largest state and more than two times the size of Texas, which is the second-largest state in the nation.

The term Alaska Native encompasses distinct cultural linguistic groups, which are often divided into five major groupings: the Aleut/Alutiiq (Southwestern Aleutians), Athabascan (Interior Indians), Inupiat (Northern Eskimos), Yup'ik (Southern Eskimos), and Tlingit/Haida/Tsimshian (Southeastern Coastal Indians). Each of these groups is culturally distinct through important differences in cultural practices, including variation in kinship networks; developed subsistence hunting and gathering practices; unique languages; belief systems; and spirituality, art, music, and dance traditions. The groups all honor and respect the land and waters upon which their lives depend, have respect for the fish and animals, value community over individuality, and respect and learn from their elders.

In many regions of the state, Alaska Native people still hunt, fish, and gather the same plants and animals they have for centuries, practicing their traditional culture as passed down to younger generations through the stories, teachings, and life examples of their elders. Subsistence foods make up a majority of their diet, including the diet of those living in the urban centers of Anchorage and Fairbanks. It is common to see traditional culture celebrations and ceremonies practiced in communities, and many of the elders continue to pass on their traditional knowledge of activities such as hunting, gathering, survival skills, ivory and wood carving, and beadwork.

Health and Mental Health

The overall health (physical and mental) of Alaska Native people has improved over the last few decades with progress in health care practices, medical advancements, and increased healthy behaviors. However, when compared to the nonminority population in the United States or with other racial and ethnic minority groups, Alaska Natives' health still remains poor compared to the rest of the U.S. population. For many health indicators, Alaska Native people have the poorest health and greatest health disparities of any population in the nation, along with American Indian populations. The Alaska Native mortality rate is over three times the national average, with a significant percentage of deaths related to alcohol. Alaska Native youth smoke cigarettes at a rate that is four times higher than other youths. Alaska Native children are more likely to be neglected or abused, and Alaska Native women suffer higher rates of domestic violence and sexual abuse compared with the national average. More than one-third of Alaska's prison population is made up of Alaska Natives. The seemingly common denominator between Alaska Natives and these health outcomes is the high use of alcohol and other drugs.

Working With Alaska Native Clients/Communities

It must be noted that working with Alaska Natives as culturally different clients entails a focus on the individual within his or her community. Alaska Natives are becoming aware and have recognized that addressing the problems caused by typical lifestyle behaviors (e.g., eating unhealthy foods, drinking too much alcohol, and smoking) requires multiple interventions. Small Alaskan communities have voted to control alcohol use, with some voting for a total ban on alcohol. There has been a growth in health and mental health facilities, which employ trained professionals and send mental health professionals to Native Alaskan villages.

While there are differences of opinion regarding the best health and wellness practices within Alaska

Alaskan women scraping salmon from the skin using traditional methods. Following the teachings of their elders, many native Alaskans have continued to fish, hunt, and gather food.

Native communities, established, evidence-based treatments for Alaska Native clients require some kind of adaptation process prior to implementation. For instance, some Alaskan Native communities could view the problems of alcohol, drugs, smoking, and overall poor health as the result of their community losing their traditional, sacred ways and being forced into European lifestyles. Using a standard medical model to treat a psychological problem rather than approaching this as a holistic and historical problem would seem an illogical, best-practice technique. Partnering with community members to better understand local practices and traditions paves a way for "actual" best practices when working with Alaskan Native clients. Professional practices should be grounded and offered in the social context of each unique Alaskan community.

David A. Patterson Silver Wolf
Washington University in St. Louis
Jordan Lewis
University of Washington
Jessica Black
Washington University in St Louis

See Also: Ethnic Groups and Drug and Alcohol Use; Ethnicity and Clients; Health Care, Disparities in; Indian Child Welfare Act; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; Native Americans; Native Americans, Suicide Among.

Further Readings

Lewis, J. "The Future of Successful Aging in Alaska: What Can We Learn From Our Elders to Ensure a Healthy Future." International Journal of Circumpolar Health, v.72 (2013). http://www.circumpolarhealthjournal.net/index.php/ijch/article/view/21186 (Accessed November 2013).

Lewis, J. "Successful Aging Through the Eyes of Alaska Native Elders: What It Means to be an Elder in Bristol Bay, Alaska." The Gerontologist, v.51/4 (2011).

Lewis, J. P. and K. Boyd, "Determined by the Community: CBPR in Alaska Native Communities Building Local Control and Self-Determination." Journal of Indigenous Research, v.1/2 (2012). http://digitalcommons.usu.edu/kicjir/vol1/iss2/6 (Accessed November 2013).

Lewis, J., T. M. Woods, R. Zuniga, and E. J. R. David. "The Indigenous Peoples of Alaska: Appreciating the Role of Elders in Shifting Toward a Strength-Based and Culturally Appropriate Approach to Mental Health." Communiqué, v.23-27 (August 2013).

Patterson, D. A., B. Duran, C. N. Dulmus, and A. Manning. "Alcohol Screening and Brief Intervention as Standard Practice: Working With the American Indian/Alaskan Native Population." Journal of Evidence-Based Social Work (in press).

Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services

Based upon epidemiological data individuals from diverse populations are statistically overrepresented in the alcohol and drug abuse treatment population. Compounding this data is the lack of consensus of the term diversity as meaning culture, ethnicity, race, gender, and/or sexual orientation.

In the arena of substance abuse treatment, the majority of programs define diversity as being those clients identified as African Americans, Asians and Pacific Islanders, Hispanics and Latinos, women, and gays/lesbians. Further, specific alcohol and drug abuse treatment programs, based upon state and federal funding priorities, have targeted older adults, children of alcoholics, adolescent Native Americans, athletes, members of the military, the criminal population, and those with disabilities under the concept of diversity. Each of these groups brings to their substance use disorder a unique set of etiologies and needs.

Education and Credentialing Standards

In most states, trust territories, and many foreign countries, treatment of those having alcohol and drug abuse disorders is provided by therapists specifically certified or licensed in alcohol and drug abuse. In most states there is not a specific requirement for education/training in diversity and the varying treatment strategies necessary to effectively treat those from diverse populations. Ethical standards in alcohol and drug abuse counseling do infer the need to be sensitive to diversity in the treatment population, but these ethical standards do not require specific competencies in this arena.

Most states require a written examination to be certified or licensed as an alcohol and drug abuse therapist. In the majority of cases this examination is provided by the International Certification and Reciprocity Consortium. While this test is comprehensive to etiologies and the behaviorally defined 12 core competencies required of an alcohol and drug abuse therapist, it does not explicitly address diversity or specific diverse populations.

In all jurisdictions certifying or licensing alcohol and drug abuse therapists, recertification is required on a periodic basis with documentation of approved continuing education. In many states, this approved continuing education can, but is not required to, address specific diverse populations.

Practicing Alcohol and Drug Abuse Treatment

The majority of alcohol and drug abuse therapists work in detoxification, inpatient, residential, or outpatient programs. In conducting assessment, diagnosis, treatment planning, and implementation of the treatment plan, the therapist must be aware of the specific culture and cultural prohibitions related to the individual client. Only by addressing these cultural considerations relating to the diversity of the client can an effective treatment plan be developed and implemented.

Research has indicated that alcohol and drug abuse clients tend to respond to treatment more positively when the therapist is culturally similar to the clients. As this is not always possible in alcohol and drug abuse treatment settings, research has shown that training therapists on the needs of clients from diverse populations will enable the therapists to assist these clients toward treatment goal attainment.

Alcohol and drug abuse therapists develop treatment plans that address the lifelong recovery paradigm for their clients. As recovery is a lifelong process it is imperative that postformal aspects of the treatment plan return the diverse population client into his or her culture with a bridge to sober living. This also requires the alcohol and drug abuse therapist to have knowledge of and appreciation for the diverse culture in which the client will live the rest of his or her life.

Treatment Funding and Access

Federal data indicates that those individuals from diverse cultures tend to be overrepresented in lacking traditional health insurance or the ability to pay for alcohol and drug abuse treatment services. Unfortunately, state and federal funding for fiscally disadvantaged populations has remained stagnant for the last decade. Alcohol and drug abuse treatment agencies, and therapists, have to be creative in finding access to effective and client-matched treatment for many clients from diverse populations. This means relying on charitable organizations, religious-based charities, or the provision of a set percentage of pro bono services.

Managed care is an overlay of alcohol and drug abuse services provided through Medicaid funding. Many times this requires treatment failure at a less intense treatment setting prior to stepping up to a more intense treatment. As diverse populations are overrepresented in the Medicaid population there is also a higher failure rate for first treatment episodes because of these requirements.

Recovery-Oriented Systems of Care

Recovery-oriented systems of care is the evolving treatment paradigm for alcohol and drug abuse treatment. This paradigm views the formal treatment episode as only the start of recovery. Lifelong recovery is the goal and ongoing assistance from the alcohol and drug abuse treatment organization becomes mandatory. In this recovery-oriented systems of care paradigm, a new form of treatment agent, called a recovery coach, becomes the focal point for the alcohol and drug abuse client postformal treatment. The recovery coach acts in a manner as most coaches, but he or she assists their clients in maintaining their specific recovery plans on a long-term basis. A recovery coach does not need the extensive education and training of an alcohol and drug abuse therapist. Instead this new position requires insight into recovery, and the coach should be from the diverse culture to which the alcohol and drug abuse client will return postformal treatment.

Relapse Prevention in Treatment

Of great concern in the provision of alcohol and drug abuse treatment is the client being able to maintain achieved treatment goals postformal treatment. The recovery-oriented systems of care model addresses one element of this concern. Still, the use of a recovery coach continues to have the client rely on external sources of support. The alcohol and drug abuse therapist must also work with the client to shift this external locus of control to an internal locus of control. This is the basis for relapse prevention treatment and the need for this as part of formal treatment.

Relapse prevention treatment is an educational technique that focuses on significantly increasing the client's coping skills in high-risk situations for relapse. The alcohol and drug abuse therapist takes the client through individual, specific behavioral rehearsals of high-risk situations until the client can positively cope with a sense of comfort in these situations.

With diverse populations it is imperative that the therapist not only be aware of the client's specific diverse culture, but also have a positive appreciation of how individuals in that culture handle stress and coping. Research has shown those alcohol and drug abuse clients coming from diverse cultures enter treatment with more coping skills than those from the majority population. While theories focus on the increased stressors and the necessity for learned coping in diverse populations, the alcohol and drug abuse therapist must access the level of coping skills the client brings to the treatment setting and build from this assessed foundation.

Prevention of Alcohol and Drug Abuse

It is only logical to want to prevent the onset of alcohol and drug abuse, rather than having to intervene and treat these disorders. In providing alcohol and drug abuse prevention services the prevention professional must select or adapt the prevention strategy to the culture of the targeted population. For prevention, the diversity of the targeted population is the most critical variable.

The alcohol and drug abuse prevention professional must be able to adapt the prevention program's content to accommodate the needs of the specific diverse consumer group. In doing this, the prevention agent matches intervention materials and messages to observable characteristics of the diverse target population. This can overtly involve the use of culturally identifiable people, locations, language, music, and products familiar to the diverse target populations. Covertly, this involves focusing on the social, cultural, environmental, and historical aspects of the diverse target population.

Future Directions

While there has been extensive research indicating necessary modifications to traditional alcohol and drug abuse treatment and prevention methods and techniques, for diverse populations this research is only now being integrated into general treatment and prevention models. Additionally, the lack of required diversity education/training specific to the provision of alcohol and drug abuse treatment and prevention services also delays the application of the evidence-based research to actual practice. With the workforce research regarding alcohol and drug abuse therapists and prevention professionals indicating the need for many new professionals (because of the aging of this professional population), it is expected that diversity research will accelerate into practice at a much faster rate.

C. Dennis Simpson
Western Michigan University

See Also: Alcohol Consumption, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Drug and Alcohol Screening; Ethnic Groups and Drug and Alcohol Use.

Further Readings

Lawson, Gary W. and Ann W. Lawson. Alcoholism and Substance Abuse in Diverse Populations. Austin, TX: Pro-Ed, 2011.

Loue, Sana. Diversity Issues in Substance Abuse Treatment and Research. New York: Plenum, 2003.

Straussner, Shulamith Lala Ashenberg, ed. Ethnocultural Factors in Substance Abuse Treatment. New York: Guilford Press, 2003.

Alcohol Consumption, International Variations in Attitudes Toward

Alcohol consumption kills more than 2.5 million people annually, meaning that more people die from alcohol than from AIDS or other diseases. But because of human diversity and with regard to the specific country of origin of a person, there are variations in consumption and in attitudes toward alcohol in general. As a consequence, alcohol-addicted people need a special kind of human service, which deals with the various reasons of their addiction as well. The term alcohol is used here for all kinds of alcoholic drinks like beer, wine, whiskey, or other spirits. Because of this definition, alcohol is one of the most dangerous reasons for the death of many people in many different countries. And in some, the death rate is even increasing. This is not a well-known fact, because alcohol is depicted as "cool" and harmless in the media and daily life, especially by the young generation, which is confronted with alcohol in daily life in many different situations, like parties, the most known being the U.S. spring break season. Celebrities drinking in public create an image of "coolness" in relation to the consumption of alcohol.

A report from the World Health Organization in 2011 stated that globally, people drank an average 6.1 liters of pure alcohol per person in 2005. This amount is dangerous, because that much alcohol consumption is bad for health, causing many people to suffer from diseases caused by alcohol abuse. As a result, health experts from around the world are calling for a more global and standardized regulation of alcohol consumption. This would be a dramatic change, as there are differing attitudes toward alcohol consumption among countries, which are mainly consequences of different regional parameters. There are economic, social, and religious reasons that caused the above-mentioned differences in international attitudes toward alcohol consumption.

A long tradition of alcohol production, the social background, and daily life, as well as religious beliefs, are responsible for the levels of alcohol consumption in different drinking regions around the globe. According to the World Health Organization's report, eastern European states are especially high consumers; however, western European nations are not far behind the per capita consumption of these countries, including the former Soviet republics. Especially with regard to the age limit, which generally ranges between 16 and 21 years, the average age of the purchaser of alcohol (on-premise service or off-premise purchase) is very low (16). This fact is just a consequence of economic influences, determining the direction of the European alcohol industry.

Economic Reasons

Alcohol consumption is an economic factor that is important for the wine and beer industries in many countries. It is not astonishing that countries with an extensive tradition in beer-brewing like the Czech Republic, Ireland, or Germany show a high per capita beer consumption, ranging from 7 to more than 9 liters per person per year. The same tradition is traceable in wine-producing countries like France, Portugal, or Italy, where the annual wine-drinking per capita ranges from 7 to over 9 liters per person per year as well. What could be applied to wine and beer is also effective in the case of whiskey. Irish and Scottish people, especially, drink a lot of whiskey, which is produced in these countries. Because of the mentioned trends, it is obvious that these countries gain money by placing alcohol taxes on the sales of beer, wine, or whiskey. Furthermore, the economies of the mentioned countries are dependent on alcohol sales or exports to other countries. This makes it clear that such countries, which are alcohol-producing nations, are not too strict in their policies against alcohol consumption. There are lobbies for beer, wine, and pure spirits, whose members are eager to circumvent an aggravation of national policies against excessive alcohol consumption. But there is not only an economic origin of increased alcohol consumption in several countries; there are social reasons as well.

Social Reasons

Generally speaking, well-educated people with a stable social background drink less alcohol than poorer people in an unstable social environment. Unemployment, a lack of prospects, or increasing poverty pave the way for higher alcohol consumption, especially in the member states of the former Soviet Union, where the per capita consumption of alcohol is very high. Young people without a rosy perspective tend to start drinking at a younger age. When parents are heavy drinkers, children begin to imitate their habits as well. This is not the only problem in deprived nations, where more people are dying from alcohol consumption. Poverty is forcing people to produce alcohol on their own, which might cause a faster death by alcoholic cirrhosis. This unrecorded and so-called moonshine accounts for 30 percent of alcohol consumed globally. The home-brewed liquors are often responsible for dangerous diseases or deaths, because most "brewers" use prohibited substances to extend the strength of the self-made alcoholic beverages.

In addition to the danger of unofficially produced alcohol, a higher rate of young alcoholics is traced to such countries, which often do not have a national alcohol policy at all. Where the state is not trying to regulate alcohol consumption using laws or stricter control of young people's drinking habits, more youths become addicted and finally harmed by alcohol abuse. Only 31 percent of the World Health Organization (WHO) members possess such a policy, but a policy alone does not guarantee a decrease in alcohol consumption. The United States attempted to forbid the consumption of alcohol during the years of Prohibition, which led to criminalization. Furthermore, the illegally sold alcohol was more harmful than the officially sold brews. In countries like Finland, where the prices for alcohol are very high, the per capita consumption is not lower than Russian consumption. There is no traceable formula to define the per capita rate of alcohol consumption for a given country, but there is one decisive factor. The lowest alcohol consumption rates can be found in North Africa, the Middle East, Pakistan, and Indonesia. The reason for these statistics does have a religious origin: Islam.

Religious Reasons

In countries where most people are of the Islamic faith, the alcohol consumption per capita per year is at the lowest level. The explanation for this is simple: Islam forbids the consumption of alcohol, especially in countries where sharia provides the fundamental law, it is forbidden to drink wine, beer, or pure spirits at all. Since the establishment of Islamic religious beliefs during the time of Muhammad, Muslims have not been allowed to drink alcohol. The sharia is very strict in cases of disregard for this prohibition. This leads to an almost totally abstinent society in these countries. Consequently, the populations in Islamic countries do not suffer from deaths related to alcohol abuse, even if there are some more liberal Islamic states where the consumption of alcohol is increasing. In contrast to this, in Christian-dominated countries, alcohol consumption is not forbidden by religious beliefs, shown by the comparison of the per capita consumption rate between Islamic and Christian nations.

Solutions

There are different parameters defining the grade of alcohol consumption in countries around the globe. To obtain a unified international attitude toward alcohol consumption, the WHO has to deal with the above-discussed reasons. There should be more member states adopting national policies against alcohol consumption, and at first glance, there is a higher need for preventive measures. People, especially children, need to be informed about the consequences of excessive alcohol consumption. Liver cirrhosis, renal diseases, and other longtime consequences should be discussed in schools and at home to prevent children from getting into contact with alcohol. The state has to regulate the opportunities to buy alcohol. There must be strict age restrictions in combination with more active clarification of the negative facts of alcohol consumption. Furthermore, the international community has to act in agreement to protect future generations from becoming alcohol addicts.

Frank Jacob
City University of New York

See Also: Abuse and Neglect; Adult Education Programs and Services; Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Children of Substance Abusers; Children With Special Needs; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Insurance; Health Promotion Services; Medical Necessity; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Anton, Raymond F. The Pharmacology of Alcohol Abuse. Berlin: Springer, 1995.

Boyd, Gayle M. Alcohol and the Family: Opportunities for Prevention. Piscataway, NJ: Center of Alcohol Studies, 1999.
Davies, Phil, et al. Alcohol Problems and Alcohol Control in Europe. London: Croom Helm, 1983.
Litten, Raye Z. Measuring Alcohol Consumption: Psychological and Biochemical Methods. Totowa, NJ: Humana Press, 1992.
World Health Organization. Global Status Report on Alcohol and Health. Geneva: World Health Organization, 2011.

Alloparenting, Cultural Aspects of

The term alloparenting originated in a sociobiological context and was coined in 1975 by the evolutionary biologist Edward O. Wilson. The word alloparent comes from the Greek root allo, which means other, and the Latin root word parens, which means parents. Wilson paired these two words to designate any person other than the biological mother or father who cares for a child an “allocare,” or “other parent.” In the field of human services this type of parenting is called alloparenting. Alloparenting is defined as being part of a parenting system in which individuals other than the actual parents act in a parental role to children who are not their own. In Western culture this largely refers to grandparents and siblings.

About a decade prior to the word’s derivation, British geneticist William D. Hamilton proposed that as part of the parenting process, individuals who are not biological relatives should help parents by taking on parental roles when the benefits to children who receive this form of child care outweigh the costs. From this theory, he coined the term Hamilton’s rule, which is often preferred to “allocare” because it is a better description of child care by individuals other than relatives. The individual who typically takes on this parental role is a relative, but this is not always the case.

Why Provide Allocare?

The concept of acting as a parent to a child that is not one’s own can seem like a waste of time to some; moreover, the logic of alloparenting can seem maladaptive, and sometimes it is. To some people it makes more sense to have a family of their own; however, research shows that despite these assumptions, the human species continues to show the opposite behavior.

When examining the reasons why an individual would choose to provide allocare it is important not to assume the act of alloparenting is always an altruistic behavior—a genuine act of good for the welfare of the child. Alloparents can have ulterior motives for choosing to care for children who are not their own, such as the hardwiring of the brain to display this type of care for others, or being driven by emotions that stimulate self-interest (education and play, reciprocation, and genetic interest). Research suggests that often young, childless women will spend time around mothers looking for an opportunity to have contact with their children. This can be seen as an opportunity for an immature individual to have a chance to “practice” mothering. Some provide allocare with an expectation of reciprocation, which may create positive social bonds within the social unit.

Finally, children who receive alloparenting may benefit more than their nonalloparented counterparts. Rather than being guarded from danger or harm, children can be exposed to caretakers who are invested in their well-being. This also provides the child with exposure to a variety of individuals, which may demonstrate what is and is not acceptable behavior from a parent.

Cross-Cultural Perspective

Several cross-cultural studies have looked at the effects of alloparenting. Studies have shown that multiple allocarers are a common feature in many societies and this form of parenting appears to work. Western culture, however, is not as certain about this. Some research challenges this notion and states that children who spend more time in child care (cared for by multiple people) are more likely to display more aggressive and antisocial behavior when attending elementary school. On the other hand, children who spend more time in child care can demonstrate higher levels of cognitive functioning and linguistic development.

Although the evolutionary evidence may suggest otherwise, the North American and European psychological and social welfare literature is focused on the nuclear family as a support system. The nuclear family includes the biological mother and father, children, and sometimes grandparents. Conventionally, Western culture makes assumptions about how biological parents should parent their children, and society as a whole is likely to negatively judge any pattern in parenting that does not include the biological parents. This causes all kinds of agonies for biological parents and nuclear families.

When examining the culture of alloparenting—if it exists—several factors to consider include, but are not limited to: socioeconomic status, age, family size, and education. The extent to which alloparenting may or may not take place can be determined by some of these factors. For example, someone living in a household with several children, step-children, grandparents, and sometimes even grandchildren might have another adult relative take care of the small children. This can be because of the biological parents' minimal income, work schedules, or minimal parenting skills.

As a final note to alloparenting, there is not one "right" way to provide parental or alloparental care. Instead biological parents and other caregivers integrate a variety of approaches and methods that are dependent on specific cultural, economic, and ecological conditions. Many authors write about approaches to parenting that are better or worse than others, and while this may work well in one context or for one family, it may not work well for another. One of the most important things to consider in the field of human services is the long-term well-being and health of individuals and their family system. Finally, the biggest challenge in understanding alloparenting across cultures is not to alter different perspectives—if they exist—but to find ways to wade through transitions and different understandings while being aware of one's own.

Monique N. Mercado
St. Mary's University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Kinship Care; Kinship Care, Cultural Aspects of; Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in.

Further Readings

Ahnert, L. L. "Parenting and Alloparenting: The Impact on Attachment in Humans." In C. S. Carter et al., eds. Attachment and Bonding: A New Synthesis. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2005.

Bentley, G. and R. Mace. Substitute Parents: Biological and Social Perspectives on Alloparenting in Human Societies. New York: Berghahn Books, 2012.

Harkness, S. and C. Super, eds. Parents' Cultural Belief Systems: Their Origin, Expressions and Consequences. London: Guildford Press, 1996.

Alternative Medical Systems

Academic medicine is no longer the only way to treat people who are suffering from pain or chronic diseases. A growing number of men and women prefer to use alternative medical systems to cure or palliate their illnesses. Some of these alternative medical systems, like ayurvedic or traditional Chinese remedies, have their origins in Asia; some, like homeopathy and naturopathy, were established in Europe. No matter where these systems originated, more and more patients are willing to use alternative treatments to get rid of their pain. For this reason, it is not strange that these systems are a growing factor in the medical field in Europe and the United States. In general, all of these methods are regularly used because they are meant to heal the body by using the body itself or natural essences. All of the aforementioned alternative systems are traditional ones, but each has its own origins and methods. Despite their diversity, all alternative systems can look back on a long tradition.

Ayurveda

The ayurveda medical system can be traced to ancient India, where it was developed. Today it is widely used in India, Nepal, and Sri Lanka, but there is a growing Western community whose members prefer this form of Indian medicine to the academic one. According to ayurveda theory, there are different energies and temperaments, the so-called three doshas (vata for wind, pitta for fire, and kapha for earth), for each part of the body. If the balance of these three body-influencing factors is disordered, a person will become sick. The ayurveda medical system aims to renew the balance of these three doshas to cure the illness. To achieve this goal, ayurveda massages, a special diet, spiritual yoga, and the healing abilities of medical plants can be used. Regarding the diet and medical plants, ayurveda practices have some overlap with the traditional Chinese medical system.

Traditional Chinese System

As the name makes obvious, this medical system was developed over the last two and a half millennia in China. It was used in one form or another throughout eastern Asia, especially in Vietnam, Korea, and Japan, where special variants of the Chinese system are still in use. The patient is cured by a mixture of different methods, which in combination should strengthen the body‘s qi—the most basic substance of which the world is composed. In addition to medicine, acupuncture; moxibustion; massages like shiatsu, qi gong, or tai chi; and a special diet are used to cure several diseases. The Chinese traditional system uses hundreds of different substances as medicines, including parts of snakes and other animals, minerals, or medical plants that are able to help the patient if they are used in the correct way, for the right disease, and in combination with other methods. In contrast to the Chinese medical system, which involves curing with a combination of substances, homeopathy uses another method of healing.

Homeopathy

This medical system was invented by the German doctor Samuel Hahnemann (1755-1843) and was published as early as 1796. Hahnemann wanted to cure diseases using medicine that had similar, harmful elements to the patient’s disease. His basic belief was similia similibus curentur—“likes are cured by likes”—and this philosophy is still used for the creation of homeopathic medicine today. Homeopathic medicines are chosen for their influence on healthy persons, as these treatments arouse the same symptoms of an ill person. To select the correct medicine, Hahnemann created medical tables that provided special medicines for each disease.

To create homeopathic medicine, the fundamental elements are potentized (usually using the proportion of 1 to 10 or 1 to 100) repeatedly, using water, ethanol, and sugar found in milk. This process was vital, because many substances were poisonous in their original form. Supporters of academic medicine criticize homeopathy because most of the elements are not traceable after the process of potentialization; but many people continue to buy and use homeopathic medicine because they believe in its effects. There are definitely cases when this kind of medicine can help the patient.

Naturopathy

Other alternative medical methods include the Asian variants that are used by naturopathy, which aims to activate the self-healing ability of the body. This should be done using natural medicines or impulses, like sunlight, fresh air, movement, relaxation, water, earth, controlled breathing, and even emotions or one’s own will. All these impulses are able to influence the body‘s healing process. During this process, natural medicine made of plants is used as an additional element of treatment. The definition of treatment is not always exact, which makes it difficult to determine the naturopathy needed for each individual case because there are similar therapies used by other systems that could be defined as naturopathy. The pioneer of this field was Christoph Wilhelm Hufeland (1763-1836), a German physician who made the first experiments with naturopathy. Today there are different methods of naturopathy such as hydrotherapy, diets, or aromatherapy, which can be helpful in treating different ailments.

Growing Popularity of Alternative Medical Systems

All of the aforementioned alternative medical systems are popular today. More and more people are doubtful about academic medicine, which is why a growing number of patients are asking for an alternative method of treatment. There are research centers for alternative systems, especially for the Asian traditional systems used by Western physicians. As a consequence of the ease and locality of different alternative systems, people tend to try these new forms of medicine. Many hospitals and health resorts currently offer both academic and alternative medical systems. People have to decide which medical treatment is most suitable, because some people may be cured by alternative methods, while others do not believe in their success. Because of human diversity, human services professionals, and especially medical service providers, need to be open to alternative approaches, originating from a range of cultural heritages, that can be used for traditional and alternative medical systems in Asia and Europe.

Frank Jacob
Julius-Maximilians-Universität Würzburg

See Also: Health and Sickness, Differing Attitudes Toward; Health as a Human Right; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Medicaid; Medical Necessity; Medical Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for; Medical Supplies, Access to; Medicare; Outpatient Medical Care; Pain Management; Public Health.

Further Readings

Dean, Michael Emmans. The Trials of Homeopathy: Origins, Structure and Development. Essen, Germany: KVC-Verlag, 2004.

Jütte, Robert, Guenter B. Risse, and John Woodward. Culture, Knowledge and Healing: Historical Perspectives of Homeopathic Medicine in Europe and North America. Sheffield, UK: European Association for the History of Medical Health Publications, 1998.

Lochan, Kanjiv. Dictionary of Ayurveda. Varanasi, India: Chaukhambha Sanskrit Bhawan, 2004.

Sivin, Nathan: Traditional Medicine in Contemporary China. Ann Arbor: Center for Chinese Studies, University of Michigan, 1987.

Svoboda, Robert. Ayurveda: Life, Health and Longevity. New Delhi, India: Penguin Books, 1993.

Sweet, Victoria. Rooted in the Earth, Rooted in the Sky: Hildegard von Bingen and Premodern Medicine. New York: Routledge, 2006.

Xie, Zhufan. Dictionary of Traditional Chinese Medicine. Hong Kong: Commercial Press, 1984.

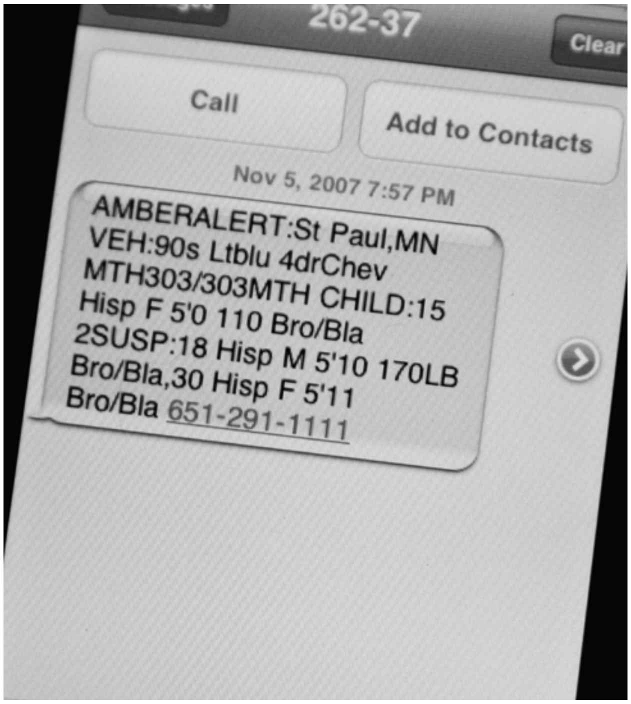
AMBER Alert

AMBER Alert is a human services instrument that aids families and law enforcement agencies in diverse communities and nations in order to find missing children whose lives are in danger. In addition, public programs of AMBER Alert have made use of diverse disciplines in order to improve the programs as well as investigate child abductions through establishing working teams that include law enforcement, legal agencies, social services agencies, communications, emergency management personnel, and others. Even though communities and nations have their own versions of AMBER Alert programs, they seek the same goal and follow the same basic practices, having been adapted from a sample that was developed following a tragic event that occurred in the United States.

Amber Hagerman, a 9-year-old girl, rode her bike near her home in Arlington, Texas, in 1996, when a stranger in a black pickup truck abducted her. The stranger killed Amber and dumped her body in a drainage ditch near her home. Amber's abduction and murder horrified parents, and soon elected officials and policy makers responded. Amber's killing prompted public discussions about whether an emergency alert system might have saved her life. Local broadcasters and police in Dallas, Texas, implemented the AMBER Alert Plan a year later. AMBER was soon adopted and spread across Texas and throughout the United States. The AMBER Alert Plan diffused across national borders and spread to Europe and Australia, among other places, and many countries retained the name: the AMBER Alert Plan.



Nov 5, 2007 7:57 PM

AMBERALERT:St Paul,MN
VEH:90s Ltblu 4drChev
MTH303/303MTH CHILD:15
Hisp F 5'0 110 Bro/Bla
2SUSP:18 Hisp M 5'10 170LB
Bro/Bla,30 Hisp F 5'11
Bro/Bla 651-291-1111

In addition to television and radio stations, AMBER alerts are now redistributed over the Internet and via wireless to specific targets such as cell phones and e-mail accounts.

The program's objective is clear: rescue abducted children whose lives are in danger. The AMBER Alert Plan activates an early warning, public dissemination campaign through AMBER Alerts transmitted over communication networks. The AMBER Alert Report issued by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) reported in 2011 that the system saved hundreds of lives. A few research studies to date have investigated the effect of AMBER Alerts on abducted children's rescue operations.

AMBER Alerts operate on the premise that public notification mobilizes people by increasing citizens' hypervigilance and likelihood of reporting tips that assist in the rescue of children within the first critical hours after abduction. M. K. Brown and colleagues found that a majority of murdered children are killed within the first critical three hours. Authorities argue that as time passes after the abduction, the likelihood of a successful recovery decreases. Research supports authorities' argument: homicide investigations of abducted children stress action within the first three hours after abduction to increase the likelihood of recovering these children.

The American version of the AMBER Alert Plan, known as America's Missing: Broadcast Emergency Response, was codified into federal law by the 2003 Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to End the Exploitation of Children Today (PROTECT) Act. Endorsed by federal law, AMBER Alert plans operate by local, regional, and state governmental agencies through AMBER Alert communications networks. The coordination of AMBER Alert planning was provided by the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) (see http://www.amber-net.org; http://www.amberalert.gov) in cooperation with the NCMEC, which serves as a national resource center and information clearinghouse on missing children.

The criteria recommended by the DOJ for issuing an AMBER Alert include law enforcement agencies' belief that an abduction of a child aged 17 years or younger has occurred and that a child faces imminent danger of serious bodily injury or death. There must be sufficient descriptive information on the victim and incident in order to help receive citizen tips. The AMBER Alert system broadcasts on alerts on television and radio stations and relies on the coordination between voluntary broadcasters and law enforcement agencies. Television and radio broadcasts and electronic highway signs are a main source for the public notification of the most serious child abductions. Alerts are redistributed through the Internet and wireless devices to specific targets, like truck drivers in specific areas, e-mail accounts, and cell phone and other wireless consumers.

An AMBER Alert may be issued by law enforcement on a state, regional (multiple counties), or local level as well as multiterritorial levels. The geographic area of an alert is determined based on law enforcement's investigation. Law enforcement agencies empower the AMBER Alert Plan. Thousands of police agencies across America gather information and respond immediately to locate a child. A rapid and public response to abduction frequently increases scrutiny of an abductor. Some abductors have felt the pressure of public scrutiny and released the child or surrendered to law enforcement.

Some evidence indicates the success of the AMBER Alert program, but scientific studies are lacking. A majority of success stories usually do not include life-threatening circumstances: abduction by a noncustodial parent. A rapid recovery of an abducted child has not been shown to be a direct effect of AMBER Alerts. Research indicates that life-threatening child abductions are rare, and that law enforcement agencies overuse the alert system.

Questions about AMBER Alert's effectiveness remain: (1) Do alerts mobilize the public to action? (2) How does public mobilization occur? (3) Are stunned bystanders able to process sufficient information to initiate an alert and convey accurate information about a victim and perpetrator? (4) Does the public feel sufficient empathy to report their sightings of an allegedly abducted child? (5) Does overuse of the alert system adversely affect the chance of recovering abducted children? (6) Are there potentially effective alternative strategies and approaches for the public dissemination of information about child abduction? These questions await answers, and until then, the AMBER Alert Plan remains active in the unfortunate cases of child abduction.

Murat Koçak
Independent Scholar

See Also: Abduction; Child Protective Services; National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

Further Readings

Brown, M. Katherine, Robert D. Keppel, Joseph G. Weis, and Marvin E. Skeen. "Investigative Case Management for Missing Children Homicides: Report II." Rob McKenna, Attorney General of Washington, and U.S. Department of Justice Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, 2006.

Greer, Jennifer D., Po-Lin Pan, David Flores, and Marti Cecilia Collins. "Priming and Source Credibility Effects on Individual Responses to AMBER and Other Mediated Missing Child Alerts." Social Science Journal, v.49 (2012).

Griffin, Timothy. "An Empirical Examination of AMBER Alert 'Successes.'" Journal of Criminal Justice, v.38 (2010).

National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. "2011 AMBER Alert Report." http://www.amberalert.gov (Accessed July 2013).

Pashley, Veerle, Els Enhus, and Mark Leys. 'Child Alert': Public Information Dissemination of Child Disappearances. Brussels: Child Focus, (2010).

Zgoba, Kristen. "The Amber Alert: The Appropriate Solution to Preventing Child Abduction?" Journal of Psychiatry & Law, v.32 (2004).

American Academy of Social Work and Social Welfare

The formation of the American Academy of Social Work and Social Welfare (AASWSW) was announced on Friday, November 6, 2009. This milestone development resulted from years of planning and discussion among professional social work organizations, which included mostly the Saint Louis Group and the Council on Social Work Education. The academy is viewed as a mechanism that will enable the profession of social work to better respond to the growing demand for vigorous circumspection that can guide effective human services policies, programs, and practices.

The academy is an honorific society. Membership in the society is composed of distinguished practitioners and scholars in the field of social work and social welfare who are dedicated to achieving excellence through high-impact work that advances social good. The academy's board of directors is responsible for developing a process to solicit nominations and make the selection of new fellows. The board also provides oversight of the business operations of the academy that promote its success and sustainability. Included in the board's vision is that the academy will strengthen social work's capacity to provide benefits to the wider society.

The academy was established to perform the following functions:

- Encourage and recognize outstanding research, scholarship, and practice that contribute to a sustainable, equitable, and just future
- Inform social policy by serving as a frontline source of information for the social work profession as well as Congress and other government agencies and nongovernment entities charged with advancing the public good
- Promote the examination of social policy and the application of research to test alternative policies, programs, and practices for their impact on society
- Celebrate excellence in social work and social welfare research, education, and practice

As an independent entity, the academy is registered with the state of Ohio with a virtual office located at the Mandel School of Applied Social Sciences of Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland. The commitment of the academy to social work as a profession and to social welfare from a policy perspective is influenced by a history of social welfare development in the United States.

The Academy and Social Work Profession

Among the motivations for the formation of the academy is the dedication to achieving excellence in the field of social work and thereby contributing to the reduction of societal problems. The profession of social work was born of a desire to provide needful human services to those without resources of recompense. Social work aims to ameliorate social problems. Social workers respond to the problems that hinder optimal functioning for individuals, families, groups, organizations, and communities. A challenging profession, social work helps people address such problems as poverty, marital conflict, parent-child conflict, delinquency, health and mental issues, substance abuse, and abuse and neglect.

Social work can be said to have originated in ancient times, when all major religions encouraged people to help the poor. Therefore, social work began thousands of years ago, when human beings started to perform charity work. Modern U.S. social work has its roots in the mass migrations of the 19th century and the Industrial Revolution era that led to a number of social problems in England and the United States. Jane Addams was one of the first social workers in the United States, who in 1889 with Ellen Gates Starr founded a settlement house in Chicago, called the Hull House, to work with the poor and immigrant communities. Modeled after the Toynbee Hall settlement house in London, Hull House utilized a family focus and advocacy approach to influence the community to correct the dolorous social conditions under which the poor were living. The influence of the Charity Organization Society and the settlement movement sparked the beginning of modern U.S. social work, which is regarded as one of the most efficient and effective practices in the world.

The Academy and Social Welfare

The academy is dedicated to performing actions that influence social policy and the social welfare system and contribute to a sustainable, equitable, and just future. Social welfare encompasses those goods and services that are collectively believed to fulfill the social, economic, health, and recreational needs of everyone in a society. The history of social welfare in the United States began long before government welfare programs were created. The British Elizabethan Poor Law of 1601 was imported to the American colonies. This legislation was the major codification dealing with poor and disadvantaged people in England and became the basis for dealing with the poor in colonial America.

Prior to the 1850s, most social services in the United States were delivered by religious organizations, family-based groups, and private charities. During the 1850s and 1860s, the federal government established the Freedman's Bureau. Many mental asylums, orphanages, and poor houses were also established at the state level. In 1862, a Civil War pension was created for veterans and their families. The history of modern American social welfare began with the stock market crash in 1929, and the resulting Great Depression of the 1930s.

During the depression, millions of people suffered from extreme hunger and poverty. People lost all of their savings and means of income, and many resorted to looting and violence to feed themselves and their children. More than 31 million single mothers, people with disabilities, and the elderly were starving. There was unusual turmoil, unrest, and a heightened amount of criminal activities. President Franklin D. Roosevelt proclaimed a New Deal in 1933, which established numerous major social welfare programs to address poverty and unemployment. In 1935, the Social Security Act was enacted. In 1996, under President Bill Clinton, the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) portion of welfare benefits was replaced with the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF).

The American Academy of Social Work and Social Welfare, through its membership of accomplished scholars, provides leadership and gatekeeping through research, education, and practice. The academy is committed to strengthening the safety net for American people, families, and communities.

Felix O. Chima
Prairie View A&M University

See Also: Code of Ethics of the National Association of Social Workers; Council on Social Work Education; International Federation of Social Workers; Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in; Social Work, Diversity Practice in; Social Work Practice and People of Color; Social Workers.

Further Readings

Ambrosino, R., J. Heffernan, G. Shuttlesworth, and R. Ambrosino. Social Work and Social Welfare: An Introduction, 7th ed. Belmont., CA: Brooks/Cole, 2012.

Jansson, B. S. The Reluctant Welfare State: Engaging History to Advance Social Work Practice in Contemporary Society, 7th ed. Belmont, CA: Brook/Cole, 2012.

Zastrow, C. Introduction to Social Work and Social Welfare: Empowering People, 10th ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 2010.

American Correctional Association

The American Correctional Association (ACA) is the world's oldest and largest international correctional association. Representing and serving all disciplines within the correctional profession for more than 140 years, the ACA has championed the cause of corrections and correctional effectiveness. ACA serves as a comprehensive resource that can assist with a broad spectrum of correctional services, including professional development, networking, consulting, employment, certifications, standards, accreditation, publishing, research, technology, testing, and conferences. The ACA has a constitution and bylaws, a code of ethics, and a set of general operating principles.

ACA professional membership is composed of individuals, agencies, and organizations involved in all aspects of corrections, including adult and juvenile services, community corrections, probation, parole, and jails. Adult and juvenile correctional facilities, jails, and corrections programs throughout the world are accredited based on compliance with standards established by ACA's Commission on Accreditation for Corrections. The standards are used widely by correctional practitioners and administrators and address all aspects of confinement, housing, health care, supervision, and professional training. In 2013, the ACA had approximately 20,000 individual members in the United States, Canada, and other nations, and included approximately 75 chapters and affiliates representing other countries, states, provinces, regions, and professional specialties. The association also has 20 standing committees and 18 ad hoc committees that help achieve its vision and mission. Each year at its winter and summer conferences the association presents awards to recognize professionals who have dedicated their careers to ensuring the integrity and vitality of the corrections profession. The association also maintains an active job bank accessible from its Web site, http://www.aca.org.

The American Correctional Association has a vision statement, a mission, and eight goals that were approved by its Delegate Assembly at the 132nd Congress of Corrections in 2002. The vision statement is: "The American Correctional Association shapes the future of corrections through strong, progressive leadership that brings together various voices and forges coalitions and partnerships to promote the concepts embodied in its Declaration of Principles." The mission is: "The American Correctional Association provides a professional organization for all individuals and groups, both public and private that share a common goal of improving the justice system." The eight current ACA goals relate to the following areas: (1) expanding membership; (2) promoting diversity; (3) providing professional development opportunities; (4) ensuring the integrity of standards and accreditation processes; (5) collaborating on research and education activities; (6) promoting a positive public perception of corrections; (7) developing international relations; and (8) promoting ethics within the justice profession.

The American Correctional Association's current constitution and bylaws were approved and implemented by its membership in August 2013. The constitution and bylaws provide guidance, goals, and a sense of the spirit that drives the association. These materials reflect 143 years of revisions, changes, and challenges, documenting shifts in perceptions and policies while remaining true to the association's values.

History of the Association

Founded in 1870 as the National Prison Association (NPA), the American Correctional Association is the oldest association developed specifically for correctional practitioners. In 1907, the NPA was renamed the American Prison Association (APA). At the 1954 Congress of Correction held in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the name of the APA was subsequently changed to the American Correctional Association to reflect the expanding correctional philosophy and the organization's increasingly important role within the community and society as a whole. During its first organizational meeting in 1870, the ACA assembly elected Rutherford B. Hayes as the first president of the association. At that time Hayes was governor of Ohio, and he was later elected the 19th president of the United States. ACA developed its Declaration of Principles at its inaugural meeting in 1870; this document went on to become the correctional guidelines used in the United States and Europe. Successive generations of corrections practitioners revised the principles in 1930, 1960, 1970, and 1982.

The American Correctional Association believes that the principles of humanity, justice, protection, opportunity, knowledge, competence, and accountability are essential to the foundation of sound corrections policy and effective public protection. Guided by its Declaration of Principles, the ACA seeks to benefit from the heritage of the past, plan and prepare for the future, and lead and serve the correctional profession.

The ACA's principle of humanity asserts that, "the dignity of individuals, the rights of all people, and the potential for human growth and development must be respected." The principle of justice states, "Corrections must demonstrate integrity, respect, dignity, fairness, and pursue a balanced program of humaneness, restoration, rehabilitation, and the most appropriate sanctions consistent with public safety."

The protection principle maintains, "Corrections has a duty to ensure the protection of the public, offenders under corrections supervision, corrections workers, and victims and survivors of crime." The principle of opportunity affirms that, "Corrections is responsible for providing programs and constructive activities that promote positive change for responsible citizenship."

The knowledge principle states, "Corrections must be committed to pursuing a continual search for new knowledge, technological advances, and effective practices that strive toward excellence and positive change." The principle of competence stipulates, "Corrections administrators, supervisors, and line employees must be professionally competent and committed to conducting their responsibilities in accordance with professional standards." The accountability principle asserts, "Corrections officials shall ensure accountability in regard to the treatment and management of offenders, selection and performance of staff, and the interface with the community and victims."

Because ethical conduct is paramount in the corrections profession, ACA established a Committee on Ethics. In August 1994 the Board of Governors and Delegate Assembly formally adopted the ACA's Code of Ethics.

The American Correctional Association works to shape public policy on correctional issues in a manner consistent with its' founding principles, constitution and bylaws, vision statement, public policies, and resolutions. The Government and Public Affairs Department (GPAD), in partnership with the Legislative Affairs Committee, develops the association's position on public policy issues and represents the association before Congress, federal executive agencies, state and local governments, advocacy and interest groups, the media, and the general public. GPAD is responsible for monitoring, tracking, and analyzing legislative activity for the association and disseminating information to policy makers, advocacy groups, and the media as well as ACA members.

M. Scott Young
Roger H. Peters
University of South Florida

See Also: Community Corrections; Jail Diversion Programs for Children and Adolescents; Juvenile Justice System; Prisoner Reentry Programs; Probation and Parole Officers.

Further Readings

American Correctional Association. "Constitution and Bylaws." http://www.aca.org/pastpresentfuture/constitution06.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

American Correctional Association. "Standards for Adult Correctional Institutions." Alexandria, VA: American Correctional Association, 2006.

Travisono, Anthony P. and Mary Q. Hawkes. Building a Voice: 125 Years of History. Alexandria, VA: American Correctional Association, 1995.

American Indian Movement

The American Indian Movement (AIM) emerged in the summer of 1968. Months earlier, on April 4, Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in Memphis, Tennessee. A few days later, on April 11, President Lyndon B. Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act of 1968. Senator Robert F. Kennedy was assassinated in June. Amid this atmosphere of unrest and demands for social change, Dennis Banks and George Mitchell organized a meeting to discuss the issues faced by American Indians. The meeting would launch a civil rights movement that focused national attention on the discrimination and injustice faced by American Indians.

Initially AIM focused on local police brutality and later expanded its goals to include treaty rights. The group participated and organized several occupations, most notably a 71-day standoff at Wounded Knee, South Dakota. With AIM's increased visibility, frustrated family members of Indian victims approached the group for assistance in seeking truth and justice. AIM filled the void when tribal councils and the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) did not intervene. Today, AIM is still engaged in promoting Indians' rights, spirituality, education, leadership development, and sovereignty in urban areas and on reservations.

The Beginning

On July 28, 1968, a community meeting took place in the basement of a rundown church in the American Indian ghetto in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Dennis Banks and his friend from boarding school, George Mitchell, organized the meeting to discuss concerns of American Indians. The two organizers shared the experiences common to their generation. At that time, Indian children were forced to attend white boarding schools and forbidden to retain their traditional ways of life (in today's view, a form of cultural genocide). BIA agents bused these children away from their familiar homes and communities. At the boarding schools, Indian children had to learn white people's language and culture, yet they later found they were blocked from securing good jobs. For example, Banks held various minimum-wage jobs and barely got by. In May 1968, he was just released from the state prison at Stillwater. The original charge was stealth of 16 bags of groceries to feed his family of 10. He had been sentenced to five years imprisonment, whereas a white accomplice had received two years of probation. His experience was a microcosm of American Indians' lives: desperate poverty was rampant, unsanitary housing conditions were the norm, health care was lacking, unemployment was chronically high, and alcohol-related arrests were common.

During the 1960s, when American society was experiencing social and political unrest (e.g., the civil rights movement, protests against the Vietnam War, student strikes), Banks questioned: What were the roles of American Indians amid the waves of citizens' calls for change? This question was the reason he decided to organize a community meeting. He hoped to have 40 to 50 attendees, however, nearly 200 people showed up. Clyde Bellecourt was present at the meeting, as were Mary Jane Wilson, Eddie Benton-Banai, Harold Goodsky, Francis Fairbanks, Girlie Brown, and others. Banks, Bellecourt, and Benton-Banai had all served time in the state prison at Stillwater for various charges. The Minneapolis American Indian community was ready for an Indian rights organization to address concerns and seek solutions. AIM was born, and AIM Patrol was formed to protect local Indians from police brutality and racist treatment. Bellecourt was the first chairman of AIM and Banks the first field director.

Police brutality in Minneapolis came in the form of a manhunt of Indians based on a quota system. The police arrested about 200 Indians every week. Every Saturday night at 10 o'clock the police would raid two Indian bars and arrest the customers for drunk and disorderly conduct. The "lawbreakers" would be ordered to work without pay as punishment for their "offense." Only when the work was completed would the free laborers be released from the workhouse, farms, or city projects. The Indians made up about 1 percent of the state population, yet they were overrepresented in the state's incarcerated population (more than one-third of prison inmates were Indians). In addition, one-third of American Indians in Minnesota resided in the city slums of Minneapolis (most of them were from the Anishinabe tribe). To make matters worse, the Minneapolis police chief denied his department engaged in racist practices.

AIM Patrol members were on a mission. They wore red jackets and drove red cars to pull drunken Indians from the bars and take them home before the police arrived. As a result, arrests decreased considerably. AIM Patrol also collected evidence of racist treatment and police brutality toward American Indians for the police chief's reference.

Expansion and Networking

In the two years after the initial meeting, AIM's membership grew to 5,000. In 1969, AIM expanded to Cleveland upon Russell Means's invitation. Months later, the Cleveland chapter of AIM was established and Means joined AIM. Then, Herb Powless requested to set up a chapter in Milwaukee. In five years, AIM had 71 chapters in the United States and eight chapters in Canada. Hence, AIM expanded from its local focus to become an international organization.

With AIM reaching out beyond the city limits of Minneapolis, Banks started searching for and acquainting himself with Indian spirituality. This was a period of cultural and spiritual enlightenment for him and AIM's other young leaders. They were removed from their native cultures, and the cultural gap between Indian elders and youth was as wide as a gulf. Gradually, medicine men (spiritual leaders), sweat lodges, Sun Dances, sacred ceremonies, powwows, drums, and Ghost Dances were integrated with AIM activities. Spirituality, leadership, and sovereignty became the pillars of AIM.

AIM accomplished several firsts for American Indians. The organization was responsible for creating the first Indian Health Board in Minneapolis (1969), which provided direct health care; the first Legal Aid Society (1970); an Indian housing and moving program; a radio station, KUXL, which broadcast programs on Indian issues; and the first alternative schools for Indian children—the Red School House in St. Paul, Minnesota, and the Heart of the Earth Survival School in Minneapolis (1972). In addition, the Indian Education Act was adopted in 1972; Title IV of this law provides a legal foundation that Indian education should be based on Indian culture and a culturally sensitive curriculum. American Indians desperately wanted their own survival schools rather than having to attend white boarding schools. At the time, this goal was unique and contradictory to the ongoing desegregation and busing in American public schools.

First Exposure

On November 9, 1969, Richard Oaks and 40 members of the Bay Area Council of American Indians (CAI) landed on Alcatraz Island, an abandoned federal property. Among them were Means, his father, his cousin Madonna Gilbert/Thunderhawk (Oglala Lakota), and Belva Cottier (Lakota). Means grew up around the San Francisco Bay area of California. His family had been relocated from South Dakota via the federal relocation program. On November 20, 1969, 90 more American Indian students (including two informants for the Federal Bureau of Investigation) joined the original group to live on Alcatraz for 19 months. The occupiers called themselves Indians of all tribes in honor of the more than 56,000 Indians from various tribes who supported their action.

The Indians on Alcatraz sought to set up an Indian culture center. Means, Mitchell, Bellecourt, and other AIM members stayed on the island for a few days to show their support. It was there that Banks met John Trudell, who would become AIM's chairman in the 1970s. Hollywood stars Jane Fonda, Marlon Brando, Anthony Quinn, and Candice Bergen visited the island during the occupation, as did Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) informants and infiltrators. Eventually the occupiers were removed on June 11, 1971.

The occupation of Alcatraz raised political awareness and helped empower American Indians. Although it ended without success, its symbolic meaning influenced subsequent local and regional occupations. It also prompted AIM to take on the issue of reclaiming tribal lands under the Treaty of Fort Laramie (the Sioux Treaty of 1868). The post-Alcatraz occupations that AIM organized included the takeovers of an abandoned naval station at the Minnesota/Saint Paul International Airport, an abandoned Coast Guard station on Lake Michigan, Mount Rushmore (1970), and Plymouth Rock in Boston. The latter gained national news coverage of AIM. However, it was the occupation of the BIA building that put AIM in the spotlight of national and international attention.

The Occupation by Chance

The occupation of BIA had not been planned. AIM had organized The Trail of Broken Treaties march to Washington, D.C., before the presidential election in November 1972. AIM leaders (including Leonard Peltier) planned to give presidential candidates The Twenty Points, a list enumerating issues of concern to American Indians. Three caravans (from Seattle, Las Angeles, and Oakland) drove through reservations in different states to pick up followers en route to Washington. After more than 300 people and 85 cars arrived at the Capitol Building during the predawn hours on November 2, 1972, they were faced with broken promises from the federal government, which had previously agreed to arrange escorts, accommodations, and meetings. Instead, the marchers were rushed to a rundown place infested with rats and having no heat, beds, or food.

Gradually, they moved out and gathered at the BIA building. Some found the cafeteria inside the building and started cooking meals to feed the group. BIA Commissioner Louis Bruce (half Sioux and half Mohawk) did not take part in the demonstration, but he agreed with many of its goals and he stayed inside the building with the protestors for 24 hours. (His actions led him and two other top BIA officials to be fired in December 1972.) When riot police tried to remove protestors from the building, the latter, armed with office furniture, fought back to push the police out to the streets. The protesters then sealed the building.

It was during the seven-day occupation that AIM members found BIA files revealing the widespread involuntary sterilization and other abuses of American Indians. Means, with his cousin Madonna Gilbert/Thunderhawk, collected 1.5 tons of these files. Finally, high-ranking governmental officials agreed to hold meetings and negotiations with AIM leaders and to provide travel money for protestors to return home. But the entire group had to wait until the day after the election to leave Washington.

Troubled Waters

After returning from Washington, AIM refocused its attention to the state of South Dakota. The Indians' relationships with whites in Rapid City were tense; the son of Sarah Bad Heart Bull (Lakota) was stabbed to death and his white killer charged with only involuntary manslaughter; and the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation was at a boiling point after a failed attempt to impeach tribal chair Dick Wilson, whose opponents claimed was corrupt and abusive. Older tribal women, many of whom lost their children or grandchildren during Wilson's rule, asked AIM to discuss the situation. In February 1973, Banks, Means, and other AIM members arrived at Pine Ridge. The women suggested occupying Wounded Knee (the site of a historic Indian massacre in 1890) near the reservation to protest tribal governance and the federal government's failure to comply with treaties it had negotiated with the Indians. U.S. Marshals and the FBI cordoned off the area. A 71-day standoff and armed conflict pitting the occupiers against U.S. law enforcement agents followed. The siege ended on May 8, 1973. A total of 565 occupiers were arrested and tried in federal court. After an eight-month trial, they were acquitted of wrongdoing in 1974 because of the FBI's unlawful handling of witnesses and evidence. Peltier was sentenced in 1977 for killing two FBI agents on the reservation during the occupation.

Living conditions at the reservation worsened after the occupation. Wilson's private army became a death squad. Killings of AIM supporters continued. In February 1976, Anna Mae Pictou Aquash, an AIM activist from Canada, was found dead in an execution-style murder. Her death commenced a lengthy dispute among AIM leaders regarding who killed her.

Later Years and Division

In February 1978, Banks organized the Longest Walk from San Francisco to the Capitol Building to protest proposed legislation calling for the abrogation of treaties with Indian nations. Protestors reached their destination five months later. A tepee was set up near the White House and became a symbol of the demonstration. The walk received much media attention and the proposed legislation was later defeated. In 1991, AIM organized the National Coalition on Racism in Sports and Media to challenge the use of Indian names of sports teams and Indian figures as team mascots without tribal approval. The following year, AIM staged a demonstration during Super Bowl XXVI, in which the opposing teams were the Washington Redskins and the Buffalo Bills.

After a five-month march from San Francisco to the National Mall in Washington, D.C., in 1978, a tepee is placed at the National Mall to symbolize threats to tribal lands.

In 1993, AIM split into two camps: AIM Grand Governing Council (AIMGGC) in Minneapolis, led by Clyde Bellecourt and his brother Vernon, and American Indian Movement of Colorado, led by Russell Means and Ward Churchill. Some believe the constant presence of FBI agents/infiltrators and informants deepened the internal divisions among American Indians and created dissension within AIM.

In 2008, Banks planned a second Longest Walk to commemorate the 30th anniversary of the original event. Although time and society have changed, the organization's historical and spiritual walks maintain the goal of promoting awareness of American Indians' concerns and unity. Today, AIMGGC focuses on leadership development, education, and spiritual practices through its annual events such as the International Youth and Elders Cultural Gathering and Sundance (in Pipestone, Minnesota) and Clyde H. Bellecourt Endowment Scholarship Fund and Awards Banquet (in Minneapolis, Minnesota).

Nearly 30 years after Aquash's death, both Arlo Looking Cloud, a member of AIM's security staff, and AIM member John Graham were indicted for murder in 2003. Arlo Looking Cloud was convicted the following year. During his trial, Kamook Nichols, Banks's former wife, was a witness and revealed she had been a paid FBI informant since 1988, wiretapping communications among AIM leaders and collecting information against the organization. Graham was convicted of felony murder in 2010.

Conclusion

AIM's grassroots activism and advocacy were instrumental in raising awareness of American Indians' fight for cultural integrity, identity, spirituality, respect, and strength. At times AIM was depicted as a militant group. However, it should not be forgotten that "warrior" and "patriot" have sacred meaning in the Native culture.

Paige Mayleen True
California State University, Monterey Bay

See Also: Administration for Native Americans; Center for Native American Youth; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Ethnic Groups and Drug and Alcohol Use; Indian Boarding Schools; Indian Child Welfare Act; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; Indian Health Service; National Congress of American Indians; Native Americans; Native Americans, Suicide Among; Tribal Social Services; Tribal Sovereignty.

Further Readings

American Indian Movement. http://www.aimovement.org (Accessed September 2013).

American Indian Movement of Colorado. http://www.coloradoaim.org (Accessed September 2013).

Banks, Dennis and Richard Erdoes. Ojibwa Warrior: Dennis Banks and the Rise of the American Indian Movement. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 2004.

Churchill, Ward and Jim Vander Wall. Agents of Repression: The FBI's Secret Wars Against the Black Panther Party and the American Indian Movement. Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 2001.

Fixico, Donald L. Bureau of Indian Affairs. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2012.

Johnson, Troy R. The American Indian Occupation of Alcatraz Island: Red Power and Self-Determination. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2008.

Johnson, Troy R., Joane Nagel, and Duane Champagne, eds. American Indian Activism: Alcatraz to the Long Walk. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1997.

Kurt, Peter and Terry Straus, eds. Visions and Voices: American Indian Activism and the Civil Rights Movement. Brooklyn, NY: Albatross Press, 2009.

Langston, Donna Hightower. "American Indian Women's Activism in the 1960s and 1970s" (2006). http://www.indybay.org/newsitems/2006/03/21/18095451.php (Accessed September 2013).

Means, Russell and Marvin J. Wolf. Where White Men Fear to Tread. New York: St. Martin's, 1995.

Peltier, Leonard. Prison Writings: My Life is My Sun Dance. Harvey Arden, ed. New York: St. Martin's, 1999.

Weyler, Rex. Blood of the Land: The Government and Corporate War Against the American Indian Movement. New York: Random House, 1982.

Americans with Disabilities Act

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) of 1990 is a nondiscrimination law that mandates the removal of physical barriers, discriminatory practices, and negative stereotypical attitudes as a means to promote greater social integration and equity for people with disabilities. The ADA serves a similar function as other nondiscrimination laws in terms of its desired outcomes; however, it differs in its approach by mandating that people with disabilities receive different treatment. The ADA defines a person with a disability quite broadly. Under the law three criteria must be met: an individual must have a physical or mental impairment that limits one or more major life activities, have a record of the impairment, and be regarded as having such an impairment. The ADA mandates employers and public and private establishments to provide reasonable accommodation to a person with a disability. Reasonable accommodation refers to making existing facilities readily accessible and usable by people with disabilities through the provision of assistive technology to improve communication and/or changes to the physical environment. The ADA addresses issues of access for people with disabilities through almost all areas of social life: the workplace (Title I), state and local government (Title II), public accommodations (Title III), and telecommunications services (Title IV). The ADA is important to the issue of diversity in human services because it identifies people with disabilities as a protected class and mandates their equal treatment.

Discrimination, Social Exclusion of People with Disabilities

According to the 2010 U.S. Census, 56.7 million (18 percent) of the population is living with a disability. People with disabilities are often the subjects of discrimination because of stigmatizing stereotypes, attitudes, and beliefs about their abilities. Stigmatizing attitudes and beliefs marginalize people with disabilities from full participation in society by denying them opportunities to go to school, participate in social activities, access affordable health care, and engage in meaningful work. This results in loss of human potential, income, and social participation among people with disabilities.

Disability has historically been defined through the medical model, which viewed disability as the result of individual dysfunction requiring medical intervention and rehabilitation. People with disabilities were only seen in terms of their disability, viewed as dependent on able-bodied society, and excluded from mainstream society, often in institutional settings. Segregating people with disabilities by removing them from society was seen as a necessity for the good of the individual and society. The civil rights movement provided the opportunity for people with disabilities to begin to question their unequal status in society. Key legislation, coupled with shifts in thinking about disability, changed the way that people with disabilities were treated. The Rehabilitation Act (RA) of 1973 and the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) of 1975 heralded the beginning of a shift in public policy that changed the way that people with disabilities were treated by the larger society. The RA mandated that people with disabilities could not be denied federal services or benefits, and for the first time recognized people with disabilities as a distinct class of individuals. The IDEA mandated early intervention, special education programs, and services for children with disabilities through public schools.

The independent living movement and the shift to viewing disability through a social model precipitated demands within the disability community for protections from discrimination in all areas of their lives. The independent living movement focused on asserting the rights and responsibilities of people with disabilities through self-determination. Self-determination refers to the rights of people with disabilities to identify their needs and control the actions to support them to live independently. The social model of disability views disability as a result of the limitations in the environment seen through societal attitudes and beliefs. These beliefs translate into stigmatization, limited opportunities, and environmental obstacles, which inhibit participation of people with disabilities in social life. Stigmatization is found in the way that people with disabilities are viewed as less than abled-bodied individuals because of their altered abilities. Limited opportunities for people with disabilities are found in educational and vocational prospects because of the way that both are constructed around an able-bodied ideal. Buildings built without accessible ramps preclude an assumption that people with physical disabilities do not need to enter them, thus environment obstacles exist for people with disabilities, which inhibit their participation in society.

The Americans with Disabilities Act

The purpose of the ADA was to protect people with disabilities from discrimination by addressing issues of access, which impact their inclusion into wider society. Title I of the ADA forbids employers to discriminate against a qualified applicant with a disability through job application procedures, hiring, termination, compensation, job training, and advancement opportunities. Title II covers the activities of state or local governments, such as providing public housing, licensing, education, transportation, parks and recreation, detention, emergency response, and police. Title III extends protections to public accommodations, such as restaurants, hotels, theaters, convention centers, retail stores, shopping centers, private schools, day care centers, office buildings, factories, and warehouses. Title IV covers all aspects of telecommunications.

Within each regulatory section provisions are made to ensure that people with disabilities receive services in integrated settings, and that unnecessary standards or rules that might deny a person with a disability equal opportunity to enjoy a program or service are eliminated, unless these standards are deemed necessary for the provision of the program or service. Integrated settings are defined as those that are located in mainstream society and provide individuals with disabilities access and opportunities to interact with nondisabled individuals through shared activities. Necessary standards are defined as safety procedures needed for the operation of the program that are based on actual risk and not on speculation, stereotypes, or generalizations about people with disabilities.

Entities under the ADA are also required to make reasonable modifications in policies, practices, and procedures to ensure that an individual with a disability is ensured equal access. Allowing service dogs into a government building as an exception to a rule that restricts animals from public areas is an example of a modification. Public and private entities must also ensure effective communication with individuals with disabilities through the use of appropriate auxiliary aids, new construction free of architectural barriers, and consideration of barriers when retrofitting existing buildings. Auxiliary aids are defined as services like qualified interpreters or devices such as assisted listening headsets, video-text displays, and large-print materials. These aids must be offered at no cost to the individual with a disability.

Under Title I, a qualified applicant is someone with a disability who, with or without reasonable accommodation, is able to carry out the essential job functions for which the job requires. Reasonable accommodation in this instance refers to having employers make existing facilities readily accessible and usable by people with disabilities. Restructuring job functions, allowing schedule changes, or reassigning a worker with a disability to another position are other examples of reasonable accommodations. Acquiring or modifying equipment or devices, training materials, and providing qualified readers or interpreters are other examples of reasonable accommodations. The ADA covers employers with 15 or more employees in both public and private sectors of the workforce.

Employers are not required to provide reasonable accommodation if they can demonstrate that doing so would incur an undue hardship. An undue hardship is described as any action requiring substantial exertion or expense in relation to other factors such as the employers' size, resources, or the nature and structure of the work. The Equal Employment Opportunities Commission (EEOC) is responsible for enforcing Title I of the ADA. The U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) is responsible for enforcing Titles II, III, and IV of the law.

Impact of the ADA on People With Disabilities

Twenty years after the ADA was first enacted, its impact on the lives of people with disabilities has been uneven. While people with disabilities and advocacy groups point out that the law has been successful in changing some of the barriers to participation, they also point to the fact that people with disabilities are still not fully integrated into society. Consider that a recent survey by the Kessler Foundation and the National Organization on Disabilities found that people with disabilities are much less likely to be employed (21 percent versus 59 percent) or to complete college (19 percent versus 27 percent) than people without disabilities. People with disabilities are still more likely to be living in poverty compared to people without disabilities.

The ADA itself has been criticized for its broad definition of disability and limited scope. Disability is defined as something discrete within the ADA, when in fact it is not. Some critics contend that people with disabilities are a heterogeneous group as variations within and across disabilities render disability an individualized experience. Intersectionality with other identities such as gender, class, race/ethnicity, sexual identity and orientation, and religious affiliation will also interact with disability to produce different social experiences and outcomes. The scope of the ADA has also been challenged, with some critics contending it does not do enough to address access issues related to health care for people with disabilities. Accessing adequate health care has been found to be a significant issue for people with disabilities because of the provisions of private and public health insurance regarding income requirements, service caps, and preexisting conditions.

Lisa M. Stewart
California State University Monterey Bay

See Also: Accommodation; Assistive Technology; Deinstitutionalization; Disability Services; Individuals with Disabilities Education Act; Reasonable Accommodations.

Further Readings

Brennan, J. "The ADA National Network Disability Law Handbook." https://adata.org/lawhandbook (Accessed June 2013).

Kessler Foundation and National Organization on Disabilities. "Survey of Americans with Disabilities." http://www.2010disabilitysurveys.org/pdfs/surveysummary.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

National Council on Disability. "The Impact of the Americans with Disabilities Act: Assessing the Program Toward Achieving the Goals of the Americans with Disabilities Act." http://www.ncd.gov/publications/2007/07262007#toc1 (Accessed June 2013).

U.S. Department of Justice. "Information and Technical Assistance with the Americans with Disabilities Act." http://www.ada.gov/2010_regs.htm (Accessed June 2013).

U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. "Facts About the Americans with Disabilities Act." http://www.eeoc.gov/facts/fs-ada.html (Accessed June 2013).

Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) has long been considered a crucial step in the acquisition of equality for persons with disabilities. The federal statute passed in 1990 mandates that action be taken by employers, public and private entities (including educational institutions), transportation providers, and communication companies so that otherwise qualified individuals have access to the same opportunities available for public use. The ADA also allows qualified individuals to file suit and seek protection against discrimination should these actions not be taken. Since its passage, debates by disability activists and scholars have been fueled by court interpretations that lead to varied applications of the law. Protection under the statute is determined by a three-prong evaluation, and the language used by the ADA's original framers ensures its flexibility as well as the reasons for differing opinions on the intentions of the law.

Protection Under the ADA

The ADA allows legal claims to be made by "qualified individuals with disabilities" who seek action against public entities that have excluded or mistreated them in some way. In order to receive the protection of the ADA, a person must meet one of these criteria: (1) have an impairment that severely limits a major life function; (2) have a record of such impairment; or (3) be perceived as having such impairment.

Framed after both the Civil Rights Act of 1964 guaranteeing nondiscrimination on the basis of race, gender, religion, or national origin, as well as the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, which was written to prevent work- and education-related discrimination against "handicapped persons," the ADA expands the goals of those two acts by subdividing the statute into five titles, each covering unique aspects of public engagement, as well as including specifications regarding public transportation and the provision of telecommunication devices for the deaf (TDD) in Titles II and IV, respectively. The most commonly recognized applications of the law regard employment, education, and current construction practices.

Under the employment regulations (Title I), the law provides an otherwise qualified individual access to fair employment and requires entities to make what the statute refers to as reasonable accommodations in order to grant such access. This may be achieved by providing an alternate workspace for a person who uses a wheelchair, or allowing a cashier with arthritis to take periodic breaks to sit down.

Public entities and public transportation are covered by Title II, which provides regulations for any entity that receives federal money to function. Because universities and public schools receive federal aid from the students admitted, the educational provisions are provided in this title and follow the reasonable accommodation standard as well.

Commercial spaces and public venues are the subject of Title III. This section of the ADA governs access to, for example, restaurants, religious institutions, and hotels. The architectural guidelines for public entities that make up the heart of Titles II and III require that new construction as well as any major renovations to existing construction taking place after 1992 must meet specific access requirements. Therefore, housing developments are required to grant leases to persons who use wheelchairs, and municipal buildings are required to have elevators and accessible entry points. Courts have generally upheld these requirements unless the defendant can show an undue hardship—that it would be unreasonably expensive or harmful to comply with the requirements.

As part of the 20th anniversary celebration of the signing of the ADA, representatives of the Paralyzed Veterans of America take part in a flag procession.

Finally, Title V of the statute provides further definition and clarification for the earlier titles.

Interpretation

Much of the flexibility of the statute exists in the interpretive value assessed within defining disability itself and the use of the key phrases "severely limits" and "major life function." As many scholars have noted, each of these phrases raise particular questions regarding the intentions of the original drafters of the law. The merit of a claim is based on the legal strategies deployed to satisfy these meanings, and on the courts' willingness to follow the precedent of other cases as well as the specific guidance set out by the U.S. Department of Justice and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). Jurists, however, are not required to adhere to such guidance. Hence, the rulings that have been delivered follow predictable patterns only insofar as the jurists who deliberate them. The passage of the ADA Amendments Act in 2008 is meant to clarify some of these questions by providing further examples of what constitutes major life function.

Additionally, the preamble of the ADA states that at least 43 million Americans are living with some form of disability. It was the hope of the framers that these Americans be treated with the respect and given the opportunities that the general public is offered. However, logic suggests that each of these Americans will have differing levels of impairment and limitations. Therefore, it becomes reasonable that the law cannot assess all individuals with disabilities to be equal in terms of what the courts should provide for them. This has left many wondering if there is an implied hierarchy to resolutions under the ADA, and whether, for example, favorable outcomes are more common for certain impairments.

Lastly, because lawsuits can only be filed by individuals with disabilities and determinations are made on a case-by-case basis, debates continue regarding whether the ADA represents a law interested in the civil rights of the individual or has a wider and more comprehensive effect on public policy. Legal as well as policy decisions to date suggest that both are true.

Daniel Preston
Syracuse University

See Also: Administration on Intellectural and Developmental Disabilities; Americans with Disabilities Act; Children With Special Needs; Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, United Nations; Individuals with Disabilities Education Act; Reasonable Accommodations.

Further Readings

Colker, Ruth. The Law of Disability Discrimination Handbook: Statues and Regulatory Guidance, 6th ed. Newark, NJ: LexisNexis, 2007.
Krieger, Linda H., ed. Backlash Against the ADA: Reinterpreting Disability Rights. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2003.
U.S. Department of Justice. "The Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990." http://www.ada.gov (Accessed August 2013).

Ansell-Casey Life Skills Assessment

The Ansell-Casey Life Skills Assessment (ACLSA) is a strengths-based measure of both tangible and intangible capabilities and behaviors generally viewed as important life skills for children ages 8 to 19. The measure assesses for both tangible (i.e., skills needed for daily living, self-maintenance, and obtaining and sustaining gainful employment) and intangible (i.e., skills needed for interpersonal relationships and for maintaining employment, such as decision-making, problem-solving, planning, communication, self-esteem, anger and grief management, and social skills) self-sufficiency and life skills. The measure was originally designed for youth in out-of-home placement care, but the ACLSA has been found to be appropriate for use for youth regardless of living circumstance.

Background on Life Skills Assessment

A variety of instruments assessing tangible and intangible independent living skills have been developed, including the Daniel Memorial Independent Living Skills System, the Life Skills Inventory: Summary Report Form, and the Independent Living Skills Assessment Tool. However, these instruments were developed without norming group data, and the reliability and validity of these instruments were not established during the development. Other instruments, such as the Vineland Adaptive Behavior Scales, had known psychometric properties but were limited in use to youth with developmental delays. Additionally, the previously described measures did not allow for multiple collateral sources (i.e., youth, caregivers, and treatment providers) to complete the measures independently in order to obtain multiple data points regarding the youth's skill level. In fact, some of the measures did not capture the youth's perception of his/her own skill level across domains. As a result, the ACLSA was developed in response to the limitations of the previous life skills.

Development of the ACLSA

The goal guiding the research and measurement design of the ACLSA was to create a reliable and valid instrument that would assess current levels of life skills knowledge. Another goal was to create an instrument designed for use in both individual case planning and program development surrounding self-sufficiency for independent living in order to increase the practicality of the instrument. The Independent Living Committee at the Casey Family Program generated items for the instrument following an extensive literature review. Experts in the field of self-sufficiency then critiqued those items, and focus groups of youths, caregivers, and child welfare professionals revised the items and format. Consultants also assisted to ensure that items were developmentally appropriate across gender, culture, and ethnicity. Additional focus groups and pilot studies were conducted in both rural and urban populations.

Versions of each ACLSA were field-tested with youths served by a private, out-of-home care agency and their caregivers to assess the strengths and limitations of youths in care while also examining the instrument's psychometric properties. Differences in general areas of competency and skill levels were assessed for further development. Differences in demographic variables, such as age, gender, and ethnicity, were examined, as well as variations in risk or protective factors. Revisions were made based on the empirical analyses and the ACLSA's field-test version, as well as consumer and professional feedback, leading to the most current version.

The ACLSA version 2.0 was developed to assess youth at different developmental points. Four versions of the ACLSA were created for youths of different ages and focus on life skills attainment based on developmental theory. Four versions of the ACLSA are available: ACLSA-I for ages 8 to 9 (containing 37 items), ACLSA-II for ages 10 to 12 (56 items), ACLSA-III for ages 13 to 15 (81 items), and ACLSA-IV for ages 16 to 19 (118 items). While some items are identical across ACLSA versions, others become progressively more sophisticated for older children. Age differences are typically found, with older children scoring higher than younger children, across all versions of the ACLSA. Each version of the ACLSA can be administered to youth and their caregiver(s). The measure is currently available in both paper and Web-based format. Youth respond to items on a three-point Likert scale, with response options ranging from "not like me" to "very much like me," while caregivers respond to item options ranging from "not like the youth" to "very much like the youth." Administration time is approximately 40 minutes.

The ACLSA assesses life skills across a variety of domains, including Social Development, Educational and Vocational Development, Physical Development, Moral Development, and Money, Housing, and Transportation. The Social Development scale is divided into five subscales, including Leisure Time, Social Relationships, Communication, Emotional Well-Being and Self Awareness, and Parenting. The Educational and Vocational Development scale comprises three subscales, including Decision Making, Career Planning and Employment, and Work and Study Skills. The Physical Development and Self-Care scale comprises Health and Safety and Pregnancy Awareness subscales. The Moral Development scale is captured by a Values, Rights, and Responsibility subscale. Lastly, the Money, Housing and Transportation scale contains four subscales, including Money Management, Housing, Household Management, and Transportation and Mobility. A youth's performance is compared to the domain of possible skills to see how well the person has mastered each skill set. Since the ACLSA was designed as a strengths-based measure, it is expected that most scores would fall in the mid- to high range, especially for youth with developed or learned independent living skills.

However, critics noted that evaluation of the reliability and validity of the ACLSA was needed to ensure revisions have not affected the psychometric characteristics, particularly predictive validity of the measure. The developers of the ACLSA conducted a normative study in order to further test predictive, construct, and concurrent validity. Tests of the stability (i.e., test-rest reliability, alpha reliability) were also planned.

The Casey Life Skills Assessment (CLSA or ACLSA v.3) was created and now assesses youth ages 14 to 21; it comprises 113 items categorized within eight areas of skills, knowledge, and awareness. The domains include Daily Living, Self-Care, Relationships and Communication, Housing and Money Management, Work and Study, Career and Education Planning, Looking Forward, and Permanency. The measure also converted from a three-point Likert scale to a five-point scale in order to give youth more choices. Additional assessment tools are now available that address specific life skills and transition concerns for specialized populations (Healthy Pregnancy; Parenting Infants; Parenting Young Children; Youth Assessment Level I: Elementary Age; Youth Assessment Level II: Middle School Age; Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender, and Questioning; Homeless Youth; American Indian; Education: Upper Elementary School; Education: Middle or Junior High School; Education: High School; Education: Postsecondary or Training; and Educational Supports). Empirical studies regarding the psychometric properties are currently in progress.

Overall, identified strengths of the ACLSA formats include its initial psychometric properties, ease of access (i.e., free for public use), and options for administration (i.e., choice of pencil-and-paper or Web-based version).

Apryl A. Alexander
Auburn University

See Also: Daniel Memorial Institute Independent Living Skills System; Foster Care Agencies; Life Skills Training.

Further Readings

Nollan, K. A., M. Wolf, D. Ansell, J. Burns, L. Barr, W. Copeland, and G. Paddock. "Ready or Not: Assessing Youths' Preparedness for Independent Living." Child Welfare, v.79/2 (2000).

Uzoebo, V., M. Kioko, and R. Jones. "Deconstructing Youth Transition to Adulthood Services: Lessons Learned From the VISIONS Program." Vulnerable Child and Youth Studies, v.3/1 (2008).

Antilocution

The term antilocution was introduced by Harvard psychologist Gordon Allport to identify forms of speaking that damage out-groups. This neologism appears throughout his well-known text The Nature of Prejudice, published in 1954. For Allport, the antilocution is the most elementary form of prejudice. Thus, profanity is not, in itself, antilocutionary until it is directed at a demarcated and marginalized group—a race, an ethnicity, or a gender, for example. Allport's term is important to diversity studies because it establishes a category for speech that, at some level, inhibits tolerance, diversity, and, ultimately, social justice.

For Allport the antilocution is the first and least-damaging form of prejudice, followed by avoidance, discrimination, physical attack, and extermination—each one being, in his view, more harmful than the ones that precede it in this, his prejudice scale. It is likely, given current attitudes toward out-group-malediction and its consequences, that contemporary readers will take issue with Allport's full description of the antilocution, which would, for example, regard hate speech as occasionally cathartic and thereby defusing of the prejudicial situation at hand. Scholars might also disagree with Allport's benign conclusions, not conceiving the antilocution as the mere base of a prejudice pinnacle but as a noxia present in every other step, serving as the scaffolding as well as the foundation for all forms of prejudice. All the same, both readers and scholars might appreciate Allport's pioneering recognition of the role language plays in prejudice and discount his oversights, given he wrote during an era when out-group malediction was common and well tolerated—the era of the lyrical aphorism "sticks and stones may break my bones but names will never hurt me." In the song "Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer," written around the time Allport wrote, for example, no judgment is ever made against the other reindeer that tortured Rudolph because what Allport refers to as the "mild" persecution of out-groupers, be it the consequence of ethnicity, race, or color of the nose, was normative, both for the persecutor and the persecuted. The power of ideology to hide and promote prejudicial inclinations is nowhere better demonstrated than in the happy singing of this Christmas song by public school children, even in the midst of the antibullying movement. Changing that ideology is a gradual and ongoing process.

Despite the lack of an explicit framing on Allport's part, his meandering usage of the term throughout the text provides some opportunity to decipher his understanding of its range—thus, Brian Mullen and Tirza Leader suggest Allport recognized how it could (1) express hostile prejudice, (2) promote exclusion, (3) precipitate violence, and (4) directly harm the referent. All this overlooks, however, the fundamental effect of the antilocution: that it establishes and reinforces the social conventions that (1) demarcate a group, (2) thematize the character of its members, (3) mythologize its history, and (4) propose conventions governing how it might be handled. In terms of this issue, Allport's failure to establish a typology for the antilocution has crippled research aimed at understanding it and its influence. Unfortunately, since the time of his writing, the many who have referenced his term and cite his work take the idea no further than he did—where they have given the title of antilocution to out-group-malediction, they have made no effort to elaborate on the antilocution's nature.

Consequently, Mullen and Leader point out that there has been no systematic study of the association between antilocutions and violence, which is ironic, given sociologists like Randall Collins place out-group malediction at the heart of ethnic conflict, for example. Understanding the structural characteristics of the antilocution with respect to each marginalized group would render the term its appropriate position in sociological research on prejudice, diversity, disability, and so forth. For that reason, some of the characteristics of antilocutionary discourse are set forth below.

Antilocutionary Force

Antilocutions have power—the power to harm. That said, there are two essential ways that antilocutions build and express their power: (1) naming, that is, focusing their audiences on a summing-up term that capitalizes on the cultural associations already in place with respect to that out-group; and (2) normativizing, that is, proposing new associations for the out-group referenced, thereby expanding the prejudices associated with them. Antilocutionary naming is exemplified by the slur while philippics (e.g., The Jews and Their Lies, by Martin Luther and significant passages of Adolf Hitler's Mein Kempf) provide a most elaborate illustration of antilocutionary normativizing. These antilocutionary powers express themselves in both qualitative and quantitative fashion. Qualitatively, antilocutions form a tapestry of prejudicial identity around out-groups, causing everything done by and done to those groups to be filtered through the frame of reference generated by the prejudicial attributions. Quantitatively, the repeated delivery of antilocutions increases the presence of prejudice until it saturates the discursive sphere within which out-group maledictions are spoken. Together, the quality and quantity of these maledictions represent the antilocutionary forces directed at the out-group addressed. Tacitly understood by those who employ them and those who welcome them, such antilocutionary forces are nothing less than an insidious instruction manual, tailored to the specific out-group; and discovering what those instructions might be would amount to cataloging the antilocutionary forces in play. How is this done?

Probing the nature of antilocutions with respect to a particular out-group involves the application of research methods as they are already understood within the social sciences. Certainly it cannot be done here. However, the fact that antilocutions establish distinct normative associations with particular out-groups can be loosely demonstrated from results gained by typing an out-group name into a Google search followed by the word should or are. After typing the words the poor are . . . into a Google search, for example, Google completed the statement with the word lazy; and, after typing "The poor should . . ." Google completed the statement with "learn to go without," "die," "not have kids," and "help themselves."

Whereas each out-group carries its own distinct collection of normative associations, properly deciphering group-specific, antilocutionary codes should be nothing less than a subfield of research for sociologists concerned with diversity, disenfranchisement, disability, and so forth. The principal value of the concept of antilocutions will only be recognized when researchers establish the antilocutionary force that is brought to bear against each out-group through research into the conventions of antilocutionary language.

Antilocutionary Forms

Where does the antilocution exert its influence and where can it be studied? Everywhere. Language expresses itself in a myriad of forms, and antilocutions may be created in any of them. A single word can be antilocutionary, as is the case for derisive out-group naming such as "n----r", "k--e", and "w-p", examples used by Allport. An antilocutionary word, however, must rely heavily on pre-inscribed cultural associations to be meaningful when spoken alone; uttered within a group unfamiliar with the language in which it is spoken, it will be (except for its tone and the events surrounding its usage) meaningless. Antilocutionary statements also rely on cultural associations, but they may also supplement or reinforce those associations by virtue of their explicitness, as for example, "They'll catch that n----r tonight and whale the life out of him." Already one can see the scaffolding effect of antilocutionary discourse in this sentence: the out-grouper is derisively named (i.e., n----r) and a pattern of out-group treatment is reinforced as normative for that out-group (i.e., catching and whaling).

The statement "Mary was asking for it," is also an antilocution of this form—one that blends gender, violence, and blame into an ideological tumor so damaging and familiar that an educational film on sexual consent has been titled with the expression. Note within this example, as well, that a statement may be out-group antipathetic though a single person named in the statement if the rationale of the statement is group- rather than person-based. The two-stage structure (i.e., naming and normativizing) for the antilocution, named immediately above, can also be found in antilocutionary conversations, with one or both parties using maledictions. In addition, an individual may pontificate, expounding and even expanding at some length on antilocutionary norms. Thus, it is that the nature of informal everyday communication, including spoken words, sentences, conversations, and diatribes, may all be antilocutionary. One can threaten, gossip, swear, cry, lie, cajole, mock, insult, brag, exaggerate, confess, suggest, deny, praise, and even pray in an antilocutionary fashion.

A culture's linguistic arts can be antilocutionary as well. Poetry, rhymes, jokes, riddles, proverbs, and prophecies might be antilocutionary. The limerick, for example, is a standard rhythmic and rhyming form for antilocutions. Even great literary works can be antilocutionary—the classic example being William Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, but one should not disregard The Taming of the Shrew, or even Othello, for that matter.

These three plays are deeply embedded in anti-Semitism, misogyny, and racism—in that order. The famous Tales of the Arabian Nights is viciously antilocutionary, particularly with respect to women and dark-skinned people; no parallel can be reasonably drawn between it and the fairy tales collected by the Grimm brothers. Short stories and novels can also be antilocutionary in part or in overall design. Both Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness and Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn can be examined with respect to the antilocutionary nature of the texts; and there are misogynistic, anti-Semitic, prejudicial, racist, and homophobic characterizations in books and stories. Song lyrics can be antilocutionary and quite damaging, given the manner that music saturates contemporary environments. The song "Short People" by Randy Newman was singled out for this reason; however, a good part of rap music is couched in this sort of speech as well, for example the Jay Z song, "99 Problems." Comic books, video games, television programs, movies, advertisements, posters, pamphlets, Web pages, blogs, Facebook posts, Twitter pages—all these may also have antilocutionary content because the antilocution affirms and elaborates an attitude, and this can be done through any medium using whatever forms that medium allows.

Alongside creative works, reportorial forms of discourse can be antilocutionary. Such works are distinctly damaging in that they do not merely propose an attitude, as is the case for creative works, but also purport to reveal the facts of the case. Newspaper articles can be antilocutionary—explicitly so, as they were in Nazi Germany and in the American south before the Civil Rights Act—but also subversively antilocutionary in, for example, news articles reporting the skin color of a criminal only when the color is black. Indeed, even scholarship can be antilocutionary: The Bell Curve, by Charles Murray and Richard Herrnstein, was largely regarded as antilocutionary by virtue of the manner that the authors racialized IQ and recommended social policies with respect to their conclusions. Antilocutions also can be found in an essay by deconstructionist Paul de Man.

The antilocution can also be delivered through tonality, by gesture, or even through an act of silence. When one person refuses to greet another in word or even in handshake, for example, the effect may be antilocutionary if the person scorned is a member of an identifiable out-group and the context of the event allows it to be understood as a symbolically meaningful discriminatory act.

It is important to note that users of antilocutions are often unaware of the damage they do by employing them. A child, for example, may hear an adult speaking in antilocutionary fashion and imitate that speech without comprehending its nature or consequences. Even where adults are concerned, not all malignant out-group malediction is malicious because the norms governing the conventions of discourse precede the conscious awareness of what is being done. This fact speaks to the importance of educating publics with respect to malediction and harm to others.

So much antilocution exists that no finite limit can be set around it. Nevertheless, it is possible to probe its range and nature with respect to a particular group, a particular form of communication, a particular mediated form, and a particular historical epoch, as has been cursorily set out with a few illustrations above. In this sense, the term antilocution might yet open to social scientists concerned with issues such as disability, diversity, minority status, and so forth a context within which to frame research aimed at measurably studying the relationship between speech that diminishes out-grouper status and extrasymbolic forms of maltreatment.

Robert Wade Kenny
Mount Saint Vincent University

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Prejudice, Theories of; Racial Microaggression.

Further Readings

Alexander, Jeffrey. The Civil Sphere. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.

Allport, Gordon. The Nature of Prejudice. Cambridge, MA: Perseus, 1954.

Collins, Randall. Violence: A Micro-Sociological Theory. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2008.

De Man, Paul. "The Jews in Contemporary Literature." Le Soir (March 4, 1941).

Goffman, Erving. Stigma: Notes on the Management of Spoiled Identity. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2009.

Kenny, Robert Wade. "The Constitutional Dialectic." Quarterly Journal of Speech, v.86/4 (2000).

Morris, Scott and Jason Young. Asking For It: The Ethics & Erotics of Sexual Consent, Sut Jhally, dir. and ed. Media Education Foundation, 2010.

Mullen, Brian and Tirza Leader. "Linguistic Factors: Antilocutions, Ethnonyms, Ethnophaulisms, and Other Varieties of Hate Speech." In On the Nature of Prejudice: Fifty Years After Allport, John F. Dovidio, Peter Glick, and Laurie A. Budman, eds. Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2005.

Ruscher, Janet. Prejudiced Communication: A Social Psychological Perspective. New York: Guilford Press, 2001.

Weaver, Richard. Ideas Have Consequences. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948.

Anti-Semitism

Anti-Semitism, the discrimination against Jews for reasons associated with their racial heritage, has been present in the North American continent since the first community of Israelites settled in Manhattan in 1654. However, it was only after the Civil War, when immigrants from Europe increased considerably in numbers, that a racist attitude toward Jews started gaining ground. Discrimination against and hatred of Jews peaked during the interwar years, but they never reached the same levels of paroxysm and magnitude as in Europe. With the United States being a heterogeneous multiethnic society, Jews found themselves to be a minority alongside many others, and consequently they have been spared the role of natural and exclusive target of racial hatred that was common in European societies. This explains why no indigenous theorization of anti-Semitism has developed in the United States. However, the perception of widespread diffidence toward them shaped the attitude of American Jews in connection to human and social services; communal self-help was seen as the most feasible way to provide for the needs of the population. The prominent role of tzedakah (in Judaism, the religious obligation to charity) also drove Jews in the United States to seek help from their own ranks rather than ask the government.

The first Jewish community in America dates back to 1654, when a small contingent of Israelites arrived in the then Dutch colony of Nieuw Amsterdam (later New York) from Recife, another Dutch settlement on the Brazilian coast that had been snatched by the Portuguese. Memories of the violence and massacres perpetrated against their kind during the Iberian inquisition persuaded these Jews to move to more tolerant shores. In fact, these immigrants were granted permission to stay in Nieuw Amsterdam by the Dutch India Company, although the then governor Peter Stuyvesant, a devout Christian, opposed the decision and considered Jews "hateful enemies and blasphemers of the name of Christ."

One remarkable case of anti-Jewish behavior took place in 1733 when the trustees of the Georgia Charter pressed the colony's leader, James Oglethorpe, into denying Jews permission to settle in the territory. Oglethorpe, however, opposed the decision and granted Jews permission to stay.

The American Revolution marked a turning point in the history of American Jews. The First Amendment to the Constitution provided that the republican government would not interfere nor legislate on matters concerning religion, while a 1790 letter by George Washington to the Jewish community of Newport, Rhode Island, assured its members that "the children of the Stock of Abraham, who dwell in this land" would do well so long as they would "demean themselves as good citizens." This latter formulation, according to recent scholarship, has to be seen as a foreboding of the trials and ordeals to come, as it implied that Jews would fare well in the United States only as long as they would comply with white Protestant standards of citizenship; and, during the course of American history, Jews would often find themselves to be beyond these standards.

Starting from the latter half of the 19th century, anti-Semitism shifted its focus from religion to the social sphere, as attacks would target the cultural and racial differences of Jews in relation to the Anglo-Saxon norm. The rise to prominence of a significant number of German Jewish businessmen and financiers, together with a huge increase of Ashkenazi newcomers from eastern Europe, caused concern among the white elite: the former were seen as uncouth upstarts whose enormous wealth could challenge their social exclusivity, while the latter appeared an alien tribe responsible for all kinds of social evils, from crime to political radicalism. Aversion and fear of the aliens became the nurturing ground of a nativist movement that advocated the end of unrestricted immigration—with no distinctions between Jews and gentiles, Europeans and Asians.

Discrimination took a variety of forms. In 1866, after a series of fires destroyed warehouses and workshops belonging to Jews, the insurance companies believed the owners had set fires to their own property in order to collect indemnity; as a consequence, they agreed to stop underwriting Jewish assets. Ivy League institutions, such as Yale and Harvard, imposed quotas that limited the enrollment of Jewish students, while forms of unofficial exclusion were in place in hospitals, law firms, companies, and department stores, which often opted to pass over Jewish applicants. One particularly significant incident occurred in 1877 in Saratoga, New York, when millionaire Hugo Seligman was denied accommodation at the Grand Hilton Hotel. The case of Seligman, who had been a friend of Abraham Lincoln as well as an intimate of President Ulysses S. Grant, showed American Jews that no matter how rich, assimilated, and well-connected they might become, U.S. society would always regard them as different and inferior. Working-class newcomers, too, would generate resentment among American peers as their willingness to work for low pay was mistaken for a deliberate effort to depress wages and steal jobs from them.

The press started to run reports documenting the unhealthy conditions of immigrant neighborhoods, implying how all major problems—filth, overcrowding, child labor, vice—stemmed from the inability of newcomers to comply with Anglo-Saxon standards of hygiene and property, flaws believed to depend on cultural traits peculiar to immigrants. Newspapers and magazines also featured cartoons that overemphasized physical attributes associated to Jews, such as hooked noses and sidelocks, or targeted stereotypes like lust for money and duplicity. Anti-Semitism from Europe found its way into the United States as an increasing number of articles were translated and published in the American press.

Racist propaganda occasionally degenerated into violent attacks. In 1902 in Manhattan, mourners at the funeral of Rabbi Jacob Joseph, recognized leader of the Orthodox community, were assaulted by employees from companies along the procession route and later clubbed by police agents who had come to break up the riot.

The Jewish community reacted to the unwholesome climate by establishing organizations that could help enhance a pro-Jewish agenda and improve the status of American Jews. It was in this period that the community started to organize a network of institutions that would cater to the needs of the community, caring for the sick, elderly, orphaned, unemployed, poor, and so forth. So massive was this organizational effort that some scholars have singled it out as one hallmark of American Jewish identity.

The wealthy and assimilated German Jews believed that the anti-Jewish rhetoric depended on the cultural backwardness of their Russian coreligionists. Therefore, a group of prominent businessmen founded the Educational Alliance in 1893, with the purpose of providing services and classes on civics, religion, personal hygiene, English, and sports that could help newcomers accommodate to American society. In spite of the noble purpose, however, scholarship has underlined how such paternalistic efforts created a divide in the Jewish community, pitting rich assimilated "Germans" versus poor ignorant "Russians." Further, by stressing the desirability of adherence to Anglo-Saxon norms in order to fit into American society, institutions such as the Educational Alliance insinuated uneasiness, even aversion, toward traditional eastern European Jewish culture between attendees, especially younger ones. The generational divide between "backward parents" and "modern children" would feature in the work of many early 20th-century American Jewish writers, such as Anzia Yezierska.

Another important effort to improve the status and reputation of Jews was the founding, in 1893, of the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), with the aim of educating female immigrants on topics like birth control, civil liberties, human rights, and suffrage. In 1909, after McClure's published "Daughters of the Poor," an article by muckraking journalist George Kibbe Turner accusing Jews of controlling prostitution in New York (one of many that depicted Jews as pimps), the NCJW reacted by launching a series of antiprostitution initiatives, in particular by reaching out to young, unaccompanied female immigrants, especially vulnerable to the lures of ruthless individuals. The foundation of Kehillah, similarly, responded to the outcry provoked by New York Police Commissioner Hiram Bingham, who publicly complained about the excessive rate of Jewish crime in the city. Kehillah's manifold activities would challenge the flood of anti-Jewish press by collecting data on crime, investigating illegal activities, and helping Jews in trouble.

The same pattern was replicated in 1913 with the Leo Frank case and the birth of the Anti-Defamation League. Frank, a Jewish engineer working in a factory in Atlanta, was accused of having raped and murdered a young employee at the plant. When Frank was sentenced to death, the verdict was met by public jubilation; however, when the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment two years later, the local population expressed outrage and a crowd of armed men kidnapped Frank from prison and lynched him. The flood of anti-Semitic articles and editorials that appeared during the trial convinced 15 members of the Chicago chapter of the B'nai B'rith, a mutual aid society founded 60 years earlier, to create the Anti-Defamation League, an organization devoted to the dissemination of correct information about Jewish cultural heritage and to counter the racist language of the press and politicians. The choice was fitting as the Progressive era marked an intensification of racist propaganda blaming Jews for all kinds of social evils, from political radicalism to sexual libertinism. A typical instance of the bad press of the period was Burton J. Hendricks's "The Great Jewish Invasion," a series published by the prestigious McClure's magazine that gave a racism-infused account of the emergence of Jewish immigrants as successful businessmen and manufacturers: Hendricks's view of Jews was summed up by comments such as "no people have had a more inadequate preparation, educational or economic, for American citizenship."

Madison Grant's The Passing of the Great Race (1916) condensed the mood of Anglo-Saxon anxiety over the survival of American civilization. The essay bemoaned the fate of old-stock Americans as their blood was threatened by the arrival of inferior people from southern and eastern Europe, and was particularly harsh on Jews, as they seldom adopted Christian religion or understood American ideals. The Roaring Twenties saw a white, middle-class backlash over the evil forces of modernity, with Congress passing legislation that restricted immigration (National Origins Act, 1924), limited the production and consumption of alcohol (Volstead Act, 1919), and censored inappropriate behavior and morals in movies (Hays Code, 1930). The conservative reaction also led to crackdowns on trade unions and radical groups, in response to a worldwide threat heralded by the Russian Revolution. As some prominent members of the Bolshevik party, like Leon Trotsky, were Jews, the November 1917 uprising came to be seen as a Jewish conspiracy against capitalism. Henry Ford, the car manufacturer, was one of the most assertive in making the claim. In 1919 he bought the Dearborn Independent and turned the newspaper into a platform to promote his racist views. The paper supported the idea of an "international Jewish conspiracy" and in 1920 published a series titled "The International Jew: The World's Foremost Problem," which detailed how Jews controlled both world finance and radical movements and manipulated diplomacy to cause wars in which Christians died and Jews got rich.

Leo Frank on trial for the rape and murder of a young employee in 1913. This case and the many editorials related to it led to the creation of the Anti-Defamation League.

The situation got worse during the Depression, as Jews took the blame for economic hardships. However, it was not just the Anglo-Saxons who targeted Jews; as economic conditions got worse, other minorities became more vocal in their resentment. When riots erupted in Harlem in 1935, mobs of African Americans attacked and destroyed neighborhood shops owned by Jews.

The significant presence of Jews in President Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration (such as Henry Morgenthau, Jr., and Felix Frankfurter) induced opponents of New Deal legislation to single out Jews as the mastermind behind these policies. Many prominent figures spoke out against Jews. Joseph P. Kennedy, father of future president John F. Kennedy, while ambassador in England, complained to German officials that Roosevelt had fallen into the clutch of Jews. Father Charles Coughlin, who hosted a popular radio show and published a newspaper, the Social Justice, lectured his audience about the Jewish domination of America. Charles Lindbergh, the pilot of transatlantic fame, spoke at rallies organized by America First, a noninterventionist movement, and blamed Jews for instigating involvement in the war against Germany. Philip Roth's The Plot Against America (2004) draws on Lindbergh's role as spokesperson for anti-Semitism to paint a picture of the discrimination endured by the Jewish community of Newark during the 1930s.

In spite of all these occurrences of racist behavior, the situation posed little personal threat to Jews, particularly in comparison to what was happening in Europe at the same time. Although it caused personal pain and communal discomfort—as historian Hsia Diner put it—most American Jews remained safe as individuals and as members of a community.

However, the economic strains took a heavy toll. The Jewish organizations, once the pride of the community, struggled to deal with the huge numbers of people in need, and many had to turn to the public relief roll. The diminished possibility of providing relief sparked the fear that destitute Jews would turn to crime and illegal activity to provide for themselves, and that, in turn, would increase the already significant level of animosity and resentment toward the community. Also, many considered public welfare unreliable and feared that anti-Semitic attitudes would sooner or later prevail and relief funds for Jews would be ultimately terminated. Others were concerned that hostility toward Jews would surface in the very delivery of service, with lower standards of quality. Jewish agencies reacted by rationalizing fund-raising and allocation of services, and by pioneering strategies, such as psychoanalysis, casework, and counseling to target social problems.

The postwar years are usually considered a golden age for American Jewry, as the community assimilated into the middle class and the Holocaust aroused a wave of sympathy toward the plight of Jews. New pieces of legislation, such as New York's antidiscrimination bill (1945) and the Fair Education Practices Act (1948), addressed discriminatory behavior that had been carried out in the previous decades. Anti-Semitism, however, would occasionally resurface. During the civil rights era, for instance, Jews and Jewish institutions in the south became the target of segregationist whites, with synagogues bombed in Nashville, Atlanta, Charlotte, Gastonia, Jacksonville, and Miami. In the wake of the Hollywood witch hunt and McCarthyism, the left-wing activism of many Jews occasioned the employment of anti-Semitic rhetoric. Since 1967, the strong bond between Israel and American Jews has become a major originator of anti-Semitic attitudes. Transnational Jewish solidarity was frequently framed in the context of an occult Zionist power secretly dominating the world, while African American nationalist groups equated Israel and its supporters to a colonialist lobby exploiting colored people. However, anti-Semitism remains today at the fringes of American public discourse, relegated to private prejudice and informal discrimination.

Sostene Zangari
Politecnico di Milano

See Also: Antilocution; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Jewish Americans; Prejudice, Theories of.

Further Readings

Goldstein, Phyllis and Harold Evans. A Convenient Hatred: The History of Antisemitism. Brookline, MA:

Facing History and Ourselves National Foundation, 2011.

Prager, Dennis. Why the Jews?: The Reason for Antisemitism. New York: Touchstone, 2003.

Turner, George Kibbe. "The Daughters of the Poor." McClure's (November 1909).

Appalachia and Human Services

People of Appalachia possess a rich cultural heritage that is often misunderstood by outsiders. Many of their cultural values center on family, community, and religion. Although some Appalachian communities have experienced economic growth, much of the rural Appalachian regions are fraught with high unemployment, poverty, poor health, and disparities in education. People of Appalachia traditionally try to solve their own problems, but the severity of some of the challenges faced by its people has increased the need for human services.

Appalachia

Appalachia refers to the region along the Appalachian Mountains in the eastern United States running from southern New York to northern Alabama and Mississippi. According to the Appalachian Regional Commission, the region includes all of West Virginia and portions of 12 other states including Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia. Forty-two percent of the 420 Appalachian counties are rural, compared to 20 percent nationally.

Once exceedingly dependent on mining, agriculture, chemical industries, forestry, and heavy industry, the Appalachian economy now includes a number of service and manufacturing industries. These gains have transformed Appalachia from widespread poverty to a region of economic contrasts with focused areas of high unemployment, acute educational disparities, and poor health and other areas experiencing a surge of economic vitality through the development of new industries.

Appalachian Culture

People of Appalachia are often misunderstood. They are less prone to be viewed as a cultural minority. This is likely because outwardly, they do not appear to be different from mainstream Americans. This is especially true of urban Appalachians, those who migrated to urban areas such as Chicago, Cincinnati, and Detroit.

Appalachian culture is centered around the Appalachian people and the influence their values have on their attitudes, lifestyle, and behavior. Their value system has evolved partly because of their early settlement in isolated geographic regions of the mountains. There is no consensus about what it means to be a person of Appalachia. Whites, blacks, and Native Americans are represented in the people, but Celtic immigrants are believed to have had the greatest influence on their culture because of their clan social framework. The influences from these diverse cultures have led to the development of various distinct cultural traits and values that differ from mainstream Americans. Some cultural traits include their influence on music, particularly bluegrass and gospel music; their arts and craft skills, especially in quilting and woodworking; and their various regional dialects.

The cultural values of the Appalachian people include a strong work ethic; rich cultural heritage; patriarchal socialization; a strong conviction for equality and independence; identity dependent on their family, extended family, and their community; a strong connection to their land; and commitment to their religious worldviews. In the large area of Appalachia, there are regional differences, but much of the cultural commonalities of its people remain the same.

Appalachia and Human Services

Some Appalachian communities have made great strides in income growth, employment, educational attainment, and infrastructure. However, many people of Appalachia face numerous challenges including poverty, unemployment, obesity, cancer, high rates of disease including infectious diseases, prescription and illicit drug abuse, alcoholism, domestic violence, and depression.

Rural Appalachia has experienced historic shortages of health and community services. Perhaps because of their history of isolation, suspicion of people and systems not affiliated with their inner social network, loyalty to "in-groups," and the outside exploitation of its people and culture, people of Appalachia tend to distrust outsiders. This mistrust, coupled with the fear of being taken advantage of by outside organizations, provide a unique challenge for human service delivery. Primarily, human service practitioners may find it difficult to gain entry into the Appalachian community. Practitioners who adhere to strict organizational mandates that are ineffective for people of Appalachia can lead the Appalachian community to view such helpers as insensitive.

For the people of Appalachia, social networks support safety and physical and psychological health. Feelings of shame, privacy concerns, lack of transportation, family and/or cultural issues, and lack of funds to pay for services are some of the major obstacles to service delivery.

Service delivery for Appalachian people must be based on the genuine needs as expressed by the people themselves. Whatever services are provided, there must be recognition that the Appalachian culture is real and operational. Gaining the trust of the people and the community is essential and can be achieved through honesty, humility, compassion, and the display of respect for the culture and its people. Practitioners who demonstrate cultural competency; value community diversity; respect local knowledge; and collaborate with family networks, other professionals, the local community and its churches are more apt to gain the confidence and respect of the people of Appalachia and their communities.

When working in Appalachian communities, network development and service collaboration is fundamental. A variety of different agencies and organizations, both governmental and nongovernmental, and expertise in the community is needed in order to identify best practices in service delivery within a framework of limited resources. In many cases, human service practitioners may work as part of a team of care providers to deliver services to the people of Appalachia. The team may include counselors, physicians, case managers, social workers, support staff, community consultants, and clergy. Some key approaches to service delivery center around prevention services, community education and participation, provider training, and assessment.

People of Appalachia traditionally try to manage their own problems and do things for themselves; however, some of the challenges that face the Appalachian community may be too large and complicated to manage without the assistance of human services. Human service delivery must take into account the social, cultural, economic, and political contexts of Appalachia. Collaborative and integrated efforts of service delivery are necessary in order to provide services tailored to meet the unique needs of the people of Appalachia.

Jill C. Dustin
Old Dominion University

See Also: Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Community-Based Services; Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Economic Support and Services; Educational Support Services; Employment/Career Assistant Services; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Ethnic Groups and Drug and Alcohol Use; European Americans; Family Services; Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of; Overweight and Obese Adults and Children; Poverty; Rural Communities; Spirituality/Religion and Diversity.

Further Readings

Ambrose, Heather and Roger Hicks. "Culturally Appropriate Counseling and Human Services in Appalachia: The Need and How to Address It." VISTAS 2006 Online. http://www.counselingoutfitters.com/Ambrose.htm (Accessed September 2013).

Appalachian Regional Commission. "The Appalachian Region." http://www.arc.gov/appalachian_region/TheAppalachianRegion.asp (Accessed September 2013).

Hayden, Wilburn. "Appalachian Diversity: African-American, Hispanic/Latino, and Other Populations." Journal of Appalachian Studies, v.10/3 (2004).

Lee, Wanda, John Blando, Nathalie Mizelle, and Graciela Orozco. Introduction to Multicultural Counseling for Helping Professionals, 3rd ed. New York: Routledge/Taylor & Francis Group, 2007.

Marcum, Carl. "Appalachian Cultural Awareness and Community Development." Extension Service: West Virginia University. http://ritchie.ext.wvu.edu/r/download/23466 (Accessed September 2013).

Russ, Kathryn. "Working with Clients of Appalachian Culture." http://counselingoutfitters.com/vistas/vistas10/Article_69.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Tang, Mei and Kathryn Russ. "Understanding and Facilitating Career Development of People of Appalachian Culture: An Integrated Approach." Career Development Quarterly, v.56/1 (2007).

Arab Americans

The term Arab American has been defined in various ways in different disciplines. Taken simply, an American-born (or naturalized) citizen with ancestry from most Middle Eastern countries could likely be considered Arab American. Previous publications use membership in the Arab League to determine which nations would be "Arab." In this article, however, the challenge of defining Arab (and by extension Arab American) primarily based on membership in a political organization is deepened by the fact that member states of the Arab League are from parts of Asia and Africa—continents of origin that the U.S. Census determines as two different races—while defining Caucasian to include people of the Middle East. The Arab nations are included with other ethnic groups and nationalities (i.e., Persians from Iran, Turks in Turkey, etc.) in the understanding of the geographic and cultural term Middle East. Therefore, geography and nationality become secondary in the basic understanding of Arab Americans as a culturally different group. The commonality of the Arabic language—though present in multiple dialects—and a common shared cultural heritage that is patriarchal and traditionally conservative become more salient.

The Role of Religion

The prevalence and influence of Islam in the Arab world is clear; however, when considering Arab Americans as a group, there is conflict between reality and the generalization of Arabs to Arab Americans. Although the majority of the world's Arab population is Muslim, approximately two-thirds of the Arab American community is Christian. Data collected through the U.S. Census and other means have documented these accounts of Arab Americans. Research in the field of counseling, social psychology, and sociology has shown that Arab Americans who are Christian tend to assimilate into American culture with less consternation because they are able to negate the negative stigmas associated with Islam in the United States. Regardless of which religion a person or family follows, religion is a salient point of identity for Arab Americans, and thus service providers should be cognizant of possible conflicts of religious and cultural beliefs between social norms and American culture.

External Services

Like many minority populations in the United States, Arab Americans are less likely to view outside counseling services as an option for social and emotional issues because of cultural norms. These norms often associate personal issues with "matters of the home" that need to be handled within the nuclear and/or extended family. This view is similar to that of black and Latino/a counterparts whereby the communal nature of the family solving problems together is valued more than the individual seeking his/her own resolution from outside the family; seeking help outside is viewed as a sign of weakness and a poor reflection on the family. Help seeking becomes more likely the further removed a person is from the point of ancestry, meaning these issues will likely be more prevalent if someone is a first-generation Arab American than if someone is a third- or fourth-generation Arab American. Service providers should explore a person's background and ancestry to assess how removed a person may be from their familial point of ancestry.

Furthermore, service providers will find their ethical obligations to the Arab American population mirror the obligations to any other minority group and the importance of cultural competence becomes salient. Like other minority groups in the United States, Arab Americans are subject to different sociocultural bias emphasized in mainstream media outlets. Arab Americans may internalize these often-negative views through a phenomenon known as stereotype threat. Stereotype threat is described as the internalization of a negative stereotype associated with one's group membership. Human services workers must be aware of these possible internalizations while eliminating their own personal bias in order to maintain the ethical obligations to ensure the safety of these clients as outlined in certification and licensure standards.

Tarryn E. McGhie
Zaid M. Haddad
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Muslim Americans; Prejudice, Theories of.

Further Readings

American Counseling Association. http://www.counseling.org (Accessed November 2013).

American Mental Health Counselors Association. http://www.amhca.org (Accessed November 2013).

Nassar-McMillan, Sylvia and Julie Hakim-Larson. "Counseling Considerations Among Arab Americans." Journal of Counseling and Development, v.81/2 (2003).

Talal, Hasan bin. "The Arab Human Development Report 2002: Review and Reform." Arab Studies Quarterly, v.26/2 (2004).

Asian Americans

It has been well documented in literature and professional guidelines that there is a need for both direct human service providers and organizations to provide culturally appropriate services. Culturally appropriate services are aimed at providing care or services to people by addressing, rather than ignoring or merely being sensitive to, cultural factors such as ethnic heritage, nationality of family origin, values, or beliefs. To better aid individuals, families, and communities of a nondominant culture, service providers must consider the cultural lens in which individuals of nondominant backgrounds may view and engage the world, while simultaneously attempting to make the process of engaging in services welcoming and helpful. Despite some efforts of human service providers and organizations, several nondominant racial and ethnic communities continue to be underserved, including Asian Americans.

Asian Americans are people originating from or whose ancestors are from an Asian country, including people from Bhutan, China, Pakistan, India, Indonesia, and Singapore. Part of the complexity of serving the Asian American population is because of its intragroup diversity. The Asian American population is extremely heterogeneous and comprises 43 different ethnic groups who use over 100 different languages. There are also differences within each ethnic group. For example, within the Asian Indian community there are more than 25 languages, 200 different dialects, and at least seven religions. To best address how Asian Americans are culturally different as clients and the barriers that are present in engaging in mainstream services, it is beneficial to have a fundamental understanding of the culture and how it may manifest itself in contemporary human service delivery.

Asian Culture

As humans and human behavior are shaped by biological and sociological experiences, it is critical to have a general understanding of the variety of cultural differences that exist. Despite the intrinsic differences that are present in each of the Asian cultures, the subgroups share common characteristics such as collectivism and familism. A significant influence of these shared characteristics is Confucianism, which emphasizes the betterment of the family unit over the individual. This collectivist belief creates a cultural environment conducive to interdependence, contrary to most Western countries' individualist perspectives. There exists a general consideration in Asian cultures that if someone were to face a problem, the family would help them on their path to resolution. Similarly, should an individual fall on difficult economic times, there would be communal assistance among the extended family with the latent expectation that the same would be done in return for any member. Juxtaposed against the value of family are the trust of intrafamily members and a mistrust of outsiders.

Along with the emphasis placed on the growth and development of family and community, there is also the parallel cultural value of endurance and restraint. Individuals, particularly first-generation Asian Americans, are prepared to have a harder life in the new country in order to establish themselves and provide for the family. Endurance and restraint are generally viewed as admirable traits among Asian Americans, often manifesting as bearing a burden, such as physical or mental illness, without assistance. This value can also be seen in the low rates of community service participation, even within Asian Americans' nations of origin, as it is often considered strength to not tax the community by presenting a need. An additional Asian value of note is the emphasis on "saving face," defined as one's prestige in the society. Asians strive to avoid potentially negative stigmatizing labels that may bring shame to the family name. Stigma and shame have been suggested as barriers to help-seeking among minority groups. Some Asian cultures view an individual or family seeking aid as shameful, as they are demonstrating that they are incapable of caring for themselves and or for their family.

When Asian Americans settle in the United States and are often removed from their extended family, they may favor individuals who look, act, or present with similar beliefs to their own. This subtly prohibits other cultures and values from permeating their own and, inversely, encloses communities in an insulated sphere of nonengagement. In contrast, some immigrants may embrace acculturation and assimilation, which either blends their culture of origin with a host culture, or adopts the culture in which new migrants find themselves, respectively. Given the culture of Asian immigrants' homelands, there are significant differences between their culture of origin and the Western culture that create conflicts in which they operate as Asian Americans. Some of the barriers that exist among Asian Americans accessing services in the United States are a result of discordance between their native culture and Western culture. A challenge is also seen by poor integration into the mainstream communities in which Asian Americans reside.

Implications for Service Providers

In addition to cultural values as an essential element when examining Asian Americans as culturally different clients, mainstream service structures and the unique differences that each client possesses should also be examined. Contemporary mainstream service structures create barriers that prevent Asian Americans from utilizing services. Language barriers are a common problem for Asian Americans with limited English proficiency, as most Asian Americans are first generation. Enlisting the aid of interpreter services or human service providers who speak the same language may increase service use. Another suggestion for serving the Asian American population is cultural brokering, the use of a bicultural individual who understands and can explain the two cultures to both clients and service providers, and who comprehends how each of the cultures may influence both viewpoints relating to service provision.

Age and length of time in the United States may play a role in access to and utilization of services among Asian Americans. Younger first-generation Asian Americans are often taught English as a secondary language in their home culture or are able to learn English quickly once they are in the United States, enabling them to communicate and seek services when they desire and removing the language barrier to accessing services. In addition, younger Asian Americans often have Western influences in their upbringing, including interactions with peers and portrayal in the media, such as on television, in movies, and online. This larger Western influence in their acculturation competes with adherence to traditional cultural values and may facilitate an easier transition into mainstream society, and thus mainstream services.

Contrast this with older Asian Americans, who may have their first exposure to Western culture upon immigration. The process of acculturation can be very different for older Asian Americans given the myriad of obstacles they face, including language barriers, systemic discrimination, and cultural conflicts of values. It is not surprising that there are sometimes clashes between generations of Asian Americans depending on factors such as level of acculturation or how long they have been in the United States. In providing services to Asian Americans, it is of the utmost importance to recognize the confluence of factors that shape individuals' entry into the service system, whether they be new immigrants or established citizens, and where they may be on the spectrum of acculturation.

David John Rieker
Long Beach Memorial Medical
Suzie S. Weng
University of North Florida

See Also: Asian Immigrants; Asian Indian Immigrants; Chinese Americans; Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Cultural Broker; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Services; Ethnicity and Clients; Filipino Americans; Hmong Immigrants; Race and Clients; Social Work, Diversity Practice in.

Further Readings

Chaudhary, Nitasha, Amita Vya, and Kalpana Ramiah. "Addressing the Health Needs of South Asians: The Community Perspective." Health, v.4/10 (2012).

Lee, Sunmin, Genevieve Martinez, Grace X. Ma, Chiehwen E. Hsu, Stephanie Robinson, Julie Bawa, and Hee-Soon Juon. "Barriers to Health Care Access in 13 Asian American Communities." American Journal of Health Behavior, v.34/1(2010).

Weng, Suzie. S. and Peter V. Nguyen. "Factors Affecting Elder Caregiving in Multigenerational Asian American Families." Families in Society: The Journal of Contemporary Human Services, v. 92/3(2011).

Asian and Pacific Islander American Health Forum

The Asian and Pacific Islander American Health Forum is a national health policy organization for Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders. It advocates for increased recognition, inclusion, and engagement of these ethnic groups within policies and programs that sustain and improve their health and general well-being. The forum serves the interests of some 17 million Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders living in the United States and its jurisdictions. The forum's programs operate in conjunction with community organizations, health providers, and advocates to provide technical assistance and training. The organization's efforts led to the creation of the White House Initiative on Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders. The forum advocated strongly for the passage of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act and continues to campaign for the routine inclusion of Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders in the collection and dissemination of local, state, and national health data sets.

Pursuant to its overall purpose, the forum engages in a range of policy work in relation to the expansion of health care, the improvement of health care quality, and the expansion and improvement of data pertaining to the health and well-being of the communities in which Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders live. The forum endeavors to affect policy decisions through the analysis of current and prospective policy issues, the building of pertinent and pragmatic coalitions, the systematic engagement of relevant policy makers, and the coverage of its goals and activities in the media. The work of the forum is facilitated by a number of partnerships with a range of community-based organizations, researchers, and specialist health advocates.

Improving the Access to Health Care

The forum focuses on a range of connected policy priorities. First, it is concerned with access to health care, noting, for example, that one in three Korean Americans and one in four Native Hawai‘ians and Pacific Islanders lack health insurance. The forum maintains that as a group, Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders are more likely to be uninsured than non-Hispanic whites. According to a report released in 2011, the forum noted that although 71.7 percent of Asian Americans have insurance coverage compared with 67.4 percent of the general U.S. population, the rates for many groups within the Asian American community are far lower; for example, only 52.1 percent of Cambodians, 46 percent of Hmong, and 44.2 percent of Bangladeshis have health insurance. In addition, 22.5 percent of Bangladeshis lacked health insurance, as did 21.3 percent of Cambodians, 22.3 percent of Koreans, and 22.9 percent of Pakistanis.

According to the forum, one of the reasons for the high rates of uninsured individuals is that a greater-than-average number of Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders either own or work for small businesses. For example, 27 percent of Asian Americans who own or work for small businesses lack health insurance, compared with only 10 percent of Asian Americans who own or are employed by large businesses; similarly, 25 percent of Native Hawai‘ians and Pacific Islanders employed or owning small businesses are uninsured, compared with only 6 percent who own or are employed by large businesses. While public programs such as Medicaid and the Children's Health Insurance Program help reduce the number of uninsured Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders, these individuals continue to experience language and cultural barriers in the insurance enrollment process and difficulties understanding the criteria for insurance eligibility.

Improving the Quality of Health Care

Second, the forum works to ensure that the health care provided for Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders is of sufficient quality, which in the context in which the forum operates refers primarily to health care providers developing mechanisms to allow for the delivery of culturally and linguistically appropriate patient care. The forum maintains the cultural and language barriers faced by the communities it represents exacerbate their health issues since Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders often fail to receive appropriate levels of preventative care, medical advice, counselling, or general health care.

In its 2011 report, the forum stated that the vast majority of Asian Americans (70.5 percent) speak a language other than English at home, a rate higher than that of all other racial and ethnic groups, with the exception of Hispanics/Latinos (76.8 percent). Among Asian American groups, Bangladeshis had the highest proportion of people speaking a language other than English at home (91.5 percent), followed by Hmong (91.3 percent), Pakistanis (85.7 percent), and Vietnamese (84.2 percent). Because these groups speak a language other than English at home, many Asian Americans lack proficiency in English and this undoubtedly results in the language barriers that impede access to quality health care.

The forum's advocacy on behalf of Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders recognizes the need to appreciate these groups' respective cultures and histories and to recognize the impact of each in determining and monitoring their health status. To that end, the forum advocates that ethnic-specific data should be collected, collated, analyzed, and disseminated. However, the relatively small populations of Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders render it somewhat difficult to locate data of sufficient quality and comprehensiveness to provide significant determinations of important health issues and for appropriate levels of intervention.

To that end, the forum seeks to increase research and data collection regarding Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders by supporting a standardized collection of pertinent data on race, ethnicity, and primary language; by increasing the effectiveness of endeavors to collect data in the form of health surveys and within hospitals and other health care organizations; by advocating for the increased collection and dissemination of data by federal agencies; and by seeking to ensure that an adequate range and level of resources are applied to the systematic collection of health data on Asian Americans, Native Hawai‘ians, and Pacific Islanders.

Improving Health Care Equity

Third, the forum is concerned with achieving a level of equity in relation to health care; that is, ensuring that every individual, from every ethnic or cultural group, has a fair opportunity to attain the best standard of health available through the provision of health care. To that end, the forum advocates that data and research need to be undertaken in order to ascertain whether and to what extent health care resources are being applied in an equitable manner; and when there appears to be a disparity in that allocation, the forum believes the socioeconomic factors that might account for this disparity must be effectively addressed.

The forum suggests a range of approaches that might assist in this data collection and analysis, for example, recommending the use of disaggregated data on Asian American, Native Hawai‘ian, and Pacific Islander communities because such data might reveal disparities in health status and/or access to appropriate health care for certain groups within those broader communities. It would follow, the forum argues, that specific rather than generic data such as this would allow policy makers to target health care delivery more effectively, and to set appropriate and more meaningful health care priorities together with the necessary and identified resources. For the forum, the systematic engagement in community-based participatory research would create data that were based upon the direct and relevant experiences of the communities with which the research was concerned.

Rob McCusker
Teesside University

See Also: Asian Americans; Asian Immigrants; Hawai‘ian Native Americans; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Insurance; Pacific Islanders.

Further Readings

Asian and Pacific Islander American Health Forum. http://www.apiahf.org (Accessed November 2013).

Asian and Pacific Islander American Health Forum. "Demographic and Socioeconomic Profiles of Asian Americans, Native Hawai'ians and Pacific Islanders in the United States" (July 2011). http://www.apiahf.org/sites/default/files/Demographic_Socioeconomic_Profiles_AANHPI.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Lee, Sunmin, Genevieve Martinez, Grace X. Ma, Chiehwen E. Hsu, Stephanie Robinson, Julie Bawa, and Hee-Soon Juon. "Barriers to Health Care Access in 13 Asian American Communities." American Journal of Health Behavior, v.34/1(2010).

Asian Immigrants

Recent history has witnessed an influx of Asian immigrants to the United States. Asian immigrants have become an integral part of various aspects of American society by redefining the nation's identity and reshaping its economy. The Asian immigrant population features strong diversity in terms of national origin, ethnicity, culture, socioeconomic backgrounds, and immigration statuses. Some of the largest Asian immigrant groups come from India, Philippines, China, Vietnam, and Korea. These countries differ in language, culture, and immigration statuses.

Depending on their country of origin and circumstances, Asian immigrants migrate to the United States as refugees, asylees, temporary or permanent residents, or undocumented people. Oftentimes, their various migration experiences have socioeconomic and psychosocial impacts on their acculturation to the United States. There are vast implications for the human services needs of the Asian immigrant population because of its growth and diversity. Culturally competent and accessible human services for the Asian immigrant population is not only valuable for an individual immigrant's successful resettlement but also for the long-term social and economic success of the United States from cultivating productive citizens.

Issues Asian Immigrants Face in the United States

Regardless of origin, immigration status, or any other demographic factor, most immigrants experience general stressors of leaving behind a familiar environment to enter a new country with unfamiliar culture, language, climate, social system, and behavioral norms. Immigrants have to navigate through the different aspects of their new surroundings, including finding employment, housing, and addressing any health care needs. However, the considerable diversity within the Asian immigrant population creates varying magnitudes and different sets of issues. For example, an Asian refugee will face more challenges in establishing financial stability than an Asian immigrant coming for a job opportunity. Thus, understanding the Asian immigrant population as heterogeneous acknowledges how differences in their social histories, socioeconomic statuses, and cultural characteristics impact their experiences as immigrants in a new country.

The immigration status of Asian immigrants is especially telling of potential hardships they might experience in adjusting to their new environment. For example, the refugee population face unique and substantial challenges in their immigration to the United States. Refugees are people who flee or are forced to leave their country of origin because of persecution or fear of persecution. The refugee experience can be challenging to their psychological and social acculturation in the United States. Personal losses of friends and family members, country, and familiar way of life can cause severe psychological distress—especially when this occurs abruptly, as is often the case with refugee evacuation. Learning a new language, adapting to a new culture, lack of social network support, and having to establish economic self-sufficiency can compound refugee acculturation stresses. For example, Asian refugees may face challenges in accessing medical care because of financial hardships, transportation problems, language difficulties, and lack of medical insurance.

Human Services Needs of Asian Immigrants

Immigration legislation and policy have been enacted to address some of the human services needs and ameliorate the above-mentioned social and economic challenges. These services often depend on immigrant statuses. For example, the Refugee Act of 1980 provides refugees special assistance with the ultimate goal of economic self-sufficiency. These services include relocation assistance, medical care, English language services, employment counseling and placement, and financial assistance. They are also entitled to Supplemental Security Income, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Medicaid and Children's Health Insurance Program, and food stamps. For immigrants with permanent residence, the services available are more restricted. For example, a sponsored immigrant qualifies for these economic services based on their own income plus the income of their sponsors.

As Asian immigrants adapt to their new environment, their human services needs change. Once immigrants acquire their immediate needs of food, shelter, information, and basic language skills, they transition to intermediate needs of training and education for employment, health services, and housing. Long-term needs may include participating in U.S. society as equals with the native-born population and citizenship.

Barriers and Gaps in Human Services Needs of Asian Immigrants

Important to human services for Asian immigrants are the cultural competency of delivery and the accessibility of services. Although there are human services available to immigrants in the United States, Asian immigrants face many barriers to accessing these services. The main types of barriers to service utilization are informational (awareness of existing and available services), financial, linguistic, cultural, and systemic barriers (policies and structures that keep marginalized groups from gaining access). For example, there are barriers to mental health services for the Asian immigrant population. Studies have found that Asians view mental health services as a last resort and are less likely than their Caucasian counterparts to be referred by any social support system, whether that be family and friends or the criminal justice system. There is a need for programs focused on assisting and connecting Asian immigrants to human services and resources.

How human service programs are administered can address the disparities in human services utilization. Implementation of cultural competency within services, such as health care, can alleviate the barriers by approaching immigrant patients with appropriate and culturally sensitive intervention techniques. Culturally competent techniques can include materials available in the immigrant's native language, bilingual staff or interpretation services, and cultural awareness in those providing services. Closing the barriers and gaps to human services can help Asian immigrants meet their basic needs and improve well-being.

Vi Donna Le
Hye Jeong Choi
Jeff R. Temple
University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston

See Also: Acculturation; Community-Based Services; Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of.

Further Readings

Chow, Julian C., Kim Jaffee, and Lonnie Snowden. "Racial/Ethnic Disparities in the Use of Mental Health Services in Poverty Areas." American Journal of Public Health, v.93 (2003).

Drachman, Diane. "Immigration Statuses and Their Influence on Service Provision, Access, and Use." Social Work, v.40 (1995).

Pereira, Krista M., Robert Crosnoe, Karine Fortuny, and Ajay Chaudry. "Barriers to Immigrants' Access to Health and Human Services Programs." U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, May 2012. http://aspe.hhs.gov/aspe/hsp/11/immigrantaccess/barriers/rb.shtml (Accessed December 2013).

Asian Indian Immigrants

Asian Indians are the third-largest Asian American ethnic group in the United States, constituting 1 percent of the U.S. population, or about 3.18 million people, according to the 2010 U.S. Census. Among all ethnic groups Asian Indian immigrants possess the highest household income. After enactment of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965 and the Immigration Act of 1990, the Indian community carved a niche in American society as highly skilled professionals. The percentage of Asian Indians who are below the federal poverty line is 10 percent, compared to 12 percent of all Americans. About 67 percent of Asian Americans hold graduate degrees, making them one of the wealthiest and best-educated populations in the country. However, Asian Indians experience the same problems as any other immigrants. Moreover, some of these people are taxi drivers, small shop owners, messengers, newspaper hawkers, domestic workers, and waiters in restaurants who are in dire need of service support. All Asian Americans irrespective of their status or nationality are confronted with prejudice and racial discrimination. Child abuse, domestic violence, mental as well as physical health, the plight of senior citizens, single mothers, and lack of communication skills are some of the major problems present in the Asian Indian community.

Prejudice Against Asian Indians

Asian Indians who have settled in the United States have often been the target of racial and other forms of discrimination. Antimiscegenation laws were enacted in the 19th century, and federal legislation adopted in 1882, 1917, 1924, and 1934 categorized persons on a racial basis, dividing people into whites and nonwhites. However, the Immigration Act of 1990 represented the culmination point in the liberal era of immigration policy formulation. As a result of this law, Asian Indian immigrants, along with their children, became more visible in American politics, society, economy, and culture. At the same time, there was division in the Asian Indian community because of the reluctance of many immigrants to enter mainstream American society. An anti-immigration atmosphere was created in some quarters after the act was passed, and there was a sustained campaign by protectionist groups with their slogans of “Hindu invasion” or “Turban tide” against the Indians. The Asian Indians have also become easy targets because of the prejudice of some U.S. residents who see these immigrants as taking jobs away from American citizens.

After September 11, 2001, Asian Indians again became targets of ethnically biased attacks, causing mental trauma for the victims. However, these indiscriminate attacks were condemned by the public and many organizations. The hate crimes against the community became a major concern for Asian Americans, and organizations such as South Asian Alliance for Action and South Asian American Leaders for Tomorrow were established to prevent such crimes.

Service Needs of Asian Indians

The needs of Asian Indian immigrants pertaining to human services are more or less similar to other minority groups coming to the United States from Asia, Africa, and Latin America. The social and economic profile of Asian Indians has become very complex with the increasing influx of immigrants, resulting in the proliferation of human service requirements as well as human service providers. In the health care system, the immigrants sometimes face negative interaction with health care agencies. Lack of information, barriers in language and culture, as well as economic deprivation have restricted the immigrants from obtaining proper health care. Some people receive alternative treatments not only from traditional healers within the Asian Indian community, but also take recourse to Indian ayurvedic medicine. A low level of education and economic constraints among poor immigrants also prevent them from receiving health insurance benefits.

Among the Asian Indians, one of the major causes of mortality is coronary heart disease, which is more common in this population than in other ethnic groups. The comparative prevalence of this heart disease is because of obesity, lack of physical activity, genetic risks, and other medical problems. In order to prevent heart disease, health educators should also look into psychological and social factors. Psychological and behavioral disorders are a major problem in American society, and Asian Indians are not immune to it. Their psychological well-being has become a major concern, as many face difficulties in adjusting to American life. Some develop emotional disturbances like anxiety disorders, schizophrenia, and other types of mental diseases. Under the Community and Mental Health Centers Act of 1963, mental health centers were established throughout the country offering services such as inpatient care, partial hospitalization, and consultation.

The children of Asian Indians also face physical and emotional problems, which are a concern for human service agencies. These difficulties include the plight of children living in single-parent families. Child abuse is another serious problem for some children. Senior citizens with low incomes are provided with low-cost housing, food stamps, and benefits from Old-Age, Survivors, and Disability Insurance (OASDI). Newly arrived women immigrants with low levels of education work as child care assistants, taking care of the children of working parents. Some of them also work in homes making packaged foods to be sold in grocery stores. Even educated immigrant women are not paid as well as their white counterparts. Domestic abuse against women is increasing, and organizations like Manavi, Sakhi, Apna Ghar, and Maitri have been set up in New Jersey, New York, Chicago, and San Francisco.

Social service agencies have been established to mitigate the plight of persons working in low-wage service positions. The oldest of these agencies, the National Association of Indians in America, was established in 1967, and has provided assistance to immigrants. Other agencies and human service providers teach new immigrants the basic skills of communicating in English. About 5,000 attorneys are members of the North American South Asian Bar Association, and this organization represents Asian Indians who are charged with criminal offenses or denied fundamental rights. Taxi drivers of South Asian origin formed the New York Taxi Workers Alliance in 1996 to obtain better working conditions.

The various human service groups that have sprung up to assist immigrants have an important task to perform. A competent human service provider dealing with Asian Indians from diverse cultures should be familiar with special culture-centered counseling techniques. An empathic understanding will also alleviate the sufferings of Asian Indians; the human service needs of this client group will be better addressed and immigrants will face an even better future in the United States.

Patit Paban Mishra
Sambalpur University

See Also: Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Historical Role of; Asian Americans; Asian Immigrants; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Health Promotion Services; Social and Economic Justice; Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

Further Readings

Agarwal, P. Passage from India: Post 1965 Indian Immigrants and Their Children: Conflicts, Concerns, and Solutions. Palos Verdes, CA: Yuvati Publications, 1991.

Bacon, Jean Leslie. Life Lines: Community, Family, and Assimilation Among Asian Indian Immigrants. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Bloodgood, Chandra. Becoming an Au Pair: Working as a Live-in Nanny. Port Orchard, WA: Windstorm Creative, 2005.

Burger, William R. Human Services in Contemporary America. Belmont, CA: Thomas Brooks/Cole, 2008.

Das Gupta, Monisha. Unruly Immigrants: Rights, Activism, and Transnational South Asian Politics in the United States. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2006.

Jensen, Joan M. Passage from India: Asian Indian Immigrants in North America. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.

Joshi, Khyati Y. New Roots in America's Sacred Ground: Religion, Race, and Ethnicity in Indian America. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2006.

Kulanjiyil, T. Indian Immigrants and Mental Health Needs. New York: Parivar International, 2012.

Motwani, Jagat K. America and India in a "Give and Take" Relationship: Socio-Psychology of Asian Indian Immigrants. New York: Center for Asian, African and Caribbean Studies, 2003.

Park, H. L. Enabling Services at Health Centers: Eliminating Disparities and Improving Quality. New York: New York Academy of Medicine and Met Life Foundation, 2006.

Ramisetty-Mikler, Suhasini. "Asian Indian Immigrants in America and Sociocultural Issues in Counseling." Journal of Multicultural Counseling and Development, v.21/1 (1993).

Rangaswamy, Padma. Indian Americans. New York: Chelsea Publishing, 2007.

Ranjan, Gita and Shailja Sharma. New Cosmopolitanisms: South Asians in the U.S. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2006.

Singh, Bedi H. and Neena Rosey Kahlon. Problematics of Indian Immigrants. New Delhi: Rajat Publications, 2010.

Ty, Eleanor and Donald C. Goellnicht. Asian North American Identities: Beyond the Hyphen. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2004.

Assimilation

Globalization, described as the movement of people across national borders, presents both opportunities and challenges with regard to how migrant hosting nations, ethnic cultures, and, indeed, service providers deal with issues of identity and difference. It is increasingly evident that theorists, policy makers, and practitioners will have to grapple with issues that arise within this "crucible of cultures" brought about by increasingly high levels of cross-border activity in the contemporary forms of migration. For politicians, social workers, and other practitioners, the increasing heterogeneity of ethnocultural identities and differences has triggered a plethora of theories and strategies for appreciating, understanding, and dealing with difference. Thus, assimilation is one such alternative, choice, concept, or approach to dealing with intercultural relations.

Within the past two centuries, following significant levels of migration, assimilation was thrust into the forefront of social academic theorizing, research, and political discussion, predominantly in America and Europe.

Assimilation at its basic level means the process by which immigrant individuals, ethnocultures, and groups adjust or are made to adjust their behavior (socially and economically) in order to assume the dominant or host or native culture. On the face of it, it may seem that considerable consensus exists regarding the meaning of the concept of assimilation. Yet when the range of points of view are interrogated, the extent of the differing perspectives around both the process and the meaning of the term assimilation emerge. Indeed, the meaning of the term has at times been notoriously elusive for many reasons: first, because it has been contested that the original meaning and model attributed to the phenomena of the interaction between groups was viewed as far too simplistic, inept, or inadequate in explaining how new minority groups blended into the majority (normally native) groups within immigrant hosting countries over the past century. The second argument comes from concerted longitudinal studies and also a reexamination of group behaviors and community relations that revealed other equally enriching perspectives and insight into intergroup ethnocultural and social relationships and the process of arriving at a point in time where they seem to blend. These ongoing developments present new and equally valid grounds for reappraising earlier propositions, thereby contributing to the existing body of knowledge.

Thus, as a further extension of the points made above, assimilation may also be defined as the point in time at which evidence of full understanding (social and structural engagement) between the minority and majority groups becomes evident. The Chicago school of sociology in particular brought this discussion to another level at the beginning of the 20th century. During the initial theorizing assimilation was portrayed as a process that was linear, or a continuum with one end of the line depicting a distinct and definable migrant ethnic group that holds clear home cultural values, while on the other end of the continuum the groups will have adjusted into a host (native) culture enough as to be indistinguishable from that of the host ethnic/cultural group.

Perhaps it is important to state that although a sociological focus on the model of assimilation seemed to wane in the 1970s, its resurgence has been brought about by increased voluntary or involuntary migration worldwide. Voluntary migration involves the movement of people from their home country to another for economic reasons, including employment. Involuntary migration also involves the movement of people to another country, but there is an element of being forced by circumstances such as conflict, environmental disasters, displacement, or other forms of disaster. People affected by involuntary migration may seek asylum in a stable country and may be granted refugee status.

Discussions around assimilation have often been framed within the context of cross-border movements, that is, migration. Yet migration has been taking place for thousands of years. The expansion of the Greek, Roman, and Carthaginian empires, for example, was an exercise in some form of assimilation. The efforts by explorers such as Vasco da Gama, Ferdinand Magellan, and Christopher Columbus and the expansion of the British Empire in the 19th century resulted in some form of social and economic contact and interaction between explorers and natives (i.e., indigeneous groups), rulers and the ruled, the colonizers and the colonized.

Perhaps the key factors that shaped and continue to impact the discussion about assimilation relate to three key aspects: (1) the definition and redefinition of democracy over time, individual and other rights in an increasingly human rights–driven era; (2) the significantly lower levels in previous migrations as compared to the post-20th-century migration; and (3) resource pressures brought about by rising population numbers and migration over time.

Thus, it can be observed over time that perfectly legitimate demands on the part of immigrants on the basis of human rights may run counter to perceived and sometimes real economic, social, and political insecurities and pressures from within the migrant hosting nations. For reasons of perceived and real cultural and economic insecurities and pressures, nothing short of assimilation was generally expected to inform political, development, and social policies in the 19th and 20th centuries. The inability to stem migration—whether in Europe or Australia—brings back the discussion to assimilation.

The concept of assimilation is essentially a race and cultural relations concept discussed as such by many social researchers. First used in the United States, the concept has generally been credited to the work of Robert Park, who researched extensively into race relations theory. Park depicted the race relations cycle in terms of four distinct stages: contact, competition, accommodation, and assimilation. It has generally been accepted that the concept was first used in America in referring to the process that minority cultures undertook in settling among the dominant white race. Indeed, the context within which these debates have taken place in recent decades does provoke a debate worth considering.

Migration constitutes one of the most striking global developments of the last century and has exerted a phenomenal social and cultural impact with regard to geodemographics in a number of countries in the world. The majority of the people who are displaced by wars, political instability, and environmental change migrate to neighboring countries. However, a significant number fleeing from conflicts seek asylum in countries far away from their country of origin. The farther afield people travel to seek asylum and migrate, the greater the likelihood that they will encounter a culture significantly different from their own, or that the immigrant culture will be wildly misunderstood or misrepresented by a majority or host group. Thus, the

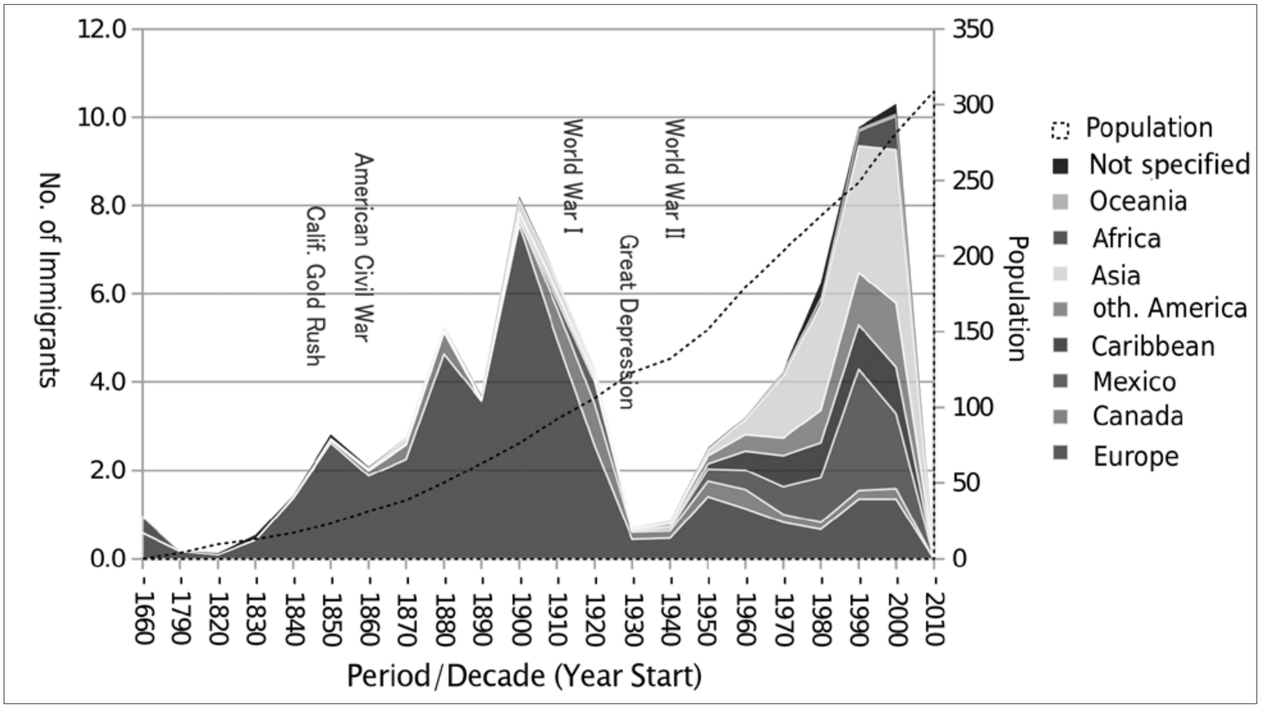

Figure 1 Immigration to the United States (Between 1660 and 2009 in millions). Assimilation at its basic level means the process by which immigrant individuals, ethnocultures, and groups adjust or are made to adjust their behavior in order to assume the host or native culture.

Sources: U.S. Department of Homeland Security 2011 Yearbook of Immigration Statistics. Data prior to 1820, "History of Immigration to the United States." http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/History_of_immigration_to_the_United_States.

host society, who are mostly politically and socially powerful and influential, may seek to set a framework within which to integrate the migrants. Yet the host community and nation may largely draw these frameworks for engagements around their cultural and national values. While some critics may rightly argue that assimilation may be desirable or essential for proper functioning of a community or nation, immigrants may argue that assimilation places unnecessary constraints on them.

From the above discussion, it is not problematic to see why assimilation has a number of critics in that it creates perhaps a forced notion of "the host knows it all" situation. Thus, assimilation essentially revolves around the expectation that minority ethnocultural groups and mostly migrants will blend into the dominant culture or host nation of which they have become a part. This progressive process is associated with immigrant individuals and groups reconfiguring their behavior in order to be deemed fit by the host nation and ethnocultural groups. The process is associated by demands, articulated or not, from the host nation or culture for immigrants to become and behave "native and host nation cultured." Thus, assimilation is often also referred to as "cultural assimilation" within the diversity discourse.

Often central to the discourse about assimilation is its effect on the minority groups as they adjust to be incorporated into the majority cultural group. The identity of members of the minority group is undermined and threatened as the distinct role and values that have served them well previously in their home countries/cultural groups are subjected to change or extinction. Thus, for example, in response to such outside pressure, a member of a minority group may seek other forms of identity within in-groups of their home minority ethnic group with a view to retaining aspects of their values and culture that have previously proven to sustain them. External cultural threats to a minority ethnic cultural group may not necessarily be detrimental to a minority group. On the contrary, pressures from the majority and the powerful to assimilate may provide the impetus to and rationale for resorting to their own cultural and group values to help them make sense and cope with challenges facing them in the host nation/community context.

It has been suggested with proponents of an assimilationist perspective that immigrants will inevitably become like the main group over time, and the immigrant having lived the longest in a given place or within a host culture will display fewer characteristics that can be traced to their home/cultural group than newer immigrants. Yet others have argued that the journey by immigrants toward assimilation is characterized by barriers and roadblocks against migrants to which host nations, cultural groups, or nations are oblivious. Thus, the issue is often advanced by some critics that this relates to a relative disadvantage faced by migrants that host communities often ignore in policy making. The argument states that the journey to assimilate for migrants and often minority groups may be punctuated by economic and cultural blocks from the majority because of discrimination and ethnocentric tendencies. Confronted with such hurdles in the new context and environment, it has been suggested that it ought to be acknowledged that minorities should be able to celebrate and develop links and avenues to cope or circumvent challenges in the new environment. Indeed, structural barriers such as institutional barriers may present obstacles and impede the assimilation process.

The above does make it necessary to consider some arguments and propositions about how the level of assimilation may be measured. The level of assimilation and the process of assimilation may be measured around the following dimensions, though this is by no means exhaustive:

1. Social status: This aspect centers on the experiences of immigrants around occupation, levels of income, education prospects, and attainment and how these measure up to those of the host community.
2. Language: The loss of home-nation language and adoption of the host community's language has sometimes being associated with assimilation. The more likely a minority group is able to speak the language of the host nation and community has been attributed to the process of assimilation.
3. Spatial separation: This relates to the patterns that develop over time between the host and immigrant communities. It has been suggested that as the process of assimilation takes hold, the usually concentrated patterns of settlement by immigrants will gradually decrease as the immigrant community settles among the host community areas.

4. Intermarriage: This is a critical feature that has been attributed to assimilation. Second generations and third generations of immigrants may show characteristics of intermarriage with the locals and in the process display intimate and improved relations with the host community.

Although at the outset this discussion seems to suggest that assimilation is the relationship between the majority determining the course of events and the minority, it is a more complex concept. In certain cases it may simply revolve around the powerful cultural minority exercising power over minority groups. In certain cases it may be the powerful minority expecting, and to an extent requiring, that the majority they forcibly occupy, for example in a colonialist context, assimilate to the minority culture, social expectations, and values.

The process of globalization, the free movement of people, and the right to life for those fleeing persecution and conflict (generally known as protection) mean that there will always continue to be discussions on what forms intergroup relations must take to uphold human rights and the civil liberty of migrants. In the final analysis, this discussion does not seek to suggest a preferred option for dealing with identity and cultural difference brought about by migration.

Indeed, for example, although the countries in the European Union share common ideals of democracy and free society, nationally each one of the countries pursues vastly different approaches to migration between them—assimilation being just one of many alternatives. Perhaps the most critical point worth considering is how policies and practices at national or local levels and service provision take into account human rights and the civil liberties of migrants in an increasingly mobile and ethnically diverse world brought about by migration.

Martin Nthakomwa
Coventry University

See Also: Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of;; Immigration: Human Service Issues; Immigration Law, History of U.S.; Pluralism.

Further Readings

Alba, Richard and Victor Nee. Remaking the American Mainstream: Assimilation and Contemporary Immigration. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2005.

Gordon, Milton. A*ssimilation in American Life: The Role of Race, Religion and National Origins*. New York: Oxford University Press, 1964.

Salins, Peter. Assimilation, American Style. New York: Basic Books, 1997.

Assistive Technology

Assistive technology has been used to assist humans in everyday tasks throughout history. However, the systematic use of the term assistive technology has emerged only recently. Formal definition of assistive technology (AT) was first published in the Technology-Related Assistance for Individuals with Disabilities Act of 1988 (commonly known as the Tech Act), which was amended in 1994 and replaced with the Assistive Technology Act of 1998 (AT Act) and remains in effect today via Public Law 100–407. Since 1988 this legal definition has been used in other federal legislation authorizing services and supports for persons with disabilities. For example, the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) includes P.L. 100–407.

In the United States, according to the Assistive Technology Act of 1998, AT refers to any "item, piece of equipment, or system, whether acquired commercially, modified, or customized, that is commonly used to increase, maintain, or improve functional capabilities of individuals with disabilities." Assistive technology, also called adaptive technology, can be used in the home, workplaces, schools, nursing facilities, hospitals, museums, and numerous community buildings and locations.

AT tools include assistive, adaptive, and rehabilitative devices that promote independence for individuals with disabilities by enabling them to increase their mobility, comprehension, and access to learning and to accomplish daily tasks and perform basic functions. For instance, there are keyboards with colors and large keys, as well as ergonomically designed computer mouses and speech recognition computer software to improve writing and listening for people with limited hand and body movement and visual, hearing, and speech impairments.

AT devices can be low tech, medium tech, or high tech. In addition to new technologies and computer software, AT can include simple tools and devices such as ergonomically designed pencils, enlarged text, traffic sounds, echoes, pedestrian signals, the texture of the sidewalk, hearing aids, text telephones (TTYs) and telecommunication devices for the deaf (TDDs), walkers, and prosthetic body parts. It is now the law that federally funded Web sites must be Section 508-compliant, or accessible to those with disabilities. Assistive technology for homes, workplaces, schools, and nursing homes may include any of the following:

- AT for motor aspects of writing, such as adapted tool grips, stabilized materials with nonslip materials, slantboards, and raised lined paper;
- AT for reading, such as book easels, enlarged text, color overlays, books on tape, e-texts and books, screen readers, picture symbols, highlighter tape, screen magnifiers, enlarged text, and braille;
- AT for study and learning, such as picture schedules, highlighter tape, outlining and scheduling programs, handheld recorders, and visual timers;
- AT for mobility, such as gait trainers, standers, walkers, braces, power and manual wheelchairs, scooters, canes, and adapted tricycles;
- AT for daily living, such as adapted eating and drinking utensils, adapted personal hygiene tools, switch-operated cooking devices, picture task analysis for chores, environmental control units, and adapted swings;
- Augmentative communication devices, such as speech-generating devices and voice amplifiers, speech recognition devices, eye-gaze boards, and object communication boards;
- Medical equipment and medical supplies, such as patient lifts, orthotics and prosthetics, hearing aids, electric larynxes, and sip-and-puff systems—activated by inhaling or exhaling;
- Special equipment and AT for work, study, and recreation, such as enlarged computer keyboards, text-to-speech (TTS) and speech-to-text software, voice recognition software, amplified telephones, magnifiers, adaptive sport equipment, keyguards, minimouses, touch screens, trackballs, and joysticks;
- AT for hearing, such as classroom amplification systems, personal amplification systems, captioning, and TTY/TDD conversion modems;
- Equipment and AT for community access and accessibility adaptations, such as ramps, stair glides, lifts, accessible public transportation, talking automatic teller machines (ATMs), and voting machines for the visually challenged;
- AT for writing, such as word cards, handheld spell checkers, tablet personal computers, sentence strips, tape recorders, talking word processors, graphic organizing software, and word processor accessibility features;
- AT for mathematics, such as talking calculators, graph paper to organize math problems, and recorded work problems; and
- AT for seating and positioning, such as nonslip surfaces on chairs, bolsters, and adopted chairs or wheelchairs.

Assistive technology serves people with communication disorders, impaired mobility, hearing and visual impairments, and cognitive and learning disabilities. AT includes the selection of appropriate devices and services, training in how to use them, solutions for caregivers, and ideas for future research and development. In addition to improving the daily tasks and functions of people with disabilities, AT provides security and support for people at risk and experiencing difficulty, such as the personal emergency response system (PERS) that triggers an alert for assistance.

Who Benefits From Assistive Technology?

Assistive technologies have been developed to help many different types of people with a vast variety of challenges. These challenges are not limited to low vision, a voice or speech disorder, cognitive impairment, hearing impairment, brain injury, progressive degenerative diseases, developmental delay or disorder, attention issues, autism, and social, emotional, and behavioral challenges. AT also assists people who have difficulty learning English as a second language and other learning disabilities, as well as those with performance challenges in school and in the workplace or with temporary difficulties because of health issues, aging, and accidents.

History of Assistive Technologies

Several world events have impacted the need for and development of assistive technologies. Following the American Civil War and World War II, there were major developments in medicine and science and advancements in orthopedic devices, such as prosthetic limbs and wheelchairs. The advent of new technologies since the 1970s also had a major impact on the advancement of assistive technologies. For example, educational software was developed for improving literacy, mathematics, and reading text out loud.

Hearing aids were first patented in the 1890s and improved in size and quality following World War II and the Vietnam War because of the fact that hearing damage was the leading disability for military personnel. Tremendous effort and funding for the development and advancement of new technologies to improve hearing loss was supported by the U.S. military and other federally funded initiatives. AT is continuing to develop in the 21st century in response to an increasing number of soldiers who are returning to the United States with motor and cognitive impairments and other neurological disorders, including traumatic brain injury, as well as mobility, hearing, and sight loss.

The field of AT is improving at a very rapid pace with the help of new technologies and innovations in telecommunications, nanotechnologies, biotechnologies, and robotics, as well as the demand and the necessity for inclusive education and business models. As the outdoor navigation technologies such as talking traffic signs and global positioning systems (GPS) improve, they provide directional cues for persons with visual impairments.

There is a growing emphasis on developing inclusive, transformative educational resources and products that can be used by everyone. It is easy to create lesson plans using the universal design for learning (UDL) that was developed by the Center for Applied Special Technology. UDL provides a template for creating flexible learning goals, methods, educational resources, and assessment models that differentiate education and accommodate learners with different abilities.

Melda N. Yildiz
Kean University

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990; Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, United Nations; Individuals with Disabilities Education Act; Meaningful Access; National Database for Autism Research; Special Education; Universal Access/Universal Design.

Further Readings

Bodine, C. Assistive Technology and Science. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2013.

Bugaj, C. R., S. Norton-Darr, and International Society for Technology in Education. The Practical (and fun) Guide to Assistive Technology in Public Schools. Eugene, OR: International Society for Technology in Education, 2010.

Florian, L., ed. The Sage Handbook of Special Education. London: Sage, 2007.

GovTrack.US. "H.R. 4278--108th Congress: Assistive Technology Act of 2004." http://www.govtrack.us/congress/bills/108/hr4278 (Accessed November 2013).

LD OnLine. "Technology." http://www.ldonline.org/indepth/technology (Accessed November 2013).

National Center on Accessible Instructional Materials. http://aim.cast.org (Accessed November 2013).

Rose, D. H. and A. Meyer. "Teaching Every Student in the Digital Age: Universal Design for Learning" (2002). Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development. http://www.cast.org/teachingeverystudent/ideas/tes (Accessed November 2013).

School of Public Health and Health Professions, University at Buffalo, State University of New York. "Assistive Technology Training Online Project." http://atto.buffalo.edu (Accessed November 2013).

United States Access Board. http://www.access-board.gov (Accessed November 2013).

World Health Organization. "Disabilities and Rehabilitation: Assistive Devices/Technologies." http://www.who.int/disabilities/technology/en (Accessed November 2013).

Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development

The Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development (AMCD)—a division of the American Counseling Association (ACA)—is an organization that strives to encourage counseling practitioners and other mental health providers to be aware of and understand multiculturalism and the influence of the multicultural counseling approach.

Multiculturalism has been recognized as the "fourth force" in the counseling profession. Its basic principle is that society and communities learn to accept the cultural differences of their populations and strive to provide equality of protection for individuals from varied backgrounds to include race, ethnicity, ability, sexual orientation, religion, national origin, and culture. More recently, multiculturalism has expanded to include training of counselors in the United States and establishing multicultural counseling competencies as a guide to becoming proficient in this area. Today, counselors are trained in the skills that enable them to become aware of cultural differences in themselves and others.

History

The AMCD was originally the Association of Non-White Concerns in Personnel and Guidance (ANWC), which was established in 1972. Several years before that, the members of what would become the ANWC asked the American Personnel and Guidance Association (APGA)—the former name of the American Counseling Association—to create a separate division that would focus on nonwhite concerns. Although ANWC members paid their dues to the APGA, they had experienced limited representation and had no voting rights on the APGA's board of directors or senate. Despite recommendations pointing out the need for a multicultural perspective in counseling and education, APGA officials did not believe there was a need for a division to focus on minority issues. After long discussions and several meetings between the ANWC and APGA, APGA denied the ANWC's request.

The interested members of ANWC continued to have their own sessions and group meetings. The group expanded its membership and elected its own officers. Group members also raised funds to accomplish their goals. However, the members still experienced a lack of help or encouragement from APGA. The interested group members of ANWC continued to expend their efforts toward their goal. The members elected agents and kept disseminating information to group members who were interested in becoming a division of APGA. They also provided information concerning current progress and what was happening within the APGA.

The interested group members of the ANWC found out that the APGA could not provide any assistance to the group. Three weeks prior to the APGA national conference in 1972, the elected officers of ANWC visited the APGA headquarters in Washington, D.C., to discuss their request to become a separate division. The ANWC members and APGA officials had many long discussions about the name, tax-exempt status, membership, and other details.

However, the APGA officials did not immediately approve the request and continued to vacillate. But at the APGA's 1972 national conference in Chicago, ANWC members finally achieved their goal of establishing a separate division. Over 400 ANWC members attended a preconference to show their support for the new division. The ANWC division was officially chartered at the Chicago convention. The name of the division was changed to the Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development in 1985.

Leadership

Samuel H. Johnson was the most significant leader of the ANWC. He and his colleagues made a great effort to develop the ANWC and influenced people in the community to educate themselves about multicultural concerns. The ANWC became one of the most recognized and respected organizations for minority groups in the helping professions. Johnson was the president of ANWC for two terms and later became president emeritus of the AMCD.

Past and current leaders of the AMCD have continually focused on the development and goals of the organization. The leaders have worked hard to improve human and civil rights development. The current concerns of the AMCD are to create an ongoing international outreach to mentor graduate students, provide guidance to new professionals, and publish materials with active, multicultural-competent helping professionals.

Mission

The Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development aims to create programs that assist counseling practitioners and students in attaining awareness and understanding of cultural and ethnic differences. The organization has recognized the need for establishing multicultural competencies and standards for counseling practitioners who work with diverse client groups. The AMCD promotes opportunities among counseling trainees, supervisors, and practitioners for the development of multicultural competence. The association also makes an effort to educate and train counseling professionals and students in order to improve their knowledge of ethnic, racial, and cultural diversity.

The AMCD promotes the counseling profession and other mental health professions in being aware of and understanding the impact of cultural and ethnic differences on the counseling process. The organization's focus is to enhance criteria and guidelines for providing development-counseling services to people of all cultures and ethnic diversity groups. The AMCD also encourages counselors and students from diverse cultural backgrounds to advance and sustain personal growth through improved educational programs. Moreover, the AMCD identifies and advocates for eliminating conditions that develop barriers that could harm or risk the development, health, and wellness of people from a diversity of cultural and ethnic groups. In addition, the AMCD publishes a newsletter four times a year, which contains information about ethnic concerns of interest to group members, and produces a quarterly publication, the Journal of Multicultural Counseling and Development, which focuses on and addresses various topics such as race, culture, ethnicity, gender, religion, sexual orientation, ability, acculturation, and social class, among others.

Multicultural Counseling and Development

The AMCD has emphasized the importance of multicultural counseling competencies and ethnic and racial comprehension to mental health practitioners and students across a variety of professions. Several authors in the field of multiculturalism write about multicultural counseling to include different forms and ways of human interaction, engagement, and innovations across different backgrounds. Multicultural counseling recognizes that counseling practitioners should respect individuals' race, ethnicity, ability, sexual orientation, religion, national origin, and culture while working with diverse populations.

The AMCD identifies multicultural counseling competencies across three domains: attitudes and beliefs, knowledge, and skills. The AMCD maintains that culturally skilled counselors must be aware of their own cultural values and biases. It is important for counselors to have knowledge about their own racial and cultural differences to avoid having a negative effect on clients. The AMCD believes that culturally skilled counselors should understand clients' worldview. Culturally skilled counselors are also fully aware of the particular group with which they are working in order to eliminate negative reactions in counseling. Additionally, counselors should become familiar with the historical and current sociopolitical influences that may impact the lives of racial and ethnic minorities. The AMCD affirms that counselors need to be aware of culturally appropriate intervention strategies. Culturally skilled counselors respect clients' religions, beliefs, and values because they relate to interventions and strategies helpful in working with specific groups.

Monique N. Mercado
Sunkyung Chung
St. Mary's University

See Also: Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Competence, Training in; Culturally Diverse Practice, Theories of; Education for Diversity in Human Services.

Further Readings

Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development. http://www.multiculturalcounseling.org (Accessed November 2013).

Monk, G. D., J. M. Winslade, and S. Sinclair. New Horizons in Multicultural Counseling. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2008.

Roysircar, G. "Introduction to a Special Issue on the Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development Leadership History." Journal of Multicultural Counseling and Development, v.38/4 (2010).

Smith, M. L. and G. Roysirca. “African American Male Leaders in Counseling: Interviews With Five AMCD Past Presidents.” Journal of Multicultural Counseling and Development, v.38/4 (2010).

Thomas, K. R. and S. G. Weinrach. “Mental Health Counseling and the AMCD Multicultural Counseling Competencies: A Civil Debate.” Journal of Mental Health Counseling, v.26/1 (2004).

Association of Administrators of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children

The Association of Administrators of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children (AAICPC) was established in 1974 and consists of members from all 50 states, the District of Columbia, and the U.S. Virgin Islands. The AAICPC has authority under the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children (ICPC) to promulgate rules and regulations to more effectively carry out the terms and provisions of this compact. The AAICPC obtains its secretariat services as an affiliate of the American Public Human Services Association.

The secretariat to AAICPC provides administrative, legal, and technical assistance to individual states that administer the compact. The secretariat also offers resources and information for resolving problems of mutual concern and formulating common policies, practices, and goals. The secretariat does not generally handle questions about individual cases, and these questions should be referred to the public human service agency or private child placement agency responsible for the case.

The Compact’s Process

The Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children is an agreement between all 50 states, Washington, D.C., and the U.S. Virgin Islands. The compact provides for the movement and safe placement of children between states when the children are in the custody of a state, being placed for private/independent adoption or, under certain circumstances, being placed by a parent or guardian in a residential treatment facility (RTF). The process involves several steps. In order for an ICPC placement request to get started, a caseworker (or adoption entity) in the state in which the child is located creates a packet that includes such items as the child’s social, medical, and educational history and the current status of any court case involving the child. The packet will also include information about the person who is being considered for placement of the child in the receiving state, so that the receiving state will know whom they should be evaluating for possible placement. Once the local person in the sending state creates the placement request packet, it is sent to the central ICPC office in the sending state (usually the state capital, e.g., Austin, Texas).

The ICPC central office in the sending state makes sure everything is in the packet, approves it to be sent out, and then transmits it to the ICPC central office in the state where the child would be placed. Once it arrives in the central office of the receiving state, that office also looks at the packet and, if all is in order, the central office will send it to the social services agency office in the community where the home of the prospective placement is located. Someone from the social services agency will then visit the home, meet with everyone in the home, conduct background screening, and make a determination as to whether the home should be approved for the child to come and live there.

A completed home study report is then sent from the local agency to the central ICPC office in that receiving state and the placement request is either approved or denied based on the recommendation of the home study report. The packet is then sent from the receiving state to the central office in the first state for review. Finally, the local office that started the placement request is sent a copy of the completed home study, along with documentation of the receiving state’s decision to either approve or deny the placement request. If the request has been approved by the receiving state, the child can be placed in the chosen home.

While there is much more detail to the process in terms of the forms, financial arrangements for the child, and licensing that may need to be put in place, this is a simple overview of each of the steps that the placement request process will take to go from the local level in one state, through the central office of each state, to the local level in the other state and back again. The process ensures that when children are placed out of state, they are placed in a safe and nurturing environment that can meet their particular needs.

The Compact's Purpose

The primary purpose of the ICPC is to ensure that children placed out of state are placed with caregivers who are safe, suitable, and able to meet the child's needs. The ICPC requires an assessment of these factors before a child is placed out of state. Individual state statutes are not enough to ensure that such an assessment takes place before placement because the authority of an individual state and its statutes end at the state's border. As a legally binding agreement between all states, the ICPC ensures that children enjoy a uniform set of protections and benefits, regardless of which state they are moving to or from.

Another critical function of the ICPC is to ensure that the person or entity that places a child out of state retains legal and financial responsibility for the child after the placement occurs. This directly benefits children by eliminating any question of who is ultimately responsible for the child's well-being and for meeting the child's needs following placement. The ICPC also protects the interests of states by ensuring that individual states are not put in the position of having to take on the legal and financial burden of caring for children placed within their borders from other states.

The Compact's Protocol

The ICPC governs the following types of placements: (1) the placement of a child in the care or custody of a state public child welfare agency with a relative family, a foster family, or an adoptive family in another state; (2) the placement of a child by any individual or entity into another state if the placement is for the purpose of adoption; (3) the placement of a child by any individual or entity into a licensed residential treatment center located in another state; and (4) under certain circumstances, the placement of a child with the child's parent or parents located in another state.

The ICPC does not govern the following types of placements: (1) the placement of a child by the child's parent, stepparent, grandparent, adult sibling, adult uncle, adult aunt, or legal guardian with any such relative or guardian located in another state; and (2) the placement of a child into a medical facility, a psychiatric institution, or a boarding school located in another state.

The Interstate Compact for Juveniles (ICJ) is a contract between the states that regulates the interstate movement of children who are under court supervision or who have run away from home and left their state of residence. The ICJ provides for states' supervision and return of youth who (1) have run away from home and left their state of residence; (2) are on probation, parole, or under supervision, and have escaped to another state; (3) have been accused of an offense in another state; (4) are in need of institutionalization or special services in another state; and (5) are offenders who have been released into the community and wish to relocate to another state.

Tamikia S. Lott
Old Dominion University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services, Overview; Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators; At-Risk Youth Services; Child Welfare Services; Childhood Trauma; Educational Support Services; Gangs: Social Issues and Intervention; Gangs in Schools; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Detention Centers; Juvenile Justice System, The.

Further Readings

Association of Administrators of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children. http://www.aphsa.org/content/AAICPC/en/home.html (Accessed November 2013).

Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators. http://ajca.us (Accessed November 2013).

Holloway, Christopher. "Interstate Compact for Juveniles" (2000). U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/ojjdp/fs200012.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Interstate Commission for Juveniles. http://www.juvenilecompact.org (Accessed November 2013).

Interstate Commission for Juveniles. "ICJ Rules" (2009). http://www.juvenilecompact.org/LinkClick.aspx?fileticket=hvMqJ-56kQk%3d&tabid=648 (Accessed November 2013).

Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators

In 1954, magazine articles began to publicize the epidemic of runaway juveniles. Oftentimes juvenile runaways crossed state lines to ensure their whereabouts remained undiscovered. Because of the recognition that action required, various organizations sought to develop counteractive legislation. Efforts were directed toward devising an interstate agreement to cover manifold state problems implicating juveniles.

To devise an interstate agreement, needs were identified that included procedures to permit the return of runaways, absconders, and escapees who were discovered in other states. In addition, to devise an interstate agreement a system under which juvenile offenders could be supervised in other states had to be implemented. The Council of State Governments, with the assistance of many other groups, undertook the task of drafting a compact to meet these needs. Among the organizations that worked with the council on this task were the National Probation and Parole Association, the U.S. Children's Bureau, the Senate Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency, the National Association of Attorneys General, and the Parole and Probation Compact Administrators Association. The Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators (AJCA) came from the work group's efforts. AJCA oversees the Interstate Compact for Juveniles (ICJ) for the United States. The deputy compact administrator of each state is a member of the association and responsible for the daily ICJ activities for his/her state.

Model

AJCA comprises compact administrators and deputies appointed by each state and other participating jurisdictions. It is responsible for developing and adopting the rules and regulations that currently govern the administration of ICJ. Also, AJCA actively participates in stipulating the uniform, cooperative, interstate supervision of juveniles on probation and parole; provides for the prompt return (from one state to another) of juveniles who have run away from home and/or escaped from institutions; promotes education about the compact and probation and parole practices; provides training to juvenile justice professionals; and provides additional measures to protect juveniles and the public. Furthermore, the national AJCA may identify failures to comply with established rules.

AJCA was modeled after the successful operation of the Interstate Compact for the Supervision of Parolees and Probationers (Adult Compact), which served to encourage the compact approach for interstate action on juvenile problems. The Adult Compact came about after Congress enacted the Crime Control Consent Act in 1934. Subsequently, the final draft of the Interstate Compact for Juveniles was approved in 1955, and the first organizational meeting of the compact administrators was held in 1956. By 1986, all 50 states, the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, and Guam had ratified the ICJ. Today the ICJ continues to provide for the welfare and protection of juveniles and the public.

AJCA Role and Function

AJCA is dedicated to cooperation among states and jurisdictions that are part of the ICJ. The AJCA provides for the well-being and safety of juveniles as well as the community, promulgates rules and regulations, and ensures that the provisions of the compact are homogeneously administered in all states and jurisdictions that have adopted the compact.

The role of the AJCA is to provide for the uniform cooperative interstate supervision of juveniles on probation or parole. Also, the role of AJCA calls for the punctual return, between states, of juveniles who have run away, escaped, absconded, or fled to avoid prosecution; declaration of rules and regulations as empowered by the governing statute; and effective means to carry out the terms and provisions of the ICJ. Likewise, the role of AJCA is to cooperate with the sending states' terms of supervision while maintaining the quality supervision that the receiving state would provide to its own juveniles, in addition to promoting education and offering training to its members and other juvenile justice professionals.

The AJCA's role with the national commission is to closely support a smooth, seamless transition for successful implementation of the new compact. It is the AJCA's goal to assist noncompact states and the national commission to provide uninterrupted services to youth and families during this critical transition period. The AJCA's role with the national commission is to provide specialized and specific training on compact issues, provide education and consultation on daily compact operations, and reinforce compacting and noncompacting states to continue to operate in an accommodating fashion to safely transfer and return juvenile offenders under joint supervision agreements. Correspondingly, AJCA's role is to continue to provide support to the noncompacting states and to communicate issues to the national commission in an effective manner.

As it relates to functionality, the state juvenile compact administrator is responsible for ensuring implementation of statutory mandates for the ICJ in his/her home state. Additionally, this individual or designee represents the state in the national AJCA. While organizational structures vary and daily allocation may occur, duties that must be completed include ensuring all runaways, absconders, escapees, or fugitives are returned in accordance with the ICJ statutory provisions, AJCA rules, regulations, and local juvenile procedures. The state juvenile compact administrator analyzes incoming and outgoing youth case material to ensure completion and compliance with ICJ and ensures the processing of completed referrals to receiving states or local supervising authorities. In addition, the state juvenile compact administrator is responsible for authorizing or rejecting of cooperative supervision for parole or probation supervision based on local recommendation and ICJ statutes, as well as ratifying completion of travel permits authorizing temporary youth movement between states. Furthermore, the state juvenile compact administrator tracks and reviews progress reports and case closures to ensure youth are supervised in compliance with the ICJ; he/she also establishes a liaison with other ICJ offices and all local supervising jurisdictions. Moreover, the state juvenile compact administrator develops policies and procedures in compliance with the statute; compiles required reports and statistics on youth served through the ICJ; and assumes other duties, although not statutorily mandated, that constitute best practice and are mandated in the AJCA rules and regulations. Additionally, the state juvenile compact administrator must assist local juvenile probation and parole, court, and law enforcement departments or other agency staff by providing information regarding ICJ; attend required meetings provided by national AJCA; and provide training to juvenile justice professionals in ICJ law, AJCA, and state rules and regulations.

The Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators (AJCA) was formed in 1954 to help combat the epidemic of juvenile runaways. Interstate Compact for Juveniles, overseen by the AJCA, is used in 20,000 to 30,000 transfer and supervision cases of juveniles on probation or parole annually.

New AJCA

Compact administrator and deputy compact administrator roles and functions will change under the ratification of the new compact. This change will mean AJCA will support the implementation of the new ICJ law in each state. AJCA will also assist both noncompacting and new compacting states to work closely together to serve youth and families under the ICJ. The new roles under the new compact will be to serve as the respective states' national commissioner or designee; provide consultation or serve as an adviser to individual state commissioners; serve as the administrator for daily operations of the state ICJ office; serve as the liaison to his or her respective state council; and provide education, training, and consultation to council members on the old and new compact. Furthermore, the new roles will include developing internal policies and administrative rules for ICJ operations within states and require a strong working knowledge of the new compact rules and regulations and an understanding of each state's individual statutory requirement. In addition, he/she will work with state and national commissioners to develop "best practice" models for effective case transfers, case management, and treatment intervention services, and promulgate rules while acknowledging potentially conflicting individual state and federal laws.

Tamikia S. Lott
Old Dominion University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Association of Administrators of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children; At-Risk Youth Services; Child Welfare Services; Childhood Trauma; Educational Support Services; Gangs: Social Issues and Intervention; Gangs in Schools; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Detention Centers; Juvenile Justice System.

Further Readings

Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators. http://ajca.us (Accessed December 2013).

Council of State Governments. Interstate Compact on Juveniles Resource Kit. http://www.csg.org/knowledgecenter/docs/ncic/ICJ-ResourceKit.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Holloway, Christopher. OJJPD Fact Sheet: Interstate Compact on Juveniles. Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (2000). http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/ojjdp/fs200012.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Interstate Commission for Juveniles. http://www.juvenilecompact.org (Accessed December 2013).

Interstate Commission for Juveniles. ICJ Rules (2009). http://www.juvenilecompact.org/LinkClick.aspx?fileticket=hvMqJ-56kQk%3d&tabid=648 (Accessed December 2013).

At-Risk Youth Services

The state of African American male educational attainment and society's perception of black males are matters of concern. There are a multitude of forces and pressures impeding the progress of African American males in education, which has a residual effect on their educational opportunities and, potentially, their life experiences. For example, black males are more likely to underperform on standardized tests, undergo suspension from school, experience special education placement, and eventually drop out of school. In the past 100 years, approximately 400 publications have been written about black males. In many instances, these publications report that black men have been characterized as endangered, uneducable, dysfunctional, and dangerous given their various challenges and unfortunate dealings with the educational and judicial systems.

In 2006, while African American male youth accounted for a little over 1 percent of the U.S. population, they were implicated in 25 percent of the homicides and composed 15 percent of homicide victims. Consequently, many black males are missing from school because they are completing prison sentences, mostly for drug-related offenses. Only 47 percent of black males who enter ninth grade earn a high school diploma. Additionally, they are often overrepresented in special education and alternative education programs, and underrepresented in gifted and talented programs and advanced placement classes. Black males have much to contend with, and these myriad issues often intersect with their other identities, such as residents of low-income communities. Drastic measures must be taken to alleviate such adverse educational and life experiences; otherwise, the progress of black males will continue to decline. Specific interventions such as role modeling and mentoring and educational programming have proven to combat the inability of educational progress and to create positive experiences among black males.

Need for Role Models and Mentors

Role models in and outside the classroom, such as black male teachers and other professional black men, are important to the self-esteem and positive identity development of African American males. The dearth of role models affects male children and their conceptions of a prosperous future. In an anecdote, a young man explained the overwhelming and sometimes mixed messages about being a black man in America. He attributed his experience of parenting a child out of wedlock, dealing drugs, and landing in prison to his lack of clarity on how to obtain success in his life as a black man. Thus, having strong role models and mentors contribute to enabling black male students to feel valued and connected.

Likewise, the recent emergence of African American male mentoring groups and networks are garnering national attention and support. Formal mentoring programs such as the Student African American Brotherhood (SAAB) and Collegiate 100 operate national mentor initiatives that are effective for students. The benefit of such programs is that they provide a vehicle for students to more easily develop mentoring relationships, which could positively impact black male students' transition from high school to postsecondary education. Matching students to mentors at the beginning of the mentoring program signifies the importance of mentoring to the student's success.

Need for Educational Workshops

Helping students to develop their noncognitive skills would be advantageous to their high school completion efforts, college persistence, and degree completion. Workshops that inform students about time management, note taking, goal setting, and study skills would significantly improve the performance of black males in high school and in college. In fact, these skills warrant development as early as their elementary school years.

Conclusion

African American males face numerous challenges to ascertaining success in American society. They are often the victims of broken homes, poor education, and an unrelenting justice and penal system. The life trajectories of black males can be significantly altered with the appropriate support; however, this support should be provided prior to high school completion. Failing to address their needs early could leave them unprepared for high school, college, or a career. Additionally, since many black male youth live below the poverty line, their chances of being exposed to strategies for success in the school environment or community are minimal. Those who are in positions to provide financial, socioemotional, and academic resources to African American male youth should by all means move forward and act.

Lloyd Glen Bingman
The Bingman Group

See Also: African Americans; Juvenile Justice System; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Fletcher, Michael A. "At the Corner of Progress and Peril." Washington Post (June 2, 2006). http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2006/06/01/AR2006060102184.html (Accessed November 2013).

Schott Foundation for Public Education. "Yes We Can: The Schott 50 State Report on Public Education and Black Males" (2010). http://www.blackboysreport.org/bbreport.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Student African American Brotherhood. http://www.saabnational.org (Accessed November 2013).

U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs. Bureau of Justice Statistics. http://www.bjs.gov (Accessed November 2013).

Whiting, G. "Gifted Black Males: Understanding and Decreasing Barriers to Achievement and Identity." Roeper Review, v.31/4 (2009).

Autism and Asperger's Syndrome, Services for Autism was first reported by Leo Kanner in 1943, and since then there have been varying definitions and understandings of the disorder. The American Psychiatric Association (APA) has revised the Diagnostic Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM; fifth edition) because understanding the nuances in each of the spectrum disorders is confusing and difficult to delineate. Redefining the description of the different diagnostic labels and all of the labels associated with autism will fall under autism spectrum disorder (ASD). The diagnosis will fall under levels (i.e., 1, 2, and 3) indicating the severity of symptomology. With the entire diagnosis falling under one label, the DSM-5 seeks to simplify or clarify the discrepancies among the labels autistic disorder (autism), Asperger's disorder, childhood disintegrative disorder, and pervasive developmental disorder not otherwise specified. Clarifying the definitions hopefully will help determine services needed to treat the disorder. The revised 2013 definition by the American Psychiatric Association is that, "Autism Spectrum Disorder is a range of complex developmental disorders that can cause problems with thinking, feeling, language, and the ability to relate to others. They are neurological disorders, which means they affect the functioning of the brain."

Listed below are the characteristics that are typically applied to those diagnosed with autism spectrum disorders:

- Communication problems: difficulty using or understanding language. Some children with autism focus their attention and conversation on a few topic areas, some frequently repeat phrases, and some have very limited speech.
- Difficulty relating to people, things, and events: trouble making friends and interacting with people, difficulty reading facial expressions, may not make eye contact.
- Repetitive body movements or behaviors: hand flapping or repeating sounds or phrases.

Diversity and Prevalence in Autistic Spectrum Disorders

The most recent data by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) cites that one in 88 children in the United States are estimated to have an autism spectrum disorder. ASD diagnoses cut across socioeconomic, race, and ethnic lines as the prevalence of occurrence is typically the same for different racial/ethnic and socioeconomic groups. However, there are gender differences: males have a four-times-higher ASD diagnoses rate than females. Treatment disparities exist for underprivileged and racial/ethnic groups; for example, African Americans are typically diagnosed later than Caucasian groups. This also is true for other racial and ethnic groups. This delay may result in services being offered later, which will require more intensive services because of the delay. Also, research has not been adequately conducted on different racial groups, which may mean that a phenotype has not been developed for these groups and they typically are underrepresented in ASD randomized controlled trials. Further, researchers may not be culturally sensitive to the issues that confront families of different cultures. Currently, there are no statistical data that differentiates the spectrum disorders based on racial or class differences.

Provision of Services

Essential to finding services for children with autism spectrum disorder is to first get an assessment that will correctly diagnose them, and that assessment should be completed in a timely manner (the earlier the better). Most states have early intervention services in which comprehensive evaluations are conducted for the purpose of determining the correct diagnosis for a child, and the diagnosis will provide a basis for determining which services are appropriate.

Children suspected of having a disability can be evaluated as early as infancy. However, symptoms for autism spectrum disorder may not be evident until early toddlerhood. Additionally, all school systems must evaluate children suspected of having a disability per the federal Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA), which was last reauthorized in 2004.

There are two ways to approach the acquisition of services, and one of the approaches is to access information through advocacy groups that provide information and support for people seeking services. The second is knowing the type of interventions and services that are available and having the opportunities to select an intervention that best suits the child. However, a caution to parents or other caregivers is that access to interventions is sometimes limited and not as available to all those seeking it. There are a number of interventions, and one should inquire if they are research-based or practice-informed to ensure the best possible outcomes for children and adults who fall under the diagnosis of ASD.

Parents are concerned that the DSM-5 changes may result in fewer services for their children who have previously been identified as having one of the five syndromes listed above. The crafters of the DSM-5 argue that this simplified categorization represents a more accurate process of identifying persons with ASD.

Family Advocacy

Advocacy work is crucial in working with persons with disabilities. Some examples of the advocacy groups are as follows:

- The Autism Society's services include public awareness and advocacy across the life span.

- The National Autism Association's services are autism research funding, advocacy, support, and education.
- Autism Speaks' services include funding research for both prevention and intervention and advocacy.
- The Online Asperger Syndrome Information and Support (OASIS) Center along with MAAP Services for Autism and Asperger Syndrome (OASIS @ MAAP Web site) is a resource for families, individuals, and medical professionals who work with or are challenged by people with autism spectrum disorder.

Examples of Treatment Options

Parent education and training: Parent (and other family members/caregivers) training is essential in that it is the parent/guardian who will spend the most time with their offspring and as a result must be able to work with them to support and supplement treatment options.

Social skills training and speech-language therapy: These skills can be gained through participation in social skills groups and speech language therapy.

Cognitive behavior therapy (CBT): This method of intervention helps individuals with Asperger's (or other ASD symptoms) regulate their emotions, develop impulse control, and improve their behavior.

Applied behavioral analysis (ABA): Has been used by hundreds of therapists to teach communication, play, social, academic, self-care, work, and community living skills, and to reduce problem behaviors in learners with autism. Over the past several decades, different treatment models using ABA have emerged and all use strategies that are based on the work of B. F. Skinner. The ABA model is one that is commonly used as an intervention for children diagnosed with Asperger's syndrome. ABA methods use the following three-step process:

1. An antecedent, which is a verbal or physical stimulus such as a command or request. This may come from the environment or from another person, or be internal to the subject.
2. A resulting behavior, which is the subject's (or in this case, the child's) response or lack of response.
3. A consequence, which depends on the behavior. The consequence can include positive reinforcement of the desired behavior, or no reaction for the incorrect response.

Sensory integration/occupational therapy: In sensory integration therapy (SI), occupational therapists work with children to stabilize their senses and their reactions to external stimuli. This therapy can help children gain better control over their bodies, and thus can reduce clumsiness and instability and improve hand-eye coordination. SI therapy can also reduce anxiety in children.

Medication: No medications specifically treat autism/Asperger's syndrome. However, some children with autism/Asperger's experience symptoms that can be controlled by medication for depression, anxiety, attention deficit, or hyperactivity.

TEACCH method: A type of educational intervention that places great emphasis on structured learning by using visual prompts, and this invention can be administered at day care programs as well as in the home.

Ruby M. Gourdine
Howard University School of Social Work

See Also: Autism Diagnostic Observation Schedule; Children With Special Needs; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment.

Further Readings

American Psychiatric Association. Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, 5th ed. Arlington, VA: American Psychiatric Publishing, 2013.

Dworzynski, K., A. Ronald, P. Bolton, and F. Happé. "How Different Are Girls and Boys Above and Below the Diagnostic Threshold for Autism Spectrum Disorders?" Journal of the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry, v.51/8 (2012).

Huerta, Marisela, Somer L. Bishop, Amie Duncan, Vanessa Hus, and Catherine Lord. "Application of DSM-5 Criteria for Autism Spectrum Disorder to Three Samples of Children With DSM IV Diagnosis of Pervasive Developmental Disorders." American Journal of Psychiatry, v.169/10 (October 2012).

Mandell, D. S., L. D. Wiggins, L. A. Carpenter, J. Daniels, C. DiGuiseppi, M. S. Durkin, and R. S. Kirby. "Racial/Ethnic Disparities in the Identification of Children With Autism Spectrum Disorders." American Journal of Public Health, v.99/3 (2009).

Simpson, Richard L. "Children and Youth With Autism Spectrum Disorders: The Search for Effective Methods." Focus on Exceptional Children, v.40/7 (2008).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children and Families. "Autism and Autism Spectrum Disorders." Child Welfare Information Gateway. http://www.hhs.gov (Accessed July 2013).

Autism Diagnostic Observation Schedule

Autism spectrum disorder (ASD) is a neurodevelopmental disability that is described as impairments in social interaction and communication and has unusual or restricted behaviors. Symptoms most commonly arise in early childhood and are usually observed before 3 years of age. Age of onset is usually around 2 years but may be earlier if more severe. Worldwide reports of incidence of ASD are about 1 in 100. As of 2008 the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) reports an overall incidence in the United States of 1 in 88 children, with 1 in 54 boys and 1 in 252 girls having a diagnosis of ASD. ASD occurs in all races and socioeconomic groups.

According to the CDC study the estimated prevalence among non-Hispanic white children was 12 per 1,000, non-Hispanic black children was 10.2 per 1,000, and Hispanic children was 7.9 per 1,000. Estimates for Asian/Pacific Islander children ranged from 2.2 to 19 per 1,000. As for socioeconomic status, prevalence of ASD increased with increasing socioeconomic status (SES). About 10 percent of these individuals have a comorbid diagnosis of Down syndrome and about 38 percent have an intellectual disability (IQ of less than 71).

The diagnostic assessment of ASD is based on the the criteria of fifth edition of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5). The criteria include (1) persistent impairment in social interaction; (2) restricted, repetitive patterns of behavior, interests, or activities; (3) symptoms present in early development; (4) impairment in functioning related to symptoms; and (5) impairment not more appropriately explained by intellectual disability or global developmental delay as sole diagnosis; comorbidity can occur but social development should be lower than expected development level.

Clinically, the diagnosis is based on observation, assessment, and behavioral history. One difficulty with diagnosis of ASD is because of the high variability of presentation. ASD is a constellation of symptoms, and rarely the same presentation is seen in two children. There are observable differences in developmental level, language use, and IQ that are all freely variable to the individual child. Multiple structured assessments have been developed to establish standard observable findings. Assessments of note are the Autism Diagnostic Observation Schedule (ADOS), Autism Diagnostic Interview Revised (ADI-R), Screening Tool for ASD in Toddlers and Young Children (STAT), and the Diagnostic Interview for Social and Communication Disorders (DISCO). ADOS and ADI-R are the two assessments frequently used in evaluating a suspected individual. These are evaluated through activities that allow the examiner to observe if clinically relevant behaviors are present. ADI-R is a comprehensive interview that normally lasts 1.5 to 2.5 hours that gathers past history and current history of the suspected individual's history from parent or caretaker. The interviewer inquires specifically about the level of the functioning of the suspected individual based on the DSM-5 criteria. The ADOS and ADI-R, along with consensus in a multidisciplinary team, is thought to be the best estimate of clinical diagnosis.

As implied by the name, the ADOS is a semi-structured observational test. In contrast to the ADI-R, which relies on historical information and self-report, the ADOS is an "in vivo" test that allows for real-time observation of a child's behaviors. One benefit of the ADOS is its utility across a broad spectrum of developmental ages and abilities. While the lower limit of the ADOS is relegated to a nonverbal developmental level of 12 months or higher, and an ability to walk independently, it can be used through adulthood. Four distinct ADOS modules are available, but only one is administered to a particular patient. Which module is chosen is dependent upon patients' chronological age and expressive language ability—module 1 is for those without phrase speech, module 2 is for those who are not verbally fluent, module 3 is for fluent children, and module 4 is reserved for verbally fluent adolescents and adults. Although each module contains different activities, they all assess social and communication behaviors central to the diagnosis of autism through the use of a variety of "presses" that elicit the behaviors of interest.

An ADOS module is conducted over 30 to 45 minutes, during which time observations are recorded. Following administration, observations are coded into realms of communication, reciprocal social interactions, play, and stereotyped behaviors. A total score includes the sums of the communication and reciprocal interaction metrics, whereas play and stereotyped behaviors are excluded due to the difficulty in accurately assessing these areas given the limited time window of observation. Each of the above-mentioned realms are rated on a score from 0 to 3, with the higher numbers corresponding to worsening severity and clinical impairment. These numbers are compared to predefined cutoffs for each realm—if each realm's cutoff is met, a diagnoses of autism is conferred. In contrast, lower threshold cutoffs may correspond to a diagnosis of autism spectrum disorder in lieu of a pure autism diagnosis.

The ADOS has proven to be a reliable instrument in diagnosing autism and ASD, with Catherin Lord demonstrating sensitivities exceeding 90 percent and specificities between 80 and 90 percent. Clinical experience with this patient population should not be underemphasized when employing the ADOS, however, and can enhance the reliability of the scale, particularly when dealing with atypical or "difficult" cases. Combined with excellent reliability, the ADOS, when appropriately administered, is timely and cost-efficient and is applicable to a broad patient population, making it a useful clinical diagnostic instrument.

Jeremy Matuszak
University of Nevada, Reno
Jeremy Ernst
University of Nevada School of Medicine

See Also: Autism and Asperger's Syndrome, Services for; Children With Special Needs; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment.

Further Readings

American Psychiatric Association. Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, 5th ed. http://dx.doi.org/10.1176/appi.books.9780890425596.910646 (Accessed December 2013).

Baio, J. "Prevalence of Autism Spectrum Disorders: Autism and Developmental Disabilities Monitoring Network, 14 Sites, United States, 2008." Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report: Surveillance Summaries, v.61/3. Atlanta: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 2012.

Durkin, M. S., et al. "Socioeconomic Inequality in the Prevalence of Autism Spectrum Disorder: Evidence From a U.S. Cross-Sectional Study." PLOS One (2010).

Jones, R. M. and C. Lord. "Diagnosing Autism in Neurobiological Research Studies." Behavioural Brain Research, v.251 (2012).

Lord, C., et al. "The Autism Diagnostic Observation Schedule—Generic: A Standard Measure of Social and Communication Deficits Associated With the Spectrum of Autism." Journal of Autism and Developmental Disorders, v.30/3 (2000).

Mazefksy, C. A. and D. P. Oswald. "The Discriminative Ability and Diagnostic Utility of the ADOS-G, ADI-R, and GARS for Children in a Clinical Setting." Autism, v.10 (2006).

B

Behavior Modification and Residential Treatment Facilities

Behavior modification and residential treatment facilities, which are also known as youth residential treatment centers or teen boot camps, are facilities that have been established to deal with American youths who exhibit antisocial behavior or mental illness or who are abusing alcohol or drugs. Within such facilities, behavior that has been deemed inappropriate or disruptive is modified by using both positive and negative learning tools to teach skills that ostensibly improve abilities to function within the home, school, and community.

Government-operated youth group homes tend to hire well-trained staff and are regulated by both state and federal laws. Contrarily, approximately 700 behavior modification and residential treatment facilities operating in the United States and abroad are privately owned and operated. Thus, there is little government oversight. Staff at these facilities frequently lack training in either medicine or psychology. Since parents are required to sign contracts giving staff full authority to act as their representatives, residents of these facilities are extremely vulnerable to both physical and mental abuse. Thousands of abuses have been reported, and several facilities in Mexico have been shut down by government authorities. The U.S. State Department has basically adopted a hands-off policy concerning behavior modification facilities abroad, but officials have warned parents to be aware of the potential for abuse and advise parents to visit facilities before consigning their children to them. Human service professionals are on the front line of reporting abuses and play a major role in raising public awareness about the existence of such abuses.

Behavior modification and residential treatment facilities usually adopt behavior modification techniques that use both positive and negative reinforcement. Residents are rewarded with points, privileges, or increases in status when they conform, and they are punished with time-outs, loss of privileges, lengthened stays, and decreases in status when they fail to conform. Some facilities use corporal punishment, and many resort to what may be considered torture. In general, youths exhibiting antisocial or destructive behavior are referred to psychiatric hospitals for short-term crisis management and to residential centers when long-term behavior modification is deemed appropriate.

Background

By the turn of the 20th century, some states had begun to reshape the behavior of children and youths by placing them in state-operated institutions. The most notorious of these institutions may be the Arthur G. Dozier School for Boys in Florida, which served as the state reform school for over a century before it was shut down in 2011 after mass graves were found on the premises. Subsequent investigations uncovered physical and mental abuse, forced labor, rape, and even murder. Traumas experienced by children as young as 5 were detailed by Roger Dean Kiser, a former resident, in The White House Boys: An American Tragedy. Even before the book, a number of lawsuits filed by adults who had been incarcerated at the Marianna, Florida, facility had raised questions about widespread abuse. Such reports caused many parents and professionals who deal with troubled youths to look for other ways to modify disruptive behaviors.

In the 1960s and 1970s, the focus on high rates of juvenile delinquency led governments to devote considerable resources to dealing with troubled youths, and human services professionals spent a good deal of their time dealing with such cases. In 1967, Montrose Wolf introduced the concept of teaching youths by positive reinforcement and using time-outs rather than corporal punishment to deal with negative behavior. Wolf established the first group home based on this principle.

In the 1980s, many desperate parents began turning to behavior modification facilities that took on the aspect of harsh training experienced in military boot camps. In addition to those located within the United States, facilities for modifying the behavior of troubled American teens were established in Mexico, Jamaica, Costa Rica, and Samoa. In the United States, the best-known facilities are those operated by the Utah-based World Wide Association of Specialty Programs and Schools and the Colorado-based Aspen Education Group, both of which focus on therapeutic rehabilitation. Some residents in these programs are placed by their parents, but others are placed there by court order as a way to avoid incarceration.

All behavior modification and residential treatment facilities tend to be isolated, and residents have only limited contact with the outside world. The majority of human service professionals believe that these facilities fail to teach youth the necessary skills for modifying their behavior because harsh environments are not always conducive to learning the social skills needed to survive outside the facility.

Repercussions

In the first decade of the 21st century, the Mexican government began shutting down behavior modification facilities located in Baja California, Mexico, by the American-based U-Turn for Christ program. When the last one in the area was shut down on December 5, 2005, officials cited a range of violations that included physical and mental misconduct by staff, lack of staff training, absence of medical professionals, and insufficient bathroom, shower, and recreational facilities. Inspectors also found that teens were suffering from insect bites that had been left untreated and discovered a large stock of expired medicines. The previous year, four youths who had run away from another facility had first called attention to the abuses in Mexican facilities; they had run away to escape mistreatment.

The vulnerability of teens placed in behavioral modification facilities has now begun to be widely recognized, as reports of abuses have continued to surface. In 2007, the Government Accounting Office issued a report citing thousands of abuses in teen residential facilities based on incident reports from state agencies and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services between 1990 and 2007. In 2005 alone, 1,619 abuse incidents were reported in 31 states. In May 1990, a 15-year-old female died while being forced to go on a hiking expedition because the facility's staff lacked the necessary training to recognize symptoms of dehydration. In September 2000, a 15-year-old male died from a severed artery after being held face down in the dirt by staff for 45 minutes. Staff members were charged with homicide. In July 2002, a 14-year-old male died from hyperthermia during a hike while a staff member watched from behind a tree because he thought the teen was "faking it."

In 2008, the extent of abuse at some behavioral modification and residential treatment facilities led Democrats in Congress to introduce the Stop Child Abuse in Residential Programs for Teens Act. The purpose of the act is to stop physical, mental, and sexual abuse in all residential centers for teens and to prevent staff from using such methods as denying water, food, clothing, shelter, and medical care. The act also calls for an end to physical restraints except when necessary for a teen's safety and provides greater transparency and accountability. The act failed to pass Congress.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Behavior Support and Management; Group Homes for Adults; Group Homes for Children; Torture, Survivors of.

Further Readings

Hair, Heather J. "Outcomes for Children and Adolescents After Residential Treatment: A Review of Research From 1993 to 2003." Journal of Child and Family Studies, v.14/4 (2005).

Johnson, M. Alex. "Infamous Florida Boys Reform School Even More Widespread, Report Says." NBC News (December 10, 2012).

Kiser, Roger Dean. The White House Boys: An American Tragedy. Deerfield Beach, FL: HCI Books, 2010.

Martin, Garry and Joseph Pear. Behavior Modification: What It Is and How to Do It, 8th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 2007.

Tribble, Sandra. "Mexican Center Shut Down U-Turn for Christ Youth Ranch." Union Tribune (December 5, 2005).

U.S. Government Accounting Office. "Residential Treatment Programs: Concern Regarding Abuse and Death in Certain Programs for Troubled Youth." http://www.gao.gov/new.items/do8146t.pdf (Accessed March 2013).

U.S. Surgeon General. "Mental Health: A Report of the Surgeon General." http://profiles.nlm.nih.gov/ps/retrieve/ResourceMetadata/NNBBHS (Accessed March 2014).

Behavior Support and Management

"Behavior support and management" are umbrella terms for several treatment approaches that are often used with students as well as people with intellectual and developmental disabilities. Behavior management approaches are used with people of all ages and with varying types of disabilities. Recipients of these services are from all ethnic and racial groups and may have a variety of developmental and mental health issues. In addition to this wide breadth of consumers, people seeking self-improvement may also utilize these modalities. Behavior support may include direct implementation of a behavior support with a goal of modifying client behavior, or it may include indirect consultation to a consultee (e.g., a parent, caregiver, or teacher), who would then implement the objectives of the behavior support plan with the client. Behavior support is used widely within schools, institutions, and treatment centers, though the approaches may vary.

Behavior support is based on the field of behaviorism and can be used proactively to present challenging behavior or in response to behavior that is identified as challenging. Challenging behavior is culturally situated but is generally behavior that creates an unsafe situation for the person exhibiting the behavior or those in the vicinity. Behavior of this intensity, frequency, or duration may also limit a person's usual activities or the availability of community opportunities or privileges. Behavior may emerge in childhood and persist into adulthood, though in some cases challenging behavior may arise in adulthood.

This behavioral pattern may be functional, adaptive, and/or communicative in nature, and these factors should be taken into account when attempting to understand why a behavior may be occurring. When determining the function of the behavior, it is imperative to conduct a thorough medical screening to be sure that an acute or chronic medical condition is not the precipitant or cause of the behavior.

Types of Behaviorism

There are four general types of behaviorism: methodological, psychological, analytical, and "radical."

Methodological behaviorism. In the methodological model, psychology is argued to be the science of behavior, as opposed to the science of the mind or mental states. Making reference to beliefs or desires of an animal or a human would be absent in this model, and as in psychological behaviorism, external stimuli, responses to such stimuli, and reinforcements to maintain or extinguish behavior would be the predominant areas of inquiry and concern.

Psychological behaviorism. Psychological behaviorism was often elucidated in the writings of Ivan Pavlov, Edward Thorndike, and, perhaps most famously, in the work of B. F. Skinner. Psychological behaviorists argued that intelligent behavior is the result of associated learning. When associations or pairings occur between experiences and thoughts, a person gains knowledge of the world or their immediate environment and this informs their behavior.

Psychological behaviorists are concerned with trying to predict how a person's behavior might change if certain variables in their environment are changed or manipulated. Behaviorists often used the word conditioning to describe the process or way in which people create new associations. Operant conditioning is learning about the relationship between events.

A reinforcement (such as food or a preferred activity) may be presented to increase the frequency of a desired behavior. An example of operant conditioning may be an experiment in which a lab animal learns that once it pushes the lever, food (reinforce) will appear. The animal becomes conditioned to press the lever for food. In thinking about human behavior, this might be the distribution of an allowance or monetary reward when a child completes his or her chores. The term reinforcer has also been the subject of controversy as it is defined as something that will increase the frequency of a behavior; however, the presentation of a reinforcer may have no observable effect. In application, the person or animal may also become desensitized to the reinforce, leading to a neutral effect or a decrease in response over time. A behaviorist may at that time substitute a higher value reinforcer in determining that the original reinforcer has lost the desired potency or effect.

The idea that behavior may only change depending on the reinforcements provided has also been criticized through the research of Albert Bandura. Bandura, in his social learning theory, demonstrated that people can and will learn through observing others and subsequently imitating their actions. Absent any reinforcers, people may change their behavior after observing another person. In this way, Bandura developed a theory that added psychological process to the interaction between environment and behavior that behaviorists had thus far solely focused their theories on.

Analytical behaviorism. In analytical behaviorism, mental states or terms describing these states are used, though behavioral terms are often substituted for the mental states at their closest estimate. If someone were to have a belief or thought, analytical behaviorists might reframe this as a behavioral tendency that may inform the researcher as to how the person might behave in a certain situation. This point has not been without controversy, however, as analytical behaviorists almost always used mental terms even in the behavioral reframe, and as a result it was questioned whether the dialogue on mental states can truly be replaced with solely behavioral terms.

"Radical" behaviorism. Skinner engaged in what many would call "radical" behaviorism and this mode of study often fused methodological, psychological, and analytical behaviorism. While behaviorism was once a ripe and robust research field, it has been in decline owing to the criticisms surrounding the absence of acknowledgment or concern for mental states and the idea that behavior can be changed solely through manipulation of the environment.

Assessment

The interventions contained within behavior management are generally designed to increase the frequency of certain behaviors (generally positive or desirable) while decreasing or eliminating (usually problematic or maladaptive) behaviors. After a behavior is identified, a behavior analysis is conducted by a trained behavior analyst or other similarly trained specialist. This is done with either an informal or formal functional behavior assessment. This assessment can take the form of interviews, observational information, interviewing the individual, and interviewing the team. The goal is to decide if the behavior in question (the "target") is actually a problem and to subsequently create a hypothesis about why this behavior may be occurring. The hypothesis should include the setting event, the trigger or antecedent, an observational or operationalized description of the behavior, and the consequence or reward that may be serving to maintain the existence of the behavior. During the time period in which a clinician is attempting to understand the behavior and is conducting a functional behavior assessment, data should be collected to establish a baseline. The intervention follows the assessment and is an attempt to eliminate the behavior, modify the situation and/or the behavior, or reduce the frequency to a nonproblematic level. This response can be proactive or reactive.

Interventions can take a myriad of forms and functions. In some cases, one may add structure to the environment. This can clarify and define responsibilities and tasks as well as expectations and roles. This may include reminders, schedules, and teaching about limits and what is acceptable or not for the setting in question. Much of this intervention includes the addition of clarity and predictability to people's lives. Environmental interventions include modifying the surroundings to remove a bothersome noise or object, changing residence, changing aspects of the home environment depending on preferences and/or sensory sensitivities and/or tolerances, and helping people to stay connected and engaged.

Treatment

From a mental health perspective, medication is often used to assist in the alleviation of symptoms. Caution is advised, however, as medications have also been used as chemical restraints in the past and, in some cases, currently. Counseling is also utilized to augment a behavior modification plan and may include such interventions as "desensitization procedures" in order to provide a systematic method to decrease negative reactions to objects or situations that may be an inevitable part of the person's life.

In some cases aversive interventions have been or still are used. Aversive behavioral interventions may be painful, intrusive, or uncomfortable stimuli or actions with the purpose of inducing pain or discomfort. These interventions arise out of the work of Pavlov and Skinner. The theory arises from the idea that if an individual presents a negative reaction or situation to an undesirable behavior, then behavior will stop or will be extinguished. The person or animal may proactively come to expect this negative response and is expected to refrain from the behavior before the negative application becomes necessary. Examples of aversive behavioral interventions include applying lemon juice or hot sauce to a person's lips, restraints or mechanical movement limitation (i.e., tying a child to a chair, or time-out rooms or closets), and electrical shocks. In some cases embarrassment has been used, such as calling attention to the person in a group by forcing them to wear a helmet as a consequence for their behavior. Food contingencies programs have also been used, in which case calorie deprivation is applied as a consequence. Aversive behavioral interventions are controversial and many school systems, institutions, and state governments have now placed a moratorium on the use of such interventions. Research has aligned with the stance, showing that once the negative response is no longer consistently applied, the individual will generally revert back to the undesirable behavior. Thus, the avoidance of the negative stimuli is not generalized for application in natural or community settings and the decrease in undesirable behavior may have been an effort to avoid the negative stimuli as opposed to a sustainable change. Further criticism of this approach includes the fact that those implementing aversive behavior plans are not clinicians but staff or day support workers who are not educated at a level required to implement such plans. Another criticism is that these plans are often implemented on an intermittent basis, and due to the inconsistency involved they can be viewed as punishing rather than therapeutically beneficial.

Positive behavioral support is a particular approach to behavior management and support. This approach to behavior support emerged out of and in reaction to the controversy surrounding the use of aversive behavioral interventions. In this approach, there are no aversive responses or consequences to behavior. There is also minimal risk to the person in terms of physical or psychological harm, and it does not include significant physical exercise or physical restraint or enforcement given a person's active resistance. The focus in positive behavioral support is often on a proactivity and manipulation of antecedent or setting events, as opposed to reacting to a behavior and then responding with reinforcement upon the display of the behavior. Emergency procedures are still used; however, these are expected to decrease over time given the proactive focus of this model. Social validation is also a consideration, as is maintaining the dignity of the recipients of these services. While positive behavior support continues to focus on increasing desirable behavior and decreasing undesirable behavior, the aims also include increasing quality of life or a positive lifestyle. Positive behavior support, much like other forms of behavior support and management, emphasizes empirically derived conclusions, such that data collection is an important aspect of both monitoring and deciding on the next course of action. Positive behavior support also includes valuing the rights of people with disabilities, something that the behavioral community appeared to be silent on in the past or at the very least did not explicitly acknowledge. In addition to the values aforementioned, positive behavior support emphasizes respect, person-center planning, inclusion, and normalization as well as self-determination.

Positive behavior support plans are generally implemented system-wide, in that the person who is the focus may be in the middle of a much larger system of supports, all of which would participate in and implement the behavior support plan. Positive behavioral support is gaining ground in school systems across the United States. These behavior support plans are implemented throughout the school. The focus is on the preferred behavior as opposed to the undesirable behavior. Typically, three to five targets are chosen and presented to staff to ensure at least 80 percent acceptance. An example of these targets may be for individuals to respect themselves and others: in the restroom, flush the toilet after you use it; and in the cafeteria, wipe the area with a cloth after using it. All staff at the school, from the principal to the teachers to the janitors, would be involved in the implementation and success of the plan. Behavioral expectations are taught, just as math, science, or any other subjects are emphasized. Children in the school system are rewarded for demonstrating the expected behaviors and this is shared with other members of the school as well as with the child's parents as an additional reinforcement level. Parents are aware of the school-wide expectations and buy-in and support are expected from those at home as well.

In addition to its uses with students and those within the disability services communities, behavior support and management extends to parent training as well as to job performance management. Studies have shown a decrease in teenage risk-taking behavior, even in the presence of genetic risk, when a parent training program is also implemented. In addition, parent training programs have demonstrated the ability to assist divorced single mothers and those coping with children with conduct disorder.

In terms of job performance, an assessment of an employee's strengths and deficits is conducted and from that report a behavioral plan to increase job performance is implemented. This may include positive reinforcements for completion of timely work product, a decrease in mistakes, or an increase in overall productivity. Typically in this system, negative reinforcement is not used, with the overall emphasis placed on positive behavioral support. Negative reinforcement in this environment may lead to employee resentment and anxiety, and so positive supports have been found to be more industrious and rewarding, increasing the frequency of positive and productive employee behavior and performance.

Behavior support and management has evolved much since its introduction in 1911 (through the work of Edward Thorndike) and the subsequent research of the 1940s and 1950s. Though once a mainly laboratory endeavor, through the work of applied behavior analysts behaviorism now focuses on application and behavior change of those in community settings. Based upon the successes found in those settings, particularly in use with those with autism spectrum disorder, behavior support has now branched out to include organizational behavior change and modification. Behavior analysts are now employed in a wide breadth of settings and their consultation and expertise is sought after by schools, institutions, and corporations.

Shanna L. Burke
Nonotuck Resource Associates, Inc.

See Also: Behavior Modification and Residential Treatment Facilities; Chemical Restraints; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Developmental Disabilities, Attitudes and Myths in Services for; Developmental Disabled Individuals; Disability Services; Disabled Clients.

Further Readings

Bailey, Jon and Mary Burch. 25 Essential Skills & Strategies for the Professional Behavior Analyst: Expert Tips for Maximizing Consulting Effectiveness. New York: Taylor & Francis, 2010.

Bambara, Linda M. and Timothy P. Knoster. Designing Positive Behavior Support Plans, 2nd ed. Washington, DC: American Association on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities, 2009.

Erchul, William P. and Brian K. Martens. School Consultation: Conceptual and Empirical Bases of Practice, 3rd ed. New York: Springer, 2012.

Maag, John W. Behavior Management: From Theoretical Implications to Practical Applications. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson Learning, 2004.

Witt, Joseph C., Frank M. Gresham, and George H. Noell. "What's Behavioral About Behavioral Consultation." Journal of Educational and Psychological Consultation, v.7/4 (1996).

Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations

The quality of health care has and continues to be a topic of much interest and debate within the United States. Poor access to health care, limited availability to medical facilities, and impoverished neighborhoods all contribute to a lower quality of health. Both racial and ethnic minorities tend to report lower quality of health and fewer health care opportunities. With lines of race and ethnicity dividing the quality of health in the nation, it is important to understand what is causing the disparity and what can be done to reduce and eradicate it. Behavioral health issues cross boundaries of race, ethnicity, gender, and socioeconomic status; however, minorities are still the larger population that has the most limited access to medical and psychological services.

Products of The Environment

Health disparities for racial and ethnic minority populations are simply the differences in health outcomes for them. These health differences are tied to social conditions that offer either advantages or disadvantages depending on the community where one lives, goes to school, and works. Families and individuals who face social and economic disadvantages encounter far more challenges in obtaining and maintaining healthy lifestyles. In understanding the environment of an individual and the many roles he/she takes on, it is important to see the individual in a complete image. Learning about the individual's education, geographic location, employment, and living circumstances all offer assistance in understanding health conditions and disparities.

There are two types of disadvantages that greatly affect the quality of health reported and possibly access to health care. Living with the constant experiences of social and economic disadvantages severely limits and, in some cases, prohibits someone from enjoying the best quality of health possible. Attaining levels of optimal health is severely reduced when individuals face discrimination within their social and economic status, which may include (but is not limited to) disability, age, gender, sexual orientation, race, ethnicity, religion, and geographic location. At times the barriers to health are far greater than one's ability to overcome them and achieve health benefits. Health benefits cannot be solely rested on the individual's labor, try as they might.

In the United States, socioeconomic status is generally measured by two variables: the first is income and the other is education level. Those who are financially stable can afford health care insurance, copays, specialists, medications, and everything that comes with being proactive with their health. While taking these necessary steps, they are far more able to sustain a healthier life than someone who is poor and has to choose whether to handle their medical needs or instead attempt to secure their basic needs along with those of the family.

A great divide between the poor and the financially secure is that of their general approach to health. The socioeconomically disadvantaged population often have no other choice but to take a reactive stance in regard to their health. An example of what this could involve is having access to an antibiotic medication to fight an infection: by the time they have received medical services, they might have to sustain an amputation. The poor are more likely to encounter drastic medical accommodations due to their inability to obtain quality health care. One of the few choices the poor have is to be reactive with their health: they simply cannot afford a non-necessity when so many basic needs are barely—if at all—being met. While this cycle continues, those who can and do achieve a higher quality of life have the means, resources, and limited barriers to do so.

Education has been another measure that can offer a view into the behavioral health disparities among race and ethnicity. Individuals who did not graduate from high school often suffer from poor quality of health and inaccessibility to health care. Those who have achieved a greater educational level have far less barriers to overcome in obtaining quality health services. Those individuals who are economically disadvantaged and do not graduate from high school face the worst health circumstances compared to those who are educated and not poor.

Not only are adults at risk for health disparities but also are the children living in low socioeconomic status and geographically disadvantaged areas. Children who are raised in an environment of limited education, resources, and role models for healthy living are disadvantaged throughout both childhood and adulthood. Lack of information regarding healthy choices, lifestyles, and fitness all accrue to further driving the disparity between ethnicity and race. Reports show that the less education the parents have, the higher the levels of poor health in children.

Cultural differences within the nation's behavioral health disparities have in fact been influenced by social factors. The greater the social and economic advantages one has corresponds with the greater health quality, access to health care, and overall healthy living one will experience. Racial and ethnic differences in behavioral health can be understood by the experiences that an individual faces in his/her environment. Whether one grows up in an advantaged or disadvantaged environment due to their ethnicity and/or race undoubtedly affects their chances of attaining an optimal quality of health. Research shows that the average white adult will be among the least likely to report experiencing poor quality of health. Health disadvantages in relation to income decrease as the amount of an individual's income increases. This means that the more income and financial resources one has, the fewer challenges they will face in achieving the best health outcomes possible.

Historically and currently, the majority of black and Hispanic individuals grow up and live in disadvantaged areas. Their neighborhoods generally contain higher crime rates, government housing complexes, higher pollution levels, poor school systems, and less than adequate health care services. These factors of socioeconomic status reflect discrimination among both ethnicity and race in every aspect of health care, including the area of mental health. Health inequalities can be viewed in the neighborhoods with greater amounts of poverty, which include those areas with higher numbers of black and Hispanic populations.

Currently it is against the law to segregate and discriminate on the basis of race or ethnicity, but due to the inequalities of the past, individuals currently find it difficult to escape the socioeconomic status they were born into. It is very challenging for an individual to rise above their parents' status when they constantly face disadvantages. Opportunities are few and far between in economically challenged neighborhoods due to minimal employment opportunities and the lack of good schools that allow for economic and social growth. Lack of resources and poor-quality government housing are additional factors that contribute to the many harmful conditions that disadvantaged minorities face in their economically challenged neighborhoods.

The Impact of Health

Health is influenced by a multitude of factors that include biological, social, and economic characteristics. While one cannot alter the biological factors of individuals, something can be done about the social and economic factors of health. Reducing health disparities is essential for disadvantaged adults and children. Increasing awareness and distributing health information evenly for individuals is just the first step the nation has taken to show how choices affect health.

Learning about the society in which an individual lives is essential to understanding the behavioral health disparity. If all one can buy in their neighborhood is liquor and cigarettes as opposed to a frozen yogurt treat, then perhaps the limited resources in the neighborhood should be examined. It is likely that a frozen yogurt shop is even unheard of in the neighborhood and all the children know is the liquor store on every corner. Social environments affect an individual's opportunity for choice and resources. Individuals learn and function within their environments with what they have and what is available to them. If every child had the opportunity to be offered a yogurt treat instead of being approached to sell drugs, their understanding of health would be completely altered. Children in poorer communities suffer from more physical, emotional, and economic disadvantages. The children in these poorer communities attend schools that lack funds for resources for after-school programs, healthy snacks, textbooks, and group sports. The parents of these children are sometimes non–high school graduates who tend to be less educated on health-related issues. This leaves the children with inadequate health resources, including a positive, healthy role model. When children do not know what "healthy" looks like as a child, they will surely encounter difficulty when they try to navigate or create a healthy outlook as an adult.

Individuals facing daily economic and social challenges constantly encounter the greatest health-related consequences when compared to the average person. Individual stress, along with the environment where one lives, works, and grows, feed the behavioral health differences between race and ethnicity. Greater than the social or economic factors that are the cause of so many disadvantages are the barriers related to affordable and accessible health care. The lack of health care insurance is the most influential obstacle and highest-ranked characteristic in the minority population that completely affects their quality of health. It is important to recognize that racial and ethnic minorities are the defining populations who do not have health insurance to assist them in making quality choices about their health. Reports show that even when minorities do receive health care, their experiences include additional barriers to and poorer quality of care. For those 24 million adults who do not speak English, constant challenges related to their behavioral health issues exist. At times, there are few if any translators or behavioral health specialists who speak the native language of the minority. Without quality communication, the patient–provider relationship is severely damaged.

Meeting in the Middle

The shortages of mental health professionals, physicians, psychologists, and other health professionals in disadvantaged communities greatly impact the health of ethnic and racial minorities. The racial and ethnic minorities are not able to receive the preventive or acute treatment they need if behavioral health services are not even offered in their community. In order to reach the underserved populations and reduce the racial and ethnic health disparities, health services either must go into the community that needs the services or transportation must be provided for the disadvantaged population to travel to the needed services. Either way, to close the gap in health disparities, a bridge must be created to connect those in need with the services that should be available to everyone.

Those living and working in poorer communities often encounter more limits in obtaining healthy lifestyle choices and are at greater risk for higher rates of physical and emotional challenges. Steps needed in order to reduce the large ethnic and racial disparity include a transformation in health care. To live in a society where access to health care can be obtained by every individual, offering health insurance coverage even to those in the most disadvantaged circumstances would reduce disparities in behavioral health. Another dimension to take into consideration is that of strengthening multicultural awareness of health care professionals. By training the professionals to be aware of racial and ethnic behavioral health disparities, they can become better equipped to serve and minimize the disparity by further understanding the underserved communities.

Serving the poorer communities will take an increase in the availability of services that can be shared through community-based programs and policies. Programs and policies can be requested by individuals in the community, elected officials, health care professionals, outreach programs, and nonprofit organizations. By working together, communities can create safer and healthier opportunities for children and adults who lack and desperately need both preventive and acute care. Children who grow up learning a healthy lifestyle will apply what they learn in their adulthood. Healthy adults will create less strain on the health care system and the chances of full participation in society increase by eliminating or severely reducing illness, disability, and suffering.

Julie A. Strentzsch
Allison M. Atkinson
St. Mary's University

See Also: Community Health Centers, Poverty; Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to.

Further Readings

Selig S., E. Tropiano, and E. Greene-Morton. "Teaching Cultural Competence to Reduce Health Disparities." Health Promotion Practice, v.3 (2006).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "HHS Action Plan to Reduce Racial and Ethnic Health Disparities." http://minorityhealth.hhs.gov/npa/files/Plans/HHS/HHS_Plan_complete.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Bias in Service Delivery

The effective delivery of direct services is fraught with opportunities for human bias, both conscious and unconscious, simply due to its well-established reliance on human interpersonal exchange and the professional utilization of various assessment and intervention methodologies. Preconceived notions about an individual, an ethnic or racial group, a religion, a specific social class, a social lifestyle, or a political affiliation, as examples, may trigger human service professionals to unwittingly respond subjectively and even unfairly and destructively. Operationally, bias represents the opposite of open-mindedness and neutrality. In many instances bias may be viewed as prejudicial or discriminatory when judgments or decisions are made that are not based on factual, accurate information or objective criteria and do not accommodate differing or varying viewpoints. Discussion in the human services field suggests that often professionals are subjected to implicit biases that are negatively associated with groups that are different than they are (outsiders), despite a stated commitment to equalitarian values.

Minimizing Bias: NASW Code of Ethics

To ensure professional accountability in the practice of social work and to avoid the harmful reliance on biases and any form of professional conflict of interest, the National Association of Social Workers (NASW) formulated a Code of Ethics. The code comprises six fundamental principles that support competency in addressing social diversity and oppression regarding: race, ethnicity, national origin, color, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, age, marital status, political belief, religion, immigration status, and mental or physical disability. These guidelines focus on the parameters and values related to: (1) serving people in need and addressing social problems; (2) challenging social injustice; (3) respecting the inherent dignity and worth of the person; (4) recognizing the central importance of human relationships; (5) behaving in a trustworthy manner; and (6) practicing within areas of competence while developing and enhancing professional expertise. Although these principles are not prioritized in order of importance, the third principle directly identifies the prominent need for professionals to treat each person respectfully while managing and celebrating differences and cultural and ethnic diversity. To support clients' "socially responsible self-determination," a core value of the profession, practitioners must be aware of their hidden biases and monitor undesirable behaviors and their potential negative effects on service delivery.

Blaming the Victim: Disparities and Disproportionality

Not surprisingly, there has always been an undercurrent of discussion in the human services field regarding the intersection of social policy and service delivery, especially identifying who is "worthy" or entitled to services and under what terms. Some advocates have protested that systems have a tendency to blame the victims themselves for poor social or psychological outcomes, while compounding complex factors that contribute to predictable, obstructionistic barriers to appropriate service delivery. Class, race, gender, age, geographic location, educational attainment, sexual orientation, disability, perceived motivation, and legal status are examples of factors that may trigger an individual's negative assumptions and perceptions based on prior experiences and preexisting biases. Humans categorize their life experiences and stereotype others as a way to create order and make life simpler. Fundamentally, biases, especially unconscious or hidden biases, become ways of coping with complexity and forming automatic ways of surviving. Sometimes formed out of ignorance, fear, or hatred, biases can lead to pervasive discrimination and prejudices, which harm others and project them as inferior or substantially different than the normal group. It is very difficult to unlearn biased attitudes because individuals have a tendency to accept what they already believe, regardless of conflicting evidence or new and different levels of exposure.

Social activism, which dates as far back as the 1960s, also reflects bias backlash due to the implications for social policy, which were viewed as discriminatory and unjust, leading to the inequitable distribution of social/economic resources. These movements have targeted: civil rights, women's rights, gay rights and marriage equality, child abuse and neglect reporting and prevention, workplace harassment, reproductive rights and abortion, fetal rights, gender equality in athletics, the Indian Child Welfare Act, affordable health reform, immigration rights, Head Start and early childhood education, juvenile delinquency prevention, teen pregnancy, the permanency movement in child welfare, the protection of human subjects in research (mentally ill, minority, incarcerated, poor, disabled), and family advocacy in the military. In each instance, members of the affected groups carried a stigma that posed challenges to their ability to gain equal access to services and social entitlements. Such barriers reinforce the individual, family, or community's inability to thrive and benefit from societal privileges.

Bias may lead to extreme stereotypes, which can foster blatant discrimination or even hate crimes. When traditional crimes are enmeshed with hatred and prejudice, one can witness the overt expression of bias against groups from lynching to cross burnings to vandalism of synagogues to violence and murder. Although a shameful historical aspect of U.S. history, the term hate crime was not coined until the 1980s, when emerging hate groups like the skinheads engaged in a wave of bias-related crime. Unfortunately, hidden biases are more difficult to address, and well-intentioned social service policies and personnel may enact prejudices and beliefs in the delivery of critical resources. Illustrations of such beliefs include the following statements:

- Black male adolescents are frightening; they are violent and steal.
- Gay men are likely to be pedophiles.
- Latina females make babies and allow themselves to be dominated by older men.
- Immigrants want a free ride in this country.
- Individuals of color do not use mental health services and always wait until the last minute to see a doctor.

Bias represents a conscious and unconscious inability to be neutral or consider a view other than one's own and reflects a closed mind. This may be directed at a social class, religion, race, ethnicity, or political party. Bias keeps one in his or her own comfort zone and may prohibit the delivery of quality services to those most in need. Bias may negatively inform public policy making because it impedes objectivity, and so priorities may be skewed or programmatic strategies and resources may not be best aligned with optimal outcomes. The policy failure therefore is assigned to those who were served. Recently the child welfare community has addressed the overrepresentation of African American children in comparison with their numbers in the nation's child population in the foster care system. Since research has established that there is no difference between races regarding rates of child maltreatment, the question has been raised: Why is there a racial bias in removing children from their biological families, when family and community risk factors are held equal? Such removal rates have exposed poor African American children to higher levels of trauma due to separation from their parents as well as the poor outcomes of the child welfare system itself, for example, homelessness, lack of education, and underemployment.

There remains a pressing need for human services professionals, through self-examination, authentic dialogue, processes of accountability to service mission, and relevant research, to address biases in service delivery at both the macro/administrative/policy and micro/direct services levels. NASW's Code of Ethics presents a framework for avoiding the institutionalization of distorted beliefs and for passing on unconscious biases systemically, thus causing harm and deprivation over time and for future generations.

Sheryl Brissett Chapman
National Center for Children and Families,
Bethesda, Maryland

See Also: Code of Ethics of the National Association of Social Workers; Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Diversity in the Workplace; Education for Diversity in Human Services; Hate Groups; Health Care, Disparities in; Juvenile Justice System; Multiethnic Placement Act of 1994; Multiculturalism; No Child Left Behind Act; Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in; Poverty; Power, Race/Ethnicity and; Racial Microaggression; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; Size Discrimination; Social Determinants of Health; Social Work Practice and People of Color; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Berger, L. M., S. A. Front, and K. S. Slack. "Examining Racial Disproportionality in Child Protective Services Case Decisions." Children and Youth Services Review, v.34 (2012).

Dettlaff, A. J. and J. R. Rycraft. "Factors Contributing to Disproportionality in the Child Welfare System: Views from the Legal Community." Social Work, v.55 (2010).

National Association of Social Workers. NASW Code of Ethics. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 2008.

Wilcox, C.W. Bias: The Unconscious Deceiver. Bloomington, IN: Xlibris, 2011.

Biculturalism

Biculturalism is a word that is very widely defined. It changes its connotations from person to person and from culture to culture. Many times the words bicultural and biculturalism have been used for denoting the same trend in society. The meaning of biculturalism, therefore, is often misunderstood. One can say that in the case of a society or state comprised of several cultures, both prominent and latent, with many intercultural networks and orientation, the practitioners in the system for successful living conditions have to adopt what is called biculturalism, and with the passage of time the state has to lawfully ratify it for the welfare of larger numbers of population at a larger stage for a longer time.

The two cultures then flow side by side, and the citizens find themselves free to accommodate and adapt according to the patterns of both. Biculturalism can be applied to the aptitude and understanding of a person with relation to the two cultures in context, and to the policy of equal treatment for two cultures in any nation, as well. If one calls a person "bicultural," it denotes the person's ability to accommodate two different cultures—not only culturally but also with regard to the value system and identification patterns, as appears to be the case with Indian Americans, Chinese Americans, Japanese Americans, etc., living in the United States, who are acculturated in Indian, Chinese, and Japanese cultures respectively, along with being acculturated in American culture. On the other hand, biculturalism is also used to describe a condition in a country or geographic region in which two distinct cultures simultaneously become visible and flow seamlessly. Thus, it indicates the presence of two different cultures in the same region.

The word biculturalism was officially used for the first time in Canada on July 19, 1963, as a neologism, when the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, popularly known as the Bi and Bi Commission and the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission, was established by the then Canadian government under the premiership of Lester B. Pearson. The commission was appointed to "inquire into and report upon the existing state of bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada and to recommend what steps should be taken to develop the Canadian Confederation on the basis of an equal partnership between the two founding races, taking into account the contribution made by the other ethnic groups to the cultural enrichment of Canada and the measures that should be taken to safeguard that contribution." The reference to "biculturalism" had been made earlier in 1929, when Graham Spry, a Quebecoise Canadian, used it in a speech to the Canadian Club of Quebec and focused on the "bicultural character of the Canadian nation."

Later, the issue of biculturalism became popular in New Zealand in 1982 with reference to the issues of clash and reconciliation between two major cultural and ethnic groups—Maori and Pakeha New Zealanders. The term also gained momentum in Africa and Belgium with reference to the cultural clash of Anglophone white South Africans and the Boers in South Africa, and that between the Walloons and the Flemish in Belgium. The case of Parsis in India is also similar, as they manifest their heritage Parsi culture and collective Indian culture at the same time. The practitioners of biculturalism manifest the salient elements of their ancestral culture vis-à-vis identifying themselves in the other dominant culture of the political/geographical region, and make themselves distinct from the acculturated people. Sometimes this trend brings a new culture of integration. It is evident in Indian Hindu-Muslim culture popularly known as Ganga Jamuni Tehzeeb, manifesting the values and belief systems of the two.

The policy of biculturalism is adopted by countries as a diplomatic step to appease two belligerent and rival cultures. When one analyzes the history of countries with bicultural practices, like those of Canada, Belgium, and New Zealand, it records that there has been a continuous national or ethnic conflict between the settlers and the indigenous people or between the two rival colonizing groups in which neither of the parties has achieved complete victory. Studies in biculturalism analyze the issues of class, ethnicity, gender issues, and biculturalism. They also undertake the bicultural experiences: exploring how the bicultural experience may connect to ideas of acculturation, assimilation, marginality, bush tradition, cultural clashes and communication barriers, identity, ambivalence, superordinate, subordination, and issues related to insiders and outsiders. The legislature and executive in a bicultural scenario always are challenged to create a middle path for both prevailing cultural groups.

Analyzing the process of biculturalism in different parts of the globe, it is visible that some of the U.S. states have faced cultural tensions. The movement for Chicano rights, or the Mexican American civil rights movement, is an important but less focused segment in American history that demanded a bicultural policy with regard to Mexican Americans. The main rights that this movement sought in its agenda of consideration were restoration of land grants, farmworker rights, better wages, better communities, better working environments, enhanced avenues for education, and granting of voting and political rights to Chicanos. In Belgium the clash of French- and Dutch-speaking populations put two cultures in confrontation that later gave way to the nation's adopting a bicultural policy. The Republic of Vanuatu, an island nation located in the South Pacific Ocean, has a unique case of biculturalism in which the rivalry between France and Great Britain in administration and colonization brought them together to annex the territory, creating a British-French Condominium in 1906. It led to a bicultural state of dominantly English and French cultures. The case of the Polish-Lithuanian

A statue in an Ottowa, Canada, park of Lester B. Pearson, prime minister of Canada. Pearson established the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism in 1963. The commission was created to "inquire into and report upon the existing state of bilingualism and biculturalism" and to develop equality and cooperation between the founding races of Canada.

Commonwealth established a biculturalism of Polish and Lithuanian cultures due to the impact of two major forces for years. The Swiss Confederation, a landlocked nation surrounded by Germany to the north, France to the west, Italy to the south, and Austria and Liechtenstein to the east, has recognized biculturalism with two major impacts—those of French and German cultures.

The Republic of Paraguay, a landlocked nation in South America, bordering Argentina in the south and southwest, Brazil in the east and northeast, and Bolivia in the northwest, has observed two simultaneous and parallel-running cultures: the indigenous Guaraní and the colonizing Spanish. In the same way, South Tyrol, or Alto Adige, is an autonomous province in Italy that is dominated by German and Italian cultures and realizes smooth biculturalism. As discussed above, the case of New Zealand is a landmark, where the indigenous Maoris and early British settlers have established biculturalism.

As far as Canada is concerned, it is a classic example of biculturalism. From the time of the earliest settlement and foreign presence in Canada, many international cultural players have realized their sway there. With the passage of time, French and English culture emerged as the two most powerful forces there. Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, after passing the Official Languages Act, declared Canada a bilingual nation in 1969, which is a reflection of biculturalism. Canadian administration has provided equal status to English and Anglophone and French and Francophone cultures in the governance of Canada.

As far as the concept of biculturalism among individuals is concerned, a bicultural individual is capable of blending one's heritage with the acquired culture, which becomes visible with all cultural practices, values, and identifications. It also suggests that a bicultural person not only finds him/herself capable of understanding the two cultures but also reflects their ethos and icons in his or her behavior as well. Biculturalism develops in the sociocultural contexts and environment of the individual. A bicultural individual keeps a modest balance between the heritage culture and the acquired culture; for example, one can find the behavior of diaspora populations in many countries who observe the cultural baggage along with accommodating them in the acquired land, which is manifested many times in emotional biculturalism. Terms such as Spanish American, German American, Chinese American, Indian American, or Asian American are self-explanatory as far as biculturalism is concerned. Biculturalism, thus, manifests the mutual relations and the presence of two distinct cultural groups, usually of perceptible difference in status and power, in a locale united by sociopolitical and economic interests.

The cult of biculturalism implicitly has many good and bad traits simultaneously. The imminence of rivalry between two cultures can harbor cultural clash. It is natural when they take a negative turn. Their healthy and constructive relationship can develop a sustainable and mutually respectful relationship between the cultures. A well-managed structure of biculturalism in any nation can bring healthy competition, which may increase gross national product and all-around development.

Ravindra Pratap Singh
University of Lucknow

See Also: Cultural Determinism; Ethnoentrism and Ethnorelativism; Subcultures.

Further Readings

Bacallao,Martica and Paul Smokowski. Becoming Bicultural: Risk, Resilience, and Latino Youth. New York: New York University Press, 2011.

Ballara, A. Proud to Be White? A Survey of Pakeha Prejudice in New Zealand. Auckland, New Zealand: Heinneman, 1986.

Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. http://epe.lac-bac.gc.ca/100/200/301/pco-bcp/commissions-ef/dunton1967-1970-ef/dunton1967-70-eng.htm (Accessed September 2013).

Rutledge, M. Dennis. Biculturalism, Self Identity and Societal Transformation: Research in Race and Ethnic Relations, vol. 15. Bingley, UK: JAI Press, 2008.

Biracial Children

Biracial children have parents who are of different racial heritages. The 2010 U.S. Census reported that approximately 3.5 million children are of more than two racial heritages. Researchers, who in the past mainly focused on black and white biracial children, noted these children were mentally and physically weak. This biased view, which was once popular, was called the hybrid degeneracy theory and contributed to the stereotype of biracial children as socially misfit. The theory has since been disproved and deemed scientifically wrong. Another factor that affected biracial children negatively was the antimiscegenation laws adopted by some states. These laws prohibited interracial marriages, and the offspring of such marriages were regarded as socially unacceptable. These laws were struck down by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1967, and biracial children are no longer deemed unacceptable in society. The social environment surrounding biracial children has improved, yet biracial children still have problems.

Supporting the Identity Formation of Biracial Children

Some biracial children look physically ambiguous. For example, if a child has a Japanese American mother and an African American father, the child may look African American. Due to the child's physical appearance, she may be identified as African American by others although she wants to identify herself as Japanese and African American. If this happens, she will have an identity formation problem. In order to avoid the identity problem, scholars point out that what is necessary for the healthy identity formation of biracial children is: informing them of their biracial heritages, living in a racially diverse area, and giving them names that reflect their biracial heritages.

Parents can provide information on children's biracial backgrounds by talking about them with their children and practicing their respective cultures at home. For example, consider a case of a biracial child whose mother is Chinese American and whose father is Irish American. The mother can cook Chinese food at home and speak Chinese to the child. In this way, the child can be familiarized with the mother's cultural heritage. The father can do similar things with the child to reflect his Irish culture. If the child is familiar with both parents' cultures, even if others tell her she does not look Chinese, she will be comfortable with who she is.

People usually celebrate holidays or cultural traditions with their relatives. If biracial children can share these occasions with relatives of both parents, they will be more confident of who they are. However, some biracial children suffer from the rejection of their relatives. Similarly, some biracial children are raised by single parents and do not know of the other parent's racial heritage. In both cases, biracial children do not have enough access to their biracial heritages.

However, there are many support groups for biracial children throughout the United States. These groups offer occasions such as picnics, summer camps, and parties through which biracial children can learn about their biracial heritages and interact with other biracial children. Through various activities at home and in the community, biracial children can incorporate biracial heritages and achieve biracial identity.

The community in which they live is also important for biracial children. If a child has an Indian American mother and a Caucasian father and lives in a predominantly white neighborhood, she may find it difficult to embrace her mother's cultural heritage because of the dominance of the white culture. Some parents of biracial children move to areas where the racial/ethnic population is more diversified, but not all parents can do so. In this case again, support groups help biracial children get to know their biracial heritages through participating in the events or activities these groups hold.

Names play an important role for the identity formation of the biracial child. Some biracial people look racially ambiguous, but if their names reflect their biracial heritages, people can easily recognize that they are biracial. For example, a child has a Greek American mother and a Vietnamese American father, and she looks Caucasian. But if she only has a Vietnamese name, people will wonder what she is. "What are you?" is a question biracial children are often asked. If the child has a name that reflects both her Greek and Vietnamese heritages, she could easily answer this question by simply telling her name. Some biracial children are given names reflecting only one of their parents' heritages, but they tend to alter or combine the other parent's heritage with their names when they grow up so that the names match their physical appearance as well as their identity.

By carefully providing information on their biracial heritages and choosing the location of residence and names, parents can help achieve a healthy identity formation for biracial children.

School Life and Dating

Children at American schools often form cliques based on race. African American children, for example, befriend other African American children; Korean American children are with other Korean American children. If this is the case, biracial children cannot find any clique in which to fit. As a result, some try to pass as one of their parents' race, but this betrays their true biracial identity. When biracial children grow up, they also confront dating issues. Like friends, dating partners are chosen based on race. Some biracial children say they feel like they are betraying one of their parents if they choose their dating partners from the other parent's racial group. In order to solve these problems, some students launch clubs for biracial peers at high schools or universities. These clubs function to support biracial children who are isolated from classrooms or who feel like they betray their identity and parents when they choose a dating partner. Some schools have counselors who support the special needs of biracial children, yet there are few schools that have these support systems.

Health Issues of Biracial Children

Biracial children face urgent health issues when they have leukemia or blood cancer. As part of their treatment, leukemia or blood cancer patients may need a bone marrow transplant from someone who matches their racial group. . Biracial children have to find a donor who completely matches their biracial background. For example, if a child's parents are African American and Native American, a donor has to have the same biracial background. However, only 2 percent of the donors who register with the National Marrow Donor Program are biracial. There is a great need for prospective registrants to be informed about the special health needs of biracial people in order to increase the number of biracial donors participating in the program. In addition, many U.S. health statistics are based on the racial categories contained in the census, which does not include biracial children. It is also imperative for people who deliver health and medical services to pay more attention to biracial children.

Kaori Mori Want
Shibaura Institute of Technology

See Also: Biracial Couples; Multiracial Children; Multiracial Individuals and Families.

Further Readings

MAVIN Foundation. "Matchmaker Bone Marrow Project." http://www.mavinfoundation.org/Matchmaker.html (Accessed July 2013).

Pedrotti, Jennifer Teramoto and Lisa Edwards, eds. Perspectives on the Intersection of Multiculturalism and Positive Psychology, book 7. New York: Springer, 2014.

Renn, Kristen. Mixed Race Students in College: The Ecology of Race, Identity, and Community on Campus. New York: State University of New York Press, 2004.

Biracial Couples

Interracial marriage was legally banned in many places in the United States until the U.S. Supreme Court in 1967 struck down all antimiscegenation laws in the Loving v. Virginia case. Because of these laws, biracial couples were regarded as socially unacceptable. Biracial couples are couples who are of different racial backgrounds, such as a Chinese American wife and an African American husband.

According to the 2010 U.S. Census, approximately 5 million Americans have racially different partners. In the past, biracial couples were shunned by society because there was a social assumption that marriage should be between people of the same race. Being excluded from many aspects of social life, some biracial couples had to live an isolated life. Some biracial couples faced prejudice, discrimination, and ostracism from their families, friends, communities, and society. Biracial couples had a difficult time, but with the help of their peers and support groups, they have survived the difficult time together, raised children, and contributed to American racial tolerance and diversity.

Loving v. Virginia Ruling

The environment surrounding biracial couples was difficult before antimiscegenation laws became illegal as a result of the Supreme Court ruling in Loving v. Virginia (1967). An antimiscegenation law was first enacted in Virginia in 1662, and many other states later adopted similar laws. These laws basically banned marriage between a Caucasian and a non-Caucasian. Some states banned marriages between different non-Caucasian groups, such as a marriage between a Chinese American and a Mexican American, but these marriages were usually tolerated. It is therefore pointed out that the purpose of these laws was to keep the Caucasian race from being mixed with other races and to maintain white supremacy.

The antimiscegenation laws banned biracial marriages for a long time and functioned to justify discrimination against biracial couples. However, the Virginia statute was challenged by a biracial couple, Mildred and Perry Loving, in 1963. Mildred was part African American and Native American; Perry was Caucasian. They were brought up in the same neighborhood in Virginia, and became lovers later on. Since Virginia had an antimiscegenation law, the Lovings went to Washington, D.C., and lived there for a while. However, they wanted to live in their hometown in Virginia and moved back there. When they returned, the Virginia police arrested them because they violated the antimiscegenation law. The state ordered the couple to leave Virginia for 25 years, but the Lovings wanted to live in their own community, and began a legal battle against Virginia with the support of Robert F. Kennedy and the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). Two ACLU lawyers, Bernard Cohen and Philip Hirschkop, represented the couple, and on June 12, 1967, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that antimiscegenation was unconstitutional and ordered Virginia to approve the couple's marriage.

Networking of Biracial Couples

The Loving case eased the restrictive environment for biracial couples. However, there continues to be misunderstanding and prejudice against biracial couples, such as other people staring at them, starting rumors, or calling them names, To deal with these problems, some biracial couples have moved to areas where biracial marriages are more tolerated and have tried to find couples like them for mutual support. The 2010 U.S. Census illustrated that cities such as New York City, San Francisco, and Honolulu have relatively large multiracial populations. Biracial couples can easily find people like themselves in these places. Some biracial couples have launched either face-to-face or Internet-based support groups in order to extend help and understanding to other biracial couples and to provide helpful information for biracial couples throughout the United States. These groups provide outreach and support to biracial couples who live in racially homogeneous areas and who cannot find people like them.

Biracial couples need mutual support because they share similar problems. Some face rejection from their families and cannot introduce their children to their respective families. Some biracial couples report neighborhood harassment such as name-calling, stares, harmful rumors, property vandalism, and threats. Prejudice is accelerated when couples have children. Some people tell biracial couples that their children will suffer identity dilemmas because the children will have no place in any racial group, and therefore couples should not have children. Some biracial couples find that their children do not look like them, and people have trouble identifying parents and children as a family, which negatively affects family unity.

In order to fight against social bigotry, biracial couples need support groups that understand their problems. These support groups' activities are various. Some offer opportunities for biracial couples to learn how to deal with the unpleasant experiences they face in society and how to raise children. Workshops or information on childrearing are beneficial for biracial couples because it is sometimes difficult for them to understand the feelings or problems of their children due to their monoracial backgrounds. Some support groups are politically active. Some of these groups lobbied the government to change the U.S. Census so that their children could mark their biracial heritages on the census. This lobbying is called the multiracial movement and it succeeded in persuading the government to change the census. Before the movement, biracial people had to mark only one of their racial heritages, and some biracial couples found this "mark only one race" feature of the census detrimental to the development of their children's identity formation and self-esteem. Beginning with the 2000 U.S. Census, all biracial people can mark more than one racial category. These various activities not only help biracial couples but also encourage Americans in general to get rid of their negative images of biracial couples.

Changing Social Atmosphere and Human Services Needs

After the Loving ruling, biracial couples were no longer illegal and society has gradually changed its attitude toward them from rejection to acceptance. In 1980, the number of interracial marriages was only 6.7 percent, but the 2010 U.S. Census revealed that approximately 15 percent of all new marriages in the United States were interracial marriages.

Further evidence of how the increasing number of biracial couples positively affects public views can be found in a 2012 Pew Research Center study on interracial marriages. The study reported that 43 percent of respondents stated that interracial marriage was a positive change for society, and 63 percent answered that it was fine with them if their family members "outmarried" into another racial group. On the other hand, the same data illustrate that some Americans still cannot accept biracial couples, with 11 percent of respondents stating that interracial marriage was not a good change for society, and 14 percent believing that intermarriage was a bad thing. While the public's attitude toward biracial couples is getting better, there are people who maintain their negative views toward biracial couples, with continuing reports of harassment against biracial couples. Human services for biracial couples will be necessary until the day all Americans can embrace biracial couples as a part of their society.

Kaori Mori Want
Shibaura Institute of Technology

See Also: Biracial Children; Critical Race Theory; Multiracial Individuals and Families; Race, Social Definitions of; Race and Ethnic Categories, U.S. Census.

Further Readings

Dacosta, Kimberly McClain. Making Multiracials: State, Family, and Market in the Redrawing of the Color Line. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2007.

Moran, Rachel. Interracial Intimacy: The Regulation of Race and Romance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.

Pew Research Center. "The Rise of Intermarriage." http://pewsocialtrends.org/files/2012/02/SDT-Intermarriage-II.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

Blindness and Low Vision

Across the globe, there are numerous definitions of blindness and low vision, each with the intent of defining a person's eligibility to receive certain benefits such as income assistance, disability support, and various rehabilitation services.

The concept of "legal blindness" in the United States was promulgated by the American Medical Association in 1934 and adopted by Congress as part of the Aid to the Blind program in the Social Security Act of 1935. The law defines legal blindness as having a visual acuity (measured by the Snellen test) of 20/200 or less in the better eye, with Sightless Among Miracles*, a bronze sculpture created by R. T. Wallen, was donated to the Carter Center River Blindness Program. The program has assisted in the delivery of more than 35 million treatments of a drug donated by Merck and Company to families in Africa and Latin America who, for hundreds of years, have been stricken with river blindness.*

best correction or widest diameter of visual field subtending an angle of no greater than 20 degrees. Since 1935, this definition has been used as a criterion by which a person in the United States may be deemed eligible for public services.

This is not only true in North America, but also in most of Europe. For example, in the United Kingdom (UK) blindness is defined using the Snellen test, but is measured in meters, with 6/60 in meters the U.S. equivalent of 20/200 in feet.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) and Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) Amendments Act of 2008 use the term visual impairment and refer to it as a disability if: (1) it substantially limits a major life activity; (2) it was substantially limiting in the past; or (3) an employer regards or treats an individual as having a substantially limiting vision impairment.

The World Health Organization's (WHO) International Classification of Diseases (ICD-10) defines blindness as having a visual acuity of less than 3/60 (the metric equivalent of Snellen's 20/200). The WHO takes this definition one step further by adding the category of low vision, defining it as a visual acuity with best correction of less than 6/18 (roughly 20/63 Snellen equivalent) and/or a corresponding visual field loss of less than 10 degrees. Furthermore, the WHO identifies four levels of visual functioning— normal vision, moderate visual impairment, severe visual impairment, and blindness—and takes a more functional perspective.

Prevalence

According to 2010 U.S. Census data, of a total population of 142.6 million persons age 40 and over, 4.2 million Americans have a visual impairment, while 1.3 million are blind. Approximately 60 percent of the 4.2 million visually impaired persons have functional low vision. On a global basis, the World Health Organization estimates that 285 million people are visually impaired, with 39 million of those blind and 246 million having low vision, or approximately 80 percent who have functional low vision. These are important data as they help inform public policy decisions and help direct private and governmental service providers to the information required to best serve individuals with visual impairments.

For example, while there are overlaps among services for people who are blind and those with low vision, there are services that may be unique to each of the populations. People who have no functional vision can negotiate activities of daily living by using nonvisual techniques, such as braille and computer screen reading programs, among other devices and techniques. Those with low vision will use devices and techniques that capitalize on their residual vision, such as computer screen magnification software, telescopes, handheld magnifiers, and video magnifiers.

Services

Services for people who are blind or have low vision may be categorized as: financial benefits; rehabilitation or compensatory strategies to perform activities of daily living, such as adaptive kitchen skills, braille and other tactile systems, orientation and mobility, communication, adaptive computer skills, use of remaining vision, and psychosocial adjustment to vision loss; and employment.

Financial benefits. By 1919, 13 states had approved specific procedures for providing financial aid to individuals who were blind. In 1935, the Social Security Act provided grants to states to provide "aid to the blind." Provisions of this law remain intact today in U.S. and state governments, resulting in supports and services such as Supplemental Security Income, Medicaid, and federal income tax deductions for those who are legally blind. The UK provides financial benefits such as the Personal Independence Payment (PIP), Employment and Support Allowance (ESA), and certain tax credits. In Germany, people who are blind receive cash benefits, while people in Ireland who are blind are able to receive a pension. In Australia, the Disability Support Pension (Blind) is issued to men and woman who are legally blind. This pension is free of income and asset testing and is not taxable. Assistance is also available in Australia for the purchase of equipment to improve an individual's independence.

Rehabilitation. In the United States methods and techniques to provide people who were blind with the skills necessary for independent living originated with Dr. William Moon in the mid-1800s. Through home-based instruction, he worked with people to assist them in learning what would later become known as home teaching. By 1926, 25 states had adopted these services. Today, every state provides services through a combination of public and private agencies.

Globally, the organizations providing services to people who are blind or have low vision are too numerous to list. Examples across the globe include the Spanish National Organization of the Blind (ONCE), which provides training in daily activities, education, and leisure activities; the Polish Association of the Blind, a public-benefit organization, offers support for activities of daily living across the country; the South African National Council for the Blind provides community-based rehabilitation services; and the Nippon Lighthouse in Japan offers services in the areas of personal adjustment training, adaptive communication, and orientation and mobility.

Employment. The fundamental supposition in the United States during the 1920s and early 1930s was that people with visual disabilities had little potential for competitive employment and were relegated to either sheltered workshops or home industry settings. However, with the passage of the Randolph-Sheppard Act of 1936 and the Wagner-O'Day Act of 1938, opportunities for people who are blind began to expand. People who were blind were allowed to operate vending stands on federal property, and it became mandatory for the federal government to purchase designated products from workshops that employed people who were blind. Today, people who are visually impaired are employed as lawyers, accountants, computer programmers, teachers, and many other occupations. However, unemployment and underemployment continue to be an issue. Recent U.S. statistics (2011) conclude that noninstitutionalized persons aged 21 to 64 years with a visual disability have an employment rate of only 36.8 percent.

According to a World Blind Union (WBU) presentation in 2012, people who are blind or have low vision are the group least likely to attain employment. The WBU finds that in many countries people who are blind are five times more likely to be unemployed than the general public. The WBU has undertaken three initiatives to help dispel employers' previously conceived notions about the capacities of people who are blind/partially sighted and the relatively simple modifications that can be made in the workplace: (1) employment mentoring and peer support programs; (2) microcredit and microenterprise programs; and (3) the establishment of employment resource banks.

James A. Leja
Western Michigan University

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990; Assistive Technology; Disabilities, International Variation in Attitudes Toward; Disability Services; Disabled Clients.

Further Readings

The Chicago Lighthouse for People Who Are Blind or Visually Impaired. "About Blindness." http://chicagolighthouse.org/programs-and-services/information-and-referral/about-blindness (Accessed November 2013).

Koestler, Frances A. The Unseen Minority: A Social History of Blindness in the United States. New York: AFB Press, 2004.

World Blind Union. http://www.worldblindunion.org/English/Pages/default.aspx (Accessed November 2013).

World Health Organization. "Visual Impairment and Blindness" (2013). http://www.who.int/mediacentre/factsheets/fs282/en (Accessed November 2013).

Blue Collar/Pink Collar/White Collar

Jobs are classified into categories by the conventional dress of the workers—blue, pink, and white collars. This stratification system is actually based on the level of education and training required, pay, social prestige, nature of work activities, and the setting in which the workers perform their tasks.

"Blue collar" refers to work or occupations that are manual and craft-related, found in factory or outdoor settings. Formal schooling or apprenticeship training is generally required for entry into these occupations. Due to the manual (or craft) nature of their work activities, workers wear blue work shirts, uniforms, or jumpsuits. Jobs that are labeled "blue collar" range from construction workers, carpenters, nurses, electricians, plumbers, assembly plant workers, and sanitation workers to police officers. All of these are traditionally male-dominated occupations, except for nursing.

"Pink collar" is a label used to capture the emergence of a new group of workers in clerical and service work in the mid-1950s. During this period, there was an influx of women into the labor markets, taking up jobs as secretaries, waitresses, child care providers, and telephone operators. The growth of the service economy and technological development has facilitated the expansion of these "female occupations" in industrialized nations.

"White collar" refers to jobs or work performed in office settings that necessitate the wearing of white shirts or business attire. Managerial, supervisory, and professional jobs that require college or advanced training and/or licensing fall into this category. High paying and high status, these jobs were historically dominated by whites and men. Racial minorities and women were historically barred from receiving education as well as from participating in these occupations.

Technology, Prestige, and Inequality

Due to a lack of the means of production, such as capital and technology, individuals are compelled to sell their labor for wages in the labor markets. Industrialization has brought stability and change in the stratification system. Generally, white-collar (intellectual, knowledge-based) workers command the highest respect in the society, followed by blue-collar (technical/manual, craft) workers. Pink-collar (clerical or service-oriented) workers are at the bottom in terms of occupational prestige. In addition to education, skills, and pay, gender composition in a field serves as an indicator of occupational prestige. Jobs with a relatively high concentration of women or perceived as "women's work" tend to be low paying, low prestige, and low security.

White-collar and most blue-collar work are considered as "desirable" or "good jobs" because of their relatively high pay and career prospects. In contrast, due to their low pay and poor career prospects, pink-collar work is considered as "least desirable" or "bad jobs." Further, the possibility of moving from the "bad-jobs" sector to the "good-jobs" sector is close to zero, due to the requirements of higher education and/or specific skills for white- and blue-collar work.

The distinction between white-collar (middle-class/managerial) and blue-collar (working-class/technical) workers is blurred because automation in factories and information technology has turned many manual and craft jobs into relatively clean, responsible, and clerically oriented work. Technology has de-skilled some workers and upgraded the skills of other workers. However, technological changes have provided freedom of movement and reduced time pressures for blue-collar workers. Technology has also transformed communications and, in turn, relationships between white- and blue-collar workers. To a large extent, technology has reduced inequality between blue- and white-collar work in terms of the production and delivery of goods and services.

The same cannot be said about pink-collar jobs. In fact, the opposite is true. Technology has de-skilled many clerical jobs and allowed employers to recruit women into secretarial and service-oriented work. The perception that women are a docile and subordinate workforce has made them an ideal source of labor in office settings and service industries.

Job Security and Satisfaction

Historically, individuals performing intellectual and technical work have enjoyed job security. Requirements for higher education and specialized skills and the need for on-the-job training make worker replacements costly for employers. Further, most if not all manual and craft workers are unionized and protected by seniority rules from arbitrary discipline or exploitation by employers. White-collar workers report a higher level of job satisfaction thanks to financial rewards, career prospects, and autonomy. By contrast, working conditions and physical demands of the job lower the level of satisfaction among blue-collar workers.

The civil rights and women's movements have resulted in racial and gender integration in many previously white-male-dominated occupations. High school education is the minimum requirement for entry into blue-collar jobs such as firefighting, union construction, and subway operation. Newcomers in fire service, construction, and transit operation receive formal training or apprenticeships. However, historically disadvantaged groups (women and racial minorities) continue to face substantial informal barriers in these fields. The obstacles range from white and male workers' opposition and resistance to women and minorities in firefighting and union construction to harassment, assaults, sabotage, and threats to personal safety.

Most white-collar jobs can no longer provide job security. Hiring at the entry level from outside and being promoted from within has created an internal labor market for many organizations and companies. Firm-specific skills and knowledge may have protected incumbents from external competition for promotions. As a result, they have a competitive edge in getting ahead within their firms. However, cuts in government spending and corporate restructuring have resulted in massive layoffs of white-collar workers, especially those occupying middle-level managerial or administrative positions. Industrial restructuring and recent economic recession has resulted in a permanent loss of these white-collar jobs and created a cadre of "collarless workers."

Having previously worked from "9-to-5" in office settings with regular paychecks, benefits, and ladders of upward mobility, many white-collar workers are now self-employed at home or work as independent contractors for previous employers or for other companies. To keep themselves employable in the fluctuating job markets, these "collarless workers" have to maintain and expand their networks.

Job Appeal

What makes blue-, pink-, and white-collar jobs appealing? The nature of manual labor or craft requires workers to do physically demanding, repetitive, and sometimes dangerous tasks. The physical toll is high for those who do these jobs. But the "costs" and danger associated with most blue-collar work are compensated by high financial rewards. In contrast, pink-collar workers pay a high psychological and emotional toll. Dead-end, labor-intensive, and nonunionized, many "female occupations" are oriented to serving the public or providing supportive roles in companies, human services agencies, and private residences. With the emergence of the service economy, especially the proliferation of call centers worldwide, women have taken up the bulk of work as office or sales clerks, waitresses, telephone operators, beauticians, maids, nannies, and home care providers. Compared to blue- and white-collar work, pink-collar work is intellectually and technically less challenging. However, these "female occupations" provide part-time employment, flexibility, and freedom to engage in other activities after work. Unlike their counterparts in blue- and white-collar jobs, pink-collar workers do not enjoy job security or high pay. Seldom unionized, these low-wage workers perform routine work without the job benefits and prestige associated with blue- and white-collar work.

A similarity shared among blue-, white, and pink-collar workers is that an increasing number of workers are hired on short-term contracts. Instead of being salaried workers, a large proportion of managerial, professional, and service workers are now being paid by the number of hours worked and/or being assigned to a specific job location to serve a client.

Technological changes have allowed multinational corporations to set up international call centers or data entry processing centers in developing counties and to hire a large number of female workers at low wages. This global trend has driven down the wages of these feminizing occupations and turned these jobs into "ghettos" for women worldwide.

Generally, a pleasant work environment and relatively high pay make white-collar work attractive. Due to the nature of work and career prospects, job satisfaction of white-collar workers tends to be higher than that of blue- and pink-collar workers. However, fierce competition for jobs and downward mobility has become a reality for many white-collar workers. Restructuring and economic recession in recent decades has eliminated many white-collar managerial jobs. Information technology has expanded the scope and nature of work outside office settings. White-collar workers are now expected to check their e-mail, make and answer telephone calls, and participate in meetings when they are at home and on vacations. The Internet, smartphones, and other electronic devices have completely shattered the boundary between work, family, and leisure. Information overload and loss of privacy have become a fact of life for many doing white-collar work. Thus, long hours and stress may result in higher rates of "burnout" among workers with higher education or specialized skills.

The Future of Blue-, Pink-, and White-Collar Work

In spite of technological changes and restructuring, there is no evidence of massive and well-organized efforts among workers to protect their job security and privacy. These changes collectively might have benefited a specific group of workers. There are more women in the labor force than ever. It is not because women have suddenly grown stronger or greedier than before. Many of them are compelled to enter the labor force by economic needs. Women's participation in the labor force has expanded into the service economy. Women are as willing and able as men to do a variety of work. They enter intellectually, physically, and emotionally demanding jobs to support themselves and their families. The notion of femininity can be considered an asset instead of a liability for women in seeking employment opportunities on a global scale.

As more women complete higher education, they will continue to enter the labor market in large numbers. As an economic force to be reckoned with, it will be difficult for employers to continue to treat women doing white-, blue-, and even pink-collar work the way they did. Women's presence and their demands for equal and respectful treatment in corporate board rooms, on construction job sites, or at their client's residences will continue to erode male dominance in blue- and white-collar work and improve the status of women holding pink-collar jobs. However, changing the work cultures in male domains requires organization, resources, and support of coworkers and supervisors. History has revealed that without support at the institutional level (from the government, unions, and media), it is difficult for women to improve their plight in male (blue-and white-collar) and female (pink-collar) jobs.

Implications for Human Services and Diversity

An increase in the participation of women in white-, blue-, and pink-collar jobs creates new human services needs and delivery. The society will shift its economic and support services from male workers to a female workforce. Workplace diversity suggests that more women will take on the role of sole economic provider or coprovider in American households. As an economic force to be reckoned with, women have become an agent of diversity in human services and care. There have been increasing demands for child and senior services by working mothers with the responsibilities of taking care of children, elderly parents, and sick relatives. Workplace diversity, coupled with demographic shifts, have compelled governments and corporations to pay attention to gender and family issues. As providers for their families, female and (young) male workers have to juggle family and work. For working parents, day care and after-school services are indispensable. Employing domestic help with child care, housework, and elderly care has become a common practice among professional women. This may contribute to the legitimization of personal concierges and the entry of more workers, especially women, into service-oriented jobs. Long-term residential or home care for elderly parents and community-based services for seniors will be needed to meet the growing needs of employed women or working mothers to take care of parents with special needs.

A shrinking of the organizational ladder has resulted in the demand for employees' education. Former holders of high-paying, high-status, white-collar jobs may need to update their knowledge or upgrade their skills. A proliferation of online college credit–bearing courses, continuing education, or new career training is a direct outcome of rising demands by working professionals or those who want to make career changes.

Economic restructuring and recent recessions have led to an extended working life expectancy of many "baby boomers." To make up for the income loss as a result of career interruptions or to recoup investments in additional education or training, they tend to delay retirements. Thus, an increasing number of workers in their 50s and 60s may face stiff job competition in a diverse workforce. Their extended participation in the labor force will result in tensions for human services and delivery. Employers will have to come up with the resources to address the issue of skills obsolescence and the health care needs of an aging workforce. At the same time, many of these "baby boomers" will find themselves working side by side with younger workers who share different values and work and lifestyles. How to help a diverse workforce develop and maintain cultural competence constitutes a challenge for governments and corporations.

After obtaining new career training or retooling, some former holders of white-collar jobs may take up blue-collar jobs or work as self-employed (independent) contractors for a diverse clientele here and abroad. This group of "freelancers," young and middle-aged, will generate demands for new human services catering to their unique (flexible) work and lifestyles.

Joyce Tang
Queens College of the City University of New York

See Also: Aging and Adult Services; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Home and Community Services; Home Care Services; Long-Term Residential Care.

Further Readings

Ehrenreich, Barbara. Nickel and Dimed: On (Not) Getting By in America. New York: Henry Holt, 2001.
Granovetter, Mark and Charles Tilly. "Inequality and Labor Processes." In Handbook of Sociology, Neil J. Smelser, ed. Newbury Park, CA: Sage, 1988.
Paap, Kris. Working Construction: Why White Working-Class Men Put Themselves—and the Labor Movement—in Harm's Way. Ithaca, NY: ILR Press, 2006.
Rosenbaum, James E. Career Mobility in a Corporate Hierarchy. New York: Academic Press, 1984.
Royster, Deirdre A. Race and the Invisible Hand: How White Networks Exclude Black Men From Blue-Collar Jobs. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
Sennett, Richard. The Craftsman. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2008.
Sennett, Richard and Jonathan Cobb. The Hidden Injuries of Class. New York: W. W. Norton, 1972.
Sherman, Rachel. "'Time Is Our Commodity': Gender and the Struggle for Occupational Legitimacy Among Personal Concierges." Work and Occupations, v.37 (2010).
Smith, Vicki and Esther B. Neuwirth. The Good Temp. Ithaca, NY: ILR Press, 2008.

Blue Vein Society/Paper Bag Test

In order to conceptualize the Blue Vein Society, it is imperative to first examine its evolution. This article discusses eugenics, the mulatto hypothesis, and the one-drop rule, which serves as the circumference for understanding the Blue Vein Society. The article concludes with a review of information on the Blue Vein Society. This article is significant for human services because it illustrates the magnitude of diversity even within a single ethnic or racial group. Moreover, it seeks to assist in eradicating a monolithic notion that is subject to fostering prejudices and stereotypes about certain groups of individuals.

Eugenics

Eugenics is a term coined by Francis Galton in 1883. Galton defined eugenics as the study of all agencies under human control that can improve or impair the racial quality of future generations. Eugenics is the philosophy, theory, and practice of improving the human race by promoting the increase of people with desired traits and decreasing the reproduction of people with undesired traits. The eugenics era lasted from the start of the 20th century to well into the 1970s. It continues to influence the thinking of much of the scientific and social communities in the United States. The science of eugenics was based on the shared belief that the genetically and socially elite of human evolution culminated in the white Anglo-Saxon Protestant race. More specifically, it was also a widespread belief that those who were least developed were doomed by heredity to be not only genetically inferior but also socially unfit.

Some racist individuals and groups in the United States used the science of eugenics to imply that African Americans were inherently inferior in every way to whites. Consequently, there was far less value placed on the lives of African Americans. Those African Americans who would commingle with other African Americans would continue to perpetuate an inferior race of people. However, those African Americans who joined with white people would only improve the status of the race. The ideology became a pathway to understanding the mulatto hypothesis.

The Mulatto Hypothesis

The mulatto hypothesis is theoretically couched in the science of eugenics. A mulatto may be defined as the offspring of an African American and a Caucasian. Initially, the product of these racially different people was considered an anomaly. This was attributed to the notion at that time that commingling the people of the African American race with those of the Caucasian race was taboo. Moreover, mulatto people were often perceived as a violation to the purity and immaculacy of the race. African Americans in every aspect were considered inferior. Some suggested that African Americans were of subhuman status and even were the missing link between man and ape. Consequently, this notion defined the subservient role that African Americans assumed in society.

The revised version of the mulatto hypothesis indicated that in order for African Americans to improve the quality of their race, they had to increase the amount of their Caucasian genetic heritage. Therefore, lighter-colored African Americans had the advantage over those African Americans with darker-colored skin (from two African American parents). Caucasians who were the offspring of two white people were undoubtedly considered superior in every way.

One-Drop Rule

One factor with a tremendous influence on the formation of the mulatto hypothesis had to do with what was called the one-drop rule. The one-drop rule suggested that if a person had as little as one drop of African American blood in their ancestry, that person was an African American. It was also known as the one-black-ancestor rule, or the traceable-amount rule, or the hypo-descent rule. This meant that racially mixed people were assigned the status of the subordinate group. In this case, African Americans were the group with the lower status.

Ironically, during the antebellum period, people of mixed ancestry who were free and appeared Caucasian were legally and socially immersed into the majority white community. This was the circumstance if the person had up to one-quarter (one African American grandparent) or even one-eighth (one African American great-grandparent) African ancestry. Moreover, if the person's physical appearance was that of a Caucasian and they were perceived by others as Caucasian, they were then accepted in society as white.

It was not until the 20th century that the one-drop rule was adopted as a law. This law was mostly proposed and supported by those white people who were trying to maintain a sense of white supremacy and purity of their ancestry. The Racial Integrity

Mulattoes sitting on the porch of country store near a cotton plantation in Melrose, Louisiana, in 1940. Such men could have been given the paper bag test used by upper-class African American societies in the early 1900s to determine if a black person was white enough to gain admittance or acceptance. Anyone with a skin tone darker than a paper bag was not allowed into the group.

Act of 1924 was the first law to initiate such ancestry standards. Enacted in Virginia, this law required that a racial description of every person be recorded at birth. Once that identification occurred, the person was divided into one of only two categories: white and colored. The Racial Integrity Act of 1924 defined "colored" as a person with African or Native American ancestry.

The Society

The Blue Vein Society became known as a group of people generally of mixed African–African American and white Anglo-Saxon heritage. This combination produced a population of people whose physical traits and complexion were different from those of traditional African–African American as well as white Anglo-Saxon people. However, by definition they are African American. This occurrence also promoted a class system for the children stemming from the two individuals who represent separate ethnic groups.

The term Blue Vein Society is also associated with a perceived aristocratic group that had wealth, privilege, and high social status. In a broader sense, Blue Vein Society signifies the historical phenomenon found among some African Americans in which individuals with lighter complexion and loosely curled, wavy, or straight-textured hair occupy positions of favor, while darker-skinned African Americans rank lower on the social scale. Technically, the term blue vein was attributed to having less pigmentation in the skin until one could see the blue veins that were in the volar forearm. Moreover, the Blue Vein Societies continued to develop, particularly in the southern region of the United States for decades following the Civil War.

As the members of the Blue Vein Society continued to exist throughout the larger African American community, they began to epitomize nearly another racial/ethnic group in society. The main objective of the Blue Vein Society was to maintain their lighter complexion, physical features, and privileged social status in the greater African American community. This has been known in more recent times as "colorism." For example, the members of the Blue Vein Society may have been employed in the same company as many darker-skinned African Americans. However, the lighter-skinned African Americans often avoided any intimate social contact with the darker-skinned African Americans once the workday was over. Within the work environment, the darker-skinned African Americans often occupied the physically labor-intensive positions, while the lighter-skinned African Americans were likely to serve in a leadership capacity. This concept was perpetuated and supported by the white company owner. Because the physical appearance of the Blue Vein Society members more closely resembled that of white people, they were also perceived as being more intelligent than the dark-skinned workers. Thus, they were considered more suitable for their employment position.

In certain social, educational, and religious settings, members of the Blue Vein Society executed behaviors that fostered colorism in the African American community. Common practice in these venues were called the brown paper bag test and the fine-tooth comb test. An applicant could be denied admission into certain organizations, schools, and even churches if their skin color was darker than that of a brown paper bag. If the texture of a person's hair was so course that a fine-tooth comb could not smoothly pass through it, that person failed the test.

In summary, the Blue Vein Society is generational groups of African American people who have mixed African–African American and white Anglo-Saxon heritage. They generally have physical traits and complexion different from those of traditional-looking African–African American as well as white Anglo-Saxon people. They were also perceived as an aristocratic group that had wealth, privilege, and high social status within much of the African American community.

The Blue Vein Society continued to exist during the post–Civil War era. Its conceptualization began with the science of eugenics. The Blue Vein Society was supported by the mulatto hypothesis and enhanced with the one-drop rule. For many in the African American community, the ideologies of the Blue Vein Society continue to exist. There are those who still carry out covert and subtle practices. However, in present times, the Blue Vein Society fails to subsist as a solidified nationally recognized organization.

Dashiel J. Geyen
Texas Southern University

See Also: African Americans; Biracial Children; Race, Social Definitions of; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Black, Edwin. War Against the Weak: Eugenics and America's Campaign to Create a Master Race. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 2004.

Davis, James F. Who Is Black?: One Nation's Definition. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2001.

Galton, Francis. Inquiries Into Human Faculty and Its Development. London: Macmillan, 1883.

Gatewood, Willard B. Aristocrats of Color: The Black Elite, 1880–1920. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990.

Kein, Sybil. Creole: The History and Legacy of Louisiana's Free People of Color. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2009.

Sandler, Kathy. A Question of Color: A Documentary. Independent Television Service: California Newsreel, 1993.

Sweet, Frank W. Legal History of the Color Line: The Rise and Triumph of the One-Drop Rule. Hartford, CT: Backintyme Publishing, 2005.

Talty, Stephan. Mulatto America: At the Crossroads of Black and White Culture: A Social History. New York: HarperCollins, 2003.

Walker, Alice. In Search of Our Mother's Garden. San Diego, CA: Harcourt, 1983.

Boarder Babies

Every year in the United States thousands of newborns and infants are abandoned at hospitals by troubled or ill-equipped mothers who leave it to the health care system and human services agencies to care for their babies. These abandoned newborns and infants are commonly referred to as "boarder babies" because they effectively become boarders at the hospitals and youth services agencies that support them. Most of these children end up as dependents in the foster care system.

The main approach used by human services agencies to address the boarder babies issue is twofold. The primary goal is to prevent abandonment. Addiction, abuse, poverty, and illness are leading causes of baby abandonment. Providing broader and better access to supportive social services and affordable housing for women facing these situations is considered critical as a way to reduce the risk of baby abandonment by troubled mothers. When prevention is not possible, the secondary goal is to facilitate and expedite safe and suitable permanent placement for the babies who have been abandoned. All of these efforts involve participation and coordination by health services, social services, and the courts.

Conceptual Approaches

Three main ideas are critical to contemporary efforts to resolve the boarder babies situation in the United States: collaboration, training, and process improvement.

Collaboration among health care facilities and child welfare agencies may help reduce the incidence of baby abandonment in the first place, and can also help speed permanent placement when abandonment of a child does occur. Specifically, by establishing a mutual understanding or formal protocol between human services agencies and hospitals, critical information about high-risk abandonment situations can be exchanged more swiftly and easily among all parties involved. The same free flow of information can assist when performing due diligence in cases where identification of an abandoned child, biological parent, or caregiver relative is required.

Training is another way to ensure open and ongoing communication among human services agencies, health care providers, and legislative constituents. Training focused on issues tied to child abandonment can facilitate a comprehensive and consistent approach among the diverse service providers and legal participants involved in boarder babies cases. This is especially true when it comes to identifying risk factors for abandonment, ensuring understanding about voluntary relinquishment and termination of parental rights, performing diligence searches prior to placement, and adhering to state and federal child welfare laws.

Process improvements throughout the various organizations that are involved in responding to the needs of the nation's boarder babies also can help establish consistency in procedures and responsive actions. The implementation of protocols and checklists for specific situations, for example, can make it easier to identify required actions, time frames, and participants tied to a given abandonment case. As such, all parties involved in that action can become aware of every step in the process and can see how each step is interconnected within and among the various agencies associated with the case.

Practical Approaches

In addition to the conceptual components behind efforts to address boarder babies and child abandonment issues, there are also practical elements that often are applied to help alleviate the situation.

Manageable caseloads for child welfare workers are critical to ensuring comprehensive and effective services to support fewer instances of abandonment and to facilitate placements when a child is abandoned. It is important that caseworkers, for their part, communicate candidly, clearly, and in an unbiased way with families who are potentially confronting an infant abandonment/relinquishment situation. This interaction often takes the form of one-on-one mentoring between a caseworker and family members. In these sessions, the child welfare agent strives to make the family fully aware of the consequences of terminating parental rights, the details and time frames involved in the child protection process, and the types of permanent placement options that might come into play, such as legal adoption of the child by another family. It is of paramount importance that the communication be neutral but complete.

Early intervention with medical and mental health services for infants and children who have been abandoned or who are at risk of abandonment also is very important. Toward that end, human services workers must carefully assess the child's physical, developmental, behavioral, educational, and social needs as part of the process when determining whether a parent is able to meet the child's needs. This same scrutiny also is helpful when trying to identify an appropriate placement for an abandoned or at-risk baby. The goal is to place the infant in a home that may be suitable for permanency as soon as possible, so understanding the child's physical and emotional status makes it easier to determine the best long-term match for a potential caregiver and home environment.

In the event that an at-risk parent has been identified by a hospital, court, or human services organization, it is important that child welfare agencies identify and deliver a broad range of tailored services designed to help prevent abandonment or, if necessary, to expedite permanent placement for the child who is risk of being abandoned. Such services could include anything from alcohol or drug treatment services for family members to information and services designed to aid in a smooth transition to a biologically related caregiver, unrelated legal guardian, or adoptive family. Additionally, some tools and strategies are available to help uncertain parents make decisions about child abandonment in a timely manner so as not to extend the child's at-risk or impermanent situation.

First, it is critical for hospitals and human services agencies to identify as early as possible those children who are unlikely to benefit from being reunited with their parent or family unit. For example, this may occur when a child's safety is in question. If family reunification seems plausible, case-workers may employ a process known as concurrent planning. Concurrent planning enables a family to work toward unification while simultaneously creating an alternate plan for permanent placement of the child elsewhere. The successful implementation of concurrent planning involves in-depth case-work with the at-risk family, including frank discussion with the biological family about the importance of safe permanent placement for the child, types of permanency options, and consequences of deciding to keep or relinquish the child. It is also important for child welfare workers to participate in diligent search efforts to identify parents and relatives in cases of infant abandonment and to perform frequent and exhaustive case reviews. Subsidized guardianship is sometimes used to encourage relatives to care for abandoned babies who might otherwise remain in the foster care system for an extended period of time.

Voluntary relinquishment offers parents the opportunity to participate in adoption planning for their children. This empowers the parents to make decisions about the child's well-being while avoiding the potentially adversarial and costly processes involved with involuntary termination of parental rights through the court system. Smoothing the process can help speed up permanent placement for the child and save vital time and resources of human services agencies and the courts.

Mediation and family group conferencing, also known as family group decision making, is sometimes used to present the idea and details of voluntary relinquishment to parents and to expedite permanency. Mediation is a way to provide a structured, legal discussion without involving the formal court system. When the courts do get involved, they can help prevent abandonment by imposing legal accountability and mandatory services, such as drug counseling, to help support maintenance of custody by the parent. When necessary, the courts can also expedite termination of parental rights and speed the adoption process once parental rights are terminated.

Family group conferencing involves meetings hosted by child welfare specialists in which immediate and extended family members of at-risk children are encouraged to cooperate, collaborate, and communicate with each other and with the child welfare worker in a nonconfrontational way to make decisions and develop plans for the child's immediate and future safety, well-being, and placement.

The Abandoned Infants Assistance Act was passed in 1988 to help fund intervention programs for families and caregivers. The passage of the Adoption and Safe Families Act in 1997 approached the issue from the other end by putting parameters in place to pressure human services agencies and the court system to find permanent placement for boarder babies in a shorter period of time, typically one year or less. These legislative mandates, however, are only part of the solution to the boarder babies problem in the United States. To move closer to the goals of preventing infant abandonment and rapidly placing abandoned children into safe and nurturing homes requires a collaborative, consistent effort by all parties involved. The multidisciplinary efforts include comprehensive communication and coordination of administrative and procedural practices to help identify and support at-risk families and, if necessary, to permanently place abandoned/relinquished infants and children.

Shari Parsons Miller
Independent Scholar

See Also: Abandonment; Abuse and Neglect; Administration on Children, Youth and Families; Adoption and Safe Families Act; Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Case Management Services; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Early Childhood Development; Family Permanency Planning; Family Services; Foster Care Agencies; Group Homes for Children; Hospitals; Infant/Toddler Development; Legal Services; National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System; National Organization for Human Services; Parenting Skills Training; Protective Services for Children; Social Workers.

Further Readings

Mercer, Jean. "Many Caregivers: The Effects of Change on Attachment." In Understanding Attachment: Parenting, Child Care, and Emotional Development. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2006.

National Abandoned Infants Assistance Resource Center. Boarder Babies, Abandoned Infants, and Discarded Infants. Berkeley: University of California, Berkeley, 2005.

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. The Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, including Adoption Opportunities and the Abandoned Infants Assistance Act, as amended by the Keeping Children and Families Safe Act of 2003. June 2, 2011.

Boot Camps

The notion that offenders, particularly juvenile delinquents, would benefit from military-style boot camp regimes dates from the late 1980s. It was hoped that such a setting would "build character" as it is thought to do in true military contexts and that the harsh discipline encountered there would serve as a form of "shock therapeutic corrections," which would jolt the minor offender and delinquents into a more conformist state of mind. It should be noted that such facilities were often created at former military bases and were significantly cheaper to run than were traditional juvenile facilities. Boot camps also served to reduce overcrowding at existing more custody-based facilities. At base, however, the philosophy that underlies correctional boot camps is not primarily economic; it is essentially a punitive response to the growth in urban crime in that period and reflects the notion that all that is needed to curb delinquency is harsh discipline that would put an end to the assumed permissiveness of the juvenile's parenting.

It was thus implicit that such a regime would build accountability and pride in achieving modest goals through teamwork. Some facilities put a heavy emphasis on literacy and ensuring that those who completed the program were also academically on track. Offenders with alcohol and drug problems were to receive specially targeted therapeutic intervention in some programs. The sad fact is that after boot camps for both juveniles and adults had been established in the 1990s, numerous evaluative studies showed that they had little or no impact on significant behavior variables once the juveniles left the treatment milieu. Although the focus of most literature on correctional boot camps concerns those operating in the public sphere, it should be noted there are privately operated, commercial juvenile boot camps ("brat camps") in some areas. While some of these facilities deal with court referrals, many are the last resort of relatively affluent parents with ungovernable children. Many of these have a "wilderness" approach involving much outdoor exercise and work with domestic animals. A few have a religious orientation that involves heavy immersion in biblically-based discipline and scripture.

While Georgia opened the first boot camp for adults in 1983, Orleans Parish, Louisiana, began the first boot camp for juveniles in 1985. By the 1990s there were 70 juvenile boot camps in 30 states, most employing a program similar to that of military boot camps. Inmates went through a degrading intake procedure in which their heads were shaved, they were given military-type garb, and issued bunks. They were subject to extremely early rising (often to the tune of a bugle), calisthenics, and drills. As in the military, misbehavior or an error by one member of a squad resulted in punishment for the entire squad or individual drill collectively. Punishment usually consisted of running laps or performing meaningless exercises. Some instances have been reported of food and water being denied and sleep deprivation being used as punishment.

Much effort was expended on verbal abuse and humiliation from "drill sergeants" who had squads participate in "team- and character-building" activities that many participants found degrading and pointless. Some shocking instances of abuses by guards and instructors have been reported. It should be noted that many instructors were former drill sergeants, retired from the military. Camps

A Recruiting Station Twin Cities' Mini-Boot Camp gives drill instructors a taste of Marine Corps Boot Camp. Correctional boot camps resemble military boot camps by emphasizing basic training activities such as vigorous exercise, strict rules, and manual labor. It was hoped that such a setting would build character, as it is thought to do in the military.

differed widely in how much time was devoted to education and therapeutic intervention. It has been alleged that both education and therapy were strictly subordinate to the rigors of the boot camp milieu and the demands of custody. This, however, varied from facility to facility. It is notable that some camps made real efforts to educate, counsel, and help those offenders with special needs. Aftercare and reentry programs were generally lacking given the little attention paid to the young offenders' need to transition to the real world and the streets.

Outcomes have not been encouraging. In general, recidivism was about the same for juvenile boot camp graduates as it was among those who went through traditional types of correctional interventions. Some studies even suggested that juvenile boot camp graduates actually committed more crimes after release. As might be expected, those programs that emphasized treatment approaches had somewhat better outcomes than those focused more on security and instilling discipline. Even when aftercare has been provided, however, results are not very positive, and in practice boot camps have turned out to be 10 times more expensive than traditional juvenile aftercare. So, although they are less expensive to operate than traditional custodial facilities, they are more expensive than most community-based alternatives.

Why Did Juvenile Boot Camps Fail?

One reason that military boot camps succeed is that everyone who participates (in the volunteer armed forces at least) is there because they want to work toward common goals. While that primary goal is arguably to serve one's country, another more significant goal for many is to raise one's status and to qualify for postmilitary preferential hiring and educational opportunities, and thus to achieve upward mobility and rise in the esteem of the community generally. Moreover, when one completes boot camp in this context, there is a dramatic ceremony replete with awards and one is no longer a "boot," but is a soldier, a sailor, or in the case of the U.S. Marines, a lance corporal. One literally can wear badges or patches signifying that upward movement.

In correctional boot camps, however, once one "graduates," with or without a ceremony, he or she is simply back on the streets, even if some aftercare is forthcoming. They are former offenders with no additional rewards or status conferred within the world of the streets. They get no preferential treatment from employers or the state. They are simply back to where they started. Many have returned to dysfunctional families and neighborhoods singularly lacking in legitimate opportunities for law-abiding youth, let alone former offenders. There is no community support for the graduates of juvenile boot camp programs. Thus, correctional boot camps suffer from a lack of sensible goal-directedness. The punitive goals of shocking the juvenile into conformity or forcibly instilling discipline simply cannot inhere in the absence of any short-term, tangible, or even eventual reward for having played the game.

Another problem results from hiring drill sergeants from the military. They are used to aggressively dealing with motivated young people and being rewarded for getting fast results. The lack of motivation and drive that they encounter when dealing with young offenders in juvenile boot camps is galling to these hardened professionals. Some are perhaps, at times, overenthusiastic in drilling, in the application of discipline and punishment, and in their general expectations insofar as this singularly unmotivated or negatively motivated audience of young people is concerned. Hiring more qualified personnel who are more oriented toward juvenile work should be a priority. Hiring criminal justice and social work professionals would demonstrate that more emphasis should be placed on education and therapy rather than on instilling discipline. Also, more selectivity should be exercised in terms of recruiting participants. It is clear that previously incarcerated juveniles and hardened offenders should not be included in such a program and that such programs should focus on less serious offenders. Furthermore, boot camps should focus on better postcompletion placement, reentry strategies, and aftercare. Some have suggested that the entire boot camp approach, with its focus on harsh discipline and unquestioning obedience to authority, simply encourages rage, defiance, and hostility.

That notwithstanding, the "get tough," "scared straight" mind-set still exerts a powerful appeal to both the public and politicians. Juvenile courts have used boot camps as a tool and parents have used them as a threat. The public as a whole believes, erroneously, that boot camps, like Scared Straight programs, work. Thus, though it is clear from years of research that these approaches do not work, boot camps (and Scared Straight programs) are still operating in some jurisdictions due to their popular and political appeal and their undeniable mediagenic qualities. In the face of the reality of program limitations and failure to produce, and due to the fact of some serious abuses by staff members, some states, such as Maryland, Georgia, and Arizona, recently closed some juvenile boot camps. Florida abandoned them altogether. But as late as 2003 there were still 3,000 inmates serving time in over 54 boot camps in the United States.

Francis Frederick Hawley
Western Carolina University

See Also: At-Risk Youth Services; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Detention Centers; Juvenile Justice System.

Further Readings

Feld, Barry and D.M. Bishop. The Oxford Handbook of Juvenile Crime and Juvenile Justice. New York: Oxford University Press, 2012.

Henggeler, Scott and Sonja Schoenwald. "Boot Camp for Juvenile Offenders: Just Say No." Journal of Child and Family Studies, v.3/3 (2007).

Howell, James. Preventing and Reducing Juvenile Delinquency: A Comprehensive Framework. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2009.

MacKenzie, Doris L., et al. Correctional Boot Camps: Military Basic Training or a Model for Corrections? Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2004.

MacKenzie, Doris L., et al. A National Study Comparing the Environments of Boot Camps With Traditional Facilities for Juvenile Offenders. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, National Institute of Justice, 2001.

Shoemaker, Donald. Juvenile Delinquency. New York: Rowman and Littlefield, 2013.

U.S. Department of Justice, National Institute of Justice. "Correctional Boot Camps: Lessons From a Decade of Research" (2003). https://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/197018.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Border Communities

The United States-Mexico border communities are defined as the area of land 100 kilometers north and south of the border and stretching approximately 2,000 miles east and west from the southern tip of Texas to California. The United States-Mexico border region is one of the most active regions in the world in regard to migratory movements, creating a cultural space defined by hybridity of culture, identity, and language. However, border communities face significant social and economic problems such as poverty, poor access to health care and education, and violence. It is critical that human service professionals understand the challenges faced by border communities, the development of border theory, and practices that can help alleviate social problems in border communities.

Geography and Demographics

The border region comprises 14 sister cities in four U.S. states and six Mexican states. Two-thirds of the border region lies in Texas. The population for the border region is estimated to be approximately 13 million and is expected to double by 2025. In fact, two of the fastest-growing metropolitan areas in the United States are Laredo and McAllen, two cities located on the Texas-Mexico border. In general, educational attainment is lower in the U.S. border region when compared to the rest of the United States. With the exception of San Diego, 25-year-olds in the border counties average two to three fewer years of school than their counterparts in the United States as a whole. The border region contains three of the 10 poorest counties in the United States and 21 counties designated as economically distressed.

On the Mexican side of the border, due to rapid industrialization the communities have less access to water and sanitation services than the rest of the nation. On the U.S. side of the border region, colonias (rural unincorporated settlements) are reflective of Third World communities. Although the majority of residents are U.S. citizens, they lack basic educational and employment opportunities and have limited infrastructure, leading to diseases that are controlled in most parts of the world. When U.S. border communities are considered as one geographic area, they provide the least health care access, report the lowest per capita income, and have the highest number of uninsured children and children living in poverty than any U.S. state. Along with health needs and poverty, the border region also suffers from violence and pollution.

Colonias are settlements on unincorporated land. Land plots in the colonias are typically sold through a contract-for-deed system, which means that a developer sells the land for a low down payment, but the buyer has no title until the last payment is made. Approximately 1,800 colonias can be found in the U.S. border region. Colonias are characterized by isolation, and lack of sanitary water, paved roads, and other necessary public services. The average yearly income of $14,000 for families living in the colonias is well under the poverty line and unemployment ranges from 40 to 50 percent. Residents of these areas must travel long distances to reach churches and other education or health services. They may have to drive up to 30 miles in order to find drinkable water, plaguing the colonias with problems such as outbreaks of dysentery and hepatitis A.

Violence in Border Communities

There have been elevated rates of violence on the Mexican side of the border due to drug trafficking. Women in particular have been victims of sexual exploitation, kidnappings, and murder, while the perpetrators of these crimes act with impunity. For example, the femicides in Cuidad Júarez have received international attention from human rights activists demanding justice for the women and their families. Despite these dire circumstances, there are many human rights activists on the Mexican side of the border calling attention to these crimes and demanding accountability. In addition, many of these activists have developed organizations intended to meet the needs of children and youth orphaned as a result of this violence.

The U.S. government claims that violent crime related to drug trafficking has not "spilled over" to the U.S. side of the border. However, it has been difficult to determine actual statistics regarding "spillover" violence due to the lack of a formal definition of this violence and the potential for geographic dispersal beyond the border region. Nevertheless, current data suggests that there is no significant difference in violent crime in U.S. border communities compared to previous years.

Border Theory

Despite the social problems, the border region has contributed to the rich body of work known as border theory. Culturally, border communities are known as spaces of hybrid cultures and areas of separation and contact. These borderland spaces have become metaphors for Mexican identity in the United States. Border theory spans almost every discipline including psychology, education, geography, social work, and sociology. For Mexican Americans, the borderlands signify daily challenges of constructing an identity in the face of racism, discrimination, and an anti-immigrant sentiment as well as the intersection of various identities such as gender, race, and sexuality. Thus, those that learn to exist within this borderlands identity are skilled at negotiation and at moving among social and cultural groups.

Solutions

Much of the work related to health issues along the border is focused on prevention methods. For example, promotoras, or community health workers, help address lack of access to health care services by emphasizing health literacy. However, without increases and sustained governmental and private funding for health programs, infrastructure, and education, progress in these areas will be limited. Human service professionals can play a critical role in documenting social problems in these areas, collaborating with public health workers, and assisting residents in accessing services. Finally, human service professionals must understand the strength of a border identity and what this means to individuals of Mexican origin psychologically and metaphorically.

Leticia Villarreal Sosa
Dominican University

See Also: Biculturalism; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Global South/Global North; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Disparities, Role of; Mexican Americans; Poverty.

Further Readings

Anzaldúa, Gloria. Borderlands/La Frontera: The New Mestiza. San Francisco: Spinsters/Aunt Lute, 1987.
Spence, Richard, Lynn Wallisch, and Shanna Smith. "Treatment Seeking in Populations in Urban and Rural Settings on the Border." Alcoholism: Clinical and Experimental Research, v.31/6 (2007).
United States-Mexico Border Health Commission. "Health Disparities and the U.S.-México Border: Challenges and Opportunities." http://www.borderhealth.org/files/res_1719.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

Bullying

Although bullying has likely occurred throughout human history, it was only in the latter part of the 20th century that data was collected on the scope and extent of the problem. These data show that bullying is widespread, both inside and outside school settings. Bullying is damaging not only to victims but also to the school atmosphere. Legislation, policies, and prevention programs have been enacted to help eliminate bullying.

Definition and Scope

According to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' Web site, Stopbullying.gov, "Bullying is unwanted, aggressive behavior among school aged children that involves a real or perceived power imbalance. The behavior is repeated, or has the potential to be repeated, over time."

Bullying takes many forms. Stopbullying.gov delineates three types of bullying: verbal, social, and physical. Verbal bullying refers to saying or writing mean things and includes behaviors like name-calling, taunting, inappropriate sexual comments, teasing, and threatening. Social bullying, also called relational bullying, is hurting someone's reputation or their relationships. This might include purposely leaving someone out, spreading rumors, telling others not to be friends with someone, and publicly embarrassing someone. Physical bullying is hurting someone's body or their things. This includes hitting, pinching, kicking, spitting, tripping, pushing, taking and/or breaking someone's things, and making mean gestures.

Bullies may target anyone. They often target those they see as marginalized or vulnerable; thus, data shows that young people who are or are perceived to be lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgendered

According to the 2011 Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System, 20 percent of students in grades 9 through 12 had been bullied. Bullies often target those they see as marginalized or vulnerable. Most research shows that bullies have often been bullied as well, meaning the lines between bully and victim are more fluid than many think.

(LGBT) are more frequently targeted. The Gay Lesbian & Straight Education Network (GLSEN) conducts a biennial National School Climate Survey in which they measure how frequently bullying of LGBT students occurs and the responses to it. The 2011 survey includes responses from 8,584 students between the ages of 13 and 20; students were from all 50 states and the District of Columbia and from 3,224 unique school districts. Results indicated that eight out of 10 LGBT students (81.9 percent) experienced harassment at school in the past year because of their sexual orientation, three-fifths (63.5 percent) felt unsafe at school because of their sexual orientation, and nearly a third (29.8 percent) skipped a day of school in the past month because of safety concerns.

Importantly, both boys and girls can be bullies, although the methods used and the types of behaviors exhibited may vary. Studies show girls are more likely to target other girls because of their looks and are more prone to use verbal, emotional, and social forms of bullying. Girl-on-girl bullying, as exemplified in popular films like Mean Girls, has also been called relational aggression. Youth with disabilities may also be at risk for experiencing bullying. A 2012 study found that 46.3 percent of teenagers with autism spectrum disorders had been bullied. Further, bullying of students because of their racial or ethnic background is common. Additionally, some maintain that abusive dating relationships, or dating violence, is simply another form of bullying.

It is important to recognize that it is not just students who can be bullies or bullied. Teachers, too, can be both bullies and victims of bullying. It is difficult to know precisely how often this occurs because there are no specific tools devoted to measuring it. Youth who are bullied by teachers are often hesitant to report it because they are embarrassed, fearful that the teacher will give them poor grades or fail them, or do not think anyone will believe them. Finally, most research shows that bullies have often been bullied as well. That is, the lines between bully and victim are more fluid than many think.

According to the 2011 Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System coordinated by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), 20 percent of students in the ninth through 12th grades reported being bullied. Bullying is also common among the college-aged population, where it may occur between two students, between a student and a teacher, or between two teachers. One study found more than 60 percent of college students reported witnessing a peer being bullied by another student, and more than 45 percent reported witnessing a student being bullied by a teacher. In another study, almost 25 percent of respondents reported having been bullied by another student, and 19 percent reported having been bullied by a teacher.

Cyberbullying

Today, many bullies utilize technologies in what is called cyberbullying. Stopbullying.gov defines cyberbulling as "bullying that takes place using electronic technology. Electronic technology includes devices and equipment such as cell phones, computers, and tablets as well as communication tools including social media sites, text messages, chat, and Web sites." Cyberbullying differs from traditional bullying in that it can happen 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Someone can be cyberbullied even when he or she is at home alone. Some technologies allow perpetrators to remain anonymous, making it difficult for authorities to identify the bully if the behavior is reported. The 2011 Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System found 16 percent of ninth through 12th grade students had been cyberbullied.

Signs of a Potential Bully

Stopbullying.gov has identified warning signs of a potential bully. Youth who are involved in many verbal or physical fights, hang around with friends who are bullies, are frequently in trouble at school, blame others for their problems, are excessively competitive, and are hyperworried about their reputation are most likely to bully others.

Warning signs of bullying include, but are not limited to, frequent headaches and stomach aches; changes in eating habits and/or rapid weight loss or gain; unexplained injuries; lost or destroyed property, such as clothing and books; difficulty sleeping or nightmares; developmental delays or regressions; sudden loss of friends or avoidance of social situations; decreased self-esteem; and self-destructive behaviors, such as talking about suicide, self-mutilation, sexual promiscuity, and running away. Victims are more likely to skip school and thus may have lower grades. Several studies have found bullying to be predictive of later involvement in abusive dating and/or domestic relationships. Both bullies and victims are more likely than other students to carry weapons to school, increasing the likelihood of criminal activity on school grounds. After the Columbine massacre in 1999, the U.S. Secret Service reviewed 37 school shootings and found bullying had been a factor in two-thirds of them.

Research has shown that only one-third of youth bullying victims tell an adult. There are many reasons why young people do not talk about the bullying, including fear of retaliation; feelings of humiliation, shame, and hopelessness; concern that they will not be believed; and fear of rejection from friends.

Antibullying Legislation and School Policies

Legislation can help address school bullying. Bullypolice.org offers ratings of states based on their bullying legislation. As of April 2014, all states except Montana had some type of legislation prohibiting bullying. In December 2010, the U.S. Department of Education reviewed state bullying laws and identified 11 key components. State laws should: (1) include a purpose statement that outlines the effects of bullying and declares it to be unacceptable; (2) contain a statement of scope, which delineates where the policy is applicable; (3) specify the prohibited activity; (4) enumerate specific stakeholders; (5) direct every local educational agency (LEA) to develop and implement a policy prohibiting bullying; (6) instruct LEAs to include specific components in their antibullying policies, such as a definition of bullying consistent with state law, reporting mechanisms, sanctions for violating the policy, referral processes, and procedures for investigating, responding, and maintaining written records; (7) include a provision for review of local policies, allowing the state to ensure that such policies are consistent with state law; (8) develop a communication plan for notifying students, their families, and staff; (9) include a provision requiring school districts to offer training for school staff responding to bullying; (10) require LEAs to regularly provide data about incidents of bullying to the state and to make this data available to the public; and (11) include a statement that victims have the right to other legal recourse.

In addition to having clear policies and procedures, schools can help prevent bullying by implementing prevention programs. Many prevention programs utilize a bystander prevention approach. This approach recognizes that in any bullying situation, there is likely to be three key players: the bully, the victim, and bystanders, or others who witness the incident. Bystanders can be passive or active. Passive bystanders are those who do not say or do anything to encourage or discourage the bullying. Active bystanders can be either hurtful or helpful. Many times, active bystanders egg on the bullies. Bystander prevention programs aim to empower bystanders to actively disrupt the bullying.

One of the most widely utilized bullying prevention programs is the Olweus Bullying Prevention Program (OBPP). OBPP is designed for elementary through high school youth. It has been evaluated many times and has been found to reduce bullying, improve the classroom climate, and reduce related antisocial behaviors, such as vandalism and truancy. It has received endorsements from the U.S. Department of Education and the American Academy of Pediatrics.

Laura Finley
Barry University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; At-Risk Youth Services; Childhood Trauma; Peer Pressure.

Further Readings

Bazelon, Emily. Sticks and Stones: Defeating the Culture of Bullying and Rediscovering the Power of Character and Empathy. New York: Random House, 2013.

Coloroso, Barbara. The Bully, the Bullied and the Bystander: From Pre-School to High School—How Parents Can Help Break the Cycle. New York: William Morrow, 2009.

Dellasega, Cheryl. Girl Wars: 12 Strategies that Will End Female Bullying. New York: Touchstone, 2003.

Koskiw, Joseph, Emily Greytak, Mark Bartkiewicz, Madelyn Boesen, and Neal Palmer. "The 2011 National School Climate Survey." Gay Lesbian & Straight Education Network. http://www.glsen.org/learn/research/national-school-climate-survey (Accessed November 2013).

Olweus Bullying Prevention Program (2012). http://www.clemson.edu/olweus (Accessed November 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "Stopbullying.gov." http://www.stopbullying.gov (Accessed November 2013).

Business Incubator

A business incubator accelerates and systematizes the process of creating successful entrepreneurial companies through a range of comprehensive support, developed and coordinated by incubator management. This support typically includes access to finance, exposure to business and technical support services, shared office services, flexible leases, and expandable space.

Incubation is different than other forms of business support in that it provides an integrated, tailored, hands-on business support environment under one roof (often called a “one-stop-shop”) for entrepreneurs. The high-level business development resources are provided by both an on-site incubation team and an off-site network of contacts. Incubation is a resource-intensive activity; therefore, most incubators are selective. Some, for instance, expect entrepreneurs to have a fully developed business plan, whereas others require a less developed idea and provide assistance with business plan development. Others may target only women entrepreneurs or people of color. The purpose of incubation is not to provide support indefinitely; start-ups typically complete the process and “graduate” within three years.

An incubator’s foremost goal is to produce successful ventures, that is, start-ups that are financially viable and able to operate independently after graduating. By offering their clients services on a one-stop-shop basis and allowing overhead to be reduced by sharing costs, incubators notably improve the survival and growth prospects of their start-ups. Moreover, incubators are viewed as a means of meeting a range of socioeconomic policy needs, which may include: (1) creating employment and wealth for local communities; (2) transferring technology between client start-ups and their host incubators; (3) promoting innovation; (4) enhancing links between universities, research institutions, and the business community; and (5) encouraging women or minority entrepreneurship.

Incubators’ Origin, Growth, and Types

Business incubators formally developed in the United States in the 1960s and later expanded in Europe through a range of related models, such as innovation centers, technopoles, or science parks. At present the United States has the largest number of incubator programs in the world. The growth of U.S. incubation has been rapid, from only 12 business incubators in 1980s to over 1,250 incubators in October 2012. In addition, there are currently thought to be around 900 incubators in Europe. The estimated number worldwide is 7,000, with very few focused on minority-group entrepreneurs.

Incubators vary in the way they deliver support in their different start-up environments, methods of operation, and sponsorship. Traditional business incubators pursue economic development as their primary goal, promoting entrepreneurship, innovation, job creation, and growth. Most of these incubators are run by national or local authorities. They often provide general services, while specialized incubators are established by universities or private-sector organizations.

Since the late 1990s there has been an accelerated growth in for-profit incubators, especially those fostering the formation and growth of information and communication technology (ICT) start-ups. The growth of these so-called new economy incubators is reflected in the strong increase in information technology-related incubator clients. Sponsors of these for-profit incubators are typically consultancies and technology solution providers able to offer a complete array of technological, advisory, and other business support services. These new economy incubators differ significantly from their traditional counterparts in respect to the goals pursued. They focus primarily on high-tech and Internet-related activities, and unlike traditional incubators do not have employment creation or the promotion of minority-group entrepreneurship as their principal objectives.

Based on the principle that innovation will come from diversity, and with the objective of targeting social issues, a few incubators provide support and resources specifically to minority-group entrepreneurs. Women and people of color often face higher barriers of entry to incubators. While some argue that these barriers originate in the education system, the scarce research available indicates other factors that impede creation of women- and minority-focused incubators, such as the perception that entrepreneurship is a male domain and the lack of information, self-confidence, mentors, role models, and finances.

Impact and Effectiveness of Business Incubators

The literature analyzing the impact and effectiveness of incubators is divided into two approaches. A normative approach examines the best practices of incubators, with the aim of making recommendations for improved incubation processes, including the quality of management and the services provided to incubate start-ups, among other goals. With respect to minority groups, best practices would include targeting minority-group university graduates, using the craft-skills tradition to create business opportunities for women, and mentoring by women and people of color, among others. These studies are controversial because they assume a priori that incubators improve the performance of incubated companies. Moreover, they tend to be heavily influenced by (1) their objectives, particularly when they aim to justify public funding for incubator; and (2) their methodology, because they often ignore the influence of external factors on the performance of incubated firms and the restricted empirical base.

By contrast, the positivist research approach analyzes the value added by incubators. In other words, is there conclusive evidence that growth in the small-business sector or amelioration of social issues would not have occurred without incubators? Such measurement has largely been made by reference to the number of start-ups using incubators, including minority-group incubators, without examining whether these new business ventures would have existed, survived, or grown without incubation.

Another issue given extensive attention in the research is how a business incubator´s performance should be judged, particularly regarding its wider socioeconomic impact. Research suggests that apart from financial indicators and the routine assessment of service delivery against quality standards, most incubators (and research papers) do not go beyond the use of indicators such as start-up success-failure rates. Fewer studies contain an assessment of incubated companies' growth rates or the wider socioeconomic impact, apart from calculating the number of employees in incubated start-ups or the number of women entrepreneurs using incubators. Only recently has research focused on the views of incubated entrepreneurs themselves about the value added by being located in an incubator. Furthermore, the postincubation period is much neglected with little evidence in most studies that a client´s performance after graduation has been analyzed.

Sylvia Rohlfer
Colegio Universitario de Estudios Financieros

See Also: Employment/Career Assistance Services; Microlending Programs; Social Capital, Role of; Social Innovation.

Further Readings

Arlotto, Jacques, Jean-Michel Sahut, and Frederic Teulon. "What is the Performance of Incubators? The Point of View of Coached Entrepreneurs." International Journal of Business, v.16/4 (2011).

Barrow, Colin. Incubators: A Realist's Guide to the World's New Business Accelerators. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 2001.

National Business Incubation Association. "Incubation FAQ." http://www.nbia.org/resource_library/faq/index.php (Accessed June 2013).

C

Caribbean Immigrants

Caribbean peoples' migration to the United States has been ongoing since the 1800s. Presently, over 3.5 million Caribbean immigrants live in the United States. They are a major immigrant group in Florida, New Jersey, and New York. These states contain over 70 percent of the Caribbean immigrant population in the United States. The human services needs of Caribbean immigrants include legal support to adjust their immigration status as necessary and to avoid exploitation, abuse, and criminal victimization in employment, and efforts to access human services. They also encompass social and psychological support to adjust to a new country and, eventually, political empowerment to advocate for the heterogeneous ethnicities that comprise Caribbean immigrants. Immigrants also need access to medical care, education, and transportation to promptly and constructively assimilate into society.

The Caribbean includes a number of countries, each with its own cultures and subcultures. Languages include English, Spanish, French, Dutch, and dialects; therefore, English language instruction in the United States is a human services need for many Caribbean immigrants. The main source countries of immigrants are Cuba, Dominican Republic, Jamaica, Haiti, and Trinidad and Tobago, respectively. Many relocate to raise their economic status through employment and or education, and others move for family reunification.

Moving to a new country often means a change in social standing, friends, and other familiarities. Services that facilitate the adjustment of immigrants into legitimate networks of opportunity are to the benefit of the newly constituted community. When such opportunities are not apparent, as is more likely the case for immigrants who do not speak the language of their new country or who might lack desired skills or education necessary for a legitimate existence in a marginalized state, illicit niches of opportunity can become more appealing to some. In 2009, researchers Mamdi Corra and Sitawa Kimuna found that English-speaking Caribbean immigrants generally do better economically than their non-English-speaking counterparts.

Often families immigrate in part; thus, family reconciliation in the new country is a priority. Census numbers indicate that approximately 54 percent of Caribbean immigrants to the United States have been women. For a parent in the United States, assistance with child care in the absence of the other parent and extended family is often a great need. Indeed, it is not uncommon for Caribbean immigrants to send unruly children back to the Caribbean for more traditional socialization. Small matters necessary to exist, such as having a Social Security card to secure employment and being able to open a bank account, are challenging if the immigrant is undocumented. For persons from the Caribbean who are more likely to enter the United States by air than by land or sea (such as immigrants from Central America), their U.S. presence is more likely to be the result of an overstay on a temporary visa.

There can be a mental health toll to navigating two cultures—the old and the new—and, for many, coming to terms with becoming a "minority" in the United States. In 2007 David Williams and colleagues analyzed data from the National Study of American Life, which included 1,621 Caribbean blacks. They found that first-generation Caribbean blacks had fewer mental health problems than their second- and third-generation counterparts. This was attributed in part to accepting the impact of stresses associated with being black in the United States. The suggestion is that with time and generations, the impact of the foreign culture fades.

Deportation may intensify the need for human services. It is problematic in two major ways: (1) when it involves persons who no longer have familial ties in their country of origin, so the act is like banishment to a strange land, devoid of support; and (2) when a deportation action separates a family in the United States, thus punishing not only the person who is deported but also his/her kin. Deportation became more of a concern for some Caribbean immigrants with the passage of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996. The law facilitates deportation for crimes of moral turpitude (for example, spousal abuse, animal fighting, theft, and fraud) and restricts social services benefits. In so doing, the law increased the need for legal services for many Caribbean immigrants, forcing several with permanent-resident status to reluctantly pursue U.S. citizenship in order to protect themselves against deportation.

Caribbean immigrants to the United States are not usually the poorest or least educated, as legal access to the United States normally requires some demonstration of means of support. Some Caribbean immigrants are eligible for Temporary Protected Status (TPS). After the 2010 earthquake in Haiti, over 40,000 Haitians in the United States were eligible for human services given their application for TPS. TPS allows persons to stay in the United States if temporary conditions in their home nation (due to natural disasters, war, etc.) prohibit their safe return. These circumstances present special human services needs in adjusting, locating housing, obtaining basic supplies, and assistance in building lives after what are often devastating circumstances.

Camille Gibson
Prairie View A&M University

See Also: Children, Youth, and Human Trafficking; DiversityRx; Dominican Americans; Ethnicity and Clients; ICE Detention Centers, Services in; Migrant Workers; National Center for Cultural Competence.

Further Readings

Mahoney, Annette M. The Health and Well-Being of Caribbean Immigrants in the United States. New York: Routledge, 2012.

Matthews, Lear. English-Speaking Caribbean Immigrants: Transnational Identities. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2013.

McCabe, Kristen. Caribbean Immigrants in the United States. Washington, DC: Migration Policy Institute, 2011.

Williams, David R., Rahwa Haile, Hector M. Gonzalez, Harold Neighbors, Raymond Baser, and James S. Jackson. "The Mental Health of Black Caribbean Immigrants: Results From the National Survey of American Life." American Journal of Public Health, v.97 (2007).

Case Management

The provision of case management in mental health care has long been regarded as the preferred mode of service delivery. However, in recent years it has also expanded into other arenas, thereby demonstrating its clinical value and transferability. At its foundation, case management refers to the coordination of community services by a single professional who is responsible for assessing a client's needs, developing and implementing appropriate care plans based on this assessment, and then evaluating the care plan through ongoing follow-up. In some cases, case managers will also be responsible for transitioning clients to other services when they move or no longer meet program or diagnostic criteria. This approach originated in the United States and evolved following the deinstitutionalization of psychiatric patients in the 1950s and 1960s. In this mental health care context, case management is usually implemented for individuals with serious and persistent mental illnesses who require ongoing support with illness management, employment, socialization, and maintaining community tenure.

In the United States, the term case management is also applied in the primary care realm as a component of managed care, and it has also been adapted for use in the care of the elderly, in acute health care settings, correctional services, child welfare, social housing, and employment support programs. In all cases, the goal is to develop a comprehensive psychosocial assessment in collaboration with service recipients, who will then access community resources on an ongoing basis to meet their needs. The case manager, also known as a service coordinator, will complete referrals to these programs.

Because community resources can almost universally operate at a lower cost than institutionalized care, case management is a cost-effective paradigm since a single professional, ideally knowledgeable about community resources, serves as the primary contact for the client. This reduces the prospect of duplicating service, which would occur if each program served as its own entry point for the client. This unique structure is particularly valuable for clients with complex needs as their service coordinators can develop an intricate knowledge of their strengths, deficits, and required needs for successful community-based illness management. Additionally, this coordinated care has become more important in recent years as clients' needs have become more complex. Among other factors, this increasing complexity occurs because of an aging population, poverty and legislative restrictions, insufficient community resources, often overlapping mental health and health care needs and, ironically, the involvement of multiple agencies itself.

Case management is both a professional and organizational endeavor. While any number of regulated professionals can serve as case managers, including, for example, nurses, social workers, and occupational therapists, effective service delivery also requires a commitment by their employing organizations to provide resources that promote case management activity. This includes investing in programs and staff and monitoring quality through ongoing program evaluation. In British Columbia, Canada, an integrated case management framework has even been adopted by government ministries to promote seamless, integrated service delivery and information-sharing since clients typically receive multiple government benefits at once. According to the National Case Management Network of Canada, there are five guiding principles of case management: (1) it supports client rights, (2) it is purposeful, (3) it is collaborative, (4) it supports accountability, and (5) it strives for cultural competency.

Regardless of the sector in which case management services are provided, core components include assessment, care planning, service implementation, and evaluation. Case management is a collaborative approach that should solicit client input as much as possible. Community service providers are encouraged to be flexible and accommodating and recognize that clients are often involved with multiple providers and addressing complex needs. As a component of best practice, agencies are encouraged to invest in case management programs and the employees who are performing case management activities.

From a diversity perspective, culturally sensitive case managers participate in an ongoing process of increasing self-awareness to ensure that service recipients are treated with genuine concern, respect, and appreciation for their unique identities. Although diversity is often thought of in terms of racial differences, it is equally important to recognize social and economic differences, the influence of gender and class, and sexual orientation. Case managers are encouraged to learn principles of cross-cultural communication, strengths-based assessment, and divergent perspectives about illness, disability, or dysfunction. Practitioners are required to work collaboratively to ensure that these perceptions, which often vary by culture and may clash with the clinician's own understanding, are not a barrier or impediment to proper treatment.

Derek Chechak
Memorial University of Newfoundland

See Also: Case Management Services; Mental Health Services, Adult; Partial Care Services for Adults, Mental Health.

Further Readings

Kanenberg, R. L. Case Management Handbook for Clinicians. Eau Claire, WI: PESI Health Care, 2003.

Manoleas, P., ed. The Cross-Cultural Practice of Clinical Case Management in Mental Health. New York: Routledge, 2000.

National Case Management Network of Canada. Canadian Standards of Practice for Case Management. Toronto: National Case Management Network of Canada, 2009.

Powell, S. K. and H. A. Tahan. CMSA Core Curriculum for Case Management, 2nd ed. Baltimore: Lippincott Williams & Wilkins, 2008.

Case Management Services

"Case management services" refers to the range of assistance provided to a person, making sure that he/she has access to quality services and support systems in the areas of social, health care, education, and economic skills for gainful employment. The Case Management Society of America in its 2009 definition states, "Case management is a collaborative process of assessment, planning, facilitation, care coordination, evaluation, and advocacy for options and services to meet an individual's and family's comprehensive health needs through communication and available resources to promote quality cost-effective outcomes." The focus of case management is to ensure "personalized" attention and support to an individual, leading to achievement of the intended purpose.

A wide range of contexts and issues may require such services, ranging from general to specialized care. Case management in the context of human services could be, for example (1) ensuring an autistic child is provided with the necessary educational, medical, and social support; (2) providing a patient admitted to a hospital with an ailment with the specific treatments needed for recovery; or (3) training an unemployed youth in the skills desired and necessary to ensure he/she has a better chance in the job market. Case management services is the process of service to the individual rather than a particular component of a specific service. This article explores the various characteristics of effective case management services and describes the generic process involved in case management and the group of people who are central to case management—the caseworkers.

Core Criteria for Successful Case Management

Goal oriented. A case management service must be focused on the overall goal it aims to achieve for the person, in due course of time and/or after the due processes and intended activities to support are completed. While it is possible that the intended goal may change in the process and duration of the case (depending on the individual's responses, which may vary from person to person), it is still worthwhile to set a clear and realistic goal at the beginning, which will determine the nature and extent of services the person will receive.

Beneficiary as the central focus. The interest and benefit of the individual beneficiary (and his/her family, if relevant) need to be the core purpose around which the entire case management process and procedures should be designed. There is also a critical need for understanding the diverse needs and preferences of different population groups within the community based on their background and origin (e.g., gender, age group, race, culture, religion, sexual preferences, occupation categories, socioeconomic standards, geographic origins, urban or rural, etc.). Unless understood at the outset, these could become potential barriers in effective delivery of services. The case management service must be able to adapt to these different needs of the diverse populations it intends to serve.

Accountable. The case management system and the individuals operating it must remain accountable to the beneficiary. This is essential in order to achieve quality. Accountability could be enforced and measured both internally within the agency providing case management service through setting clear performance objectives and benchmarks for individuals and groups and review of the same at periodical intervals. Beneficiary satisfaction surveys or discussions are another effective way to elicit information from the clients about the services they received and feedback. Done on a periodic basis, these surveys and/or discussions serve as a transparency and accountability measure for the case service provider. Care has also to be taken to seek feedback from diverse population groups so that the case provider can know whether their services are meeting the specific needs of these groups.

Comprehensive: Each case management system needs to be as comprehensive as possible, ensuring that the individual benefits from the synergy of different services. This also avoids the situation where services from different units within the system work at a cross-purpose with each other. At the same time, the system needs to be well understood and simplified, for both the recipient and the provider, to ensure that it can be implemented as intended.

Integrated. Case management needs to be integrated within the overall operating system of the service provider and not be a stand-alone system.

Coordinated. Case management also makes sure that multiple services and providers are coordinated within themselves, usually by a caseworker (who also identifies the need for these services and providers in the first place).

Standardized and evidence based. As much as possible, case management services need to be standardized based on evidence that has been created over time. This helps avoid unnecessary delays and gives the individual the opportunity to be taken through a system that has worked for most other individuals. Improvisations as necessary can be introduced depending on the need of the specific individual.

Flexible to the need of the client. Taken from the point above regarding need for standardization of the processes and practices, care has to be taken to make sure that the specific needs of the individual are considered and changes effected based on these. Such changes, if carefully documented and monitored over a period of time, can lead to making this part of the standardized practice for individuals who closely resemble each other on a range of attributes (e.g., age, sex, marital status, occupation, race, income group, education qualification, past disease history, lifestyle, etc). This helps develop understanding of diverse groups, avoid a tendency to develop services with a "one size fits all" mind-set, and establish service protocols and standards that the beneficiaries will value and participate in effectively. Challenging and avoiding responses based on stereotypes (for different groups) is vital.

Cost-effective. One of the key attributes for an effective case management system is cost-effectiveness, both for the individual seeking support (by providing comprehensive support services) and for the institution providing the service (by ensuring that the case managers follow set guidelines and procedures that are optimized, avoiding waste).

Sustained. Services need to be sustained over a period of time until the overall goal set at the beginning (and reviewed midcourse if need be) is achieved. Also, a successful case management system needs to have the capability to be repeated again and again by the institution providing service and by the caseworkers.

Other crucial elements of quality case management services include (1) privacy and confidentiality of the individual's personal information, limiting access only to those on a strict "need to know" basis; (2) use of best professional skills in identifying the needs of the individual and using a multidisciplinary approach involving various experts; (3) building a culture of learning wherein the various steps and processes used for an individual are reviewed and lessons analyzed to inform improvements for the future; (4) termination of case management as necessary to avoid dependency; and (5) being in line with the legal and regulatory frameworks so as not to jeopardize the interests of the client or the organization providing support.

Central to an effective case management system are the caseworkers. The caseworkers have the central role to manage the "case files" of individuals and play the coordination role in a case management system. Some of the essential skills caseworkers need are the ability to conduct quality interviews to elicit information in a diligent way, effective communication, analytical thinking, the ability to build collaboration with different teams, and clear understanding of the standardized processes and systems.

The caseworkers also need to be aware of the diversities (and stereotypes associated with specific groups) that exist within the community and develop skills to communicate and interact with these populations at ease, irrespective of their own personal beliefs and value systems. Cross-cultural competence of the social workers is a key requirement and is included in most of the academic training programs, and that is furthered with experience working with the community. Some of the behavior competencies for the caseworkers include empathy, nonjudgmental attitude, friendly and nonthreatening manner, and ability to instill confidence in the person who is seeking assistance.

The caseworkers need to undergo periodic training in order to remain up to date on the various aspects of the support and service system and processes involved in the case management process. Given the sensitive nature of some of the services provided, some of the caseworkers may need additional counseling support to remain professional and in order to take care of their own well-being (e.g., caseworkers working with survivors of gender-based violence such as rape and domestic abuse are subjected to harrowing accounts from the survivors and these may be difficult for them to cope with in the long run).

Setting up a case management system varies among organizations, depending on the focus. The following are some of the generic steps and good practices involved:

1. Understanding the background of the potential “client base” and their particular support needs is crucial in setting up a case management system. This can be based on a review of research on the issue, information collected at the community level through social workers, as well as by building up a strong information and knowledge base of the individuals who are supported. Careful client review needs to also establish the inherent diversity that may be present within the community.
2. Preparing a comprehensive policy and standard operating procedures (SOP) manual is important to ensure that individuals receive standardized services and to enable the caseworkers and others to all read from the same script. Changes to the manual and procedures need to be constantly and adequately communicated to the staff through orientation, training, and refresher courses.
3. Involving caseworkers and other staff in review and feedback is essential to ensure that ineffective practices are removed as the case management system goes through improvements. This also ensures that staff members remain involved with the process, feel motivated, and willingly implement all the agreed-upon standard procedures.

Prafulla K. Mishra
Norwegian Refugee Council

See Also: Case Management; Partial Care Services for Adults, Mental Health; Targeted Case Management.

Further Readings

Case Management Society of America (CMSA). “Standards of Practice for Case Management” (2010). http://www.cmsa.org/portals/0/pdf/memberonly/StandardsOfPractice.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Center for Health Training. “Fundamental Skills for Case Managers: A Self-Study Guide” (2003). http://www.cdph.ca.gov/HealthInfo/healthyliving/childfamily/Documents/MO-AFLP-FundamentalSkillsManual.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Griggs, Carolyn, et al. “Required Skills and Values for Effective Case Management.” http://www.adph.org/professional_services/assets/component2.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

U. S. Administration on Aging. “A Toolkit for Serving Diverse Communities.” http://www.aoa.gov/AoA_programs/Tools_Resources/DOCS/AoA_DiversityToolkit_Full.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Wanless, Scott. “The 7 Key Components for an Effective Case Management Methodology” (2010). http://www.emrremedies.com/images/whitepaper-7key.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Center for Native American Youth

The Center for Native American Youth (CNAY), a nonprofit policy program at the Aspen Institute, was founded by former U.S. senator Byron Dorgan in 2011 and is headquartered in Washington, D.C. The mission of CNAY is to promote the well-being of Native American youth through both policy development and communication in order to ensure that Native American communities have access to education, housing, health care, and law enforcement services. Additionally, CNAY identifies tribes in need of funding and helps secure resources from the federal government and private sector, as many services to these communities are frequently underfunded. Most important, CNAY seeks to address the unique challenges faced by Native American youth, such as high rates of suicide, violence, gang activity, and alcohol and drug abuse.

Social and Historical Context

The U.S. government currently recognizes 566 tribes. These tribes are acknowledged as sovereign nations and act as self-governed communities. Historically, the federal government established treaties promising equal protection of Native American citizens' rights in exchange for the land that many tribal communities were forced to relinquish. Despite these agreements, the living conditions of many Native Americans are below the national standard.

Furthermore, a large economic disparity exists between American Indians/Alaskan Natives (AI/AN) and the general population. Although programs currently exist to assist AI/AN, many are unable to provide adequate aid. The Indian Health Service, for example, was established as a federally funded health care program for AI/AN communities. The monetary appropriations set aside for this program, however, only meet about 52 percent of health care needs. This is problematic as tribal communities have the highest rates of Type II diabetes, higher-than-average rates of obesity among infants, and five times the cases of tuberculosis than that of the general population.

Historical trauma resulting from loss of native lands along with underfunded programs has resulted in many unaddressed issues among Native American communities, inspiring Dorgan to donate $1 million in unused campaign money to found CNAY. CNAY's current goals for policy development and implementation are to address these issues as well as those that affect Native American youth, the most at-risk population in this community.

Challenges Faced by Native American Youth

The center identifies AI/AN between the ages of 15 to 24 as the most at-risk population. Native American youth—those under the age of 18— compose about 28.3 percent of the Native American population. According to the 2010 Census, approximately 32.4 percent of this subpopulation lives in poverty. Various forms of violence, including suicide, homicide, and intentional injuries, account for 75 percent of deaths among Native American

On Wednesday, April 2, 2011, Secretary Tom Vilsack met with 30 Native American youth students from eastern and western tribes, southeast Alaska, and Tuba City, Arizona, at the Roots of American Agriculture garden. The purpose of the day, as is this mission of the Center for Native American Youth, was to encourage young people to pursue healthy lifestyles.

youth ages 12 to 21. Additionally, Native American communities have high rates of alcohol and drug problems. Specifically, alcohol mortality rates among the Native American community are 514 percent higher than that of the general population, and approximately 22.9 percent of AI/AN over the age of 12 report the use of alcohol. Sixteen percent of Native American youth report substance dependence or abuse as well as the highest rates of methamphetamine use in the country.

In addition to high rates of violence and substance use, Native American youth face many barriers with regard to education. Approximately 50 percent of Native American students graduate from high school compared to 76.2 percent of white Americans. The center works directly with schools and students to gather information regarding the conditions of schools in Native American communities. CNAY works to ensure that schools are up to national standards, encourages academic success, and provides opportunities for youth such as internships, scholarships, and dialogues in which they can openly voice their concerns.

One of the primary objectives of CNAY is to reduce the high rate of suicide, as it is the second-leading cause of death among Native American youth. Native American teens have the highest rate of suicide compared with any other group in the United States. CNAY provides mental health resources and referrals to Native American youth who may be experiencing suicidal ideation or have lost friends or family members to suicide. CNAY also focuses extensive energy and resources on suicide prevention efforts.

Strategies Employed by CNAY

The Center for Native American Youth serves as a source of information and education about conditions in tribal communities. It compiles research and statistics on issues specific to Native American individuals and highlights legislation and federal agencies that exist to serve this community. These efforts are designed to impart knowledge regarding the rights of individuals in Native American communities and to call attention to the disparities that these individuals encounter on a daily basis.

The Center for Native American Youth has created many programs to foster positive changes. For example, the center's Champions for Change program identifies five Native American youth who serve on the advisory board to promote cancer awareness, language preservation, academic success, and leadership, among other concentrations. Individuals at CNAY regularly visit schools to converse with youth and to understand the issues they find most important. The center uses this information to directly inform the legislature of the problems faced by this population. Additionally, the center frequently holds roundtable discussions and summits that unite youth and many federal agencies to provide opportunities for listening and collaboration.

Part of the center's mission includes highlighting the successes of Native American youth. CNAY features personal stories submitted by Native American youth who have overcome hardships or reached personal goals, operating with the belief that youth have the ability to enact inspiration and change through storytelling. Ultimately, CNAY works to form strong, trusting relationships with tribal leaders and youth in an effort to collaborate and produce positive outcomes within the Native American community.

Maribel Plasencia
Alexis Avery Adams-Clark
Butler Hospital and Brown University
Gregory L. Stuart
University of Tennessee–Knoxville

See Also: Alaskan Natives; Child Support Agencies and Services; Child Welfare Services; Indian Child Welfare Act; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; Indian Health Service; Native Americans; Native Americans, Suicide Among.

Further Readings

Borowsky, Iris Wagman, et al. "Suicide Attempts Among American Indians and Alaskan Youth." Archives of Pediatrics and Adolescent Medicine, v.153/6 (1999).

Center for Native American Youth at the Aspen Institute. "Native American Youth 101." http://www.aspeninstitute.org/sites/default/files/content/upload/Native%20American%20Youth%20101_higres.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Nebelkopf, Ethan and Mary Phillips, eds. Healing and Mental Health for Native Americans: Speaking in Red. Lanham, MD: Altamira Press, 2004.

Central American Immigrants

Because of the unique immigration patterns of Central Americans, it is important to consider the human service needs of this group separately from other Latino groups. Within the United States, there are nearly 3 million foreign-born Central Americans and nearly 5 million people who identify as Central American diaspora. Over two-thirds of those identifying as Central American are from El Salvador and Guatemala. The circumstances surrounding how and why Central American immigrants come to the United States, as well as the type of reception they receive, can impact their adaptation and long-term outcomes including mental health, education, and employment. Therefore, human service professionals should familiarize themselves with the context of immigration of Central Americans including the legacy of war as well as the particular challenges they face once in the United States.

Central Americans

Central America is considered to include the countries of Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Panama. Although Belize and Panama are part of this region geographically, they have distinct histories. Belize is an English-speaking republic that gained its independence from Great Britain in 1981. Panama has a South American indigenous culture and was part of Colombia until 1903. It is also important to note that Guatemala has a significant Maya population that was not eliminated to the same extent as in other countries during Spanish colonization. Guatemala continues to have a significant Maya population who remain culturally and linguistically distinct.

The Context of Migration

Central American migration flows have been significantly influenced by the danger and instability caused by war, U.S. foreign policy, and a continued legacy of poverty. Central Americans have become a major source of migration flows, particularly after a decade of armed conflicts in El Salvador, Nicaragua, Guatemala, and Honduras between the 1970s and 1990s. Because many Central Americans were forced to leave their country due to war, many argue for their refugee eligibility. However, unlike other immigrant groups entering the United States from war-stricken countries, few Central Americans are granted refugee status.

The recognition of Central Americans as refugees was complicated by the U.S. policy decisions regarding these armed conflicts. The United States was concerned about the spread of communism, which led to restrictive immigration policies toward Central Americans as well policy decisions that supported the increased use of military force and violence in Central America. For example, during the Reagan administration, there was enthusiastic support for the Contra rebels in Nicaragua who opposed the socialist Sandinista government. In Guatemala, Ronald Reagan was sympathetic to then dictator Efraín Ríos Montt, who was later tried in the Guatemalan courts for genocide. Also, the lack of recognition of economic repression as a tool of warfare in these countries makes qualifying for refugee status difficult because Central Americans are considered economic migrants instead of refugees. Due to the difficulties in being recognized as refugees, combined with continued political unrest and economic hardship in Central America, there continue to be high rates of undocumented immigration; nearly half of Central Americans lack legal immigration status.

Adaptation and Acculturation

Migrating to another culture disrupts individuals' familial and social networks, cultural behavioral norms, expectations, and values. The process of acculturation can be stressful and is affected by the circumstances involved in emigration, including exposure to trauma and experiences of political and economic oppression. Despite the end of the armed conflicts, Central American countries continue to feel the impact of the legacy of war. For example, survivors of genocide in Guatemala describe the legacy of poverty, family conflict, loss of land, and the continued impact of trauma on their daily lives. Once in the United States, Central American immigrants exposed to war-related trauma exhibit high levels of mistrust, identity confusion, and isolation; these factors, in turn, are related to immigrants' well-being. Central Americans demonstrate significantly higher levels of acculturative stress compared to that of other Latino groups. Thus, human service professionals should recognize the importance of avoiding the generalization of experiences of Latin American immigrants, and instead treat Central Americans as a group with unique characteristics, premigration experiences, and stressors.

In addition to the impact of war, Central Americans experience challenges due to their immigration status. Central Americans are sometimes referred to as "unrecognized exiles" because they share characteristics with refugees, such as feeling pushed from their country of origin and the experience of traumatic events prior to migration. However, because they are not legally recognized as refugees they do not have access to the social services and financial assistance that is given to refugees to assist in the resettlement process. Occasionally, Central Americans have been granted temporary relief from deportation with multiple deadlines and confusing application procedures. This "straddling" of Central Americans between the status of documented and undocumented creates a long-term uncertainty, impacting them in different social and personal spheres such as the family or work. Human services professionals should be aware of the various immigrant statuses within the same family and the impact this legal status can have on access to services as well as the adaptation process.

Human Service Provision

In order to ease the acculturative stress experienced by many Central American immigrants and support their adaptation process, services provided should be culturally appropriate and accessible. Services should recognize the importance of family in the Central American culture, the effect of war on immigrants' social network and psychological well-being, their status as unrecognized political refugees, and the migration experience. Political and economic repression has left deep wounds, which can be transmitted multigenerationally. Families are often reluctant to discuss what they witnessed or experienced and there may be family conflicts, loyalties, or alliances related to these "untold" stories. Often some family members migrate first, leaving behind those who must assume new roles and responsibilities. When the family is reunited, family members must reorganize and develop new structures and roles once again. Human service providers should acknowledge the impact of trauma on the family and explore the impact on family relationships, as well as support families in the process of renegotiating roles.

Even when services are culturally and linguistically appropriate, Central Americans may still have difficulty accessing services. The fear developed during their civil war experiences creates isolation from social networks, impacting access to social services. In addition, the combination of high illiteracy rates and language barriers make it difficult for Central Americans to access services. Efforts must focus on reaching the Central American community by creating awareness of the availability of services, providing linguistically appropriate services, and making services accessible despite a lack of health insurance or immigration status.

Leticia Villarreal Sosa
Dominican University

See Also: Assimilation; Children of Undocumented Aliens; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Hispanic Americans; Hispanic Immigrants; Immigration Law, History of U.S.; Torture, Survivors of; Undocumented Immigrants

Further Readings

Depietro, Frank. Central American Immigrants (Hispanic Americans: Major Minority). Broomall, PA: Mason Crest, 2012.

Galeano, E. Open Veins of Latin America: Five Centuries of the Pillage of a Continent. 25th anniversary ed. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1997.

Garni, Alisa. "Mechanisms of Migration: Poverty and Social Instability in the Postwar Expansion of Central American Migration to the United States." Journal of Immigrant and Refugee Studies, v.8 (2010).

Menchú, Rigoberta. I Rigoberta Menchú: An Indian Woman in Guatemala. 9th ed. Edited by Elisabeth Burgos-Debray. New York: Verso, 1990.

Changing the Client Versus Changing the Environment

Conventional approaches to working with clients in mental health and other therapeutic settings primarily involve the use of psychotherapy and/or medication to bring about changes in the clients that presumably allow the clients to better adapt to their life circumstances. However, in recent years there has been a shift in this perspective among several groups of practitioners who instead favor an approach that views the source of emotional suffering as residing in the environment rather than in the client. This focus assumes that it is not necessarily most beneficial to alter the client. In this alternative approach, the guiding principle is the need for social change rather than individual change.

This shift has been influenced by a number of developing trends in the disciplines of psychiatry, psychology, social work, and allied helping professions. There is growing recognition that current dominant approaches to mental health care have not resulted in a decrease in rates of mental illness. Moreover, evidence of the dangers, adverse reactions, and side effects of psychiatric medication is becoming more readily acknowledged both within and outside the medical community. As such, clients and clinicians alike are seeking alternatives to current mainstream models of care.

Alternatives to Psychotherapy and Medication

The active search for alternatives to conventional mental health care has led to the development of innovative approaches that have been used across a spectrum of conditions and problems. A key group in this work is the International Network Toward Alternatives and Recovery (INTAR). This group consists of clinicians, patients, and researchers who explore progressive models of care that are situated largely in communities rather than in traditional clinics or hospitals. The communities vary widely and include peer-support group housing and teams that respond to first-episode psychosis by entering the client's home and working closely and intensely with the client and his or her family and community members to avoid hospitalization. These approaches follow the assumption that medication and psychotherapy serve to mask the underlying problems that stem from the person's environment. Emerging evidence indicates that these supportive alternatives can be highly successful in leading clients back into a daily life of well-being and positive functioning.

In her book The Myth of the Chemical Cure, psychiatrist Joanna Moncrieff outlines the risks of the mainstream psychiatric approach and argues that the current overreliance on psychiatric medication serves the interests of the psychiatric and pharmaceutical industries rather than the needs of clients. Similarly, psychologist Paula Caplan has been highly influential in raising awareness of the risks associated with psychiatric labeling and diagnosis. Caplan argues that psychiatric labels can be used to justify to clients and families the use of harmful medications and to provide courts with a rationale in custody and other cases to deny rights to those diagnosed as mentally ill. These critiques of mainstream psychiatry demonstrate clearly the risks of focusing solely on the client as the locus of change.

Empowerment Therapy

To many clients and practitioners, the outright rejection of psychotherapy is both unrealistic and unnecessary. Therefore, psychotherapists have worked to develop models that are responsive to the critiques of those who maintain that alternatives are crucially needed. One of the more widely recognized models is the feminist empowerment therapy developed by Judith Worell and Pamela Remer. This model is highly useful not only for female clients but also for members of marginalized groups generally, including low-income clients and clients of color. The empowerment therapy approach assumes that stressful environments bring about psychological and emotional suffering that is often mistakenly framed solely as symptoms of mental illness. Worell and Remer argue that these "symptoms" should instead be viewed as manifestations of social ills that clients should be empowered to combat in their daily lives. Empowerment therapy thus contains tenets that focus on the development of individual empowerment as a means to create transformative, permanent changes in one's environment. These tenets include the belief that the interface between the personal and the political in the clients' lives must always be considered in therapy sessions such that prevailing social and political forces are critically examined as possible obstacles to psychological well-being. Another key tenet is the belief that the therapist must model an egalitarian relationship with the client; this modeling serves to encourage the client to adopt an empowered stance in taking on the task of social change.

Critiques of Changing the Environment Instead of the Client

While there has been growing support for the range of alternative approaches developed in recent years, most practitioners adopt the belief that working with a client must involve making individual changes in the way the client thinks, acts, and reacts. The approach of changing the environment rather than the client is to them a foreign notion. Most clinicians are trained in a model that is highly individually focused and, indeed, the scope of their training rarely includes a consideration of the social ills that give rise to what is diagnosed as mental illness—including poverty, violence, and various forms of discrimination.

Moreover, clinicians see before them an individual who is distraught and who may be in crisis; their training equips them to deal with the emotions entailed by the crisis more than attending to the outside factors that are at play. Therefore, approaches to changing the environment remain on the periphery of models of care. In the end, clients and clinicians must choose for themselves the approach that is best suited to their goals and to their ideological assumptions about the causes and cures of human suffering.

Future Directions

The various existing alternative approaches are a long way from being widely accepted. There are a number of ongoing challenges that necessitate new ideas about what it means to "treat" mental illness. One key issue is the need for systematic research on how helpful these alternatives are for clients. Most mental health scholars are trained in the same approaches and philosophies as mainstream clinicians and therefore use as their variables of interest only individual, noncontextualized factors. This approach to research represents only one part of the host of influences that impact mental health problems: the focus is on the pathology of the client, not on the dangers in her or his environment. This model is particularly dangerous when examining the psychological impact of trauma. Trauma survivors, such as combat veterans and victims of sexual assault, are too often viewed as psychologically weak rather than as exhibiting responses aimed at adapting to life-threatening environments.

Another key issue is the need for scholars and clinicians to partner with activists and advocates in working to change the social conditions that give rise to psychological suffering. University-based and hospital-based teams can identify local groups that work to change such conditions as unsafe housing, inadequate protections for domestic violence survivors, and discriminatory practices used against veterans and racial and sexual minorities. Lastly, the training of practitioners needs to be expanded to develop not only clinical competency but also social and structural competencies that support them in their ability to work with clients to identify sources of emotional danger in their environments.

Alisha Ali
New York University

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Mental Health Services, Adult; Mental Health Services, Children; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment.

Further Readings

Caplan, P. J. and L. Cosgrove, eds. Bias in Psychiatric Diagnosis. Lanham, MD: Jason Aronson, 2004.

Healy, D. Let Them Eat Prozac: The Unhealthy Relationship Between the Pharmaceutical Industry and Depression. New York: New York University Press, 2004.

Moncrieff, J. The Myth of the Chemical Cure: A Critique of Psychiatric Drug Treatment. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008.

Worell, J. and P. Remer. Feminist Perspectives in Therapy: Empowering Diverse Women. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2003.

Chemical Restraints

A chemical restraint is a type of medical restraint in which a drug is used to limit the movement or freedom of a person, often by sedating them. Chemical restraints are sometimes used in medical settings such as emergency rooms, inpatient medical departments, and psychiatric settings when patients are disrupting their medical care, trying to harm themselves, or attempting to hurt others. The use of chemical restraints in nonmedical settings like foster care, group homes, and juvenile detention centers has been documented as well. Drugs such as benzodiazepines (e.g., Xanax, Valium, Klonopin, Halcion), antipsychotics (e.g., Haldol, Thorazine, Compazine, Zyprexa), and dissociative anesthetics (e.g., Dextromethorphan, Ketamine) can be used as chemical restraints. Currently, there are no drugs approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) for use as a chemical restraint, though off-label use of medications is not limited.

While the use of chemical restraints to keep people from harming themselves and others can be part of their medical treatment, chemical restraint use has been criticized. Criticisms include mismanagement of the chemical restraint by health care workers for the convenience of staff rather than the benefit of the patient. This mismanagement can lead to loss of activities of daily living (ADL) function, loss of cognition, aggression, and hallucinations. A patient's quality of life may be affected, with reduced social contact, decreased participation in activities, loss of independence and control, increased problems with eating and sleeping patterns, and loss of dignity.

Ethical issues must be considered around the use of chemical restraints. The right of the patient to be free of chemical restraint must be placed above discipline or the convenience of staff. Health care workers must, in conjunction with their supervisors, be able to safely and adequately care for patients assigned to them. This is often where the team approach to health care is beneficial. Patients also have the right to autonomy. By using chemical restraints, often without patients' consent, patients are denied the ability to make their own health care choices. Larger concerns around the use of chemical restraints include the use of drugs for FDA-indicated conditions and the appropriate prescription of medications for off-label uses. Other considerations for off-label use include questions about appropriate dose and duration and assuring the patient is monitored for any adverse effects of the medication. There are unresolved issues around chemical restraints including questions if chemical restraints are ever appropriate and what are the standards for their use. Currently, there are no federally mandated standards to cover their use.

The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act (OBRA) of 1987 created a national minimum set of standards of care and rights for people living in certified nursing facilities. This landmark legislation mandated that residents be free from physical or chemical restraints imposed for the purposes of discipline or convenience. OBRA states that restraints may only be used to ensure the physical safety of the resident or other residents and only upon the written order of a physician that specifies the duration and circumstances under which the restraints are to be used. This does not preclude the use of assistive devices when deemed medically necessary and/or appropriate. Also, OBRA required the regulation of certain drugs in nursing homes and limited the use of as-needed (PRN) medication orders. Additionally, the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990 mandated the regulation of certain drugs used in nursing homes and the establishment of a drug utilization program in these facilities. This mandate refocused the role of the pharmacist in becoming an active participant in reducing potential drug therapy problems in nursing homes.

The use of chemical restraints on persons with disabilities is an important point of consideration. While there is little evidence of chemical restraints used to intentionally harm, there are concerns that persons with disabilities have been chemically restrained as an alternative to addressing communication barriers or frustrations. The use of chemical restraints is often attributed to staff not having time or not being trained to communicate effectively with patients who experience communication barriers. This is often attributed to staffing shortages. Medicating a person perceived as "difficult" or "challenging" is seen as a convenient mechanism or cultural norm for understaffed and overworked facilities.

Children are another group with special issues around chemical restraints. There has been an increase in the prescription of antipsychotic medication to children, often for developmental disorders, attention deficient hyperactivity disorder, or disruptive behavior disorder. Children do have mental health disorders that need treatment; however, attention continues to be focused on the rapid increase in children taking antipsychotic medications, as well as the children who receive medication but do not receive standard mental health assessments or visit a mental health professional while taking the medication. Like other patients that receive medication, children must be offered alternative ways to limit disruptive behavior, not be medicated for control or punishment, and monitored while on medications. Chemical restraints of children continue to be a problem in the foster system and juvenile justice system, often because of understaffed facilities, cutbacks to mental health services, and inadequate staff training.

Sarah E. Colonna
University of North Carolina at Greensboro

See Also: Ableism; Abuse and Neglect; ADHD, Services for Individuals With; Adoption, Special Needs; Adult Day Care; Aging and Adult Services; Americans with Disabilities Act; At-Risk Youth Services; Behavior Support and Management; Child Welfare Services; Children in Foster Care; Day Care for Children; Disability Services; Early Childhood Development; Emergency Medical Care; Family Therapy; Foster Care Agencies; Hospitals; Medical Necessity; Medicare; Mental Health Services, Adult; Mental Health Services, Children; National Institute of Mental Health; National Institute on Aging.

Further Readings

Advocacy for Inclusion. "The Use of Chemical Restraint in People With Disabilities." http://www.advocacyforinclusion.org/publications/Reports/use%20of%20chemical%20restraint%20in%20people%20with%20disabilities%20may10.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

Braun, Julie A. and Lawrence A. Frolik. "Legal Aspects of Chemical Restraint Use in Nursing Homes." Marquette Elder's Advisor, v.2/2 (2000). http://scholarship.law.marquette.edu/elders/vol2/iss2/5 (Accessed July 2013).

Day, D. M. "Examining the Therapeutic Utility of Restraints and Seclusion With Children and Youth: The Role of Theory and Research in Practice." American Journal of Orthopsychiatry, v.72 (2002).

Health Services Advisory Group. "White Paper on Chemical Restraint Use for the California Department of Public Health." http://www.cdph.ca.gov/programs/LnC/Documents/CAHPS-HSAG-White-Paper-Chemical-Restraint-Use-Final.pdf (Accessed July 2013.)

Turnham, Hollis. "OBRA '87 Summary." http://www.allhealth.org/briefingmaterials/obra87summary-984.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act

Child abuse and neglect is a significant social concern. Children who experience abuse and/or neglect are more likely to have developmental delays and impaired language or cognitive skills; be identified as "problem" children (with attention difficulties or challenging behaviors); be arrested for delinquency, adult criminality, and violent criminal behavior; experience depression, anxiety, or other mental health problems as adults; engage in more health-risk behaviors as adults; and have poorer health outcomes as adults.

As different cultures come into contact with each other, conflicting cultural child-rearing practices create a situation ripe with the potential for disputes concerning what constitutes child abuse or neglect. The apparent threat is the mishandling of a child maltreatment case due to bias toward particular cultural views, standards, and norms. In order to respond to child abuse and neglect effectively, increased attention must be given to the role of families' race and culture, and appropriate threshold trainings must be routinely incorporated to establish a professional standard of cultural competence.

The key federal legislation addressing child abuse and neglect is the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (CAPTA), originally enacted on January 31, 1974 (P.L. 93-247). This act was amended several times and was most recently amended and reauthorized on December 20, 2010, by the CAPTA Reauthorization Act of 2010 (P.L. 111-320). Congress enacted the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (CAPTA, P.L. 93-247) to create a single federal focus for preventing and responding to child abuse and neglect. As a condition of receiving state grant funds under that act, states are required to have procedures in place for receiving and responding to allegations of abuse or neglect and for ensuring children's safety.

CAPTA provides federal funding to states in support of prevention, assessment, investigation, prosecution, and treatment activities and also provides grants to public agencies and nonprofit organizations, including Indian tribes and tribal organizations, for demonstration programs and projects. Additionally, CAPTA identifies the federal role in supporting research, evaluation, technical assistance, and data collection activities; establishes the Office on Child Abuse and Neglect; and mandates Child Welfare Information Gateway. CAPTA also sets forth a minimum definition of child abuse and neglect.

The Children's Bureau, Administration for Children and Families, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, is the federal agency charged with supporting states, tribes, and communities in providing programs and services to protect children and strengthen families. Additionally, CAPTA identifies the federal role in supporting research, evaluation, technical assistance, and data collection activities; establishes the Office on Child Abuse and Neglect; and mandates the National Clearinghouse on Child Abuse and Neglect Information.

The primary goals of federal child welfare programs are to ensure the safety of children; to enable them to be part of strong, permanent families; and, in doing this, to foster the well-being of children and their families. CAPTA is the only federal child welfare program focused solely on preventing child abuse or neglect as well as responding to allegations of abuse or neglect. Funding for CAPTA state grants is provided to help states improve their child protective services systems and may be used for a range of purposes specified in the law. To be eligible to receive these state grant funds, a state must submit a plan including certain assurances related to how it will operate its child protective services system; establish and support citizen review panels; and, to the "maximum extent practicable," annually supply to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services certain child abuse and neglect data. The statute provides that any funds appropriated for these purposes must be distributed to all eligible states by formula.

Each year, the Exchange Club of Flagstaff, Arizona, displays an annual Field of Hope, Healing Field, which posts blue ribbon flags as a memorial to Arizona's children who have lost their lives because of child abuse and neglect.

State Grants to Improve Child Protective Services

Funds are provided to state child welfare agencies and may be used to improve their system of child protective services. To receive these funds, a state must provide assurances that it has procedures or policies (1) to receive and respond to allegations of child abuse or neglect, ensure children's safety, and provide appropriate referrals; (2) for the appointment of an appropriately trained guardian ad litem (attorney or volunteer) for each child victim involved in a court proceeding; (3) to maintain confidentiality of child abuse and neglect records; and (4) for improving training to workers. States are also required to establish and support citizen review panels to evaluate the effectiveness of child protective services policies and practices and must, "to the maximum extent practicable," submit certain child abuse and neglect data to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services each year.

Research, Demonstration, and Technical Assistance

Funds are awarded competitively to support an ongoing research program and other work related to better identifying, preventing, and treating child abuse and neglect and for required federal efforts to collect and disseminate child abuse and neglect data, operate an information clearinghouse, and provide technical assistance related to child abuse and neglect prevention and treatment. A few of the projects and activities currently funded (in whole or in part) include the Child Welfare Information Gateway Web site, annual publication of "Child Maltreatment," the National Resource Center for Child Protective Services, the National Quality Improvement Center on Differential Response, and the initiative on Supporting Evidence-Based Home Visitation to Prevent Child Maltreatment.

Community-Based Grants for the Prevention of Child Abuse or Neglect

Funds are provided to a designated lead entity in each state for support and development of community-based programs and activities that prevent child abuse and neglect. The lead entity must make an inventory of unmet preventive services needs in the state, foster a continuum of family support and strengthening services at the community level, leverage nonfederal funds to support prevention programs and activities, and provide technical assistance to funded community-based groups. Community-based groups that receive subgrants from the lead entity must provide, directly or by referral, core family resource and family support services. These services include parent education and parent mutual support groups, community and social service referrals, voluntary home visiting, and respite care.

Children's Justice Act Grants

The Children's Justice Act makes funds available to each state to improve systems related to the investigation, prosecution, and overall handling of child abuse and neglect cases with particular focus on cases involving child sexual abuse and exploitation, child abuse– or neglect-related fatalities, or maltreatment of children with disabilities. To receive these funds, a state must establish a multidisciplinary task force to study state administrative, judicial, and investigative practice related to child abuse and neglect cases; receive recommendations from this task force in the initial year that grants are funded (and every three years after); and implement those recommendations (or an alternative plan). In addition, a state must meet all the requirements for receipt of CAPTA state grants.

There is a multitude of individual, organizational, community, environmental, and contextual factors that all come into play for the grantees and the families they are serving; these factors can facilitate or impede implementation efforts. Nonetheless, there is no escaping the fact that a transformed child welfare system that focuses on safety, permanency, and well-being outcomes requires parent and family engagement and family support. Parent and family involvement within a system of care requires mutual respect and meaningful partnerships between families, professionals, and communities. For the future, child welfare activities must be focused more on supporting families and communities in ways that will ultimately prevent child maltreatment and keep children within their families and communities.

Ibrahim Cetinkaya
Independent Scholar

See Also: Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Child Protective Services.

Further Readings

Brodowski, Melissa, Liliana Hernandez, Angelique Brown, and Christine Lamble. "The Children's Bureau's Role in Promoting Parent Engagement and Family Support: A Brief History and Current Efforts." Journal of Family Strengths, v.12/1 (2012).

CAPTA Reauthorization Act of 2010. https://www.childwelfare.gov/systemwide/laws_policies/federal/index.cfm?event=federalLegislation.viewLegis&id=142 (Accessed December 2013).

Child Welfare Information Gateway. About CAPTA: A Legislative History. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Children's Bureau, 2011.

Stoltzfus, Emilie. The Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (CAPTA): Background, Programs, and Funding. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service, 2009.

Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of

The maltreatment of children is a serious social problem with unique implications related to diversity, especially with regard to socioeconomic status and race/ethnicity. Child abuse and neglect are defined in U.S. law as "the physical or mental injury, sexual abuse or exploitation, negligent treatment, or maltreatment of a child by a person who is responsible for the child's welfare, under circumstances which indicate that the child's health or welfare is harmed or threatened thereby." In most states, professionals who work in health care, mental health services, and kindergarten-through-12th-grade (K–12) education are mandated by law to report situations of child abuse and neglect to state or local child protection agencies. Children and families of color are disproportionately reported for child maltreatment due to institutional racism, because child maltreatment is often triggered by other social problems, and because, on average, families of color have more exposure to professionals who comply with mandated reporting requirements. Moreover, reported cases involving families of color are disproportionately substantiated and trigger a more punitive response from the child welfare system. However, most research indicates that when other social problems are controlled for and estimates are based upon population surveys, not official reports, caretakers of color are not more likely to maltreat their children.

The Extent of Child Maltreatment

Each year for the last 10 years, approximately 3 million cases, involving between 5 and 6 million children, have been officially reported for child maltreatment, a rate of about 45 reports per 1,000 U.S. children. Child neglect, that is, the failure to provide adequate food, clothing, shelter, supervision, or medical care, is by far the most commonly reported type of child maltreatment, representing approximately three-fourths of substantiated cases. Physical abuse accounts for less than 20 percent and sexual abuse about 10 percent of cases substantiated by the child welfare system. Between 1,200 and 1,500 children die as a result of child maltreatment every year, most often as a result of neglect.

Child Maltreatment, Poverty, and Race/Ethnicity

Of all types of child maltreatment, neglect is the most highly correlated with poverty. Caretakers may fail to provide adequate food, clothing, shelter, supervision, and medical care because they lack the resources to do so. Thus, a poor family may be evicted because they do not have rent money and end up living in their car. Alternatively, poor parents may choose to spend their limited funds unwisely, for example, on a car, and then not have money for food, whereas middle-class parents can afford a car and groceries. One of the most frequently reported types of neglect is lack of adequate supervision. A single mother working at a minimum-wage job may not be able to afford appropriate child care. In all the situations described above, caretakers will be defined as neglectful.

Families of color are more likely to be poor. The proportion of African American (greater than 22 percent), Native American (30 percent), and Hispanic (greater than 22 percent) families with incomes below the poverty level is more than twice that of white (less than 10 percent) families. For Native American families the rate is three times that of white families. The only exception is Asian American families, who have the same poverty rate as white families. Because of this disproportionality in poverty levels, families of color (except Asian American) are more vulnerable to neglecting their children, simply because they lack resources.

Child physical abuse, the next-most common form of maltreatment, is also associated with poverty, but is also linked to situational stress, such as having a special needs child, multiple children, partner conflicts, work-related problems, racial/ethnic discrimination, and child misbehavior. It is well documented that poor families experience a greater number of these life stresses. For a complex set of reasons including economic hardship, these situational stresses are more likely to occur in families of color. Indeed, sexual abuse is the only type of child maltreatment not found at higher rates among poor and stressed families.

Race/Ethnicity and Substantiation of Child Maltreatment Reports

Of the approximately 74 million children in the United States, 68 percent are white, 14 percent African American, 1 percent Native American/Alaskan Native, 23 percent Hispanic, and 4.4 percent Asian American. Given the disproportionate number of families of color living in poverty, it is expected that they would be more likely to be reported for child maltreatment. In terms of the ethnicity of the substantiated cases of child maltreatment, in 2011 21.5 percent were African American, 22.1 percent Hispanic, 43.9 percent white, 1.1 percent Native American, and 0.8 percent Asian American. These figures demonstrate the overrepresentation of African American children and the underrepresentation of white and Asian American children substantiated for child maltreatment. Although the proportions of Hispanic and Native American children are only slightly higher than their proportions in the general population, Hispanic and Native American children, like African American children, are removed from parental care at much higher rates than the percentage of these children in the overall population.

Racial/Ethnic Bias and Child Maltreatment

Of concern are findings from studies that examine the relative severity of child maltreatment and case circumstances for white families versus families of color and child welfare interventions. When maltreatment severity and case characteristics are held constant, these studies document that not only are children of color more likely to be removed from the home, but they are also placed in more restrictive settings when compared to white children. For example, a Native American single mother with a history of substance abuse is more likely to have her children removed from her home than a white mother with the same history. An African American youth whose parents are not adequately supervising him, resulting in school truancy and curfew violations, is more likely to be placed in a group care facility than a white youth with the same history, who may be placed with a relative. These examples demonstrate the impact of institutional racism.

Part of the reason families of color are more likely than white families to be reported for child maltreatment is because they are more likely to seek services from professionals who honor their mandated reporting obligations, such as public-sector workers providing financial assistance, food assistance, and health care services. In contrast, white families, who are more likely to be middle class, seek services from professionals who are less likely to honor their mandated reporting responsibilities, such as therapists in private practice or private health care providers.

In addition to these effects of institutional racism, dominant societal assumptions about optimal families and living situations for children affect how child maltreatment is defined. For example, in Native American culture the community or tribe is responsible for its children. Because of this, it is not uncommon for children to be in the care of an adult who may be a cousin, an aunt, or a tribal elder. These living situations constitute "improper custody," considered a type of neglect in the child welfare system, and for this reason an Indian child is in danger of being removed from that living situation. Another example of institutional racism is how services to assist families and children are structured to address child maltreatment. For example, caretakers are often sent to "counseling" based upon an assumption that they have deficiencies in functioning, when in fact they may just lack resources. The counselor is likely to be middle class and white. If a caregiver's first language is Spanish, that parent may be precluded from receiving the service he or she needs to have children returned because there is no Spanish-speaking counselor. The intent is not to discriminate against racial or ethnic minorities, but that may nevertheless be the effect.

There are federal efforts to address the differential impact of the child welfare system on families of color, such as the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978. But there are other federal statutes that deny the realities and complexities of racial inequality, for example, the Multiethnic Placement Act of 1994.

Kathleen Coulborn Faller.
University of Michigan

See Also: African Americans; Asian Americans; Child Welfare Services; Children in Foster Care; Critical Race Theory; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Foster Care Agencies; Indian Child Welfare Act; Multiethnic Placement Act of 1994; Native Americans; People of Color: Service Delivery, Psychological Assessment, Cultural Issues; Protective Services for Children.

Further Readings

Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (1974). CAPTA Reauthorization Act of 2010 (P.L. 111-320). "Child Welfare Information Gateway Fact Sheet." https://www.childwelfare.gov/pubs/factsheets/about.cfm (Accessed April 2013).

Delaronde, Steven, Gary King, Robert Bendel, and Robert Reece. "Opinions Among Mandated Reporters Toward Child Maltreatment Reporting Policies." Child Abuse & Neglect, v.24/7 (2000).

Putnam-Hornstein, Emily, Barbara Needell, Bryn King, and Michelle Johnson-Motoyama. "Racial and Ethnic Disparities: A Population-Based Examination of Risk Factors for Involvement With Child Protective Services." Child Abuse & Neglect, v.37 (2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children and Families, Administration on Children, Youth and Families, Children's Bureau. "Child Maltreatment 2011." http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/research-data-technology/statistics-research/child-maltreatment (Accessed April 2013).

Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths

Prevention, treatment, and wellness promotion for young people ages 11 to 25 has been a growing objective for U.S. social service, education, juvenile justice, child welfare, and medical fields for the past century. These services target the emotional health, substance abuse, and social, behavioral, academic, and/or vocational functioning of adolescents and young adults. Improving the ability of youth to attain success in school; promoting mental, social, and emotional health and well-being; facilitating growth-fostering relationships; and equipping youth to achieve developmental milestones including the establishment of a stable and sustainable living environment are common goals among adolescent and youth service providers.

Historical Context

Mental, emotional, and behavioral health services for adolescents and youth in the United States share an intimate relationship with juvenile corrections services. Their common history dates back to the late 1800s, when the state of Illinois established the nation's first juvenile court in Chicago. In the years that followed, a group of concerned women on the board of directors of Jane Addams's Hull House began investigating juvenile delinquency and, in 1909, created the Juvenile Psychopathic Institute to study adolescent brain functioning, IQ, and psychological factors impacting troubled youth. Their approach inspired the opening of many child guidance centers across the United States in the early to mid-20th century.

The Child Study Center at the Yale School of Medicine was created in 1911 and served as an innovator in the study of child and adolescent development. During World War II, the drafting of teenagers and young adults from diverse ethnic and socioeconomic backgrounds contributed to data on the relationships between a youth's mental health and ability to function in the world. This spawned a new interest in adolescent health and wellness, and in 1948, a nationwide collaboration of child guidance clinics organized to form the American Association of Psychiatric Clinics for Children (AAPCC) to advocate for effective adolescent/youth services. In 1953, the American Academy of Child Psychiatry was founded, and in the 1960s the National Institute of Health awarded its first grant to study pediatric psychopharmacology.

In 1982, a groundbreaking study was released by Jane Knitzer titled Unclaimed Children: The Failure of Public Responsibility to Children and Adolescents in Need of Mental Health Services. The study was the first of its kind examining on a large scale the effectiveness of mental health services for children and adolescents in the United States. A key finding of the Knitzer study highlights the importance of family and parent inclusion as an essential component to the success of youth services. In 1984, the National Institute of Mental Health established a Child and Adolescent Service System Program, a program later shifted to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), encouraging states to develop a more comprehensive system of care for troubled adolescents, prioritize community-based treatment, facilitate collaborative efforts among state agencies and stakeholders, and increase parent and family involvement in adolescent services.

The Special Education Pupils Program passed in 1984 provided a new framework for youth mental health care by mandating that special education students be provided adequate mental health services as a component in a collaborative manner between educators and mental health providers. This significantly increased access to mental health services for youth through school individualized education programs (IEPs) and enabled troubled teenagers to remain at home and in their home school, while building necessary services into their weekly schedule.

The case of R. C. v. Hornsby (Alabama, 1988) placed a spotlight on youth in state custody who were committed to psychiatric hospitals despite never having received any diagnoses. Parents and families in these instances were often denied visitation rights. The legal agreement in this case mandated the creation of a system of care for young people with mental health disorders currently or at risk of being involved with the child welfare system, and established family preservation as a priority for these youth.

In 1989, the Federation of Families for Children's Mental Health was established to promote a family-driven, youth-guide system for adolescent mental, social, and behavioral services. A decade later, in 2001, the Jason K. v. Eden settlement in the state of Arizona further galvanized these improvements to the provision of child behavioral health. In the settlement, the state adopted a vision that placed youth and families at the center of care delivery systems. Principles established by this settlement included (1) collaboration with the child and family, (2) adoption of evidence-based practices, (3) cross-system collaboration, (4) maximizing service accessibility, (5) strength-based family and youth-tailored services, (6) focus on stable child placement, (7) respect for youth and family cultural background, and (8) anchoring and connection to natural supports.

In 2003, Katie A. v. Bonta further challenged the detrimental and common practice of placing foster children with mental health problems in hospitals and residential facilities when they could be enabled to remain in homes in their community if adequate services were available. The settlement of this lawsuit provided the framework for the expansion of wraparound services and evidence-based practices being made available to foster children with the intention of preventing institutionalization.

Terminology

"Adolescent" is generally defined as a young person 11 to 25 years of age. "Family-driven care" indicates that families take a primary role in making decisions regarding the mental, social, emotional, and behavioral services their children need and receive, as well as contributing to the formation of the policies and procedures governing the larger systems responsible for funding, driving, and providing those services. "Youth-guided care" indicates an emphasis on the rights of adolescents and young adults receiving mental, social, emotional, and/or behavioral care to be educated, informed, and empowered to take a decision-making role in their own services, and to contribute to the formation of the policies and procedures governing the larger systems providing those services. "Evidence-based practice" refers to a service approach that has been evaluated using a criteria base to determine the level of its empirically demonstrated effectiveness with a certain population. In order to be considered an evidence-based practice (EBP), the approach must have documented outcomes in two or more randomized controlled outcome studies comparing the target approach to an appropriate alternative where a significant advantage was found.

"System of care" refers to comprehensive community-based services and supports consisting of research-informed programs, strong interagency collaboration, and sustained funding. "Least restrictive environment" is a standard established by the 2004 Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) that dictates that youth be served when at all possible in their home school, permitted to reside at home with their family, and receive services in the most natural, diverse, and culturally relevant setting possible. "Custody relinquishment" refers to the practice of "voluntarily" giving up one's child or children to the child welfare system, juvenile department, and/or state in order to access mental health services for them. "Wraparound services" refers to a concept established in the 1980s to prevent out-of-home placements and promote care in the least restrictive environment. The aim of wraparound services is to provide youth with serious and/or complex mental, emotional, or behavioral problems an intensive, individualized care plan involving collaboration between the adolescent, family, natural supports, service providers, and community agencies that enables the adolescent to remain in his/her home and community.

Differentiation From Adult Services

Historically, adolescent/youth services such as behavior modification and substance abuse intervention mimicked the psychodynamic and aggressive/confrontational approaches being applied to adults with similar presenting problems. Psychiatric, psychological, corrective, and substance abuse recovery programs initially designed for adults were liberally applied to adolescents with little alteration. The Stockton Developmental Center, which functioned as an insane asylum for the state of California in the 1800s, is an example of institutions that placed children in the same hospital wards as adults, with no separate accommodations.

In the 1950s, certain U.S. medical and social service facilities began to recognize that adolescent behavior problems such as substance abuse and delinquency did not necessarily mirror those of adults. Despite a growing understanding of the unique features of the adolescent brain, youth were still subjected to the same service approaches as adults through the 1980s. Currently, youth service providers recognize the now large body of research demonstrating that adolescent and adult mental, emotional, social, and behavioral problems manifest differently and are best treated differently. Owing to their unique developmental stage—socially, physiologically, and neurologically—adolescents in need of services cannot be treated as merely younger versions of adults. Reinforced by research on the most effective ways of serving teenagers and their families, treatment programs developed specifically for youth emerged slowly in the 1990s.

Settings

Youth services in the United States are provided in a variety of community-based settings, including home-based services, school-based services, juvenile correction departments, community clinics, foster care homes, and medical and residential facilities. Based on statistics from 2007, 3.1 million—or almost 13 percent—of youth aged 12 to 17 in the United States annually receive counseling or psychotherapy intervention in a specialized mental health setting—either outpatient, inpatient, and/or with a combination of in-home services. Another 12 percent receive services in a school-based setting. Approximately 3 percent receive mental health services in a general medical setting, and over 5 percent receive services in multiple settings.

In 2002, the American School Counseling Association established a framework for the provision of youth treatment and prevention services in school-based settings. School counselors utilize evidence-based approaches to provide individual, group, and family-oriented interventions to students through high school, designed to promote academic, social, emotional, and behavioral health.

Currently, more than 2 million U.S. teenagers annually become formally involved with the juvenile justice system and millions more benefit from prevention services aimed at deterring youth from needing juvenile correction involvement. The vast majority of youth enter the juvenile corrections system with at least one diagnosable mental health need. In some communities where access to mental health care and preventative care is limited, children are referred to the juvenile justice system because general mental health services for youth are unavailable or limited in their area.

Evidence-Based Practices for Youth Services

Adolescent/youth services include a variety of different approaches, depending on the preferences of the youth and family, the diagnosis, the level of severity of the problem, and the availability of equipped service providers. Common prevention services include group therapy, psychosocial support, peer and adult mentoring, psycho-education, and prosocial extracurricular activities. Typical intervention services may include individual, group, and/or family therapy with an array of evidence-based practices, possible psychiatric evaluation, and medication, along with care coordination/case management.

Empirical research on the effectiveness of youth services has contributed to a growing body of literature on evidence-based practices for prevention and intervention for adolescents. Cognitive behavioral therapy, motivational enhancement therapy, multidimensional family therapy, multisystemic therapy, and brief strategic family therapy are a few examples of dozens of empirically supported approaches for providing effective services for adolescents and their families. The Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMSHA) maintains a list of evidence-based practices and programs in the delivery of effective youth services in the United States.

Obstacles to Accessing Effective Youth Services

Studies of service access and effectiveness consistently reveal ongoing disparity between youth of different racial/ethnic and socioeconomic backgrounds, as well as gender differences. At present, African American youth are more likely to be placed out of home and to be discharged from residential treatment into foster care than their peers. Males are consistently found more likely to be placed in residential facilities than their female peers. An estimated 40 percent of the boys and nearly 30 percent of the girls placed in residential treatment could have been treated effectively in their home community, based upon their level of risk severity, if adequate community services were made available.

Controlling for risk factors and all other variables equal, adolescents treated in residential facilities and out-of-home placements are found more likely than their peers to have suicidal tendencies, comorbid mental health conditions, and experience abuse and neglect. In the United States, research indicates that as many as 75 to 80 percent of children and adolescents in need of mental health services do not receive them at all, or in inadequate manner or frequency. Barriers to accessing adolescent and youth services can include stigma preventing the youth and/or family from seeking help; lack of culturally relevant services available; language barriers between youth, families, and service providers; inadequate funding; transportation difficulties; and/or shortage of trained providers.

Current Trends

In 2006, the National Center for Children in Poverty released findings from Unclaimed Children Revisited. The initiative highlights the best state policy practices across the nation in adolescent/youth service delivery, including an emphasis on developmentally and culturally appropriate services, family and youth engagement, and evidence-based services. The study revealed the following trends in U.S. youth services: (1) increased inclusion of parents and families in policy, procedure, and implementation of youth services, (2) decrease in funding and practice of approaches shown to be harmful or ineffective for youth, (3) increase in use of evidence-based practices and best practice approaches informed by research on youth health and wellness, and (4) growing focus on prevention and promoting protective factors that lead to resiliency for youth and families.

The growing interest in protective factors and resiliency development represents a shift in the field of youth services away from a concentration on mental illness and toward strength and wellness. Closely related to this shift is a growing awareness of the importance of language and culture-specific services—adolescents and their families can be best understood and served within the context of their home culture. Resiliency is a strengths-based concept that emphasizes the promotion of relationships, activities, skills, and values that serve to prevent and protect a youth from negative consequences, risky behaviors, and environmental challenges.

Stress-relieving and resiliency-building activities can include spiritual practices; problem solving; practicing positive interactions with family members, teachers, and peers; service to the community; leadership development; and participation in team sports and/or the arts. Family-based treatment interventions, often provided in the home, outpatient clinic, and/or school, can serve to facilitate positive interactions between troubled youth and their parents, siblings, and extended family and tend to consistently demonstrate good empirical outcomes. Evidence-based practices empower families and youth to learn relational skills, practice creative approaches to solving conflict, reflect on their family culture and values, and identify natural strengths the youth and family can draw upon to achieve their health and wellness goals.

Julie Strentzsch
St. Mary's University

See Also: Mental Health Services, Children; Partial Care Services for Children, Mental Health; Wraparound Services/Systems of Care.

Further Readings

Kazdin, Alan and John Weisz, eds. Evidence-Based Psychotherapies for Children and Adolescents. New York: Guilford Press, 2003.

Poncin, Yann and Joseph Woolston. "Systems of Care, Wraparound Services, and Home-Based Services." In Textbook of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry, Mina Dulcan, ed. Arlington, VA: American Psychiatric Publishing, 2010.

Santrock, John. Adolescence. 14th ed. Columbus, OH: McGraw-Hill, 2011.

Sells, Scott. Treating the Tough Adolescent: A Family-Based, Step-by-Step Guide. New York: Guilford Press, 2004.

VanDenBerg, John, Eric Bruns, and John Burchard. "History of the Wraparound Process." Focal Point: A National Bulletin on Family Support and Children's Mental Health: Quality and Fidelity in Wraparound, v.17/2 (2003).

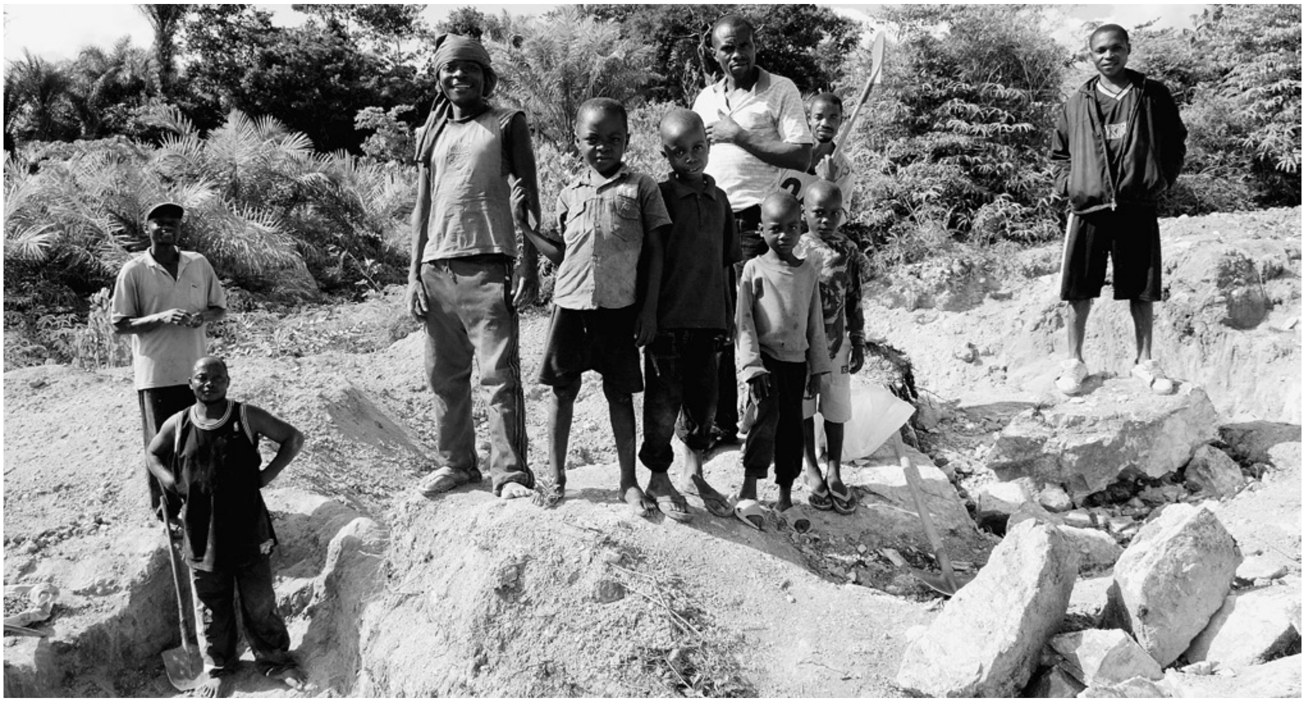
Child Labor, International Variations in Attitudes Toward

Nearly every child throughout the world participates in various levels of work. Much of this work is developmentally positive for youth, leading to a positive well-being and improved quality of life.

For example, by earning money helping parents or neighbors with various chores, children can learn important lessons on the work ethic and social and fiscal responsibility. However, many children throughout the world are forced to work laborious hours that deprive them of childhood. The International Labour Organization (ILO) defines child labor as work that harms children as it deprives them of childhood and dignity and that is detrimental to physical and mental development. Child labor is further characterized by work that interferes with proper education by (1) preventing children from attending school, (2) forcing children to leave school prematurely, or (3) having children combine schoolwork with excessively long and heavy workloads. In other words, any work that hinders a child's development can be regarded as child labor. Due to immeasurably negative effects, there is a growing consensus regarding the need to eliminate child labor worldwide. In fact, a majority of countries have ratified two of the most important ILO conventions on child labor: convention No. 138 on the minimum age for admission to employment and work and convention No. 182 on the worst forms of child labor. Despite these positive advancements, the eradication of child labor has not been supported in all parts of the world. Indeed, child labor remains an ongoing and widespread problem in many developing countries, where attitudes favorable to its use are often commonplace.

Child Labor in Developing Countries: Asia and Sub-Saharan Africa

Although estimates of child labor from diverse international organizations and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) vary, it has been reported that approximately 250 million children are forced into child labor. The two regions with the worst forms of child labor are Asia and sub-Saharan Africa. Indeed, these two areas account for 90 percent of all forms of child labor, from working on the family farm to the hazardous industry sector. In sub-Saharan Africa, more than 40 percent of all youth between the ages of 5 and 14, or about 48 million children, work for survival. According to recent estimates by the United Nations, there are more than 34 million orphans in sub-Saharan Africa, indicating that many children are in danger



Mining "conflict minerals" wolframite and casserite in Kailo, Democratic Republic of the Congo. In sub-Saharan Africa, children work alongside their parents. In this mine, children help pan for ore and help carry and sell goods. Child labor remains widespread in many developing countries, where traditional attitudes in favor of its use and conditions of economic necessity are commonplace.

of being exploited as potential laborers. The Asia-Pacific region also shows high rates of child labor, with 122 million children between the ages of 5 and 14 compelled to work. Most of these children are employed by their parents on the family farm or enterprise, as opposed to outside factories or other industrial settings. Approximately 8 percent of children work in the latter.

Economic Causes of Child Labor in Developing Countries

As child labor is particularly prevalent in developing countries, it can be assumed to have a close association with the economic development of a nation. That child labor is negatively related to gross domestic product (GDP) per capita has been shown by Kaushik Basu, the chief economist of the World Bank, who demonstrated that a rise in national income relates to a proportional decrease in child labor. In fact, financially struggling parents often oppose laws prohibiting child labor, making enforcement difficult and costly in developing countries. Some parents in developing countries might need additional income from their children to survive extreme poverty, albeit at the expense of the short-term toll on children's health and long-term consequences to their education and career potential.

Parents' Attitudes on Child Labor

Even though the condition of extreme poverty plays an important role in maintaining child labor in developing countries, another crucial determinant of child labor is parents' attitude toward children in the household. Household survey data obtained from developing countries point to the importance of cultural and social factors in influencing child labor, including parents' educational attainment, household heads' religion, cost of education, balance of bargaining power between father and mother, and parents' attitudes toward child labor. The probability of child labor increases when parents display a lack of concern for their children's welfare and safety. Also, children from male-dominated households tend to work more than children from households where the mother has greater bargaining power. In general, whether due to cultural practices or religious norms, men in developing countries tend to have greater bargaining power than their female counterparts. Indeed, a household survey conducted in rural India suggests that a father's preference for child labor, in part, is predictive of whether or not a child works. Theoretical research on child labor is grounded in the general assumption that parents are altruistic, and that the reason for parents making their children work is solely concerned with the poverty level. However, recent empirical research and experiences from activists working to change the situation in developing countries indicate that, when it comes to implementing policies against child labor, changing parents' attitudes toward child labor is crucial.

Attitudes Toward Child Labor in Developed Countries

Up until the middle of the 20th century, child labor had been a persistent and serious problem in the Western world as well. The rapid economic growth spurred by the Industrial Revolution coupled with increasing concern for child welfare made it possible for developed countries to enact laws against the use of child labor. Attitudes toward child labor in developed countries are well reflected in initiatives to control child labor even though it is no longer a pressing issue: the two most notable examples are a consumer boycott and trade sanctions of imported goods "tainted" by child labor. A consumer boycott means that a consumer is willing to pay higher prices to buy "child labor–free" products, as goods produced though child labor often retail at lower prices because of the lower wages demanded by children. To maintain international labor standards and decrease child labor in developing countries, such consumer activism is popularly considered desirable because it does not call for government intervention.

However, due to the consumer boycott in the Western world, an adverse reaction that causes child labor to increase has been reported. Lower wages resulting from the consumer boycott mean that children will have to work more and harder to obtain the higher incomes needed to survive. Also, unless trade sanctions are complemented with alternative options for working children, restrictions on child labor could end up making some children worse off as they relocate to unaffected industrial sectors. Therefore, to curb child labor effectively, the use of consumer activism should be matched with alternative policies that afford more educational opportunities for children in developing countries. For example, in Latin America, a dramatic increase in primary school enrollment was achieved by designing and implementing the monetary reward program (e.g., the PROGRESA program in Mexico) to compensate for the loss of income when children go to school instead of work. Free school meals, supplies, health care, education vouchers, and even cash stipends were utilized.

Conclusion

To help children involved in hazardous and laborious work, numerous governments, NGOs, and individuals have developed measures and implemented policy to eliminate or reduce the harms of child labor. By understanding the importance of societal and parental attitudes in contributing to the continuation of child labor, and by working alongside relevant agencies, human service providers can assist in the eradication of child labor and associated harm.

Jeff Temple
Chorong Kim
Swathi Anantha
University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston

See Also: Children, Youth, and Human Trafficking; Fair Labor Standards Act; Poverty.

Further Readings

Basu, Kaushik. "Child Labor: Cause, Consequence, and Cure, With Remarks on International Labor Standards." Journal of Economic Literature, v.37/3 (1999).

Basu, Kaushik and Homa Zarghamee. "Is Product Boycott a Good Idea for Controlling Child Labor? A Theoretical Investigation." Journal of Development Economics, v.88 (2009).

Bhaskar, V. and Bishnupriya Gupta. "Parental Altruism and Child Labor: Examining the Historical Evidence From the United States." Cliometrica, v.6/3 (2012).

Grossmann, Harold and Jochen Michealist. "Trade Sanctions and the Incidence of Child Labor." Review of Development Economics, v.11/1 (2007).

International Labour Organization. "Child Labour." http://www.ilo.org/global/topics/child-labour/lang--en/index.htm#a3 (Accessed September 2013).

UNICEF. "Child Labor." http://www.unicef.org/protection/57929_58009.html (Accessed September 2013).

Child Protective Services

Children are the most vulnerable of all human beings, and the younger the child, the more vulnerable he/she is to child neglect and abuse, which federal law defines as a failure to protect children from death, serious physical or emotional harm, sexual abuse, or exploitation.

Children with special needs that result from disability, mental retardation, visual or hearing impairment, learning disabilities, physical disabilities, and behavioral problems are also particularly vulnerable to both neglect and abuse. Approximately half of all children in protective care have been removed from their homes because of neglect and abuse, and the other half are in protective care because of physical and medical conditions. In 1992, the Children's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) began maintaining the National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System. HHS is also responsible for maintaining the Child Welfare Information Gateway, a clearinghouse for information on child protection and child welfare. Protecting the lives of children and ensuring their safety becomes a priority for child protective service workers who are trained to identify children who may be neglected or abused. These professionals pay regular visits to homes on which reports have been made and to foster homes and residential facilities. The basic authority for this oversight of child welfare is derived from the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act of 1974 (CAPTA) and relevant state laws.

As long as states comply with federal requirements, they may apply for CAPTA funds to be used for prevention, assessment, investigation, prosecution, and treatment. CAPTA also offers funding to nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) dedicated to educating the public about child mistreatment. In general, state laws recognize four types of child mistreatment: physical abuse, sexual abuse, emotional abuse, and emotional neglect. A number of states also recognize educational and medical neglect as forms of child mistreatment. Those considered most closely responsible for protecting children include parents, guardians, relatives, foster parents, and caregivers. Other individuals who mistreat children are likely to be accused of violations of criminal law rather than child protection laws. Twenty-seven states require child protective service workers to notify law enforcement of suspected abuse by a nonfamily member or in the case of sexual abuse or severe physical injury.

Early History

Throughout most of history, patriarchal systems have dictated that male heads of households held virtually total authority over other members of their family. This authority gave them the right to use corporal punishment against children, adult females, and servants. Some societies even tolerated infanticide. By the late 15th century, this had begun to change in the more developed nations. In Britain, for instance, Parliament passed the Poor Law Act of 1601, giving government the right to separate girls under the age of 16 and boys under the age of 21 from their parents and place them in service. The Tenures Abolition Act of 1660 extended the rights of British nobles, giving landlords control of the property of minor children of tenants living on their property. The law also allowed fathers to appoint guardians for their own children, which meant that widows were vulnerable to losing control of their children and their children's property.

Since the law in the American colonies was generally based on British common law, both American and British courts often stepped in to protect the interests of children. Since it was assumed that children were not intended to be idle, children who became wards of the court were often placed in involuntary apprenticeships or in asylums alongside delinquents. The reform movement of the early-to-mid-19th century produced private institutions such as the New York House of Refuge, which received government funding to house orphans and delinquents. By 1850, reforms had resulted in the practice of moving children away from institutions and into foster homes outside large cities. In 1875, New York became the first state to enact child protection laws. Determining that poor immigrants were not fit to care for their own children, by 1879 the state had taken 48,000 children away from their parents in what was deemed their best interests. The 20th century ushered in a family preservation movement, and both federal and state laws were passed to protect children through mitigating conditions that led to mistreatment.

Twentieth Century

In the early 20th century, children began to be viewed as individuals with an inherent right to enjoy childhood. Mandatory education laws and the abolishment of child labor improved the quality of life for most children, but many were still vulnerable to mistreatment from those they looked to for protection. However, it was not until the 1970s that the issue of child neglect and abuse was placed on the public agenda. Investigations revealed that children in institutions, group homes, foster care, and day care were often at high risk for mistreatment. Within those settings, disabled children were twice as likely as other children to be neglected or abused.

In 1974, the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (CAPTA) was signed into law (P.L. 93-247) in response to "battered child syndrome" being identified as a valid medical condition. Before that time, state laws had focused on the mistreatment of children living with their own parents or guardians and virtually ignored the safety of those living in institutions and residential facilities. The National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect sponsored a comprehensive study that examined the vulnerability of children in such settings.

Congress amended CAPTA in 1984 to require states to investigate child mistreatment, report their findings to the federal government, and take corrective action. Since state funding and commitment to protecting children was inconsistent, results were mixed. CAPTA was again amended in 1988, 1992, 1996, and 2003. The 1996 amendment required states to submit a child protection plan to the federal government, detailing provisions, procedures, and programs designed to keep children safe. That same year, passage of the Protection and Advocacy for Mentally Ill Persons Act offered greater protection to mentally ill and emotionally disturbed children living in residential homes. Since 1997, HHS standards have dictated that in order to receive federal funds, states must ensure that the incidence rate of children mistreated by foster parents and facility staff members is no higher than 57 percent.

A series of court cases throughout the 20th century solidified the right of children to be protected. From the early to mid-1980s, the focus was on removing children from homes where they had been mistreated. This often meant putting mistreated children up for adoption, and Congress passed the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act in 1980 and the Adoption and Safe Families Act in 1997. However, Santosky v. Kramer (455 U.S. 745, 1982) placed the burden of proof on states before parental rights could be permanently terminated. States receiving federal aid for child protective services are required to enact laws that are consistent with federal laws. Efforts to preserve families led to the passage of Family Preservation and Support Program of 1993 and the Keeping Families Safe Act of 2003.

Twenty-First-Century Data

In 2009, data from the National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System indicated that some 36 million reports of abuse and neglect had been recorded, and 905,000 had been classified as neglect. Seventy percent of these children lived with one or both parents. In 10 percent of the cases, the mistreatment was perpetrated by a foster parent, legal guardian, unmarried partner, day care staff, or residential staff member.

In 2010, 78.3 percent (538,557) of cases reported to child protective services involved neglect, 17.6 percent (121,380) involved physical abuse, 9.2 percent (63,527) involved sexual abuse, 8.1 percent (55,405) involved psychological maltreatment, 2.4 percent (16,209) involved medical neglect, and 10.6 percent (72,910) fell outside these categories or were unknown. In 81.3 percent (578,821) of the cases, the person who mistreated a child was a parent. Thirty-four percent of the mistreated children were from birth to 3 years old. In most cases, child mistreatment is first recognized by professionals. In 2010, 57 percent of all reports of child mistreatment originated with teachers, law enforcement, legal personnel, and social service workers. Other cases were reported by parents, neighbors, friends, or other relatives. Of 3.3 million reports in 2010, only 19 percent of the cases were substantiated. Child protective service workers responded to substantiated reports of child mistreatment by monitoring families within their homes or removing the child/children from the home. In 2010, 229,000 children were placed in foster care. That same year, 1,537 children died from neglect or abuse.

In 2011, there were approximately 3.4 million reported cases of children being mistreated, and 60.8 percent of those were screened. Three-fifths of the reports had been filed by professionals such as teachers, police officers, lawyers, and social services workers. The highest rate of mistreatment was among children from birth to 1 year old, with a rate of 21.2 percent per 1,000 of that population. Almost 79 percent of the cases of mistreatment involved neglect, 17.6 percent involved physical abuse, and 9.1 percent involved sexual abuse. There were 1,545 fatalities among mistreated children in 2011, and 81.6 percent of the victims were under 4 years of age. In more than 78 percent of the cases, the perpetrator was a parent, and 88 percent of those were biological parents. Eighty-five percent of these parents were between the ages of 20 and 49, and more than half were female. Also in 2011, Congress passed the Child and Family Services Improvement and Innovation Act, which amended the Social Security Act and provided continued funding for the Child and Family Services Program.

Current Status

As a result of national and state cooperation, the Office of Justice Programs of the U.S. Department of Justice partnered with the National Center for State Courts, the American Bar Association, and the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges to produce the Court Performance Measures in Child Abuse and Neglect Cases Toolkit in 2004 as a means of improving courts' responses to cases involving the mistreatment of children. In 2005, 2007, and 2009, the National Center for State Courts and private organizations sponsored the Judicial Child Protection Summits, where state officials and judicial leaders met to develop plans for working with parents and children in individual court cases and creating state judicial commissions devoted to protecting children. Using grants from the Children's Bureau, states are now able to promote stability through foster care.

The fact that children are still being neglected and abused despite all efforts to protect them makes it clear that children will continue to be vulnerable to the people who are supposed to love them and keep them safe. Child protection services workers are often blamed for returning children to dysfunctional homes after they have been removed as a result of mistreatment. However, they are often bound by state laws that emphasize family reunification. Most child protective service caseworkers are underpaid and overworked, and worker burnout is common. Many states prefer dedicating resources to other avenues, since children are not able to vote. Experts suggest that caseworkers should have greater flexibility in serving the best interests of children to whom they are assigned because they are the ones with firsthand knowledge of individual cases.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act; Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Child Welfare Services; Children With Special Needs.

Further Readings

Abramowicz, Sarah. "English Child Custody Law, 1660–1839: The Origins of Judicial Intervention in Paternal Custody." Columbia Law Review, v.90 (1999).

Adams, Harry William. Justice for Children: Autonomy, Development and the State. New York: State University of New York Press, 2008.

Childwelfare.gov. "Major Federal Legislation Concerned With Child Protection, Child Welfare, and Adoption." https://www.childwelfare.gov/pubs/otherpubs/majorfedlegis.cfm (Accessed November 2013).

Fox, Sanford J. "Juvenile Justice Reform: An Historical Perspective." Stanford Law Review, v.22 (1970).

Overcamp-Martini, Mary and Jennifer Nutton. "CAPTA and the Residential Placement: A Survey of State Policy and Practice." Child and Youth Care Forum, v.38/2 (April 2009).

Radha, Jaqannathan and Michael J. Camasso. Protecting Children in the Age of Outrage: A New Perspective on Child Protective Services Reform. New York: Oxford University Press, 2013.

Richardson, Tom I. and Marsha V. Williams, eds. Child Abuse and Violence. New York: Nova Biomedical Books, 2008.

Samuels, Bryan. "Breaking the Silence: Protection, Prevention, Intervention, and Deterrence." http://www.hhs.gov/asl/testify/2011/12/t20111213a.html (Accessed November 2013).

Tali, Gal. Child Victims and Restorative Justice: A Needs–Rights Model. New York: Oxford University Press, 2011.

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "Child Maltreatment 2010—Data Tables." http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/resource/child-maltreatment-2010-data-tables (Accessed November 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "Child Mistreatment 2011." http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/resource/child-maltreatment-2011 (Accessed November 2013).

Wade, Jim, et al. Caring for Abused and Neglected Children: Making the Right Decisions for Reunification of Long-Term Care. Philadelphia: Jessica Kingsley, 2011.

Wesley, William. "Child Protective Services—Historical Overview, Current System." http://education.stateuniversity.com/pages/1828/Child-Protective-Services.html (Accessed November 2013).

Child Support Agencies and Services

A child support agency is a government establishment intended to promote parental responsibility of custodial and noncustodial parents. Each year, approximately 17 million children are served by child support agencies within the United States. The purpose of this article is to explore the historical origin and present-day functioning of child support agencies and services.

History

In 1975, Congress began the federal child support program to reduce public expenditures on welfare, to pay back benefits from the government's welfare program, and to reduce the need for welfare assistance. In 1996, Congress changed the program as part of the new welfare reform laws to expand the inclusion of technology and increase the certainty that children are the direct recipients of paid parental support. It has since emerged to be a family support program providing a variety of prevention and intervention services. The federal Office of Child Support Enforcement (OCSE) is the government entity that oversees the child support program. OCSE does not provide services directly to families, but families receive services from state, tribal, and local support agencies. A majority of states work with prosecuting attorneys, law enforcement agencies, and officials of family or domestic relation courts to carry out the program at the local level.

Administration of Services

The Office of Child Support Enforcement helps child support agencies to develop, manage, and operate their programs effectively and according to federal law. Services are administered through a variety of initiatives to include financial support of child support program operations, providing grants for state visitation programs, providing policy guidance and technical assistance, conducting audits and educational programs, supporting research and program improvement, operating the Federal Parent Locator Service and the National Directory of New Hires, working with states to provide limited enforcement services, working with employers and other private and public partners, and helping with intergovernmental child support cases. The OCSE requires that child support programs provide supportive services for both welfare and non-welfare families and requires the states to publicize information about available services.

Child support programs are run by each state and/or tribal community. Despite variance from state to state, the federal government plays a key role in the design features of state programs. Services are available to all parents who need them. Functions of state and tribal child support programs include locating noncustodial parents, establishing paternity, establishing and enforcing support orders, modifying orders when appropriate, collecting and distributing child support payments, and referring parents to other services. The actual establishment and enforcement of child support orders are handled by local family and domestic courts and administrative agencies. Other issues that may exist between parents, such as property settlement, custody, and access to children, are not handled by the child support program but by local courts.

More than 17 million U.S. children receive services from child support service agencies. Functions of state and tribal child support programs include locating noncustodial parents.

Method of Operation

There are certain methods of operation that child support programs use to ensure children receive the support they need. In order to have appropriate access to information, the federal government operates location services that include the Federal Parent Locator Service, the Federal Case Registry, and the National Directory of New Hires. These entities are not only used to locate noncustodial parents but are available for noncustodial parents whose children have been hidden from them in violation of a custody or visitation order. If necessary, state and tribal child support programs will provide paternity and/or genetic testing to establish parentage.

Population Served

Any parent or person with custody of a child who needs help to establish child support and/or medical support or to collect support payments can apply for child support services. Those who receive assistance under the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF), Medicaid, and federally assisted foster care programs are automatically referred for child support services free of charge. For all others seeking child support services, a fee of up to $25 may be charged, although some states waive all or part of the fee or collect payment from the noncustodial parent. Either parent can receive help to have a child support order reviewed every three years or whenever there is a substantial change in circumstances to ensure that orders remain fair. Child support caseloads are driven by the increasing number of children born to unmarried parents, which is nearly half of all births.

Demographics of Child Support Services

The Office of Child Support Enforcement (OCSE) collects little information concerning demographic and economic characteristics of those who utilize services but instead works in conjunction with the U.S. Census Bureau to collect this type of data. The "2010 Census Survey Report" indicated that a majority of custodial families utilize child support services. Moreover, females overwhelmingly maintain the majority of custodial families, making up nearly 90 percent of all families receiving services. Parents who were never married, separated, black, Hispanic, had less than a high school education, had one child, or were high school graduates had child support awards or agreement rates of approximately 45 percent. Furthermore, custodial parents who were either non-Hispanic white, divorced, married, had some college education, had at least a bachelor's degree, or lived with two or more children from an absent parent had slightly higher child support awards or agreements of approximately 55 to 60 percent. Considering specifically economic characteristics, approximately 36 percent of families who utilized child support services were poor, and nearly half were 150 percent below the poverty line.

Services

To improve the reliability of child support payments, child support programs utilize family-centered strategies—economic stability, health care coverage, family violence collaboration, healthy family relationships, engagement of fathers from birth, and child support prevention. The child support program helps noncustodial parents find and keep work, and may connect custodial and noncustodial parents to resources that help them achieve and maintain economic stability. The program assists with the establishment and enforcement of private health insurance or public health care coverage requirements against either or both parents; the establishment and enforcement of cash payments by either parent to fund premiums, copayments, and extraordinary or uncovered medical expenses; and cash payments for Medicaid cost reimbursement.

The child support program has played a critical role in supporting healthy marriage and couples skill-building programs by using a variety of strategies to promote healthy marriages, teaching skills that help parents work together to successfully manage conflicts and challenges. They intentionally seek to engage fathers from birth by operating in-hospital paternity establishment programs to ensure that every child has a legal father and has the same rights and privileges as children born to married parents. The child support program can also partner with programs designed to engage fathers during pregnancy and at the birth of the child, conduct outreach, and work closely with other community-based programs that promote father involvement.

The most ideal situation for parents and children is prevention of services. In order to prevent the need for services, child support programs often partner with middle and high schools, fatherhood programs, and pregnancy prevention programs to reach young people through educational tactics. Child support education explores the financial, legal, and emotional responsibilities of having children outside marriage and may be combined with programs on related issues, such as reducing teen or unplanned pregnancies, preventing family violence, teaching parenting skills, and helping teen parents improve their relationship skills. Similar strategies are used to reduce the risk of family violence and help family violence survivors pursue child support safely.

Kaprea F. Johnson
Mary Sanderfer
Old Dominion University

See Also: Adoption Agencies and Services; American Academy of Social Work and Social Welfare; Child Welfare League of America; Child Welfare Services; Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Family Planning Services; Family Preservation Services; Family Services.

Further Readings

Almanac of Policy Issues. "Child Support Enforcement Program." http://www.policyalmanac.org/social_welfare/archive/child_support_01.shtml (Accessed August 2013).

Gopalan, G., et al. "Multiple Family Groups: An Engaging Intervention for Child Welfare–Involved Families." Child Welfare, v.90/4 (2011).

Grall, T. S. "Custodial Mothers and Fathers and Their Child Support: 2009: Current Populations Report." Washington, DC: U.S. Census Bureau, 2011.

Greenberg, D. and P. K. Robins. "How Welfare to Work Programs Improved Over Time In Putting Welfare Recepients to Work." Industrial and Labor Relations Review, v.64/5 (2011).

Office of Child Support Enforcement. "Child Support Handbook." https://www.acf.hhs.gov/sites/default/files/programs/css/child_support_handbook_with_toc.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Child Welfare League of America

The Child Welfare League of America (CWLA) is an agency with a nearly 100-year history of advocating for the rights of children, whose age and legal status make them vulnerable members of U.S. society. While CWLA has maintained the core of its purpose, the agency's structure and activities have expanded and changed over time, along with the changing landscape of the U.S. child welfare system. In its work to advance best practice standards in the field, CWLA has encountered many intersections and divides in attempting to reconcile the best interests of children and the concerns of a diverse American population.

CWLA in the Beginning

Prior to 1920, the year the CWLA was established, the nation's child welfare efforts were led largely by local, private charitable organizations. These organizations, including religion-based orphanages and almshouses, children's aid societies (CSAs), and societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals (SPCAs), varied vastly in their approaches to the protection and care of children in need.

For example, many of the orphanages and almshouses viewed their purpose as the need to reform and discipline children separated from their families. Concerned about the treatment of children in these institutions, children's aid societies began using a substitute family model of caring for children. This model closely resembled the modern foster care system in that children whose biological families were not allowed or not able to care for them were placed in private homes, rather than residential facilities. However, a mainstay of this system was the idea that these children should be moved out of urban centers into rural areas, leading to the practice of relocating children far from their home communities, sometimes across the country.

It wasn't long before concerns about this type of child fostering arose, with some child advocates questioning whether children needed to be removed from their families of origin. Many advocates began bringing to light the fact that many children were removed simply because their parents were extremely poor and lacked adequate resources and support to safely care for their own children. These advocates found comrades in animal rights advocates. In fact, SPCAs in cities like Boston and Cleveland became important child protection agencies in the early U.S. child welfare system. Workers began applying preventative methods to the protection of children that were similar to those they'd been using with animals. They employed the approach of offering case management services to children and their parents to prevent the need for an out-of-home placement.

As the federal government started to recognize the problems of poverty, abuse, and neglect and began to take a more active role in both prevention and intervention in families, government officials began bringing together representatives from the vast array of child service agencies for forums to discuss major issues in the field. It was during the first White House Conference on the Care of Dependent Children in 1909 and subsequent conferences that a need for unifying standards of care across agencies was recognized and the roots of the CWLA were established.

Initially made up of 68 member agencies and seven paid staff members, CWLA structured itself so as to set standards that were entirely voluntary and to become a central resource for information on best practices in child welfare. As such, besides adopting the first written Standards of Excellence focused primarily on foster care, the agency also began publishing one of the nation's first scholarly journals concerned with disseminating research on children's issues, Child Welfare, and providing training programs to member agency staff.

It was also not long after the agency's inception that it found the need to become intimately involved with the specific welfare of immigrant children, who made up a significant portion of the population of poor children. While CWLA was instrumental at the time in campaigns to find adoptive homes for these children, the Western European makeup of the immigrant population and the purview limits of the Standards of Excellence kept the agency from having to take a formal stand on controversial issues, like racial matching versus transracial adoption, until later in its history.

Later History

In the mid-20th century, CWLA found itself straddling controversy, taking actions that represented different extremes in the debate among child advocates on the cross-cultural raising of children. On one hand, the agency participated in an experiment with the U.S. Children's Bureau, which eventually affected over 600 Native American children who were removed from their tribes and adopted by non-Indian families—an action that later prompted CWLA to formally apologize to tribal organizations. On the other hand, in the 1958 revision of the Standards of Excellence, matching the racial background of a child freed for adoption to the racial background of a prospective adoptive family was promoted as a best practice.

CWLA Today

Today, the published mission of the now 800-member organization remains consistent with its historical roots. Yet, the activities of this complex organization have expanded dramatically, and CWLA's positions on issues related to diversity have become explicit. CWLA continues to update and expand the Standards of Excellence, now reaching beyond foster care into 12 other child welfare practice areas, including, but not limited to, adoption, child care, health care, administration, and independent living. In addition, Child Welfare continues to be a leading research journal in the field, and the agency continues to be a major provider of worker training and education through conferences, technical assistance, and consultation.

In addition, CWLA is now well known for both its legislative advocacy efforts and its role as the hub for collection and analysis of data about the child welfare system. These two present-day activities have helped establish a more clear position of the agency in the ongoing concerns related to the confluence of culture and child welfare. CWLA now issues data reports and policy statements and provides congressional testimony on a wide range of topics, including disproportionality and disparity of outcomes for children of color in child welfare, same-sex parenting and adoption, the needs of LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer) children in care, Native American child welfare, and immigration and deportation policy.

Abigail Kauffman Wyche
Northern Michigan University

See Also: Adoption Agencies and Services; Case Management Services; Child Welfare Services; Children in Foster Care; Indian Child Welfare Act; Multiethnic Placement Act of 1994; Protective Services for Children.

Further Readings

The Adoption History Project. "Transracial Adoptions." http://pages.uoregon.edu/adoption/topics/transracialadoption.htm (Accessed July 2013)

Child Welfare League of America. "Statement: Children of Color in the Child Welfare System." http://www.cwla.org/programs/culture/disproportionatestatement.pdf (Accessed July 2013)

Child Welfare Services

Since the establishment of the U.S. Children's Bureau in 1912, the federal government has maintained interest in child welfare services and responsibility for the safety, stability, and well-being of the nation's children. While hardly without controversy or debate in shaping priorities, federal and state interests in children are multipronged, including maltreatment investigation, advocacy, research (and data collection), policy and procedure setting, workforce preparation, system maintenance, and service coordination.

Few experts would argue against the notion that the child welfare system evolved along a series of pendulum swings involving best interests, (e.g., of the child, parents, and the family), sources of funding (and control namely, state versus federal responsibility), and legislative provisions that extended beyond child welfare and instead were more inclusive of the welfare of the child. Today, child welfare is challenged to balance a desire to preserve families that often includes keeping children in the home and in their communities. When not deemed safe, the call for services becomes drawn to the need to develop substitute care to accommodate the multiple and complex health, mental health, and educational needs of these children and their families. The ultimate goal is to restore the children to long-term, permanent care, inclusive of adoption or permanent placements that best prepare them, as most families prepare their children, for lifelong personal responsibility and responsible civic engagement. Much of the controversy about the child welfare system has focused on the overwhelming number of children of color entering its services. More than half of maltreated children in out-of-home care are nonwhite, which represents a sizeable change in the composition of children placed in foster care during the late 20th century and early 21st century. Today, with the steady wave of immigrant families seeking refuge in the United States, increasing poverty and associated risk factors of parental stress and child vulnerability to neglect and abuse, and constant displacement and disruption in affordable living among racial and ethnic minority families, child welfare and human services overall are overwhelmed and underfunded.

Concepts like overrepresentation, disproportionality, and disparities have emerged to characterize the landscape of child welfare, all the while evidencing discriminatory practices that differentiate child welfare treatment along racial and ethnic minority lines when compared to white children. "Overrepresentation" denotes that a particular group of children constitutes a larger proportion in the child welfare system than it does in the general population. "Disproportionality" characterizes a situation in which a particular racial or ethnic group of children constitutes a higher percentage of those in foster care than other racial or ethnic groups. The terms disproportionate treatment and disparities refer to disparate or inequitable treatment or patterns of service utilization (e.g., in terms of types, quality, availability, and accessibility of services at various decision points). Disparity comparisons are usually made between children of color and similarly situated white children. All told, child welfare has demonstrated a limited capacity to redress the growing number of children of color who are essentially raised by government systems independent of their own families.

Social Justice Perspective

The need for child welfare services has evolved around four forces—social justice, culture, systemic practices, and research (i.e., accountability). A social justice perspective brings into the center of the discussion the very real social concern about the disproportionate number of children of color vulnerable to harm, instability, and insecurity. Social victimization has readily been attributed to negative neighborhood effects, high crime, and exposure to interpersonal and community violence, drugs, crime, and so on that undermine the foundation upon which all children thrive—safety, trust, support, and hope. Child welfare services are fundamentally aimed at restoring these foundational pillars without which no child can survive.

Linked to this discussion are durable inequalities, almost exclusive to families of color that prevent their social and economic mobility. The long-standing achievement gap remains a serious impediment to basic social welfare. The social consequences accompanied by poverty, inadequate access to resources, and the like have strong correlates to child maltreatment. A social justice perspective, within the context of unequal distribution of power (and privilege), draws attention to an ongoing societal racialization that has historically disadvantaged some and advantaged others in ways separate from but intersecting with class and other social identities. A social justice perspective argues that the overrepresentation of children of color quite possibly reflects social barriers and obstacles that impair parents' ability to raise their children in a home and neighborhood environment free from the imposition of stress and strain that interferes with their efforts to develop and maintain a nurturing environment.

As the need for public assistance increases, so, too, does the likelihood that dependent families increase the scrutiny and intrusion that goes along with asking for help. In this sense, child welfare services are an unanticipated consequence of general helping that allows access into the homes of the most vulnerable, perhaps fostering perceptions of need.

Cultural Perspective

A cultural perspective challenges the field of child welfare to consider the parenting practices of families of color not as pathological child caring, but as some combination of best cultural intentions and culturally specific safeguards against being consumed by other social control forces. For example, parenting practices that do not conform to mainstream child-rearing practices are often consistent with values, beliefs, and attitudes unique to culturally different families. These families may further implement disciplinary practices targeted at safeguarding their children from either cultural assimilation or engaging in behaviors inconsistent with their cultural upbringing and for which there are even harsher social consequences. For cultures that are impassioned by their family bonding, it is hard to imagine a worse consequence than to lose a member to social forces that are perceived as adversarial, prejudiced, and operating outside their control. Overall concerns have been repeatedly expressed about the lack of appreciation of cultural differences in expressions, family decision making, and distributing consequences for breaches in cultural expectations.

A cultural perspective argues that child welfare services must promote more open discussions about differential parenting responses that may be embedded in cultural beliefs. More open dialogue with families about their cultural views on discipline is argued to engage families more in the helping process, reshape perceptions of cultural practices that might otherwise be misperceived as abusive or neglectful, and ultimately promote relevant services that are applicable to the families receiving these services. A cultural humility perspective is called for to support the consideration that if families are seriously considered as having an essential role in raising their children, then workers must weigh more heavily the power imbalance imposed on such families, especially in regard to cultural matters about which these families are far more knowledgeable. Engaging families can also serve to educate the child welfare workforce about the cultural values and beliefs parents hold regarding child raising.

Issues of Concern

Child welfare system responses themselves have, since their inception, warranted attention from initial reporting through to the eventual case closing and beyond. Concerns raised in the literature call on research to better understand ambiguities in assessment, maltreatment substantiation, and decision making about who to remove or leave in their own home. The child welfare "system," other systems, larger policy enactment, agency procedures, and caseworker decision making have also garnered extensive attention in discussions of discrepancies in child welfare practices, particularly when focused on children of color. System-response concerns include differential criteria for maltreatment substantiation, rationale for placement of children of color outside the home and into less desirable environments, differential duration of out-of-home placement, differential referral to the juvenile justice system for behavioral problems, referral to inadequate public-sector social services rather than utilizing private-sector agencies, and lack of in-home or other support services.

In terms of service delivery, concerns have been raised about the range and quality of services, service availability and accessibility, and ongoing support and resources for families living in their own communities, designed to prevent further child maltreatment. Additional challenges include the low number of adoptive homes and other permanency options; older youth aging out of the system without adequate preparation, life skills, or resources to sustain themselves; high need for special services; and other barriers and obstacles that maintain children in the child welfare system of care.

Child welfare services are further complicated by large caseload size and inefficiency in caseload management, high caseworker turnover, caseworker bias, insufficient professional training, systemic assumptions governing caseworker-family matches, lack of linguistically proficient staff, poor or nonexistent interpreter services, and inaccessibility of other health and human services (e.g., substance abuse treatment). Social policies favoring placement rather than family preservation, promoting termination of parental rights over reunification, and sanctioning financial incentives for nonkinship rather than kinship connections reflect larger, institutional forces that complicate a holistic understanding of child welfare services and their limitations.

Quality of Research

The quality of research sheds additional light on the number of children of color receiving child welfare services. Critiques about child welfare research focus on the low quality of data, nonexistence of data, limited geographical scope of studies, lack of comprehensive nationwide studies, ambiguous findings, methodological differences in measures and units of analyses, combining different sources of data (i.e., mixing findings from administrative or cross-sectional data with longitudinal data), insufficient population size, and inadequate analytic strategies. The use of race as a categorical variable rather than considering racial and cultural meanings associated with race (or ethnicity) is problematic. Viewing children of color, in general, as homogeneous groups is in itself problematic because generic race or ethnicity categories fail to differentiate these children according to ancestry, language, geographic region, economic and immigrant status, generation, and other important sociodemographic characteristics. Moreover, in many state and national reports, categorizing racial and ethnic minority children ignores the increasingly biracial and multiracial ancestry of these groups of children. This lack of clarity and relative diffusion pose a serious challenge to the child welfare system's ability to accurately count and account for the growing number of racial and ethnic minority children in its care.

In terms of maltreatment definitions, the lack of common definitions across states compromises a fuller appreciation of national data since the metrics for operationalizing child maltreatment types differs. Finally, concerns regarding data reporting, summarizing, and outcome dissemination focus on assumptions about within-group differences of racial and ethnic groups, lack of acknowledgement of variation of family contextual functioning, failure to account for race or ethnic-specific dynamics (e.g., recentness of migration and geographic location), culturally and linguistically biased data collection instruments, and other problems that have been leveled to either discredit or deem suspect causal explanations and implicit assumptions about race.

As funding remains scarce, more and more intersystem efforts are underway inclusive of child welfare, juvenile justice, mental health, health, and education. This joining is not without additional complications since tracking procedures, data management, constituencies needing specific information, and the like greatly influence what data is reported and for what purposes.

Conclusion

Child welfare service challenges are clearly multiple and difficult to disentangle. Few experts would disagree that there needs to be an alignment of the multiple, intersecting perspectives about child welfare. The cumulative effects of disadvantage, cultural influences, systemic assumptions and possibly capricious decision making among service providers, and research challenges are all implicated as barriers to change in a system that has far-reaching importance in the lives of children in need. It is likely that the future will hold even more complications in terms of child welfare needs as human trafficking, cyberpredation, the reduction of sexual mores that increasingly expose children to vulnerable social situations, immigrant children, and so on must all become part of the anticipated change in service needs with greater implications for relevant service delivery.

Child welfare services is called on to engage in a more comprehensive approach that is more inclusive of the child and family voices upon whom these services are applied. Clearly, services inclusive of a focus on the welfare of the child that engage the multiple child service constituencies have far more value to family preservation than current efforts that arise only when families are in trouble. The true test of the nation's commitment to children and families will be in efforts to undertake the kinds of reforms that encompass the foundational pillars of safety, trust, support, and hope of all children, and when any of these pillars are breached, serious efforts are undertaken to restore these pillars—to restore these children and families as a public commitment and promise.

Robert M. Ortega
University of Michigan School of Social Work

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services, Overview; At-Risk Youth Services; Biracial Children; Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths; Child Support Agencies and Services; Child Welfare League of America; Children, Youth, and Human Trafficking; Children in Foster Care; Children of Incarcerated Parents; Children of Substance Abusers; Children of Undocumented Aliens; Children With Special Needs; Children, Youth, and Human Trafficking; Kinship Care; Kinship Care, Cultural Aspects of; Mental Health Services, Children; Protective Services for Children.

Further Readings

Denby, Ramona and Carla M. Curtis. African American Children and Families in Child Welfare: Cultural Adaptation of Services. New York: Columbia University Press, 2013.

Pecora, Peter J., et al. The Child Welfare Challenge: Policy, Practice, and Research. Chicago: Aldine Transaction, 2009.

Webb, M .B., K. Dowd, Harden B. Jones, J. Landsverk, and M. F. Testa. Child Welfare and Child Well-Being: New Perspectives from the National Study of Child and Adolescent Well-Being. New York: Oxford University Press, 2010.

Childhood Trauma

It is estimated that in 2011, around 676,000 children were victims of abuse and neglect. Of this number, approximately 21percent of the children were African American, 22 percent were Hispanic, and 43 percent were white. Moreover, 26 percent of children in the United States will either experience or witness a traumatic event before they reach the age of 4, according to the National Center for Mental Health Promotion and Youth Violence Prevention. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention conducted a study that revealed a link between childhood trauma and adult onset of mental illness, violence, and chronic onset. Childhood represents a significant period of development because it is the time children learn how to cope and receive guidance and nurturing from their parents or guardians. Children represent the population at the highest risk for being impacted by trauma, especially trauma occurring sometime during childhood. The topic of childhood trauma has largely been neglected in the literature, thus making the understanding of how children are impacted across their development largely unstudied. When trauma occurs in childhood, problems or behaviors that manifest are due to the traumatized child attempting to alleviate their distress.

Though many children have stressful experiences in childhood, such as a death of a loved one or divorce, these experiences are not considered traumatic in nature. "Trauma" is defined as an event that is sudden or unexpected that poses a threat to the child's life or body integrity and gives the child the feeling of intense terror, horror, and/or helplessness. Examples of childhood trauma include but are not limited to child sexual abuse, physical domestic abuse, neglect, natural disasters, man-made disasters, and life-threatening illness. Whether a child will have difficulty adjusting following trauma is dependent on the child's developmental level, ability to cope and foster resiliency, sources of familial support, social support, and environmental support.

Trauma Impact and Symptomology

All children process traumatic events differently; thus, each child presents a unique set of symptomology in reaction to that trauma. A child can be stunted in their developmental stage and unable to transition into adulthood, while another child can transition into adulthood with minimal manifested symptomology. Factors that determine how a child mitigates the effects of childhood trauma are the emotional, social, and physical resources that are available to the child. Another factor that determines how children process traumatic events is their parents' reaction to the traumatic event. If the parents are coping well (i.e., good coping skills and resilient behaviors) the child is more likely to model that behavior and develop coping skills and resilient behaviors.

Trauma symptomology encompasses the behavioral, physical, emotional, and cognitive difficulties that manifest for the child following the traumatic experience. Some children after traumatic experiences may begin to see themselves, their surrounding environment, and the people in their environment differently. Children who have experienced traumatic events sometimes exhibit a fear of being separated from their primary caregiver, clinginess, loss of previously accomplished developmental skills, and sexualized behaviors that are not age appropriate. Affective symptomology includes depression, fear, anger, and mood changes. Behavioral symptomology includes avoidance, modeling, aggression, and destructive behaviors. Some cognitive symptoms include distorted cognitions and irrational beliefs.

Post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) is also associated with childhood trauma. Symptomology occurs in three clusters: reexperiencing, avoidance, and hyperarousal. Reexperiencing involves having intrusive thoughts or dreams about the traumatic event. Oftentimes the reexperiencing is expressed by children by reenacting the traumatic event via play or experiencing psychological distress when exposed to reminders of the traumatic event. Avoidance behaviors and emotional numbing refers to the child avoiding situations, people, and places that are reminders of the traumatic event. The child can present detachment and a flat affect that speaks to the emotional numbing that can occur following a traumatic event. Hyperarousal symptomology associated with PTSD includes angry outbursts, irritability, startle reaction, hypervigilance, and sleep disturbance.

Resilience as a Factor

Some children after experiencing a traumatic event are resilient and are able to lessen the development of any long-term effects of childhood trauma.

Resilience refers to a child's ability to positively cope despite the trauma. In order to be deemed resilient, the child has to have been exposed to a significant traumatic event and have a positive outlook and coping skills in spite of the trauma. Factors that determine whether a child develops resiliency include a strong support system, the parent–child relationship, the child's temperament, and the child's cognitive ability.

Treatment

Common treatment strategies for childhood trauma include cognitive behavioral therapy, expressive therapy, narrative therapy, trauma-focused therapies, and psycho-educational treatments. Treatment of childhood trauma requires that mental health professionals remain cognizant that children must be conceptualized within the social, contextual, and familial systems in which they live. Additionally, clinicians must be mindful that each child experiences trauma and its related stressors differently, thus the treatment provided must be tailored to the specific child. It is imperative that clinicians treating childhood trauma be aware of any cultural bias they might bring in therapy selection, assessments, and interventions to ensure that they are using therapy and techniques that are most beneficial to the child to whom they are providing treatment. Children impacted by traumatic events should not be looked at as if they will always be impacted by the stressors caused by the trauma, but rather that there are ways to lend support to aid in managing and overcoming the traumatic stressors.

Culturally Responsive Services

In order to work effectively with diverse children populations impacted by trauma, it is imperative those providing services operate through a culturally responsive lens. Helping professionals must take into account the role of culture, family, race, and ethnicity in the child's coping mechanisms following the traumatic event. To provide interventions to which the child is responsive, it is also important to incorporate the child's culture, family, and all the systems of which the child is a part when selecting the best treatment options and understanding the issues that arise following the traumatic event.

Kimberly N. Frazier
Texas A&M University–Corpus Christi

See Also: Abuse and Neglect; Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Domestic Violence, Victims of; Trauma-Focused Services.

Further Readings

Centers for Disease Control. http://www.cdc.gov (Accessed January 2014).
Cohen, J., A. Mannario, and E. Deblinger. Treating Trauma and Traumatic Grief in Children and Adolescents. New York: Guilford Press, 2006.
De Young, A., J. Kenardy, and V. Cobham. "Trauma in Early Childhood: A Neglected Population." Clinical Child and Family Psychology Review, v.14 (2011).
Ferrara, F. Childhood Sexual Abuse: Developmental Effects Across the Lifespan. Pacific Grove, CA: Brooks/Cole (2002).
Finkelhor, David, Heather Turner, Richard Ormrod, Sherry Hamby, and Kristen Kracke. "Children's Exposure to Violence, a Comprehensive National Survey." Office of Justice Programs Juvenile Justice Bulletin (October 2009). https://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/ojjdp/227744.pdf (Accessed January 2014).
Gill, E. Helping Abused and Traumatized Children: Integrating Directive and Non-Directive Approaches. New York: Guildford Press, 2006.
Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. http://www.samhsa.gov (Accessed January 2014).
U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. http://www.hhs.gov (Accessed January 2014).

Children, International Variations in Attitudes Toward

Several theories refer to global, cultural, and socioeconomic conditions among the critical causes responsible for the international variations in people's attitudes toward children. Factors leading to comparable or diverse patterns of attitudes on this subject include such variables as gender, age, marital status, education, employment, and religiosity. Furthermore, the essential role of the family is generally recognized as the prime factor fostering positive or negative attitudes.

Positive attitudes toward children indicate that children are not only a source of joy, but also essential (central) to people's cultural, social, emotional, and economic lives. People who have children are generally considered happier than childless people. People with negative attitudes view children as problematic or as noncentral to their lives (e.g., a drain on economic resources or difficult to find time for within busy work environments and responsibilities).

Using material from a study conducted in 1988 of six European countries (Austria, Great Britain, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, and the former West Germany), researchers found that Europeans do not share common attitudes toward children. Within these countries, however, three characteristics were identified as being related to positive attitudes: traditional attitudes toward women's roles, lower levels of education, and the joint experiences of marriage and parenthood. There are some variations across nations in the overall level of support for the centrality of children. For example, while Italians and Austrians held the most favorable attitudes toward children, Dutch respondents showed the least favorable attitudes. The responses for West Germany, Ireland, and Great Britain fell somewhere in between these opposing attitudes.

Regarding gender, women held stronger beliefs than men in considering children as essential or central to their lives. Concerning marital status, although married people with children, regardless of gender, exhibited more favorable attitudes toward the centrality of children than never-married, childless people, there were certain variations in the six European countries. For example, in only two countries, Ireland and the Netherlands, did persons who were married with children and those who were married without children express higher levels of support than never-married, childless respondents.

However, marriage did not affect individual orientations toward children in Austria, Great Britain, Italy, and West Germany. On the other hand, the lack of religious orientation had a negative impact on attitudes toward the centrality of children in all six countries. For example, in Great Britain, Italy, and the Netherlands, individuals who did not adhere to any religion were significantly less likely to view children as central than persons who identified with a specific religion.

Studies dealing with attitudes toward children in seven eastern European countries divided the countries into three groups, with the former East Germany being the most egalitarian country, Bulgaria and Hungary being the most traditional societies, and Poland, Slovenia, Russia, and Czech Republic falling on the continuum between them. In these studies, people who had traditional views about family and gender roles, and who considered marriage as being important for their happiness and security, held positive attitudes toward children and viewed them as being a central part of their lives. These studies pointed out that Bulgarians and Hungarians have the most traditional and favorable attitudes toward children, while former East Germans and Russians view children less favorably than people in the other countries being studied. It is interesting to note that traditional attitudes toward children in eastern Europe are similar to those in two southern European countries, Greece and Italy.

Results from another comparative inquiry of attitudes toward children in six Western societies (Austria, West Germany, Great Britain, Ireland, the Netherlands, and the United States) maintained that older people, advocating traditional forms of marriage, hold positive attitudes toward children. The elderly viewed children as more central to their lives than did younger adults. In these six countries, individuals who were unmarried, better educated, employed, and less religious experienced changes in attitudes toward children and held less favorable or less traditional views about them. Similarly, in Croatia (at the crossroads of central Europe, south Europe, and the Mediterranean) work- and success-oriented women, impacted by urbanization, do not perceive children as a joy and decline to submit to social pressure to have children.

A survey on attitudes concerning the statement that "people without children lead empty lives," showed that support for this statement declined gradually between 1988 and 2002 in Great Britain, the United States, and Ireland. American women were more accepting of childlessness and, therefore, viewed children as less central. British and Dutch women held lower levels of support than men for the centrality of children.

Traditionally and despite social pressure for married couples to bear children, people living in Arab countries show sincere affection and positive attitudes toward their offspring. Although there are many differences among Arab countries, people share a common perception that children are God's beloved beings (ahbāb Allah). Arabs, both men and women, deeply love children and express that love openly. To display this love, parents and relatives frequently communicate and interact with children, kissing and hugging them and gently tapping their heads and shoulders. It is a common practice that when Arab persons meet parents accompanied by their children, they say, "May Allah protect and keep them for you." The centrality of children to Arab people is reflected in the fact that parents support their children financially and socially, even when the children grow up and become adults or get married.

In Japan, children have become a high-priced commodity. It is not only expensive to have children in Japan, but the cost of educating them obliges parents to limit their number of offspring to two. Japanese fathers have little time to converse with their children on a daily basis; 37.4 percent of fathers interviewed stated they had no contact at all with their children during the working week.

Both Arab and Japanese parents view and want their children to be obedient, docile, well brought up, and emotionally mature, while American parents encourage their children to display qualities of independence, autonomy, and leadership. Unlike Western people, Arabs use an informal but polite and respectable way to address parents or people who have children by using the term father or mother, followed by the name of the oldest child. For example, a father whose eldest son is named Kareem is addressed as abu Kareem (father of Kareem), while the mother is addressed as umm Kareem (mother of Kareem). Most Arabs desire to have children, especially male children, to enhance their social status and to have someone to help them when they grow old. However, in Japan parents have no guarantee that their children are going to look after them in old age. A study conducted by Japanese researchers in 1997 examined six countries (Japan, the United States, Great Britain, France, Thailand, and Korea) and concluded that Japanese parents did not want to be dependent on their children, but they nevertheless hoped to live with them one day.

Understanding international variations in attitudes toward children helps people recognize not only the richness of human experience, but also certain patterns of people's behavior. For instance, while in Austria or France the principal motivation for having a child is to enjoy child-rearing, in Japan having children arises from a sense of duty to society or the family rather than being considered a pleasure in its own right. Based upon these various studies, it is evident that worldwide attitudes toward children have changed considerably in the last few decades, augmenting international variations in these attitudes.

el-Sayed el-Aswad
United Arab Emirates University

See Also: Child Support Agencies and Services; Child Welfare League of America; Child Welfare Services.

Further Readings

el-Aswad, el-Sayed. 2008. "Ahfāl al-'awlamah: Thaqāfat al-mas'ūliyya wa mas'ūliyyat al-thaqāfah." (Children of Globalization: The Culture of Responsibility and the Responsibility of Culture). al-Tofoola: Bahraini Society for Child Development, v.9/1 (2008).

el-Aswad, el-Sayed. "Bitterness and Sweetness: Children with Special Needs in Bahrain." Tasbir: Insight on Islam and the Middle East. http://tabsir.net/?p=41 (Accessed November 2013).

el-Aswad, el-Sayed. "Peace be Upon the World: Voices of Women and Children From an Arab Society." Paper presented at the 102nd Annual Meeting of the American Anthropological Association, November 19-21, 2003.

el-Aswad, el-Sayed. "Socialization and the Construction of World Views of the Child: Comparative Study Between a Gulf Society and a Rural Egyptian Society." Dirasat. Sharjah, U.A.E.: Emirates Writers and Literates Union. v.6 (1993).

Gubernskaya, Zoya. "Changing Attitudes Toward Marriage and Children in Six Countries." Sociological Perspectives, v.52/2 (2008).

Jolivet, Muriel and Anne-Marie Glasheen. Japan: The Childless Society? The Crisis of Motherhood. New York: Routledge, 1997.

Jones, Rachel K. and April Brayfield. "Life's Greatest Joy: European Attitudes Toward the Centrality of Children." Social Forces, v.75/4 (1997).

Obradovic, Josip and Mira Cudina. "Child-Bearing Attitudes in Croatia: A Country Passing Through the Modernization Process." Journal of Comparative Family Studies, v.42/1 (2011).

Robila, Mihaela and Ambkia Krishnakumar. "The Role of Children in Eastern European Families." Children & Society, v.18/1 (2004).

Children, Youth, and Human Trafficking

Human trafficking is trade in humans, whether through force, persuasion, or misrepresentation. It is not to be confused with human smuggling, which is the illegal transportation of people across national borders without proper immigration procedures, but often it includes smuggling. Smuggling is a crime against the state; trafficking is a violation of human rights. Trafficking has the end goal of putting the trafficked victims to work, either in forced labor or especially as prostitutes; human trafficking for the purposes of organ theft or forced surrogacy are rare but noteworthy exceptions. The victims of human trafficking are often children or young adults, forced to work in brothels. The United Nations (UN) protocol concerning human trafficking is the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, part of the 2003 Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime. (Trafficking is also explicitly condemned in other UN documents like the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Convention on the Rights of the Child.) In 2010, human trafficking revenue was estimated at about 5 percent of all illegal international trade revenue. About a third of trafficked victims are under age 18. Though reports often indicate that many victims of human trafficking are Americans, this is largely a reflection of the chaos and uncertainty faced in developing nations where many victims originate, and which makes it less likely for them to be reported as missing or abducted.

Human trafficking into the United States is unfortunately common. The I-10 corridor is the major trafficking route in the United States, according to the U.S. Justice Department. The highway runs from one coast to the other, connecting numerous southern cities like Los Angeles, Houston, San Antonio, and New Orleans. One of the largest originating cities—cities where international traffickers first arrive with their victims before leaving for other parts of the country—is Wichita, Kansas. Cities near major airports often see human traffic passing through but can also be destinations for victims of human trafficking who have been forced into sex work, due to the demand for sex workers associated with business travel, national and international conventions, and major sporting events.

Victims of trafficking may be forcibly abducted, threatened with force or harm to their family, coerced by playing on their vulnerability (especially in the case of children), or simply tricked into being smuggled into another country, thinking they have secured a legitimate job—in many cases, even thinking they have legitimately immigrated—only to discover that the employment waiting for them is as a forced sex worker. In some cases the victim even paid fees for the trip and for fake passports, work permits, or other documents, defraying the operating costs of the trafficker. In other cases, the victim may incur debt to the trafficker in return for the victim's passage to the new country, resulting in the need to work the debt off through bonded labor.

Common in the past—this was the way many Asian Americans came to the United States in the 19th century, for instance—this is an infrequent arrangement today. Forced labor under threat of violence (to the victim or the victim's family) or exposure to immigration authorities is more common, especially for male victims, who may be put to work in sweatshops, factories, or farms, though forced laborers are also found in the service industry and domestic service. In recent years, the International Order for Migration has found an increase in forced labor by human traffickers, which in 2010 exceeded for the first time the number of human trafficking victims trafficked for sexual exploitation.

The International Labor Organization estimates that 1.2 million children are trafficked every year. Children are trafficked for purposes including sexual slavery (whether as prostitutes, for child pornography, or as brides in early marriages, especially in cultures where that is traditional), labor in the illegal drug trade, to serve as child soldiers, and as part of the illegal international adoption trade, particularly in the case of infants. Children may be abducted or may be purchased from parents, which makes the trafficker's work easier. Some critics of international adoption find the line between legal and illegal adoption to be a fine one at times, as when an adoption agency is negligent in ensuring that the child was legally given up for adoption by his/her parents, or when children with missing parents are presented as orphans and adopted accordingly (when, in fact, natural disasters and political instability can make it exceptionally difficult to find people and result in parents and children being separated).

In cases where a country's government and infrastructure have regularly proven unable to regulate the adoption industry and prevent illegal adoptions, countries on the receiving end of adoptions—usually the United States and western Europe—have suspended international adoptions from that country. Nepal and Guatemala are notable examples. Activists have also called for suspension of adoptions from Cambodia and Laos, and several organizations called for a halt to adoptions of Haitian children after the 2010 earthquake, due to the tendency of traffickers to exploit such periods of chaos.

In poor states, children may be purchased for as little as $20, and when sold into slavery in other countries, may command prices as trivial as $350. Forced labor remains one of the prime motives for trafficking children. Child slaves abducted or bought from African countries have been used on cocoa, cotton, and coffee farms in Côte d'Ivoire since the late 1990s at least, and in the early 2000s several authorities estimated that 15,000 trafficked children were thus used. Some had been beggars who were abducted and forced to work. Others had been sold by their families or sent to the farms to work with the intention of sending remittances home. Many were from Togo, Burkina Faso, and Mali. New agreements in the cocoa industry have been adopted in response to the negative publicity, but child labor continues to be used both in it and other African agricultural industries. Trafficked children have also been known to work in mines, particularly mining copper for Chinese firms working in the Congo and mining for gold in Mali, and in factories for the textiles and clothing industry, which is how the incredibly high demand for clothing is not matched by equally high prices. Most child laborers are between the age of 5 and 14.

38 Degrees, one of United Kingdom's largest campaigning communities, joined with Anti-Slavery International and the Independent in 2011 to hand in a more-than-45,000-signature petition to the British prime minister's office. The petition asked the British government to opt into the new Eurpean Union Directive on Human Trafficking, which provides further protection for trafficking victims.

Sex work is another common motive for human traffic. Despite efforts to end the practice, the law often lags in this area. For instance, though the U.S. Supreme Court has held that because children cannot legally consent to sex, they cannot be party to the crime of prostitution but rather only its victims, children under age 14 cannot be prosecuted for prostitution. But the court extended this protection only to young children. Adolescents age 14 to 18, who are minors, may still be prosecuted and may not seek help out of fear of being arrested themselves.

Contrary to popular assumption, as many boys as girls are abducted for sex work. Once sold by the trafficker, children sold into sexual slavery usually do not work for a traditional pimp but rather for an older and more experienced child who is also a prostitute and has secured living arrangements. While most customers are older, wealthy white males, surveys of child prostitutes have found that about half the boys and a tenth of the girls have also served female customers, sometimes exclusively. Women also make up about a third of traffickers.

Bill Kte'pi
Independent Scholar

See Also: Abduction; Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; At-Risk Youth Services; Child Protective Services; Children, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Human Trafficking.

Further Readings

Bales, Kevin and Ron Soodalter. The Slave Next Door: Human Trafficking and Slavery in America Today. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2010.

Hepburn, Stephanie and Rita J. Simon. Human Trafficking Around the World: Hidden in Plain Sight. New York: Columbia University Press, 2013.

Kara, Siddhartha. Sex Trafficking. New York: Columbia University Press, 2010.

Lloyd, Rachel. Girls Like Us: Fighting for a World Where Girls are not for Sale. New York: Harper Perennial, 2012.

Children and War

Wars always create victims, but children are especially vulnerable and need special human services to address the traumatic experiences of war. Experiences can differ from case to case, as children, especially those involved in conflicts in postcolonial Africa, are used as child soldiers; become homeless and have to flee from their native towns or villages; or are victims of rape, which became an instrument of war in Rwanda and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. During the recent civil wars on the African continent, more and more children were recruited to serve in rebel forces and militias, and over 20,000 children had to flee during the Second Sudanese Civil War (1983–2005), becoming known as the Lost Boys of Sudan. Even today, Congolese children are being victimized by rape, which emerged as an instrument of war during the civil war of the Hutu against the Tutsi in Rwanda.

Child Soldiers

The idea of using children as soldiers is neither modern nor did it originate in Africa. In previous centuries, armies recruited young males when there was danger or a lack of adult soldiers. This phenomenon occurred globally. During World War II, boys were recruited by the Red Army in the Soviet Union as well as by the Nazis, who wanted to mobilize their last remaining forces—the so-called Volkssturm—to prevent an occupation of Germany. With the end of World War II and Europe‘s long-lasting period of peace, children were no longer part of European armies.

However, with the decolonization in Africa and Asia, more and more children were forced into the newly formed rebel armies as a consequence of the postcolonial ethnic conflicts in several countries. Even when the United Nations General Assembly adopted a treaty to prohibit the use of children (under the age of 18) in combat, in 2000 there were still countries in which children were fighting as soldiers. These children, mainly young boys, are manipulated into joining the conflict and are given a weapon to fight for their adult leaders.

During the First and Second Congo Wars (1996–97 and 1998–2003), child soldiers were recruited and are still being recruited as a consequence of the ethnic conflicts within Congolesian society. Many rebel groups, such as the Mai Mai Bakata-Katanga,

The Jowle Camp in September 2013, in Garowe, Somalia, was created in 2011 for the displaced refugees of the Somalia Civil War. It is estimated that over 10,000 refugees live here, mostly women and children who lost their family members in combat. Before the camp opened, displaced Somalis were spread among smaller settlements around Garowe.

whose members are active in the province of Katanga, continue to recruit boys between the ages of 8 and 17 into their troops to fight against the province's secession. Girls are also forced to join the rebel forces.

Lost Boys of Sudan

In contrast to children serving as soldiers, children more often become victims who are forced to leave their homes and flee from the cruelties of civil war. The Lost Boys of Sudan is one of the most well-known examples of these types of victims. Over 20,000 young boys who belonged to the ethnic groups of Nuer and Dinka were forced to leave their homes during the Second Sudanese Civil War. They fled with, or in case of their parents‘ death, without their parents to international refugee camps, where they got their name from aid workers. For most of these children (who were girls as well as boys, even if the name suggests otherwise) the Sudanese Civil War laid the ground for a diaspora, which did not end until 2005, when many of the former children returned to Sudan to help rebuild the country, although their hope for a better future remained unfulfilled. More recently, as a consequence of the battles after the secession of South Sudan, children of the border region of Sudan and South Sudan were forced to flee in fear of becoming victims of the area's new civil war. These children feared being killed in the violent conflict or being raped by soldiers, as systematic rape had become an instrument of war, especially on the African continent.

Rape as an Instrument of War

During the civil wars in Rwanda and the Democratic Republic of Congo, rape became a systematic weapon used against the enemy. The Tutsi in Rwanda used rape as a weapon against the Hutu, employing a kind of mass sexual violence as a means of weakening their opponents. An environment was thus created in which rape became an acceptable procedure with which to fabricate a strong community of rapists, which favored the ruling ethnic group. These practices were introduced to the Congo from Rwanda when different groups entered the Congo to fight over Congolese raw materials. As of 2013, about 15 different ethnic groups were involved in the combat, seeking to destroy opposing ethnic groups. Sexual violence against women or systematic rape is one way to achieve this aim, because rape diminishes an opponent‘s strength. Rape not only harms the victim, but also harms the entire opposing society, which is weakened by this act of sexual warfare. For this reason, it is commonly believed that Hutu militia, who fled from Rwanda, introduced the war practice of rape into the Congo. Many women and girls are now suffering from this practice, which has been adopted by different rebel groups that are active in the Congo today.

As a consequence of their traumatic African civil war experiences, child victims of these conflicts are in need of special human services, no matter if these children were recruited to kill people of another ethnic group, orphaned and forced to flee from their homes, or victims of systematic rape. No matter what their experience, they are still children and need help to overcome their traumatic memories. With children as the victims of conflicts in Mali, Sudan, the Congo, and Syria, this problem is very grave and of the highest importance.

Frank Jacob
City University of New York

See Also: Child Abuse/ Neglect, Victims of; Childhood Trauma; Children With Special Needs; Colonialism, Lingering Effects of; Diaspora; Displaced Persons; Hate Groups; Rape as an Instrument of War.

Further Readings

Bixler, Mark. The Lost Boys of Sudan: An American Story of the Refugee Experience. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2006.
Dallaire, Roméo. They Fight Like Soldiers, They Die Like Children: The Global Quest to Eradicate the Use of Child Soldiers. New York: Walker, 2011.
Rosen, David M. Armies of the Young: Child Soldiers in War and Terrorism. Piscataway, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2005.
Roth, John K. Rape: Weapon of War and Genocide. St. Paul, MN: Paragon House, 2012.
Singer, Peter Warren. Children at War. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006.
Wessells, Michael. Child Soldiers: From Violence to Protection. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2009.

Children in Foster Care

The current U.S. fosterage system emerged from early child welfare reformers who witnessed the brutal impact of 19th-century poverty on poor, orphaned, half-orphaned, neglected, and abused children. In urban areas these children grew up on the streets, fending for themselves, or were placed in crowded, poorly staffed, and poorly funded orphanages. Institutional life was intentionally harsh. Routines and norms, guided by fiscal efficiency, sought to reform children out of poverty and produce a working class that could provide manual or domestic labor in a growing industrial economy. While middle- and upper-class children were imbued with sentimental value, poor children had instrumental value. Thus, their care and their care needs were seen through an economic lens.

Cognizant that the poor conditions of institutional care failed to produce the kind of workforce envisioned, Charles Loring Brace and other “child savers” asserted that these children’s need for labor could benefit rural families. The result was orphan trains, which transported children from urban areas to the U.S. farm belt, where they were added to farm families as dependents, but paid for their care through their labor. From its inception, children entering U.S. fosterage fell outside middle-class ideals of sentimental children emerging from intact nuclear families. This difference continued through the 19th century but began to shift in the 20th century, when changing child labor laws and increased industrialization led the way to cultural ideals extolling women’s noneconomic domestic labor, a nuclear male-headed family, and children’s decreased instrumental value. Consistent with these ideals, the 20th century saw a shift in the locus of the problem from homeless, abused, or neglected children as a threat to the social order that needed reform, to children as victims of their parents’ circumstances who needed protection. This shift intersected the professionalization of child welfare workers mainly through nongovernmental-sponsored agencies and the emergence of casework. Professional caseworkers were charged with assessing risk, protecting children, and monitoring their care through fosterage.

Fosterage initially was considered a substitute family that could socialize children and convert their social difference through love and nurture. However, as foster care became an economic activity commercializing the ideal of a mother's love and nurture, foster families themselves and foster mothers fell outside the ideal of family life. This is important because it established foster families as a board and care service and social workers as the real experts in assessing and providing for children's needs. "Best interest of the child," a phrase echoed in much of the literature, is assessed through the lens of professionals. While family care is privileged to institutional care, "family" is steadfastly defined in policy and practice as a legal or blood relationship and children's needs are defined through their need for kinship and permanence. Fostering is a short-term solution to a child's care but not a "real" family. Foster parents are licensed and regulated by the state and their care is categorized according to the service they provide (e.g., short term, long term, therapeutic care). Kinship through foster care is only seen as possible through adoption, and long stays in foster care are deemed deleterious to a child's development.

Contemporary Discourse and Themes

Throughout the 20th century children's needs and experiences in abusive or neglectful families was the center of discourse through voluminous studies on the impact of trauma, separation, lack of nurture, issues with attachment, and family disruption. The assumption upon which the majority of these studies lies is that children require very particular familial environments in order to thrive. This includes routine, constancy of caregivers, physical and emotional safety, and an environment that is attentive to their physical and emotional development—all constructs that ultimately privilege an idealized nuclear, middle-class family form and function. The dominant discourse finds the intersection of poverty, chronic neglect, abuse, and trauma artifacts of poor parenting and family dysfunction. Through this lens children in foster care require specialized behavioral psychological intervention rather than reform or nurture.

The emphasis of contemporary child welfare social work is reuniting biological families or releasing children to new families through adoption. Thus, part of all casework with children entering care is some form of permanency plan. This means that casework also extends to working with children's families of origin to help them conform to social child-rearing norms. Kinship care emerges as a central theme of 20th century discourse, premised on the belief that a child's care is improved and their chances for a successful placement are increased by finding a blood or legal relative to provide care. Non-biologically or legally-related foster parents are not considered kin, and a disjuncture emerges between the work of foster parenting as foster parents construct it, which is to provide love, nurture, and care to children, and state-sanctioned policy and social worker practice to find a "real home" for children. Few foster care studies include foster parents' subjectivities and instead focus on the children in care. When foster parents are included in the literature they are discussed in terms of their utility to social workers. This includes their grief responses, parenting styles, training needs, and retention patterns.

Failures in the Foster Care System

Most analysts agree that the current foster care system is in crisis stemming from an increased number of children who need placement, the chronicity of family issues requiring children to stay in care longer, a shortage of foster and adoptive families, and burgeoning social worker caseloads. In short, the system's demands far exceed its capacity. Conditions that lead children to foster care have not received adequate policy or practice attention, and funding for prevention or rehabilitative family work has been dramatically cut, leaving complex social problems to become entrenched and endemic.

Additionally, long-term studies of children who emerge from foster care suggest that they suffer lasting developmental delays and experience psychological damage resulting in poor employment, educational, and life satisfaction outcomes. This is systemically induced as children experience multiple placements without benefit of long-term relationships that promote emotional attachment. Most child welfare professionals call for broad policy changes that can reform the way foster care is administered and the ways in which families receive service. While there are pockets of innovation, such as better diagnostic tools to help social workers determine who needs care, or children's villages that attempt to provide a permanent home and keep siblings together, the basic paradigm for care has not changed substantially.

Danielle F. Wozniak
University of New England

See Also: Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System; Aftercare Services for Children Aging Out of Foster Care; Child Welfare Services; Foster Care Agencies; Fostering Connections of Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008; John H. Chaffee Foster Care Independence Program.

Further Readings

Child Welfare League of America in partnership with Casey Family Programs. CWLA Best Practice Guidelines: Child Maltreatment in Foster Care. Washington, DC: Child Welfare League of America, 2003.

Shaw, Julie and Nick Frost. Young People and the Care Experience: Research, Policy and Practice. New York: Routledge, 2013.

Wozniak, Danielle F. They're All My Children: Foster Mothering in America. New York: New York University Press, 2001.

Children in Special Living Arrangements

Children around the world are being raised in various socioeconomic, technological, and cultural contexts that account for tremendous variation and shifts in children's living arrangements. In addition to living with their biological parents, children can be found in various other traditional and nontraditional special living arrangements.

Unwed parents continue to be one of the largest contributors to children in special living arrangements, that is, single-parent homes. However, there are changing cultural norms related to sexual behavior and family formation that increasingly denote the single-parent household as common, normal, and adaptive compared to other more dysfunctional arrangements where both parents are present (parental discord and physical violence). Increases in pregnancies outside marriage and decreases in the urgency to marry have both increased the chances of a child being born outside marriage and into a living arrangement with a custodial parent. After the child is born, the living arrangements for the child commonly may or may not include both parents or either parent, this decision being determined based upon cultural traditions and beliefs.

On average, those who have children out of wedlock are younger and less educated and have lower yearly income compared to parents who are married. As a result, the children of parents who are unmarried are more likely to live in poverty and have poor developmental and educational outcomes. Adolescents living with single unmarried mothers are more likely to experience greater delinquency and lower grade point averages than those living with cohabiting stepparents. Additionally, research has found that children who live in nontraditional households (single parent, stepparent, no parent) are more likely to have unhealthy eating habits. The above research suggests that relationship dynamics may play a role in academic and health outcomes of children.

Divorce also contributes to children living with a custodial parent or in a special situation with a stepparent. Blended families are often a by-product of the remarriage or cohabitation of partners who both bring children from previous unions or the combination of children from both previous and current relationships. Notably, 16 percent of all children live in a blended family.

There are racial, ethnic, and cultural differences in the likelihood of a child living in a special arrangement. According to information from the U.S. Census of 2011, black or African American unmarried women had the highest percentage of births at 67.8, and unmarried Asian women had the lowest percentage of births at 11.3. Hispanics make up a large part of new immigrants in the United States. Immigration may affect the kind of household children grow up in, as other relatives living in the home may provide an extended household arrangement.

There are many reasons why biological parents may not be the primary caregivers for a child. Parental mental disabilities, physical disabilities, drug abuse, and military duties are a few of the reasons children may end up in special living arrangements. Children may also be removed from the homes of their biological parent or parent due to sexual, physical, or emotional abuse or neglect. Oftentimes, these children may live with their grandparents or other relatives or with nonrelated adults such as foster parents, adopted parents, the families of their friends, or people associated with their parents. This can be difficult for a child to process; however, it may be a better environment than the child's parents would be able to afford. Many grandparents step in to fulfill the roles of parents for their grandchildren due to the biological parents' incapacities. It has been shown that psychological distress among grandmothers can predict behavior problems of children.

Nonrelatives including but not limited to stepparents, adopted parents, and foster parents are also responsible for the care of many children. When a child's biological parents are unable to take care of the child due to any of the reason listed above, the child may be adopted or placed in a foster home. Adoptive and foster parents make up a smaller percentage of homes raising children in a special living arrangement. Because there are more children in need of an adoptive or foster home than there are prospective adoptive or foster families, other viable options are explored for homes for these children. Some children are placed in foster homes or adopted by families of a different race and some children are adopted by gay and lesbian couples. Some gay and lesbian potential adoptive or foster parents are faced with seemingly unjustifiable obstacles in their efforts to adopt or foster a child. These obstacles exist despite a body of research suggesting that the personal and social development of children of gay and lesbian couples is not compromised when compared to children of heterosexual parents. In fact, the qualities of family relationships may be more important than the sexual orientation of parents.

Multigenerational families provide another special living arrangement for children. Children are living with relatives other than their biological parents, such as grandparents, aunts, uncles, siblings, and cousins. Also, as a result of the development of adaptive strategies of multigenerational families such as role flexibility, children in this special living arrangement often develop an ancestral worldview, biculturalism, and come out of the environmental trials of ethnic stratification status. The developmental outcomes of and sensitivity to cultural gaps are enhanced for ethnic minority children in this type of living arrangement. This is aided by the adaptive strategies geared toward the child-rearing goals of positive thoughts and feelings about the ethnic group and socialization for interdependence.

Living with a nanny as one of the primary caregivers is yet another special living arrangement for some children. When examining this type of living arrangement, different aspects of many other living arrangements may come into play. A nanny most often is a nonrelative paid to provide care for a child or children. This person oftentimes is of a different race than that of the child or family and may or may not be of a different culture. Because the child's nanny spends a great deal of time with the child, sometimes more than the parent or parents, the nanny's morals, values, and culture may more likely be instilled in the child and a blending of ideals may occur.

Christopher Edwards
Duke University Medical Center
Shentelle Livan
Le'Marus Alston
North Carolina Central University

See Also: Children in Foster Care; Co-Parenting, Cultural Aspects of; Families, Nontraditional; Family Structure, Diversity of.

Further Readings

Kelley, S., D. Whitley, and P. Campos. "Behavior Problems in Children Raised by Grandmothers." Children and Youth Services Review, v.33/11 (2011).

Kelly, J. "Children's Living Arrangements Following Separation and Divorce: Insights From Empirical and Clinical Research." Family Process, v.46/1 (2007).

Manning, W. and K. Lamb. "Adolescent Well-Being in Cohabiting, Married, and Single-Parent Families." Journal of Marriage and Family, v.65/4 (2004).

Patterson, C. "Children of Lesbian and Gay Parents." Current Directions in Psychological Science, v.15/5 (2006).

Stewart, S. and C. Menning. "Family Structure, Nonresident Father Involvement, and Adolescent Eating Patterns." Journal of Adolescent Health, v.45/2 (2009).

Children of Incarcerated Parents

The problems of children of incarcerated parents are of such global concern that in 2011 the United Nations held a general day of discussion to address the issue. The assembled group produced a list of recommendations, the top two being that children of incarcerated parents should have the same rights as other children and the best interests of the child must be a primary consideration in all actions that will affect the child when a parent is incarcerated. Nowhere is caring for and protecting the rights of these children more of a challenge than in the United States, which has the highest incarceration rate in the world.

The incarceration of a parent often leads the child to face financial instability, changes in family structure, and myriad psychological, social, health, and development problems.

More than half of those incarcerated have children, and over 2 million children in the United States have one or both parents in prison. This number has steadily increased. Over half of the children of incarcerated parents are 9 years old or younger, one-quarter are younger than 5 years of age, and black and Hispanic children have a disproportionately higher risk of having a parent incarcerated. Parental incarceration increases the probability that children will live in poverty and leads to a myriad of psychological, social, health, economic, and development problems. These children have been called the hidden victims because they are harshly punished for their parents' crimes, and their plight goes largely unnoticed.

Special Needs

It is clear that removing children from their parents by means of incarceration has detrimental effects. Research has focused on psychological health, physical health, developmental issues, and social problems for children of incarcerated parents. More men are incarcerated in the United States than women, so more children have a father in prison than a mother. However, research has more often examined the impact of maternal incarceration, as these women are likely to be the primary, and often sole, caregivers of minor children. The literature has shown a higher likelihood of children of incarcerated mothers being moved from one family member to another or being in foster care, creating safety and stability concerns for children and adverse events in these settings. It is clear, nonetheless, that the incarceration of either or both parents creates special needs for their children.

Children of incarcerated parents often suffer one or more traumas. The first trauma often occurs when the parent is arrested in front of the child. According to reports, between 20 and over 80 percent of children witness their parents being arrested one or more times. This event has been linked to elevated risk of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), confusion, and negative emotions, particularly if there was a violent altercation during the arrest. Adults frequently do not explain such scenes, leaving the children to create their own scenarios and explanations. This may lead to further experience of negative emotions and PTSD.

Once removed from their parents' care, children experience the further trauma of separation. More than 70 percent of incarcerated women had at least one minor child living with them at the time of their arrest, so separation from a child's mother is very common. A child's limited contact with his or her incarcerated mother prolongs the separation and creates great uncertainty about when and if the child will see their mother. Children who have mothers in prison are likely to have a father in prison. Having a parent in prison is an ambiguous loss, without closure, which leaves children confused and unsure of their future. Prison visits can be surrounded by stress and emotions by adult family members, which can also create stress for children.

According to attachment theory, maternal separation can lead to long-term impairment, the severity of which can depend on the quality of the attachment, age, and gender. Negative outcomes for children include feelings of resentment, abandonment, loneliness, shame, and anger. A sudden disconnection of their relationship with their parent can also leave children worried about who will take care of them. These concerns are well founded. Children of incarcerated parents may be moved from one family caregiver to another, especially in the case of a lengthy incarceration. These caregivers often experience stress with their new responsibilities. For example, children often live with grandparents, some of whom are not physically able to take on all caregiver roles. In the case of maternal incarceration, research has shown that the vast majority of women have been victims of violence and sexual assault. Therefore, a child in the care of the mother's family may be exposed to the same abuse or to violence. In their new homes children are also at higher risk for poverty.

At school children of incarcerated parents face many significant challenges. The stigma of having a parent in prison can create problems in peer relationships including mistrust, feelings of shame, rejecting friendship with other students, and feeling as though they do not belong. Studies have reported that children and adolescents with incarcerated parents may have decreased interest in academics, earn failing grades, and report delinquency, expulsion, and dropout. They have an increased risk for offending, substance use, and mental health problems. Children of incarcerated parents are also at high risk for health problems. Although studies differ, some research suggests that children of incarcerated parents have twice as many serious health problems as other children. These health problems can also interfere with their academic performance.

Conclusion

Unfortunately, some people focus on the outcomes of children of incarcerated parents as being further evidence of biological bases of crime, with the children being the bad seeds. This belief and the stigma attached to having a parent incarcerated contribute to the unaddressed needs of these children. In recent years, more research specifically looking at the needs of these children has started to emerge, separate from the literature on parental separation and loss and on women in prison. Programs such as U.S. Dream Academy, a mentoring and after-school program for children of incarcerated parents, which served 970 children in 2011, are well received but only serve a small percentage of the children in need. There is still a great need for more research to address this problem, and more resources to assist children of incarcerated parents.

Susan T. Marcus-Mendoza
University of Oklahoma

See Also: Childhood Trauma; Children of Substance Abusers; Families of Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners; Incarceration and Sentencing, Racial Disparities in; Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners.

Further Readings

Allard, Patricia and Judy Greene. "Justice Strategies, Children on the Outside: Voicing the Pain and Human Costs of Parental Incarceration." Justice Strategies (2011). http://www.justicestrategies.org/publications/2011/children-outside-voicing-pain-and-human-costs-parental-incarceration (Accessed November 2013).

Arditti, Joyce A. Parental Incarceration and the Family: Psychological and Social Effects of Imprisonment on Children, Parents, and Caregivers. New York: New York University Press, 2012.

Burgess, Stacey, Tonia Caselman, and Jennifer Carsey. Empowering Children of Incarcerated Parents. Chapin, SC: Youthlight, 2009.

Eddy, Mark and Julie Poehlmann, eds. Children of Incarcerated Parents: A Handbook for Researchers and Practitioners. Washington, DC: Urban Institute, 2010.

Harris, Yvette R, James A. Graham, and Gloria J. Oliver Carpenter, eds. Children of Incarcerated Parents: Theoretical, Developmental, and Clinical Issues. New York: Springer Publishing, 2010.

Zehr, Howard and Lorraine Stutzman Amstutz. What Will Happen to Me? Intercourse, PA: Good Books, 2011.

Children of Substance Abusers

More than 10 million children under the age of 18 are at risk for both hereditary and environmental effects of parental substance abuse. Genetically, the child of one substance abuser has a 50 percent chance of a biological predisposition to addiction. If addiction is present in both parents, the probability of addiction in their offspring increases to about 80 percent. Substance abusers and their children are high consumers of community resources, accounting for a majority of child welfare cases that cost Americans more than $5 billion yearly.

The children of substance abusers are at risk for physical, social, emotional, cognitive, and behavioral effects of familial substance abuse. The prevalence of substance abuse within any race, ethnicity, or culture determines the prevalence of affected children. Urban areas generally have younger, more ethnically and racially diverse populations than rural areas.

Physical Effects of Parental Substance Abuse

Substance-abusing mothers place children at risk from the time of conception. Alcohol and drug use during pregnancy are associated with miscarriage, premature birth, and low birth weight. Babies who are born addicted to narcotics begin life in need of detoxification. At the time of their birth, these infants may receive specialized medical care, but their needs are ongoing and often require the intervention of the child welfare system for parent education and monitoring to assure that their care continues.

More concerning is the potential for fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS) and other substance-related birth defects. FAS cannot be reversed or remedied and often occurs with secondary conditions that include cognitive disorders, conduct disorders, eating disorders, depression, and psychosis. Implementation of protective factors can reduce the risk of most secondary disorders. Protective factors include early diagnosis, special education, social services, a nurturing environment, and the absence of violence.

During childhood, the children of substance abusers have more hospital admissions for medical problems, which are often related to injuries sustained from physical abuse. Children of substance abusers who are treated for injuries and illnesses should routinely be assessed for mental, emotional, and cognitive disorders. Substance-abusing parents may not follow through with treatment recommendations, so it is important to assess the effects of trauma and begin treatment while service providers have access to these children.

Mental and Emotional Disorders in Children of Substance Abusers

Early in life, erratic and neglectful parenting causes a high rate of attachment disorder in children. Addicted mothers are more likely to abandon their babies or have them removed due to neglect or incarceration. Young children of substance abusers are more likely to be placed in the care of foster parents or grandparents. The ensuing issues are distrust, shame, guilt, anger, and grief. Children who have been removed from their parents need a stable environment with structure and consistency. Most children of substance abusers are at high risk to become substance abusers, so education for foster parents and assistance for grandparents who are raising grandchildren should include an emphasis on recognizing protective factors.

In the households of substance-using parents, children are subject to chaos and deprived of the affordances that assure healthy development. In school, children of substance abusers often have “sloppy Mondays” related to chaotic or violent weekends. Adolescents with substance-abusing parents are more likely to have drug problems and eating disorders. All through childhood, the children of substance abusers have more psychiatric hospital admissions, longer inpatient stays, and greater health care costs than children whose parents do not abuse drugs. A higher rate of exposure to domestic violence increases the probability of post-traumatic stress disorder and other anxiety disorders. Depression and suicide occur more frequently in this vulnerable population. Early diagnosis, treatment, and extended follow-up may decrease the propensity for these conditions to become chronic.

Behavioral Problems in Children of Substance Abusers

Attention deficit disorder and oppositional defiant disorder are more prevalent in the children of substance abusers. In adolescence, the children of substance abusers are more likely to have alcohol and drug problems and the associated problematic behaviors. Anxiety and depression in children often manifest in acting-out behaviors. Although some behavioral problems may occur in children of substance abusers due to neurological problems incurred prenatally, behavioral issues are more likely to be associated with parenting. Parents who abuse alcohol and drugs are poor models for stress management, self-soothing, problem solving, decision making, conflict resolution, and emotional modulation. Much like their substance-abusing parents, children of substance abusers may have poor social skills, poor coping skills, unrealistic expectations of others, and a lack of empathy regarding the effect their behaviors have on others. Often in a substance-abusing household, the children inappropriately assume parental or spousal roles. Concessions of their perceived power and importance cause them difficulty in relationships with peers, partners, teachers, and service providers.

Parental impairment deprives children of normal and normative experiences. Most children look forward to the end of a school day, but children with impaired parents often have increasing anxiety as they near their homes. Many are ashamed of their families, so they do not invite friends to visit and may withdraw from friends who invite them to visit. Extensive research on the resilient children of substance abusers determined that a relationship with a caring adult outside the immediate family system is a protective factor. Extended family members, neighbors, teachers, and coaches frequently fill this role. Children with special talents for the arts, sports, or academics often develop a healthy relationship with a mentor and may be more resilient to family challenges. Human services workers may be the only people who have the opportunity to go above the requirements of their employment and extend themselves to children living in chaos.

Adult Children of Substance Abusers

Addiction and its associated conditions are prone to multigenerational transmission. Children of substance abusers grow up, marry, and have children of their own. In the 1980s, Adult Children of Alcoholics (ACOA) began a movement to define their common issues and provide each other support and encouragement to survive an alcoholic household. Although their self-identified list of ACOA characteristics is controversial for its lack of empirical evidence, it is useful in understanding and addressing the special needs of the children of substance abusers while they are still children. ACOAs claim to guess at what is normal, suggesting the importance of exposure, instruction, and guided participation in social settings in childhood. ACOAs claim fear of criticism, fear of authority, and fear of angry people as core traits, indicating a need for childhood activities that promote mastery and empowerment. The need to provide models for healthy relationships is suggested by the ACOAs' tendencies to confuse pity for love, confuse intensity for intimacy, and love people who need a rescue. A propensity to isolation, self-criticism, and low self-esteem predict depression and suggest that children of substance abusers are more likely to be resilient if they are encouraged to participate, monitored for negative self-talk, and praised for their efforts.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Beacon College

See Also: At-Risk Youth Services; Child Welfare Services; Childhood Trauma.

Further Readings

Friel, John and Linda Friel. An Adult Child's Guide to What's Normal. Deerfield Beach, FL: Health Communications, 2010.

Whitfield, Charles L. Healing the Child Within: Discovery and Recovery for Adult Children of Dysfunctional Families. Deerfield Beach, FL: Health Communications, 1987.

Woititz, Janet G. Adult Children of Alcoholics. Deerfield Beach, FL: Health Communications, 1987.

Children of Undocumented Aliens

There are currently 4 million U.S.-born children with at least one undocumented parent in the United States. Over three-fourths of these children are Latino, followed by Asian (10 percent) and Canadian (5 percent), with the remainder being from other (5 percent) groups. The undocumented status of parents impacts the development of their children as well as interactions with institutions such as schools or health care. The undocumented status also impacts experiences with employment, housing, and access to other social services, even when children are U.S. citizens. In addition to a lack of access to resources, children of undocumented parents and their families live with anxiety due to fear of deportation. Some U.S.-citizen children are already living with the consequences of family separation due to deportation. Consequently, the U.S.-citizen children of undocumented immigrants have a vastly different experience than other children—an experience that is virtually unrecognized. Human service professionals should be aware of the risks for children associated with their parents' undocumented status as well as how to support the family's existing resiliency.

Deportation and Family Separation

Deportation has threatened families for years and continues to cause anxiety among many mixed-status families today. Mixed-status families are families that have at least one undocumented parent and at least one child who is a U.S. citizen. In the current climate of anti-immigrant polices enacted at state and federal levels, families express increased fear of deportations. In addition, faced with immigration raids taking place in their communities or workplaces, parents take extreme measures similar to parents living in war zones. Families resort to sequestering themselves in their homes, forgoing income, and keeping their children out of school. The deportation of one parent results in loss of income and inability to meet basic needs for the remaining parent. The undocumented parent who remains is often too fearful to request emergency assistance.

When a parent is detained or deported, leaving the child without parental care, additional consequences occur, as the child welfare system must become involved. It is estimated that for every two deportations of an undocumented immigrant, one child is left behind. The constitutional rights of parents are not confined to citizens, and both the child welfare system and immigration law assume that parents and children should be reunified. However, in too many cases, when a parent is deported or detained, children are separated from parents for extended periods of time, resulting in termination of parental rights. U.S.-citizen children taken from undocumented parents who are deported are often placed in the custody of family members they barely know or in foster homes, causing additional psychological and emotional harm.

Family separations occur because courts have ruled that parents' undocumented status makes them unfit to parent their children, even though the parents have not abused their children. The parent who has been deported is often without recourse in their home country, unable to comply with requirements to be reunited with children or challenge the court ruling.

While the courts would argue that placement in a foster home in the United States and termination of parental rights may be in the best interest of the child, research suggests otherwise. The children who remain behind experience psychological and emotional consequences, such as appetite disturbance, sadness, excessive sleeping, lack of interest in activities that they used to find pleasurable, nightmares, and academic issues. Recommendations for improving this situation include instituting policy changes to protect the rights of undocumented parents and their children; creating positions dedicated to the reunification of these families; training on immigration policy for child welfare workers, lawyers, and judges; and creating partnerships with foreign consulates and the child welfare system to assist in locating parents when deportations or detentions occur.

Service Utilization

The Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996 eliminated legal permanent residents' (i.e., "legal" immigrants) access to means-tested programs, such as Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (also known as "public aid") for a period of five years and denied undocumented immigrants' access to most government programs. Since the law's adoption, there has been continued anti-immigrant sentiment. Human service professionals find it difficult to service undocumented parents because of the lack of services available to them. For example, undocumented individuals may not be eligible for emergency housing or heating assistance.

Furthermore, the anti-immigrant climate has resulted in mixed-status families becoming wary of applying for services out of fear of deportation, even though their U.S.-citizen children are considered eligible for these programs. In particular, parents avoid educational or social resources for their children that require identification, proof of employment, or proof of income. As a result, children of immigrants use public benefits less often than children of U.S. citizens, despite higher rates of economic hardship. Older children continue to experience challenges with access to college. In 2008, for example, the state of Virginia issued a memo stating that children of undocumented parents may be disqualified from in-state tuition rates.

Impact on Child Development

Undocumented parents utilize tremendous survival strategies in order to provide their children with learning opportunities. Undocumented parents also demonstrate resiliency in the face of uncertain and often dire circumstances. For example, the Latino family's emphasis on relationships provides a basis for a sharing of strategies for navigating the complex social service system within their own communities. Despite these efforts and resiliency, the undocumented status of parents has lowered children's cognitive skills due to parents' economic hardships, psychological distress, and a lack of access to social networks. The working conditions of undocumented parents exacerbate the negative impact on children's cognitive skills due to wage theft, long hours, and inflexible work hours. Thus, undocumented status negatively impacts these U.S.-citizen children beyond the impact of poverty and low parental education alone. In addition, as U.S.-citizen children become older, they often express a sense of guilt or conflict because they can access services that parents or noncitizen siblings cannot, creating additional emotional and mental health concerns for these adolescents.

Human Service Professionals

An important key in working with children of undocumented parents is to be familiar with the rapidly changing immigration law and policies. In addition, assisting families in naming and talking about the trauma and discrimination faced as a result of the undocumented status of parents can help parents and their children reframe the challenges they face. Human service professionals should make connections with immigrant and ethnic advocacy groups and associations, which have often developed innovative ways of serving their clients. When undocumented parents have access to service providers and social networks that help them navigate these systems, they access services for their children at comparable rates to documented immigrants. Having access to these networks lessens their sense of fear and increases both resiliency and a sense of efficacy. Specifically, the points of entry for these families are the school and hospital; thus, human service professionals in these settings should be particularly aware of the needs of mixed-status families. It is often through these settings that families are able to access other forms of public assistance and psychosocial support.

Leticia Villarreal Sosa
Dominican University

See Also: Cultural Broker; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; DREAM Act, The; Family Reunification; Hispanic Immigrants; ICE Enforcement Detention Centers, Services in.

Further Readings

Capps, Randy, Michael Fix, Jason Ost, Jane Reardon-Anderson, and Jeffrey S. Passel. "The Health and Well-Being of Young Children of Immigrants." The Urban Institute, 2004. http://www.urban.org/UploadedPDF/311139_Childrenimmigrants.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

Xu, Qingwen and Kalina Brabeck. "Service Utilization for Latino Children in Mixed-Status Families." Social Work Research, v.36/3 (2012).

Yoshikawa, Hirokasu. Immigrants Raising Citizens: Undocumented Parents and Their Young Children. New York: Russell Sage, 2011.

Children With Special Needs

"Children with special needs" is an umbrella term that encompasses a wide array of diagnoses and disabilities ranging from mild to severe. Such diagnoses as learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), cerebral palsy, and epilepsy fall under this category. Children with special needs can be identified as those who have medical, neurological, developmental, genetic, behavioral, or emotional conditions that require more health and educational services than their nondisabled peers.

According to the U.S. Census Bureau Report, one out of nine children under the age of 18 receives special education services due to a disability, with a staggering 2.8 million children between the ages of 5 and 15 having some type of disability. Moreover, the families of these children also face many challenges, including the expense and care of the child as well as the emotional impact of dealing with these various difficulties. However, by accessing the appropriate services in the community and school, these families can adjust to the child's condition and educate others through their experiences.

Multiple issues surrounding diversity impact this population. As the number of children under the age of 18 continues to grow, the number of children with special needs will increase. Although the medical, developmental, behavioral, and educational needs of children can affect any racial or ethnic group, it is important for health and educational service providers to be culturally competent in dealing with these children and their families. The assessment and interventions provided to these children should take into account the overall culture in which the child lives as well as their individual needs and functional level.

The World Health Association has developed a model of factors that influence the outcome of children around the globe. In providing services for these children, a health service provider must take into account the physical, medical, and/or psychological conditions and how these factors interact between a dynamic social and cultural environment and with the personal needs of the child and his/her family.

Educational and Behavioral Functioning

Children with special needs typically must be assessed for the condition that impacts their daily life activities. Included in these assessments must be a determination of educational and/or behavioral needs that impact their ability to interact with others and to participate in educational activities. Aspects of a child with special needs that should be included in assessment and intervention can include, but are not limited to, intellectual functioning, learning problems, mobility issues, and poor behavioral adjustment. Not all children with special needs have difficulties in all of these areas; however, good service providers should address the degree of adaptability a child has to navigate through his/her environment.

Family Functioning

Perhaps the most important aspect of working with a child with special needs is to address the multifaceted system of the family. Because various cultures have different values associated with disabilities, it is important to take into account these belief systems and ideas that can impact the family dynamic. Most families must care for their children that have special needs more than families who do not have children with disabilities. Because certain races and ethnicities may have fewer resources, it is important that the services provider is sensitive to these stressors related to caring for a child with special needs.

Diversity Issues

Service providers must be especially sensitive to the idea of able-bodyism when working with children with special needs. Many disabilities that face children tend to be lifelong and founded in medical definitions. However, new research is helping service providers move away from the limitations that these medical definitions and measures of disability indicate. Specifically, by utilizing a model that allows the person with a disability to define the idea him/herself instead of allowing "experts" to do it gives greater empowerment to and emphasis on the individual rather than on the label.

Kurt T. Choate
Northeastern State University

See Also: Ableism; ADHD, Services for Individuals With; Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Autism and Asperger's Syndrome, Services for; Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Communication Disorders, Services for; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Developmental Disabled Individuals; Disabilities, International Variation in Attitudes Toward; Disability Services; Education Support Services; Family Services; Group Homes for Children; Intelligence Testing; Learning Disabilities, Services for Individuals With; Mental Health Services, Children; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment; Special Education.

Further Readings

Babb, L. Anne and Rita Laws. Adopting and Advocating for the Special Needs Child: A Guide for Parents and Professionals. Westport, CT: Bergin & Garvey, 1997.

Federation for Children With Special Needs. http://fcsn.org (Accessed January 2014).

Gargiula, Richard and Jennifer Kilgo. Young Children With Special Needs, 2nd ed. Clifton Park, NY: Thompson, 2005.

Children's Defense Fund

The Children's Defense Fund (CDF) is a national, nonprofit advocacy organization that was not formally established until 1973 but has historical roots deeply embedded in the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. Responding to the injustices forced on poor and minority children throughout the history of both the U.S. child welfare and public education systems, Marian Wright Edelman, an attorney and colleague of Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., began the fund with the goal of challenging the federal government to improve its policies and programs affecting the nation's children.

Philosophy and Methods

CDF has successfully brought the liberal values of its predecessor entities, namely King's Poor People's Campaign and the Washington Research Project, into the post-civil-rights era by broadening the organization's focus to all children and rebranding its cause as one of democratic accountability. Today the organization labels its purpose "the No Child Left Behind" mission and aims to represent nonpartisan interests.

Throughout its history, CDF has maintained that U.S. children do not have a legitimate voice in the policy-making decisions at the local, state, and federal levels that affect them most. Relying heavily on a sunshine advocacy strategy, CDF has strived to be the voice for children by educating legislators on issues that affect children, making legislators' previously closed-door actions public knowledge. The fund also analyzes the impact of legislative decisions, and publishes reports about children's issues that it disseminates to the public.

Milestones and Achievements

CDF's advocacy strategies have resulted in significant milestones and achievements, which have earned the organization a great deal of attention and support. Notable publications by the organization include "Children out of School in America" (1974), the annual Children's Defense Budget (1981–present), Children's Defense Fund's Voting Records for Members of Congress (1982–present, and the "Cradle to Prison Pipeline" report (2007). CDF has also lobbied for the passage of several key pieces of legislation including the Education for All Handicapped Children Act (1975), the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act (1980), and the No Child Left Behind Act (2001). In addition, CDF has been instrumental in gaining federal funding for programs such as Head Start, Medicaid, and the Child Income Tax Credit.

Other Campaigns and Programs

In the late 20th and into the 21st centuries, the Children's Defense Fund began launching a number of public awareness campaigns and supported programs serving children across the country. For example, CDF coordinated the Adolescent Pregnancy Prevention Program, the Vaccines for Children Program, and the CDF Freedom Schools initiative. It also mobilized voters in various campaigns and demonstrations, including the Stand for Children demonstration in Washington, D.C., in 1996, the Children Can't Vote, You Can registration campaign in 2004, and the Health Coverage for All Campaign in 2007.

Noteworthy Supporters

In 2014, Edelman continued to serve as CDF's president. The organization enjoys the support of several well-known celebrities and public figures including actress Reese Witherspoon, basketball star LeBron James, pop music artist Shakira, and former secretary of state and first lady Hillary Clinton. CDF also receives the financial support of major corporate foundation donors such as the Prudential Foundation, the Ford Foundation, and the Kresge Foundation.

Abigail Kauffman Wyche
Northern Michigan University

See Also: Administration on Children, Youth and Families; Child Support Agencies and Services; Child Welfare League of America; Child Welfare Services; Children With Special Needs; National Center for Children in Poverty; No Child Left Behind Act; United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Further Readings

Children's Defense Fund. http://www.childrensdefense.org (Accessed November 2013).

Sribnick, Ethan, "Origins of Modern Child Welfare: Liberalism, Interest Groups and the Transformation of Public Policy in the 1970s." Journal of Policy History, v.23/2 (2011).

ChildStats

ChildStats is an accessible resource on the condition of children and their families in the United States. Statistics from 22 government agencies about 41 areas of well-being are compiled by the Federal Interagency Forum on Child and Family Statistics and made available for public use. Each statistic is described as an indicator of one of seven domains of well-being: family and social environment, economic circumstances, health care, physical environment and safety, behavior, education, and health.

The 41 statistical indicators are updated annually and made accessible on the ChildStats Web site: http://childstats.gov. These statistics and others relating to children are mandated by former president Bill Clinton's Executive Order No. 13045 (1997), which required the monitoring of children's well-being. Attention to the needs of children is a long-standing social value in the United States, as analyzed by scholars such as Joel Best. The forum responds to these needs by providing a yearly report, "America's Children: Key National Indicators of Well-Being," available online. In these reports, the 41 well-being indicators are presented, summarized, and monitored for changes over time, with attention paid to changes that are statistically significant or that differ from previous years. These reports are useful resources that summarize massive amounts of government data in a single place.

In addition to the summary statistics presented at the ChildStats Web site, the site provides links to the 22 selected federal agencies that publish statistics related to children's well-being, allowing the user to access each of the hundreds of statistics available in detail. The Federal Interagency Forum on Child and Family Statistics, a division of the Department of Health and Human Services, selects the indicators for each domain of coverage from the various federal agencies in forms that are regularly measured, easy to understand, and serve as useful measures of the state of American children and families. It is important to recognize that the validity of the statistics is uneven, and some areas are covered thoroughly while others are less so. Because the sources for the statistics for each area of well-being are divided among different agencies, each domain has indicator statistics of varying validity.

Analyzing the Statistics

The user should keep in mind that statistics are a social construction, and are no more valid than the processes used to create them. Some are direct counts, as is done by the U.S. Census. These are the gold standard of social measurements. Other than the census, surveys using a random sampling technique may be the most practical way to estimate the characteristics of a population. But surveys have their own characteristic limitations. Social science research has demonstrated how surveys about admissions of behavior do not produce the same results as direct measures of behavior. This research has revealed that reports of behavior based on interviews and surveys systematically underreport deviant and other socially disapproved behaviors. Thus, the domain of behavior, which includes youths' responses to survey questions about smoking, alcohol use, illicit drug use, and sexual activity, must be taken with caution. Declines in some statistics in recent reports may represent behavioral change, but may also represent changes in social norms and willingness to admit socially undesirable behavior.

Some of the statistics include reports of various administrative processes, such as police departments' records of cases involving youth crime. Different procedures are used by the departments to compile these reports, regional and local variations are introduced, and definitions vary from one official and team to another. The results of administrative processes are not comparable and should not be treated as consistent. Neither should the rate of serious youth crimes be taken at face value, for it combines reports of youth about victimization with police records of crimes. The user also should be alert to how greatly the diversity of the population being summarized by the statistics is included and presented.

The work represented among the 22 federal agencies is carefully done and generally can be accepted as the best available information on each of the domains. Nevertheless, a widely recognized concern about children—child abuse and neglect—appears in the domain of family and social environment despite the incomparability of states' data-gathering procedures. Use of National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System (NCANDS) data by the forum fails to recognize the lack of statistical reliability and validity in those measures. A better choice is the forum's omission of the social problem of missing children.

Diversity Statistics

There is much more to be done to gather and report statistics on diversity. The standard categories of age, gender, state and/or region, and race are available from most sources, but the U.S. Census does not gather data on religion and these data are not reported by other federal sources. Education is reported, but not social class. Some income data and categories of poverty are available. But the intersectionality of identities that yield the diversity characteristic of the country and awareness of how race, gender, and class, among other statuses, intersect is not currently available.

The Federal Interagency Forum on Child and Family Statistics also attempts to monitor and coordinate the compilation of child and family statistics by the federal agencies. The agency is particularly helpful in stating areas in which new indicator coverage is needed within its domains and meeting with agencies to promote needed indicators. As the forum is in a position to recommend changes, it would be good to attend to the diversity of the population of children and families. In general, ChildStats is a remarkable resource and is highly recommended to students, researchers, practitioners, and the public.

International Comparative Statistics as Indicators

Other sources of statistics on children's well-being are available from many agencies, including the various census departments of world governments, as well as the United Nations. Such statistics are important, but must be used with caution because they are not developed the same way across nations and even within nations. International comparative statistics for children have been compiled by the World Policy Analysis Center. Other sources on national characteristics include the U.S. Department of State and the Central Intelligence Agency.

One of the most common uses of indicators in the media is the ranking of different countries according to an outcome statistics, such as performance on academic tests or various health indicators. Often the objective of such comparisons is to call attention to an apparently low rating for the United States; then the conclusion seems obvious that more attention to the "social problem" revealed should be given. However, the way the statistics are calculated often differs greatly from one country to another and such comparisons should not be accepted at face value.

Keith R. Johnson.
Oakton Community College

See Also: Abuse and Neglect; Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act; Child Welfare Services; National Center for Missing and Exploited Children; National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System; Protective Services for Children.

Further Readings

Best, Joel. Threatened Children: Rhetoric and Concern About Child-Victims. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990
ChildStats. http//www.childstats.gov (Accessed November 2013).
Federal Interagency Forum on Child and Family Statistics. "America's Children: Key National Indicators of Well-Being, 2013." http://childstats.gov/pdf/ac2013/ac_13.pdf (Accessed November 2013).
Pestello, H. Frances G., Fred P. Pestello, and Irwin Deutscher. Sentiments and Acts/Communication and Social Order. Brunswick, NJ: Aldine Transaction, 1993.
World Policy Analysis Center. "Children's Chances: How Countries can Move From Striving to Thriving." http://childrenschances.org (Accessed November 2013).

Chinese Americans

Historically there has been a scarcity of inquiry into ethnic groups of Asian origin in the United States. Attempts to assess the needs of these groups have been largely restricted to the clustering of several groups under the umbrella terms Asian Americans and Asian American Pacific Islanders, despite these people's heterogeneity.

Compared to other races, the clustering of Asian Americans has resulted in Asian Americans doing better in terms of education, income, and other factors that have contributed to the model minority myth that all Asian Americans are not in need of human services.

Among Chinese Americans, there are needs in the areas of immigration and acculturation, aging, mental health, and security and safety. These issues were identified as recurring themes in the literature. Chinese Americans have been in the United States since the late 19th century and constitute the largest of the Asian American groups, making up 23 percent of the 17 million Asian Americans. However, even among this group there are numerous individuals who carry with them different languages, customs, and ethnic identities. Those who identify as being of Chinese descent may have lived in Taiwan, Vietnam, mainland China, or any of other places in the world. Chinese Americans may speak many different dialects but the two most common in the United States are Cantonese and Mandarin. As the population of Asian Americans continues to grow at a pace exceeding that of all other racial and ethnic groups, a more precise focus on subgroups may provide a more nuanced, well-tailored approach for addressing challenges and needs present for those falling under this larger term.

Immigration and Acculturation

A number of needs in the Chinese American population are more prevalent within immigrant and refugee populations; these challenges are related to the process of acculturating as individuals adapt to life in a new country. Difficulties associated with adapting can be particularly noteworthy for this population as more than two-thirds of individuals of Chinese descent are first generation. Immigrant populations often bring with them several difficulties that put them at a disadvantage when attempting to join the labor force. Many immigrants lack vocational training appropriate for jobs in the United States and have limited English proficiency; these immigrants tend to be more clustered in urban ethnic enclaves where immigrants from the same country of origin reside in a close geographical area.

Those with higher levels of educational attainment may find themselves employed in positions far below their qualifications. Though some assistance is frequently available for these and other adjustment-related problems, many individuals may not know how to access these resources due to lack of knowledge about available assistance or language barriers. Being able to navigate multiple agencies and formal institutions requires guidance in order for benefits and assistance to be rendered.

Aging of the Population

The Chinese American older adult population is expected to increase faster than the Chinese American population as a whole. Certain needs become present as Chinese Americans grow older. For instance, while normal aging may involve some short-term memory loss, it is important to recognize cognitive deterioration attributable to dementia or Alzheimer's disease. If such problems are not addressed, older adults may be at greater risk of injury or of not being able to meet basic functions associated with daily living. Another concern is that these individuals may be separated from kin or adult children because of geographical distance or lack of transportation.

Family support has been identified as integral to the well-being of elderly Chinese Americans as it has been noted as the most important relationship in their social network. This places older adults at increased risk for being socially isolated, which can exacerbate chronic health conditions or lead to psychological distress. These risk factors are troubling as elderly Chinese Americans are already at heightened risk of depression or suicide, especially among those who are foreign-born. When the family is not available, many older individuals can form relationships of support with neighbors and friends nearby. Finding and promoting methods of bolstering social involvement and support among older adults is a substantial challenge currently and shall only grow over time as the proportion of the elderly increases within this population.

Mental Health Concerns

A number of concerns are present among Chinese Americans related to mental health. One challenge is encountered in terms of dealing with the results of acculturating to the norms of a new country and potential cumulative stressful events. For Chinese people migrating to the United States, there is increased likelihood of having disruptions to social networks and for there to be some alienation after departing their country of origin. A secondary risk that should be considered is that there are likely refugees among those emigrating from overseas; those who arrive in the United States may have fled violence or persecution, creating the possibility of trauma-related symptoms or post-traumatic stress disorder.

Another need associated with Chinese Americans exists in the fact that there tends to be a heightened prevalence for certain mental health conditions. Recognizing these concerns can be difficult, as this population may hold beliefs that attribute different causes for mental illness, including cultural explanations that may be influenced by traditional Chinese beliefs such as karma and failure to honor ancestral spirits. There are also certain cultural syndromes for Chinese Americans. One of these, neuroasthenia, includes fatigue, physical complaints, difficulty sleeping or eating, and dizziness. Another is known as qi-gong psychotic reaction or qi-gong deviance and is marked by dissociative and paranoid symptoms that are acute in duration, which are believed to be caused by incorrect or excessive practice. Chinese Americans may demonstrate mental illness differently through complaints that are bodily in nature such as headaches, chest pain, or digestive problems. Being able to identify mental illness and how it may be manifested represents an important consideration for this population.

Security and Safety

All individuals and groups have a need to feel free from harm in order to feel secure. Among Chinese Americans, a common motif arises regarding being a victim of crime or violence that includes robberies of Chinese businesses and Chinese fast-food delivery personnel; the sense of vulnerability associated with these crimes can be enhanced by a poor relationship with law enforcement or the sense that the criminal justice system will not grant them equal protection.

Past experience and historical precedent can fuel mistrust, result in more frequent confrontations, and complicate efforts to establish a working relationship with formal law enforcement. For Chinese Americans, there has been ample history of injustice that points out differential treatment ranging from the Chinese Exclusion Act to the legal handling of the murder of Vincent Chin. These incidents appeared to demonstrate to the Chinese American community that Chinese Americans were acceptable targets for discrimination and that they could not count on adjudication through legal entities. Efforts by law enforcement and criminal justice agencies to establish a relationship in which community members are valued could diminish these perceptions and increase involvement.

Another representation of a threat to safety found among the Chinese American community may relate to violence within the family. These problems are often demonstrated through physical abuse directed at spouses. A number of factors may be associated with an increased risk for intimate partner violence. There seems to be a pattern of increased prevalence among immigrant populations that can be partially explained through trends from one's country of origin. Looking at spousal abuse in China yields dramatic differences in prevalence based on one's location, with those living in rural areas substantially more likely to be affected by this problem.

Additionally, relationship dissatisfaction has traditionally been an indicator of spousal abuse. Conflicts or dissatisfaction with a spouse's relatives have also been connected with this problem. Experiences of perceived discrimination have been found to be closely correlated with intimate partner violence. Lastly, the stress and hardship of establishing a life in the new country is connected with the risk of spousal violence. Law enforcement and local domestic violence shelter partnerships with the Chinese American community could help establish the trust needed for survivors to seek help in times of need.

Implications for Human Services Professionals

While identifying the needs of Chinese Americans is important, it is equally important to break down the service barriers that prevent Chinese Americans from addressing those needs. Unaddressed needs are detrimental to the physical, mental, and emotional health of this population. When addressing these challenges, it is imperative for human service professionals to consider the cultural connotations associated with problems, as issues such as mental health and domestic violence tend to be stigma-laden topics. Addressing these issues through educational outreach in the community may assist in lessening resistance associated with the topics; such efforts can be augmented through partnering with cultural brokers and leaders within the community to establish a collaborative relationship that can help those in need be directed to and teach practitioners to provide appropriate services.

Warren T. Wolfe III
Rockingham Memorial Hospital
Suzie S. Weng
University of North Florida

See Also: Acculturation; Asian Immigrants; Cultural Broker; Culturally Specific Services; Mental Health Services, Adult.

Further Readings

Chow, Julian. "Multiservice Centers in Chinese American Immigrant Communities: Practice Principles and Challenges." Social Work, v.44 (1999).
Dong, XinQi, E-Shien Chang, Esther Wong, Bernarda Wong, Kimberly A. Sharupski, and Melissa A. Simon. "Assessing the Health Needs of Chinese Older Adults: Findings from a Community-Based Participatory Research in Chicago's Chinatown." Journal of Aging Research, v.2010 (2010).
Wang, John X. and Linda Hu. The Chinese-American Method: Raising Our Children With the Best of Both Worlds. Bloomington, IN: Trafford Publishing, 2013.

Chronic Diseases Common in Developing Countries

This article examines chronic diseases that threaten the health and longevity of individuals living in developing countries, or diseases that are associated with undo health burden. Chronic disease is defined as an illness that is long in duration, is less visible, and progresses gradually. The leading chronic diseases are coronary heart disease, ischemic stroke, diabetes, and particular cancers as well as obesity that tends to be the antecedent to many of these diseases. It is suggested that the rise of incidence in chronic disease in developing countries is a result of increasing age and escalation of overweight and obesity prevalence. In order to obtain a full understanding of the development and maintenance of several chronic diseases, it is necessary to address the crucial function of the obesity epidemic and the risk factors it produces in chronic diseases.

General Risk Factors for Chronic Diseases in Developing Countries

Limited physical activity, consumption of high-density and low-nutrient foods, and having limited access to finances are all risk factors for the development of chronic illness with the exception of obesity. Obesity can be associated with having resources in excess. Tobacco use is another risk factor associated with chronic diseases in developed countries. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), it is estimated that 443,000 people die prematurely from smoking or exposure to secondhand smoke. Secondhand smoke has been linked to several chronic diseases, including heart disease, lung cancer, sudden infant death syndrome, acute respiratory infections, ear problems, and severe asthma attacks.

Poor health care is another factor that can contribute to chronic diseases. Lack of access to preventive care, weak primary care systems that are ill-equipped to respond to budding disease symptomatology, and unaffordable treatments are key ingredients in the emergence of epidemics.

It is noted that there is often a convergence of noncommunicable chronic diseases (e.g., diabetes, obesity, or most cancers) and communicable diseases (infections, parasitic diseases, etc.) that produce long-term care needs in developing countries and among vulnerable populations. Low-income countries are disproportionately affected by chronic diseases, often carry the highest disease burdens, and are most susceptible to the negative and positive influences of health behaviors. Over 60 percent of global deaths were produced by preventable chronic diseases and 80 percent of those deaths were located in low- and middle-income countries.

Interventions for Chronic Disease

It is estimated that chronic disease management will cost developing countries $84 billion dollars in 2015, if interventions to decelerate the progression are not implemented. One means of slowing down the advancement is through a population-based approach in which the public is educated (health promotion) on the contributory factors as well as the treatments of chronic disease, to include tobacco use, unhealthy food consumption, and lack of physical activity. Another means of addressing this public crisis is through community-based programs that target high-risk populations and family systems with the purpose of enabling them to become active in their health care while promoting the utilization of community resources and health services. Furthermore, the reduction of saturated fat and the removal of trans fat (unsaturated fat) from manufactured products will also help in the deceleration of chronic diseases in developed and developing countries.

Prevention and Health Promotion

Formal health promotion, or the process by which individuals are empowered to control and increase their health status, has to be an increasingly prevalent component of health care in developing countries where traditional models of treatment once symptoms exist are inefficient, costly, and ineffective, and where prevention is the primary goal. Health promotion focused on nutritional intake (increased fruits and vegetables), aerobic exercise programs (minimum of 30 minutes at moderate intensity multiple times each week), weight management and healthy body weights, smoking cessation, and stress management may prove most effective. These must be culturally tailored in developing countries toward acceptable body image, functional access to resources, and cost. Preventive (health promotion) and interventional efforts are important considerations in the effective management of chronic disease in developing countries.

Obesity

Obesity is a global public health epidemic that affects both underdeveloped and developed countries. Body mass index (BMI) is the universal measurement utilized to calculate body sizes, to include overweight ranging from 25.0 to 29.0 kilograms per square meter (kg/m^2) and obese ranging from 30.0 + kg/m^2. American Heart Association statistics indicate that 154.7 million Americans over the age of 20 are overweight and of these, 78.4 are obese with 33.8 percent being non-Hispanic whites, 37.9 percent being blacks, and 36 percent being Mexican Americans. This health concern also affects 23.9 children, ages 2 to 19, and of these, 12.7 million are obese.

Health disparities and economic, social, and behavioral factors play pivotal roles in the development and maintenance of this public crisis. The BMI is a universally accepted measurement that it is an unrepresentative measure for people of color because it was standardized on white middle-class individuals. This discrepancy can result in inaccurate classifications of body size, particularly since it was determined that blacks have greater body densities than their white counterparts. Several developed countries, particularly the United States, have embraced the "supersize it" mentality, which involves the acquisition of large-capacity products, including food.

This movement is not only socially based but also economically driven. It has been noted that some people of low socioeconomic status will purchase and consume low-nutrient foods because they are accessible and more affordable than high-nutrient foods. The consumption of high-sugar and dense foods drastically reduces energy and motivation

According to the American Heart Association, 12.7 million American children are overweight. Childhood obesity and combating it are issues that are increasingly studied.

required to be physically active. Lack of physical activity impedes caloric expenditure and allows for weight gain. Other contributing factors to lack of or limited physical activities are transportation and media devices. Industrialized and developed countries have implemented sophisticated transportation systems that are conducive to immobility and access to media devices such as television, game consoles, cellular phones, and tablets that greatly promote a sedentary lifestyle.

Diabetes

Approximately 350 million people worldwide have altered glucose metabolism, insulin insensitivity, or pancreatic disease (autoimmunity) that results in the condition of diabetes. In Type 1 diabetes, processes like autoimmune disease render the pancreas unable to produce insulin or to produce insulin in deficit amounts to effectively manage glucose levels in the body. Although chronic with increased disease burden in childhood and adulthood, this condition requiring exogenous insulin is not considered a preventable disease.

In Type 2 diabetes, the body does not effectively use insulin to manage blood glucose levels and a state of hyperglycemia is produced. The disease is the product of genetic predisposition in the context of environmental stimuli like excess macronutrient intake, lack of physical exercise, obesity, and even poor stress management. Representing the vast majority of diabetes cases, many aspects of Type 2 diabetes can be controlled with behavioral management, and the manifestation of the disease is preventable. Similar to Type 2 diabetes in its symptom complex, gestational diabetes is diagnosed only in women and is most often seen as a multifactorial complication associated with pregnancy.

Diabetes can be associated with additional morbidities such as depression, renal dysfunction, peripheral neuropathy, retinopathy, cardiovascular disease, stroke, and death. In advanced stages of untreated or undertreated diabetes, amputation, dialysis, and blindness are common.

Risk factors for the development of Type 2 diabetes include impaired glucose tolerance test (IGT) or impaired fasting glucose (IFG); increasing age; a family history of diabetes (genetics); neuroendocrine dysregulation; high-fat diet; obesity and overweight; hypertension; black, Hispanic, Asian, American Indian, or Alaskan Native race/ ethnicity; restricted or limited physical activity; and gestational diabetes. Prevention and management of Type 2 diabetes includes nutritional management (high fruits and vegetables/low fat), exercise and fitness, stress management, effective management of comorbid diseases, and weight loss.

Lung Cancer

In the United States, smoking-related medical costs account for greater than 8 percent of medical expenditures. In developing countries, such estimates are sometimes difficult to derive from unreliable and unavailable data and cultural differences in the management of disease morbidities—not everyone seeks treatment in formal settings from professionals who document their processes, outcomes, and epidemiology of diseases.

Estimates of the impact of smoking and factors that influence lung cancer include exposure to pathogens in the home (e.g., gas and coal heating sources, open-air flames, secondary tobacco smoke or exposure) and workplace (e.g., industrial pollutants), and generally poor air quality (e.g., smog). Lung cancer incidence, prevalence, and mortality were greater for men than for women and greater in developing countries where health promotion is less prominent than in countries with more economic growth that allow health promotion and cancer control programs to be an effective influence on health behaviors.

Lung cancer is one of the most frequent cancers plaguing world populations, representing an estimated 12 percent of all cancers. It remains the most common cause of death from cancer with one-half of all cases occurring in developing countries. Based on data from the United States, where some of the best-kept population-level data exist on cancer, five-year survival rates from lung cancer cohere at around 15 percent; they are estimated to be about one-half of that rate in developing countries.

Risk factors include exposure to tobacco smoke (primary or secondhand), exposure to polluted air (radon and other toxins), family history of lung cancer (genetics), exposure to asbestos and inhaled toxins, comorbid pulmonary diseases like emphysema, and excessive alcohol consumption. Lung cancer prevention has primarily focused on nutritional management, effectively managing precancerous diseases, smoking cessation, monitoring and remediating air pollution in the home, and limiting exposure to pollution and toxins known to increase the risk of developing lung cancer.

Coronary Heart Disease

Coronary heart disease (CHD) and stroke account for almost one-third of all deaths in the world. Factors associated with CHD are clear and well known, but there is an emerging science of CHD in developing countries. For example, cholesterol and lipoproteins levels, two factors associated with the development of CHD, were found to be lower in developing countries than in industrialized countries. Similarly and proportionally low was the progression and severity of atherosclerotic plaques in the aorta and coronary vessels of samples collected from developing countries, suggesting that an agrarian diet and physical exercise (labor) may be protective.

Risk factors for CHD include age, gender, family history of CHD (genetics), cigarette smoking, hypertension, body fat percentage, body mass index, serum cholesterol, diabetes, lack of physical exercise, stress, and saturated fatty acids in the diet. In addition to the value of each risk factor, risk is increased as the number of risk factors present increases. Prevention includes smoking cessation, increase in physical exercise, stress management, diet control, and weight loss. An emerging science is evaluating the value of a class of medicines known as statins in reducing coronary heart disease risk.

Christopher L. Edwards
Duke University Medical Center
Keisha-Gaye N. O'Garo
Womack Army Medical Center

See Also: Health and Sickness, Differing Attitudes Toward; Health as a Human Right; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Disparities, Role of; Health Promotion Services; Overweight and Obese Adults and Children; Public Health; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health; Smoking and Smoking Cessation, Cultural Aspects of.

Further Readings

Abegunde, D., et al. Preventing Chronic Diseases: A Vital Investment. Geneva: World Health Organization, 2005.

Andrieu, E., N. Darmon, and A. Drewnowski. "Low-Cost Diets: More Energy, Fewer Nutrients." European Journal of Clinical Nutrition, v.60 (2006).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). Chronic Disease and Health Prevention: Tobacco Use Targeting the Nation's Killer at a Glance. Atlanta: CDC, 2011.

Chen, B. H., C. J. Hong, M. R. Pandey, and K. R. Smith. "Indoor Air Pollution in Developing Countries." World Health Statistics Quarterly, v.43/3 (1990).

Collins-McNeil, J., C. L. Edwards, B. C. Batch, D. Benbow, C. S. McDougald, and D. A. Sharpe. "Culturally Targeted Self-Management Program for African Americans With Type 2 Diabetes Mellitus." Canadian Journal of Nursing Research, v.44/4 (2013).

Collins-McNeil, J. C., E. C. Holston, C. L. Edwards, J.C. Benbow, and Y. Ford. "Physical Activity, Depressive Symptoms, and Social Support Among African American Women with Type 2 Diabetes." Canadian Journal of Nursing Research, v.41/3 (2009).

Ebrahim, S. and G. D. Smith. "Exporting Failure? Coronary Heart Disease and Stroke in Developing Countries." International Journal of Epidemiology, v.30/2 (2001).

Go, A. S., et al. "Heart Disease and Stroke Statistics—2013 Update: A Report From the American Heart Association." Circulation, v.127/1 (2013).

Guzman, M. A. "Diet and Chronic Disease: INCAP Studies of Atherosclerosis and Coronary Heart Disease." Food and Nutrition Bulletin, v.31/1 (2010).

Lopez, A. D., et al. "Chronic Obstructive Pulmonary Disease: Current Burden and Future Projections." European Respiratory Journal, v.27 (2006).

Martire, L. M. and R. Schulz. "Involving Family in Psychosocial Interventions for Chronic Illness." Current Directions in Psychological Science, v.16 (2007).

Nugent, R. "Chronic Diseases in Developing Countries: Health and Economic Burdens." Annals of the New York Academy of Sciences, v.1136 (2008).

Ofusu, H. B., K. D. Lafreniere, and C. Y. Senn. "Body Image Perception Among Women of African Descent: A Normative Context?" Feminism & Psychology, v.8/3 (1998).

Parkin, D. M., F. Bray, J. Ferlay, and P. Pisani. "Estimating the World Cancer Burden: Globocan 2000." International Journal of Cancer, v.94/2 (2001).

Parkin, D. M., F. Bray, J. Ferlay, and P. Pisani. "Global Cancer Statistics, 2002." CA: A Journal for Clinicians, v.55 (2002).

Robinson, H. M. and K. Hort. "Non-Communicable Diseases and Health Systems Reform in Low-and-Middle-Income Countries." Pacific Health Dialogue, v.18/1 (2012).

Surwit, R. S., C. L. Edwards, S. Murthy, and A. E. Petro. "Transient Effects of Long-Term Leptin Supplementation in the Prevention of Diet-Induced Obesity in Mice." Diabetes, v.49 (2000).

Wagner, D. R. and V. H. Heyward. "Measures of Body Composition in Blacks and Whites: A Comparative Review." American Journal of Clinical Nutrition, v.71 (2000).

Warner, K. E., T. A. Hodgson, and C. E. Carroll. "Medical Costs of Smoking in the United States: Estimates, Their Validity, and Their Implications." Tobacco Control, v.8/3 (1999).

Cisgender

Cisgender is an identity term that refers to a person whose gender identity matches the sex that was assigned to that person at birth. The term, which serves to distinguish transgender identity from nontransgender, originated in the transgender rights movement and was borrowed from the biochemical sciences. Cisgender privilege is implied in the use of the term. Some activists and scholars critique the use of the term because of its implications for furthering a binary understanding of normative gender identity development (e.g., transgender or cisgender) rather than a fluid and wide-ranging scope of gender identity. Human services workers should become familiar with sources of privilege and oppression that the term cisgender represents and their implications for practice.

Definition, Background, and History

First used in 1994 in Web-based conversations about transgender activism and advocacy, the word cisgender became known to refer to persons who are nontransgender-identified. Because of the range of gender identities in the world (e.g., man, woman, transgender, genderqueer, intergender, pangender, two-spirit, etc.) there became a need to distinguish one as having a gender identity that coincides with the sex assigned at birth. This is in contrast to a transgender identity—a person whose gender identity is different than the sex assigned at birth. Gender is generally thought to be a socially constructed concept that conveys the distinction between a person's societal role and the biological sex that was assigned at birth. Gender identity refers to the intrinsic sense of being man, woman, or other gender such as trans and is invisible and internally felt.

Originally used in biochemistry applications, the Latin prefix cis refers to things that stay the same, and in Latin it literally means "on this side." Therefore, the term cisgender was meant to infer that the person's gender identity stayed the same. The term originally circulated in queer and gender studies scholarship and classrooms and only recently has it been used outside of academic settings. Therefore, many lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) persons may not be familiar with the term.

Transgender Rights Movement

The term helps distinguish between the often misused and misinterpreted meanings associated with sexual orientation and gender identity. For example, one can be a cisgender lesbian woman, a cisgender heterosexual woman, a transgender lesbian woman, or a transgender heterosexual woman; just because a person is transgender does not mean he/she is also gay. This distinction is important to the transgender rights movement because many of its activists seek to articulate it as separate from the gay rights movement. A transgender liberation movement began in the early 1990s and was organized to combat the oppressions that transgendered people face. This movement has recently attracted more public attention in the media and within political and activist circles. That attention has come as a result of hard-fought battles for recognition as a culture and identity distinct from the lesbian, gay, and bisexual (LGB) community. The use of the term cisgender is also thought to be pertinent to the transgender rights movement because it allows the movement to obtain language that is equally usable to what the gay rights movement has—the "other" (heterosexual).

Transgender women have been the subject of debate in feminist scholarship and activism since the 1970s. Feminists disagree as to whether they should include transgender women in theory, scholarship, and activism. Transgender scholars and activists also disagree about whether or not it is important to be included in a feminist movement that does not seem to want them. Feminists who argue for the exclusion of transwomen claim a medical viewpoint and biological influences in their justification for their segregation. Transwomen who argue for inclusion in feminist discourse claim an oppression viewpoint and use social and cultural influences in their justification for their presence.

Cisgender Privilege

Cisgender privilege is thought to encapsulate the freedoms that nontransgendered people enjoy as part of a social world that still operates within a binary understanding of gender. Socially constructed gender roles, and those who operate within them, are often accepted by the majority of people but fail to acknowledge those that they marginalize. Thus, cisgender represents the free and unquestioned access to public and private social institutions to which nontransgendered people are privileged.

Use of the term cisgender can usher in self-awareness. To realize that one never had to struggle with feeling like something other than the sex assigned at birth raises awareness about the experience of transgendered people. Recognition of cisgender privilege can help a nontrans human service worker to understand systemic oppressions faced by transgender people such as: most cisgender people did not have to fight a legal battle to be able to use their own names, did not have to face the marginalization of failing to fit into societal gender roles, did not experience violence and hate language for trying to outwardly show the bodies they feel are right on the inside, and the list of transgender oppressions can go on. Awareness and sensitivity to cisgender privilege is part of culturally competent practice with transgendered people.

Anticis

Some scholars and activists denounce the use of the term cisgender because it favors a "normative" developmental trajectory, indicating that an identity should match a biological sex. Inferring a normal trajectory serves to further marginalize people who do not fit into the model, and marginalization is part of the discrimination and oppression faced by transgender people. This critique also involves the misunderstanding that one can be "born a woman" rather than "to become a woman." To use the word cisgender is to imply the former, whereas the latter is more congruent with a transfeminist point of view. To suggest that there is an inherent gender identity that one is born with because of the sex assigned at birth is to align with a medical view of gender and sex, which many see as oppressive and inaccurate. A transfeminist view represents a resistance to the medical belief that transgender people are pathological and require treatment. Instead, a transfeminist point of view, which incorporates queer, disability, feminist, and transgender scholarship, seeks to liberate transgender people from the structures that restrict, regulate, and control transwomen's bodies. Such structures include medical and social institutions that tell people what gender is and is not and what expressions of gender are and are not acceptable. Transfeminists argue that regulation marginalizes the voice of someone who disagrees with those definitions and strips the free will of humans to determine their own destiny.

Megan E. Gandy
Virginia Commonwealth University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Model of; Gender and Clients; Heterosexual Privilege; LGBTQ Clients; Transgender Individuals.

Further Readings

Enke, A. Finn. "The Education of Little Cis: Cisgender and the Discipline of Opposing Bodies." In The Transgender Studies Reader 2, Susan Stryker and Aren Z. Aizura, eds. New York: Routledge, 2013.

Green, Eli R. "Debating Trans Inclusion in the Feminist Movement: A Trans Positive Analysis." Journal of Lesbian Studies, v.10/1-2 (2006).

Martin, James I. and D. R. Yonkin. "Transgender Identity." In Sexual Orientation and Gender Expression in Social Work Practice: Working with Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, and Transgender People, Deanna Morrow and Lori Messinger, eds. New York: Columbia University Press, 2006.

Serano, Julia. Whipping Girl: A Transsexual Woman on Sexism and the Scapegoating of Femininity. Berkeley, CA: Seal Press, 2007.

Coca-Colonization

Globalization, with its multidimensional outcomes, has resulted in significant changes in every aspect of daily life, including human services and diversity. The gap between clusters of social structure and the scope of diversity spread throughout the world in this process. It generated new terms and perceptions like "coca-colonization."

"Coca-colonization" refers to cultural and economic impacts of the Western, particularly the American, way of life through consequences of globalization processes, on local cultures and economies around the world. It is a term formed by combining "Coca-Cola," a soft drink brand of a multinational beverage company with U.S. origin, and the term colonization. Although slavery and colonization were prohibited around the world with increased standards of democracy and human rights, the term coca-colonization is ironically used to express the existing influence of developed the economies on economic, social, and cultural structure of developing countries.

The term emerged in the post–World War II years to attract attention to the irresistible spread of capitalism around the world. It became popular with the 1994 publication of Reinhold Wagnleitner Coca-Colonization and the Cold War: The Cultural Mission of the United States in Austria After the Second World War. The book pointed out how American culture was internalized in other countries, particularly in the Iron Curtain states, with the influence of music, radio, films, newspapers, and magazines rather than the influence of military or diplomatic power.

Coca-Colonization of the World

How has the world been coca-colonized? Has it only been coca-colonized, or are there other versions of colonization, such as "McDonaldization," which is a similar term used to explain the same idea as coca-colonization. In fact, these are simply symbols to express the extent of a change, which generated a new world in terms of economic, social, and cultural aspects. The change, of course, did not come up in an instant but occurred as a result of evolving processes. Roots of the change date back over centuries to the emergence of new actors in the international system. While empires and states were, previously, the unique actors in the system, nonstate entities arose as a challenge to the state. These entities included international and regional alliances, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), volunteer associations, multinational corporations, etc. Technological progress from the use of steam in industry and transportation to the invention of the Internet and wireless communication techniques played a key role in the emergence of this new order in the world. As an irresistible result of these processes, the world turned into a small village in which people, goods, money, and knowledge could move easily and quickly. Borders between states became less important because of the transboundary communication and trade between people and companies which are located in different parts of the world. All these processes were results of a new era, which is termed globalization.

Beyond Coca-Colonization

The rapid circulation of goods and money resulted in the need for producing as much as possible in order to meet limitless interests of consumers around the world. Consequently, two approaches emerged as a response to this situation. On the one hand, proponents of globalization argued that the existing order helps people around the world reach outcomes of the system. As in the example of Coca-Cola, for instance, it is possible today for almost every single person to get a bottle or can of Coke in the world regardless of his or her distance to the United States, home of Coca-Cola.

On the other hand, opponents of the current globalized world harshly criticized effects of globalization and argued that the poor became poorer, while the rich increased their assets with free trade and such benefits of globalization. Coca-Cola would be a great example to support this assumption. Only nine glasses of Coke per day were sold in 1886, the year Coca-Cola was created. However, today almost 2 billion of bottles of Coke are sold in more than 200 countries around the world in a single day. In Mexico, the southern neighbor of the United States, for example, the per capita consumption of Coke was 745 servings in 2012, with a 50 percent increase since 2002 and 250 percent increase since 1992. In other words, everybody drank more than two bottles of Coke every day in Mexico in 2012. According to official numbers regarding its consumption around the world, it is apparent that Coca-Cola became a global company with a revenue the surpassing economies of many countries.

Focusing on the years when the coca-colonization term emerged, one sees that there were two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, and their satellite countries in the world. World War II had ended with massive casualties on each side in the war. In the years following the war, but there developed a tense atmosphere all around the world because of the Cold War. Leaving weapons aside, both sides in the Cold War acted as though they would attack each other anytime—even with nuclear weapons. Countries in Europe took positions according to their links with the United States and the Soviet Union. Germany was in the middle of the continent both geographically and politically. The term coca-colonization emerged in such an environment and symbolized the influence of the West, particularly the United States, on the Eastern bloc. Eventually, the Cold War ended with the fall of the Berlin Wall, collapse of the Soviet Union, and decline of communism.

Today, countries in the world are much more vulnerable to influences of the above-mentioned changes as borders are more transparent and communication is easier and cheaper. If the West achieved its aim to export its values to other countries via its goods such as Coca-Cola, Levi's jeans, fast-food chains, and Hollywood films during the Cold War years, it is much easier today to export popular culture to other countries via the myriad opportunities of the Internet and other communication techniques. If the impact of Coca-Cola was defined as coca-colonization 50 years ago, today there are many more tools to "googlize," "applize," "facebookize," or "twitize" the world. If somebody asked an individual "to google something" 10 years ago, that individual probably would not understand the meaning of the request.

However, today it is common for people to get the order "Just google it!" If one wants to see the impact of the Internet on social movements in North Africa and the Middle East in the last couple of years, the only thing that one has to do is "just google it." Once one does so, one finds the impact of Facebook and Twitter on Arab Spring movements. Large numbers of people came together against oppressive governments via sharing their ideas through Web sites or mobile applications like Facebook and Twitter. Therefore, although these companies were born in Silicon Valley in the United States and became economic giants, they are now in living rooms of millions of people around the world. Similar to the idea of coca-colonization, today's world, particularly developing countries, can be seen as a target of popular Western/American culture export with all its aspects, including language, lifestyle, and social relations.

Consequences of Coca-Colonization

Coca-colonization with its multidimensional new versions has encompassed the world, but is it good or bad? It is difficult to make a clear-cut evaluation of the consequences of coca-colonization for both the former version and the contemporary versions. It is even impossible to argue that the process of coca-colonization is over. As mentioned above, while there had been a single version of coca-colonization during the Cold War years with a beverage, a couple of Hollywood films, and so forth, today the world faces a multidimensional version of coca-colonization. It has been getting deeper with more aspects. However, the situation is not a one-way street from the United States to other countries.

While the Western/American lifestyle is being exported to the other countries, it is also shaped by the influence of immigrants, students, and employees coming out of the United States. American streets today are full of symbols of the Chinese, Indian, and Islamic cultures. Therefore, it is difficult to judge coca-colonization as an extension of globalization processes as good or bad, because it has multiple aspects both in favor of and against the way of life of the West or the United States and other countries.

Hudaverdi Balci
Rutgers University

See Also: Assimilation; Biculturalism; Colonialism, Lingering Effects of; Coca-Colonization; Global South/Global North; Melting Pot Theory; Monoculturalism; Multiculturalism; Western Communities and Cultural Competence.

Further Readings

Langhorne, Richard. Global Politics. New York: Hodder Arnold, 2006.

Scott-Smith, Giles and Hans Krabbendam, eds. The Cultural Cold War in Western Europe 1945–1960. Portland, OR: Frank Cass, 2003.

Wagnleitner, Reinhold. Coca-Colonization and the Cold War: The Cultural Mission of the United States in Austria After the Second World War. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.

Whitfield, Stephen J. The Culture of the Cold War. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996.

Code of Ethics of the National Association of Social Workers

One of the distinguishing marks of a profession is the presence of an ethical code. The National Association of Social Workers (NASW) Code of Ethics was created as a guide of professional conduct for social workers in their day-to-day practice and ethical decision making. Established as an organization in 1955 through the consolidation of many social work entities, NASW developed and adopted the Code of Ethics in 1960, as well as other practice standards. Having undergone multiple revisions over the years, the Code of Ethics was most recently revised by the 2008 NASW Delegate Assembly, the representative, decision-making body of NASW, composed of 277 elected delegates. This revision emphasized the profession's responsibility to recognize cultural competence and diversity, expanding sections 1, 2, 4, and 6 to include gender identity and expression, as well as immigration status.

The code is organized into four sections. The first section is a preamble, which provides an overview of the social work profession's mission, as well as its core values. The core values identified are: service, social justice, dignity and worth of the person, importance of human relationships, integrity, and competence.

The second section details the six purposes of the code: (1) identifying core values on which the mission of social work is based; (2) summarizing broad ethical principles that reflect core values and establishing a set of standards that should be used to guide social work practice; (3) identifying relevant considerations when professional obligations conflict or ethical uncertainties arise; (4) providing ethical standards to which the public can hold social work professionals; (5) socializing new practitioners to social work's mission, values, and ethical procedures and standards; and (6) articulating standards that the profession can use to assess unethical conduct. Additionally, the second section discusses the use of the code, as well as containing a concise discussion on its application.

In the third section, Ethical Principles, the code details the ethical principles that follow from the values noted above. For example, for the value of service, the ethical principle identified is, "Social workers' primary goal is to help people in need and to address social problems." These values, in turn, inform the practice of social work by relating a specific principle to the core values defined in section 3.

The fourth section in the code, Ethical Standards, provides specific ethical standards in regard to social workers' ethical responsibilities to clients, to colleagues, in practice settings, as professionals, to the social work profession, and to the broader society. Some areas covered in subsection 1, social workers' ethical responsibilities to clients, include self-determination, informed consent, competence, cultural competence and social diversity, conflicts of interest, privacy and confidentiality, access to records, payment for services, physical contact, sexual relationships, and termination of services.

While the code exists to guide professional practice, it was not designed to specifically address every issue that practitioners will face. The code serves as a social workers' foundation for ethical decision making and must be applied on a case-by-case basis, but social workers are also expected to adhere to the various laws and legal codes specific to their practice. Not surprisingly, these do not always coincide, leading to a tension in practice. If social workers do not adhere to laws, legal penalties are enforced; if they do not adhere to ethical standards, legal difficulties, as well as potential discipline by professional boards, may occur. Failure to abide by the code can result in sanctions by the NASW, loss of licensure, malpractice lawsuits in civil court, and/or being required to make reparations.

Of particular importance in resolving an ethical dilemma is the recognition of the values, worldview, and cultural background of the client. The social worker's own values and unique life experiences can influence how an ethical dilemma is approached and viewed and even how the code is applied and ranked in terms of the importance of various issues. Self-awareness of values, beliefs, and potential biases can help decrease any negative effects that could hinder the resolution of a particular ethical dilemma.

Noted within the section of the code that enumerates its purposes is the premise that the code does not provide a set of rules prescribing how social workers should act in all situations but instead offers a guide to decision making and conduct when ethical issues arise. While reasonable differences of opinion can exist among social workers regarding the application of the code, social workers should consider how their decisions would be viewed in a peer review process in which the professional standards of the code would be applied.

Also noted within the purposes section are the code's limits, specifically that a code of ethics cannot guarantee ethical behavior, nor can it resolve all ethical issues or disputes. The NASW Code of Ethics sets forth values, ethical principles, and ethical standards to which social workers should aspire and by which their professional actions can be judged. The code cannot simply be applied in a routine manner, as each client's issue and situation is unique and requires an individualized assessment and ethical resolution.

Lisa Clifton
Cedarville University

See Also: Council on Social Work Education; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Social and Economic Justice; Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in; Social Work, Diversity Practice in; Social Workers.

Further Readings

Corey, Gerald and Marianne Schneider Corey. Codes of Ethics for the Helping Professions. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 2011.

DiFranks, Nikki N. "Social Workers and the NASW Code of Ethics: Belief, Behavior, Disjuncture." Social Work, v.53/2 (2008).

National Association of Social Workers. Code of Ethics. http://www.naswdc.org/pubs/code/code.asp (Accessed June 2013).

Reamer, Frederic G. Ethical Standards in Social Work: A Critical Review of the NASW Code of Ethics. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 1998.

College and University Health Services

Whether private or public, institutions of higher education (IHE)—also referred to as colleges and universities—serve diverse populations, including students, faculty, administration, and staff who hail from the United States and from countries abroad. Country of origin is but one example of the diversities found in academe. As with many other human services agencies, colleges and universities experience diversity of ability and disability, age, race, ethnicity, country of origin, gender, religion, sexual orientation, and socioeconomic class and values and, as such, must demonstrate understanding and respond to these diverse constituents.

The American College Health Association (ACHA) in 2011 articulated its cultural competence statement as ". . . the capacity for an individual, an organization, or an institution to respond to the unique needs of populations whose cultures are different from that which might be considered 'dominant.'" Expressed as the recognition of differences between one group and another, ACHA's statement commits to cultural inclusion, cultural respect, equality, and equity. Inclusion, respect, equality, and equity exemplify the functional components of cultural competence. A culturally competent college or university integrates and transforms knowledge about individuals and groups of people into specific standards, policies, practices, and attitudes necessary to deliver high-quality, responsive health services. Facilitating institutions of higher education's delivery of culturally competent health services are knowledge and experience, beliefs and attitudes that meaningfully value feelings, values, attitudes, and beliefs about self and others, and the institutional response. The policies and guidelines of a culturally responsive college or university are intended to affirm that its policies and procedures are just, provide humane and respectful care for students, protect privacy, and, further, assure that services are beneficial and do not harm.

Colleges and universities can be categorized in multiple ways. For purposes of this article, discussion is limited to institutions that serve residential and commuter students and that are located either in urban or rural locales. Typically, the range of health services delivered by a college or university includes some or all of the following: prematriculation immunization status, tuberculosis screening, drug misuse/abuse education, drug testing of student athletes, emergency and hazard protocols, prevention of sexual violence education, assessment and referral in the case of injury or acute illness, a position paper on tobacco use, and counseling and referral services.

Depending upon the state, colleges and universities are mandated by law to require certain vaccinations for matriculating students. Some states and institutions may require fewer or more, and others may only recommend certain vaccinations. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), the list of recommended vaccines may include the following: measles, mumps, and rubella (MMR); polio; varicella; tetanus; diphtheria and pertussis; human papillomavirus; hepatitis A; hepatitis B; meningococcal quadrivalent; influenza; and pneumococcal polysaccharide. It is interesting to note the mandate speaks to matriculated students, but is silent on nonmatriculated or adult and continuing education students. Because there exist a variety constructs by which institutions categorize students, students and parents are encouraged to clarify which vaccinations are required or recommended and into which student category they fall.

Commuter campuses typically provide health services during regular business hours (9 A.M. to 5 P.M. Monday through Friday) during the academic semesters and winter and summer sessions. Depending whether the college or university offers evening and weekend classes, a reduced schedule of health services may be available. On the other hand, residential campuses must configure services to meet the needs of students around the clock, seven days per week during academic semesters and winter and summer sessions. Regardless of where the institution is located, the student health service unit can be considered as a point of entry into health care services provided either on campus or contracted with local medical and emergency health care providers.

Embedded in this broad set of institutional categorizations is the intercollegiate athletic program. Most colleges and universities participate in national and regional athletic conferences for selected individual and team sports. The number of teams sponsored by a campus varies according to the institution's National Athletic Collegiate Association (NCAA) division memberships, local support and interests, and, of course, financial constraints. Members of the NCAA, regardless of the division/s in which they participate, must abide by proscriptive guidelines of Title IX (the 1973 federal legislation that paved the way for equity in educational and athletic opportunity). In the words of the NCAA, "We simply must make sure that our athletics programs represent all of the United States and all of our complexity … committed in higher education and intercollegiate athletics to the philosophy of promoting diversity in our work," and [sic] the NCAA views Title IX as the "Magna Carta for women in higher education . . . providing for women what had previously been denied—opportunity."

Any discussion of college and university health services will include student health insurance. The American College Health Association recommends that policy guidelines for student health insurance address both insured and self-funded health plans and those institutions recognize their respective sponsored health plans as the students' primary source of coverage. What constitutes an adequate and appropriate scope of coverage can include, though not be limited to, coverage for immunizations, preventive screenings and services as mandated by the respective state and federal law, illness and injury, prescription medications,

Students relax on campus. According to the American College Health Association's nondiscrimination policy, the association supports all initiatives to create a campus climate guided by the values of cultural inclusion, respect, equality, and equity.

preexisting conditions, continuity of coverage during medically necessary leave of absence, and continuity of coverage for previously insured students. Most important and fundamental to the culturally responsive institution, as mandated by federal and state law, and where appropriate in keeping with the institution's mission, the student health insurance program must be made available to all students regardless of age; gender identity, including transgender; marital status; physical size; psychological/physical/learning disability; race/ethnicity; sexual orientation; religious, spiritual, or cultural identity; sex; sexual orientation; socioeconomic status; and veteran status. Integral to an intercollegiate athletic program is the institution's responsibility to its student athletes, which is extended to the visiting athletic staff and student athletes during practice and competition dates.

Colleges and universities intentionally seeking to achieve and maintain cultural competence and responsiveness are encouraged to familiarize themselves with the Standards of Practice for Health Promotion in Higher Education (SPHPHE). The constructs that inform SPHPHE's standards of practice affirm that health is the capacity of individuals and communities to reach their potential; specifically, that health is not simply the absence of disease but is "a positive concept emphasizing social and personal resources as well as physical capacities," as stated by the World Health Organization (WHO). It can be argued that the breadth of WHO's statement assumes cultural competence and responsiveness.

SPHPHE advocates health promotion initiatives aimed to expand protective factors and campus strengths and to reduce personal, campus, and community health risk factors. This is possible within the alignment with the mission and value statements of institutions of higher education. Because each college or university is a community—possessing components of a community (space, functional units, patterned social interaction, and symbols of collective identity—each institution is thereby positioned to build upon the interrelationships and interdependencies present among its student members. This approach both examines and addresses health issues at the intrapersonal, interpersonal, and institutional levels.

College and university health services articulate the best of higher education's commitment to cultural inclusion, competence, and responsiveness. While striving to deliver preventive education and services, these units promote the acknowledgement, understanding, and valuing of differing systems of beliefs, values, and customs that affect health. Health promotion in higher education advocates healthy environments guided by cultural competence and inclusion and respect, equality, and equity.

Linda Barley
York College, University of New York

See Also: Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Health Promotion Services

Further Readings

Emmett, M. "Priorities of the Association" (2011). http://www.ncaa.org/wps/wcm/connect/public/ncaa/about+the+ncaa#sthash.vObHlNqL.dpbs (Accessed December 2013).

Glanz, K., B. Rimer, and F. Lewis, eds. Health Behavior and Health Education: Theory, Research and Practice, 3rd ed. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2002.

Purnell, L. and B. Paulanka. Transcultural Health Care: A Culturally Component Approach, 3rd ed. Philadelphia: F. A Davis, 2008.

World Health Organization. http://www.who.int/healthpromotion/Milestones_Health_Promotion_05022010.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Colonialism, Lingering Effects of

Colonialism determined the policy of most European countries for centuries. Since the 15th century, when Spain and Portugal began colonial acquisition in Africa, India, and the Caribbean, European powers including Britain, France, and the Netherlands began to strengthen their ambitions to gain colonies on these continents. Colonialism was not just a European phenomenon; Asian countries like Japan also participated in the colonization process during the 20th century. With regard to the single colonialisms, factors of human diversities were responsible for the single lingering effects of the colonial rules of colonial powers in different colonial environments. Until the end of World Wars I and II, most colonies remained an essential part of the economies of these European powers, but the effects of colonialism were not one-sided. It influenced the colonies in a way that lingering effects of colonial rule are still visible in some nations. The former colonies remained influenced under economic, ethnic, and religious parameters, which are responsible for the standard of living in the non-European world, and immigrants from former colonial countries may have a need for special human services.

History of Colonization

Colonization occurred for different reasons. The desire for expansion, a religious mission, and the acquisition of new markets and raw materials were responsible for Spain and Portugal to begin colonizing regions in the late 15th century. Christopher Columbus and Vasco da Gama are well-known explorers who opened up new areas for Spanish and Portuguese trade and religious missionaries. In later centuries, both of these colonizers were replaced by the French, the British, and the Dutch, which were responsible for the decline of Spanish rule in Asia and the Caribbean. North America became a model colony, securing the British hegemony as a colonial power. Until the end of World War I, when the British dominions Canada, South Africa, and Australia became self-governing colonies, and the first decade after World War II, when the first African and Asian colonies were granted independence, the European Great Powers and Japan were eager to achieve the status of a colonial power. What had been a valuable part of economic success from the 15th to the 19th centuries became an expensive aspect of foreign policy after the late 19th century. From 1945 onward, most colonial powers became willing to abandon their rule on foreign continents. Despite this, until today, one is able to trace the long-term effects of colonial rule, which many experts think ended too quickly for most colonial nations, where a vacuum of power was responsible for many problems in the aftermath of independence.

Economic Effects

One of the most important lingering effects of colonialism is its economic effect. The European powers acquired colonies to strengthen their industry and supply of raw materials. Because of this, existing economic structures were implemented, as in India during the 15th and 16th centuries; but in later years, the colonial powers adopted a more intensive assertion of the colonial field. Industrialization spread from the mother country to the colonies, which could be seen as a positive effect, but at the same time, the raw materials were exploited (e.g., the gold and silver mines in South America) to provide the European countries with a surplus of prosperity. Many former colonies still produce the same products, which had been implemented as an industrial field in the colonial era (e.g., sugar production in Cuba), but suffer from a lack of precious metals, which were used to finance Europe during the early modern times. As a result, formerly luxurious products became cheaper in the postcolonial and more globalized world. The work-intensive productive processes in the colonial nation were also responsible for a growing slave trade, which justifies the ethnic effects of colonialism.

Ethnic Effects

Because of the Atlantic slave trade, many people were sold as slaves in Africa to harvest cotton in South America, though African slaves were not the only people who were forced to leave their homes. Multiethnic societies were established in the Caribbean, the United States, and South America, where blacks were needed to set up and drive large cotton, cocoa, and sugar plantations. Also, Indian people left their homes to serve in South Africa during the period of massive railway construction. Thus, colonialism led to an ethnic uprooting in African and Asian societies, but this was not its only ethnic effects. The process of demarcation in the colonial field was arbitrary because colonial powers drew the borders on a map. Ethnic conflicts or existing tribal organizations were ignored. This ignorance led to civil wars and many ethnic conflicts in Asia and Africa after the beginning of decolonization.

The different groups started to gamble for national power to establish their rule. For example, the Congolese and Sudanese civil wars were lingering long-term effects of colonialism. Different ethnic groups became part of the same nation-state because they had to live inside the same borders, but were unable to live their daily lives by following their needs and beliefs. Because of religious differences, states split up (i.e., India and Pakistan), in the post–World War

II era. There were not only local conflicts, which worsened as a consequence of the colonial period, but still other ethnic conflicts, especially the conflict between the black majority and the white elite—as was the issue of the apartheid system in South Africa. This was a system that was established during the colonial era, but existed until the 1990s as a lingering effect of colonization. The ethnic conflicts were not the only ones resulting from the colonial rule of the European powers.

Religious Effects

Following the colonial ambitions of the different European states, many missionaries started to enter the colonies to spread Christianity on the far-off continents of Africa, Asia, and South America. They were successful in baptizing many people in different countries, which led to very prominent Christian communities in these countries, such as Brazil. As a lingering effect of colonialism, today's Catholic Church has the biggest influence in former colonies. However, local religious beliefs and traditions were destroyed, and many religious conflicts occurred. One example is the Boxer Rebellion, which was led by a Chinese religious group—the Boxers—as a consequence of the increasing missionary work of foreign missionaries, who tried to baptize the Chinese people. Despite the uprisings, the colonial powers were generally able to suppress religiously driven uprisings in the individual nations, but there were not always conflicts. In some cases, a symbiosis of former religious beliefs and Christianity formed and created new forms of spiritual worship. Traditional and new aspects were mixed to create a new religious movement.

Because of the differing effects of colonialism on the individual colonies, most countries were unable to protect their cultural heritage against colonialism and Europeanism. The daily influence was able to systematically infiltrate the existing economic, ethnic, and religious traditions. As a consequence, the colonies changed. The changes lasted for centuries, and one is able to trace these changes through their lingering effects. Even if the situation differs from case to case, and varies in the extent of its lingering effects, colonialism is a global phenomenon, one of high historical importance, and is able to explain the present human diversity in many different nation-states. Each multicultural society has its roots in migration, which is in most cases a direct consequence of European governmental colonial policies. Even if the aim was initially economic, the way that colonialism was implemented changed through the ages and led to the situation. This situation is determined by different ethnic and religious exchanges, which are a direct consequence of the extended colonial era in the states' histories.

Frank Jacob
Julius-Maximilians-Universität, Würzburg

See Also: Assimilation; Cultural Determinism; Global South/Global North; Power, Race/Ethnicity and.

Further Readings

Gann, Lewis H. and Peter Duignan, eds. Colonialism in Africa 1870–1960. 5 vols. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1969–1973.
Leigh, Dale. Economies of Representation 1790–2000: Colonialism and Commerce. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2007.
Martin, Thomas, et al., eds. Crises of Europe: Decolonization and Europe's Imperial States, 1918–1975. London: Bloomsbury, 2010.
Nicholas, Thomas. Colonialism's Culture: Anthropology, Travel and Government. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press, 1996.

Communicable Diseases Common in Developing Countries

Disease is a serious threat to the overall well-being of populations across time and borders. The prevalence of diseases spread through communities and populations has plagued civilizations throughout history. From the bubonic plague in the 14th century that killed an estimated 25 million people in Europe to the influenza virus that results in approximately 500,000 deaths per year today, communicable diseases persist as serious threats to the livelihood of societies and the well-being of people in communities. Three out of every 10 deaths worldwide are attributed to communicable diseases. As organizations focus on the transmission of communicable diseases around the world, health monitoring indicates significant disparities in health education, prevention, and treatment among nations. These issues significantly impact communities in developing countries, where health care is limited and facilities lack the means necessary to provide adequate health care to reduce mortality rates associated with communicable diseases.

Mortality Rates

Deaths associated with communicable diseases account for high rates of premature loss of life. While communicable diseases cause 51 percent of deaths globally based on years of life lost (in young populations), only 8 percent of death in high-income countries is based on premature death, compared to 68 percent in low-income countries. Reliability of statistical data varies widely between high-income and low-income countries, with results from high-income countries valid to plus or minus 1 percent, and results in low-income countries at approximately plus or minus 15-20 percent. The reliability of statistical data in low-income countries is a result of underreporting, suggesting that mortality rates for communicable diseases may be much higher than indicated.

Transmission

Communicable diseases are transmitted from person to person, either through direct contact or contact with infected secretions or discharge. While some diseases, such as measles and pertussis, have a short incubation period and easily detectable symptoms, other diseases produce vague, nonspecific symptoms and some show no sign of infection. The diseases that show little to no sign of infection are those most capable of rapid transmission through a population. Influenza, for instance, is a widespread communicable disease that typically presents itself in symptoms subsequent to the person becoming contagious. Children are more likely to transmit influenza than adults, with incubation periods beginning days before symptoms and lasting up to two weeks after infection. Influenza can be transmitted airborne, through direct contact with a host, or from contaminated surfaces. Influenza outbreaks in developing countries can lead to a significant rise in transmission and death due to overpopulation and poor sanitation facilities, as well as a lack of resources to treat the large number of people suffering from the virus.

Other communicable diseases can become serious, lifelong battles. Human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), the virus leading to acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), has become a global concern. Since the documentation of Patient Zero in 1980, HIV/AIDS has infected over 70 million people worldwide, with over half of those cases resulting in death. An estimated 34 million people around the world are currently infected with the virus, with half of them being women and 10 percent children. Because of the lack of symptoms during the early stages of HIV/AIDS, its transmission can go undetected and spread through populations. HIV/AIDS is transmitted through blood and other bodily fluids, most commonly through unprotected sexual intercourse and needle-sharing typically associated with illegal drug use. Other modes of transmission, such as mother-to-fetus transmission and blood transfusions, are more prevalent in developing countries where lack of awareness and medical care fail to diagnose infected individuals, resulting in higher rates of transmission.

Awareness

Implementing disease control and prevention requires effective monitoring, community support, and resources to treat outbreaks and endemic infections. Organizations such as the World Health Organization (WHO), Institut Pasteur, and the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) provide outreach support to developing countries in order to bring awareness to populations lacking preventative education, health care facilities, and vaccination access. Global health initiatives (GHIs) such as Stop TB (tuberculosis), Roll Back Malaria, and the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunizations provide support systems and health care services to local communities. These GHIs align with the United Nations Millennium Development Goals (MDG) targeted at improving the quality of life in populations in the least-developed countries. MDG 4 and 5 focus on reducing child mortality and improving maternal health, respectively. MDG 6 achieves the preceding goals by combating communicable diseases in vulnerable populations. Through GHIs and other global awareness programs, worldwide efforts promote sustainable and effective procedures to eradicate preventable communicable diseases aligned with MDG and aimed at bridging the widespread health care resource gap throughout the developing world.

Over a decade since the promotion of MDG, progress has been made toward global awareness and reduction of communicable diseases in the least-developed nations. Although smallpox was eradicated in 1979 and rinderpest in 2011, most communicable diseases continue to plague developing countries in varying degrees. Eradicated or low-prevalence diseases in high-income countries continue to have high mortality rates in the developing world. Polioviruses, for instance, were eradicated in the Americas in 1994 but continue to be endemic in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Nigeria, and there also are outbreaks in developing countries in which there is overcrowding, high birth rates, and poor hygiene and sanitation. The largest public health initiative in history, proposed by the World Health Assembly (WHA) in 1988 to eradicate polioviruses, has shown a 99 percent success rate globally. Public health initiatives such as Stop Transmission of Polio (STOP) continue to provide country-based support to diminish disease outbreaks and work toward global elimination.

National and regional initiatives focused on communicable disease reduction have also shown great success. African countries, especially sub-Saharan nations, face an HIV/AIDS epidemic, accounting for the deaths of nine out of 10 children associated with HIV/AIDS in the worldwide mortality rate. GHIs concerned with HIV/AIDS focus on health education, treatment, and prevention. Through the President's Emergency Plan for Aids Relief (PEPFAR), the United States and other countries pledge to use breakthroughs in scientific research and effective prevention strategies to promote awareness and globally eradicate HIV/AIDS.

Results and Implications

GHIs and other programs provide a platform for developing countries to establish health practices aimed at preventing and treating communicable diseases. The collaboration through global partnerships to improve health care worldwide has proven successful in combating several communicable diseases across populations. Due to increased health monitoring on local, national, and global levels, great strides have been made to decrease the transmission of communicable diseases. Over 20 million people have survived tuberculosis due to GHI treatments, millions of children avert malaria through prevention and education, and increased access to antiretroviral medication has helped treat millions of people infected with HIV around the world. Yet, as shown through the MDG regarding health, the current status of diseases around the world is not diminishing at the rate many hoped for. As of 2011, over 7 million people infected with HIV lack access to antiretroviral medication. Eighty percent of malaria deaths occur in 14 countries, all of which are developing countries. Although progress is seen in many areas, the eradication of communicable diseases in developing countries is a formidable task requiring the dedication of GHIs and worldwide support to provide developing countries with sustainable methods of health education and prevention.

Whitney Szmodis
Lehigh University

See Also: Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality; AIDS/HIV Programs; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Disparities, Role of; Pharmaceuticals, Access to.

Further Readings

Chin, James. Control of Communicable Diseases Manual, 17th ed. Washington, DC: American Public Health Association, 2000.

Jamison, Dean T. and W. Henry Mosley. "Disease Control Priorities in Developing Countries: Health Policy Responses to Epidemiological Change." American Journal of Public Health, v.81/1 (1991).

Murray, Christopher J. L. and Alan D. Lopez. "Mortality by Cause for Eight Regions of the World: Global Burden of Disease Study." Lancet, v.349/9061 (1997).

Walker, Damian and Julia A. Fox-Rushby. "Economic Evaluation of Communicable Disease Interventions in Developing Countries: A Critical Review of the Published Literature." Health Economics, v. 9/8 (2000).

Communication Disorders, Services for

Communication disorders occur across the age span, from infancy to the elderly, and encompass the diagnosis and intervention of individuals with difficulty in receiving, sending, processing, and understanding verbal, nonverbal, and graphic symbol systems. Speech disorders are classified as articulation/phonology, fluency (stuttering), and voice disorders. Language disorders reflect difficulties in form (phonology, morphology, and syntax), content (semantics/meaning), and use of language (pragmatics), or any combination of these linguistic components. Speech and language are distinguished from one another because speech mainly deals with the production of sounds and syllables, and language focuses on understanding (receptive) and producing (expressive) language.

There are multiple causes of communication disorders, such as motor speech disorders like apraxia and dysarthria. Aphasia, loss of language resulting from a stroke, tends to occur more often in adults, but children, particularly those with sickle cell anemia, may also experience strokes. Feeding and swallowing disorders also fall under the umbrella of communication disorders. Different types and degrees of hearing loss influence speech intelligibility and receptive and expressive language, which may be associated with individuals who have been diagnosed as deaf or hard of hearing (HOH). Central auditory processing disorders influence the ability to perceptually make sense out of what is heard, according to the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association. Traumatic brain injury (TBI), autism spectrum disorders, cleft lip and palate, developmental difficulties such as Down syndrome, and emotional/behavioral difficulties also contribute to communication disorders.

Neurologically based sensory and structural difficulties are referred to as organic disorders, as contrasted with functional disorders. Functional disorders occur when the onset of the problem occurs in preschool, school-age, and high school students, and is a disorder for which there is no identifiable cause. Speech-language pathologists (SLPs) are required to spend six years in undergraduate and graduate training and one year of supervised full-time paid practice after completing the graduate degree. Concerns about any individual with a suspected communication disorder should be referred to SLPs, who are highly trained and skilled and can work with families and agencies to meet the needs of the individual.

Demographics

Communication disorders may be acquired or developmental, judged by degree of severity, and may be a primary disorder or coexist with other impairments. As contrasted with language disorders, language differences do not constitute a disability and are influenced by social, regional, and cultural practices. Language differences, also called social dialects, regional dialects, and language varieties, are often associated with race, ethnicity, and cultural variables. Although there is evidence that socioeconomic status (SES) may impact a decrease in vocabulary, overall limited resources do not appear to significantly affect acquisition of the rules of speech and language. SLPs are charged with distinguishing language disorders from language differences by determining what is a communication disorder, and what linguistic characteristics mainly reflect the influence of the person's linguistic environment. It is also the role of the SLP to determine when there are disorders in the presence of a language difference, that is, the two sets of linguistic characteristics can co-occur.

SLPs may have difficulty sorting out which grammatical rules, vocabulary, semantics, and speech productions constitute a difference versus a disorder. The inability to do so tends to lead to misdiagnoses and overdiagnoses of language disorders among children from multicultural backgrounds. Therefore, service delivery requests should ask for an evaluation in the first and second dialect or the first and second language. Other demographic data reveal that males have a higher prevalence in select communication disorders. For example, A. Proctor and associates reported that there was a statistically significant difference in gender, with males having a higher prevalence of stuttering (disfluency) than females. This same study revealed no statistically significant difference in stuttering between African American and white preschoolers. Other evidence from D. H. McKinnon and colleagues suggests a higher prevalence of language disorders and speech disorders may be found in males as opposed to females.

Service Delivery

Intervention plans are typically customized for the individual, depending on the specific disorder or the co-occurrence of disorders. For some communication disorders, such as articulation/phonology and childhood language disorders, there are well-designed intervention programs that may be applied to many who are diagnosed with the same disorder. However, there are other disorders for which an individualized intervention plan must be developed. For instance, the effects of TBI do not result in a homogeneous group, requiring unique therapy plans for each individual. Alternatively, those with aphasia can be categorized into homogeneous groupings, and intervention programs can be applied to everyone with a specific type of aphasia.

Evidence suggests that children receive the greater amount of service because they are screened and identified, and intervention can be readily provided in schools nationwide. Prominent among school-based models of service delivery are the pull-out model, the classroom intervention model, the indirect consultative model, and the collaboration model. In the pull-out model, the child leaves the classroom to receive intervention with an SLP in a different setting within the school. After the SLP completes intervention activities, the child is returned to the classroom. Both individualized and group intervention may utilize the pull-out model. In the classroom-based model, the SLP provides intervention to a child or small groups of children within the context of the classroom. There are different modifications to the classroom-based model. For instance, the SLP and the classroom teacher team teach and use scaffolding to integrate language intervention with regular instruction. Another modification requires the SLP to accept primary responsibility in managing a small class of children who have been diagnosed as language impaired.

The indirect consultative model also has modifications. Indirect infers that the SLP does not deliver the services per se. In some cases, the SLP develops appropriate goals for each child and then supervises a speech-language assistant in administering activities so that the child will meet the goals. The clinician-caregiver consultative model requires the SLP to conduct parent training and thereby facilitates parents' abilities to deliver selected intervention to the child. In other cases, the SLP consults with the classroom teacher who integrates language and speech goals into the context of the curriculum. The collaborative model, a transdisciplinary approach, considers that a single person does not hold all of the knowledge needed to make therapeutic decisions. Therefore, a team of professionals who have expertise in different areas of special education work collaboratively to diagnose the problem, plan goals, and deliver intervention. The team usually includes parents, paraprofessionals, and the students. Studies of which model is more efficacious suggest that no one model is superior to another, and that each is clinically useful depending on its application in different settings.

The American Speech-Language-Hearing Association (ASHA) reports 14 variables that influence service delivery in schools. Jayne Brandel and Diane Frome Loebe reorganized the ASHA variables into characteristics associated with the individual with the disorder, characteristics related to the SLP, and the setting in which services are provided. The model, named the school-based intervention decision making (SIDM) model, consists of variables that can be applied in other service delivery settings outside of the elementary school. That is, when services are delivered outside of the elementary school setting, such as acute and subacute hospitals, rehabilitation facilities, or clinics, the individual, the SLP, and the setting will also be considered in decision making about frequency, intensity, and content of therapy.

With the availability of improved technology, services can be delivered via telepractice communication networks, online Web sites, and other alternative technological mechanisms. Finally, early intervention models have also emerged for infants, toddlers, preschoolers, and their families. Early intervention models mainly focus on family-centered approaches and service delivery in naturalistic environments, such as intervention and parent training during home visits and different types of coaching models.

Adele Proctor
University of Illinois

See Also: Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in; Disability Services; Disabled Clients; Educational Support Services; Special Education.

Further Readings

Cirrin, F. M., et al. "Evidence-Based Systematic Review: Effects of Different Service Delivery Models on Communication Outcomes for Elementary School–Age Children." Language, Speech and Hearing Services in Schools, v.41 (2010).

McKinnon, D. H., S. McLeod, C. Sturt, and S. Reilly. "The Prevalence of Stuttering, Voice, and Speech-Sound Disorders in Primary School Students in Australia." Language Speech and Hearing Services in Schools, v.38 (2007).

Proctor, A., E. Yairi, M. C. Duff, and J. Zhang. "Prevalence of Stuttering in African American Preschoolers." Journal of Speech, Language and Hearing Research, v.51/6 (2008).

Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in

Because of a growing global economy, the population has become increasingly more diverse. In order to make accurate assessments and plan effectively, communication between human services professionals and their clients must be clear, precise, and complete. For counselors, social workers, case managers, psychologists, nurses, and psychiatrists who depend on the nuances of language to understand their clients at a deeper psychological level, an understanding of the communication styles of many cultures and ethnicities is essential, a task complicated by the countless variations within any ethnic group. The intermingling of races and ethnicities suggests that communication styles will continue to emerge, rendering descriptions of communication styles relative to context and individual differences. Verbal communication includes the spoken word, tone of voice, and nonverbal behaviors. Transcending the written or spoken word are proxemics, the perception and use of personal space; kinesics, bodily movements such as facial expressions, posture, characteristics of movement, gestures, and eye contact; and paralanguage, which includes loudness of voice, pauses, silences, hesitations, rate, and inflections.

Patterns in speech, eye contact, listening, responding, and manner define the communication style of a culture. White, black, Hispanic, Asian, Native American, and Arab cultures have general differences in communication style. In all primates, emotions cause physiological reactions that have distinct universal signs. Culture, however, can modify the expression of emotional responses and complicate the assessment process. For example, poor eye contact and minimal feedback that suggest depression in a white client are normal demeanor for a Native American. Communication differences among cultures also reflect cultural differences in history, beliefs, and values.

High-context and low-context communication refer to how much a speaker relies on actual words to communicate. Cultures that have high-context communication use both verbal and nonverbal messages. High-context communication requires a listener to have excellent observational skills and a thorough knowledge of body language and nonverbal cues to understand the message. Persons from the same culture will more accurately read the meaning of nonverbal behaviors. Persons of a different culture must familiarize themselves with the behavioral nuances of different cultures. Asia, the Middle East, Africa, and South America are high-context cultures. Low-context cultures rely more on the literal meaning of words to determine the speaker's intentions. Written communication is sufficient to accomplish the communication goals of low-context cultures. The United States, Germany, Switzerland, and the Scandinavian countries are low-context cultures.

Whites

Communication patterns among whites are congruent with individualistic societies. Americans are future-focused, task-based, and often driven to gain mastery of people, situations, and nature. Their happiness often comes from achievement. White Americans tend to speak louder and faster than other cultures, and to have more eye contact. In public communications, white Americans restrain themselves from emotional expression, often equating it with a lack of control. Maintaining a midrange of volume, tone, and tempo is preferable to passionate expression, which may be associated with being irrational in America. In conversation, the speaker tends to look away from the listener, and the listener looks directly at the speaker. When whites hear and understand a comment, they nod in acknowledgement, and they respond quickly to the comments of others. White Americans have a moderate range of expressive gestures. Because white Americans have diverse origins, among whites different ethnicities interpret communication differently. Italians, for instance, consider loud and animated talk to be the mark of a stimulating conversation. The English may find the same volume of conversation threatening and the mark of impending conflict.

African Americans

African Americans animate communications with frequent, large gestures and speech that is loud and fast. African Americans have a large range of volume and pitch, and their movement within that range changes from situation to situation. With each other, blacks have closer proxemics and are more likely to communicate through touch. Eye contact is direct and sustained when African Americans speak, but when they are listening, eye contact diminishes, which is the opposite of the dominant white culture eye-contact patterns. African Americans are quick to respond, and it is common within the culture to interrupt before another has finished speaking. Passionate communication is more believable to African Americans, and the neutral, objective tone of standard American English often garners suspicion and distrust.

African Americans speak in a dialect of black English, and can easily change from the dialect to mainstream language. Black English has a unique vocabulary, pronunciation, grammar, syntax, and accent. "Ebonics" is a term coined to describe black English as a combination of ebony and phonics. In many contexts, the cultural communication differences between whites and African Americans are perceived as conflicts.

When African Americans call and respond, whites perceive them as loud, aggressive, and impolite. Whites often view animated African American behaviors as childish and unsophisticated. African Americans communicate with their bodies. The young African American's slow, swinging style of walking gives a message of assertion. Slapping the palms of each other's hands indicates agreement or celebration.

Hispanics

Like Asians and Native Americans, Hispanics have much diversity within the culture. Hispanics have a low-key manner in public, they tend to speak more quietly than other cultures, and they are offended by louder-speaking groups. In a group solely composed of Hispanics, their natural emotionality is expressed with more animated speech and larger gestures. Hispanics may avoid eye contact and look away or down when they are addressed, especially by an older person. Although they nod when they have heard or understood another person, they often have a mild delay before they respond.

Native American

Native Americans value cooperation over competition, and maintain a strong belief in living in harmony with nature and others. In communications, they tend to be reserved and nonconfrontational. It is easy to underestimate a Native American's passion for an issue because of their restraint of expression. Native American communication is low key, with a small range of pitch, tone, and volume. In conversations, Native Americans allow each other to complete their thoughts. Direct eye contact may be seen as intrusive. Indirect eye contact is particularly important in communication with elders.

A silent delay before responding to another's comments is typical. A Native American client may be listening intently while they are looking down. Quick responses to the comments made by a Native American might suggest that the speaker is being dismissive. Although Native Americans offer little feedback spontaneously, a "talking circle" is part of Native American tradition. In the circle, every member has an opportunity to express formerly unspoken thoughts. Verbal feedback and interruption are forbidden in the circle, but subtle feedback is given nonverbally through a grunt of agreement or a cough, indicating that the group is ready to move on.

Asians

Asian culture is diverse, but as a whole, it is collectivistic. Asians place value on the family, community, or work team ahead of the individual. Happiness derives from the success of the group, and failing the group incurs shame. The Chinese and Japanese place importance on status, keeping shorter eye contact with persons of higher status, and adjusting their verbiage to reflect status differences. Compared to other cultures, Asians are reserved in conversation, speaking quietly and avoiding eye contact, especially with strangers. Gestures are restrained in comparison to other cultures. Touching strangers is unacceptable, and women do not shake hands. Comments may be acknowledged with a nod, but Asians tend to have a brief delay before they give a verbal response. Asians are very reserved in expressing emotions, believing that emotionality denotes loss of control, so smiling and laughter are commonly used to mask anger, disagreement, or frustration. Asians are nonconfrontational and indirect, and may maintain silence rather than enter into a disagreement.

Arab Americans

The Arab culture values eloquence. Arabs frequently communicate through poetry, beautiful blessings, and colorful curses. The belief that words have power leads Arabs to believe that negative talk leads to negative outcomes, so they sometimes understate difficulties to avoid giving them power. Arabs are highly expressive, using broad hand gestures and loud speech. Men may exaggerate grief or sadness. A polite demeanor is important in the Arab culture. Some nonverbal behaviors that are acceptable in American culture are offensive to Arab Americans. Excessive smiling, for instance, gives Arabs the impression of superficiality. Pointing a finger at someone is threatening in Arab culture, and calling someone with a finger is considered demeaning. Arabs may soften the truth to maintain a congenial relationship, or they may be vague in lieu of saying "no." Gender roles are an important part of Arab culture. Behaviors typical of the American male are not acceptable in the Arab culture. Males do not stare, maintain eye contact, or engage in private conversation with a woman.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Webster University

See Also: Cultural and Linguistically Appropriate Services Standards; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Ethnicity and Clients.

Further Readings

Dulmus, Catherine N., Karen M. Sowers, and Bruce A. Thyer. Human Behavior in the Social Environment: Theories for Social Work Practice. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2012.
Robinson-Wood, Tracey L. The Convergence of Race, Ethnicity, and Gender. Princeton, NC: Merrill, 2012.
Wing Sue, Derald. Counseling the Culturally Diverse: Theory and Practice. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2012.

Community Action Agencies

Community action agencies (CAAs), both nonprofit public and private entities, are the local-level agencies designated to fight the War on Poverty declared by President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964, expanding on the policy ideas initiated during the Kennedy administration. These agencies were regulated by the Office of Economic Opportunity, which was established by the Economic Opportunity Act (EOA) of 1964. CAAs were tasked with fighting poverty at the local level by helping people achieve self-sufficiency.

The EOA also created programs such as Job Corps, the Neighborhood Youth Corps, and Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA). However, CAAs became the most controversial aspect of Johnson's War on Poverty. CAAs serve both the urban and rural poor, providing a direct source of assistance for those living in poverty. Every state (96 percent of U.S. counties), as well as Puerto Rico and the Trust Territories, are served by CAAs, with nearly 1,000 agencies in existence. CAAs incorporate an empowerment and services strategy aimed at giving low-income people and their communities the tools with which to overcome poverty. The majority of clients served by CAAs have incomes at or below 75 percent of the federal poverty line.

A restructuring phase of CAAs occurred from 1967-68 with the passage of the Green and the Quie Amendments. The Green Amendment required that a CAA must be designated by local officials as the official CAA for a particular area in order to operate in that community and receive federal funds. In several larger cities, the CAAs were taken over by the mayor and turned into a public agency. The Quie Amendment required CAA boards of directors to be made up of one-third elected officials, one-third low-income representatives, and the remainder from the private sector. These two amendments had positive effects on most CAA boards, despite the initial concerns of poverty groups that had been operating independently.

CAAs have undergone many challenges at the federal level since their creation, including President Richard Nixon's directive in 1973 to his appointee to the Office of Economic Opportunity, Howard Phillips, to close the office and not spend the money Congress provided for it (which was not requested by Nixon, but allocated by Congress nonetheless). CAAs survived this challenge, attaining a victory from the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., which ruled that the president could not refuse to spend funds appropriated by Congress. In 1974, the

In his special message to Congress on March 16, 1964, President Lyndon Johnson stated, "Because it is right, because it is wise, and because, for the first time in our history, it is possible to conquer poverty."

Community Services Amendments were passed and the Office of Economic Opportunity was dismantled and replaced by the Community Services Administration (CSA). Under President Jimmy Carter, CAAs were strengthened, but the enthusiasm for these programs was short-lived as President Ronald Reagan sought to reduce the federal government's support of domestic social programs, of which CAAs were a part. The consolidation of human needs programs into block grants, with a reduction of funds for those programs, as well as the designation of oversight to the states, resulted in abolishment of the Community Services Administration (CSA) and rescission of the Equal Opportunity Act.

The Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981 created Community Services Block Grants (CSBG) to provide continued federal funding of CAAs, with administrative authority for these agencies delegated to the states. At present, CAAs continue to be federally funded through CSBGs. The Omnibus Reconciliation Act also mandated the structure of CSAs, laid out goals, and detailed the use of CSBG funds. The act aimed to have a network of CAAs that would work to reduce poverty, revitalize low-income communities, and empower low-income families and individuals in rural and urban settings to become fully self-sufficient.

Funding and Accountability

Funding for CAAs originates in the Office of Community Services (OCS), which forwards a notice of funds available to the states after Congress appropriates money for CSBGs and these funds have been apportioned by the Office of Management and Budget. OCS receives 1.5 percent of the CSBG appropriation for training, assistance, evaluation, and performance measurement. After receiving their share of the money, the states provide funding to CAAs through grants or contracts.

With the reauthorization of CSBGs by the Coates Human Services Reauthorization Act in 1998, CAAs were required to conduct outcome reporting. In order to measure these agencies' performance, the OCS adopted the Results-Oriented Management and Accountability (ROMA) system. Created by the Monitoring and Assessment Task Force, a group of federal, state, and local community officials, and based on principles contained in the Government Performance and Results Act of 1993, ROMA provides a framework for continual growth and improvement for all CAAs.

ROMA created six broad antipoverty goals to guide the work of CAAs, which sought to: (1) enable low-income people to become more self-sufficient; (2) improve the conditions in which low-income people live; (3) enable low-income people to own a stake in their community; (4) achieve partnerships among supporters and providers of service to low-income people; (5) enable CAAs to increase their capacity to achieve results; and (6) enable low-income people, especially vulnerable populations, to achieve their potential by strengthening family and other supportive systems. To achieve these goals, CAAs assess poverty needs and conditions within their local communities. They also must define a clear agency antipoverty mission and strategy to address those needs, both in the short and long term. Further, CAAs must identify specific results to be achieved among low-income people, organizing and implementing services, programs, and activities to attain the results identified. For each goal created by ROMA, the OCS has set direct outcome measures for which the CAAs must report.

This grassroots, community-controlled effort is led by a locally controlled board, whose members included poor people in the community. The board directs and determines the needs of the local community and where funding could best be spent to alleviate poverty. Because each CAA is locally governed, services and programs vary depending on the needs identified at the local level. When created, the CAAs' board structure was important in terms of representing local needs and those living in poverty, who would be served by the agencies. A provision of the Equal Opportunity Act called for the poor to have maximum feasible participation in the identification of problems and their solutions, as they so defined them. Therefore, at least one-third of the boards' members are from the low-income community, exactly one-third are public officials, and up to one-third are from the private sector.

Promise and Services

Each CAA adopts the National Promise of community action which states: "Community Action changes people's lives, embodies the spirit of hope, improves communities, and makes America a better place to live. We care about the entire community, and we are dedicated to helping people help themselves and each other." CAAs conduct annual community-wide needs assessments to identify the concerns of the low-income community and set program priorities. There is no typical CAA, as each develops programs and services in response to local conditions of poverty. Services provided by the agencies span a wide spectrum including, but not limited to: emergency services (food pantries, energy assistance, homeless assistance), education (Head Start, literacy, adult basic education), food and nutrition (food banks, Meals on Wheels), family development (day care, case management, employment support), training/employment (job readiness, job training, job creation), income management (budgeting, financial literacy), transportation (on-demand transportation, rural transportation systems), housing (weatherization, home-ownership, rental assistance), economic development (small business development, business planning and loans), and health care (prescription assistance, health clinics, and the Women, Infants and Children program). CAAs have also provided local support in helping individuals in their communities cope with natural and man-made disasters.

To guide their work, CAAs follow the Community Action Code of Ethics wherein they dedicate themselves to eliminating poverty by opening to everyone the opportunities for education and training, for work, and to live in decency and dignity, respecting cultural diversity. The community action movement strives to address and ease the misery of poverty, replace despair with opportunity and hope, make known the plight of the poor, focus on people (individuals, families, and communities), and facilitate groups working together to solve problems.

CAAs are represented by the National Association of Community Action Agencies (NACAA), the largest national organization representing the interests of CAAs. The NACAA is governed by a democratically elected board of directors that works closely with state and regional associations to respond to the professional needs of the CAAs. Since 1992, CAA staff can become certified community action professionals (CCAP), a recognition of high honor within the organization achieved via completion of an extensive portfolio, study, and examination.

CAAs continue to work as advocates, service providers, and initiators of change on behalf of the poor. They strive to create the conditions by which low-income individuals, families, and communities can be lifted out of poverty, representing a war on the causes and conditions of poverty by utilizing an empowerment strategy designed to provide the tools with which to overcome poverty.

Lisa Clifton
Cedarville University

See Also: Food Insecurity; Head Start and Prekindergarten Programs; Homelessness; Housing Support and Homeless Services; Poverty; War on Poverty Programs.

Further Readings

CAA Executives' Handbook. Washington, DC: National Association of Community Action Agencies, 2000.

Clark, Robert F. Maximum Feasible Success: A History of the Community Action Program. Washington, DC: National Association of Community Action Agencies, 2000.

Payne, Ruby. A Framework for Understanding Poverty. Highland, TX: Aha Process, 2005.

Standards of Excellence: Achieving Excellence in Community Action. Washington, DC: Community Action Partnership, 2009.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. http://www.eeoc.gov/laws/statutes/titlevii.cfm (Accessed November 2013).

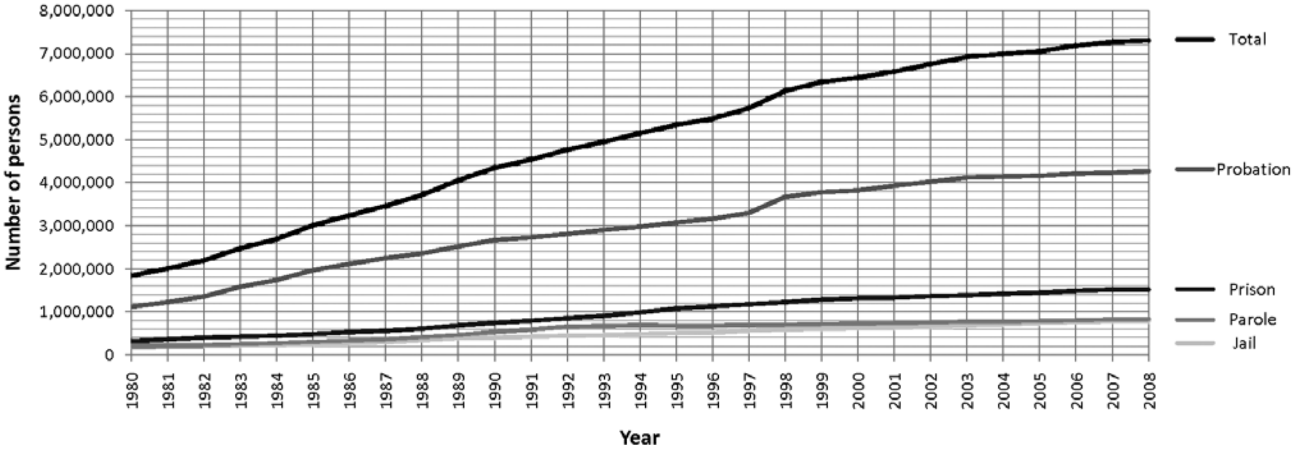
Community Corrections

The United States currently has more incarcerated people than any country in the world. This unprecedented period (1970 to present) of incarceration has resulted in severe prison overcrowding. Prisons in some cases are operating at capacities double or triple their initial design. Prison cells that were initially designed for one person are outfitted with double or triple bunks to accommodate the influx of new prisoners. Prison overcrowding presents serious safety issues for corrections officers and prisoners alike. Escalating prison violence and the high cost of operating prisons, coupled with high levels of recidivism (when people return to prison postrelease), have forced policy makers to examine alternative solutions in response to crime. One example is community corrections. Community corrections is a practice of the criminal justice system that sentences people convicted of crimes to community monitoring, rather than an official prison setting. Community corrections does not restrict an offender to their home, but rather to halfway housing, work, and educational release programs; mental health hospitals; and substance abuse impatient treatment. Some individuals under the auspice of community corrections have yet to be convicted (i.e., are out on bail awaiting trial); however, they are often subjected to many of the same guidelines as those convicted of crimes. City, state, and federal authorities have begun utilizing community corrections as an alternative to sending individuals convicted of crimes to prison. It is estimated that between 5 and 7 million people are under some form of community correctional supervision, such as probation or parole. African Americans and Hispanics represent almost two-thirds of all community corrections convictions. Most are poor, lacking education, and present greater health (physical and mental) disparities than the general public (this also holds true for individuals in prison).

Organization

The length of time that an individual serves while on a community correction sentence varies according to the severity of the crime. A community correction sentence could range from six months to five years. Most individuals sentenced under community corrections are convicted of nonviolent crimes (e.g., drug sale or possession). Many individuals are not sentenced to community corrections, but are rather subject to a period of community corrections after their prison sentence concludes: An example would be an individual sentenced to five years in prison, but eligible for release from prison after three years. If he or she is released from prison after three years, then he or she is required to serve the remaining two years under community corrections (i.e., parole or probation).

Figure 1 Correctional populations in the United States, 1980 to 2008



Source: Bureau of Justice Statistics Correctional Surveys.

Empirical data has shown that individuals sentenced to community corrections, rather than prison, tend to have a higher ratio of success, meaning that they tend to commit fewer future crimes or to return to prison for violating community correctional guidelines. The relative success of community corrections is partly attributed to its holistic and collaborative approach, utilizing nonprofit organizations, religious institutions, and family/community members in the rehabilitation process. This collaborative approach creates a holistic treatment paradigm that is able to tackle the complexity of challenges often associated with individuals in the criminal justice system, whereas services for offenders in prison settings tend to be minimal and lacking because of budgetary and policy restrictions. Many proponents of alternatives to prison programs, such as community corrections, espouse the importance of partnering with family members and nonprofit organizations. They further denounce a deterministic view of crime (i.e., individual behavior/cognition solely) and the belief that the offender can only be helped, and crime reduced, when a model is established that provides a multidimensional approach to treatment, inclusive of socioeconomic conditions.

Individuals under the auspice of community corrections have restrictions placed on their liberties. They often have stringent guidelines to which they must adhere while serving a community corrections sentence. While the guidelines will vary by state or federal jurisdictions, they often include a restriction on travel, and consumption of alcohol and illegal substances, and mandates to attend substance abuse, educational, and work programs. Restrictions can also include obtaining a driver's license, revocation of the right to vote, inability to reside in public housing, and bans from certain state and federal jobs. Some of these restrictions are lifted once an individual serves the allotted community corrections time, yet research indicates that the stigma of being formerly incarcerated often creates a perverse double jeopardy (i.e., job and housing discrimination because of a criminal conviction) that remains long after the sentence is served.

Management

The local departments of probation and parole typically oversee guideline adherence for individuals in community corrections. A risk assessment scale is utilized to evaluate the likeliness of reoffending, and to thus determine the level of supervision that an individual will require. The risk assessment scale utilizes factors such as the crime accused or convicted, past criminal history, and age of the individual as determinants to calculate risk of the offender committing new crimes. Parole and probation officers arrange meetings with individuals at their respective agencies daily, weekly, and monthly, depending on the determined risk level. The level of risk is typically calculated on a scale from 1 to 10, with 10 being the greatest risk for future criminal behavior. In addition to face-to-face meetings, parole/probation officers can also utilize phone calls and electronic monitoring devices (i.e., an ankle bracelet). An electronic monitoring device conveys an alarm to the parole/probation officer if the individual leaves the agreed catchment area. Catchment areas vary according to crimes committed or accused, but most individuals have the ability to go to work and school or receive treatment while serving a community correction sentence.

During visits with parole and probation officers, individuals in community corrections are often tested for illegal substances, including alcohol. They are also required to give a verbal or physical report (i.e., pay stubs) corroborating their adherence to the guidelines set forward by the terms of their community correction sentence. Parole/probation officers will also conduct both announced and unannounced visits to the home and workplace. If it is deemed that individuals are noncompliant with the terms set out, the respective officer has the power to arrest the individual and confine him or her to jail until a violation of parole/probation hearing occurs. A judge makes a determination at this hearing whether or not a violation occurred. If a violation is deemed not to occur, the individual will be released back to community corrections with the same or updated guidelines. If it is deemed that the individual violated the terms put forward, he or she can be sentenced to a period of incarceration, sometimes for the remainder of the original community correction sentence.

A violation of probation/parole hearing will also take place if an individual commits a new crime and is convicted while on a community correction sentence. In most cases, the new crime conviction is considered a violation of the community corrections guidelines. The judge will most likely recommend that the remaining time be served in prison concurrently or consecutively, with any prison time stemming from the new conviction.

Growth in Usage

Community corrections are of particular importance to policy makers and government officials in light of the current state of incarceration in the United States. State and federal prison populations have risen tenfold from the 1970s to the present. However, the vast majority of people incarcerated are poor people of color, and most are incarcerated for substance abuse violations. However, research indicates that drug usage is in many cases more pervasive among whites. The racial disparity in arrests and convictions has many social justice advocates concerned. They believe that communities, which are already at a social and economic disadvantage, could now be turned into open-air prisons under the auspice of community corrections.

The failure of prisons, coupled with the huge financial cost associated with prison incarceration, has moved community corrections to the forefront of criminal justice. Community corrections are a cheaper alternative to prison incarceration, and have shown greater potential of lowering the likelihood of future crime when compared to individuals sentenced to prison. Greater research and time is necessary to determine if community corrections can truly address issues of crime and punishment in America.

Kirk Anthony James
University of Pennsylvania

See Also: Incarceration and Sentencing, Racial Disparities in; Jail Diversion Programs for Children and Adolescents; Juvenile Justice System; Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners; Probation and Parole Officers; Restorative Justice.

Future Readings

Gendreau, Paul, Francis T. Cullen, and James Bonta. "Intensive Rehabilitation Supervision: The Next Generation in Community Corrections?" Federal Probation, v.58 (1994).

Gendreau, Paul, Claire Goggin, and Mario Paparozzi. "Principles of Effective Assessment for Community Corrections." Federal Probation, v.60/3 (1996).

McCarthy, Belinda Rodgers, Bernard J. McCarthy, and Matthew C. Leone. Community-Based Corrections. Stamford, CT: Wadsworth, 2001.

Trotter, Christopher. "The Impact of Different Supervision Practices in Community Corrections: Cause for Optimism." Australian & New Zealand Journal of Criminology, v.29/1 (1996).

Community Development Block Grants

Created by the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974, the Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) program assists urban, suburban, and rural communities to improve housing and living conditions and expand economic opportunities for low- and moderate-income persons. The CDBG program provides annual grants to 1,209 city and county governments and states. Funding for the CDBG program has been cut 37 percent since 2010, leaving local governments that count on CDBG funds pressuring Congress to restore funds, and critics of the program pointing to what they consider wasteful spending and calling for deeper cuts.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) was created in 1965 as part of President Lyndon B. Johnson's Great Society, along with a range of urban grant programs designed to end urban blight and make cities more livable. A decade later, the nation's mayors were disillusioned with the restrictions that these programs placed on how federal funds could be used in their cities, and President Richard Nixon was eager to give cities wider discretion in spending and less government intrusion. The Nixon administration was formulating community development revenue sharing legislation by 1971, and the Senate passed an omnibus housing bill that included community development block grants in 1972. The bill was blocked by the House Rules Committee because of opposition to other provisions in it. Congress passed an omnibus housing and community development bill, including the CDBG, in 1974. It was signed into law by President Gerald Ford a few days after the resignation of Richard Nixon.

Grant Programs

The act combined several categorical grant programs into one block grant. The CDBG program has three major components. First, entitlement grants are distributed by formula to every city that has a population of at least 50,000 or is a county seat. Cities have considerable flexibility in how the funds are spent as long as funded activities meet one of the CDBG objectives: benefitting low-or-moderate-income families, aiding in the prevention or elimination of blight, or meeting a critical community need. Second, grants to small cities provide funds to nonentitlement communities for community development activities in line with the CDBG objectives. In all states except Hawai'i, this program is administered by a state agency. The HUD Honolulu Office directly administers the CDBG program for nonentitlement communities in the state of Hawai'i.

Third, the Section 108 program allows communities to use their CDBG funds as a guarantee to back up federal financing for economic development, housing rehabilitation, public facilities, and large-scale physical development projects. Although there are specific requirements and exceptions, the Section 108 program allows cities access to as much as five times its annual CDBG funding for such projects as the acquisition of real property; the rehabilitation of publicly owned real property; housing rehabilitation eligible under CDBG; construction, reconstruction, or installation of public facilities (including street, sidewalk, and other site improvements); related relocation, clearance, and site improvements; payment of interest on the guaranteed loan and issuance costs of public offerings; debt service reserves; public works and site improvements in colonias; and in limited circumstances, housing construction as part of community economic development, Housing Development Grant, or Nehemiah Housing Opportunity Grant programs.

In addition to these three components, the CDBG program provides grants to insular areas, disaster recovery assistance, and neighborhood stabilization. Insular areas include American Samoa, Guam, Northern Mariana Islands, and the Virgin Islands. CDBG disaster recovery funds are available to states, units of general local governments, Indian tribes, and insular areas designated by the president as disaster areas. Generally, grantees are required to use at least half of disaster recovery funds for activities that principally benefit low-and moderate-income persons. These funds may be used for recovery efforts that include housing, economic development, infrastructure, and prevention of further damage to affected areas, as long as efforts do not duplicate recovery actions funded by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Small Business Administration, and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

Congress appropriates these funds in addition to regularly budgeted CDBG funds. The largest appropriations include $3.483 billion in 2001 and 2002 to assist post–September 11th New York City's recovery efforts; $16.7 billion in 2006 to assist the victims of Hurricanes Katrina, Rita, and Wilma; and $15.8 billion in 2013 to assist recovery from Hurricane Sandy. The CDBG Neighborhood Stabilization Program provides grants to communities that have suffered from foreclosures and delinquencies to purchase, rehabilitate, or develop homes and stabilize neighborhoods.

Local entitlement cities and counties receive 70 percent of CDBG funds, and states receive 30 percent. Rural counties and other nonentitlement communities compete for funding from the state formula allocation. The Department of Housing and Urban Development developed the formula that states use to guide allocations. The department must consider such measures of community need as the extent of poverty, population, housing overcrowding, age of housing, and population growth lag in relationship to other metropolitan areas.

Funding Cuts

The 1975 federal budget allocated $2.7 billion to the new CDBG program. Had appropriations kept pace with inflation, the CDGB funding for 2013 would have been more than $11 billion. Instead, for fiscal year 2013, CDBG is funded at $3.07 billion, a 30 percent reduction. Organizations such as the U.S. Conference of Mayors, a nonpartisan organization of cities with populations of 30,000 or more, and the National Association of Counties, the national organization representing the country's 3,069 county governments, utilized their resources to make the public aware of exactly how funding cuts would impact communities. Cities were forced to cut youth programs, assistance to small businesses, support for family rehabilitation and domestic violence shelters, homeless shelters, meals-on-wheels programs, adult literacy classes, and free transportation in poor and rural communities. Individual cities were confronted with cuts ranging from 15 to 50 percent of the CDGB funds that they depended on to keep such programs going. Some media reports noted that most of the services affected by the cuts were to those least able to afford such losses. Others noted that since according to HUD, for every $1 of CDBG funds an estimated $3.55 is leveraged in non-CDBG funds, and that CDBG has created or retained hundreds of thousands of jobs, loss must also be calculated in effects beyond immediate services.

Critics of CDBG, on the other hand, charge that it is a bloated agency filled with waste and abuse. They point to high administrative costs, 17 percent on average according to the Government Accountability Office, and the additional costs of printing manuals to explain government regulations and grant applications, both of which sometimes run to more than 100 pages. They note that the CDBG allocation formula is decades old, and that a phrase such as "housing built before 1940," originally intended to benefit older cities, can now be used to target dollars toward wealthier communities where older homes are restored, rather than poorer communities where older, blighted buildings have been torn down. As examples of waste and distortion of program purpose, they point to such expenditures as $588,000 for a marina in Alexandria, Louisiana; $147,000 for a canopy walk at the Atlanta Botanical Gardens in Georgia; $245,000 for renovations to awnings at a historical market in Roanoke, Virginia; and $294,000 for the development of an educational program at the Houston Zoo in Texas.

Finally, they remind CDBG defenders that the program has a history of fraud, including in San Diego, where $12.9 million was improperly spent for a festival to celebrate a shopping center; in Chicopee, Massachusetts, where $4.3 million went to the affluent neighborhood where the mayor lived; and Utica, New York, where $902,799 was spent on a marina and $255,158 on ski chalet renovations. In 2006, HUD's inspector general reported than in a mere 2.5 years, 159 individuals were indicted, administrative actions were initiated against 143 individuals, five civil actions were in progress, and over $120 million in misappropriated funds were recovered.

Wylene Rholetter
Auburn University

See Also: Housing Services; Housing Support and Homeless Services; Urban Communities and Human Services.

Further Readings

Conlan, Timothy J. From New Federalism to Devolution: Twenty-Five Years of Intergovernmental Reform. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press, 1998.

DeHaven, Tad. "Community Development." Cato Institute (2009). http://www.downsizinggovernment.org/hud/community-development (Accessed December 2013).

Seidman, Karl F. Economic Development Finance. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2005.

U.S. Department of Urban and Housing Development. http://portal.hud.gov/hudportal/HUD?src=/program_offices/comm_planning/communitydevelopment/programs (Accessed December 2013).

Community Development Corporations

Community development corporations (CDCs) are nonprofit entities focusing on local development needs. Most often serving low-income, distressed neighborhoods and/or minority/immigrant populations, they provide political capital for underserved communities and people. Their origins can be traced back to the settlement houses of the 1800s, but the modern community development corporation emerged in the 1960s as part of the civil rights and antipoverty movements. Beginning with only a few, the industry has now grown to nearly 5,000. Some have grown into national CDCs (e.g., Enterprise Foundation) or a network of independent CDCs (e.g., NeighborWorks America), but most remain focused on smaller-scale urban and rural geographies. Their work has become more varied over the past few decades but most often involves poverty issues such as housing, environment, workforce training, financial literacy, commercial corridor revitalization, and, increasingly, access to healthy foods and community facility development for charter schools, child care, and health and human services.

Local Action for Government Programs

As government programs targeted for low- and moderate-income communities grew, the need for place-based community action grew as well. Some CDCs formed out of grassroots organizing, while others were created by local governments as an alternative deployment strategy for revitalization and community development funds, such as Community Development Block Grants (CDBGs). Unlike government, CDCs can more readily respond to opportunities, address neighborhood problems from a local standpoint, and coordinate community institutions and grassroots leaders. Through community representatives serving on their governing boards, they also provide a representative voice to underserved communities throughout the political and public participation processes.

One of the hardest challenges of community development work is securing financial capital for development that meets the needs of the people who live in disinvested communities. As advocates for revitalizing neighborhoods, CDCs not only work to attract resources, they also organize against threats that may negatively impact the area (such as an environmentally hazardous industry) or displacement of low-income residents resulting from gentrification. A central theme among CDCs is the construction, protection, and maintenance of affordable housing, and this will vary according to the target area's housing needs. For example, a CDC in rural Texas may work to improve housing conditions for Mexican border workers; comparatively, a Chicago CDC may organize against condominium conversions, advocate for the utilization of tax credits for affordable units, and provide homeownership training and counseling.

Size, Scope, and Role

As with the scope of work, the size of CDCs also runs the gamut. Some national CDCs employ hundreds of people and serve as capital investors in affordable housing and community-oriented real estate development. By comparison, others function as a subsidiary of other organizations, such as churches or nonprofit social service agencies. But ultimately, they all share the same goals: to improve and protect housing options for low-income people, attract capital to disinvested communities, organize stakeholders to maximize limited resources, and represent the interests of the community they serve. Some CDCs have become certified community development financing institutions (CDFIs) in order to provide nontraditional banking services and lending. These services and loans are targeted to communities that are underserved by traditional banks and have populations that do not meet traditional lending requirements.

Because of the broad scope of size and work performed by CDCs, it is challenging to provide a concise description of these organizations. However, they are key players as government agencies, funders, and service providers seek place-based implementation to yield better outcomes. Additionally, government administrators and funders are becoming aware of the need to focus multiple resources across a broad spectrum of social needs. As nongovernmental entities, successful CDCs assemble and coordinate multiple programs and agencies serving low-income persons. During the past few years, the Federal Reserve System has engaged a dialogue between the health care, community development, and banking industries with the goal of using investment to improve health disparities through a more localized approach. As public policy changes with regard to health coverage, financing entities are also becoming more aware of the need for improved interventions. As such, the role of the CDC will continue to shift.

Ultimately, the role of CDCs is to coordinate community development efforts so that they address the problems of their target geography/population. While poverty may not be eliminated, CDCs will continue to mitigate the risks of poverty by building human, social, and physical capital in areas where low-income people are concentrated.

Denese M. Neu
National Louis University

See Also: Community Development Block Grants; Community Organizing; Environmental Justice; Financial Literacy Programs; Food Desert; Gentrification; Grassroots Leadership; NeighborWorks

America; Poverty; Social and Economic Justice; Social Capital, Role of.

Further Readings

DeFilippis, James and Susan Saegert. The Community Development Reader. New York: Routledge, 2012.

Green, Gary Paul and Anna Haines. Asset Building and Community Development, 3rd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2008.

Walker, Christopher. "Community Development Corporations and Their Changing Support Systems" (2002). The Urban Institute. http://www.urban.org/publications/410638.html (Accessed November 2013).

Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to

The confluence of changing demographics, the health status of the nation, and the social-political economics of health care has resulted in a re-envisioned approach to assessing the health of the nation, to measuring effective delivery of health and human services, and to developing the health professional's knowledge, skills, and dispositions. Antecedent to a discussion of the numbers of racial and ethnic groups represented in the U.S. population is the understanding that the U.S. Constitution requires a decadal census to ascertain the number of representatives that a state can send to the U.S. House of Representatives. As early as 1790, the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) delineated racial groups for purposes of conducting the census. Census data are used to allocate federal funding for education programs in states and communities; to collect and report national social and health statistics to be used for government agencies' policy purposes; to allocate federal dollars for law enforcement, federal highway projects, aid to farmers, and many other federally financed activities and programs; and to inform a variety of economic statistics that become the basis of the nation's economic policies.

By 1986, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services issued the Secretary's Task Force Report on Black and Minority Health, which found a disparity in health status of the majority and minority populations in the United States. The minority population was defined as African Americans, Latino/Hispanic Americans, Asian Americans, and Native American Indians, and "despite the unprecedented explosion in scientific knowledge and the phenomenal capacity of medicine to diagnose, treat and cure disease, Blacks, Hispanics, Native Americans and those of Asian/Pacific Islander heritage have not benefited fully or equitably from the fruits of science or from those systems responsible for translating and using health sciences technology."

For the 2010 census, the OMB added language clarifying Hispanics, Arab Americans and Iranian Americans, the Turkish, and West Indians. These changes were made as responses to racial, ethnicity, and heritage concerns. W. B. Du Bois's seminal work, The Health and Physique of the Negro American (1906), in which he exposed as myth the prevailing view that blacks suffered higher death rates in the north because of their racial inferiority and vulnerability to cold climates in the north, made unprecedented use of epidemiology. The government recognizes that culture and social identity are intimately linked to behavior, and thus must be reflected in the description of the nation's health status.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) identified the following racial groups in 2013: African American/Black, American Indian/Alaskan Native, Asian, Hispanic/Latino, and Native Hawaiʻian/Other Pacific Islander. Ethnic identities are complex, reflecting countries of origin and heritages. The 2010 census collected data on the following groups: white, African American or black or negro, American Indian or Alaskan Native, Asian Indian, Chinese, Filipino, Japanese, Korean, Vietnamese, Other Asian, Native Hawaiʻian, Guamanian or Chamorro, Samoan, Other Pacific Islander, Other. Further, Question 8 invited respondents to identify as one of the following: not of Hispanic, Latino, or Spanish origin; Mexican, Mexican American, or Chicano; Cuban; another Hispanic, Latino, or Spanish origin. The complexity of these categories underscores the recognition of the need to validly report one's ethnicity.

Definitions

Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health (REACH) is an evidence-based national initiative vital to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's (CDC) efforts to eliminate racial and ethnic disparities in health. Recent data report heart disease as the leading cause of death for people of most ethnicities in the United States. Further confirming the reality of health disparities is that non-Hispanic blacks have the highest rates of obesity (44.1 percent), followed by Mexican Americans (39.3 percent); and compared to non-Hispanic whites, the risk of diagnosed diabetes is 18 percent higher among Asian Americans, 66 percent higher among Hispanics/Latinos, and 77 percent higher among non-Hispanic blacks. The Office of Minority Health Disparities has reported health disparities across a wide range of health priority areas, such as cardiovascular disease, diabetes, breast and cervical cancer, infant mortality, asthma, immunization, and obesity. The report argued that persistent health disparities in the country are unacceptable and correctable using dual strategies—universal interventions available to everyone, and targeted interventions for populations with special needs.

Health Disparities and Inequalities

The CDC Health Disparities and Inequalities Report of 2011 is the first in a series of periodic, consolidated assessments that highlight health disparities by sex, race, ethnicity, income, education, disability status, and other social characteristics in the United Sates. Data examine health care access, exposure to environmental hazards, mortality, morbidity, behavioral risk factors, disability status, and social determinants for health. The World Health Organization (WHO) reported that the social determinants of health are the circumstances in which people are born, grow, live, work, and age, as well as the systems put in place to deal with illness. These circumstances are in turn shaped by a wider set of economic and social policies and political forces, including gender, racial, and ethnic biases.

Effecting Change

The approaches to effecting change are holistic and seek to support community coalitions that design, implement, evaluate, and disseminate community-driven strategies to eliminate health disparities in chronic disease; provide the infrastructure to implement, coordinate, refine, disseminate, and evaluate successful evidence- or practice-based approaches and programs in local communities; support national and international organizations with local affiliates and chapters to share evidence- and practice-based strategies and culturally based community practices to eliminate racial and ethnic health disparities; increase the evidence around effective strategies to reduce obesity, hypertension, and cardiovascular disease in racial and ethnic communities; and fund community-based organizations to reduce health disparities.

An example of a program evidencing these components are Healthy People 2020, a science-based set of national goals and objectives with 10-year targets, designed to guide national health promotion and disease prevention efforts to improve the health of all people in the United States. The 1979 Surgeon General's Report on Health Promotion and Disease Prevention, accepted as the first national report to identify health promotion and disease prevention as national priorities, is the seminal document informing the three-decade national health goal of Healthy People. Healthy Communities Programs, a companion program to Healthy People, seeks to prevent chronic disease, reduce health risk factors, and attain health equity. Reflecting J. Bircher's broader definition of health as "physical, mental, social, environmental and spiritual well-being, not merely the absence of disease," the Designing and Building Healthy Places program promotes educating decision makers on the health impact of community design, building partnerships with community design decision makers and influencers, and conducting studies to identify links between health and community design.

Rewards of Health Equality

Since 2002, the annual Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality (AHRQ) National Health Disparities Reports (NHDR) has documented the status of health care disparities and the quality of care received by racial, ethnic, and socioeconomic groups in the United States. The NHDR documented in 2008 that racial and ethnic minorities often receive poorer quality of care and face more barriers in seeking care, including preventive care, acute treatment, or chronic disease management, than non-Hispanic white patients. Minority groups experience rates of preventable hospitalizations that are, in some cases, almost double that of non-Hispanic whites. African Americans have higher hospitalization rates from influenza than other populations. African American children are twice as likely to be hospitalized and more than four times as likely to die from asthma as non-Hispanic white children. The Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, in its 2011 report the Economic Burden of Health Inequalities in the United States, concluded that between 2003 and 2006, "the combined costs of health inequalities and premature death in the United States were $1.24 trillion." In addition to the potential to reduce the financial burden of health inequalities is the promotion of a quality of life and robustness of a nation that is healthy, able, and productive.

Linda R. Barley
City University of New York

See Also: Health and Sickness, Differening Attitudes Toward; Health Care, Disparity in; Health Care Delivery, Models of.

Further Readings

Betancourt, J., A. Green, A. Carillo, and E. Park. "Cultural Competence and Health Care Disparities: Key Perspectives and Trends." Health Affairs, v.2 (2005).

Bircher, J. "Towards a Dynamic Definition of Health and Disease." Medical Health Care Philosophy, v.8 (2005).

Selig, S., E. Tropiano, and E. Greene-Morton. "Teaching Cultural Competence to Reduce Health Disparities." Health Promotion Practice, v.3 (2006).

Teal, C. and R. L. Street. "Critical Elements of Culturally Competent Communication in the Medical Encounter: A Review and Model." Social Science Medicine, v.68/3 (2009).

Thomas, S. B., G. C. Benjamin, D. Almario, and M. J. Lathan. "Historical and Current Policy Efforts to Eliminate Racial and Ethnic Health Disparities in the U.S.: Future Opportunities for Public Health Education Research." Health Promotion Practice, v.7/3 (2006).

Community Health Centers

Community health centers, also known as federally qualified health centers (FQHCs), are community-controlled health facilities that offer basic medical care in low-income and medically underserved areas. Funded by federal grants and often with sliding-scale fees based on patient income, these centers have provided primary care and preventive services in urban and rural communities across the United States for more than four decades at a cost below the national average for comparable services. In 2013, more than 1,000 community health centers served more than 15 million people in every state and territory, two-thirds of them members of racial or ethnic minorities.

Free dispensaries where part-time volunteer physicians offered medical services to the poor began in the late 18th century. Most of these dispensaries were located in eastern cities and were connected with medical schools. The doctors who provided their services at no cost typically were engaged in research and teaching medical students at the schools. Private practitioners feared that charity services were abused, and that patients who could afford medical care were seeking treatment in the dispensaries. The poor were scarcely less skeptical than the physicians, placing little trust in the dispensaries, where they were often forced to wait for extended periods to receive cursory attention.

More than a century after the controversial dispensaries, health departments in cities established clinics to address the problems of infant mortality and infectious diseases. Baby clinics stressed the importance of hygienic practices, and offered information on topics such as child care and proper nutrition. The clinics that focused on infectious diseases limited their services to diagnosis and advice because private physicians vehemently protested any intrusions into their territory. The New York City Department of Health produced diphtheria antitoxin in its diagnostic bacteriologic laboratory, sold it to drugstores, and offered it free to patients who could not afford it, but accusations of socialism and unfair competition forced it to end the program. Watched carefully by their critics, city and county health departments provided minimal health care for the poor, usually at a level similar to that of the dispensaries, throughout the first half of the 20th century, but it was not until the 1960s that the evolution of community health centers began.

War on Poverty

In the 1960s, a young doctor and civil rights activist, H. Jack Geiger, saw firsthand how effectively community-based health care was serving a Zulu population in South Africa. Impressed with the improvements in the overall health of the community affected by the system, he returned to the United States eager to see such a system implemented in inner-city neighborhoods and rural areas, where poverty was pervasive and health services were often inaccessible. His timing was fortuitous. President Lyndon B. Johnson had declared his War on Poverty, and the community health center was a good fit for the programs that were introduced. Through the efforts of Geiger and others, federal funding was secured for two demonstration projects, one in Boston, Massachusetts, and the other in Mound Bayou, Mississippi.

Legislative changes helped prepare the way for the community health centers. The Kerr-Mills Amendment to the Social Security Act in 1960 made funds available to the states for the medically indigent. In 1962, after the nation's news media made public the living conditions of migrant farm workers, the Migrant Health Act funded rural clinics to provide health care for that population. Congress passed the most significant health care legislation with the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, which provided for the establishment of community health centers. The first two centers were in operation a year later, the same year that Medicare and Medicaid provided medical benefits to the elderly, the disabled, and families living below the poverty level. A decade later, Congress authorized neighborhood health centers on a permanent basis. Later legislation extended the groups served by neighborhood clinics to include the homeless and public housing residents. The Health Centers Consolidation Act of 1996 identified all health centers programs as community, migrant, public housing, and homeless health centers. The Health Resources and Services Administration, Bureau of Primary Health Care, under the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, is the federal agency that administers health centers programs.

Organization and Efficacy

In order to receive federal funds, community health centers' patient representatives must make up a majority of each center's governing board and the center must be located in a federally designated medically underserved area; possess nonprofit, public, or tax-exempt status; provide not only comprehensive primary care services and referrals, but also services necessary to access care such as translation and transportation; and provide these services to all residents in their service area, regardless of ability to pay, along with a sliding fee schedule that is adjusted according to family income.

The population served by community health centers in approximately 3,600 communities in the United States is divided almost equally between residents of rural areas and residents of economically depressed inner-city communities. Nearly 70 percent of these patients have family incomes at or below the poverty level. About 36 percent are covered by Medicaid. The number of uninsured patients treated at health centers has steadily increased, growing from around 3.9 million in 1998 to over 5.9 million in 2013. For many of these patients, the community health center is their only source of health care.

Community health centers have been successful at providing quality health care at low costs. They provide comprehensive health care for about $1.30 per day per patient served. A number of studies have shown that community health centers save Medicaid dollars at both the federal and state level because of reductions in specialty care referrals and hospital admissions. Costs for patients with chronic illnesses such as diabetes, cardiovascular disease, asthma, depression, cancer, and HIV are also lower at health centers. The lower costs have not affected the quality of care. Both the Institute of Medicine and the General Accounting Office have recognized community health centers as models for screening, diagnosing, and managing chronic health conditions. These centers have also been effective in reducing infant mortality rates between 10 and 40 percent over communities with no health center, and in improving early prenatal care and reducing low birth rates.

Perhaps because of the community representation on their governing boards and the culturally sensitive practices that are in place, community health centers have successfully reduced racial, ethnic, and socioeconomic disparities in infant mortality, prenatal care, tuberculosis case rates, and death rates. One study concluded that even after controlling for sociodemographic factors, there were no disparities in health status among health center patients. The need for the services provided by community health centers is unlikely to decrease in the near future. Even with full implementation of the Affordable Care Act, as many as 26 million people could remain with no access to health insurance.

Wylene Rholetter
Auburn University

See Also: Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Community-Based Services; Health Care, Disparities in.

Further Readings

Community Health Center Movement. http://www.ravenswoodfhc.org/images/pdf/History-of-community-Health-Center-Movement.pdf ? (Accessed November 2013).
Lefkowitz, Bonnie. Community Health Centers: A Movement and the People Who Made It Happen. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2007.
Selig S., E. Tropiano, and E. Greene-Morton. "Teaching Cultural Competence to Reduce Health Disparities." Health Promotion Practice, v.3 (2006).

Community Organizing

Community organizing is the backbone of social justice activism. It increases community awareness of relevant social service initiatives, holds human services programs accountable to the communities they are expected to serve, and allows communities that participate in these programs to fully participate in policy decisions that affect their lives. While the term community organization did not become popular until Christian service organizations began using the phrase in the 1830s, the work is as old as civilization. Archaeologists have uncovered evidence of a workers' strike in 1170 B.C.E. in Deir al-Medina, Egypt, and the praise poem of the Mesopotamian King Urukagina, dated to the 24th century B.C.E., speaks of reforms he instituted on behalf of the poor that would have most likely been preceded by a significant community organizing effort. Every major Western religion was created by community organizers. Judaism was founded by Moses, who organized indentured Jewish-Egyptian laborers against their government; Christianity was founded by a messianic prophet who organized desert Essenes and other poor Judaeans and called for a new social order in the face of his execution; Islam was founded by a prophet-activist who gathered the marginalized around him and intentionally undermined the corrupt Meccan plutocracy. All of these figures used what would later be termed community organizing strategies as part of their work.

But while the work of community organizing is not new, its vocabulary and the idea of community organizing as something that one specifically does, separate from other missionary, humanitarian, or social justice work, is new. Chicago labor organizer Saul Alinsky's Reveille for Radicals (1946) coined the term community organizer and was the first major work to establish a clear strategic and ideological framework for community organizing. The idea of community organizing as a vocation is still novel enough that when U.S. senator and former Chicago community organizer Barack Obama became the Democratic Party's presidential nominee in 2008, both primary opponent Hillary Rodham Clinton and general-election opponent John McCain openly ridiculed that aspect of his history. By 2013, Republican Senator Rand Paul remarked: "I think we need to have Republican community organizers."

National Urban League president Whitney Young meets with President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1966. Young pushed for federal aid to cities, a plan that was eventually partially incorporated into President Johnson's War on Poverty.

Today, there are many varieties of community organizing, the most basic being grassroots community organizing, in which one listens to the concerns of a community, helps transform those concerns into actionable goals, and then mobilizes members of the community (and allies) around these goals. Doing the work of community organizing as an ally or outsider to the community that is organized is both essential, in that it introduces novel and disruptive elements into existing social structures, and hazardous, in that it can play to a savior complex, an unwarranted sense of entitlement, or more sinister motives. Keeping the community organizing effort centered on the actual needs of the community, and not the projected or anticipated needs of the community, requires a serious and vigilant listening process.

Community organizing has historically been associated with labor, civil rights, immigrants' rights, and other traditionally left-wing movements, and Alinsky's model of community organizing was revolutionary, but many strategic frameworks allow for a great degree of cooperation with historically conservative institutions. The strategy of community development, demonstrated by National Urban League president Whitney Young during the 1960s, centers on organizing community members and corporations to work together on shared strategic interests. Both strategies have been shown to work in some cases. Under the Alinsky framework, community organizing focuses on empowering marginalized people to act in their interests and achieve victories despite the existing power structure, joining with them only on a provisional, case-by-case basis. Community development, on the other hand, works to reconcile the interests of marginalized groups with the existing power structure on a more general and long-term basis. To the extent that the two approaches conflict (and they do not always conflict), disagreement tends to center on the question of whether the existing power structure can be preserved in a way that does not perpetuate existing social injustices—and this disagreement, centering on the nebulous concept of a single "existing power structure," is often semantic.

The idea that community organizing can be reconciled with more conservative community development approaches as parallel elements of the same broader strategy is the implicit ideology of the American progressive left, but it has many critics. INCITE!'s anthology titled The Revolution Will Not Be Funded: Beyond the Non-Profit Industrial Complex (2009) suggests that the community development framework often explicitly works against the interests of community organizers and their stakeholders, using direct-service charitable work and inconsequential shifts in policy to pacify efforts to achieve more significant and more lasting change.

Whatever form community organizing takes over the coming century, dramatic changes in communication technology have already fundamentally altered community organizing dynamics. Just as print made the Enlightenment possible, and the telephone made Alinsky-style urban organizing possible, mobile devices and social media have had a dramatic effect on organizing strategies—the full scope of which cannot yet be measured, given organizations' incomplete adaptation to these technologies, and more crucially, given the social inequalities still reflected in the digital divide. As the participation of Americans with mobile and social media presence approaches 100 percent, these technologies will provide increasingly valuable means by which marginalized communities may mobilize and make their voices heard.

Thomas L. Head
Edith Cowan University

See Also: Community Action Agencies; Environmental Justice; Social and Economic Justice; Subcultures.

Further Readings

Brown, Michael Jacoby. Building Powerful Community Organizations: A Personal Guide to Creating Groups That Can Solve Problems and Change the World. Chicago: Long Haul, 2007.

Kahn, Si. Creative Community Organizing: A Guide for Rabble-Rousers, Activists, and Quiet Lovers of Justice. San Francisco: Berrett-Koehler, 2010.

Minieri, Joan and Paul Getsos. Tools for Radical Democracy: How to Organize for Power in Your Community. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2007.
Sen, Rinku. Stir It Up: Lessons in Community Organizing and Advocacy. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2003.

Community Reinvestment Act (1977)

The Community Reinvestment Act (CRA) was passed in 1977 as part of a wider agenda of equity and community redevelopment in the United States. The act is designed to encourage depository institutions to serve the needs of all communities by providing access to services across lending and investment. It provides a framework for financial institutions and other stakeholders to promote banking services to all communities and all members within it. The act dictates that financial institutions must offer equal access to such services for all within their immediate geographic location, "consistent with safe and sound operations." It prohibits "redlining," a process of blocking or restricting access to banking to those in distinct areas. The act was passed in the context of existing limited or discriminatory lending practices for low-income neighborhoods, where banks often excluded those low- or moderate-income neighborhoods from lending and investment services.

This often occurred in a racialized context. Thus, the act was a result of pressure from activists, as well as a wider sense of community decline and economic hardship that plagued many such communities and ultimately damaged the American economy. Subsequently, the act has been subject to a steady stream of legislative and regulatory amendments to tighten up the requirements placed on financial institutions, and further reforms are envisaged in the near future. The act has been the subject of much debate concerning the extent to which it provides a loosening of lending criteria and thus encourages riskier lending practices, the type that influenced the 2008 financial crisis. Opinion on the matter remains deeply polarized.

The CRA was passed as part of a wider process of addressing inequality and discrimination in American society. For example, prior to the CRA, the Fair Housing Act of 1968 and the Equal Credit Act of 1974 sought to tackle discrimination in relation to the characteristics of race and sex. The CRA serves to create equality of access with regard to lending and investment services across America's communities, including mortgages, small business and other credit, and investments. Financial institutions are encouraged to lend to low- and moderate-income groups, in line with sound lending practices. The CRA applies to all institutions that carry Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) deposit insurance. Therefore, it does not apply to all institutions; there are some financial institutions that do not carry FDIC deposit insurance that are able to work outside the act.

CRA compliance is monitored, and banks are subject to scrutiny from a federal banking agency that offers a rating and associated report, which forms part of the supervisory report for that bank. Members of the public can submit comments about institutions, which are also considered. An institution's record is studied by its supervisory agency when it seeks to expand, for example through merger or acquisition. The Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), part of the Department of the Treasury, has responsibility for assessing banks' records of extending credit to all of the community. The office determines an institution's CRA rating through a four-tiered rating system: substantial noncompliance, needs to improve, satisfactory, or outstanding. The rating is determined by considering an institution's context and the community that it serves.

The act has stimulated debate concerning the extent to which it has been successful in extending credit services to low-income groups. Some economists, for example, have argued that the act has become irrelevant, or at the very least in need of being revisited, despite the various regulatory and legislative amendments to it. However, a study by Drew Dahl and colleagues in 2000 failed to prove that financial institutions respond to regulatory pressures to increase lending to low-income groups, thus arguing that the CRA did not work at that time. Debate has also been sparked concerning whether or not the CRA encourages risky lending. A paper by Sumit Agarwal and colleagues in 2012, for instance, argues that the CRA led to risky lending, which may in turn have contributed to the 2008 financial crisis. Those authors compared the lending behavior of banks undergoing CRA exams with those that were not, and found that compliance with the act led to riskier lending by banks. Yet, this is in contrast to other reports. Ben Bernanke, former chairman of the Federal Reserve, and others have stated on the record that the CRA did not contribute to the subprime crisis in any significant way. However, this view is not accepted by all experts.

A number of commentators insist that the CRA has at least forced banks to engage with those underserved markets—low and moderate income—where this might not otherwise have happened. Groups, including the National Community Reinvestment Coalition, argue that as a result of the CRA, banks have actively promoted housing and economic opportunity for underserved groups by providing affordable mortgage programs, small business loan products, community development financing, and funding for nonprofit housing and economic development programs. Sandra Thompson, director of the Division of Supervision and Consumer Protection at the FDIC, notes that the research evidence overwhelmingly demonstrates that the CRA has resulted in levels of lending to low- and moderate-income groups that have increased at a greater rate than for other income groups. The CRA was passed with seemingly noble intentions, in the context of wider change and the desire to end iniquitous banking practices, which is commended. However, the CRA remains a heated point of discussion, given the recent economic turmoil and staunch opposition from those who disagree with this type of regulation.

Tony Murphy
Sheffield Hallam University

See Also: Community-Based Services; Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation; Urban Communities and Human Services.

Further Readings

Agarwal, Sumit, Efraim Benmelech, Nittai Bergman, and Amit Seru. "Did the Community Reinvestment Act (CRA) Lead to Risky Lending?" (2012). http://www.nber.org/papers/w18609 (Accessed December 2013).
Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. "Community Reinvestment Act." http://www.federalreserve.gov/communitydev/cra_about.htm (Accessed December 2013).
Immergluck, Dan. Credit to the Community: Community Reinvestment and Fair Lending Policy in the United States. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe, 2004.
Policy Link. "Community Reinvestment Act." http://www.policylink.org/site/c.lkIXLbMNJrE/b.5136939 (Accessed December 2013).

Community-Based Participatory Research

The National Institutes of Health's Office of Behavioral and Social Science Research defines community-based participatory research (CBPR) as a hands-on, collaborative research approach between research or academic partners and community members, in which both groups have a voice in improving or changing a common community health concern. The ultimate goal is to enhance the community's involvement in applied research. Partnerships draw on the strengths of both participants and provide an opportunity to pool their knowledge and resources in addressing a community health need. CBPR gives community members an opportunity to be actively engaged and consulted during each step of the research process, from the development of research questions to communication of the conclusions and final results, in order to have a positive impact on improving health or reducing health disparities in the local community. Human diversity is important to CBPR because communities comprise persons with different cultural backgrounds, life experiences, and health needs. Interest in using CBPR as a research approach has grown in recent years, and it is used in many fields, including epidemiology, social work, public health, environmental health sciences, and psychology. Numerous examples of CBPR are available on government Web sites, Google Scholar, and professional journals.

Traditional research is a solitary activity. CBPR is more mutual and partnership-based, as both participants learn from each another. Traditional ideas of rigor may not be applicable with real communities where issues are more complex. For example, random assignment of persons to either an experimental or control group may not be possible for ethical reasons, especially when studying life-threatening health diseases. A probability sampling technique may not be possible when studying illegal human behavior, such as the distribution of narcotics.

Advantages of CBPR

CBPR has many advantages. It can improve the provision of care and outcomes for populations defined as at-risk or underserved. It can be applied in diverse communities and in a variety of community settings and across disciplines. It provides an opportunity to build trust between community members and researchers or academic partners, who might otherwise be viewed as "outsiders" to the local community. Ultimately, the trust and joint partnership will allow the pooling of resources, both tangible (e.g., financial) and intangible (e.g., knowledge) resources, to solve complex community health problems and change local policy, practice, and service provision. This trust serves as a foundation for the collaborative process to unfold throughout the research. Working with community partners is key to understanding and learning about community health and health disparities in order to transform current practices. Knowledge of community partners is used by researchers or academic partners to answer complex health questions that are defined as important to the community—not just as the agenda of a researcher. The results of CBPR may influence local or community policy makers to provide more funds for an identified community need or to provide services: this is policy advocacy in action. In some areas of research, particularly those which are grounded in health behaviors that involve moral concerns (e.g., men having sex with men) or illegal behaviors (e.g., substance abuse), this approach may be the only means of gathering data on community health issues that would otherwise not be studied. This is a major advantage of CBPR.

Challenges of CBPR

One of the challenges of CBPR is demonstrating to researchers and academics that this is an appropriate and rigorous research method. Also, as CBPR becomes more accepted among researchers and communities, so must the trust remain between researchers and community members. Noted challenges in the application of CBPR include power issues, true community consent, and the way in which financial incentives may impact the consenting process.

Researchers from various disciplines engage in areas or programs of research to contribute to the knowledge base in a health-related area, such as diabetes or mental health. However, researchers' or academicians' success in their research area (i.e., scholarly publications, grant funding) ultimately catapults them to develop a reputation as "experts" in their field. With respect to the issue of power and egalitarian relationships, the question of who was more responsible for the success of the research project may become an issue. That is, are the researchers invested in the research project in order to meet the community's needs or to advance their individual program of research or reputation?

Whether a community has given true community consent to participate in the research may also become a challenge, especially when the amount of a financial or other resource incentive may influence their decision to participate. Thus, the ethical challenge is how to assess whether true community consent has occurred. For example, a financial incentive to implement new services for an identified health concern can influence participation solely because the services are especially needed in the community when no other resources are available.

Despite the benefits and challenges associated with CBPR, it is a user-friendly and increasingly acceptable applied research methodology to address community health needs that would otherwise go unnoticed.

A. Suzanne Boyd
University of North Carolina at Charlotte

See Also: Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality; National Institute of Mental Health; Rural Communities.

Further Readings

Israel B. A., et al., eds. Methods in Community-Based Participatory Research for Health. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2005.

Minkler, M. and N. Wallerstein, eds. Community-Based Participatory Research for Health. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2003.

National Institute on Health, Office of Behavioral and Social Science Research. "Community-Based Participatory Research." http://obssr.od.nih.gov/scientific_areas/methodology/community_based_participatory_research (Accessed July 2013).

O'Toole, Thomas P., et al. "Community-Based Participatory Research: Opportunities, Challenges, and the Need for a Common Language." Journal of General Internal Medicine, v.18/7 (2003).
Wallerstein, Nina B. and Bonnie Duran. "Using Community-Based Participatory Research to Address Health Disparities." Health Promotion and Practice, v.7/3 (2006).

Community-Based Services

Community based services (CBSs) are provided by various types and structures of community-based organizations (CBOs) that serve diverse population segments. CBSs address income, housing, mental health and substance abuse, health, child welfare, child care, criminal justice, disabilities, educational, long-term care, and other similar social welfare needs; these services can be prevention- or intervention-oriented. Some CBOs are specialized in providing services to specific age groups experiencing specific issues, while others provide a range of services to several population segments. For instance, community-based adoption agencies provide adoption services for children under the age of 18; community action agencies may provide a wide range of services (e.g., income maintenance, child care, home-based parental skills training, energy assistance, etc.) to clients of all age groups. Typically, CBSs in nonprofit organizations are supported by mixed funding streams; private fees, philanthropy, grants, contracts with public agencies, and income from the sale of services and/or goods are some of the funding mechanisms. The structure and type of CBO influences the structure and type of services provided by the organization.

Professionals and programs within CBSs implement specific theories of change—assumptions about clients and their behaviors and causal relationships between interventions and outcomes. CBSs attempt to create empowering environments for clients and communities as well as actively engaging community members in designing programs. Notwithstanding the wide range of CBSs, CBOs encounter challenges in delivering high-quality services. Each of these concepts is relevant for human service professionals.

Theory of Change

CBSs and programs are designed to create specific outcomes and provide specific benefits to clients and communities. These services and programs are generally based on theories of change, in which specific activities and steps are expected to produce specific outcomes. Theory of change is a road map for creating the desired change. Ideally, leadership within CBOs explicates each program's and/or intervention's theory of change so that employees implementing the programs are clear about the relationship between their activities and the desired outcomes. Explicating theories of change is more important when organizations are serving diverse population segments because the assumptions about the change process may not be the same for all population segments. Professionals within CBSs attempt to create change in people's lives by changing their knowledge, skills, attitudes, behaviors, and health, or by changing conditions for children, individuals, families, and within communities. By explaining—with a theory of change road map—how a CBS creates desired changes, the program evaluation process can become easier for professionals.

Empowering the Community

Empowerment, a multidimensional concept, can be both personal and social. Professionals within CBSs attempt to create environments for clients to increase their sense of personal, interpersonal, socioeconomic, and political strength and develop a strong sense of self-efficacy. Some strategies for enhancing clients' sense of self-efficacy are: building trusting relationships between program employees and clients, collaborating with clients to design solutions, raising clients' awareness about power and class differences and related issues, teaching specific skills to clients, and promoting activities that will enhance clients' sense of personal power and self-advocacy. Regular in-serving training is essential for promoting and maintaining empowerment-oriented practices within CBSs, especially in light of the diverse population segments that seek assistance from CBOs.

With growing diversity within communities (e.g., immigration patterns, race, ethnicity, sexual orientations, types of family structures, religions, etc.), CBOs are inviting more community participation in effectively assessing needs and designing responsive strategies, interventions, and services to address them. Some legislative mandates also warrant community participation for social program development. The principle of community participation is based on the thesis that population segments experiencing challenges have the best knowledge of their own situations and strengths; they also know how to address these challenges by effectively deploying their strengths and community assets; and, finally, they can easily take ownership of the service or strategy. Hence, inviting their active participation in assessment and program/service design can ensure sustainable service provision and impact.

Challenges in Service Delivery

CBSs encounter several challenges in the areas of delivery systems, sustainability, and privatization. Most communities have several CBOs, so duplication of CBSs and absence of seamless service delivery systems plague the human services field. For instance, several agencies provide home-delivered meals or emergency assistance. Similarly, in the mental health arena or in the child welfare arena, different organizations that may be serving a client may have been unsuccessful in designing a well-coordinated and integrated service delivery system. In the absence of formal interorganizational partnerships or informal interorganizational collaborations, professionals within CBS programs often refer clients to other professionals—in their social or professional network—in related agencies. Hence, coordination of services, especially for addressing complex issues, may occur more through informal relationships and networks than through effectively planned interorganizational alliances, partnerships, and collaborations.

Another issue pertains to sustainability: sustainability of impact, financial sustainability, and sustainability of capacities within CBSs. Increasing focus on accountability is resulting in funders questioning the outcomes created by CBSs. These entities want to ensure that interventions and strategies create a lasting impact on client and community well-being and make a meaningful difference for pressing social, economic, and environmental problems. Program or service sustainability within CBOs is the capacity to continue to deliver intended benefits for an extended period of time after major start-up funds, resources, and technical assistance have been terminated. Maintaining programs within CBOs beyond the end of the start-up grant or funding is a challenge unless early planning has occurred by CBO management and leadership. Similarly, adapting to the changing contexts is very important for program and CBO sustenance.

Related to the issue of sustainability is capacity-building within CBOs. Salaries, work environments, and qualifications of individuals hired by CBOs are factors that contribute to high turnover in some agencies, negatively impacting capacity-building within these organizations and services. Capacity-building focuses on nurturing and building upon the strengths and problem-solving abilities of employees within CBOs. Without sound capacity-building, quality of services delivered through CBSs can be compromised.

Finally, federal and state governments—through a national devolution movement—are subcontracting with private for-profit or nonprofit organizations to provide services that were historically provided by the public sector. Devolution—transfer of power, rights, and responsibilities from one level of government to a government at lower levels—has resulted in privatization of several human services. Government entities are outsourcing the provision of social services to private organizations with the hope of improving efficiency and effectiveness. Privatization is creating ethical dilemmas in CBOs when employees and program directors must balance financial and social impact. Moreover, sometimes in their haste to contract with nonprofit organizations, public organizations may not examine whether CBOs have the capacity to deliver and administer effective CBSs.

Monica Nandan
Claire Kirkland
Kennesaw State University

See Also: Case Management Services; Community Organizing; Crisis Services; Day Treatment Centers; Interprofessional and Interdisciplinary Practice; Social Innovation.

Further Readings

Kane, Rosalie. "Thirty Years of Home and Community-Based Services: Getting Closer and Closer to Home."

American Society of Aging. http://www.asaging.org/blog/thirty-years-home-and-community-based-services-getting-closer-and-closer-home (Accessed April 2013).

Krishna, Anirudh. "Partnerships Between Local Government and Community-Based Organizations: Exploring the Scope for Synergy." Public Administration and Development, v.23/4 (2003)

Wilson, Michael G., John N. Lavis, and Adrian Guta. "Community-Based Organizations in the Health Sector: A Scoping Review." Health Research Policy and Systems, v.10/36 (2012).

Conflict Resolution and Diversity

Conflict resolution is a relatively young academic field, which has evolved and greatly expanded over the past few decades. There are an array of disputes and conflicts that can be reduced, managed, or resolved. Conflict resolution is a broad term, and when targeting and utilizing diverse conflict-reducing or conflict-ending approaches, collaboration ensures mutually agreed-upon actions. It is also useful in, and applicable to, domains of conflict at interpersonal, familial, communal, organizational, and international levels. Conflict resolution professionals provide a wide range of services for diverse communities. These include mediation, negotiation, workshops facilitation, technical training for staff, organizational conflict resolution skills, and coaching. Because the United States' population is becoming more diverse and multicultural, just as elsewhere, it is essential that conflict resolution professionals and specialists acknowledge, support, and promote diversity in their work, whether in academia, consulting, training, or other professional and organizational settings.

Professional Training

Conflict resolution specialists are trained, impartial, third-party actors who facilitate dialogue processes that oftentimes lead to outcomes that can be beneficial and rewarding for all parties in conflict. It is preferable that conflict resolution specialists have a degree in higher education. This includes those who have acquired training specifically in conflict resolution. Because of conflict resolution's interdisciplinary approach, this degree is valuable because it equips professionals with various models and paradigms/perspectives for addressing disputes and conflicts. Few universities, both public and private, in the United States or overseas, offer Ph.D. programs in conflict resolution. However, master's degrees in this field are growing, both domestically and globally. In these programs, graduate students, working adults, and professionals have more opportunities to acquire knowledge and understand the theoretical aspects of conflict resolution. Conflict resolution professionals are prepared through their training to be well versed or have hands-on practical experience in conflict resolution. For instance, some are required to fulfill requirements through a practicum that incorporates direct experience working with those who need to better manage disputes in different settings.

Despite the requirement and preference for conflict resolution specialists to have a degree in conflict resolution and related fields, it is essential that they are certified. Although there is no national licensing requirement to become a conflict resolution specialist, there are states, such as Florida and California, in which certification is required in order to become, for example, a qualified mediator. If prospective mediators want to practice mediation in Florida, they have a variety of choices and types of mediation from which to choose, depending on their interests and professional needs. Even for those with advanced degrees, such as law, medicine, education, and related fields, in order to practice mediation, they must have at least 40 hours of training to be certified. Among those certifications are: family-divorce mediation, county court mediation, circuit mediation, dependency, appellate mediation, Florida Supreme Court mediation, workplace mediation, and school mediation. Additionally, mention must be made of negotiation, facilitation, conflict coaching, and conflict management training, which are also valuable in resolving various disputes and conflicts.

Services Provided to Schools, Workplaces, Businesses, and Government

Usually, conflict resolution professionals offer services, training, and consultation that are tailored toward a client's specific needs. These services depend on the types of disputes and conflicts encountered, and the context or setting in which they occur. For the purpose of addressing a particular type of conflict or dispute, it is crucial that the service provided align with the objectives and needs of the recipient agency. For instance, there are conflict reduction or prevention professionals who specialize in campus and student-related disputes. Oftentimes, mediation is employed to address an array of student disputes, for example, negotiating living arrangements with roommates, or addressing residential, classroom, team, and student organization diversity. Workplace disputes and conflicts still persist in many organizations and institutions, both public and private. It is essential that conflict resolution specialists/mediators/negotiators create nonjudgmental environments, permitting all the parties to express themselves freely, and enhancing their understanding of the nature of the conflict.

Central to this work is identification of the parties in conflict and their stated issues and concerns. Conflict resolution specialists must have a solid grasp of, and be able to identify as clearly as possible, each party's issues. Furthermore, the mediator must be familiar with any additional underlying concerns that are related to the dispute. Depending on the nature and type of conflict, mediation may be facilitated by one mediator or a comediator over a period of one, two, or more hours. During the mediation process, the mediator may require a private separate meeting, or caucus, with one or the other party. Regardless of who asks for it, the content of these meetings must be kept private and confidential, unless permission is granted to the mediator by one or the other party to disclose such privileged information.

Needs are also valuable for all the parties in conflict. This is true, irrespective of the nature and intensity of their initial incompatible goals and desires. Through the process of mediation or negotiation, conflict resolution specialists (i.e., mediators or negotiators) should be aware of the disputing parties' interests to generate options and alternatives that will best meet everyone's needs. However, the mediator cannot impose solutions on the disputing parties because they have voluntarily entered mediation. The disputing parties must have control of the outcomes, where they can reach agreements that are mutually acceptable. The mediator must also not take sides, regardless of his or her social status and position in a society.

Like mediation, both negotiation and facilitation are valid problem-solving methods. They are useful in, and may be applied to, numerous disputes and conflicts; for example, negotiation is relevant in resolving business disputes, international conflicts, and organizational and family issues. Typically, the professional negotiator guides the dialogue of two or more parties, with the aim of reaching a compromise. Facilitation is another method in which a third party creates an environment conducive for discussion and who leads such conversation. That third party, or facilitator, helps parties to develop ground rules and set the agenda, while allowing the parties to decide the content of their dialogue. The facilitator must not make decisions for the parties. Conflict resolution specialists train frontline employees, supervisors, and managers, so that all may develop and improve skills and competencies necessary to understand and more constructively and collaboratively address conflicts. Communication is key in approaching and reaching common ground on issues that are vital for the growth and sustainability of all types of organizations.

Conflict Specialists Working With Diverse Populations

Conflict resolution specialists work with people of diverse backgrounds. They also bring their personal differences with them to any encounter. They differ in terms of cultural values, views, opinions, social status, positions, interests, and needs. The specialist must first be aware of his or her biases. Second, the responsibility of the conflict resolution specialist in diverse settings is to approach, welcome, and treat everyone from a position of humility and respect. It is essential that the conflict specialist focus on substantive matters that are shared problems of two or more disputing parties, while appreciating their similarities and respecting their cultural differences and individual personalities. Therefore, the conflict specialist's job is to accommodate all those who are seeking professional assistance, regardless of their race, religion, national origin, class, gender, gender identity, sex, ability, or age. The conflict specialist should also be conscious that diversity is an innate aspect of human society. It is important for everyone to understand and celebrate inclusive diversity. One way for conflict specialists to achieve this is to emphasize what people have in common, to bring them together to achieve a common goal.

Last, conflict resolution specialists have a role to play in providing critical wide ranges of human services for diverse populations locally, regionally, nationally, and internationally. They should emphasize and incorporate problem-solving methods in their work that are solutions-oriented. These factors are critical to the masterful use of alternatives to violence, and which can be healthier for, and beneficial to, all those directly or indirectly involved in disputes and conflicts.

Blerim Shala
Nova Southeastern University

See Also: Conflict Resolution and Diversity Cultural Competence; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Gender and Clients; Multicultural Education; Social Workers.

Further Readings

Jeong, Ho-Won. Understanding Conflict and Conflict Analysis. London: SAGE, 2008.

Kriesberg, Louis. "The Evolution of Conflict Resolution." In The SAGE Handbook of Conflict Resolution, Jacob Bercovitch, Victor Kremenyuk, and William Zartman, eds. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2009.

Lewicki, Roy, David Saunders, and Bruce Barry, eds. Negotiation: Readings, Exercises, and Cases. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2010.

Turner, Caroline S. "Advancing Diversity in Higher Education." Journal of Diversity in Higher Education, v.6 (2013).

Conflict Resolution and Diversity Cultural Competence

Increased diversity creates a rich cultural environment; however, as people from different cultural backgrounds or groups interact, cultural values occasionally conflict. Nonetheless, through a commitment to promote respect and understanding of diverse cultures and social groups, conflicts can be resolved in a culturally competent manner. Cultural competence refers to relevant, effective, and respectful processes by which individuals or organizations respond to all cultures. Diversity cultural competence in conflict resolution entails paying attention to the role of culture in conflict and utilizing strategies to mediate and resolve disputes and misunderstandings that stem from cultural differences.

Culture and Conflict: Linkages

Culture is inextricably linked to conflict. Moreover, culture is a fundamental component of conflict resolution. To better understand diversity cultural competence as it relates to conflict resolution, it is important to consider the meaning of culture. Culture is a complex concept, with various definitions. In a broad sense, culture entails an integrated pattern of learned human behavior that reflects the values, beliefs, attitudes, experiences, artistic expressions, history, traditions, and customs shared and transmitted by a group of people.

Cultural groups can be defined by various characteristics, including: language and nationality, social class, race, gender, religious or spiritual beliefs, ability or disability, sexual identification or orientation, education, employment, and shared history and experience.

Culture is the lens that shapes a group's worldview, what they see and do not see, and how they perceive and understand the world. When the cultural group to which one belongs is in the majority in a given community or nation, the individual is less cognizant of his or her culture because cultures shared by dominant groups are perceived as "normal" or the way things are done. People tend to notice cultures that are different from their culture, perceiving behaviors different from their own as strange or unusual.

When differences arise in cross-cultural encounters and relationships, culture is usually a factor, influencing perspectives, behaviors, and outcomes. In conflict, two different aspects of culture tend to be prevalent: worldview(s) and communication style(s).

Worldviews

Culture provides the lens through which individuals view the world. This means cultures view and interpret phenomena differently. No worldview is superior or more accurate than another; viewpoints are just different. Understanding and accepting the concept of differing worldviews places individuals in a position to learn about other cultures, which is fundamental to conflict resolution and diversity cultural competence.

Communication Styles

Cultures have different rules regarding how individuals should communicate with others. Some cultural groups emphasize listening over speaking. Some cultures use direct styles of communication (i.e., making eye contact, using I statements, speaking loudly), while other cultures use indirect styles of communication (i.e., by means of gestures and other nonverbal cues, showing emotions). Individuals that use direct styles of communication (high assertiveness and low expressiveness) are decisive in their tone and emphasize the bottom line. People who employ the spirited style of communication (high assertiveness and high expressiveness) are animated and can be very persuasive. Those that utilize a systemic style of communication (low assertiveness and low expressiveness) are very precise in their speaking and emphasize facts. Those that make use of considerate styles of communication (low assertiveness and high expressiveness) listen well and use supportive language.

Communication styles are not compatible. Additionally, there are different cultural norms regarding appropriate degrees of assertiveness or levels of tonality in communication. In some cultures raised voices may be perceived as a sign of impending danger or a sign that a fight has started, while in other cultures an increase in the volume of a conversation signifies an exciting exchange among acquaintances.

Essentially, people will interpret the same message or the identical situation in different ways. Moreover, different communication styles reflect different worldviews, which are the foundations of culture. Likewise, behavioral styles reflect worldviews. Acknowledging culture and understanding the various ways that people communicate and behave based on their worldviews can lead to conflict resolution that is culturally competent.

Core Dimensions of Cultural Competence and Conflict Resolution

Culture has a great influence on whether conflict is resolved in a culturally competent manner. Cultural competence has to do with the process by which individuals and organizations respond respectfully and effectively to individuals of all cultural backgrounds.

Individual cultural competence starts with being aware of one's own culture and how culture influences and shapes the conflict resolution process. Additionally, cultural competence requires an acknowledgement of one's own biases and stereotypes. In doing so, individuals have the opportunity to reflect upon how culture is acting upon them. Further, individuals have the opportunity to challenge their assumptions, values, and beliefs, as they attempt to see issues from another's perspective.

Organizational cultural competence involves congruent values, behaviors, practices, skills, policies, and structures that coalesce in a system or organization for individuals to work in the context of cultural differences.

Heterogeneity within cultures is as significant as diversity among cultures. One of the benefits of recognizing that differences do indeed exist within different cultures is that individuals avoid the practice of stereotyping. It is important to view and respect people as unique individuals within their own cultural group(s).

Potential Barriers to Culturally Competent Conflict Resolution

Knowledge and understanding of possible barriers to conflict resolution are primary steps toward eradicating or reducing them. Potential barriers or challenges toward culturally competent conflict resolution include the following:

- Unfamiliarity with other languages, dialects, values, and social norms
- Use of stereotypes to guide interactions with others
- History of negative experiences with individuals from other cultures
- Real or perceived conflict in values among cultures
- Tension and anxiety related to conflict

Guiding Principles for Culturally Competent Conflict Resolution

Through work and education, cultural competence evolves over time. Developing cultural competence results in being able to interact effectively with individuals across cultural differences. Similarly, resolving conflicts constructively requires cross-cultural understandings and awareness. Selected guiding principles for culturally competent conflict resolution require individuals to do the following:

- Learn about other cultures to better understand and appreciate people representing differences in race, ethnicity, religion, sexual identity, social class, group identity, physical ability, language, beliefs, and behavior patterns.

- Practice cross-cultural communication.
- Challenge their own values, beliefs, and assumptions about the "right way" to communicate.
- Seek methods to be effective in cross-cultural communications when there appears to be a breakdown in communication, rather than blame others for the breakdown.
- Become active and empathetic listeners, attempting to understand other cultural perspectives by putting themselves in other people's shoes.
- Honor other people's opinions and choices regarding whom they want to engage in communication.
- Suspend judgment, making an effort to view the situation from the perspective of an outsider.
- Become familiar with historical events that have caused conflict because of cultural differences. Use this information to develop an understanding of the conflict from the other's point of view.
- Be conscious of power imbalances. Be open to hearing other's perceptions regarding those imbalances
- Keep in mind that cultural norms may not be influencing the behavior of any given individual. Individuals should question their interpretations of the situation and circumstances surrounding the conflict.

In summary, there is no one-size-fits-all approach to conflict resolution. Culture is always a factor in conflict. Cultural competence can help individuals resolve conflicts across differences effectively so as to respect the inherent dignity of all cultural groups.

Wanda B. Knight
Pennsylvania State University

See Also: Conflict Resolution and Diversity; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Measuring and Assessing; Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Competence, Training in.

Further Readings

Brazzel, Michael. "Diversity Conflict and Diversity Conflict Management." In Handbook of Diversity Management: Beyond Awareness to Competency-Based Learning, Deborah L. Plummer, ed. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2003.

DeBendetti, Ellen J. Conflict, Resolution, and Diversity: A Manual of Participatory Activities. Amherst, MA: National Association for Mediation in Education, 1993.

Myers, Selma and Barbara Filner. Conflict Resolution Across Cultures: From Taking it out to Third Party Mediation. Amherst, MA: Amherst Educational, 1997.

Trujillo, Mary Adams, et al., eds. Re-Centering Culture and Knowledge in Conflict Resolution Practice. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 2008.

Continuum of Care

Continuum of care (CoC) is an enabling approach and a concept within social care services (examples could be health care, housing, support to physically and mentally challenged individuals, drug de-addiction services, sexual- and gender-based violence survivor support programs, etc.) that requires the care provider (and other duty bearers, such as state institutions, financial and legal assistance systems, etc.) to develop and implement an integrated, coordinated, and comprehensive system of care, creating a facilitative environment for high-quality support for the beneficiary/client. Central to the CoC concept is the need for all relevant caregivers and other duty bearers to work together in a concerted and coordinated way to provide quality support to the beneficiary or beneficiary group.

The CoC approach can straddle across multiple dimensions. For example, CoC can be explained in terms of time (i.e., through the age gradient for a patient from young to old and the treatment provided over a period of time), space (i.e., provision of treatment in an institution such as a hospital or at the level of the household), service provider (i.e., support to the beneficiary from a family member to that of a social worker to that provided by a specialist), and condition of the client (i.e., from acute, emergency conditions to stages in which the person is recovering).

Key Support Providers

The continuum of care is also explained in terms of the collaboration between the three key support providers. The first level of support is the beneficiary's own home and family, who are key in assisting the person and providing necessary care within their means. This is also the level in which the family could possibly confront and address any behavioral aspects that may be jeopardizing the person's well-being (e.g., substance abuse, sexual behavior, food choices, and other habits). The second level is the wider community where the person lives, which plays an important role in supporting that person through support networks, provision of information, and referrals if necessary. The third level are the public institutions, such as schools, hospitals, social care centers, short-stay homes, transitional shelters, and counseling centers, among other facilities.

In some cases, it is acknowledged that each level assists in solving the care needs for the person, thereby reducing the referral to the next level. For example, in the case of care for persons with substance abuse problems (especially for early addicts), these individuals could be assisted by the immediate family, who could support the person, prevent him or her from accessing the drug, and helping him or her develop a positive lifestyle. The other two levels (community and public institutions) would only be involved should the family be unable to address the issue.

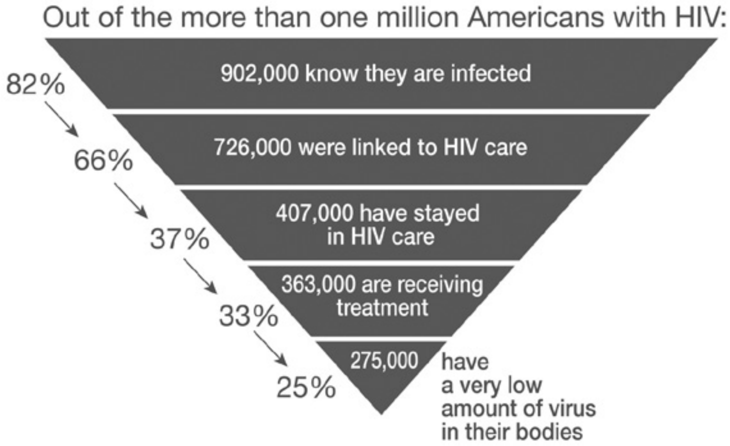

Figure 1 Percentage of HIV-infected individuals engaged in selected stages of the continuum of HIV care in 2010.

Source: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention

Key Success Criteria for Continuum of Care

One criterion for a successful CoC approach is that the care delivered is client-centered and participatory. This can be ensured only if the care providers and duty bearers understand the needs of the beneficiary and design systems that enable and facilitate easy access and usage. The specific realities of the local context are equally important to be considered. Some of the crucial aspects for the beneficiary that need to be kept in mind include: the distance at which service is available, privacy/confidentiality, affordability in terms of cost, continuity and predictability of services, and most important, quality of care.

Other factors may be important depending on the nature of the social service. Participation of the individual beneficiaries, the community at large, and other caregivers and duty bearers within the network is therefore crucial so as to discuss the needs and share their experiences and best practices, which will help in designing the CoC approach.

A second criterion for success is need-based care. Any CoC system must meet the needs of the beneficiary to the extent possible in order to provide quality care. One of the key challenges standardized social service systems face is the fact that these systems over a period of time become extremely rigid and cannot meet the specific needs of an individual or a condition that was not earlier encountered. This could be addressed by making sure any exceptions are carefully dealt with and new protocols and standards are established if needed to provide quality service to the individual.

The need for beneficiary participation in decision making is another key success criterion. A CoC approach ensures that the beneficiary (or family) is equally involved in decisions on the services provided. They are provided all relevant information and necessary advice to facilitate quality decision making. Sharon B. Arnold explains that when consumers are armed with the right information, they will demand high-quality services from their providers, choose treatment options wisely, and become active participants and self-managers of their own health and health care.

A fourth criterion for success is long-term visioning. The strength of the CoC concept is its ability to look at the long term and design and establish a network of providers accordingly. Long-term visioning could be in terms of: anticipated demographic change over a period of time, the dynamics of care needed (e.g., whether HIV prevalence is likely to increase or decrease in an area), cost factors, the need for a trained workforce, shifts in standard practices, and dealing with contingencies (e.g., a sudden increase in homeless people). Such long-term thinking enables caregivers to plan for changes and for integrating systems and approaches, rather than making a complete overhaul every time something in the external context changes.

A successful CoC approach is also collaborative and coordinated. Probably the most important need for an effective CoC is the coordination of services between different actors within the continuum and the positive collaboration among them. An effective CoC is also comprehensive, to the extent that is possible. CoC must include all aspects of care and support the beneficiary needs.

In the case of homeless people, for example, it is important that the CoC system provides for finding temporary housing, locating a permanent (or rental) house, arranging financial services or rent support, providing advice on design, introducing the person to the community, arranging for orientation to the area (if the person is new to the community), providing orientation on safety and security measures, offering vocational training to enable the person to get a job and be self-reliant, and so on. Other aspects need to be added to this continuum depending on the condition of the person. Finally, successful CoC is strategic and proactive to ensure that the services provided achieve the optimum outcome. This outcome could be measured in terms of satisfactory resolution for the beneficiary, good value for the money, synergies established between different service providers achieving maximum output, and so on.

The scope of the CoC system can also expand depending on the perceived needs in the interest of the beneficiary. For example, in an HIV CoC program, prevention aspects may be added to the already existing treatment, counseling, and post-treatment support in order to be effective and reduce the disease prevalence. Similarly, in a program dealing with support to the physically challenged person, the element of advocacy interventions may be included to entitle these individuals to certain rights (such as state support and jobs).

Advantages of CoC Approach

Farzan Bharucha and colleagues provide a compelling case for the use and expansion of the CoC approach in the health care system. Bharucha and colleagues argue that the value of the health care continuum can be best evaluated in terms of the clinical or operational improvements it provides to the overall delivery of care. This implies that a more integrated care continuum offers some combination of better quality, better service, and lower costs per unit of service. The CoC approach is advantageous for the following reasons:

- There is a synergy of action between different service providers, which makes sure that the outcome is more than what they could individually achieve.
- The approach allows specialization owing to participation of numerous providers across the span of care, enabling each provider to specialize in a particular component rather than having to take on a wide range of services that could potentially reduce quality.
- It builds partnership between care providers and other duty bearers leading to greater opportunities to learn from each other, better respond to the beneficiary's needs, and advocate together.
- Beneficiaries have access to a wide range of support services that are easily accessible and within the network.
- A CoC system that is well coordinated is also likely to gain more recognition from state institutions and communities, which could translate to receiving more funding assistance to strengthen the system further and address gaps.

Some of the activities necessary for setting up a CoC include the following:

- Mapping out the service providers. Identifying the various service providers and duty bearers in a certain location or through the expanse of the care continuum is the first stage. This gives a sense of the available providers as well as the absence of specific ones. Any gap in the continuum has to be bridged by setting up new providers or expanding the remit of existing providers to deliver the particular service for which the gap exists.
- Identifying a designated lead within the CoC system. This is crucial in order to ensure that the services are well coordinated. The role of the lead is to organize regular meetings with different providers within the network, sharing lessons and challenges. The lead also identifies any service provision gaps in the continuum and works to address this gap through the inclusion of other providers, changing approaches, or asking an existing provider to take on additional support activities.
- Identifying and communicating the referral pathways once the providers are mapped, designing a referral pathway between them if necessary. Referral systems need to be understood by all providers, including setting up standard protocols and conditions.
- Documenting the case records for individuals is crucial so as to enable the various caregivers to obtain information on the background of the client, past history, support provided, and any specific conditions they need to be aware of. Electronic documentation is probably the most efficient way in which case records are maintained and retrieved, and also ensures confidentiality by limiting access only to those who are authorized. However, given that different support providers rely (or likely rely) on different electronic filing systems, the document transmission system may not be efficient. This challenge has to be addressed. The alternative is paper-based documentation, which is used in many countries/contexts and can serve the purpose if the document management system (and various forms and formats) are standardized, easily understood, and safely stored.
- Training of staff: Given the multitude of actors who are involved in the CoC, it is important that all caregivers have skilled staff that are well versed with the protocols, standards, and approaches used by others. Interorganizational training is sometimes useful to bring together staff from different institutions and departments in order to facilitate discussions and share experiences and expectations.
- Being aware of the community: Existence of a CoC system needs to be well known to the community in which the system is set up so that community members are able to utilize the system. This includes extensive community sensitization regarding the CoC approach, the various actors involved in it, persons who could or could not access these services and preconditions, and the role of the communities themselves in supporting this approach.

Prafulla K. Mishra
HelpAge International

See Also: Home and Community Services; Hospitals; Information and Referral.

Further Readings

Arnold, Sharon B. “Improving Quality Health Care: The Role of Consumer Engagement” (October 2007). Robert Wood Johnson Foundation. http://www.academyhealth.org/files/issues/ConsumerEngagement.pdf (Accessed October 2013).

Bharucha, Farzan, et. al. “Navigating the Care Continuum: The Next Frontier for Providers.” Becker’s Hospital Review (April 2012). http://www.beckershospitalreview.com/strategic-planning/navigating-the-care-continuum-the-next-frontier-for-providers.html (Accessed October 2013).

Case Management Society of America. “Standards of Practice for Case Management” (2010). http://www.cmsa.org/portals/0/pdf/memberonly/StandardsOfPractice.pdf (Accessed October 2013).

Family Health International. “Scaling up the Continuum of Care for People Living With HIV in Asia and the Pacific: A Toolkit for Implementers” (2007). http://pdf.usaid.gov/pdf_docs/PNADK636.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities

The Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) is an international treaty adopted by the United Nations (UN) General Assembly on December 13, 2006. The CRPD is one of several key human rights treaties, including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (1979), and Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989), among others. These treaties, however, were insufficient to overcome the physical and social barriers that prevented many people with disabilities from receiving an education, becoming employed, obtaining quality health care, moving freely and independently around their communities, and being fully included in society.

There are an estimated 1 billion people with some form of disability in the world, including 182 million children. The CRPD requires nations that ratify the treaty to protect and ensure equal enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms by all persons with disabilities and to promote respect for their dignity. When a nation (called a “State Party” in the treaty) ratifies CRPD, it acknowledges an obligation to make whatever changes may be necessary in its domestic law to fully implement the treaty. In effect, ratification means that a nation consents to be bound by the provisions of the treaty, and to implement the treaty in good faith. As of July 2013, 156 nations signed the treaty and 133 of them ratified it.

Convention Requirements

The CRPD defines people with disabilities to include all individuals who have long-term physical, mental, intellectual, or sensory impairments hindering full and effective participation in society on an equal basis with others. The CRPD specifically requires nations to take all appropriate measures, including passing, modifying, and abolishing legislation, regulations, practices, customs, and other policies to implement the treaty. Fundamental to the CRPD, nations must implement all necessary measures to eliminate discrimination on the basis of disability by any person, organization, or private enterprise. In doing so, the CRPD emphasizes the necessity and importance of closely consulting with and actively involving persons with disabilities (including children) in decision making on issues concerning them.

The CRPD affirms that all persons with disabilities have a right to life, rights to liberty and security, and rights to freedom from torture and inhuman, degrading, violent, abusive, and exploitative treatment. It mandates that all persons with disabilities have recognition before the law and access to justice equal to others. Nations must ensure the accessibility of all public physical environments and facilities (e.g., schools, hospitals, courtrooms) and all public transportation, emergency, and information and communication services in both urban and rural areas.

The CRPD requires nations to promote the research, development, and availability of universally designed goods, services, facilities, equipment, information and communication technologies, mobility aids, and assistive technologies. In addition, nations must collaborate and cooperate in data collection, implementation, and monitoring and reporting progress to the UN.

When a person or group with disabilities claims a nation has violated their CRPD rights, they must use the nation’s available legal mechanisms to redress their grievances. If unsuccessful, they may file a communication with the UN Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities if the alleged violating nation has ratified the CRPD’s optional protocol. This protocol subjects the nation to the jurisdiction of the committee. The committee, however, is empowered to only examine the claim and must submit its findings and recommendations to the nation. The protocol has been signed by 91 and ratified by 77 nations.

Ratification in the United States

There are an estimated 57 million people with disabilities in the United States. They are entitled to civil rights protections under the Americans with Disabilities Act, Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, and other federal laws. The United States to date has not ratified the CRPD. Some critics of ratification argue that current U.S. law is consistent with or more protective than the CRPD, and thus the CRPD need not be ratified. Others have raised concerns that ratification would require costly or invasive changes to U.S. law. The National Council on Disability (NCD), an independent federal agency responsible for making disability policy recommendations to the president and Congress, supports ratification. In a 2008 report NCD found that the CRPD is largely consistent with federal disability law, although some provisions of U.S. law may require more rigorous implementation by the executive branch or further action by Congress.

NCD also found significant shortcomings in U.S. laws pertaining to people with disabilities. Among the larger concerns were the underenforcement of disability law and voting rights; the inability of federal law to address issues specified by the U.S. Constitution as subject to the authority of state government (e.g., rights of children, legal capacity, family and health law); U.S. Supreme Court precedent that children with disabilities are entitled only to an adequate education rather than to the development of their full potential; issues addressing access to justice, humanitarian emergencies, freedom from exploitation, and the rights of women with disabilities; and nonrecognition under U.S. law of the rights to medical and assistive devices and economic and social protections.

The United States signed the CRPD on July 30, 2009, agreeing in principle with the treaty. Ratification of a treaty requires a two-thirds majority (67 or more votes) of the Senate's 100 members. Notably, the United States has not ratified the conventions regarding persons with disabilities, women, or children. President Barack Obama supports ratification of the CRPD. On December 4, 2012, the Senate failed to pass the CRPD by a vote of 61 to 38.

Conclusion

Studies of the implementation of the CRPD by nations find modest progress in general, widely varying means of implementation under the many different legal systems of nations, and much progress yet to be made in order to see the treaty's full implementation. In the history of international human rights treaties since creation of the United Nations, it has been commonplace for nations to implement treaties over the course of decades. Likewise with the CRPD, each ratifying nation is on its own unique path to full realization of human rights for persons with disabilities.

William N. Myhill
Syracuse University

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990; Individuals with Disabilities Education Act; Universal Access/Universal Design; United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Further Readings

Handicap International. "Teaching Kit on the Convention on the Rights of Persons With Disabilities." http://www.handicap-international.fr/kit-pedagogique/indexen.html (Accessed November 2013).

United Nations. "Convention on the Rights of Persons With Disabilities." http://www.un.org/disabilities/convention/conventionfull.shtml (Accessed November 2013).

United Nations Enable. http://www.un.org/disabilities (Accessed November 2013).

Co-Parenting, Cultural Aspects of

Co-parenting is the result of two parents who are no longer in a committed relationship and continue the process of working together to raise and provide for their children. The romantic relationship between the parents may be over, but the parenting relationship remains constant. In a co-parenting relationship, both individuals share the responsibilities of parenting while working to maintain a stable environment for the children. The separation of parents results in changes and inconsistencies that may cause the children to feel a mix of emotions related to confusion, worry, sadness, and guilt. Co-parenting is a holistic process that involves planned and focused activities intended to create a supportive and empowering environment for the child.

This process can be challenging and complex. Families across cultures seek guidance and assistance from services in the community. For a human service professional, it is important to understand the impact that co-parenting has on children. This includes proactively addressing existing barriers that contribute to the conflict between culture and the needs and expectations of the social service agency. Although understanding cultural diversity in the families served in the field of human services is important, the development, delivery, and evaluation of the training of those providing services are also important. Providing continuous love and support during this time of life transition can have a long-term effect on the health and well-being of the family.

Establishing Parenting Arrangements

The arrangement of co-parenting can be established as a result of custody arrangements, mediation, parenting agreements, or by court order. These arrangements may include how frequent and how long a parent spends time with a child. Events related to school, holidays, and family celebrations such as birthdays and/or special events are considered when making these arrangements. The co-parenting arrangement may include a parenting plan, either in the form of legal stipulations or an informal plan created by an agreement made by both parents. The parenting plan typically states procedures to be followed by both parents in relation to decision making, financial obligations, medical issues and expenses, living arrangements, and everyday issues. For a successful co-parenting relationship, both individuals should demonstrate the ability to be somewhat flexible with the parenting plan to also meet the needs of each individual. Being respectful of each parent's time with the children is also a positive characteristic in building and strengthening the relationship of co-parents.

Abiding by the rules and agreed-upon decisions regarding the children can minimize conflict and increase communication regarding the children. Open communication about thoughts and opinions on the children's growth process can lead to mutual support and understanding by both parents. By keeping the best interest of the children as the main priority, both parents can work to reduce conflict through conversation and negotiation when challenges occur.

Focus of Co-Parenting

The goals of a co-parenting alliance can be achieved by maintaining cooperation through communication. In a co-parenting relationship, mutual respect and support for each individual is important for the children to witness and experience. Encouraging children to remain connected to each parent and both sides of the family can be beneficial for the relationship. Observing parents who work together and remain consistent and accountable in their parenting style allows the children to regain stability and familiarity with family lifestyle changes.

Legal and mental health professionals stress the importance of both parents forming a united front in raising their children. By working together, the parents are able to create an environment of respect and mutual support in efforts to strengthen the relationship with their children. Communicating with the other parent does not have to be stressful or include arguments during each contact episode. Many interventions have been developed to assist parents in their co-parenting relationship to reduce stress and conflict, such as attending educational classes that provide skills in shared parenting. By witnessing what other parents have gone through in their co-parenting experiences, parents may be encouraged to focus on the needs of the children and gain insight to better ways of co-parenting. Professionals in the field of human services are encouraged to support parents and help individuals understand that living apart does not mean that they love and support their children any less than before.

Community and mental health services assist families and the new co-parenting alliance with overcoming new challenges in their lives. Children may feel more comfortable sharing personal concerns with someone other than their parents. Assistance can be obtained through schools, community mental health facilities, child and youth service agencies, nonprofit agencies, or private practice.

Risks and Benefits

When parents cannot establish a healthy relationship, the children are at risk and can become entangled in their conflict. If children are constantly exposed to the conflict between their parents, their emotional, mental, and even physical health may suffer. It is important for both parents to not share negative thoughts or opinions about the other parent with the child. Although not always possible, parents should also try not to argue in front of the children. Both parents should seek professional mental health services if they experience frustration, disappointment, hurt, or troubles related to the new co-parenting relationship.

It is important to acknowledge that the children's welfare is the priority in the goal of establishing a healthy co-parenting alliance. Children need both parents to actively participate in their lives. It would benefit the co-parenting alliance to schedule regular meeting times to keep the other parent informed of issues involving the children. Maintaining a strong connection with the children through the parents' separation can be challenging. One of the most valued experiences is helping the children understand what is important. While the children do not have to know all the details surrounding the parents' relationship, telling the truth at an age-appropriate level they can understand is beneficial. Children may feel that they in some way contributed to their parents' relationship ending. Moreover, it is important that both parents stress to the children that they are not responsible for their decision in separating. Reinforcing to the children that they are not at fault for the parents' separation can assist the child in understanding the truth and lessen any feelings of self-blame or guilt.

New Schedule

Children and parents face a new experience of going back and forth between parents and their houses. Neither the parents nor the children have experience with dividing time and frequency of parent visits. Feelings of confusion, worry, and frustration are common at the beginning of the separation adjustment. Following the agreed-upon rules and schedule can minimize feelings of worry and confusion, in some cases, by establishing a regular routine. Children who experience consistency in their schedule experience their environment as much more stable. In working toward the best interests of the children, the parents' priority is creating and maintaining a healthy environment for the children. A co-parenting relationship based on communication and respect tends to offer children an opportunity to grow up in a stable atmosphere that includes both parents.

Finally, creating, understanding, following, and modifying the parenting plan to the best interest of the child is essential in a co-parenting alliance. Working together following the termination of a romantic relationship is not always easy. By being aware of the needs of the children and providing what is needed, co-parents are able to help their children navigate difficult life transitions. This process provides ground for the development of healthy interpersonal relationships in the future.

Monique N. Mercado
Allison M. Atkinson
St. Mary's University

See Also: Alloparenting, Cultural Aspects of; Divorce; Parenting Skills Training; Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in.

Further Readings

Arendell, T. Co-Parenting: A Review of the Literature. Philadelphia: Pennsylvania University Press, 1996.
Cartwright, C. and K. Gibson. "The Effects of Co-Parenting Relationships With Ex-Spouses on Couples in Step-Families." Family Matters, v.92 (2013).
McHale, J. P. and E. Fivaz-Depeursinge. "Principles of Effective Co-Parenting and Its Assessment in Infancy and Early Childhood." In Parenthood and Mental Health: A Bridge Between Infant and Adult Psychiatry, S. Tyano, M. Keren, H. Herrman, and K. Cox, eds. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley-Blackwell, 2010.

Counseling and Psychotherapy Services

Counseling and psychotherapy are integral services in the diagnosis and treatment of mental and emotional disorders. Either may be delivered as a stand-alone service or in the context of an interdisciplinary approach that includes biological and social interventions. Historically, troubled individuals sought counsel from religious leaders or from elders in their families. In many cultures, this traditional wisdom remains the primary source of help for troubled community members. In Western society, however, the Industrial Revolution created a need for better service delivery to those with mental and emotional disorders. Community mental health centers deliver a large proportion of counseling and psychotherapy services. Currently, to meet a demand from consumers and third-party payers to provide services that are effective and efficient, counselors and psychotherapists are guided by outcome research and are required to use evidence-based practices.

The terms counseling and psychotherapy are often interchangeably used. Although counselors may conduct psychotherapy and psychotherapists may give counsel, as the profession of counseling has evolved, counseling and psychotherapy have become better defined. Counseling frequently addresses issues of adjustment. A skilled counselor can help ease the strain of normal life transitions by guiding a client through the processes of problem solving, decision making, stress management, or the grief process. Counselors assist clients with interpersonal issues by mediating conflict or teaching social skills. Clients with chronic anxiety or depression often benefit from intermittent counseling to assist them with symptom management. Mental health counselors often practice at a master's level in community mental health agencies. Licensed counselors can also practice privately as generalists or with a specialty. Specialties that require additional certification include vocational counseling, school counseling, substance abuse counseling, employee assistance counseling, hypnotherapy, and marriage and family counseling.

Psychotherapy has evolved to describe services provided by a doctoral-level practitioner who treats mental and emotional disorders as defined in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders of the American Psychiatric Association. Psychotherapy focuses on complex issues that may require exploration of the deeper dynamics of personality, co-occurring medical disorders, and the client's psychosocial profile. Psychotherapy is usually a longer process than counseling.

Practitioners

The core skills of counseling are the staples of all the helping professions. To be effective, social workers, psychologists, psychiatrists, crisis workers, case managers, and psychiatric nurses must be proficient in the active listening skills of attending, reflecting, empathizing, exploring, and planning. Psychotherapy is in the scope of practice of the licensed professions of psychiatry, psychology, clinical social work, clinical counseling, and clinical psychiatric nursing. The licensed professions require specific educational preparation and supervised practice.

The discipline of counseling is self-contained. In the past two decades, counselors have accelerated their efforts to establish and clarify their professional identity and delineate their scope of practice. The American Counseling Association defines and regulates the profession of counseling. The Council for Accreditation of Counseling and Related Education Programs (CACREP) sets the standard for counselor education. In most of the United States, graduation from a CACREP accredited program or its equivalent is a requirement for licensing. With this strengthening of professional identity, education of counselors by psychologists is decreasing, and doctoral programs in counselor education are rapidly growing to meet the needs of CACREP-accredited programs.

Continuum of Care

A continuum of care refers to the frequency and intensity of treatment necessary to be effective. Counseling and psychotherapy services occur at every level of care. An intake counselor conducting an assessment and recommending the appropriate level of care is often the first point of contact for a client. At the lower level on the continuum of care, a patient may attend weekly or biweekly one-hour outpatient counseling sessions. For clients who require more support, structure, or supervision, counselors and/or psychotherapists deliver services in the context of an intensive outpatient program (IOP). An IOP often includes the services of social workers and medical professionals. The program participants meet several times per week for individual counseling, group therapy, and medication management. Day hospital programs are a step up from IOPs, and meet daily for the entire day. When inpatient hospitalization is the appropriate level of care, a counselor or psychotherapist may conduct individual counseling or psychotherapy, group therapy, family therapy, creative therapies, or psycho-education. In long-term residential settings, a counselor's duties may include assisting residents in adjusting to residential treatment, conducting community meetings, facilitating resolution of interpersonal issues, and participating in discharge planning.

The seminal work for counseling and psychotherapy occurred in the early 1900s, when Sigmund Freud conceptualized the unconscious mind and introduced the psychoanalytic theory.

Community-based counselors and psychotherapists often identify the need for medical intervention, community support, or social services. In the context of wraparound services, counselors work in conjunction with an interdisciplinary team, and may provide services at the client's place of residence to better position them for monitoring safety issues, support systems, and medication compliance. Counselors assist child protective services by working with parents toward reunification with children, and by working with children who are in foster care. In assisted living facilities, nursing homes, and hospice care, counselors assist residents and their families in maintaining their mental health while making difficult decisions, negotiating issues of loss, grief, and making healthy adjustments to critical changes in the family structure. In correctional facilities, counselors provide services to inmates who had mental health or substance abuse issues prior to incarceration, or to those who are pending release.

In community-based correctional halfway houses and three-quarter-way houses, counseling addresses mental health issues, substance related problems, vocational planning, and social support to facilitate successful reentry to the community. In courts and emergency rooms, crisis counselors assist victims of domestic violence and other crimes in establishing immediate safety. Crisis counselors may also debrief victims immediately after a crisis, or assess for and treat post-traumatic stress disorder. School guidance counselors participate in individual education plans, disciplinary actions, and student crises. Some school systems utilize guidance counselors to provide programs for students with problems associated with parental divorce, substance abuse, pregnancy, or other nonacademic problems that interfere with academic performance. Colleges typically have counseling available as a part of student services.

Types of Counseling and Therapy

Psychological theories are the foundation for standard practices of counseling and therapy. The basic theoretical orientations are psychoanalytic, existential, cognitive, and behavioral. The seminal work for counseling and psychotherapy occurred in the early 1900s, when Sigmund Freud conceptualized the unconscious mind and introduced the psychoanalytic theory. Freud's work seeded the emergence of many schools of psychotherapy. Carl Jung's humanistic theory emphasized existential crises and the importance of self. Ivan Pavlov and B. F. Skinner, behavioral theorists, studied how learning serendipitously occurs through classical conditioning, and how rewards and punishments shape behavior. Alfred Adler's theory extended Freud's work by considering clients in the context of their development, emphasizing the importance of family dynamics, birth order, and childhood experiences. Adler's method of reworking the cognitions that stemmed from childhood experiences is a precursor to the current practice of cognitive therapy. Although all of the theoretical orientations drive current practice, most contemporary counseling and psychotherapy is based on cognitive theory, which purports that thinking causes emotions, therefore a change in thinking will bring about a change in emotions.

Freud's psychoanalytic theory is the basis for the contemporary psychodynamic theory. A therapist using a psychodynamic approach helps the client to discover childhood and family-of-origin dynamics that account for the client's current state, and assists the client in releasing the influences of the past. A psychodynamic therapist might also assist a client in identifying and rectifying developmental deficits in social skills, trust, emotional modulation, or conflict resolution. Existentialism, also known as humanism, is a philosophy that explores man's propensity to explore the human condition. Therapies deriving from existentialism include person-centered therapy, gestalt therapy, and logotherapy. Rather than drawing from the past, existential therapists focus on the current state of the client, and whether they are living authentically.

Person-centered therapy relies on a strong therapeutic relationship and the therapists' ability to deliver services with unconditional, positive regard.

Cognitive therapy is founded on the premise that faulty thinking processes cause uncomfortable emotions. Cognitive therapists assist clients in restructuring cognitions that cause emotional discomfort. One method for changing cognitions is to challenge irrational beliefs. Albert Ellis pioneered this approach through rational emotive therapy (RET), in which he identified common irrational beliefs and aggressively disputed the beliefs. Behavioral therapists often treat specific symptoms. Systematic desensitization, for instance, is a type of behavior therapy that incorporates relaxation training, which is indicated for specific phobias. For behavioral issues, behavior modification is treated by developing a system of reinforcement that increases desired behaviors. Rational emotive behavioral therapy (REBT) combines cognitive and behavioral approaches, and cognitions are sometimes changed when prescribed behaviors are carried out.

Most third-party payers require that counselors and psychotherapists have empirical support for the methods they use. Evidence-based practices assure that services are safe, clinically effective, and cost-effective. The brief, specific interventions used in cognitive and behavioral approaches are easier to study than existential and psychodynamic interventions, so their dominance in the field of counseling and psychotherapy may be related to their amenability to the research that drives evidence-based practice.

Alternative Approaches to Counseling and Psychotherapy Services

As advances in medicine and technology have led to a deeper understanding of mental and emotional disorders, counselors and psychotherapists have integrated somatic approaches into their practices. To treat symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), eye movement desensitization therapy (EMDR) requires a client to recount a traumatic event as they visually follow the continuous back and forth movement of the therapist's fingers or an audible tone. EMDR has proven effective for quickly decreasing symptoms, and is most effective for a single traumatic event. Counselors using emotional freedom therapy (EFT) treat anxious clients by teaching them a technique of tapping specific points on their head, face, and hands. Despite studies that show EFT to be effective, the popular technique remains controversial. Breathwork is a technique of manipulating normal breathing patterns to attain an altered state. Psychotherapists use breathwork in conjunction with drawings, music, and group process to treat anxiety and depression, despite the scarcity of research to support its effectiveness.

Since the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the American military has significantly increased its use of mental health counselors for soldiers returning from war, military families, and veterans. They often present with problems of traumatic brain injury, PTSD, domestic violence, and suicide. Similarly, survivors of catastrophic events, acts of terrorism, and natural disasters are at a high risk for severe emotional and functional difficulties. Counselors specializing in crisis and trauma provide immediate services to victims and witnesses to these events. Counselors also work with first responders who experience traumatic stress or compassion fatigue.

Challenges to Counseling and Psychotherapy

Population dynamics present the greatest challenge to counselors and psychotherapists. As 76 million baby boomers pass retirement age, the demand for specialized services will increase. In addition to social, financial, and medical issues of the elderly, baby boomers have a high rate of substance abuse. According to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), 47 percent of older clients seeking mental health services have co-occurring substance-related disorders. It is incumbent upon counselors and psychotherapists to stay abreast of the research on substance abuse diagnosis and treatment for the aging.

Cultural competency may be the greatest challenge to contemporary counselors and psychotherapists. Age, gender, sexual orientation, and disability affect the dynamics of counseling and psychotherapy. With globalization, the cultural mix is rapidly changing. Diversity of race, ethnicity, and religion requires counselors and psychotherapists to understand the beliefs and mores of a group, as well as nuances of communication that, if misunderstood, could undermine the therapeutic relationship that is the foundation of counseling and psychotherapy.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Webster University

See Also: Cross-Cultural Service Models; Culturally Diverse Practice, Theories of; Mental Health Services, Adult; Mental Health Services, Ethnic Models and Multiultural.

Further Readings

Dreachslin, Janice L., M. Jean Gilbert, and Beverly Malone. Diversity and Cultural Competence in Health Care: A Systems Approach. Somerset, NJ: Wiley, 2012.

Srebalus, David J. and Duane Brown. Guide to the Helping Professions. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2000.

Sue, Derald Wing and David Sue. Counseling the Culturally Diverse: Theory and Practice. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley and Sons, 2013.

Court-Appointed Special Advocate, National Association

The first Court Appointed Special Advocates for Children (CASA) program was founded in 1977 by a juvenile court judge in Seattle, Washington. He recognized an unmet need and realized the benefits of utilizing a group of workers whose sole obligation would be to investigate court cases involving child abuse and neglect and to regularly report objective findings to presiding judges.

The children in these cases have been removed from their homes because of abuse and neglect on the part of their parents and/or guardians. CASA volunteers establish and maintain an ongoing presence in the lives of the children who they serve. These citizen volunteers provide a critical link between the wishes of their young clients and the decisions that judges must make on their behalf. For this reason, CASA workers are often assigned to cases that the judges find the most challenging, complex, and in need of immediate one-on-one attention and reporting.

Factors for CASA volunteer appointments will vary among judges, but they often include cases in which multiple children are a part of one immediate family. There are also frequently times when very young children (usually age 3 and under) are involved. Other common determinants for CASA inclusion are cases in which the children have been sexually abused, have suffered from medical neglect, and/or have been exposed to harmful drugs before birth. Additionally, sometimes the minor females who are involved in abuse and neglect cases are also parents. Juvenile judges will most likely assign CASA volunteers to monitor and advocate for both these young mothers and their children throughout the course of the court cases.

Since its inception, CASA has branched into many state chapters, which provide oversight and support to local agencies within their jurisdictions. Each agency recruits, trains, and supervises a diverse group of volunteers who operate as court officials, and who work with a variety of individuals and organizations throughout the course of each case to which they are assigned. CASA volunteers advocate for the best interests of the children who are directly involved in their cases. Judges support and rely on this service, largely because the information that is provided to them by CASA volunteers is pertinent, fact-based, concise, and solely directed toward the children's needs. CASA's mission is to help abused and neglected children find safe, nurturing, and permanent homes as quickly as possible.

Recruitment and Professional Training of CASA Volunteers

Agency staff members recruit CASA volunteers with the goal of selecting adult individuals from a broad range of ethnic, educational, professional, and cultural backgrounds. However, potential volunteers are not required to possess a certain skill set in order to be considered for service. After applications have been reviewed, each candidate is thoroughly interviewed. Some of the interview questions measure a candidate's cultural competence, along with their willingness to be open-minded and nonjudgmental while working on a court case. Candidates are also examined for their ability to commit to CASA volunteer work, including their availability to attend court proceedings, visit with the children at least one time each month, and remain with a case until it closes. The volunteer screening process includes personal reference checks and criminal background checks.

Once candidates are accepted as potential CASA volunteers, they are equipped with foundational skills and knowledge, which couple with their natural abilities through a research-based and nationally standardized volunteer training curriculum. Recruits receive 30 preservice hours of education, in which case studies and subjects such as child protection systems, abuse and neglect laws, cultural competence, mental illness, and substance abuse are discussed in ways that highlight family strengths. This curriculum encapsulates the roles and responsibilities of CASA volunteers, providing trainees with a greater understanding of how to effectively work on a case, and leaving each worker with a valuable resource manual to draw upon after their advocacy work begins. Annual in-service training is also provided to the volunteers. Following completion of the 30-hour course, candidates are sworn in as official CASA volunteers and "persons of the court" by judges. These qualified individuals are ready to successfully navigate through the social services and judicial systems. They become the voices of the children, and represent their interests. CASA is well-respected by judges and their staff, and volunteers are supported and guided by the CASA staff members.

CASA Volunteer Work

Once a judge appoints CASA to a specific case, its volunteers have legal rights to interview relevant people, and to gather critical information from a number of sources, including court, medical, and school records. Most cases last about one year, and volunteers usually spend about 10 hours per month on each case. This time frame largely depends on the number of children involved and the complexity of the original circumstances that brought a case to court. CASA standards require the volunteers to meet with each child at least monthly. Visits often take place in the foster homes, but could also occur in other locations, such as schools and day care centers.

CASA volunteers strive to ensure that children are thriving in their foster care placements. They also want to know if the parents are following through with the court-directed steps that must be completed before their children can be returned home. In order for CASA to effectively monitor and hold all parties accountable for their actions, volunteers regularly meet with social service providers and anyone else who could affect the cases' outcomes. A typical week could include meeting with the child, observing a parent-child visit, speaking with a caseworker about the family, and following up with a parent's probation officer. CASA volunteers also attend ongoing court proceedings, and when the need arises explain these proceedings to the involved children. CASA volunteers do not offer personal advice to the children, but instead provide steady emotional and moral support through consistent communication and advocacy work. These volunteers must convey respect and courtesy to the children's parents, while clarifying and maintaining their primary role as the minors' legal advocates.

Although CASA represents the best interest of the children involved in each case, the needs of other family members are also recognized, particularly if those needs directly impact the family's ability to successfully reunite. CASA volunteers assess and address such concerns for all immediate family members and foster parents, including any need for mental health, medical, social, and educational supports. Having access to confidential records and multiple service providers affords volunteers with a well-rounded and comprehensive platform to use when determining family needs. Knowledge of these needs is also obtained through direct interviews with external people who are relevant to the case, and through observations during scheduled and unannounced visits to the homes by CASA volunteers.

Concise written reports, which include updates on the children's welfare, along with the parents' compliance with court-ordered requirements, are written by CASA volunteers and filed with the courts for the judges' review. Hearings are scheduled with these judges at least every six months, and decisions are made by those judges regarding where the children will temporarily and permanently live. CASA reports contain such recommendations, and also offer suggestions for making current and future living situations as enriching and as trauma-free as possible for the minors. Each volunteer attempts to stay with the same case until it closes. If this is not possible, then another volunteer is assigned and supervised by CASA staff.

Taj Y. Artis
Court Appointed Special Advocates for Children

See Also: Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Children in Foster Care; Family Services.

Further Readings

CASA. The Connection: Special 30th Anniversary Issue (Spring 2007).

CASA. http://www.casaforchildren.org (Accessed July 2013).

CASA. Judges' Guide to CASA/GAL Program Development. Seattle, WA: National CASA Association Resource Library, 2013.

Crisis Services

Crisis services are used by diverse communities and encompass short-term immediate services provided to those experiencing an emergency or crisis situation. A crisis situation or event occurs when an individual is feeling overwhelmed, has difficulty coping, or lacks the resources to cope adequately with emotional, mental, physical, and behavioral distress or problems. Crisis situations or events include the ending of a relationship, death of a family member or friend, or the loss of a job. The definition of a crisis may differ with regard to cultural and linguistic groups. Situations can also be life-threatening, such as natural disasters, sexual assault or domestic violence, physical or mental illness, thoughts of suicide or homicide, and sudden and disparate changes in relationships (such as a death or divorce). At some point, most people experience a crisis. Responses to crises vary, often reflecting cultural and language differences, and most people experience an array of feelings when confronted with a crisis. It is common for individuals to feel emotionally and even physically overwhelmed during a crisis and to experience a loss of effective problem-solving and coping skills.

Crisis services often progress through different phases that are primarily aimed at reducing the intensity of an individual's emotional, mental, physical, and behavioral reactions to a crisis. During the first phase, an assessment is performed, exploring what happened to bring about the crisis and the individual's response to the crisis. An individual's response to a crisis can include emotional aspects (e.g., sadness, fear, anger, grief, or guilt), mental aspects (e.g., difficulties concentrating, loss of focus, or confusion), physical aspects (e.g., headaches, fatigue, or nausea), and behavioral aspects (e.g., loss of appetite, inability to sleep, or restlessness). During the assessment phase, it is also common to screen for potential for suicide and/or homicide. A strengths-based assessment also entails assessing an individual for strengths such as coping skills and social support.

In the next phase, it is critical to assist the individual by decreasing emotional pain, providing emotional support, ensuring safety, and developing a plan for coping with the crisis. This may involve connecting the individual with community resources that they can access to assist in coping with or resolving the crisis. The aim of crisis services is to improve functioning of the individual and assist them in developing new coping skills and avoiding problematic ways of coping such as withdrawal from potential support networks, isolation, and substance abuse. To this end, crisis services assist the individual in recovering from dealing with the crisis and experiencing long-term problematic consequences. Research has supported positive outcomes for crisis services, and has shown that such services lead to decreased distress around a crisis and improved problem-solving skills. Another phase of the crisis service involves informing the individual as to the various responses to crisis, and letting them know that they are having a normal reaction to an abnormal situation. In addition to this normalization of the response to crisis, the individual is also informed that responses are temporary.

The next phase of the crisis service process involves increasing the knowledge of how an individual can avoid or cope with a similar crisis in the future. The individual can be taught how to anticipate a crisis and helped cultivate the skills ahead of time to deal with a crisis. Crisis services largely focus on helping individuals develop the coping skills needed to effectively deal with a crisis. Such services help an individual discover coping skills that they might already have, and to develop new coping skills as necessary. Coping skills might employ relaxation techniques or exercise to address physical and mental stress, as well as journal writing. The goal is to have an individual express their feelings, rather than keeping them inside. Additionally, the individual is guided in discovering their options for social support or spending time with supportive friends and family. In addition to the cultivation of coping skills, cognitive behavioral therapy can be used in crisis services.

In the final phase of crisis services, the professional will assist the individual in helping them realize that they have the resources to cope with difficult crisis situations. The individual is encouraged to use new and previously developed coping strategies, as well as to make realistic plans for dealing with future crises. Usually, the professional will provide appropriate follow-up as necessary. Crisis services are provided by an array of service providers, such as social workers, nurses, doctors, psychologists, and other professionals or paraprofessionals. Services are provided in several different places or settings, including community clinics, hospitals, police stations, social service agencies, schools, and through 24-hour telephone hotlines. With the rise of the Internet, online counseling has also proliferated. Crisis services vary in their duration, ranging from one session to multiple sessions. Such services are not aimed at addressing long-term problems, but rather are aimed at stabilizing an individual experiencing a crisis situation. Peer counseling programs have also established peer counseling centers for specific groups such as seniors, the mentally ill, and adolescents.

Several challenges to providing crisis services have recently arisen. Crisis service providers have had to tackle an ever-growing array of issues and problems faced by clients. Additionally, the diversity of communities, particularly in cultural, ethnic, and linguistic backgrounds, has exponentially grown and has increased the need for more culturally and linguistically competent crisis services. Increased diversity in services, particularly with regard to availability and accessibility to immigrant and refugee communities, is in demand. These communities are often in need of services that are provided in different languages and by responders who are familiar with the cultures and unique needs of the community. As the diversity within communities continues to grow, crisis services will also need to diversify. Communities have also experienced a growth in the elderly and senior populations. Crisis services have also grown with the advent of first response programs. First responders, such as police officers, firemen, and paramedics, have been trained to provide crisis services. Additionally, an increasing number of those who deal extensively with the public have been trained in crisis services and in dealing with irate or violent customers.

Aileen Duldulao
Independent Scholar
Lorraine Escribano
Tundi Balogh
Morrison Child & Family Services

See Also: Behavior Support and Management; Emergency Medical Care; Family Crisis Intervention Planning; Life Skills Training; Mental Health Services, Adult.

Further Readings

Cavaiola, Alvan and Joseph E. Colford. Crisis Intervention Casebook. Independence, KY: Cengage Learning, 2010.
James, Richard K. and Burl E. Gilliland. Crisis Intervention Strategies. Independence, KY: Cengage Learning, 2012.
Rogoff, Barbara. The Cultural Nature of Human Development. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

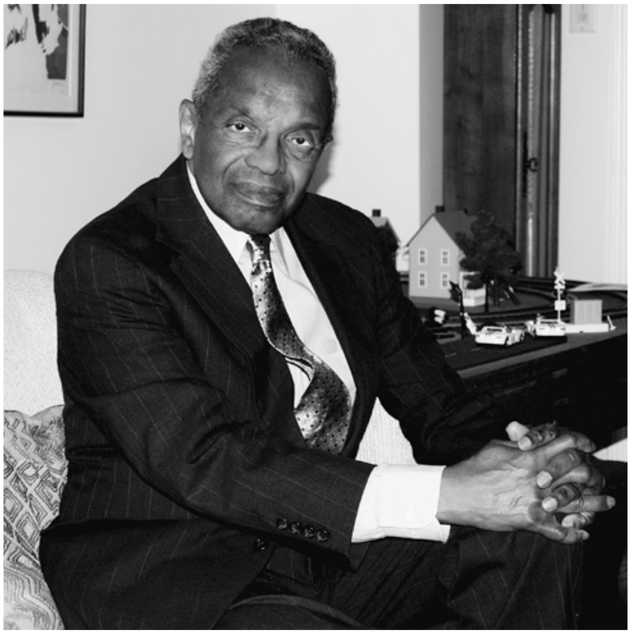
Critical Race Theory

Critical race theory (CRT) is a movement originating in critical legal studies in the mid-1970s, when Derrick Bell and other scholars looking at issues of race, racial subordination, and discrimination were concerned about the slow gains being made by the civil rights movement and began to search for an oppositional voice that reflected a more progressive and politically oriented school of thought. At that time, critical race theorists looked critically at race relations by examining everyday interactions to illuminate the racial component in them rather than promoting the color-blind approach espoused by the law and civil rights activists of the day. By looking carefully at microaggressions and everyday interactions, critical race theorists could help show the true extent of racism in the United States. It was their belief that by critically analyzing race they could begin to alleviate the racism and inequality structurally embedded in society.

Today, theorists reflect on the relationship among power, privilege, and intersectionality. They see power and oppression in a broader context that includes economics, history, education, and politics. The basic tenets of critical race theory include a critique of liberalism, storytelling, revisionist history, structural determinism, cultural nationalism, essentialism, critical pedagogy, and criticism. CRT has produced a number of spin-off movements including critical Latino theory, critical Asian theory, critical feminist theory, critical education theory, critical queer theory, and critical white theory. These schools of thought unite around a social movement that critically analyzes discrimination, oppression, and privilege in broader contexts than race, such as national origin, sexual orientation, class, and gender.

Early Origins

Critical race theory originated in critical legal studies, a field of inquiry that argues that preserving the interests of power, rather than the demands of principle and precedent, is the guiding force behind legal judgments. CRT developed out of a sense of impatience with incremental liberalism, which had failed to eradicate racism and racial subordination, and a growing sense that the early victories of the civil rights movement were being eroded.



One of the first tenured African American professors of law at Harvard Law School, Derrick Bell is largely credited as one of the originators of critical race theory.

Basic Tenets

Critical race theorists believe that acknowledging racism and privilege can help advance the cause of equality, possibly more than any other approach used in law and other contexts. A fundamental method of critique used by critical race theorists has been a critique of liberalism, storytelling/narratives, revisionist history, structural determinism, cultural nationalism, essentialism, critical pedagogy, and criticism.

For example, by attacking law using methods such as storytelling and revisionist history and refusing to take legal doctrines seriously, critical race theorists have shined a light on structural racism and implicit bias in the legal system. Theorists espouse an examination of race relations beyond a simplistic black-and-white paradigm and push forward efforts to understand how race intersects with other forms of oppression. Modern critical race theory includes a migration into and collaboration with other disciplines and scholarly fields and an interest in placing U.S. race relations into a global political and economic context. Although critical race theory began within the legal profession, it has since spread to many other disciplines including education, social work, and counseling.

Critiques of Critical Race Theory

Some critics of critical race theory point toward an inability to apply CRT to real-world situations involving social justice, thus identifying the limited applicability of the theory. Others say critical race theorists are a loose collection of scholars who do not agree on any other standard, manifesto, or set of defining tenets.

Spin-off Movements

Critical race theory has spawned a number of successor movements that critically analyze the interests of those in power in the political mainstream. In the 1990s, Latino scholars began to focus on Latino critical theory. These scholars examine a number of issues such as immigration law and policy, language and accent discrimination, and discrimination based on territorial status. In elementary, secondary, and higher education, scholars have organized around how the histories, experiences, cultures, and languages of students of color have been devalued, misinterpreted, or omitted within formal educational settings. Educators use CRT approaches and theories to help understand hierarchy in schools, tracking, school discipline, and rules and norms in the educational context.

Progressive Asian American scholars, radical LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer) theorists, and critical feminists have organized to focus on the status of people of color under the law, human rights, and the role of the law in responding to the unique challenges affecting groups intersected by race and gender. In social work, the lens of critical race theory examines the experiences of people of color in child welfare, mental health, and health care as well as in the social work education classroom, and discourse centers on the structures, policies, and practices of community-based and government programs and how they influence the experiences of families and individuals of color and others receiving services.

A final spin-off movement is critical white studies in which scholars apply the techniques and approaches of critical race theory to whites. Critical white theorists examine seemingly color-blind laws such as the income tax code, drug statutes, or policing laws in search of provisions that enact a system of privilege to whites or racial subordination to people of color. Critical discourse includes white-collar crimes such as Ponzi schemes versus street crimes, differential drug laws, and immigration laws.

Lisa D. Hines
Wichita State University

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Race, Social Definition of; Race and Clients; Racism, Long-Term Effects of.

Further Readings

Bell, D. Faces at the Bottom of the Well: The Permanence of Racism. New York: Basic Books, 1992.

Crenshaw, K. “Twenty Years of Critical Race Theory: Looking Back To Move Forward.” Connecticut Law Review, v.43/5 (2011).

Crenshaw, Kimberlé, et al., eds. Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings That Formed the Movement. New York: New Press, 1995.

Delgado, R. “Rodrigo’s Reconsideration: Intersectionality and the Future of Critical Race Theory.” Iowa Law Review, v.96 (2010).

Delgado, R. and J. Stefanic. Critical Race Theory: An Introduction, 2nd ed. New York: New York University Press, 2012.

Delgado, R. and J. Stefanic, eds. Critical Race Theory: The Cutting Edge, 3rd ed. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2013.

Cross-Cultural Knowledge

Meaningful discussions of cross-cultural knowledge ideally are holistic and appreciate the essentiality of including the cognitive, psychomotor, and affective learning domains. Benjamin S. Bloom’s seminal work, Taxonomy of Educational Objectives, published in 1956, asserts the learner should benefit from development of knowledge and intellect, attitude and beliefs, and the ability to effect physical and bodily skills. Originally created for academic education, Bloom’s taxonomy is relevant to all types of learning.

According to Bloom, the major categories of the cognitive domain are knowledge, comprehension, application, analysis, synthesis, and evaluation. In 1964, Bloom, David R. Krathwohl, and Bertram B. Masia published an updated version of Taxonomy of Educational Objectives, which included the major categories of the affective domain, specifically: receiving, responding, valuing, organizing, and characterizing.

The psychomotor domain has been adapted by various educators including R. H. Dave, E. J. Simpson, Anita Harrow, and others. For the purposes of discussing cross-cultural knowledge, the Harrow adaptation of physical and bodily activity into meaningful expression will be referenced. The major categories of the Harrow model include reflex movement, basic movement, perceptual abilities, physical abilities, skilled movements, and nondiscursive meaningful communication. In Connecting Across Cultures: The Helper’s Toolkit, published in 2013, Pamela A. Hays affirms a holistic view of cross-cultural knowledge.

Fundamental to an introduction to cross-cultural knowledge is the premise that there are categories of learning domain (ordered in degree of difficulty) and that each category (or level) must be mastered before progressing to the next. With this in mind, consider how the Harrow model adapts Bloom's original categories of imitation, manipulation, practice, integrate (demonstrate), and expert (automate).

Defining Cross-Cultural Knowledge

Cross-cultural competence is the development of knowledge and skill through experience and training that results in a complex schema of competencies that recognize cultural differences, foster perspective-taking skills, and hone interpersonal skills. Elementary school educators sometimes express learning as "ways of," such as ways of knowing (formal, informal, oral traditions, media rich environments), ways of solving problems (culturally determined philosophy, Western and Eastern), ways of communicating nonverbally (eye contact, smiling, hand gestures), ways of learning (individual work, group work, memorization, the question of questions), ways of dealing with conflict (face-to-face, quiet, nonconfrontational), and ways of using symbols (is a swastika always a Nazi swastika?).

Global entrepreneurs posit that intercultural training provides the practical tools to diagnose what is working and what is not working and to propose effective solutions to achieve company goals. While these outcomes are mostly viewed through the lens of a business model, the content domains are similar to those appropriate to health care, human services, education, and human rights. The content ranges from cultural and national heritage to communication patterns, family and community roles, workforce issues, biocultural ecology, high-risk behaviors, nutrition, pregnancy, childbearing, death rituals, spirituality, power, respect, religious practices, and ethics. The following drivers offer practical points of reference: How is time perceived, as linear or as flexible? Which has greater value, rules or relationships? How is status derived, from whom you are, or from what you do? Which is most significant, the individual or the group? Are problem solutions direct or indirect?

Supporting Cross-Cultural Knowledge

Sharon Glover advocates a cultural competence continuum that ranges from the destructive or blind to the competent and proficient. Her continuum reiterates the commonly identified core components of ethnocultural empathy, flexibility, interpersonal skill, and communications; and development of mental model/perspective-taking, metacognition/self-monitoring, openness, tolerance for ambiguity, relationship building, and self-efficacy. The I. Papadopoulous, M. Tilki, and G. Taylor model for developing cultural competence articulates four essential cultural stages: (1) awareness: self-awareness, cultural identify, heritage, ethnocentricity, stereotyping, and enthnohistory; (2) knowledge: health belief and behaviors, holistic understanding of the similarities and differences, and health inequalities; (3) sensitivity: empathy, interpersonal skills, trust, acceptance, appropriateness, respect; and (4) competence: acquisition and application of discipline-based professional skills and challenging and addressing prejudice, discrimination, and inequalities.

Larry Purnell's model of cultural competence assumes the need for similar information by (all) professionals. He argued that the metaparadigm concepts of society, community, family, individual, and health are basic to developing cultural competence. It is interesting to note that most researchers' use of the term competence implies a set of facts, figures, or "knowledge" of a culture.

While few researchers define what constitutes the "set of knowledge," all assert it necessary. Purnell asserts that the unconsciously incompetent (professional) may become the unconsciously competent (professional).

Michael V. Klein and Robert M. Huff in Health Promotion in Multicultural Populations: A Handbook for Practitioners and Students distinguish among demographic, cultural, and health care system barriers, which offer tangible bases for the appreciation of cross-cultural knowledge. For example, gender is not simply being male versus being female. Depending upon the dominant culture, being female is expressed not only as "female" but also as female in a "class" and within the "family." This contextualization of "female-gender" carries objective outcomes realized either as the presence or absence of financial resources.

Geri-Ann Galanti has presented case studies of cross-cultural knowledge from the intersecting perspectives of the caregiver and the client. Examples include possible interpretations that range from the most reasonable to the least acceptable interpretations of a client's (interpreted) noncompliant behavior for medication, what the client's hand and foot gestures communicate, nonverbal cues that do not match the client's verbal responses, and the client's discontinuance of medication that "was working," to name a few. Rudolph Young asserts that the willingness to learn a new language is appreciated as much as actually learning the language; cross-cultural knowledge "lived" contextually expresses respect, humility, and openness.

Linda Barley
York College, City University of New York

See Also: Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Competence, Model of.

Further Readings

Bloom, Benjamin S. Taxonomy of Educational Objectives: The Classification of Educational Goals, by a Committee of College and University Examiners. New York: Longmans, Green, 1956.

Galanti, Geri-Ann. Caring for Patients From Different Cultures: Cases Studies from American Hospitals, 2nd ed. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1997.

Glover, S. Building Bridges: Tools for Developing an Organization's Cultural Competence. Tucson, AZ: U.S. Office of Minority Health, 1995.

Goode, T. Cultural Competence Continuum. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Center for Child and Human Development, 1995.

Hofstede, Geert. Cultures and Organizations: Software of the Mind: Intercultural Cooperation and its Importance for Survival. London: HarperCollins, 1991.

Kim-Goodwin, Y., P. Clarke, and L. Barton. "A Model for the Delivery of Culturally Competent Community Care." Journal of Advanced Nursing, v.35/6 (2001).

Kline, M. and R. Huff. Health Promotion in Multicultural Populations: A Handbook for Practitioners and Students, 2nd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2007.

Krathwohl, David R., Benjamin S. Bloom, and Bertram B. Masia. Taxonomy of Educational Objectives: The Classification of Educational Goals. New York: David McKay, 1964.

Purnell, Larry. "The Purnell Model for Cultural Competence." Journal of Transcultural Nursing, v.13/3 (2002).

Young, Rudolph. "Cross-Cultural Skills: Essential for Expatriate Success." The Chronicle of Higher Education (August 23, 2011). http://chronicle.com/article/Cross-Cultural-Skills-/128782 (Accessed November 2013).

Cross-Cultural Service Models

Historically, there has been a gap between general and cultural practice in the literature. Because of the tension between the separate bodies of thought, clinicians tend to feel overwhelmed and experience high dissonance in the field. In efforts to address this gap, researchers and practitioners have continuously worked to develop culturally appropriate guidelines and practice models in the multicultural literature.

Cross-Cultural Service Models

The purpose of cross-cultural service models is to provide a guide on what to do with clients and to teach clinicians how to accomplish three important tasks: (1) better engage with culturally diverse clients, (2) encourage clients to remain throughout the course of treatment, and (3) foster increased satisfaction with treatment in cross-cultural clinical practice. It is imperative that clinicians understand the critical importance of encouraging open and honest dialogues of cultural difference with their culturally diverse clients. This works to make clients feel more comfortable in session and more willing to share details about difficult experiences that have been affecting their mental, physical, emotional, and spiritual health.

Guidelines

Appropriate timing is essential when considering how and when to engage in these, often uncomfortable, conversations with clients. However, scholars in the field agree on these particular points: (1) cultural difference is not a static construct, but is more dynamic and has individual, subjective meanings; (2) it is vital to work toward creating a balance between differences and similarities within culturally diverse therapeutic dyads; (3) it is the responsibility of the clinician to acknowledge the power dynamics in the dyadic relationship; and (4) a clinician's own knowledge, awareness, and skills in regard to cultural competencies should be considered in the open dialogue. Implementing these points creates a space in which the client can become empowered and can set and achieve appropriate treatment goals.

However, it is important to note that despite encouraging clinicians to actively take responsibility for their own actions and reactions in treatment, the guidelines are lacking in empirical validation for effectiveness in addressing cultural differences in clinical practice. Unfortunately, the guidelines only provide brief, inconclusive suggestions instead of holistic, comprehensive practice models that could strengthen the therapeutic alliance and set the groundwork for therapeutic change to occur.

Specific Practice Approaches

There are three prominent practice approaches in the field: (1) the tridimensional model, (2) the experiential/phenomenological model, and (3) the process model.

The most commonly referred to model is the tridimensional model, which is composed of professionals' attitudes and beliefs, knowledge, and skills in multicultural practice. Two cultural competence constituents are important to note—systematic mindfulness and vigorous sizing. Clinicians with systematic mindfulness are aware of race-specific bias and avoid engaging in stereotyping behaviors and attitudes. These types of clinicians aim to develop hypotheses and follow the appropriate hypotheses testing models in order to better serve their clients. A clinician with vigorous sizing has the ability to separate a person from his or cultural group, but also acknowledge the similarities that the person has with their cultural group(s).

The second common practice approach, the experiential/phenomenological model, urges clinicians to pay particular attention to what the client is sharing, acknowledge their own thoughts, but continue to listen to the client's narratives with openness and receptivity. Accordingly, at this point, the clinician acknowledges and validates the client's lived experience by being respectfully curious and approaching the situation from an "I don't know, please share with me" position. This model has been evidenced to enhance the therapeutic alliance, which ultimately leads to significant therapeutic change over the course of treatment.

The third model, the process model, emphasizes better communication in the dyadic process. One of the core process models proposes eight steps in improving communication that range from knowing thyself to empathizing with persons from other cultures. The other noteworthy process model encourages clinicians to bring issues related to culture, race, ethnicity, and class into the therapy room in order to directly address factors that could be affecting therapeutic change. The ability to engage in the process is crucial to cross-cultural treatment.

Limitations

There are notable limitations with utilizing any of the three models. More specifically, the tridimensional model has been criticized because most of the measures are grounded in clinician self-report rather than objective measures of their actual cultural competence. The experiential/phenomenological model is less focused on treatment rates or outcomes in research, which essentially means that it has less empirical validation. Despite the process model providing a clinically, well-grounded approach to cross-cultural practice, little connection to empirical evidence is available.

Future Models

Moving forward, more empirical research is needed in this area. Moreover, empirical verification will provide a basis for applicability in the human services field. Future studies should require an ongoing assessment, as well as an analysis process.

Kayla I. Harris
Pennsylvania State University
Kaprea F. Johnson
Old Dominion University

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Social Work, Diversity Practice in.

Further Readings

Cardemil, E. V. and C. L. Battle. "Guess Who's Coming to Therapy? Getting Comfortable With Conversations About Race and Ethnicity in Psychotherapy." Professional Psychology: Research and Practice, v.34 (2003).

Lee, E. "Revising Cultural Competence in Clinical Social Work Practice." Families in Society, v.91/3 (2010).

Lee, E. "A Working Model of Cross-Cultural Clinical Practice (CCCP)." Clinical Social Work Journal, v.40 (2013).

Sue, D. W. and D. Sue. Counseling the Culturally Different, 3rd ed. New York: Wiley, 1999.

Tinsley-Jones, H. "Racism: Calling a Spade a Spade." Psychotherapy: Theory, Research, Practice, and Training, v.40/3 (2003).

Cross-Cultural Skills

Over the past two decades the United States has experienced major demographic shifts in its population primarily because of the increase in the aged, the birth rate of racial and ethnic minorities, and international migration. This recent phenomenon has created the urgent need for human services providers to acquire cross-cultural skills to address the diverse and complex issues presented by those they serve. In contrast to the "color-blind" practice approaches promoted prior to the 1970s and early 1980s, the social work profession recognized that racial and ethnic differences must be acknowledged to improve the practitioner's professional and competent ability to engage a client with a differing cultural background.

During the late 1980s, clinicians began to embrace the significance of "cultural-sensitive" practice, recognizing that culture presented both strengths on which to build professional client relationships as well as barriers, which unintentionally could result in miscommunication and mistrust. By the turn of the century, numerous guidelines and standards for cultural competency emerged across the human services arena. Specifically, these standards and guidelines targeted cross-cultural practice, research, training, and organizational policies and were promulgated by governmental and professional associations and accrediting bodies such as the: Office of Minority Health (OMH) and the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA) in the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, American Psychological Association (APA), Child Welfare League of America (CWLA), Council on Accreditation (COA), Council on Social Work Education (CSWE), and National Association of Social Workers (NASW).

Importance of Cultural Competence

Culture may be viewed simply as one's worldview or as an integrated pattern of living for an individual, a family, an institution, a community, or a society. For both the professional and the client, culture represents values, beliefs, choices, social lifestyle, and other modes of individual and family adaptation to the community and larger society. Cultural perspectives are shared over multiple generations and may persist despite significant opportunities for integration, acculturation, and assimilation. Culture is highly dynamic and evolutionary. Therefore, it is not captured easily due to the intersection of cultural stability and change, change which is created in reaction to exposure to other cultures (frequently through education, cross-marriage, or migration). As a result, complexity and ambiguity may challenge the professional's skill in: (1) forging an alliance or relationship with the client from a different culture; (2) assessing and prioritizing the problem focus for the partnership; (3) identifying culturally appropriate techniques and methodology; (4) facilitating the roles of significant stakeholders, especially the client's natural support system and nontraditional helpers; and (5) accurately and jointly evaluating the efficacy of the intervention.

Individual Cross-Cultural Skill Sets

Culturally competent practitioners must fully embrace a professional code of ethics that genuinely respects and appreciates the diverse cultural identities they may encounter as they serve an increasingly diverse clientele. The framework for individual cross-cultural practice centers on a deeply held conviction and professional desire to enhance the quality of life for others, especially those living with oppression, exploitation, discrimination, violence, poverty, and maltreatment. Cross-cultural skills include the ability to identify the dynamics of cross-cultural interactions, as well as within-group cultural differences and similarities. Acquiring cultural competency is a lifelong process, which requires a comprehensive self-assessment on the part of the professional. Primarily directed by the clients' needs and their responses to the intervention, this self-assessment begins with understanding one's own worldview and biases, underlying factors which inform one's beliefs and attitudes, and awareness of client differences that trigger negative impulses or positive acceptance. It may be necessary for such examination to rely on supervisory or team consultation regarding "blind spots" and the personal impact on daily professional practice with diverse clients.

Practitioners must be educated about culture and how it functions in the everyday life of an individual or a family or during traumatic crisis. Professionals must research and study the implications of varying cultural journeys for their clients, including race, gender, language, sexual orientation, disability, age, religion, social class, ethnicity, national origin, immigrant status, regional upbringing, political beliefs, family composition, and any other difference that is reflected in their unique cultural identity. The goal is not to become expert in all cultures, but rather to foster the ability to engage individuals and families from any culture without generalizing, promoting misconceptions, and stereotyping. It is critical that the professional is emotionally intelligent and willing to invest in ongoing self-examination and be open to both verbal and nonverbal feedback from others regarding biases, cultural assumptions, stereotypes, and offensiveness. "Informed not-knowing" becomes the stance, which ultimately leads to inquiry and advocacy. The client must be allowed to define his or her own cultural identity and describe his or her experiences in the world. In addition to the client, a third-party cultural informant (a member of the respective group or an expert with valuable information) may be useful for gathering additional insights and understanding. The practitioner must learn enough about the norms of the client's culture to be able to reflect on what she or he feels is important to support best practice.

NASW's Standards for Cultural Competence in Social Work Practice indicate that the cross-cultural skill set for a competent social worker includes: (1) learning about the culture of others, as well as cultural strengths and challenges, through open discussion of differences and similarities; (2) comprehensive assessment of client systems that capture cultural strengths; (3) respect for clients' choices in developing goals for service; (4) attunement to clients' cultural and/or marginal experiences in the related environments; (5) effective use of the clients' natural support systems; (6) advocacy within the organization and policy context; and (7) the capacity to actively combat negative systemic and institutional myths and biases.

Organizational Cross-Cultural Capacity

Another important consideration in the application of cross-cultural skills in human services is cross-cultural capacity at the organizational level. Human services agencies provide the environmental context for culturally competent delivery of social, mental health, and health services. These contexts heavily influence the practitioner's ability to collaborate with the client, as well as to drive healthy, desirable case outcomes. From a human resources perspective, the agency staff must reflect the diversity of the clients served and at every level of the organization, from line staff to the executive suite. From a structural perspective, performance quality improvement (PQI) processes must routinely address the organization's personnel recruitment and retention policies and its performance in ensuring a highly qualified, skilled, and diverse workforce. Symbolically, in a culturally competent setting the appropriate organizational culture ("How we are here") reflects a welcoming reception for all, and maintains a physical plant that is attractive and celebrates the diverse cultures present through imagery and art and multilingual/dialect capability.

The culturally competent organization also recognizes diverse holidays through celebrations and social gatherings, which also serve optimally to integrate the diverse workforce. Within a political frame, the culture of a competent organization is safe for the expression of divergent, sometimes conflicting, perspectives and allows for authentic dialogue and appropriate compromise across client and staff lines.

Another important component of organizational cross-cultural capacity is the agency mission. The leadership of the organization should review the agency mission every two years to ensure its alignment with the culturally specific needs of clients that the agency currently serves within its communities. The mission is a major factor in sustaining organizational cultural competence because it guides the hiring and matching process for personnel, including volunteers.

The mission sets the agenda for proactive change and rallies the staff and volunteers. It also frames new employee orientation, in-service training, and ongoing professional development. The mission serves as the foundation for implementing program objectives and measurable outcomes, development and strategic planning, collaboration and partnership activities, marketing, and public policy/advocacy. Organizational leaders with cross-cultural skills practically seek to maintain a responsive, empathic, and sustainable institution that empowers those with the greatest human need to improve their circumstances.

Since the United States is projected to become a majority-minority nation by 2043, human services providers must be prepared to foster relationships within an increasingly multicultural society. The U.S. Census Bureau projects that individuals 65 and over and Asian and Hispanic populations will more than double by 2060. It is imperative that human services providers are committed to mastering cross-cultural skills, evaluating the results of their interventions while remaining actively engaged in lifelong learning.

Sheryl Brissett Chapman
National Center for Children and Families

See Also: Bias in Service Delivery; Cultural Competence, Human Services Providers and; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Competence, Training in.

Further Readings

Chapman, Sheryl Brissett. “How Do I Consider Cultural Factors When Assessing Risk and Safety?” and “How Do I Help Children Maintain Cultural Identity When They Are Placed in Out-of-Home Care?” In Handbook for Child Protection, Howard Dubowitz and Diane DePanfilis, eds. London: Sage, 2000.

Darnell, Adam J. and Gabriel P. Kuperminc. “Organizational Cultural Competence in Mental Health Service Delivery: A Multilevel Analysis.” Multicultural Counseling and Development, v.34 (2006).

Eckland, Kathyrn and W. Brad Johnson. “Toward Cultural Competence in Child Intake Assessments.” Professional Psychology: Research and Practice, v.38/4 (2007).

National Association of Social Workers. NASW Standards for Cultural Competence in Social Work Practice.” Washington, DC: NASW Press, 2001.

Ortega, Robert M. and Kathleen Coulborn Fuller. “Training Child Welfare Workers From an Intersectional Cultural Humility Perspective: A Paradigm Shift.” Child Welfare, v.90/5 (2011).

Cuban Americans

Cuban Americans represent a heterogeneous group whose migration patterns and socioeconomic characteristics vary from other Hispanic groups in the United States. In spite of the diversity among Cuban communities, Cuban Americans display cultural specificities that call for a different treatment of the group.

These specificities stem largely from Cuban Americans’ immigration history. Prior to 1958, the number of Cubans in the United States was limited in spite of the close links between the two countries. It is estimated that at this time there were approximately 221,505 Cubans residing in the United States. However, following the Cuban Revolution of 1959, large numbers of Cubans left the country and immigrated to the United States. As of 2011, 1,889,000 Cubans were living in the United States. This significant immigration consisted of multiple waves of immigration, and each wave has contributed to the diversity of the cultural identity and needs of Cuban Americans.

Cultural Cohesion of the Exile Generation

Cuban immigration can be delineated across several distinct waves, which were characterized by their great demographic diversity. The first waves, which arrived immediately following the Cuban Revolution in 1959 and continued until the 1970s, brought the Cuban elites and Fulgencio Batista sympathizers fleeing from the Communist regime put in place by Fidel Castro. These Cuban immigrants for the most part were educated and had either lost or were at risk of losing their assets to the nationalization programs carried out shortly after the revolution.

Accordingly, they were admitted to the United States as refugees, thus conferring them privileges from which other Latinos did not benefit. The Cuban Refugee Program of 1962 and the Cuban Adjustment Act of 1966, respectively, provided them financial aid and regularized their status, thus integrating these newly arrived immigrants into society from the onset. An estimated 215,000 Cubans made their way to the United States during the first three years following the revolution. The failure of the Bay of Pigs invasion and the subsequent reinforcement of Castro's hold on power further prompted approximately 74,000 Cubans to leave the island and take refuge in the United States.

The next wave began in December 1965 and ended in April 1973. During this period, Cuba and the United States agreed to permit two daily flights to bring approximately 340,000 Cubans to Miami. However, the Cuban government abrogated the agreement in May 1973, which led to a fourth wave of Cuban migration, which this time was clandestine. From the time this wave started to when it ended in 1980, less than 3,000 refugees are estimated to have entered the United States illegally.

From Refugees to Economic Migrants

A fifth wave of immigration, known as the Mariel Boatlift, marked the beginning of a shift to economic migrations. Economic difficulties and internal tensions in Cuba led a group of Cubans to seek refuge in the Peruvian embassy. Shortly after, the Cuban government announced it would permit emigration from the island. An impromptu exodus then occurred between the Cuban port of Mariel and the United States. While there were still some political dissidents among the Cuban migrants arriving in the United States, there was also a large proportion of economic migrants, as well as convicts and psychiatric patients who had been released by the Cuban government for the purpose of emigration. The negative political repercussions from the arrival of these migrants led President Jimmy Carter to halt the exodus, which by this time had nevertheless allowed a total of 124,769 Cubans to depart the island for the United States.

A final wave began following the fall of the Soviet Union in 1989 and the economic and commercial hardship which ensued on the island. A marked policy change occurred; indeed, the favored treatment by the United States from which Cuban immigrants had benefited was tightened with legislation such as the Cuban Migration Agreements of 1994 and 1995, which sought to end the "open-door policy" to Cuban immigration. This is partly due to the differential nature of current Cuban immigrants as economic rather than political migrants.

Current State of Cuban Americans

Although they belong to the same ethnic category, there are major differences between Cuban Americans and other Latinos. Compared to other Hispanic groups, the Cubans are the most geographically concentrated, with 70 percent of the population residing in Florida. Prior to the 1959 revolution, Cuban migration patterns were mainly contingent on work opportunities, and as a consequence Cuban migrants scattered all around the United States, particularly in the northeast and southeast, in states such as New Jersey, New York, and Florida. After the revolution, Cuban settlements became more concentrated, as the majority of Cubans established themselves in Florida and formed enclaves, particularly in Miami, thus providing support and opportunities for fellow Cubans immigrants.

As a whole, Cuban Americans are socioeconomically distinct from other Latino groups or the U.S. population: Their median age is 40, compared to 27 for Hispanics generally; and they are slightly older than the U.S. population, whose median age is 37. Educational attainments of Cuban Americans are similar to that of the U.S population, although slightly lower, but much higher than that of other Hispanic groups. They present lower rates of poverty and have higher median family incomes than other Latinos, but still lag behind the general U.S. population. Cubans also display a deep attachment to their homeland, particularly the political exile generations of migrants, and they usually retain the culture of their homeland as well as the use of Spanish, especially in the Miami enclave. A higher proportion of Cubans are foreign-born (58 percent) than other Latinos (36 percent); however, more than half (55 percent) are U.S. citizens, thereby facilitating their conventional participation in U.S. politics as well as their access to social programs.

Cuban Americans also exhibit great diversity within their group. From the Cuban Revolution until the end of the 1970s, Cuban political migrants were mostly white, older, educated migrants from the upper classes. However, the subsequent economic waves of immigration brought principally darker (mulattos) migrants from the working classes. This racial divide based on skin color is associated to a certain extent with the divide between the different classes and somewhat hampers attempts at unifying the Cuban community. Indeed, these newcomers no longer share the exile identity which unified the first Cuban migrants. Additionally, the rise of second and subsequent generations of Cubans who assimilate quickly into the host society is further eroding the unity of the Cuban community.

Conclusion

The varied waves of immigration resulted in Cuban Americans constituting a socially diverse group whose immigration patterns and socioeconomic characteristics differ from that of most other Latino groups in the United States. Given the heterogeneity of the Cuban Americans as a group and the socioeconomic and cultural distinctions between Cuban Americans and other Latino groups, it becomes necessary to consider Cubans as diverse clients when taking into account their social needs.

Marie L. Mallet
Harvard University

See Also: Caribbean Immigrants; Diaspora; Ethnicity and Clients; Hispanic Immigrants.

Further Readings

García, María Cristina. Havana USA: Cuban Exiles and Cuban Americans in South Florida, 1959–1994. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

Grenier, Guillermo J. and Alex Stepick. Miami Now! Immigration, Ethnicity, and Social Change. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1992.

Masud-Piloto, Félix. From Welcomed Exiles to Illegal Immigrants: Cuban Migration to the U.S., 1959–1995. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1996.

Pérez, Louis A., Jr. On Becoming Cuban: Identity, Nationality, and Culture. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.

Portes, Alejandro and Robert L. Bach. Latin Journey: Cuban and Mexican Immigrants in the United States. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.

Cultural and Linguistically Appropriate Services Standards

Racial and ethnic minorities bear a disproportionate burden of chronic illnesses, are more likely to be uninsured, face unequal access to quality health care services, and suffer worse health care outcomes than the general population. The provision of cultural and linguistically appropriate services (CLAS) is one strategy to help eliminate these health inequities. By tailoring services to an individual's culture and language preference, health professionals can help bring about positive health outcomes for diverse communities. The provision of health care services that are respectful of and responsive to the health beliefs, practices, and needs of diverse patients can help close the gap in health care outcomes. The pursuit of health equity must remain at the forefront of human service workers' efforts; they must always remember that dignity and quality of care are rights of all and not the privileges of a few.

The National Standards for Culturally and Linguistically Appropriate Services in Health and Health Care are intended to advance health equity, improve quality, and help eliminate health care disparities by providing a blueprint for individuals and health care organizations to implement CLAS. Adoption of these standards will help advance better health and health care in the United States.

History

In 2000, the U.S. Office of Minority Health (OMH) published the first national CLAS standards, which provided a framework for all health care organizations to best serve the nation's increasingly diverse population. In the fall of 2010, OMH launched the National CLAS Standards Enhancement Initiative in order to revise the standards to reflect the past decade's advancements, expand the standards' scope, and improve their clarity to ensure understanding and implementation. With the enhancement initiative, the national standards will continue into the next decade as the cornerstone for advancing health equity through culturally and linguistically appropriate services.

In 2013, the OMH, an agency within the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, released the enhanced National Culturally and Linguistically Appropriate Services Standards in Health and Health Care. With implementation of the Affordable Care Act in full swing and growing interest in improving the delivery of care and addressing health care costs, these standards will serve as a critical guide to developing policies and strategies that improve the quality of health and health care services and meet the needs of an increasingly diverse population. The enhanced standards expand the scope of the goals laid out in the standards released in 2000. They broaden the concepts of culture and health, as well as encourage health care organizations to consider not only race and ethnic background, but also beliefs, values, institutions, language, and geographical and sociological characteristics. The new standards also advocate for a broader view of health that encompasses physical, mental, social, and spiritual well-being. In this way, the enhanced national CLAS standards aim to improve overall quality of care, eliminate health care disparities, and achieve health equity.

Beyond a conceptual framework, the enhanced standards provide specific recommendations for addressing inequities at every point of patient contact with the health care system. The end goals of the enhanced CLAS standards are to ensure effective, equitable, understandable, and respectful quality care and services that are responsive to diverse needs. The standards are organized into three themes. The first theme is governance, leadership, and workforce, which provides guidance for developing leadership capacity in health care organizations in order to promote and sustain CLAS. The second theme, communication and language assistance, provides recommendations to health care organizations for addressing language and other communication barriers in order to adequately meet the needs of people with limited English proficiency. The third theme is engagement, continuous improvement, and accountability, which provides a blueprint for establishing community engagement and includes recommendations on conducting community assessments.

National CLAS Standards Opportunities

There are many opportunities to use CLAS standards to effectively enroll populations in health coverage through the new state marketplaces created by the Affordable Care Act. For example, health care organizations that carry out enrollment assistance activities should put the CLAS guidelines into practice. Beyond the Affordable Care Act, the CLAS standards are an important guide for improving quality in the delivery of care. A hospital that is working to enhance patient engagement should look to CLAS standards on data collection and community partnerships. The OMH has launched a new resource center, ThinkCulturalHealth, in order to support health care organizations and stakeholders interested in embarking on CLAS policy and practice. The site includes a cultural competence training curriculum for providers, a clearinghouse of research papers on health disparities, and updates for upcoming CLAS Webinars and events hosted by the OMH. As the United States looks for ways to promote better health and health care, the enhanced CLAS standards provide a useful road map for achieving this goal.

Culturally competent health care systems— those that provide CLAS—have the potential to reduce racial and ethnic health disparities. When clients do not understand what their health care providers are telling them, and providers either do not speak the client's language or are insensitive to cultural differences, the quality of health care can be compromised. Five interventions were reviewed to improve cultural competence in health care systems: (1) programs to recruit and retain staff members who reflect the cultural diversity of the community served; (2) use of interpreter services or bilingual providers for clients with limited English proficiency; (3) cultural competency training for health care providers; (4) use of linguistically and culturally appropriate health education materials; and (5) culturally specific health care settings. A determination could not be made with respect to the effectiveness of any of these interventions. There were either too few comparative studies, or studies did not examine the following outcome measures evaluated in the review: client satisfaction with care, improvements in health status, and inappropriate racial or ethnic differences in use of health services or in received and recommended treatment.

Reasons to Utilize CLAS

CLAS standards were developed to provide guidance on how to improve service delivery to clients who may not have sufficient access to care based on race, ethnicity, linguistic capacity, or cultural background. While the ultimate goal is to benefit the client, there are also great benefits for organizations. CLAS makes sense from a service perspective, a financial perspective, and a legal perspective.

A number of compelling reasons exist for agencies to make CLAS standards a part of their operations. Using these standards makes sense for organizations, employees, and clients. As agencies commit to serving people with different racial, ethnic, and linguistic backgrounds, this commitment will enable health care organizations to: serve healthier, more satisfied clients; increase staff competency and satisfaction; improve business; comply with antidiscrimination laws; protect their organizations from liability; protect federal funding; and improve the ability to secure funding.

Increasing health care access is more complex than simply providing funding to pay for care. Access also requires that health care services be provided in a manner that is culturally and linguistically appropriate and does not discriminate based on race or ethnicity. Such culturally and linguistically appropriate health care is a concern not only of policy makers and health care organization administrators but also of physicians and the educators of future physicians.

While federal enforcement regulations specifically address the standards pertaining to linguistic access, the standards go significantly beyond linguistic criteria in defining guidelines for full access to care. Full access requires that patients receive care that recognizes and responds to health-related beliefs and cultural values, disease incidence and prevalence, and treatment efficacy. Efforts to implement the CLAS standards are complicated by documented differences in health status and health care access among American cultural/linguistic groups, even after insurance coverage is taken into account. Any consideration of increasing access to care for patient populations that include large numbers of minority ethnicity patients will include an examination of the causes and effects of these disparities. Full access includes the means to pay for care, care that is culturally appropriate, care that is linguistically available, and care that does not discriminate based on the ethnicity of the patient.

Tamikia S. Lott
Old Dominion University

See Also: Chronic Diseases Common in Developing Countries; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Services; Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of; Culturally Specific Services.

Further Readings

Families USA Stand Up for Health Care. "The New and Enhanced Culturally and Linguistically Appropriate Services (CLAS) Standards Will Help Eliminate Disparities in Health and Health Care." http://www.standupforhealth care.org/blog/the-new-and-enhanced-culturally-and-linguistically-appropriate-services-clas-standards-will-help-eliminate-disparities-in-health-and-health-care (Accessed October 2013).

Office of Minority Health, U.S. Public Health Service, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "Assuring Cultural Competence in Health Care: Recommendations for National Standards and an Outcomes-Focused Research Agenda (2001). http://www.omhrc.gov/clas/indexfinal.htm (Accessed October 2013).

Office of Minority Health, U.S, Public Health Service, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "ThinkCulturalHealth." https://www.thinkculturalhealth.hhs.gov/content/clas.asp (Accessed October 2013).

Cultural Appropriation

Cultural appropriation is the taking of one culture's artifacts, artistic subject matter, traditional knowledge, rituals, symbols, or technologies by members of another, often dominant, culture. Cultural exchanges are inevitable as cultures interact with one another, and some scholars argue that globalization has ushered in an age of transculturation in which regular contact has eroded cultural boundaries.

When cultural appropriation occurs within the context of a free exchange sanctioned by the culture that produced what is appropriated, or some competent, authoritative representative of that culture, it may be accepted and even celebrated, with no suggestion of immoral or unjust use. But the term as it is most commonly used in the 21st century carries the connotation of exploitation. It is viewed as a kind of theft that is ethically, if not always legally, reprehensible. It occurs in marketing, in classrooms and museums, in all the arts, and in entertainment. From the plays of William Shakespeare to the performances of pop star Miley Cyrus, cultural appropriation manifests itself in observable ways.

Appropriation of the Tangible

James O. Young identifies three forms of cultural appropriation: content appropriation, subject appropriation, and object appropriation. Perhaps the simplest form of cultural appropriation to address is object appropriation, the taking of art, artifacts, and other objects that cultures consider part of their heritage. The archetypal example of this form of appropriation is the Elgin Marbles. The Elgin Marbles are a collection of marble sculptures, inscriptions, and architectural features, most famously from the Parthenon, but also from other buildings on the Acropolis: the Erechtheion, the Propylaia, and the Temple of Athena Nike.

In the early 19th century, Lord Elgin, the British ambassador to the Ottoman Empire, of which Athens had been a part for three and a half centuries at the time, with the knowledge and permission of the Ottoman authorities (as the British are still quick to point out) removed the marbles and shipped them back to Britain. Following a parliamentary investigation as to the legality of Lord Elgin's appropriation, Britain purchased the artifacts from Lord Elgin in 1816 and gave them to the British Museum, where they have been on display for almost two centuries. Even some of Lord Elgin's contemporaries, including the poet Lord Byron, viewed Elgin's removing the artifacts as vandalism, but Britain has resisted all efforts by Greece to reclaim the pieces.

The British argument for refusing to return the Elgin Marbles rested in part on their claim that Greece lacked the proper facility for displaying the historic pieces, but the opening of the $200 million Acropolis Museum in 2009 made that argument invalid. Greece has been more successful with other efforts, acknowledging that artifacts from 25 other countries have been returned to Greece. Britain has offered to loan the disputed pieces to Greece for display, provided British ownership is recognized, an offer Greece has declined. The cultural appropriation, or misappropriation, of part of Greece's history continues. Meanwhile, museums are filled with similar, if lesser known, examples.

The Elgin Marbles, also known as the Parthenon Marbles, remain on display at the British Museum even after years of dispute regarding returning the sculptures to their place of origin in Greece. Lord Elgin, the British ambassador to the Ottoman Empire, commandeered the marbles and shipped them to Britain, where they have been on display for almost two centuries.

Not all disputed objects are in museums. Friction has developed between South Korea and Japan over cabbage. Kimchi, a spicy, pickled cabbage, is a South Korean national dish now produced and marketed by the Japanese. South Koreans charge that the Japanese producers ignore the time-honored, traditional method of making kimchi, using artificial flavors and a more rapid fermentation process to produce a product that disgraces its name. Japanese kimchi producers insist that the South Koreans have no monopoly on the dish.

Museum curators, archaeologists, lawyers, representatives of various cultures, and others are engaged in ongoing debates over the repatriation of archaeological and ethnographic objects. Native American cultures have been among the most successful in recovering cultural artifacts, sometimes with the voluntary cooperation of museums, or through the Native American Graves Protection and Repatriation Act (1990). Nigeria has sought the repatriation of the Benin bronzes that British troops removed during the 1897 Punitive Expedition. China has argued for the return of bronze animal heads, once part of the zodiac fountain clock in the Yuanming Yuan garden of the Old Summer Palace that French and English troops looted and burned in 1860, and Turkey has made determined efforts to claim antiquities taken before 1970.

Music and Words

The fight against digital piracy may seem unending to composers, musicians, writers, and film producers, but Western copyright laws at least give a weapon to use in the battle. The situation is quite different when the music and the words are owned not by an individual, but by a culture. The debate centered on African American music dates back at least as far as the early part of the 20th century, and a plethora of white American musicians from "King of Swing" Benny Goodman in the 1930s to pop star Miley Cyrus in 2013 have been accused of using, and in some cases abusing, African American music. The line between influence and cultural appropriation is often a thin one. In the case of African American music, a nation's history of racism shapes the argument. No matter how colorblind the fraternity of musicians, for decades in the United States white musicians were hired to play African American music, while black musicians were denied jobs and even entrance to clubs where the music was played. Elvis Presley was the media-proclaimed King of Rock and Roll, with little tribute paid to the African American musicians whose work he had mined.

In 1999, a group of African American organizations and individuals filed suit in Phillips County, Arkansas, charging that the white sponsors of a blues festival had stolen the musical legacy of African American citizens in the county in a "racially conspiratorial process." The class-action lawsuit was eventually thrown out of federal court, by which time several parties to the original complaint, including the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), had withdrawn from the case. However, the charge that African American musical forms are proprietary to their community of origin and the use of those forms by musicians of other races is exploitative and unacceptable is alive, encompassing controversies as varied as Wynton Marsalis's use of his position as artistic director of jazz at Lincoln Center to emphasize his conviction that all jazz must be rooted in black traditional music, and Miley Cyrus's sexualized, racialized performance at the 2013 American Music Awards.

The debate concerning cultural appropriation within literature concerns both the appropriation of cultural materials and the more nebulous use of voice or character that is shaped by a culture other than that of the author. Canadian W. P. Kinsella is the author of a series of novels set on the Hobbema Indian Reserve in Alberta. Kinsella resists the image of himself as a cultural appropriator in such works as The Fencepost Chronicles, 13 stories about corrupt tribal leaders, trouble on the reserve, survival schemes, and communal drinking, but critics point out that Kinsella plays to the worst stereotypes of tribal people, and uses a mock patois that is far removed from tribal language. Tony Hillerman, author of two detective fiction series with Navajo protagonists, has also been criticized for appropriating Native American voices, but Hillerman's work has also won praise for his view of Native American life and his accounts of the ethical challenges of living in a multiethnic society.

Even more controversial is Robert Bringhurst, award-winning Canadian poet and cultural historian, who has translated works from classical Greek, Arabic, Navajo, and Haida. The Haida translations of the poems of Ghandl and Skaay, whose works were collected by an American linguist, John Swanton, at the turn of the 20th century, published in a trilogy collectively titled Masterworks of the Classical Haida Mythtellers, have brought accusations of cultural appropriation from critics who insist that Bringhurst did not have permission from Haida elders or the Council of the Haida Nation, the governing entity of the Haida Nation, to translate the poems, that he can have no understanding of Haida mythology, and he was merely exploiting it. On the other hand, the literary quality of Bringhurst's work has been acclaimed, as has his presentation of the Haida poetry as art equal to the masterpieces of Western tradition, rather than the folklore of a primitive people. The firestorm that erupted over Bringhurst's translations has largely faded, but the tension between acknowledging collective ownership common among indigenous peoples and the exercise of artistic freedom by the individual artist remains unresolved.

Degradation of Culture

The concern about an outsider profiting from cultural misappropriation is a legitimate concern, whether that profit comes from artifacts, songs and stories, or pharmacological knowledge, but an arguably greater concern is that cultural appropriation can move beyond exploiting a culture to degrading it. That which is valued or even deemed sacred within one culture can be trivialized, diluted, or destroyed by those who appropriate elements of the culture for their purposes. Misrepresentation of a culture by outsiders can create harmful stereotypes. It can even compromise the integrity of a culture.

On January 21, 1984, Michael Heller, a staff photographer from the Santa Fe New Mexican, flew over the Pueblo of Santo Domingo and photographed a ceremonial dance. The dance was sacred to the Pueblo. The photographs were published twice, once described as a "pow-wow." The Pueblo filed suit, charging trespass, violation of the Pueblo ban on photography, and invasion of privacy. From the Pueblo point of view, the aerial photography disrupted a community-binding ceremony, and the photographs transformed a sacred ritual in the culture of origin to entertainment for outsiders.

The Hindmarsh Island Bridge in Australia evoked a national debate that garnered international attention. Plans were announced in 1989 to build a bridge across the Murray River, Australia's largest river, in order to connect the mainland with Hindmarsh Island. When construction began in 1993, environmentalists and Ngarrindjeri residents protested, the latter because of the presence of aboriginal archaeological sites. The Australian government announced in 1994 that it would proceed with the bridge. However, a group of Ngarrindjeri women claimed that the bridge posed a threat to a secret woman's tradition. After an investigation concluded that the bridge would desecrate Ngarrindjeri traditions and destroy the culture, the government placed a 25-year ban on building the bridge. In May 1995, another group of Ngarrindjeri women declared the women's secret tradition claim a fabrication. A second investigation ruled in favor of the dissenting women, the ban was lifted in 1997, and the bridge was built in 2001. Findings in a civil case in 2001 rekindled the debate, which continues in books and heated exchanges nearly two decades after the first claim of a secret tradition was made. The longevity of the argument is a prime example of how strongly people on all sides of the debate feel about cultural appropriation.

The second decade of the 21st century sees Atlanta Braves fans enthusiastically doing the Tomahawk chop; Aunt Jemima, based on a minstrel show character, is into her second century of selling products for the Quaker Oats Company; and Victoria's Secret model Karlie Kloss struts a runway in leopard-print underwear, high heels, turquoise jewelry, and a floor-length feathered headdress derived from the war bonnets that are a mark of respect and achievement when worn by Native American chiefs and warriors. A lawsuit filed by the Navajo Nation against Urban Outfitters is ongoing. The retailer ignored a 2012 cease-and-desist letter requiring the company to stop selling a group of "Navajo" items, including Navajo hipster panties and a Navajo liquor flask. Urban Outfitters claims that the word Navajo belongs to everyone; the Navajo Nation claims trademark violations and violations of the federal Indian Arts and Crafts Act and cultural appropriation that ends in degradation.

Wylene Rholetter
Auburn University

See Also: African Americans; Cultural Capital, Role of; Native Americans.

Further Readings

Harris, Tamaea Winfrey. "A Twerk Too Far." American Prospect (September 5, 2013). http://prospect.org/article/twerk-too-far (Accessed November 2013).

Harrison, Simon. "Cultural Boundaries." Anthropology Today, v.15/5 (1999).

Jones, Richard. "Technology and the Cultural Appropriation of Music." International Review of Law, Computers & Technology, v.23/1–2 (2009).

Scafidi, Susan. Who Owns Culture? Appropriation and Authenticity in American Law. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2005.

Young, James O. Cultural Appropriation and the Arts. Oxford, UK: Wiley-Blackwell, 2010.

Ziff, Bruce, ed. Borrowed Power: Essays on Cultural Appropriation. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.

Cultural Broker

A cultural broker is someone who acts as an intermediary between two groups with different sets of values. Anthropologists were the first to come up with this term to define the actions associated with people using middlemen to negotiate or conduct trades between differing cultural groups. Similarly, in the human service field, the term culture broker is used when referring to an individual who helps people from different cultural groups navigate the human service system.

The broker is bicultural, meaning that they belong to, and/or possess knowledge of the values and norms of, two (or more) cultural groups. For example, the disability advocate who is not disabled, but possesses extensive knowledge about disabilities and how they affect the individual, can be considered bicultural. Their knowledge, when paired with their unique ability to understand complex interpersonal dynamics, allows the broker to effectively maneuver and transfer information and resources from one culture to another.

The use of a cultural broker is necessary in the human service profession because it supports the practitioner in understanding the culture of their client so that they may better help them. The brokering process also allows the client to learn more about the values of the human service system. This insight may help the client learn ways that they can better access services within this system. Cultural brokering creates a safe place for resources and information to be exchanged, where both groups' values are understood and respected. This unique characteristic of cultural brokering may lead to equitable and accessible services to a variety of cultural groups who may not have had this access otherwise.

Culture and Cultural Brokering

Culture is roughly defined as a shared system of values, rituals, customs, communication, language, rules, and beliefs. This system is used as a lens that shapes and affects how the individual within that culture views and interacts with others and with their environment. These values and beliefs are learned from others and shared by all of the individuals within that system. Often, when one thinks of the term culture, they think of ethnicity (a large group of people who are united geographically) or race (a social construct usually referring to the physical differences between individuals). However, the concept of culture goes much further than this. For example, disability groups, political groups, socioeconomic/income brackets, and a number of other groups all have a unique culture affecting how they view the world around them. Some disability groups are proponents of a way of viewing individuals with disabilities that sees them as a person first, rather than their disability first. This group strongly feels that in order to shift this view of people with disabilities that the disability culture (and cultures that exist outside the disability community) must employ the use of person-first language. An example of person-first language is saying a woman who is blind, versus a blind woman. This is just one example of a culture that exists within the disability community.

Cultural brokering involves the cultural broker linking persons with different cultural backgrounds for the purpose of understanding, information, or idea sharing. The exchange of information in the brokering process can occur through various forms of communication, including verbal (with the broker acting as a translator), written, and signed (such as American Sign Language). The brokering process does not involve the literal translation of cultural values; rather, this is subtly done through the brokering process. Possessing knowledge of values of the groups involved in the brokering process allows the broker to effectively communicate information, while remaining sensitive to both groups during the process. In most cases, the broker belongs to the culture that needs to access resources, yet they have the knowledge of the culture of the human service system, which allows them to engage in cultural brokering without losing their cultural identity.

Roles of the Cultural Broker

The broker takes on a variety of roles. Cultural brokers can act as a liaison between the cultures. In the human services perspective, the liaison possesses knowledge of the human service system and how to navigate that system, while also having knowledge about the culture of the group that needs help. The brokering process involves skill and sensitivity to the individual, as well as the groups of people with which the broker is working. Serving as a cultural guide or ambassador, the broker is an expert on their culture, and informs human service providers about the values, beliefs, and unique needs of their community. This often occurs when human service systems are striving to provide culturally sensitive practices, and they use this cultural expert's guidance to ensure appropriate services.

Yet another role that a cultural broker may hold is that of a problem solver in order to resolve conflicts. In this capacity, the cultural broker understands the intervening conditions and outside factors that may have an impact on the cultural brokering process. Acting as mediators, cultural brokers can help ease tension between systems by helping parties learn about one another and be sensitive to one another's perspectives. In the human service system, this involves establishing trust and rapport between the cultural broker, the practitioner, and the client while interacting with one another.

In addition to the roles the cultural broker may assume, they are also a catalyst for change. By communicating between two groups and sharing information that may not have been otherwise shared, the use of a cultural broker may influence new perspectives on how people view certain situations. For example, in the case of a cultural broker who is brokering between an immigration rights group and legislators, vital information sharing may occur that influences a policy-making decision, which in turn advances the immigration-rights group's purpose. While acting in this role, the broker must be sensitive to the interpersonal and larger organizational dynamics that affect the brokering process. From an organizational standpoint, cultural brokers can help the organization and its workers assess their awareness of and openness to other cultures. For example, a nonprofit providing domestic violence services may notice that there are a growing number of Asian Americans in their community. They may seek out a cultural broker in order to develop a specialized and culturally sensitive service for this population of individuals.

Cultural Brokering in the United States

Cultural brokers navigate between systems with different values. Values are often linked to and reinforced by the cultural group to which an individual belongs. Often, cultural groups develop because a number of people have a similar set of values, and have a common need for a particular resource. In the United States, the systems that have access to and control over the vast majority of resources are referred to as the dominant cultural group. These systems that have resources are developed and maintained through dominant cultural values and beliefs. Dominant values in the United States generally reflect democracy, individualism, privacy, change, progress, optimal health, achieving, working, materialism, cleanliness, time, directness, and assertiveness. These values are embedded into many different systems with which clients interact, and human service professionals must recognize these values and reflect on the impact they have on clients. Dominant values also impact the brokering process.

Challenges and Potential Solutions

Challenges arise in cultural brokering when one system is resistant to change, or is resistant to information that does not align with its values. In this situation, the cultural broker may take on a problem-solver role, and strategize ways in which the system can become more open to change. A suggestion to address this includes developing a team within that system (if it has the resources and interest in doing so) to address the value conflict. The broker can assist this team through the process and help them strategize ways in which they can be more open to different cultures. At times, there may be an individual (rather than a group of people) who develops an interest in exploring and confronting the values conflict.

The broker would want to work with that individual to help them explore the value conflict from both groups' perspectives, and possibly strategize ways to involve others in their organization. If this resistance to change starts to cause unnecessary tension, the brokering process between the teams may need to end. The broker may work individually with the systems to assess their needs and find alternate ways they can both receive the resources they need.

It may be difficult for human service organizations to find a cultural broker for a variety of reasons (e.g., being in a rural location, or not knowing where or how to access a broker). To overcome this challenge, organizations can first examine their staff and volunteers to determine if there is someone who may be fit to serve as a cultural broker for the situation. If unsuccessful, the organization can reach out to the community of the nondominant group to determine if there are individuals who may be able to serve the role. A third option is to attend community events or functions in which potential cultural brokers may be present. From a geographic standpoint, finding and using a cultural broker for face-to-face interactions may be difficult in certain areas. In this case, the use of technology such as a Skype or Google hangout may be appropriate.

Implications for Human Services Practice

Human service professionals strive to meet the needs of clients by empowering them and connecting them to services in order to improve their well-being. When it comes to clients who are of a different culture, services may need to be adjusted to be culturally appropriate so that it is equitable to all individuals. When human service providers encounter clients who are of a culture they do not understand, and believe there may be aspects of the clients' background that may affect the helping process, they can use cultural brokers in their service provision. In order to provide effective services and increase clients' positive outcomes, it is the responsibility of the human service provider to seek out and gain knowledge about the various systems that clients need help navigating.

As the country and communities become increasingly diversified, human service professionals will work with a variety of individuals from many different cultural groups. Using a cultural broker will help service providers become aware of the differences among cultures. While one can make generalizations about cultural groups, it is important to be aware that individuals have values that are unique and do not necessarily fit within a certain cultural group. It is important to be aware of differences in others, and how the use of a cultural broker can help one understand more about these differences and increase communication across groups. By acting as the bridge between cultures, brokers can cultivate communication of information and resources, and thus have the power to increase the accessibility of services to diverse groups.

Jacqueline Robinson
Virginia Commonwealth University
Suzie S. Weng
University of North Florida

See Also: Biculturalism; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Model of.

Further Readings

Blair, Thomas. "Community Ambassadors' for South Asian Elder Immigrants: Late-Life Acculturation and the Roles of Community Health Workers." Social Science & Medicine, v.75 (2012).

Jezewski, Mary Ann and Paula Sotnik. Culture Brokering: Providing Culturally Competent Rehabilitation Services to Foreign-Born Persons. Buffalo, NY: Center for International Rehabilitation Research Information and Exchange, 2001.

National Center for Cultural Competence, Georgetown University Center for Child and Human Development, Georgetown University Medical Center. "Bridging the Culture Divide in Health Care Settings the Essential Role of Cultural Broker Programs." http://www11.georgetown.edu/research/gucchd/nccc/documents/Cultural_Broker_Guide_English.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Cultural Capital, Role of

Pierre Bourdieu, a prominent French sociologist, asserted that social relations are determined by capital acts within networks of exchange to attain power and higher social status. Examples of cultural capital are education, intellectual capacity, skills, attitudes, knowledge, tastes, and preferences that value practices and shape social actions in daily life. Cultural capital is a significant concept in human services and diversification because it explains the reasons of diversification. More importantly, cultural capital devises responses to the questions that emerge from this diversification that affect one's life, from education to social welfare services, through a set of social dynamics and relations that are encountered every day.

Bourdieu states that, apart from economic capital, there are three forms of capital. These are social capital, human capital, and cultural capital. Economic capital is related to economic resources, such as the assets that one has, bank checks, cash, and other financial assets. Social capital is a set of social networks that are established through group membership or club association, which becomes more durable through mutual acquaintance. Human capital refers to a process in which expertise can be attained on a technical subject by training and instruction. A mechanical engineer who uses a complicated robot is an example of human capital. What distinguishes cultural capital from all other capital forms lies in discourses of speech, behaviors, attitudes, and preferences that are transmitted from one's parents and conflated with education and knowledge. Thus, the role of cultural capital has influence on the other capital forms because education level, practices, and knowledge, which are learned from previous encounters, affect social stratification, marital selection, social inclusion or social exclusion, and occupational status. All these variables and outcomes turn to a path of social relations that determine the type of acts between social agencies.

There are three types of cultural capital that shape one's life from different perspectives. These are embodied cultural capital, objectified cultural capital, and institutionalized cultural capital. Embodied cultural capital mainly signifies practices. Attitudes, formal knowledge, behavior, and preference are the main instruments of embodied cultural capital. For example, knowing the importance of good musicals (attitude), having information about the location and type of the musicals (formal knowledge), tendency not only to go to the most popular musicals but also to other amateur performances (preference and attitude), and having a ability to evaluate the quality of a musical with enough confidence to do a critical evaluation (behavior and preference) are concrete examples of this process. Second, objectified cultural capital includes transmittable goods that are reverberated by deploying practices, in other words embodied culture. Examples of embodied cultural capital are books, music, dance, computers, high-tech devices, and paintings. Finally, institutionalized cultural capital turns to value-based appreciation of the practices in embodied cultural capital. The degree that one earns in school is one of these examples. Therefore, institutionalized cultural capital serves to determine resource power and drives one to the related social class according to embodied and objectified cultural capital.

Cultural capital primarily has an influence on social selection because it gives an impetus to the cultural attitudes and behaviors while determining socioeconomic class. In doing so, on one hand, cultural capital allows the accumulation of more economic resources in circles of related social class. On the other hand, cultural practices are associated with the social character of the related group or club in which similar attitudes or behaviors can be practiced by other group or club members. Yet, social class identity and cultural class identity should not be interchangeably used. For example, a student who works hard can attain a high academic degree, even though he or she comes from a lower social class.

From another point of view, a person who has a high social class family background may not pass the exam. This means that the accumulation of cultural capital does not guarantee achievement, but it decreases opportunities for social exclusion. Yet, a high social class background offers other alternatives to socially advantaged people. Creating new opportunities for those with a lower social background is more challenging because the cultural capital of these people does not offer the same alternatives as those who are socially advantaged. This is the reason that cultural capital is a resource of power because it limits or increases opportunities in line with the accumulated cultural capital for each person. Accordingly, people who have similar accumulated cultural capital are more prone to marry or share the same social habitus. However, criticisms are raised about the limits of cultural capital. For instance, the ability of the students can be more important than cultural capital, or gender differences may have a more determinative force in decisions.

Baris Cayli
University of Stirling

See Also: Cultural Appropriation; Cultural Determinism; Cultural Literacy; Cultural Paradigms; Human Capital Development Initiative.

Further Readings

Abel, Thomas. "Cultural Capital and Social Inequality in Health." Journal of Epidemiological Community Health, v.62/7 (2008).

Diller, J. V. and J. Moule. Cultural Competence: A Primer for Educators. Belmont, CA: Thompson Learning, 2005.

Goldthorpe, John H. "'Cultural Capital': Some Critical Observations." Sociologica, v.2/1 (2007).

Swartz, David. Culture and Power: The Sociology of Pierre Bourdieu. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and

Cultural expressions are foundational to human service. Understanding the nuances of culture is critical to developing effective human service interventions. This service foundation is informed by knowing oneself, the organizational landscape, and the social context. Culture entails the shared set of values, beliefs, and social norms and the dynamic context in which they are expressed. Culture shapes health, mental health, and social well-being; how people express symptoms, find meaning in life's challenges, understand the causes of difficulties, and cope with difficulties; and how care providers fit within these schemas. Interventions can be prejudicial, discriminatory, mistrustful, and stigmatizing experiences, or they can be empowering journeys. Social structures enforce inequality and disparities, delivering disparate outcomes, which is historically evidenced in how burdens are distributed. Cultural competence matters because culture matters.

Laws, regulations, accreditation standards, professional organizations, community stakeholders, and various organized interests contribute to the demand for cultural competency. Early conceptualizations of cultural competency saw it as the acceptance and respect for differences, attention to differences, ongoing self-assessment, the development of cultural knowledge, and the resources and flexibility within service models to meet the needs of minority populations. The cultural competence continuum ranges from cultural destructiveness, cultural incapacity, cultural blindness, cultural precompetence, and cultural competence to cultural proficiency. The standards for cultural competence developed for social workers, for example, refer to the process by which individuals and systems respectfully and effectively respond to people of all cultures, languages, classes, races, ethnic backgrounds, religions, sexual orientations, gender, physical and mental abilities, and other diversity factors in a manner that recognizes, affirms, and values the worth of individuals, families, and communities, and protects and preserves the dignity of each.

Cultural competency is the integration and transformation of knowledge of diversity into policies, practices, and attitudes to improve human service outcomes by learning new behaviors and effectively applying them. The standards identify five essential elements: diversity valuation, capacity for self-assessment, awareness of the dynamics inherent in cultural interactions, institutionalized cultural knowledge, and programs and services that reflect understandings of diversity. Because of the importance of communication in cultural competency, the National Center for Cultural Competence defines linguistic competence as the capacity of an organization and its personnel to effectively communicate and convey information in a manner that is easily understood by diverse groups, including those with limited English proficiency, low literacy skills, or ability challenges. The Office of Minority Health also provides national standards for cultural and linguistic competency by broadening the markers for diversity so that new avenues open in care quality and delivery by responding to demographic and social changes, disparities, care quality concerns, legal climates, marketplace competition, and charges of wrongdoing. These types of standards speak of the integration of attitudes, knowledge, and practice competencies.

A great example of cultural competence in action would be the Medical Readiness Training Exercise conducted between Ghana and U.S. Army medical professionals as part of the U.S. Army Africa mission. The exercise, as well as the mission, brought these two groups together to promote cooperation and cultural interactions between Ghanaians and U.S. Army personnel.

Attitudes

Broad demographic and social changes reflect a growing diversity, in which racial and ethnic minorities become the majority, immigration and globalization change residency, same-sex civil rights gain recognition, historical religious differences clash, gender equity ebbs and flows, and poverty persists for many disabled people. There is a compelling need to address demographic and social changes to promote well-being (not in the absence of conflict, but in the presence of social justice). Programs, policies, and services manage change and diversity by ending harmful disparities and improving service outcomes. Cultural competency enhances the ability to compete, avoid conflict, and mitigate harm. Effective, efficient, and cost-effective services impact access, utilization, and service outcomes in ways that are enhanced by cultural competency. Attitudes support and can be barriers. The human service provider may have attitudes of warmth, empathy, and genuineness, or they may further stigmatize or prejudice interactions with others. Discussions of privilege may support competencies, or animosities. Attitudes verbally and nonverbally communicated shape individual behaviors and organizational climates. The road to attitudinal change is a journey that encounters barriers, but also reflects values and professionalism. Prejudicial attitudes may be rooted in the intuitive emotional heart, moral judgments, and reasoned thoughts. The pathways that can lead to “cultural wars” can also lead to cultural competence.

Knowledge

Cultural competency requires building knowledge across a wide array of information. It is not focused on knowledge of each area of diversity, but on cumulative knowledge of diversity, and an institutional holding of this reservoir of information. This favors participatory approaches for securing information, and then building on this participation to integrate the knowledge into the helping process (e.g., engaging, assessing, intervening, and evaluating). This includes understanding cultural patterns, historical trauma, social structures, and the intersectionalities where differing identities merge. These are manifested, for example, by the immigrant experience or the cradle-to-prison pipeline of incarceration, changing some communities. The social structures (e.g., historic, economic, political, geographic, religious, and linguistic) shape the experiences that impact help-seeking behaviors, access, utilization, or other practices. Cultural knowledge includes mores, values, traditions, beliefs, customs, communication styles, familial customs, risks, and resiliencies.

Competencies

Human service providers practice competently to improve service outcomes. Engaging the helping process starts with forming alliances characterized by trust, warmth, empathy, genuineness, and shared communications. Competency includes awareness, sensitivity, trust, communication of cultural understanding, the ability to work with and in diverse communities, the establishment of support networks, the ability to empower and confront oppression, and the power to help from a place of strength. Interventions build on strengths, resiliency, and partnerships. Competent assessments include knowing historical trauma, social settings, causes and consequences, who to turn to for help, and how to ask the difficult questions about diversity. The human service worker practices in organizational contexts and an organizational climate (sociocultural dimensions and administrative structures). Cultural competency plans support goal achievement, regulatory needs, and evaluative processes. Cultural competency plans include basic demographic data, sustainability, managerial support, goals and objectives, and outcomes. They are integrated into the mission, strategic plan, implementation plans, structural supports for the plan, training, human resources, and ongoing training. Organizations build on performance goals, strategies to achieve these goals, diversity in staffing, accountability, and consumer leadership.

Beyond Cultural Competence

Cultural competency values diversity and equity, showing it in policies and programs, being self-reflective, implementing and sustaining competencies, supporting staff in their journey toward cultural competency, targeting goals to achieve it, and monitoring and evaluating progress within a participatory framework. One cannot be fully human by preventing others from being fully human. One journeys on the path to cultural competency. It is not good will alone that leads one further down the path, but challenges to structural inequality and institutional racism. The journey welcomes service providers.

Ronald J. Mancoske
Southern University at New Orleans

See Also: Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Paradigms; Cultural Services.

Further Readings

National Association of Social Workers. "NASW Standards for Cultural Competence in Social Work Practice" (2001). http://www.socialworkers.org (Accessed July 2013).

National Center for Cultural Competence. http://gucdc.georgetwon.edu/nccc (Accessed July 2013).

Office of Minority Health (OMH), U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. National Standards for Culturally and Linguistically Appropriate Services in Health and Health Care: A Blueprint for Advancing CLAS Policy and Practice. Washington, DC: OMH, 2013.

Cultural Competence, Measuring and Assessing

There are compelling social and professional reasons why human service workers need to enhance their cultural competency skills. The changing demographics of the population, disparities and inequality, the rapid globalization brought on by economic and technological change, the need for competencies to compete in changing marketplaces, and the legal and regulatory demands of a changing society create demand for cultural competency skills. Ethical standards of practice, accreditation standards for professional training, and regulatory practices require attitudes, knowledge, and skills for culturally competent practice. Despite barriers to cultural competence skill development, there is a growing consensus in professional literature and program practices of the importance of cultural competence. Cultural competency may lead to difficult conversations about diversities, to sensitivities inherent in the conversations, to new practices, and to strategies for advocacy.

The growing demands for practice accountability moves human services professionals to evidence-based practices in order to improve service access and outcomes, reduce disparities, and build quality in transformed service delivery networks. Questions remain about the evidence base for cultural competency in the human services. A disconnect exists between "evidence-based" and "cultural competency" as described by M. R. Isaacs and colleagues. There are knowledge gaps in both cultural competence, and evidence-based practices, a lack of policy and research integrating the two, and a lack of practice-based evidence to support the integration. The evidence-based and cultural competency frameworks may not come together but rather may collide. Integrating an evidence-based approach to the assessment and measurement of cultural competency is vital to understanding and supporting the scientific basis of professional practice integrated with the values and standards of quality practice.

Measuring Cultural Competence

Culturally competent practice is a means to improve human service outcomes. There is a need for an evidence base showing how these competencies improve the quality of service outcomes. This requires an integrative approach addressing the opportunities and barriers as well as the resources to support evidence-based, culturally competent practices and their impact on service quality and the expansion of practice-based evidence. Measuring community needs for cultural and linguistic competence provides a framework for ongoing organizational supports for cultural competency measurements.

A key to integration of culturally competent, evidence-based practice is having the reliable and valid assessment instruments to measure the domains of cultural competence and the evaluation studies to know the impact on service quality and outcomes. Instruments are available for measuring multiple domains of cultural competency. The New York State Psychiatric Institute reviewed a variety of assessment tools for measuring cultural competence at various levels. Multiple instruments are identified at various practice levels, such as agency, provider, consumer/client, and training instruments. Instrument information is provided including citations, purposes, descriptions, assessment levels, administration, scoring, reliability, validity, and developer contact information. Standardized instruments that systematically evaluate practice outcomes offer the potential for the development of practice-based (and evidence-based) application opportunities. It is necessary to have the measurement tools available to support a body of research on cultural competency.

The National Center for Cultural Competence also has resources essential for self-assessment in measuring cultural and linguistic competency. The resources on measuring tools, for example, cover agency, program, provider, client, and training instruments. The center develops tools that target special populations such as measures focused on early childhood, children, families, youth, and sexual minorities. The center also provides support and information on planning for and implantation of culturally competent self-assessments, including information on checklists that support engaging in systematic self-assessments.

The Research and Training Center for Children's Mental Health reviews available instruments to measure organizational cultural competence. The center reports little empirical data on organizational cultural competency. Its review identified studies on the measurement tools available and the domains of the organizational cultural competence measures (values, governance, evaluation, communications, human resources, participation, service arrays, and resources). Cultural competence is a basic part of practice in the human services, and measuring it in practice is requisite to understanding the programs and agencies in which competency is found. Competency development requires support at all levels of the organization.

Assessing Cultural Competence

Assessments in the human services rely on participatory data collection informing practice in the embedded service context. For example, in mental health-related cultural formulations, focus might be on cultural identity, cultural explanations of illness, environments, interactions, or care impact. Clinical assessments address how the person is experiencing difficulties, his or her views on etiology and help-seeking, and conveyance of trust in planned interventions. Organizational assessments might focus on communication, resources, personnel, capacities, or organization climate. Assessments cross over divergent areas of focus, but are contingent upon measurement tools capturing the domains critical to the measures. In a pluralistic society, multilingual (or literacy) competencies may need to be assessed in one context, and trust may be a core competency in another. In some contexts, measuring levels of cultural fit (or acculturation) may tap into a dimension of needed cultural competency.

Exposure to discrimination, violence, or trauma produce biopsychosocial consequences, and assessments require engaging and relationship-building as a means of developing quality assessments. Human services workers build bridges via participation with their clients, whether they are at individual, group, family, organizational, or community levels. Culturally competent practice is the bridge to quality outcomes. Assessments require data (qualitative and quantitative) in order to get to data-driven results. Assessment foci may be at various levels (e.g., care quality, equity, organizational, provider, client, resources, unmet needs, service processes, assets, communications, or even basic demographic profiles). What is critical is that assessments include the key elements thought to be necessary for achieving quality standards of care. Policies and procedures guiding assessments would include nondiscrimination, though reaching this is a journey reflected in taking affirmative approaches to quality.

Cultural competence is the pillar on which human services are built and are supported in practice. However, measuring and assessing cultural competence is not well integrated into practice. Being rich in discussions is not the same as being substantively supported by theoretical or empirical foundations. Some empirical support is described (perhaps more so in the medical literature than in other areas of human services), but little research has been done to know if culturally competent practice leads to improved service outcomes. There is little evidence to support culturally competent practice, though such practice is widely affirmed in practice standards and literature. Valuing cultural competence is not the same as knowing it is achieved. Knowledge of achievement requires measuring, assessing, and methods to provide the data necessary to make judgments on quality outcomes. To integrate evidence-based and culturally competent practices, culture, power, and privilege merge with outcomes in quality care measurement.

To reach evidence-based and culturally competent care integration, planning and implementation are required. Organizational supports for the planning and implantation are essential. The efforts require support for sustainability. Training is often seen as crucial to sustainability efforts, but supports require more than training opportunities. Examples of supports include organizational supports, such as implementation of a cultural competence framework reflected in mission, strategic plan, service implantation plan, policies, procedures, and an organizational structure (an office of cultural competence/staffing, leadership, human resources, budget, microclimate, and training are support examples). It is necessary to have basic demographic data (targets, populations, unmet needs, etc.) available for planning and implementation. Evaluation data that informs cultural competence and effectiveness in service outcomes are key. The attributes of community and context capacity as vital, as are other asset profiles such as staffing resources and improvement goals. The evaluation to support quality includes needs and targets, and processes that lead to outcomes. Assessing for cultural competency requires clinically and methodologically valid tools and assessing organizational and administrative supports, as well as assessing service delivery. Tools have been developed in each area and need applications to build best practices and evidence-based structures.

Evidence-based practice and culturally competent practice are both complementary and challenging. Measuring cultural competence in an evidence-based approach and developing practice-based evidence furthers the integration of the two themes' guiding practice. Participatory approaches with human service partners strengthen the pathways to quality care outcomes in the human services.

Ronald J. Mancoske
Southern University at New Orleans

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Competence, Training.

Further Readings

Isaacs, M. R., L. N. Huang, M. Hernandez, and H. Echo-Hawk. The Road to Evidence: The Intersection of Evidence-Based Practices and Cultural Competence in Children's Mental Health. Owings Mills, MD: National Alliance of Multi-Ethnic Behavioral Health Associations, 2005.

Mancoske, R. J., M. L. Lewis, C. Bowers-Stephens, and A. Ford. "Cultural Competence in Children's Mental Health Service Outcomes." Journal of Ethnic and Cultural Diversity in Social Work, v.21 (2012).

National Center for Cultural Competence. "Curricula Enhancement Module Series." http://www.ncccurricula.info/resources_mod2.html (Accessed June 2013).

New York State Psychiatric Institute. "Cultural Competence Assessment Tools" (December 2010). Center of Excellence for Cultural Competence. http:// www.nyspi.org/culturalcompetence (Accessed June 2013).

Research and Training Center for Children's Mental Health. Organizational Cultural Competence: A Review of Assessment Protocols. Tampa: University of South Florida, Louis de la Parte Florida Mental Health Institute, 2006.

Cultural Competence, Model of

Cultural competence refers to integrated patterns of human behavior (e.g., language, thought, communication, action, customs, beliefs, values, and institutions of racial, ethnic, religious, or social groups) and implies having the capacity to effectively function as an individual and an organization within the context of the cultural beliefs, behaviors, and needs presented by consumers and their communities. The human and social dimensions of cultural competence holistically affect individuals, groups, communities, and organizations. The helping professions (e.g., counselors, doctors, crime scene investigators, home health aides, emergency medical technicians, nurses, police, psychologists, social workers, and teachers) play pivotal roles in delivering culturally competent services across a full spectrum of professions. The interactions between and among individuals and communities (client) and helping professionals (staff) and the respective agency (organization) occur at the levels of prevention, treatment or services, and promotion of well-being and independence.

Operational Definition

Cultural competence is the integration and transformation of knowledge about individuals and groups of people into specific standards, policies, practices, and attitudes used in appropriate cultural settings to increase the quality of services, thereby producing better outcomes. Facilitating this transformation is a challenge. The rationale underpinning the goals of cultural competence are expressed as the mastery of specific knowledge and skills that increase the provision of competent care, service, or treatment care to diverse individuals, groups, and communities; and the dispositional objective to meaningfully value feelings, values, attitudes, and beliefs about the self and others. There are several working definitions of cultural competence.

Terry Cross views cultural competence as a set of congruent behaviors, attitudes, and policies that come together in a system, agency, or among professionals and enables them to effectively work in cross-cultural situations. The National Association of Social Workers refers to cultural competence as the process by which individuals and systems respectfully and effectively respond to people of all cultures, languages, classes, races, ethnic backgrounds, religions, and other diversity factors in a manner that recognizes, affirms, and values the worth of individuals, families, and communities and protects and preserves the dignity of each. The Western Interstate Commission for Higher Education's (WICHE) mental health standards state that cultural competence acknowledges and incorporates variance in normative acceptable behaviors, beliefs, and values in determining an individual's mental wellness/illness, and incorporates those variables into assessment and treatment. For the Child Welfare League of America, cultural competence means an ability to provide services that are perceived as legitimate for problems experienced by culturally diverse persons.

There is congruence among these theoretical and operational definitions. However, one views cultural competence through multiple lenses. One must consider the "bedrock" of cultural competence: self-cultural competence. One is reminded of this initial and crucial aspect of development when revisiting R. Michael Paige and Steven Fraiberg's explanations of meaning making and social development. Extending one's vision of the world to include the "other" is the basis of this model for cultural competence.

Components of a Cultural Competence Model

Whether one views cultural competence as a stage, set constructs, dimensions, domains, or as characteristics, the common components of these categories are significant and serve as the basis of the methodology and approach to or assessment of cultural competence. I. Papadopoulos, M. Tilki, and G. Taylor posited that cultural competence is the fourth stage of four stages. Competence (competent assessment of need, and the ability to challenge and address prejudice, discrimination, and disparity) develops from awareness (of self, identify, heritage, and ethnohistory), knowledge (of health beliefs and behaviors, holistic understandings, similarities and differences, and disparities), and sensitivity (empathy, effective intrapersonal communication skills, acceptance, appropriateness, and respect). The "community tool box" enumerates five essential active principles: valuing diversity, conducting cultural self-assessment, understanding the dynamics of difference, institutionalizing cultural knowledge, and adapting to diversity.

The present participle form of these verbs underscores a key element in the process: that of things still happening. Sharon Glover's adaption of the community tool box articulates a continuum that at its least effective is culturally destructive, and at its best is culturally proficient. Glover's continuum ranges from cultural destructiveness to cultural incapacity, cultural blindness, cultural precompetence, cultural competence, and cultural proficiency. Larry Purnell developed a model for cultural competence that crosses practice disciplines and environmental contexts. The major assumptions informing the Purnell model embrace that all health (helping) professions need similar information; the metaparadigm of health and well-being as global, communal, family, and individual; and recognition that all cultures share core similarities.

Why Cultural Competence?

Diversity is reality: People are all connected through the increasing globalization of communications, trade, and labor practices. Change in one part of the world affects people everywhere. Described as the "butterfly effect," a small occurrence can change the course of the universe. Considering increasing diversity and interconnected problems, working together is the best strategy for accomplishing goals. Because social and economic changes are coming faster and faster, organizations understand the need for cultural competence. If one does not improve one's skills, one is inviting organizational and cultural gridlock. Studies show that new entrants to the workforce and communities will increasingly be people of color, immigrants, and white women because of differential birth rates and immigration patterns. The benefits to diversity are many, such as the rich resource of alternative ideas for how to do things, the opportunity for contact with people from all cultures and nationalities that are living in a community, the aid in strategizing quick response to environmental change, and a source for hope and success in managing shared survival.

The benefits of building an organization's cultural competence include increased respect and mutual understanding among all shareholders; increased creativity in problem-solving through new perspectives, ideas, and strategies; decreased unwanted surprises that might slow institutional progress; increased participation and involvement of other cultural groups; and increased trust and cooperation. While these benefits can be either tangible or intangible, the reduction in fear of mistakes, unhelpful competition, and conflict between staff and leadership is highly desirable, and the promotion of inclusion and equality is essential to fostering organizational cohesion and productivity.

The constructs of cultural competence include the knowledge of, skill in applying, and the open dispositions that embrace languages other than English (LOTE). The anthropological concept of "emic and etic" are at play in the dyad between the English speaker and the speaker of a LOTE. Embedded in the dyad between the participant and observer are beliefs regarding health, healing and wellness, how illness and disease and their causes are perceived, and the behaviors of those seeking health care and their attitudes toward the caregiver. The range of models describing cultural competence embraces global, communal, family, and individual perspectives. At each level, the various models acknowledge that all cultures share core similarities: awareness and acceptance of self and others, and the commitment to embrace shared human and social rights.

Linda Barley
York College, University of New York

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Paradigms; Cultural Services.

Further Readings

Campinha-Bacote, J. "The Process of Cultural Competence in the Delivery of Health care Services: A Model for Care." Journal of Transcultural Nursing, v.13/3 (2002).

Diller, J. V. and J. Moule. Cultural Competence: A Primer for Educators. Belmont, CA: Thompson Learning, 2005.

Kim-Goodwin, Y., P. Clarke, and L. Barton. "A Model for the Delivery of Culturally Competent Community Care." Journal of Advanced Nursing, v.35/6 (2001).

Purnell, L. "Purnell Model for Cultural Competence." Journal of Transcultural Nursing, v.13/3 (2002).

Vonk, E. "Cultural Competence for Transracial Adoptive Parents." Social Work, v.46/3 (2001).

Wells, M. "Beyond Cultural Competence: A Model for Individual and Institutional Cultural Development." Journal of Community Health Nursing, v.17/4 (2001).

Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of

The concepts of cultural, multicultural, intercultural, and global competence all share a common focus on the need to appreciate perspective—the value that individuals, organizations, and groups assign to the ways that others evaluate the world relative to their own viewpoints. Cultural competence can be prescriptively seen as a developmental model in which entities are encouraged to progress along a continuum toward knowledge of oneself in relation to one's culture, knowledge of others in relation to their cultures, a core assumption of interdependence, a commitment to cultural differences as potential assets, and a repertoire of applied skills, according to Darla K. Deardorff.

Building upon the notion of cultural competence as making sense of a relatively benign world, standpoint theory presents a world in which one's perspective is socially constructed from the images, story lines, metaphors, and concepts associated with a "subject position," a subjectively negotiated identity within a dynamic cultural system in which power and privilege are unevenly distributed. For example, racial profiling can be said to generate story lines that persistently situate young black and Latino men in subject positions as threats to the established order, providing license to civil authorities to devalue their lives in relation to those of young white men. Standpoint theory anticipates certain social problems because of the limits and conditions placed on the perspectives of those associated with certain subject positions: "What one knows is affected by where one stands in society." Cultural competence can be analytically seen as a political model in which entities can creatively respond to a power system that subjectively restricts or expands choices, as per Julia T. Wood.

When the civil rights movement challenged the overt and covert system of race-based segregation in the United States during the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s, pathways to higher education opened that enabled diverse populations to negotiate space for discourse about the existing inequities of power in society. During the presidency of Lyndon B. Johnson, the movement accomplished successes for African American agency by mobilizing the federal government as the monitor and enforcer of the educational equity agenda for social change, diversifying representation in the educational workforce and student body, and incentivizing cultural competence, especially through the policies of the U.S. Department of Education and the Department of Health and Human Services. These successes helped to ignite similar campaigns for equity and cultural competence among other marginalized identity groups, including women, immigrants, the economically poor, Latinos, Native Americans, Asian Americans, the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered, and queer community, the disabled community, and the spiritually disenfranchised.

In higher education, scholars of race and ethnicity have elevated the role of cultural perspective and exposed Eurocentric perspectives in academic curricula. Feminist and sexuality scholars have centralized gender and sexuality perspectives and have recognized the contributions of reflexivity, subjectivity, and intersectionality in providing alternatives to the myth of objectivity. Disability scholars have emphasized neurodiversity as a perspective, addressing the influence of differences in the functioning of the brain and nervous system on consciousness, perception, movement, and learning. Through the power of entrenched and institutionalized precedent, these master narratives have worked to normalize and validate the collective perspectives of the West about what is true, right, good, and beautiful—while delegitimizing and disempowering the values and accomplishments of the remainder of the world.

During the presidency of Ronald Reagan, a backlash erupted against the relative prominence of the unfinished equity and cultural competence agenda. Once the world's leader in education, America's schools had entered a period of decline relative to the world's highest-performing schools. The publication of A Nation At Risk in 1983 dramatically altered the discourse around public education in the United States, shifting the focus of the national educational agenda from cultural competence to professional standards, from equity to accountability, and from the federal government to the states and business. A Nation At Risk concluded that "The educational foundations of our society are presently being eroded by a rising tide of mediocrity that threatens our very future as a nation and as a people." Intervention by the federal government was designated as the central problem facing U.S. education. Intervention had created a national crisis in the public schools that had lowered standards, undermined the nation's sense of a common identity, and threatened the nation's role as world leader. Establishing and applying standards and demanding accountability was the panacea for improving the quality of national education in the international arena. Market forces would be the guarantor of the individual's responsibility for achieving educational excellence. Public education was viewed as the primary channel for transmitting the nation's dominant myths and values and reproducing the culture and power hierarchies of the dominant group.

Over the last quarter century, the trajectory of U.S. education policy has remained tilted toward the centrist side of the accountability paradigm. While no president has veered as far to the right as Reagan, President George H. W. Bush assembled governors to formulate national educational goals. President Bill Clinton encouraged the formulation of learning outcomes to improve measurement of what students should be able to understand, know, and do; promoted standardized testing in schools; and incentivized states to incorporate educational accountability systems. President George W. Bush implemented state curricular standards and encouraged annual assessments of progress toward achieving the standards, but he also advocated for disaggregated testing data for diverse student groups. President Barack Obama has lobbied for the Common Core curricular standards; linked teacher preparation, evaluation, compensation, and retention to student academic achievement; utilized competitive grants to states; and supported accountability for higher education institutions, as well as public charter and rural schools. He has also encouraged innovation in transforming the cultures of struggling schools; supported science, technology, engineering, and mathematics (STEM) education; and built statewide longitudinal data systems for improved assessment.

While government has emphasized accountability, professional organizations and accreditation associations are increasingly becoming the caretakers for cultural competence. In recent years, advocates for cultural competence, particularly in health, health care, nursing, psychology, and social work, have identified barriers to cultural competence, such as the failure to account for the role of culture in diagnosis and treatment, consequent overreliance on a medical model of causation, and omission of the effects of the reflexive bias of the practitioner when confronting cultural difference.

Melvin Wade
Mailee Kue
University of Rhode Island

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Measuring and Assessing; Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Competence, Training in.

Further Readings

Abrams, Laura S. and Jene A. Moio. “Critical Race Theory and the Cultural Competence Dilemma in Social Work Education.” Journal of Social Work Education, v.45 (2009).

Deardorff, Darla K., ed. The SAGE Handbook of Intercultural Competence. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2009.

Wood, Julia T. “Feminist Standpoint Theory.” Encyclopedia of Communication Theory. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2009.

Cultural Competence, Training in

Cultural competence training programs aim to increase cultural awareness, knowledge, and skills leading to changes in staff behavior and patient-staff interactions. Cultural competence training is one method of improving the effectiveness of service providers in meeting the needs of diverse clients and consumers. Evaluation studies looking at the effectiveness of cultural competence training have emerged in many fields, including social work, health care, and counseling. Culture refers to the shared values, traditions, norms, customs, religion, arts, history, folklore, language, and/or institutions of a specific group of people. Competence, in its broadest sense, is having the capacity to effectively provide services cross-culturally. It is achieved by service providers acquiring the ability to communicate, interact, negotiate, and intervene on behalf of clients from diverse backgrounds and on an organizational/societal level. Cultural competence includes the capability to identify, understand, and respect the values and beliefs of others.

Motivated by a growing body of evidence that the delivery of culturally competent services can improve outcomes and client satisfaction, and by the need to train professionals with the ability to provide quality care for a diverse population, many statutory/accreditation bodies and government agencies worldwide now require cultural competence education and training. However, cultural competence can be perceived as “elementary” by critics because of the lack of a standardized definition and methodology for curricula and research and a limited evidence base documenting the efficacy of cultural training efforts.

Models of Cultural Competence Training

There are a limited number of cultural competence training models, with the majority of models in the fields of nursing, mental health, or social work. These professions have a great deal of client contact and their professionals are likely to encounter people who may be culturally different from them. In all the models, each of the trainings included a cognitive and behavioral component. The cognitive components stress self-awareness and cultural knowledge acquisition. The behavioral components emphasize skill development such as being able to convey respect and genuine regard for others during cultural encounters. A criticism of cultural competency training is that few of the frameworks have developed validated assessment tools with which to evaluate their models. There is also limited information about the associations between patient outcomes and cultural competence training.

One common approach for providing cultural competence training to providers in a number of fields is to include cultural competence training in graduate and postgraduate education. Student counselors, social workers, and nurses are required to learn cultural competence curricula and demonstrate mastery of the learning competencies. Another way of providing cultural competence training is to offer continuing education workshops and training either face to face or online to staff who are already working in health care or mental health agencies as part of their job development, and in some professions as part of the required certification for state licensing. Cultural competence training can focus on the individual clinician-client level, organizational or societal factors, and generally includes a combination of lectures, discussions, group activities, and case studies.

Becoming Culturally Competent

Becoming culturally competent requires self-reflection and an openness and humility that enable the health care or mental health provider to allow the patient to be the expert about his or her experiences. It involves the provider’s willingness to learn from the patient. The process requires using multiple skills such as problem-solving; understanding the dynamics of oppression and privilege, racism, sexism, classism, homophobia, and other forms of discrimination; understanding the complexity of the service delivery systems; increased awareness of personal biases and stereotypes; having knowledge of the context that influences the behaviors of individuals and families; and utilizing a process of questioning.

Standards, Assessment, and Evaluation of Cultural Competence Training

Standards for cultural competence training have been recommended by a number of organizations and individuals, such as the American Psychological Association, the National Association of Social Workers, and the Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development. In the field of health care, the U.S. Office of Minority Health is promoting national standards for culturally and linguistically appropriate services (CLAS) in all states. The Center for Mental Health Services has also issued guidelines for cultural competency that aim to impact federally funded mental health programs. Many organizations have expanded their guidelines of cultural competence to include organizational processes and policies. In fact, many professional organizations have revised their codes of ethics to include respect for cultural diversity as part of the professional standards for education, training, research, and practice.

The primary method of evaluating cultural competence training has been pre-post comparisons of training participants' cultural knowledge, attitudes, and skills. One of the shortcomings in the current cultural competence training literature is the lack of standardized and validated methods to measure its impact and the limited number of validated conceptual frameworks.

There has not been great variation in cultural competence studies, and there is minimal evidence to evaluate the effectiveness of such training. The majority of evaluations claim success and are self-reported. There is minimal quantitative data, only patient experience or health outcomes. Most of the studies had small sample sizes limiting generalization of the information to other settings. There has been little in the way of serious attempts to evaluate the effectiveness of cultural competence training.

Lisa D. Hines
Wichita State University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Measuring and Assessing; Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Multiculturalism.

Further Readings

Appleby, G. A., E. Colon, and J. Hamilton, eds. Diversity, Oppression and Social Functioning: Person-in-Environment Assessment and Intervention, 3rd ed. New York: Pearson/Allyn and Bacon, 2011.

Hogan-Garcia, M. The Four Skills of Cultural Diversity Competence: A Process for Understanding and Practice, 4th ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, Cengage Learning, 2013.

Kelly, P. J. "Exploring the Theoretical Framework of Cultural Competency Training. Journal of Physician Assistant Education, v.22/4 (2011).

Office of Minority Health. "National CLAS Standards." https://www.thinkculturalhealth.hhs.gov/Content/clas.asp (Accessed November 2013).

Cultural Determinism

Cultural determinism is the notion that culture determines and defines one's personality, rather than biologically inherited traits. It studies the interactions, relations, and effects between human beings and their cultural environment. Because human service professionals aim at ameliorating human problems, knowledge of cultural determinism can help them improve policies and programs to make them more acceptable, efficient, and dynamic. Its knowledge helps them design their human services strategies in a diversified human environment.

The influence of different factors responsible for making the personality of a human being are recorded using the concepts of cultural determinism, environmental determinism, and probabilism, or cultural ecology. There are a number of theories of social development. The concept of cultural determinism is similar to that of possibilism; it rejects the environment as a controlling influence, and claims that culture is everything for the molding and grooming of an individual. Culture is the collective system of knowledge and behavior that evolves through mutual interaction and collective endeavors, shared beliefs, and mutually agreed-upon values and thoughts. These develop through the course of generations, and are treasured through the ages through many layers of communication. Cultural determinism establishes its proposition on the fact that the ideas, values, beliefs, and behavioral patterns that a human being learns in a culture determine their personality and nature.

Cultural determinism follows the idea that a person is known by his society and company because his personality becomes a bundle of habits that he learns in the surrounding culture. Culture is an important aspect of human development and takes its members into a sustainable society. It contributes to the framing of an identity and healthy self-esteem. Cultural determinism understands that human behavioral patterns, attitudes, and values are the result of cultural indicators and paradigms, rather than biological and technological factors. One can find it as a debate of nurture versus nature. Culture nurtures the being of an individual. A child is born as a plain slate (tabula rasa): his mind is unaffected and clear. Many social, cultural, and political factors make him into a "type" of person and brand his personality. Human development varies according to the stage of a society. The physical stage, vital stage, and mental stage come in a sequence. In a cultural environment, a human being develops from an unconscious to a conscious state. A culture develops over centuries and records the experiences of many known and unknown individuals.

Cultural determinism is found branching into optimistic and pessimistic versions. The optimistic version of the theory of cultural determinism suggests that human nature is highly acquiescent and impressionable in its ideal form, and therefore one can choose the way of life that one prefers for oneself. The negative and the pessimistic aspect of cultural determinism holds that an individual becomes what he or she is conditioned to be. An individual has no control over this phenomenon. A human being is a proactive person and becomes involved in the same course that the culture takes him into. A person within the same culture observes several layers of impression programming within the culture, especially at the level of nation, region, gender, generation, social class, and occupation. Cultural determinism stands against the concept of economic determinism and technological determinism as given in Marxism and a technological stance. Marxist theory asserts that an individual transforms himself into certain ideologies that are motivated by economic and technological factors. Cultural determinism may also be pitted against the technological concept of man and media determinism as sole deterministic factors, but these can stand as a segment of culture.

Cultural determinism thus keeps human beings and culture in a continuous cycle of growth and development. Its ingredients include traits and determining factors that help an individual to carry cultural determinants, through which he or she takes a behavioral stand in society and communicates his or her mind through the structures of the political and economic environment of which he or she is a part, and takes recourse to the future structure of society as a whole. Inculcation of a positive attitude, constructive reception, and response toward organized patterning of anything that contributes to the political and economic setup of the society and nation at large makes a role for cultural determinism. This superstructure also, in the life of a human being, depends upon cultural determinism. Because the process affects how an individual grows and is conditioned, and depends upon their culture, cultural determinism takes many shades and forms.

Consenting or opposing for the better or the worse cause has much to do with cultural determinism. Prioritizing choices that regulate the rules or norms of social behavior is an implication that determines the behavioral stand of an individual on any matter of meaningful concern in society, and how he or she is conditioned in the background knowledge and culture to understand and interpret the gravity of that matter or subject in relation to it. It also determines an overall personality of an individual or face of the group or society that he or she joins, or to which he or she belongs. Cultural determinism becomes an indicator that measures differences in the development of human personality. It regulates various discourses in the society concerned. It can be a potent base of psychological, sociological, political, and economic rendering of human society.

Ravindra Pratap Singh
University of Lucknow

See Also: Biculturalism; Ethnicity, Definition of; Subcultures.

Further Readings

Honderich, Ted. How Free Are You? The Determinism Problem, 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Pereboom, Derk. Living Without Free Will. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Rogoff, Barbara. The Cultural Nature of Human Development. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Cultural Humility, Model of

The increasing cultural diversity of the United States has challenged professionals to acknowledge the ideological, psychological, interpersonal, structural (both physical and organizational), historical, and socioenvironmental experiences that differentiate culturally diverse groups. A compelling call for culturally responsive practice has emerged as part of a widespread help-giving ethos reflecting a high level of professional commitment to cultural differences and equitable treatment. Critical practice principles have become organized around culturally shared attributes, primarily of racial and ethnic groups, from which to initiate and engage in culturally competent practice. A cultural competence focus has evolved within nearly every human service profession and is most evident in ethical standards and professional codes of conduct.

Trends in human service outcomes in research and from clinical observations illuminate disproportionate and disparate access and outcomes in service delivery associated with cultural differences. Concerns about cultural biases are raised in reporting, assessing, diagnosing, responding to, and evaluating practice outcomes. Service underutilization and premature termination of services have become alarmingly disconcerting as service availability, accessibility, acceptability, adaptability, and affordability are common attributes in the failure of human service professionals to effectively address the needs of culturally different help-seekers.

Cultural competence practice traditionally encompasses four components. A knowledge component draws attention to culturally shared socialization experiences and the intergenerational transmission of values, beliefs, and so on, recognized as distinct within cultural communities. An awareness component requires consciously engaging in and incorporating knowledge about the unique cultural experiences of service recipients.

This component requires help-giving that recognizes challenges and issues from within a cultural lens or worldview specific to the service recipients and their situation. An affective or sensitivity component more closely aligns with cultural empathy and necessitates a sensorial appreciation of a recipient's affective responses to his or her challenges and issues. The fourth component is the place for cultural accountability and an evaluation of the cultural appropriateness, adaptiveness, effectiveness, or relevance of help-giving decision making or actions made in collaboration with or on behalf of service recipients. Cultural action as the fourth component elicits an integration of professional and cultural knowledge and skills.

Impediments to Cultural Competence and Cultural Diversity

Most recently, culturally responsive approaches have been called upon to represent culture more as a complex set of relationships, responses, and interpretations that differentiate individuals and families beyond a list of cultural categories or traits. In the nation's multicultural society and history of immigration, migration, and historically differential experiences of privilege and oppression, individuals have either acquired or been relegated to different levels of social integration. This complexity becomes pronounced when one considers cultural experiences of minority cultures juxtaposed onto more dominant cultural forces, often necessitating unique adaptive practices to navigate cultural differences. From this perspective, multiple dimensions of cultural diversity include power differentials, privilege and oppression, and other social justice-related aspects hardly inconsequential in understanding cultural diversity.

From a basic social science perspective, cultural experiences vary in such profound ways within and across cultures that ascertaining common or core sets of cultural meanings or shared practices minimizes this complexity in ways that misrepresent cultural variation. The multiple and intersecting meanings of culture in terms of their social constructions, contextual adaptiveness, -intergenerational and social transmission, and variations across time, generations, and sociopolitical contexts illustrate the complex dynamics of cultural difference and offer a backdrop from which competence is unlikely to emerge. Producing incontrovertible, observable, and measurable cultural traits, failure to differentiate cultural diversity from its cumulative integration of race and ethnicity, class, gender, religion, and issues of power, privilege, oppression, and so on remains an impediment to cultural competence.

Efforts to bound or generalize cultural differences and experiences as a consequence of cultural differences undermine efforts to more fully recognize U.S. cultural diversity. A common critique of cultural competence perspective is the potential for discriminating against or ignoring various components of diversity by overemphasizing some aspects while underemphasizing more critical aspects as defined by the help-seeker. From a social justice perspective, a cultural competence approach does not reach far enough in addressing systemic and institutionalized oppression nor does it hold professionals accountable for the role they play in exercising professional privilege without sufficiently taking into account the cultural diversity of others.

The most serious barrier to culturally appropriate care is not necessarily a lack of knowledge of the details of any given cultural orientation, but the provider's failure to develop self-awareness and a respectful attitude toward culturally diverse points of view. Rather than learning to identify and respond to sets of culturally specific traits about the help-seeker, the culturally responsive provider must be taught to develop cultural humility.

Cultural Humility Perspective

A cultural humility perspective draws attention to two important concepts, intersectionality and multiculturalism, as important threads that support perhaps the most critical aspect of initiating help-giving: engaging help-seekers as active participants in the helping process.

Intersectionality speaks to the fact that both clients and human services professionals possess multiple identities that are reinforced and reshaped as they interact with their social and physical environments. These interactions are encapsulated in and guided by their multiple identities, which extend beyond race and ethnicity to include gender, socioeconomic class, age, sexual orientation, occupation, family roles, and so on. It is this complex interaction of identities within each individual that makes a person complex and adds to diversity.

Multiculturalism recognizes culture as having both stable and ever-changing aspects that are revised as a consequence of experiences that suppress, reaffirm, or promote adaptive or alternative responses. It connotes a pooling of influences of the many forms of cultural identity imperfectly represented in people's minds, suggesting there is more within-culture variation than between-culture variation.

A cultural humility perspective draws upon three dimensions essential to individuals' connectedness with others and with themselves. First, cultural humility promotes self-awareness to the extent that individuals must appreciate who they are from a cultural perspective and critically assess how this shapes the lens through which they view the world. The concept of "epistemic privilege" draws attention to individuals' unique experiences and the ways they affect and are affected by individuals' internal processing of experiences. Each individual is different, unique, and claims privileged ownership of the lens through which he or she views the world based on both positive and negative experiences.

Through this self-awareness, individuals appreciate the fact that others can claim equal importance to their knowledge of self, relative to their own cultural experiences. Cultural humility in the broadest sense requires more realistic views about one's talents, skills, or capacities. Culturally humble practitioners do not simply acknowledge their limitations or resist overestimating their qualities but find value in the knowledge and experiences shaped by the realities of others outside of themselves.

Cultural humility cautions the worker against viewing culture as fixed and narrowly perceived. Engaging in a process of self-awareness and self-reflection is suggested to awaken the worker to the power imbalance in the helping relationship that may influence her or his perspective on cultural relevance. Critical self-awareness guards the worker from complicity, complacency, premature assessment, and psychological and physical retreat from perspectives that privilege the worker's perspective while ignoring the lived experiences of the help-seeker.

A second cultural humility dimension focuses on differentiation and openness. Workers are encouraged to consider an individual's multiple identities and the way in which their social experiences impact their cultural worldviews. In human services, cultural humility is an essential helping virtue to the extent that it requires a worker to learn from the help-seeker so that helping is relevant in its assumptions and applications.

The third dimension of cultural humility motivates human services workers to consider the fact that in their efforts to know themselves as well as others personally and professionally, in the helping context, they must embrace the reality that the world is far more complex and dynamic then perhaps they can imagine. Cultural humility as transcendence cultivates a disposition that encourages individuals to envision the multiple possibilities of difference that exist beyond one's self in every meaningful helping encounter. Workers lend their expertise on the basis of what they know, draw on the expertise of the help-seekers with whom they work, and even then must recognize that the vastness of experience likely exceeds all that is to be known.

Cultural Humility and Human Services Workers

In sum, demonstrating cultural humility frees workers from having to possess expert knowledge about an array of cultures. This perspective has the benefit of placing the worker in a learning mode as opposed to maintaining power, control, and authority in the working relationship, especially over cultural experiences about which the client is far more knowledgeable. Workers become liberated from the constraints of cultural stereotypes and bounded knowledge about specific cultures, and are encouraged to learn from the people they serve.

From a cultural humility perspective, workers are challenged to learn to identify and build on the assets and adaptive strengths of help-seekers and perhaps engage in efforts to change the kind of social forces that so often act to disempower them as members of society.

Cultural humility is fundamentally geared toward acknowledging rather than resisting or ignoring differences in power, privilege, and oppression. It also relates to an individual's ability to seek an appreciation of and hold regard for others that may generate mutual attentiveness, active listening, and greater possibilities for reciprocal enrichment, particularly when cultural humility is identified as ethically attuned and actively responsive to individuals' boundedness as cultural and temporal beings.

Engagement in culturally responsive practice inclusive of cultural humility offers help that furthers the goals of serving the communities of help-seekers by recognizing their unique contributions to the helping process. Contemporary cultural competence practices alone may be complicit in their own forms of repression, especially when the voices of the culturally diverse help-seekers are silenced. In this sense, conceptions of social justice and inclusion are incomplete without the cultivation of an ethical sensibility like cultural humility.

Robert M. Ortega
University of Michigan School of Social Work
Roxanna Duntley-Matos
Western Michigan University School of Social Work

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Literacy; Cultural Services; Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of; Culturally Diverse Practice, Theories of; Education for Diversity in Human Services.

Further Readings

Abrams, L. S. and J. A. Mio "Critical Race Theory and the Cultural Competence Dilemma in Social Work Education." J*ournal of Social Work Education*, v.45/2 (2009).

Allen-Meares, P. "Cultural Competence: An Ethical Requirement." Journal of Ethnic Cultural Diversity in Social Work, v.16/3-4 (2007).

Button, M. "'A Monkish Kind of Virtue'? For and Against Humility." Political Theory, v.33/6 (2005).

Chang, E., M. Simon, and X. Dong. "Integrating Cultural Humility Into Health Care Professional Education and Training." Advances in Health Science Education, v.17 (2012).

Johnson, Y. M. and S. Munch. "Fundamental Contradictions in Cultural Competence." Social Work, v.54/3 (2009).

Morris, J., C. Brotheridge, and J. Urbanski. "Bringing Humility to Leadership: Antecedents and Consequences of Leader Humility." Human Relations, v.58/10 (2005).

Ortega, R. M. and K. C. Faller. "Training Child Welfare Workers From a Cultural Humility Perspective." Child Welfare, v.90/5 (2011).

Sperry, L. "Cultural Competence: Primer." Journal of Individual Psychology, v.68/4 (2012).

Tangney, J. "Humility: Theoretical Perspectives, Empirical Findings and Directions for Future Research." Journal of Social and Clinical Psychology, v.19/1 (2000).

Wendt, D. C. and J. P. Gone. "Rethinking Cultural Competence; Insights From Indigenous Community Treatment Settings." Transcultural Psychiatry, v.49/2 (2011).

Yan, M. C. "Exploring Cultural Tensions in Cross-Cultural Social Work Practice." Social Work, v.53/4 (2008).

Cultural Literacy

Cultural literacy is a concept that individuals with an awareness of and the capacity to comprehend the history, slang, symbols, and customs that construct and organize a dominant culture will be better able to communicate with one another. This form of literacy asks that individuals have a body of shared knowledge, have an understanding of the historical context of a text or an image, know common symbols, can identify the meaning of common words or phrases, and can grasp common literary or cultural references. To be culturally literate and understand the history, biography, references, and symbols, one must interact with the culture.

Knowledge of a prescribed canon of facts and ideas is not adequate; rather, an individual becomes more culturally literate when engaging with others in the culture and reflecting upon ideas of expression, experience, and connections that many in the culture share. To be culturally literate necessitates familiarity with foundational general knowledge and assumes the use of that information in the creation of a common language and collective awareness of the world. When people know about and appreciate culture and history, their own and others, this cultural literacy impacts behaviors and beliefs in a multicultural world.

E. D. Hirsch Jr. wrote that Americans needed a body of common knowledge to understand and communicate with each other. This common knowledge would allow them to perform as fully formed citizens in a democracy. His writing on critical literacy is founded on the idea that a literate society depends upon shared information, and that schooling students to have a common core of information would ultimately create a more informed and active society. The contextualization of a shared history gives students a place to learn facts about a common culture. Hirsh thought that knowing words depends on knowing cultural realities and the experiences to which the words refer. By having a common core of knowledge, people can understand the symbols, references, and contexts as they try to communicate with one another.

Why Care About Cultural Literacy?

Having a core of information to refer to helps people think, reason, and problem-solve in real time. Instead of having to try to understand the nuances of an example, the individual can work on creating a solution to the problem. It is hard to solve problems, whether they are posed on a test or experienced in daily life, if one does not have some information that one can draw on to understand the issue. Having some baseline information about the dominant culture in which one lives, whether one is part of that culture or not, is useful to navigating society. A person's comprehension of information, whether written, visual, or auditory, directly depends on whether or not the individual has relevant knowledge of the subject at their direct disposal.

For example, if one is having a conversation with coworkers about last night's major televised sporting event, even if one does not follow the teams or even the sport discussed, having basic knowledge of the rules of the game and the interest level of the coworkers would help one to navigate the shared conversation. Similarly, if one is reading an article and someone is described as "quixotic," one would benefit from having some knowledge of the 1605 novel by Miguel de Cervantes, Don Quixote. Knowing something of the main character of that novel will help one contextualize the description of another person as "quixotic." In this way, cultural literacy assumes a common reader. A common reader is someone who is literate and shares a common set of knowledge and relevant associations with the writer. In this way, the person who describes a character as "quixotic" assumes that whoever is reading their work will have some connection to the novel Don Quixote, even if they have not read the book. If the reader and writer do not share the common link of Don Quixote, some of the nuance and context of the writing may be lost.

What Does Cultural Literacy Do?

Cultural literacy provides a foundation for common knowledge. When interacting with others, writing for an unseen audience, or meeting new people, having a common base of knowledge provides shortcuts to mutual understanding. Being culturally literate offers a way for individuals to deal with technological society. People must know how to interact with each other in person, but also online, through e-mail, and when videoconferencing. Mores, customs, and values often do not change as fast as technology, so one must employ cultural literacy to adapt to change. Cultural literacy is important in communication. Whether in person or using technology to communicate, one must be aware that people use more than words to express themselves and understand others. Being able to connect to common history, symbols, and ideas can enhance communication with others. Being culturally literate, in the most basic sense, allows one to more fully participate in public life. When people try to understand each other, they can come together to know the world much better.

Criticisms of Cultural Literacy

There are criticisms of Hirsh's view of cultural literacy. The foundation of his writings on cultural literacy relies on everyone learning discreet facts out of context. There are some that call this indoctrination, instead of literacy. Literacy is not achieved by listing facts. Rather, people need to be able to place ideas and facts in the context of their lived experiences. Learning is also about more than learning facts, but people learn as they experience the world and reflect on it. When cultural literacy is determined or evaluated more on what facts people know, rather than how they integrate facts into their lives, then the decontexualization of knowledge is centered, as opposed to really making connections with the people.

There are also questions about what decisions are made for inclusion into common core knowledge. One must ask questions about who decides what form of knowledge, culture, history, authority, and point of view is deemed normative. One must understand who will compile and teach this information, and be wary of a canon that tries to speak for all, but in reality merely replicates ideas of those in power. When one is not critical of where information comes from, one tends to obscure the ways that the power of making something normal hides the ways that it perpetuates racism and sexism. By forcing knowledge to comply to a seemingly value-neutral idea of common knowledge, the information is laden with what the dominant culture values, to the detriment of the diversity, creativity, and different ways of knowing that those who are different from oneself offer.

Sarah E. Colonna
University of North Carolina at Greensboro

See Also: Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Humility, Model of; Cultural Paradigms; Ethnic Diversity and Values.

Further Readings

Murray, Denise E. Diversity as Resource: Redefining Cultural Literacy. Alexandria, VA: Teachers of English to Speakers of Other Languages, 1992.
Schweizer, Bernard. "Cultural Literacy: Is it Time to Revisit the Debate?" Thought & Action, v.25 (2009).
Sperry, L. "Cultural Competence: Primer." Journal of Individual Psychology, v.68/4 (2012).

Cultural Paradigms

Cultural paradigms are the all-embracing ways of life whereby communities are given shape. At the same time, these paradigms remain fluid enough to allow for diffusion and penetration of the "other," and even pollination by the other, or affinity to relate. Thus, individuals can experience the collective validation of living and thinking within a paradigm that is also embraced as truth by others, while contributing to the evolution and expansion of this description of truth. Once one understands how the other defines truth, and why the other defines it that way (e.g., what are their underlying cultural values), then one can communicate in a way that is understood by the other and understand the communication of the other, so that the communication loop is completed. At this point, true cross-disciplinary communication between diverse paradigms of defining truth (e.g., scientific and religious) can be initiated. Then one can dialogue from a place of building bridges, rather than walls, and grow in a mutually interactive expansion of understanding of truth. Through interdisciplinary education and research-based knowledge, with a focus on critical thinking, students learn about the history of human services, unique characteristics of human service populations, the diverse needs of clients, and ethical considerations for providing services. Skill development centers on unconditional positive regard, genuineness, reflection, perseverance, compassion, and empathic understanding.

Understanding Cultural Paradigms in Human Services

As a result of the diversity issues within human services, human service educators develop and demonstrate culturally sensitive knowledge, awareness, and teaching methodology; and human service professionals advocate for the rights of all members of society, particularly those who are members of minorities and groups and have experienced discriminatory practices. Furthermore, human service professionals are expected to provide services without discrimination or preference based on age, ethnicity, culture, race, disability, gender, religion, sexual orientation, or socioeconomic status; human service professionals are knowledgeable about the cultures and communities within which they practice. They are aware of multiculturalism in society, and its impact on the community, as well as individuals within the community. They respect individuals and groups, their cultures and beliefs. In addition, human service professionals are expected to be aware of their personal cultural backgrounds, beliefs, and values, recognizing the potential for impact on their relationships with others. Last, human service professionals are aware of sociopolitical issues that differentially affect clients from diverse backgrounds, and they seek the training, experience, education, and supervision necessary to ensure their effectiveness in working with culturally diverse clients.

The field in health care of human services encourages its practitioners to know the cultures of the multicultural client population that they are serving in the United States. The premise behind this injunction is that the use of culturally sensitive techniques that are tailored to the cultural background of the client will result in effective therapy and produce positive outcomes. However, as reflected in the plethora of terms used to describe the application of this knowledge, it is not made explicit why culture would make a difference in therapy, or how it makes a difference in the ultimate outcome. Humans have three basic needs: safety and security, integrity, and a sense of belonging. Yet, each culture uniquely frames each of these needs, and prescribes the sanctioned means to achieve them. In the struggle to define culturally competent or culturally based care, this fundamental aspect is often overlooked. Instead, the Western worldview, structure, and definitions are used as the template to assess dysfunction, diagnose a disorder, and prescribe appropriate care. The theoretical underpinnings of indigenous concepts of self and symbolic interactionism are needed to clarify these cultural misconceptions and construct a new paradigm for providing effective and acceptable care.

Cultural Paradigm Shifts

Max Weber argued that ideas and values are crucial to shaping human action, and thereby bring about change. In contrast, Émile Durkheim argued that changing ideas and values are the product of social change. In other words, make a social change happen, and eventually ideas and values will change to match. Both of these are true. To purposefully hasten the kind of upheaval shift required both approaches. Constructive programs primarily work by processes of education and making gradual changes in existing institutions. They engage in endeavors that teach, apply, and spread new ideas and values suitable to creating and sustaining the new future that these activists are working to create. Obstructive programs aggressively work to directly change behavior, usually through changing laws, and once the behavior is changed, society at large eventually comes to accept and embrace the values lying behind the laws until a worldview that reflects those values becomes the working paradigm, accepted by virtually everyone without thought.

Tactics of the former activists are thought of as “good works” (constructive programs), and the tactics of the latter as “nonviolent persuasion” (obstructive programs). The bigger the evil to be rooted out, the greater the difficulty in shifting the underlying paradigm. For example, in the case of segregation by race or class, at some point the paradigm that some people are inferior to others must be replaced by the paradigm that says that all men and women are created equal. Laws can be made that require equal treatment because at least a few people have decided that the old paradigm is no longer valid or acceptable. It may be, however, a very long time before the majority of people accept as truth the new paradigm, that all are of equal worth. Nevertheless, a great many people who may still be a minority believe, and act on their belief, that working for a change they desire is a worthy and worthwhile goal.

Cultural Paradigm Shifts Take Time

For example, to end the practice of foot-binding in China, a deeply embedded practice of nearly 1,000 years, it was necessary to outlaw it, and then work to change the underlying Chinese concept of what makes a woman beautiful. In 1911, the New Republic of China government outlawed foot binding. Although practiced in secret for a time, it is now defunct. The behavior of 1,000 years changed in less than 100 years. In another example, if women are granted equality to men, it is necessary to change the underlying paradigm of belief that women are created as a second thought or to be the helpers of men, not creatures different from but of value equal to men. In many countries, laws were made that grant rights to women, and as women achieve education and take places as equals in various spheres of achievement, the underlying paradigm of female inferiority is slowly shifting, from a global perspective unevenly, but with increasing speed. For example, it was only roughly 100 years ago that women began to secure the right to vote, and women are now heads of nongovernmental organizations, corporations, and governments.

One of the most impressive cultural change projects was the Christianization, by the Catholic Church and others, of most of Latin America, often in less than one generation. Although many elements of traditional beliefs have persisted in some places to the present day, many long-practiced behaviors changed. For instance, clothing that was more modest was adopted. Taking multiple wives was eliminated. Where it had been practiced before, head-hunting ceased as the new value system spread. In short, people are not passive victims of culture and circumstance, unable to plan and guide a social upheaval great enough to move history toward something grand as opposed to brutal. Likewise, one cannot claim to be too busy, or that change would take many centuries, too much time to merit investment in the effort when there are so many pressing problems.

Under the right conditions, cultural transformation can be stunningly swift. The process of relatively rapid, purposeful change (as opposed to change by the slow, hidden hand described by Adam Smith, or from blind, long-term, underlying social trends) typically has two phases: First, change the behavior itself, usually through changed or new laws, although sometimes in the past it has been at the tip of a sword; and then if conditions (social, economic, ecological) are favorable and all goes well, continued education and experience of the new way of living results, over time, in a shift in paradigm.

Tamikia S. Lott
Old Dominion University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Services; Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of; Culturally Specific Services.

Further Readings

Diller, Jerry V. Cultural Diversity: A Primer for the Human Services. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cool, 2011.
Hand, J. “A Cultural Paradigm Shift—Swift and Enduring” (2011). http://afww.wordpress.com/2011/07/13/a-cultural-paradigm-shift-swift-and-enduring (Accessed October 2013).
Moule, Jean. Cultural Competence: A Primer for Educators. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2012.

Cultural Services

Cultural services consist of a wide range of activities that offer benefits through practicing or reflecting on way-of-life and historical traditions that contribute to the building, sustainability, improvement, and positive growth of people and civilization. The nonmaterial individual, personal, and collective benefits associated with cultural services include enjoyment, pleasure, satisfaction, renewal, regeneration, social cohesion, increased social capital, and a heightened sense of belonging and well-being. The nonmaterial nature of the benefits derived from cultural services creates challenges in quantifying their value and consequently difficulties in measuring their real value. Cultural services are designed to promote, share, and integrate the music, art and design, dance, spiritual practices, religious ceremonies, history, and clothing of ancient civilizations into personal lives through ecosystems, educational experiences, spirituality, rituals, social interactions, art, and entertainment. For example, when one visits a mountainous region and stops to gaze at the boundless beauty of the landscape and contemplate the mightiness and majesty of the height of the mountaintops, one derives and enjoys a sense of the awesomeness of the environment.

Cultural services increase the growth of knowledge and distribution of ideas. The benefits associated with practicing and experiencing traditional activities directly flow from the values, beliefs, and practices of traditional civilizations as they interact with nature. This interaction with nature generates creative reproductions and re-creations of the experience replayed throughout life in various forms including art, architecture, spiritual practices, and ritualized ceremonies. The impact of social participation in cultural activities by individuals spurs the emergence of intended and unintended gains.

Historical, Conceptual, and Organizational Origin of Cultural Services

For centuries, cultural services have been an essential and elemental part of the lives of the people who live in close relationship with nature. Many first nation or aboriginal groups connected their concepts of religion, spirituality, and cosmogony directly to Earth and nature. Ceremonial and worship practices evolved along with the designation of sacred ritual locations. The act of creating and maintaining sacred space represents mankind's oldest form of conservation. Tribes and nations consciously and collectively decided to create and dedicate sacred spaces to worship, praise, contemplate, meditate, sacrifice, dance, sing, chant, heal, and commune. The decision to select and set aside particular spaces, sites, and locations as sacred came with the responsibility to honor, preserve, and protect not only the sites, but also the rituals, spiritual practices, and other cultural behaviors such as dancing, dress, recitations, and music.

Historically, cultural services have been important to people who live in distant places, away from intact natural locations. Additional interest has heightened as groups of people have developed at different paces and in different ways. Some ethnic groups have managed to maintain their cultural practices for hundreds of years, whereas other groups have culturally transformed and assimilated into more modern and integrated cultures. Similarly, some groups have maintained their sacred spaces, whereas others have transformed their ancient spaces into urban or suburban spaces in response to the movement of people across the world, industrialization, and subsequent urbanization.

Curiosity, enjoyment, adventure, and appreciation of diversity motivate hundreds of thousands of individuals to travel the world as explorers, tourists, historians, educators, artists, and scientists. This is the origin and cause for the development of cultural tourism. As local communities realized the economic viability and market value of their natural resources, sacred locations, ritual practices, and arts to outsiders, they developed policies, practices, and programs to preserve, present, and share the benefits of their cultural services.

Education and Training in the Cultural Services Industry

Cultural services professionals are educated and trained both formally in colleges and universities, and informally in community settings. Community settings can be containers, reflecting their cultural heritage. Mainstream educational programs focus on preparing cultural services professionals for the world of work. Higher education institutions have designed and developed curricula to prepare professionals for successful employment in numerous segments of the cultural services industry, including ecosystems, ecotourism, tourism, political science, environmental sciences, chemistry, medicine, physics, biology, theater arts, visual arts, performance arts, museum administration, and docent professions. Cultural services education and training varies by program focus and specialization. While some programs promote a tightly focused topical curriculum, others insist on the importance of an eclectic knowledge base to insure well-rounded practitioners. On the other hand, programs that teach the usefulness of the application of individual elements from a variety of fields emphasize the systems approach to understanding the interconnectedness and interrelatedness of the environment in cultural services.

Educational and training programs with sharply focused areas of specialization produce cultural services professionals with much knowledge and skill, who are capable of providing in-depth knowledge on particular topics and performing specific tasks related to cultural services. Educational specialization in cultural services allows a student to become very good at a particular work task. An advantage of specialization is that a selective task or a small group of selective small group tasks can be done very well and quickly. A disadvantage of specialization is that workers end up with very specific skills that cannot be applied to other aspects of the cultural services.

The education and training of cultural services leaders in communities begins in the homes of families and expands to the larger setting of the community through age-old rituals, ceremonies, and practices. Community settings often reflect the rich cultural heritage of their inhabitants. These settings are natural learning centers and provide fertile ground for learning the details of cultural processes, structures, experiences, and cultural practices. Artifacts, art, jewelry, and ordinary implements such as furniture and utensils serve not only as usable instruments, but they also represent symbols with special meanings and significance. In the community, music, dances, and ceremonies are vehicles to carry the messages, lessons, beliefs, and values shared by all community members.

Cultural services are rendered by the individuals designated by group authorities, usually descending from a family recognized and respected by the community as having a long history specializing in cultural services knowledge.

Cultural Services and Ecosystems

The concept of cultural services is designed to provide a structure for grasping human benefits from complex exchanges between nature and the subsequent social, economic, and environmental changes that occur. One of several broad categories of ecosystems, cultural services results in both spiritual and recreational benefits through inspiration, discovery, mental growth, and artistic experience. Cultural ecosystems services contribute to the broader needs and wishes of society, and therefore to people's willingness to financially support conservation. This includes the spiritual significance and importance connected to specific ecosystems, such as sacred grounds, as well as the inherent beauty of panoramic countryside or coastal formations that attract visitors. In addition, nature directly contributes to improving the quality of life through cultural services and ecotourism.

Cultural Services Recreation, Entertainment, and Education

Cultural services are provided by the cultural services industry, consisting of public and private institutions (e.g., government agencies, nonprofits, community-based organizations, faith-based institutions, corporations, and international groups). Cultural services in the context of recreation, entertainment, and education take many different forms, such as visits to museums, historical sites, attendance at concerts, and festivals (e.g., dance, music, crafts, pottery, graphic arts, media arts, and food). Examples of cultural services recreation, entertainment, and education include the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival and jazz festivals in other cities; Lollapalooza; World Championship BBQ contest; DanceAfrica, Choctaw Annual Pow Wow, blues Festivals, Puerto Rican, Italian, Polish, and other national and ethnic festivals; dude ranches and cowboy ranch camps, farm camps, Kingdom of Oyotunji African Village; and film and video arts.

Jerry Watson
University of Mississippi

See Also: Cultural Broker; Cultural Capital, Role of; Cultural Literacy; Cultural Paradigms.

Further Readings

Milcu, A., J. Ioana, D. Hanspach, D. Abson, and J. Fischer. "Cultural Ecosystem Services: A Literature Review and Prospects for Future Research." Ecology and Society, v.18/3 (2013).

Reid, Walter V., et al. Ecosystems and Human Well-Being: Synthesis. Washington, DC: Island Press, 2005.
Tengberg, A., I. Fredholm, I. Eliasson, I. Knez, K. Saltzman, and O. Wetterberg. "Cultural Ecosystem Services Provided by Landscapes: Assessment of Heritage Values and Identity." Ecosystems Services, v.2 (2012).

Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of

Culturally diverse practices are all encompassing, and include cultural awareness, cultural responsiveness, and the respect for cultural differences. With varied diversity becoming a norm in U.S. society and the workplace, an understanding of how to practice with intentionality is imperative. It is necessary to understand cultural proficiency when considering culturally diverse practice. Cultural competence is the ability to function within, or for a culture or cultural practice to effectively meet, the needs of those in the workplace and social environment. In doing so, the culturally diverse practices are delivered with regard to equity and respect for cultural beliefs, behaviors, and practices. Working toward cultural competence into cultural proficiency, the latter provides an organization with behaviors that are not only identified and implemented in practice, but also leads to positive experiences for the diverse population involved.

As part of the critical research surrounding cultural responsiveness, Geneva Gay and Gloria Ladson-Billings identify key components of culturally responsive practice in the educational setting. Culturally responsive teachers have an intentional focus on the learning needs of students, and in that intentionality also include and maintain a cultural consciousness. Geneva Gay also asserts that teachers in a culturally responsive setting work to engage students in a diverse curriculum with a breadth and depth of knowledge of the students' culture within the classroom. Similar modifications could positively impact the work or service setting by implementing culturally relevant client standards throughout individual care, organization branding, and communication.

Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Practice

Reaching optimal cultural proficiency is not possible without a component of linguistically diverse practice. Linguistic diversity is ever-changing and reliant on the population of clients, customers, or individuals served within the organization. The United States has recently experienced a 140 percent increase in the nation's linguistic diversity over a 30-year period, according to the U.S. Census Bureau's 2010 report. The 2007 U.S. Census reported that "of 281 million people over 5 years old, 20 percent (55.4 million) speak another language than English in the home." Understanding the population and creating measures of communication is one of the most important steps in reaching linguistically diverse populations.

In one study, researchers reported on cross-cultural communication and culturally competent care and shared the story regarding practices at a hospital where a linguistically diverse patient checked into the hospital to be treated for stomach pain. Because the hospital did not understand the patient's language, and the patient chanted ritualistic sayings, the hospital admitted her to the mental health ward.

This kind of practice is also quite typical in urban school settings, where there are large migrant populations that the school districts are not ready to service. Often, students from linguistically diverse backgrounds are placed in classes that are below their level of academic understanding because the districts do not know how to identify the students' academic ability with regard to their language ability. Noting the reality of the differences in these backgrounds within the educational setting can help transcend thinking and practice in other work settings.

Organizations can put efforts in place to adopt communication strategies that help remove some of the barriers associated with linguistic diversity. They can create visual aids using symbols and pictures, employ a translator for the most prevalent linguistically diverse group, use culturally proficient body language and appropriate nonverbal cues, provide written materials for the linguistically diverse group, seek community support through volunteerism utilizing religious organizations and cultural entities, and employ service staff who understand cultural sensitivity and create a welcoming environment for those served.

Existing Barriers in Achieving Culturally Diverse Practice

Because the U.S. population has become so diverse and has experienced monumental gains in history based on racial and ethnic diversity, more people are in denial about bias and prejudice. By understanding that racism still exists within organizations and the workplace, the first barrier to overcome is denial. The ability to systemically or incrementally overcome resistance to changes can be daunting. To truly overcome barriers to achieve cultural proficiency, the organization has to recognize the internal and external barriers. When these barriers are in place, the individuals are not recognized within their culture, employees or supervisors may create an environment of superiority, and a negative culture within the organization could be prevalent.

The realities of such barriers are felt by those who are, in most cases, the minority within the organization. The National Institute of Mental Health, Child and Adolescent Service System funded a monograph to address the needs of a culturally competent system of care. One of the recommendations was when attempting to reach cultural proficiency, the ideal set of practices would encompass analogous "behaviors, attitudes, and policies that come together in a system, agency, or among professionals" to impact positive change. By ensuring a practice that delivers these beliefs with buy-in from constituents, those previously listed barriers can be overcome.

Understanding the dynamics of cultural differences can be daunting to some. However, when the organization, institution, or individual moves to a more culturally proficient environment, all parties feel recognized and appreciated for those differences. In order to ideally reach this level of proficiency, organizations should maintain a work environment employing individuals who understand their self-identity and seek out ways to enhance the community with a commitment to meeting the needs of a multicultural environment.

It is important to work within the organization to determine the cultural understanding of staff members. Organizations should identify areas of cultural misunderstanding and bias through staff-wide professional development; seek to understand and incorporate the voices of the community that the organization serves; involve community members through intentional regard to cultural beliefs, practices, and needs; implement a culturally relevant system of operations; develop a task force or small group within the organization to help assess the needs of the prevalent cultures served; involve all stakeholders in developing a shared vision, which is inclusive and respectful of all cultures; and finally, monitor and evaluate best practices and work to strengthen areas for improvement.

Allyson L. Watson
Northeastern State University

See Also: Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cultural and Linguistically Appropriate Services; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and.

Further Readings

Culp, Brian and Jepkorir R. Chepyator-Thomson. "Examining the Culturally Responsive Practices of Urban Primary Physical Educators." Physical Educator, v.68/4 (2011).

El-Amouri, Souher and Shirley O'Neill. "Supporting Cross-Cultural Communication and Culturally Competent Care in the Linguistically and Culturally Diverse Hospital Settings of UAE." Contemporary Nurse: A Journal for the Australian Nursing Profession, v.39/2 (2011).

Yeboah, C., Barbara Bowers, and C. Rolls. "Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Older Adults Relocating to Residential Aged Care." Contemporary Nurse: A Journal for the Australian Nursing Profession, v.44/1 (2013).

Culturally Diverse Practice, Theories of

Theories of culturally diverse practice purport that behavior patterns of differing peoples are regulated and impacted by different cultural values, beliefs, and practices. Generally, a practice is a patterned or routinized way in which problems are handled, things are described, objects or bodies are moved, subjects are treated, and the world is understood. The theoretical framework of practice is contingent on the notion of cultural diversity, indicating the variety of human societies or cultures in a specific region, and the world as a whole. Cultural diversity refers to the differences that make each person or group unique when compared with other persons or groups. Cultural diversity has also been defined as the representation of people with distinctly different group affiliations of cultural significance. Cultural diversity is an expanding social phenomenon in an unprecedented era of globalization, migration, population transfer, and the increasing diversification of population and identity patterns within traditionally homogeneous groups. The challenges of the globalizing and globalized world necessitate viewing cultural diversity as essential to theoretical and clinical formulations.

According to theories of cultural diversity, diversity can be classified into two dimensions, primary and secondary. The primary dimension of diversity includes age, gender, ethnicity, physical features, race, and sexual orientation. These primary dimensions are unchangeable and play a crucial role in shaping individuals' basic self-images and worldviews. They also exert an important impact, not only on individuals' early socialization, but also on the other stages of their lives. Secondary dimensions of diversity, viewed as changeable, include educational background, income or socioeconomic status, marital status, parental status, and religious beliefs.

For example, factors such as socioeconomic status, familial interdependence, level of education or acculturation, language, immigration status, and fear of stigma in response to a disease or physical disability may influence clients' experiences and practitioners' practices related to human services. Another factor, and one that can result in a gap between the ideal and the real in human services, is the fear of the differences of others. Likewise, human service professionals are challenged by human fears of differences, and if not well trained in culturally diverse practices, are susceptible to operating from a model of exclusion, rather than inclusion.

Diversity

Within this context, diversity can be viewed as that which distinguishes one group of people from another along primary and secondary dimensions. Although practitioners mainly think of human diversity in terms of the primary dimensions of age, gender, race, sex, and ethnicity, in scholarly literature, heterogeneity and diversity often embrace a very broad spectrum of individual differences. Many scholars advocating theories of culturally diverse practice have used the broad secondary dimensions of diversity to demonstrate the effects of cultural diversity and human heterogeneity on work-group and organizational performance. Further, many core assumptions about diversity in the workplace are drawn from research in which diversity is very broadly defined. When a new idea or practice is experienced by members of a cultural group, people tend to interpret it in the context of their common worldviews. The client's perceptions of a health issue or condition, for instance, may differ from those practicing Western medicine.

The term diversity is considered practical shorthand within the practice approach for dealing with a demographic mix of people. A culturally diverse practice is regulated within a system approach, indicating the process for considering how different parts of the whole structure influence and integrate with each other in such a way that problems in a system are viewed as affecting the system as a whole. The system approach relies on an interprofessional or multidisciplinary team, which is considered critical to all models of systematically organized practice in social services, emphasizing that the whole is enriched by the differences of its component parts.

Within the context of human services, cultural diversity is viewed as encompassing both clients and practitioners. Diversity fosters a milieu where all employees, each with specialized professional skills, have the opportunity to recognize their full potential through collaborating with each other. Culturally diverse practices bring together persons of many backgrounds and cultures, whose perspectives on work relations and client-provider relations may significantly differ. Although there is ideological diversity within an agency or profession, good practitioners continue to be guided by a belief in the dignity and worth of all persons. Despite the importance of agencies in managing human services, the genuine service delivered by a social practitioner is a professional social work service, rather than the service of a particular agency. A practitioner or clinician is held accountable for his ethical code of conduct, which states that he undertakes his professional practice in dealing with clients without prejudice or use of stereotypes. Such stereotypes may lead to errors in judgment about clients or cultural groups. Institutions dealing with human services are keen to provide experiences that highlight differences in clients or populations served, as well as differences in practitioners or team members.

Effective Management

There are some misconceptions in dealing with certain problems related to human services. Inadequate social measures and arrangements may be responsible for many of the problematic situations that are understood or defined as products of those who suffer from them. For example, racism is not created by people of color. Although the United States is proud of being a nation of immigrants, not all races, ethnicities, and nationalities are accepted with equally open arms. The highest-risk groups are members of ethnic or minority groups, older adults, and those with limited education. It is unfortunate that some providers treat all older adults the same way. Another example is that because families of color are often stereotyped in the United States as being close-knit and supportive of their kin, social service agencies may not take the time to assess the actual needs of this population. This assumption may lead to less allocation of resources, manpower, and finances for outreach to those communities. In addition, providers may not be knowledgeable about or sensitive to internal variation between different ethnic sub-groups or differences in belief systems of clients. Therefore, professionals' disregard for client heterogeneity is not considered a professional practice.

In terms of the professional practice of practitioners, cultural diversity requires that organizations have a defined set of values and principles and demonstrate behaviors, attitudes, and structures that enable them to effectively work cross-culturally. This means that they must have the capacity to appreciate diversity, conduct self-assessment, manage the dynamics of difference, institutionalize and implement cultural knowledge, and adapt to diversity and the cultural contexts of the clients or communities they serve. They should incorporate these factors in all domains of practice, policy making, administration, and service delivery, and systematically engage clients or consumers, key stakeholders, and communities.

The most important advice offered to practitioners dealing with culturally diverse practices is to manage diversity. Culturally diverse practices effectively operate in the context of strong antidiscrimination environments. The idea is that encouraging an environment of cultural diversity, where peoples' differences are valued, enables practitioners to work to their full potential in a richer and more productive work environment. An advantage of diversity management is said to be its more positive approach. For instance, practitioners with expertise in the care practice of culturally diverse clients can raise awareness and educate other human service providers and staff of community organizations about factors that may interfere with the delivery of mental and behavioral health services to diverse groups of caregivers.

Skills for effective practice in culturally diverse communities include understanding other disciplines' domains of expertise and principles; recognizing and accepting clients' cultural styles; identifying common ground among diverse groups to unite team members; acquiring basic group collaboration skills including communication, negotiation, and time management; learning to communicate in a common language; defining individual roles and processes; applying conflict-resolution techniques; and creating and maintaining shared principles.

el-Sayed el-Aswad
United Arab Emirates University

See Also: Cultural Services; Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of; Culturally Specific Services.

Further Readings

Dreachslin, Janice L., M. Jean Gilbert, and Beverly Malone. Diversity and Cultural Competence in Health Care: A Systems Approach. Somerset, NJ: Wiley, 2012.

Dulmus, Catherine N., Karen M. Sowers, and Bruce A. Thyer. Human Behavior in the Social Environment: Theories for Social Work Practice. Somerset, NJ: Wiley, 2012.

Mazur, Barbara. "Cultural Diversity in Organisational Theory and Practice." Journal of Intercultural Management, v.2/2 (2010).

Culturally Specific Services

To help overcome the barriers that immigrants and refugees face in utilizing mainstream human services, ethnic populations have developed culturally specific services within their communities to meet the needs of their members. Also known as ethnic-specific services, culturally specific services are human services supported and provided for and by a specific ethnic group within its community, integrating ethnic content and ideology, with a focus on strengthening the family. The formation of culturally specific services in ethnic communities is based on geographic and ethnic identity boundaries. The communities tend to have high concentrations of first-generation, non-English-speaking, working-class immigrants within a small geographical area, known as an ethnic enclave. Living in close geographic proximity has traditionally facilitated the development and maintenance of social networks among immigrants in urban areas. Differences in culture and language between country of origin and host country may constitute initial barriers for new immigrants to participate in mainstream society.

Historically, immigrant ethnic groups have created mutual aid societies to provide service interventions that are not accessible through mainstream agencies. Factors related to immigrant-oriented services formation include (1) a large and growing immigrant population, (2) an immigrant population develops needs not adequately addressed by existing services, (3) a community member with social service experience founds an organization, (4) connections to a larger social service delivery systems exist, and (5) the resources and capacity-building exist to sustain the organization. Historically, organizations providing culturally specific services grew incrementally by adding components when resources became available. Culturally specific services currently exist alongside mainstream traditional agencies as parallel service delivery systems.

Structure and Services

Culturally specific services are delivered through various types of structures, including stand-alone 501(c)(3) nonprofits, 501(c)(3) nonprofits supported by a mainstream agency, programs within a mainstream 501(c)(3) nonprofit specifically targeting an ethnic group, government programs that specifically target an ethnic group, and faith-based entities. The type of services offered by culturally oriented organizations depends on the ethnic community's need, but is also influenced by the founders' experiences and motivation. This need is often determined by talking with community members to understand their needs, as well as through research, such as census data or a formal needs assessment. The services offered are intended to enable the social and economic integration of immigrants. The entities may also engage in organizing and participating in advocacy activities directed toward addressing policy issues, gaining or improving access to political institutions, and developing new discourses for understanding the unique conditions faced by immigrants. At the same time, these entities work to retain the customs and service delivery styles of the countries of origin. Specific services include educational programs, health care, housing assistance, job training, arts and cultural programming, recreational activities, and emergency services.

A characteristic unique to culturally specific service providers is that they often hold an insider doctrine belief that, "You have to be one to understand one." This belief encompasses not only individuals who staff ethnic agencies, but also extends to those who found them. Employing bicultural and bilingual staff helps the agency relate to clients, advocate on clients' behalf, promote trust, enhance participation and cooperation, and recruit volunteers. However, because of a lack of ethnic human service personnel and/or funding to hire bicultural/bilingual human services professionals, culturally specific programs/agencies may need to rely on paraprofessionals for service delivery. The use of paraprofessionals has been criticized because they may be minimally trained, they may be former clients who still need services themselves, they may overidentify with clients, and they may not hold to professional confidentiality standards.

Efficacy

Research on culturally specific services is fairly recent, with the majority focused on Asian Americans and mental health. Initial research indicates that benefits exist for ethnic groups in human service access and use. The presence of culturally specific services can increase an ethnic community's ability to respond to the needs of the community. Many immigrant-oriented organizations provide comprehensive human services and fill an important gap within the service delivery system for ethnic minority communities. For Asian Americans, culturally specific services have generally been better received than mainstream services. When both are available, Asian Americans have been found to use culturally specific over mainstream public-sector services. The social aspects of culturally specific services increase likelihood of participation. Studies have found that culturally specific services in a counseling center reduced service inequities for Asian Americans. In comparison studies with mainstream services on mental health, Asian American clients using culturally specific services reflect an increase in service use, higher return rates, and shorter delays in seeking treatment. The research on outcome measures related to culturally specific mental health programs has been mixed. Common concerns are that several studies use a common database, cross-cultural validity may be compromised, and they may be insensitive to ethnic differences. Additionally, many of the programs and interventions on which they were built do not appear to have been rigorously evaluated.

The use of culturally specific interventions has been suggested in order to address human immunodeficiency virus and acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) in the African American community. There also exists a general need for culturally specific addiction recovery programs; specifically, substance abuse prevention programs relevant to the African American community. Research with African American clients has focused on the variable of ethnic matching within ethnic-specific mental health services, wherein results have been inconsistent. Preliminary research also indicates that ethnic-specific alternative medicine modalities exist among diverse populations.

The recent development of the culturally sensitive approach has the goal of creating or re-creating programs and organizations that will be more culturally responsive to minority groups. As the population of the United States continues to diversify and the immigrant population continues to increase, the need for culturally sensitive social service interventions will continue to grow. As a result, mainstream entities and ethnic community members may strive to develop a pluralistic model of service delivery. To work with culturally specific programs and agencies, human services professionals may need to consider the important role that these programs/agencies play in providing effective services to local ethnic communities. Practitioners may also examine how to partner with culturally specific programs/agencies to better serve the growing ethnic and racial minority populations.

Suzie S. Weng
University of North Florida
Dalia El-Khoury
Virginia Commonwealth University

See Also: Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of; Help-Seeking Behavior, Cultural Differences in; Service Providers and Diversity.

Further Readings

Dulmus, Catherine N., Karen M. Sowers, and Bruce A. Thyer. Human Behavior in the Social Environment: Theories for Social Work Practice. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2012.

Iglehart, Alfreda P. and Rosina M. Becerra. Social Services and the Ethnic Community: History and Analysis, 2nd ed. Long Grove, IL: Waveland Press, 2011.

Jenkins, Shirley. "The Ethnic Agency Defined." Social Service Review, v.54 (1980).

D

Daniel Memorial Institute Independent Living Skills System

The Daniel Memorial Institute Independent Living Skills System (DMA) is a measure of independent living skills and one of the most widely used instruments in the United States foster care system. Independent living programs across many states and Canada use this measure as their main strategy for assessing and teaching independent living skills to youth. This easy-to-use and practical instrument measures and tracks progress across time. However, despite its frequent use in foster care and youth correctional facilities, no presently available published data demonstrate its reliability and validity across various populations.

Development of the DMA

The Independent Living Skills (ILS) system was originally developed in the 1980s by Daniel Memorial's Independent Living Program staff for use with the youth in their program. Previously, staff would informally assess living skills by observation. However, when attempting to assess hundreds of skills, this task would become burdensome, often taking weeks for assessment. In addition, examiners often would simply ask the youth whether they were competent in a particular skill, which could result in inaccurate assessments when the youth overestimated their abilities. The initial DMA (a list of 231 skills) was developed to assist staff in creating a structured manner of assessing and identifying strengths in independent living skills. Through a grant from the Jessie Ball DuPont Foundation, the ILS software was developed in 1987 and was available nationally. Although the measure was initially developed to primarily target youth in the foster care system, it can also be used with young adults of any age.

Description of the DMA

The DMA is currently in its eighth version. Two different types of assessments were developed: an interview assessment and an objective assessment. The interview has long-form and short-form versions. The long-form interview consists of 231 questions rated as pass or fail by the examiner across 16 categories of independent living, including money management/consumer awareness, food management, personal appearance, health, housekeeping, housing, transportation, educational planning, job-seeking, job maintenance, emergency and safety skills, knowledge of community resources, interpersonal skills, legal skills, religion, and leisure activities. Administration time is approximately one and a half hours for experienced examiners. The short-form interview contains 90 questions in 14 categories (the leisure activities and religion categories are omitted). Administration time for the short-form interview is approximately 30 minutes; the difference between the forms is the level of comprehensiveness.

The objective assessment was developed following patient and professional recommendations. It is a self-administered, multiple-choice measure with four answer options, and ten true/false statements. The objective assessment also has long and short forms, consisting of 231 question and 90 questions, respectively. One of the main benefits of the objective assessment form is that the test can be administered to youth in a group setting, it can be administered over several sessions, and it does not require an examiner to recite the items.

The test developers found the interview format to be more valid than the objective assessment; however, the objective assessment is more reliable than the interview test due to better test-retest reliability of youth's scores across time. It is recommended that, when possible, examiners use the long form of the interview test for a valid and comprehensive assessment. Developers also caution that when using the objective test, youth reading ability and comprehension problems can directly affect the test results, as a sixth-grade reading level is necessary for administration. Both versions of the measure can be scored manually through the use of an answer key or by computer software provided by the developer. When computer scored, the program creates a skill plan, ranging from 15 to 40 pages, recommending goals and strategies for a care provider to address any skill deficits.

Strengths and Weaknesses

As previously stated, the DMA has become one of the most widely used measures of independent living skills. The DMA is easy to use, contains multiple-choice items, and can be completed relatively quickly. The DMA can be used as a pre- and post-intervention assessment tool for program evaluation or effectiveness. However, later literature evaluating the psychometric properties of the DMA revealed that the measure demonstrates weak reliability and validity. Critics have also noted that the measure fails to address other important skills that at-risk populations face, such as mental and physical health, sexual risk-taking and disease prevention, parenting ability, and criminal involvement. An additional criticism is that the measure is not standardized and does not contain a comparison normative group because it was developed to determine knowledge of skills leading to an individualized plan for each youth. The results of this psychometric study suggest that further evaluation and revision of the DMA is needed for it to be considered a valid and reliable measure of a youth's preparedness for successful transition into independent living.

Apryl A. Alexander
Auburn University

See Also: Ansell-Casey Life Skills Assessment; Foster Care Agencies; Life Skills Training.

Further Readings

Daniel Memorial Inc., Institute for Independent Living. Daniel Memorial Independent Living Skills System. Jacksonville, FL: Daniel Memorial Institute for Independent Living, 1994.

Georgiades, S. "Initial Internal Consistency Evidence on the Daniel Memorial Independent Living Assessment: A Research Note." Children and Youth Services Review, v.27/8 (2005).

Hahn, A. "The Use of Assessment Procedures in Foster Care to Evaluate Readiness for Independent Living." Children and Youth Services Review, v.16/3–4 (1994).

Day Care for Children

The first day care facility in the United States was established in Boston in the 1840s. First known as day nurseries, child care began as a by-product of the Industrial Revolution. As American cities experienced rapid population growth through an influx of immigrants as well as laborers from around the country, social reformers became increasingly concerned with the problems associated with the overcrowding of urban areas. Social reformers tackled a variety of welfare issues, many of which pertained to the safety and care of children. As a result of their efforts, child labor laws were passed, settlement houses were founded, playgrounds were built, and day nurseries were established.

During the Progressive era, middle-class and wealthy women spent much of their time in social clubs. These organizations often began with the purpose of attending to social and cultural agendas, but as the problems of the time period became more apparent, many clubs embraced new missions and shifted their focus to service and social change. The plight of unsupervised children on city streets became an issue of grave concern to many women reformers, and they responded by creating day nurseries. The ideological foundation for this early form of day care was one of benevolence. Social reformers saw women's work in the paid labor force as an unfortunate situation and were concerned with the safety of the children mothers left at home. Day nurseries were designed to provide a homelike environment and were focused on improving the lives of needy children and their mothers. This included helping immigrants to assimilate to American culture and educating children and mothers on topics such as nutrition and hygiene. In general, the end of the Progressive era marked the end of day nurseries, which came to be negatively regarded as charity projects and sometimes took on orphanage-like qualities.

Beginning in the early 20th century, as the popularity of day nurseries diminished, nursery schools emerged as a new form of day care for children. Nursery schools were modeled after existing schools with an emphasis on early childhood development. However, nursery schools were neither designed to meet the needs of poor families because parents paid to enroll their children in these programs, nor were they designed to meet the needs of full-time working mothers because the school day was typically only a couple of hours long. Instead, the objective of nursery schools was to help foster the social and emotional development of children through interaction with others in a group care setting. As a result, mothers enjoyed the benefits of a few hours of day care. With the focus on educating children, nursery schools helped destigmatize the practice of enrolling children in group day care programs.

Changes in women's participation in the workplace began in the 1930s, then dramatically increased during World War II, and then continued throughout the women's movement and beyond. These changes have resulted in related changes in the structure and assumptions surrounding day care for children in the United States. During times of crisis, the federal government has also validated the need for day care by subsidizing temporary child care programs.

During the Depression, for example, the federal government established emergency nursery schools. The primary intent of these schools was to provide work opportunities for unemployed teachers, but the service provided by these jobs was child care. Throughout World War II, the Lanham Act helped fund day care for children whose mothers were working in wartime industries. While assisting in legitimizing the value of nonmaternal child care, these efforts offered only short-term solutions. It was not until the Comprehensive Child Development Act of 1971 that the federal government laid out a plan for long-term subsidized child care. However, the plan never came to fruition, as President Richard Nixon unexpectedly vetoed the legislation. Although many may argue that a negative stigma continues to surround the institution of day care, attitudes have shifted from seeing day care as a charitable service for extraordinary circumstances to a normative solution for working parents.

Day Care Today

According to census data, in 2011 more than 60 percent of all children in the United States under the age of 5 years (more than 12 million children) participated in some form of day care. On average, these young children spent 33 hours per week in the care of others, and their parents spent more than $9,000 a year on child care expenses. Today, day care for children takes a variety of forms including care by relatives, in-home babysitters, home day care centers, child care facilities, nursery schools, preschools, Head Start programs, and before-school and after-school enrichment activities (e.g., sports and clubs). One of the newest types of day care to emerge are 24-hour day care centers. These facilities are designed to meet the needs of parents who work nontraditional hours and are in need of evening or overnight child care.

Care by a relative is the most common practice, but approximately one-third of children younger than 5 years of age are cared for during the day by a nonrelative, often in formal day care centers and preschools. Because the majority of the day for children aged 5 to 14 years is spent in school, they are less likely to be enrolled in an organized day care situation; they are most likely to be cared for by a relative such as a grandparent or older sibling. However, 15 percent of school-age children are enrolled in before- and/or after-school enrichment programs, which can serve as day care. Older children increasingly take care of themselves; estimates suggest that more than 4 million school-age children are responsible for self-care.

Research indicates that children who spend time in a high-quality day care setting benefit from a positive impact on cognitive abilities and academic success; they do better in math, language, reading, and other subjects than children who do not attend high-quality day care. However, there is also evidence to suggest a relationship between time spent in day care and behavioral problems in school. Studies indicate that day care effects, both positive and negative, can have long-lasting implications on children's success in school, even in the teen years.

The Future

The future of day care in the United States needs to account for the inequities associated with the current child-care structure. Not all parents have access to affordable, reliable, quality day care for their children. Even though low-income workers may be eligible for financial assistance, many find long wait lists or even a depletion of funds when they apply for child care subsidies. Some low-income parents enroll their children in Head Start and universal prekindergarten programs, but not all programs extend into the summer, and parents with irregular work schedules may face additional obstacles. Moreover, day care, like most care work, is a female-dominated occupation that employs many women of color. It is well documented that these workers, many of whom may need day care for their own children, are among the lowest paid workers in the labor force.

Michelle Napierski-Prancl
Russell Sage College

See Also: After-School Services; Department of Education, U.S.; Early Childhood Development; Early Childhood Literacy; Head Start and Prekindergarten Programs.

Further Readings

Laughlin, Lynda. "Who's Minding the Kids? Child Care Arrangements: Spring 2011." Current Population Reports. Washington, DC: U.S. Census Bureau, 2013.

Rose, Elizabeth. A Mother's Job: The History of Day Care, 1890–1960. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Vandell, Deborah Lowe, et al. "Do Effects of Early Child Care Extend to Age 15 Years? Results From the NICHD Study of Early Child Care and Youth Development." Child Development, v.81/3 (2010).

Day Treatment Centers

Day treatment centers provide nonresidential services to clients. There is a great need for day treatment centers because they provide educational and support services for many of the youths who become involved in the criminal justice system. The services also address the needs of at-risk youth and juvenile and adult offenders to provide support and follow-up services. Because the services are community-based and nonresidential, clients have easy access to the services at a relatively lower cost compared to residential services.

Day treatment centers are facilities that provide structured, comprehensive, holistic services to clients. These services reduce deinstitutionalization among at-risk youths and juvenile offenders. Day treatment centers are classified as alternate or community corrections. The center provides intensive supervision for clients in that they are required to report on a daily basis. The services are somewhat similar to correctional treatment methods offered by some halfway houses. Program staff at these community-based centers will also address issues related to both the home and neighborhood of the clients. These may include home visits, comprehensive counseling, individualized cognitive-behavioral treatment services, and family integration and drug testing. Historically, day treatment centers originated in Great Britain in the 1970s, however to date several treatment centers are in operation in several cities across the United Kingdom, Canada, and the United States.

Role of Day Treatment Centers

The center provides intensive supervision and supervised placement in order to fulfill the court-appointed requirement of mandatory school attendance as part of probation. The center is also a good alternative for clients who have experienced some degree of failure within the regular school setting. Students with positive outcomes may be redirected to their original educational institution, whereas those with negative outcomes may be directed to a residential facility such as foster care or a juvenile facility.

Day treatment centers seek to provide a comprehensive program of academic training, behavior modification, and close supervision and monitoring of its clients. Day treatment programs provide specialized services designed to meet the unique needs of each client and his or her family. Programs seek to provide an effective balance between treatment, education, and sanctions in order to redirect troubled youth and address the special needs of groups such as at-risk youths, ex-offenders, or current offenders. The ultimate goal of a day treatment program is to provide the type of supervision and monitoring that will improve community safety and reduce or prevent future delinquent behavior.

Day treatment programs are usually small and community based. Hours of operation are generally 9 A.M. to 5 P.M., Mondays through Fridays; however, evening and weekend programs are sometimes provided. The average length of stay in the program varies. However, the duration of a treatment program is based on consideration of a number of factors, including the existence of underlying conditions such as mental health illness and/or drug abuse. Treatment during a typical day may include evaluations and testing, physical activity, group therapy, psychoeducational sessions, skill building, individual therapy, and psychopharmacological assessments.

Services Provided by Day Treatment Centers

The services at the day treatment centers are diverse and embrace different conceptual approaches. Some of these approaches include cognitive-behavioral therapy, which addresses anger, mental health, behavior, and substance use treatment needs; motivational enhancement therapy, which addresses substance use treatment needs; aggression replacement training to address anger, skills deficits, and moral reasoning; and motivational interviewing for rapport-building and developing and reinforcing positive change. The different approaches are used to address the differing needs of the clients. The programs may include educational, behavioral, counseling, and recreational services. The program is organized to provide a typical classroom schedule and setting with highly individualized instruction.

The programs may also include individual and group counseling, recreation, education, vocational training, employment counseling, life skills and skills training, substance abuse treatment, and resource referrals. Provision of specialized programs are also available for the treatment of selected conditions such as alcoholism and substance abuse, anorexia and bulimia, depression, bipolar disorder, anxiety disorders, schizophrenia, and other mental illnesses.

The Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration reported in 2007 that approximately 23.2 million Americans, or 9.4 percent of the U.S population, are in need of substance abuse treatment. It also suggested that approximately 7 percent of the clients are juveniles, based on previous treatment records. There are large numbers of treatment facilities in all 50 states and the District of Columbia; these range from private to public nonprofit service agencies. An estimate of the number of treatment facilities based on the National Survey of Substance Abuse Treatment Services facilities in 2011 indicated that approximately 12 percent of facilities offered outpatient day treatment or partial hospitalization services

Although many centers may focus on postadjudicated juvenile delinquents and youths who are at risk for involvement in the criminal justice system, the day treatment centers also accommodate adult ex-offenders. Most of the day treatment centers are similar, but they may also differ based on the target population, entry requirements, services offered, goals of treatment, caseload, and requirements of completion. For example, eligibility may be determined by a number of factors such as seriousness of the current offense, criminal history, and the treatment needs of at-risk and delinquent youth.

Evaluation of Day Treatment Programs

Research reports suggest that although day treatment centers have operated for over 30 years, there is little evidence of adequate program evaluation. The reports that exist primarily address evaluations for adult offenders. Some of the program evaluations show inconsistent results because the reports do not always confirm a consistent contribution to the reduction of recidivism rates for offenders.

Because day treatment centers are primarily used by juveniles, there is a need for more extensive and systematic evaluation of the program impact on juveniles. However, current reports suggest that youths who completed the nonresidential program were less likely to be rearrested, adjudicated, or convicted within 12 months of release compared to youth who completed a residential program. The day treatment center seeks to reduce recidivism and improve prosocial behavior outcomes, particularly among youths.

Day treatment centers are cost-effective because they allow program participants to return home at night; therefore, they do not have the costs associated with residential facilities. Ultimately, a day program will seek to improve community safety and provide a wide range of services to reduce future delinquent behavior, as well as provide intensive supervision and support. Day treatment centers also provide a least restrictive environment program that satisfies both the individual's treatment needs and the needs of the family or community.

Day treatment centers provide interventions for individuals who have been involved in, or who are at risk of, future involvement in the justice system. One of the strengths of the day treatment program is that it reintegrates and supports family life, which can significantly contribute to reducing recidivism. It is important that clients be engaged in the program for an adequate amount of time in order to achieve effective service that will reduce the likelihood of recidivism. It is also important that there be systematic and structured program evaluation so that best practices can be identified. Additionally, day treatment centers have a great potential to be successful because they are multidimensional, and different aspects of the program can be modified in order to address the specific needs of a client.

Fay V. Williams
Northern Caribbean University

See Also: At-Risk Youth Services; Community-Based Services; Juvenile Delinquents; Rehabilitation Centers; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Douglas, J., D. J. Boyle, L. M. Ragusa-Salerno, J. L. Lanterman, and A. F. Marcus. "An Evaluation of Day Reporting Centers for Parolees Outcomes of a Randomized Trial." Criminology & Public Policy, v.12/1 (2013).

Steiner, B. and H. D. Butler. "Why Didn't They Work? Thoughts on the Application of New Therapeutic Communities." Criminology & Public Policy, v.30/2 (2013).

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. "National Survey of Substance Abuse Treatment Services (N-SSATS): 2011. Data on Substance Abuse Treatment Facilities" (2012). http://www.samhsa.gov/data/DASIS/2k11nssats/NSSATS2011Web.pdf (Accessed March 2014).

Deaf/Hard of Hearing

Deafness is one of the most commonly occurring disabilities. Though there is a relatively low incidence in children, its incidence rapidly increases with age. National statistics for the adult U.S. population indicate that approximately 17 percent has some degree of hearing loss, from mild to profound. A population of this size makes it likely that a human service agency, clinic, or program would encounter someone who is deaf or hard of hearing as a client. Additionally, with the overall population aging, there are increasing numbers of individuals who fall into these categories. Given this growing incidence of deafness and hearing loss, it is concerning that current therapeutic approaches in mental health and other areas remain inadequate in serving the needs of deaf and hard of hearing clients, even after decades of activism and demands for change. There is thus a need for a reframing of services that consider both the uniqueness of the needs of this population and the ways that these clients' needs are the same as those of all clients. This reframing can be informed by a service model based on a social justice orientation that assumes that all deaf and hard of hearing clients have a fundamental right to appropriate and informed care. This model can be viewed as an extension of the current emphasis on the need for service providers to be trained in cultural competency.

Cultural competency is a requisite set of beliefs, knowledge, and skills that practitioners should abide by in working with clients of any background (including backgrounds that differ dramatically from their own). Consideration of culturally competent service provision typically focuses on meeting the needs of members of various racial and ethnic groups. However, by extending this model into the realm of services for deaf and hard of hearing people, it is possible to develop a set of guidelines that improve such services in meaningful and transformative ways. This extension is predicated on the view that: members of deaf culture represent a legitimate cultural and linguistic minority group, and disability status represents an individual's membership in an underserved (and often misserved) group.

People who are deaf or hard of hearing vary on dimensions of age of onset of the hearing loss, degree of hearing loss, educational experiences, language skills (both in English and in American Sign Language [ASL]), and cultural identity. Members of deaf culture use ASL as their primary language. Their view of deafness is based not on a lost ability, but instead on a shared language, common experiences in interacting with the hearing majority, and a visual orientation to the world. Deaf culture has norms that are distinctive to the deaf community. Significantly, many do not long to become hearing, but instead prefer their deaf way of being in the world. In contrast, people who are hard of hearing or who become deaf later in life tend to experience their deafness from the perspective of disability. That is, they interpret their status as a deviation from the norm of hearing, and thus as a loss. They move through a dynamic process of adjustment to their "impaired" status. Regardless of whether individuals identify as members of deaf culture or as people with impaired hearing, they experience the prejudice and discrimination of the hearing majority. Because of the pervasiveness of this discrimination, it is necessary to construe the provision of social services for deaf and hard of hearing individuals within the context of human rights.

Two laws, the Americans with Disabilities Act (1990) and the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, were designed to address discrimination against people with disabilities and to promote their full participation in society. These laws require accommodations (e.g., interpreters and telecommunication access) for people with disabilities in both private and public settings. As public settings, mental health and other human services must be prepared to provide culturally appropriate and effective communication access to permit meaningful participation. In accordance with these requirements, regardless of whether an individual identifies as a member of deaf culture, or instead identifies as hard of hearing or late deafened, there is a need to invoke a social justice perspective that construes the receipt of appropriate services as a fundamental human right.

A deaf, hard of hearing (HOH) or speech-impaired person communicating via a Video Relay Service video interpreter. There are a variety of agencies, organizations, and associations in the United States that advocate for individuals who are deaf and hard of hearing. Services are delivered in a variety of ways, including access through multimedia Web sites.

The current state of service provision in mainstream therapeutic settings privileges oral and auditory forms of communication. Implicit in this privileging is the assumption that the client has typical speech and hearing. From the moment that this assumption is not fulfilled, practitioners become de-skilled because the skills upon which they typically rely (e.g., the skills of traditional talk therapy) cannot be implemented. In order for practitioners to acquire the requisite skills to provide deaf and hard of hearing clients with the services to which they are entitled, it is necessary to follow a set of guidelines for competent care.

Providing competent care for individuals who are deaf or hard of hearing is complicated by the diversity that exists in the population (e.g., those who identify with deaf culture, and those who identify as impaired). Nonetheless, minimum guidelines include (1) providing in-service training in deaf culture and hearing loss; (2) learning culturally appropriate and effective strategies for sign language, such as oral and written communication with deaf or hard of hearing people; (3) developing a protocol for assessing the communication preferences of deaf or hard of hearing clients at the outset of services; (4) establishing relationships with local interpreter referral services; (5) hiring at least some deafness-skilled practitioners; (6) adapting written materials (such as confidentiality notices) into simpler English; and (7) establishing collaborative relationships with local deafness service providers.

Following guidelines such as these provides not only an opportunity to ensure that deaf and hard of hearing clients receive the highest quality services possible, but also allows practitioners to become better trained. The integration of basic preparation for working with deaf and hard of hearing clients into mainstream training should become standardized within and across training programs for those who will be working in social services. Additionally, following such recommendations can assist service-providing agencies and organizations in enacting a socially just framework of care that recognizes the fundamental rights of all clients, regardless of culture or ability status.

Alisha Ali
Randolph Mowry
New York University

See Also: Communication Disorders, Services for; Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in; Language Assistance.

Further Readings

Harvey, M. Psychotherapy With Deaf and Hard-of-Hearing Persons, 2nd ed. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum, 2003.

Lomas, G. I. “Social Justice and Deafness.” Journal of the American Deafness and Rehabilitation Association, v.43/3 (2010).

Smiley, D. F., T. M. Threats, R. L. Mowry, and D. P. Peterson. “The International Classification of Functioning, Disability and Health (ICF): Implications for Deafness Rehabilitation Education.” Rehabilitation Education, v.19/2–3 (2005).

Death and Dying, Cultural Attitudes Toward

While death and dying are important themes across cultures, attitudes toward preparation for dying, funeral rites and customs, and discussion of the subject vary by culture. Human service professionals often work with clients from wide-ranging ethnicities, cultures, and backgrounds. It is imperative that human service professionals recognize different ways of acknowledging and honoring death and dying throughout the world in order to provide culturally competent care. Often, the cultural attitudes of a group are informed by their religious beliefs, so there may be consistency across otherwise very diverse groups of people. For instance, Catholics across North America and most of the world share similar funeral rites for the dead, and believe that death is a natural part of life.

Almost 98 percent of those in Greece are members of the Eastern Greek Orthodox Church. Within this context, a physician will communicate the diagnosis of a terminal illness to family members of the patient, and the family decides if the person is strong enough to withstand hearing the news. At times, the person with the illness may attempt to comfort his or her family members, while for others the subject may be completely avoided. Neighbors and family are supportive of each other, and may provide plentiful food as a caretaking gesture. After a person's death, the family does not eat meat for 40 days, and music is avoided for two years. Burial tombs face the east, and families are buried together. Cemeteries have pine trees planted along the inside wall to ward off evil spirits. After the funeral service, a meal of fish is served to relatives.

While some assume attitudes regarding death and dying are constant across the African continent, there is a wide variety of practices and beliefs related to death. Even among South Africans, there exists a diversity of opinion on the subject. For instance, indigenous South Africans believe that death merely separates a person from physical and spiritual realms. Regardless of religious beliefs, for many in South Africa, death is inevitable. For Islamic Muslims living in South Africa, death is considered one's fate, and to challenge this fate is considered disrespectful. Those of Tswana indigenous background are careful to practice certain funeral rites and activities, such that death does not negatively affect the survivors of the dead. In this way, death is not an ending. The afterlife is a consistent belief, with some specific ideas regarding a gathering place called Aalamé burzakh.

African Americans often wish to care for a dying family member at home. This is not universally accepted because some people believe that this practice is linked to bad luck. Although advance directives (i.e., a do not resuscitate order) may not always exist, some reports have shown that African Americans will favor life-sustaining treatment.

Around 80 percent of those living in India are Hindu, while 12 percent are Muslim. Approximately 2 percent are Sikh. For those who are dying, most are likely to accept their fate as the will of God. Hindus believe in reincarnation, a continuous cycle in which the soul is reborn. They also believe in karma, the idea that one's actions will result in consequences that are carried over into the next life. Neighbors and friends are often considered family, and will bring food to a family and comfort them. It is often believed that life should not be extended by extraordinary means, though pain medication and herbs would be accepted. Death is often celebrated as liberation. A woman would be prepared for the funeral wearing a sari, gold jewelry, and sandals, while a man would be dressed in traditional clothing. Mourners would wear white to signify peace and calm. Wood would be stacked into a funeral pyre and the unembalmed body placed at the top. Family and friends form a circle around the pyre and offer prayers. Once cremated, ashes are taken to the nearest body of water, or the Ganges River if possible.

Among traditional Chinese, a "good death" is wished for, meaning a peaceful, natural death at home, in the absence of life-sustaining interventions. The presence of family and the fulfillment of obligations would be important. Suicide and euthanasia are accepted by many as possible routes to ensure a "good death." Dying with a full stomach is important, and is tied to beliefs about reincarnation. Discussing death and dying is thought to bring bad luck, and such a discussion in front of a person who is dying is considered rude and disrespectful. Advance directives are an uncommon practice among the Chinese. Upon dying, money, food, and other items are placed around a person's coffin. Those who are grieving wear black armbands and white strips of cloth around their heads. The Chinese government requires the body to be cremated, and the ashes are generally buried in a grave with other family members.

Shanna L. Burke
Nonotuck Resource Associates, Inc.

See Also: Chinese Americans; Culturally Specific Services; Do Not Resuscitate Order.

Further Readings

Appel, D. and M. Papaikonomou. "Narratives on Death and Bereavement From Three South African Cultures: An Exploratory Study." Journal of Psychology In Africa, v.23/3 (2013).

Hiruy, Kiros and Lillian Mwanri. "End-of-Life Experiences and Expectations of Africans in Australia: Cultural Implications for Palliative and Hospice Care." Nursing Ethics, v.21/2 (2014).

Schub, E. and N. Smith. "Black Patients: Providing Culturally Competent End-of-Life Care." CINAHL Nursing Guide (April 18, 2014).

Schub, T. "Chinese-American Patients: Providing Culturally Competent Care." CINAHL Nursing Guide (January 24, 2014).

Deinstitutionalization

Historically, the lack of knowledge about effective care and treatment of the mentally ill, as well as fear and stigma, led to large numbers of patients being housed in institutions. Patients were held for extended periods in these psychiatric institutions, where they received care, but interventions often were unsuccessful and, at times, abusive. These abusive conditions were made public through documents distributed by reformers.

Concern about neglect in mental hospitals led to an interest in developing options for the care of patients within the community. The movement was called "deinstitutionalization." However, this effort at improving mental health care was fraught with problems because it lacked coordinated public planning. In addition, a lack of cultural sensitivity led to an even greater impact on the poor as well as ethnic and racial minorities. The term deinstitutionalization is now used most frequently in regard to mental health treatment, but it was used originally to classify a large-scale social reform movement devoted to several human service areas, including mental retardation, criminal justice, and juvenile delinquency.

History

As early as the 1860s, Dorothea Dix began to write about overcrowded and inhumane conditions in psychiatric hospitals. In 1908, Clifford Beers, after being released from a state institution, published A Mind That Found Itself, an exposé of conditions inside state and private mental institutions. In the United States, interest in programs to improve mental health grew during World War II when some draftees were found unfit for service due to mental illness.

In 1946, the National Mental Health Foundation was founded by conscientious objectors who had served as attendants at state mental institutions during World War II. They worked to expose the abusive conditions at these facilities, and this became an early impetus in the push for deinstitutionalization. At the same time, the U.S. government began to fund research into treatment and prevention of mental illness with various initiatives; one was the formation of the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH). The NIMH refers to deinstitutionalization as a process put in place to prevent inappropriate admission and confinement of the mentally ill in institutions and to provide community support systems for mental health services.

During a congressional address in the early 1960s, President John F. Kennedy discussed the need for reforms in mental health. Around that time, the Joint Commission on Mental Illness and Health, a federal agency, released a report titled Action for Mental Health. This report cited the extreme costs of institutional care, the lack of therapeutic effectiveness of long-term care, and the deplorable conditions in many large public institutions. Simultaneously, reformers and mental health advocates determined that the care in these institutions was often worse than the effects of mental illness. They began to lobby for the release of these patients into community settings, or deinstitutionalization.

The federal government provided funding to support the release of patients with the passage of the Community Mental Health Centers Act of 1963 and its amendment in 1965. This act appropriated federal funds for the construction of community mental health centers with a goal of diminishing the state mental hospital's role as a major resource for the mentally ill. The plan was to establish a program of federal, state, and local services in the community. The services were to provide prevention, early detection, treatment, and rehabilitation for the mentally ill with case management, counseling, and a clinic to distribute antipsychotic medications.

The discovery of psychotropic drugs in the 1950s is commonly believed to be the start of massive deinstitutionalization. However, from 1955 to 1965, public hospitals decreased in size only about 1.75 percent on average because of a lack of places to send patients. The late 1960s and early 1970s were years of increasing community discharges, with the addition of many federal social service programs, such as Medicare and Medicaid. There was also a great increase in nursing home beds for elderly psychiatric patients and those with dementia. Inpatient hospital beds were being reduced at an average of 8.75 percent per year from 1965 to 1975. Between 1970 and 1973, 14 state hospitals were closed and others significantly reduced their bed capacity. This was a financial relief for the state governments that had been putting massive resources into maintaining these large institutions. States were able to shift the costs for mental health care to the federal government.

Important Factors Affecting Deinstitutionalization

The 1970s saw several judicial decisions regarding the civil rights of psychiatric patients. States were required by the courts to provide treatment, but many states failed to comply with the court mandate. The U.S. Supreme Court, in the case of Donaldson v. O'Connor, determined that mentally ill persons could not be confined if those individuals were not a danger to themselves or others and had the ability to survive outside the hospital. In addition, the Third Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals, in Halderman v. Pennhurst State School & Hospital, determined that inpatients should be treated in the least restrictive environment. In 1971, the U.S. District Court in Alabama, in Wyatt v. Stickney, ruled that all patients confined to institutions or residential schools had the constitutional right to individualized treatment to give them an opportunity to improve their mental conditions. That decision no longer allowed institutions or residential state schools to provide only custodial care, and this was a huge victory in the fight for community reintegration and deinstitutionalization.

Throughout the 1970s, the deinstitutionalization movement was progressing, and inpatient settings were downsizing at a fast pace. Initially, the federal government made a plan for 1,500 community mental health centers to be opened to provide inpatient, outpatient, partial hospitalization, 24-hour emergency services, and education to patients and their families. Unfortunately, a lack of funds available from the federal and state governments led to only 800 of these centers being built, with limited funding for staff. Throughout the 1970s, legislative revisions by Presidents Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford, Jimmy Carter, and Ronald Reagan resulted in further limiting the resources being provided to establish and maintain these centers. By 1981, no more federal funds were available.

The result was that patients were discharged into communities that were unprepared for their release. By the late 1970s, approximately 40,000 chronically ill psychiatric patients were released into New York City. The Upper West Side of Manhattan contained the largest concentration of deinstitutionalized patients in the United States, at 7,000. By the end of the 1990s, 93 percent of the state beds that were filled in 1955 were closed. States were motivated to participate in deinstitutionalization for financial reasons, whether alternative forms of care for the mentally ill were in place or not.

Community Response

In general, public information regarding abuse and lack of treatment in many institutions led to most community members supporting deinstitutionalization. However, communities were not receptive to large facilities for the mentally ill being built in their neighborhoods. Neighborhoods were more receptive to group homes for the elderly and developmentally disabled than the group homes for the mentally ill because the other groups were less stigmatized.

Successful community integration of the mentally ill was affected by a lack of knowledge and by fear, which created negative responses to these patients living in the community. Community boards often opposed housing for discharged patients in middle-class areas, resulting in housing options being available only in working-class or lower socioeconomic neighborhoods, where housing was less expensive. Therefore, high concentrations of discharged patients were being housed in areas that did not offer opposition. This situation forced many patients to be exposed to a hostile environment, deteriorated living conditions, and a lack of access to health and mental health facilities. In addition, some of these areas were riddled with drugs and other illegal activities, leading patients into vulnerable situations they could not manage or into becoming victims of crime or abuse.

The absence of planning for community living of the mentally ill caused discharged patients to be placed in settings with inadequate supervision. Discharged patients were sent to settings such as boarding homes, single-room occupancy hotels, or private homes. The lack of coordinated and essential services led patients back into the hospital, and cases of multiple admissions became known as revolving door cases. In addition, because of the lack of available services in the local communities, many discharged patients became homeless, turned to substance abuse, and/or turned to petty crime to support themselves. These individuals ultimately were housed in jails, shelters, or alternative care facilities such as nursing homes. The return of patients to locked settings is known as transinstitutionalization.

Studies indicate that mentally ill individuals are sensitive to social cues regarding their illness, and this has great bearing on their lives outside of institutions. Negative attitudes are often prevalent in working-class and ethnic neighborhoods. It is reported that social rejection is an enduring force in the lives of people with mental illness. Stigma has been found to be a persistent source of social stress, which leads to increased feelings of self-deprecation. This ultimately impacts the individuals' sense of mastery and ability to function in the community.

Factors in the Successful Return to the Community

The understanding of mental illness is culturally and socially defined. Some ethnic groups somatize mental illness through physical pain or with body and mood changes. Other groups may not express outward signs of struggle. If a community provider is not culturally competent, the care offered may not be adequate and may ultimately be rejected. Many minority groups have been found to lack involvement with community care, and have more unmet needs than their nonminority counterparts. Research has indicated that this difference is significant for African Americans and the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) population.

Severely mentally ill individuals who have spent a significant amount of time in an institution often have lost ties with people in the community and therefore may have fewer resources to draw from when released. Those from lower socioeconomic groups often cannot count on housing or financial support from relatives or friends, making obtaining services more difficult for them than for those who have a more solid base in the community. In addition, the lack of financial means and referrals for social service benefits has an impact on the physical health status of these individuals as well, which furthers their distress and/or depression.

Although there is evidence that family involvement positively affects relapse rates and helps with managing symptoms, financial constraints do not always allow for the family to be involved in the treatment process. Access to mental health treatment for individuals and their families may be denied or limited based on insurance coverage. Often those who have health insurance incur the high cost of a deductible, or copay, for mental health services. Ultimately, those without insurance coverage for mental health interventions will not gain the benefit of the most effective recovery-based treatments and medications. Compounding the costs for effective care are issues related to transportation, family obligations, time constraints, and legal issues. These factors impede the uninsured, the undocumented, and many people living in rural areas from getting essential treatment in their communities.

Returning individuals to the community has been a priority for the mental health, prison, and juvenile social service systems. Education for providers on culturally sensitive and accessible care is essential in this process. Community education is also essential for these individuals to return to the community without stigma and oppression. With adequate resources, the mentally ill can live productive lives in the community.

Eileen Klein
Ramapo College

See Also: Long-Term Residential Care; Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of; National Institute of Mental Health.

Further Readings

Deas-Nesmith, Deborah. "Psychiatric Deinstitutionalization and its Cultural Insensitivity: Consequences and Recommendations for the Future." Journal of the National Medical Association, v.84/12 (1992).

Iscoe, I. and L. C. Harris. "Social and Community Interventions." Annual Review of Psychiatry, v.35 (1984).

Mechanic, D. and D. A. Rochefort. "Deinstitutionalization: An Appraisal of Reform." Annual Review of Sociology, v.16 (1990).

Reda, S. “Public Perception of Discharged Psychiatric Patients: A Community Survey.” Journal of Social Psychiatry, v.42/3 (1996).

Wright, E., W. P. Gronfein, and T. J. Owens. “Deinstitutionalization, Social Rejection, and the Self-Esteem of Former Mental Patients.” Journal of Health and Social Behavior, v.41/1 (2000).

Dental Services

Kyle Willis, an unemployed African American man without dental insurance but with a painful, abscessed third molar (wisdom tooth), went in desperation to an emergency room. He was prescribed pain medication and an antibiotic to treat the infection. Lacking sufficient funds, he opted to fill only the pain medication prescription for $3 but not the antibiotic for $27. The infection eventually spread to his brain, tragically killing Willis. This story serves as a stark reminder of the vital and potentially deadly issues regarding access to care and diversity in dentistry. What dental health disparities exist among members of the U.S. population that cause patients to seek dental care in an emergency room? What steps can providers take to meet the oral health needs of at-risk populations?

Dental Health Disparities

Dental disease does not affect all people equally. Latino preschoolers experience 2.5 times more cavities than white children, and African American children experience 1.5 times more cavities than white children. Approximately 34 percent of African American seniors are edentulous (have no teeth) compared to 20 percent of white seniors. Racial and ethnic minorities as well as other at-risk populations not only experience more dental disease, they also are less likely to access services and have poorer oral health outcomes. Dental conditions remain among the most common health problems for low-income, disadvantaged, disabled, and institutionalized individuals. This means increased tooth loss, dental caries (cavities), periodontal (gum) disease, as well as a lower quality of life due to overall systemic health implications. Diseases such as diabetes, cancer, HIV/AIDS, and heart disease can be significantly impacted by oral health.

To address these disparities, providers first should be aware of the inequalities experienced by at-risk populations and target their efforts to the greatest areas of need. In addition, providers should become culturally aware and realize that the greater the social and cultural distance between them and the patients they serve, the greater the potential for suboptimal encounters. The guidelines to accomplish these goals follow:

- Providers should utilize interventions based upon the best available scientific evidence.
- Providers should work to improve patient–provider communication, building trust, and enhancing shared decision making.
- Providers should tailor patient-level interventions to enhance self-management, self-efficacy, and patient empowerment.

Although disparities in oral health and access to care are multifactorial, a common link can be found in the separation of the medical and dental systems. This separation includes professional training, clinical care, continuing education, scholarly journals, research agendas, and financing, as well as health delivery systems. Therefore, if oral health disparities are to be addressed, interprofessional education and collaborative care models must be incorporated into the current training and delivery systems.

Cultural and Literacy Concerns

Cultural competence is required for all dental care providers. Cultural competence is having the ability to provide care to patients with diverse backgrounds, values, beliefs, and behaviors, including tailoring delivery to meet patients’ social, cultural, and linguistic needs. Cultural competence is more likely to be achieved by increasing the diversity among dental health providers themselves and providing linguistically appropriate services for patients.

Health literacy should also be considered when addressing oral health disparities. Health literacy is the ability to obtain, process, and understand basic health information and services needed to make appropriate health decisions and follow instructions for treatment. The National Adult Literacy Survey (NALS) estimates that approximately 23 percent of adults have difficulty using reading, writing, and computational skills for everyday tasks. Research also indicates that 41.6 percent of U.S. patients cannot comprehend directions for taking medication on an empty stomach. Therefore, providing oral health materials that are more understandable and are written at the appropriate reading level is vitally important. To better serve the oral health literacy needs of their patient's, providers can (1) use plain, not medical, language; (2) show or draw pictures; (3) limit the amount of information provided; and (4) encourage questions.

Human service workers can partner with dentists and health professionals to address the oral health needs of patients by developing partnerships for referral and care. These partnerships would assure that patients keep their dental appointments, take medication as prescribed, and follow up with care as directed. Likewise, human service workers can reinforce the importance of proper oral hygiene and regular dental care.

Medicaid Coverage

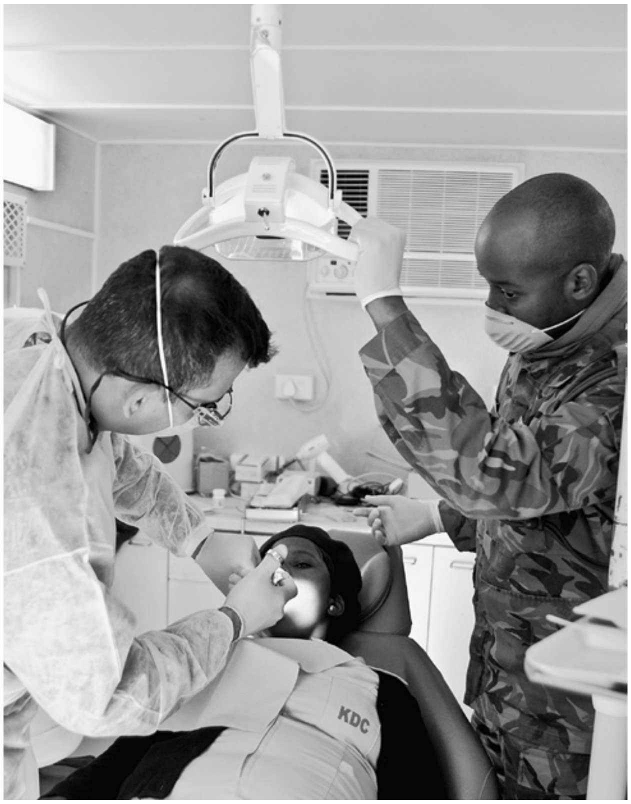
All states in the United States provide Medicaid dental programs for children from low-income families and for adults with special needs. Some states also provide limited Medicaid coverage for other adults. Historically, a low percentage of dentists participate in Medicaid because reimbursement levels tend to fall 10 to 20 percent or more below the breakeven overhead point. In other words, dentists tend to operate at a business loss when providing dental care for most Medicaid patients, whether children or adults. States vary in terms of requirements to participate in Medicaid.

In some states, dentists have the freedom to limit the number of Medicaid patients to children only or to patients within a geographic area such as a county. As an alternative to participating in Medicaid, some providers provide a significant amount of free care for some patients, although the extent of this charitable dentistry is not tracked. One of the areas of focus in the Affordable Care Act (ACA) is to increase access to dental services for children.

Other Options for Accessing and Providing Dental Care for the Underserved

Many state dental organizations organize yearly two-day events, called Missions of Mercy, in which volunteer dentists, dental students, and dental staff provide free dental services. (See, for example, http://www.adcfmom.org/Schedule.) Across many states and years, millions of dollars of dental treatment have been provided. Federally Qualified Health Centers (FQHC) and county or regional dental clinics often offer sliding fees or discounted dental services, making dental care more affordable, especially for those without dental insurance. A map of the FQHC locations in the United States is available at http://www.raconline.org/racmaps/mapfiles/fqhc.png.

Dental schools may also offer special dental treatment programs for community service or service learning opportunities for students. Some dentists and dental students may also volunteer to provide free or significantly discounted dental services through mission clinics (often faith-related) and school-based outreach clinics. A listing of U.S. dental schools can be accessed at http://www.ada.org/267.aspx.



Dentists serving in the U.S. Air Force work with the Botswana Defense Force to provide free dental services to underpriviledged civilians in Botswana.

Finally, a strong movement is currently underway to develop alternative models of dental delivery through midlevel providers such as dental therapists. Midlevel providers provide routine care such as restorations and simple extractions. These models are particularly, although not exclusively, focused on rural or remote areas that lack dentists. The long-term viability and effectiveness of these alternative models are being studied. Success in the future will ultimately depend on the ability of oral health professionals to provide quality and affordable care in order to meet the diverse oral health needs of the public.

Kimberly McFarland
David G. Dunning
University of Nebraska Medical Center,
College of Dentistry

See Also: Health as a Human Right; Medicaid Service Providers and Diversity; Public Health.

Further Readings

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). Oral Health Surveillance Data. National Center for Chronic Disease Prevention and Health Promotion. Atlanta: CDC, 2004.

Franks, Peter and Kevin Fiscella. "Reducing Disparities Downstream: Prospects and Challenges." Journal of General Internal Medicine, v.23/5 (2008).

Mouradian, Wendy, Elizabeth Wehr, and James J. Crall. "Disparities in Children's Oral Health and Access to Dental Care." Journal of the American Medical Association, v.284 (2000).

Nielsen-Bohlrman, Lynn, Allison Panzer, and David Kindig, eds. H*ealth Literacy: A Prescription to End Confusion.* Committee on Health Literacy, Institute of Medicine. Washington, DC: National Academies Press, 2004.

Reports of the Surgeon General. Oral Health in America: A Report of the Surgeon General. Washington, DC: Surgeon General of the United States, 2000.

Standards for Dental Education Programs. Commission on Dental Accreditation. Chicago: American Dental Association, 2010.

Williams, Mark, et al. "Inadequate Functional Health Literacy Among Patients at Two Public Hospitals." Journal of the American Medical Association, v.274/21 (1995).

Department of Education, U.S.

The primary mission of the U.S. Department of Education (DOE) is to provide equal access, promote competitiveness, and make quality education accessible for all of its citizens. It also provides curriculum development and facilities improvement grants to schools, as well as financial aid (e.g., loans, scholarships, and grants) to students. In addition, the DOE fights discrimination based on gender, disability, race, and language, among others, which can harm and discourage the disadvantaged and minorities who seek to have access to education. The DOE offers services to diverse populations and supports and promotes inclusion of all citizens with regard to learning and teaching that is intended to prepare students for the 21st century globalized world.

Historical Background

The DOE has a long history that dates back to its establishment in 1867 by the U.S. Congress. Its purpose was to support educational improvements as well as collect information and statistics about the nation's schools. However, because of the fear that an education department would have too much control over state and local schools, the department was reduced to an Office of Education in 1868. Then that small office operated under other federal agencies, including the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and the U.S. Department of Interior.

As a result of social and political changes in the 1950s and 1960s, federal funding for education increased. Thus, the role of the federal government in education expanded gradually, with the main purpose being to pass funds from the national level to states, districts, and higher education institutions. Also, the creation in the 1960s of federal programs to reduce poverty and protect civil rights resulted in a dramatic increase in federal funding for education at all levels. Furthermore, in the 1970s, in order to fight issues of discrimination of minorities under the civil rights laws, the functions expanded to cover discrimination based on gender, disability, and language.

The U.S. Department of Education was created as a federal Cabinet-level entity in 1979. President Jimmy Carter was not only instrumental but was also a strong advocate of a department that would serve and provide various functions and services to students and educators alike. But pundits and Republicans argued that this type of department was unnecessary and deemed it to be unconstitutional. They argued that education was not mentioned in the U.S. Constitution and this was another federal bureaucratic intrusion on state and local affairs. However, both liberals and Democrats supported the DOE, recognizing its value and necessity. They believed it to be constitutional under the commerce clause, and argued that the funding role of the department was constitutional under the taxing and spending clause. In addition, among many supporters of this department was the National Education Association.

In 1981, President Ronald Reagan publically announced his intention to abolish the DOE, but his efforts were unsuccessful. He abandoned the plan and focused on the need for school reform that intensified during the 1980s. At that time, issues were paramount with regard to declines in student achievement and standardized test scores. There was concern about the effect these issues could have on U.S. educational competiveness compared to other nations. It was also believed that education was linked to the economy of the United States and may have played a role in strengthening the economy of the United States in relation to other countries.

To address the crisis in education, various states initiated reforms that were aimed at improving the nation's educational system and student achievement. These state-level reforms were encouraged and supported by the DOE's National Commission on Excellence in Education. In 1983, the influential book A Nation at Risk was published, and it became an important study for educators and school reformist alike in their efforts to make positive changes in education. In addition, throughout the 1990s, the DOE played a pivotal role in making sure that assessment standards would hold students, teachers, and schools accountable for a higher level of academic attainment.

President Bill Clinton tried to tackle the problem of the student achievement gap in education by enacting goals in 2000 aimed at helping states set high standards for schools and students alike. Clinton also offered and expanded public school choice and supported public charter schools. In addition, the gap was noted in grades by policy makers and educators, among others, in terms of standardized test scores, dropout rates, college completion, and other success measures. For instance, African American and Hispanic students had a lower academic performance when compared to white students. Disparities were also noted among students with regard to family income, gender, learning disabilities, and English-language proficiency. This spurred government action to make positive changes by creating new programs and investing in school reforms.

Later, President George W. Bush signed the federal No Child Left Behind Act of 2002, which focused on standardized tests, school accountability, student assessment, and achievement proficiency in reading and math. Despite the fact that, based on data from the National Assessment of Educational Progress, Hispanic and black students had made great strides in improving performance in reading and math, these students still remained behind their white peers, and the student achievement gap still existed.

The Obama administration has initiated the Race to the Top (RTTT) program, which provides financial incentives to states that provide scholarships and other financial aid mainly to African American and Hispanic students, as well as to others. The aim of these initiatives and programs are to narrow or eliminate the achievement gaps of various student groups, improve student academic performance, and increase school graduation rates. In addition, RTTT focuses on giving grants to help schools to become competitive and assist in closing the gap between low- and high-performing schools.

Functions of the U.S. Department of Education

The main functions of the Department of Education are to establish policies on federal financial aid for education, and to administer, distribute, as well as monitor funds that are given to qualified recipients. The DOE also collects data on trends of education, oversees research in U.S. schools, and disseminates this information to Congress, educators, parents, and the general public. It also identifies the major issues and problems in education and tries to address them through school reform and other avenues. The DOE makes sure that federal educational laws are enforced, which includes prohibiting discrimination in programs and activities receiving federal funds, addressing and resolving complaints of discrimination, and ensuring equal access to education for every citizen. In addition, it monitors and enforces laws regarding privacy.

It is critical to note that education in the United States is decentralized, meaning the DOE does not design curricula, establish schools and colleges, develop or implement testing, or set requirements for school enrollment and graduation. These are the responsibilities of state and local school districts.

The DOE serves diverse populations in various capacities. This includes supporting and promoting inclusion in educational settings, activities, and training, and providing financial assistance to multiracial, multicultural, and other groups. This has been particularly true with regard to supporting and advancing diversity in various levels of education, including higher education.

By giving financial assistance, such as scholarships, loans, and grants, to diverse student populations regardless of race, color, national origin, gender, disability, or age, more educational opportunities will be accessed by students, which will better prepare them for the 21st century. In addition, the DOE has created programs and funds that are allocated for educational purposes for children with disabilities, tribal and Native Americans, as well as other disadvantaged populations, such as families with low incomes, immigrants, women and girls in athletic programs, people in need of vocational rehabilitation, among others.

It is important to understand that federal programs are intended to benefit all students from all walks of life. As the challenges to diversity in academia persist, some scholars speak about the need to expand the circle of diversity in higher education. As a result of the continued increase in the multiracial and multicultural U.S. population, there is more likely a need to take a new look at diversity and inclusion, as well as providing new and various services for a diverse population that would assist in their educational and training needs. It is essential that the DOE continue to tackle challenges of inclusion and diversity of its citizens by creating educational opportunities for all students and educators alike so that they can prosper in the competitive and globalized world.

Blerim Shala
Nova Southeastern University

See Also: Adult Education Programs and Services; Educational Services; Educational Support Services; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Multicultural Education; No Child Left Behind Act.

Further Readings

Hawley, Willis D. "U.S. Department of Education." In Encyclopedia of Social and Cultural Foundations of Education, Eugene F. Provenzo and Asterie Baker Provenzo, eds. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2009.

Heffernan, Robert. Cabinetmakers: The Story of the Three-Year Battle to Establish the U.S. Department of Education. Lincoln, NE: IUniverse, 2001.

Manna, P. School's In: Federalism and the National Education Agenda. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 2006.

Mendez, Jesse P., Pilar Mendoza, and Zaria Malchom. "The Impact of Financial Aid on Native American Students." Journal of Diversity in Higher Education, v.4 (2011).

Radin, Beryl A. and Willis D. Hawley. The Politics of Federal Reorganization: Creating the U.S. Department of Education. New York: Pergamon, 1988.

Sadovnik, Alan. R., Jennifer A. O'Day, George W. Bohrnstedt, and Katheryn M. Borman. No Child Left Behind and the Reduction of Achievement Gap: Sociological Perspectives on Federal Education Policy. New York: Routledge, 2008.

Turner, Caroline S. "Advancing Diversity in Higher Education." Journal of Diversity in Higher Education, v.6 (2013).

Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.

The concept of social welfare in which the government is responsible for providing a basic standard of living for all Americans was introduced by President Franklin D. Roosevelt as an essential element of his New Deal in the 1930s. Governmental responsibility for providing human services expanded still further with subsequent revolutions in education, civil rights, and consumer rights. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (originally the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, or HEW) has traditionally been responsible for dispensing services such as Medicare and food and medical assistance. Designed to provide a safety net for the needy, the disabled, and the elderly, the passage of the Social Security Act in 1935 and the establishment of the Medicare and Medicaid programs in the 1960s set the stage for significant federal government commitment to providing health and human services. Until 1979, HEW oversaw education in the United States and was responsible for the Head Start program created in the 1960s to provide school readiness for underprivileged children, thereby increasing their overall well-being.

In the 1990s, considerable criticism was leveled at the concept of welfare, and political conservatives were insistent that it should be a stopgap measure rather than a way of life. The result was a complete overhaul of the program, and a shift in the Department of Health and Human Services' (HHS) responsibilities to the American people. The success of programs overseen by HHS has been demonstrated by reductions in infant mortality, teen births, deaths from sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS), and the increased number of elderly people who manage to live on their own with only limited outside assistance. Nevertheless, there are still large gaps in the health status of whites and racial and ethnic minorities in the United States, as well as between those with socioeconomic advantages and those who lack them. Experts continue to implore HHS to dedicate more resources to reducing the rate of low-birth-weight and special-needs infants and the number of women having caesarean sections. In addition to providing access to health and human services, HHS conducts research on related issues, including the fields of food and drug safety and biomedicine.

Background

The Department of Health and Human Services was established in 1953 as the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. When the Department of Education became a separate Cabinet-level department in 1979, HEW became HHS. From the beginning, the department served as a link between individual citizens and the government to which they looked for health and human service assistance. HEW grew rapidly, and changes were common as the department responded to the needs of a dynamic population. Within two decades of its founding, HEW was responsible for 200 federal government programs and was overseeing 13 agencies and 10 regional offices.

As part of the effort to overhaul the existing welfare program, the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996 (PRWORA) replaced Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) with the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program (TANF). Welfare reforms placed new emphasis on putting the poor to work. Since the largest segment of this group included single mothers and their dependent children, that effort involved providing extensive child-care assistance through HHS. The reforms also focused on reducing the rate of infants born outside of marriage and stepping up governmental involvement in collecting child support payments from noncustodial parents.

By 2008, HHS employed more than 67,000 people assigned to oversee the dispensation of the nation's health care and provide human services. One in every four dollars in the federal budget was dedicated to serving these needs. The 2012 budget for HHS, in millions, was $873,872, and that figure had grown to $974,594 by 2014. The largest shares of HHS financial resources are dedicated to Medicare (54 percent) and Medicaid (31 percent).

Organization

The Department of Health and Human Services is a Cabinet-level agency, and the secretary of HHS is responsible for carrying out its mission of helping "provide the building blocks that Americans need to live healthy, successful lives." The federal government's commitment to health-related services has evolved considerably since its first effort in 1798, when the government provided assistance to sick and disabled seamen. The divisions that operate under the HHS umbrella include the Administration for Children and Families (ACF), which was established in 1991. AFC has 1,287 employees and operated under a $47.73 billion budget in 2013. The Administration for Community Living (ACL), which was established in 2012 by merging the Administration on Aging and the Administration on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities, has a staff of 148 and a 2013 budget of $2.07 billion.

Established in 1989, the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality (AHRQ) is the research arm of the American Public Health Service. AHRQ has a staff of 314 and a 2013 budget of $0.43 billion.

Another arm of the Public Health Service is the Atlanta-based Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry (ATSDR). The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) is also based in Atlanta, and CDC is charged not only with disease control and prevention but also with dealing with national health emergencies and working with similar agencies around the world to deal with global health aspects. CDC was established in 1946 as the Communicable Disease Center; it employs 11,086 people and operated with a budget of $10.24 billion in 2013. The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) oversee the Medicare program and work with states on health programs for the most vulnerable segments of the American population. Established in 1977 as the Health Care Financing Administration, CMS has a staff of 5,591 and a 2013 budget of $763.14 billion. The National Institutes of Health (NIH), which originated as the Hygienic Laboratory on Staten Island, New York, in 1887, is the oldest division within HHS. NIH is responsible for biomedical and behavioral research, and a large component of its role is training researchers and dispensing medical knowledge. NIH has a staff of 18,984 and a 2013 budget of $29.15 billion.

The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) was established in 1906 in response to passage of the Pure Food and Drug Act. FDA has a staff of 14,829 and a 2013 budget of $4.03 billion. Created in 1982, the Health Resources and Services Administration (HRSA) seeks to improve health care for Americans who are uninsured, isolated, or medically vulnerable. With a staff of 1,965, HRSA operated with an $8.10 billion budget in 2013. In 1992, the Alcohol, Drug Abuse and Mental Health Administration, which had been created in 1974, became the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMSHA). This agency has 627 employees and a 2013 budget of $3.35 billion. Until 1955, overseeing federal aspects of health services to American Indians and Alaska Natives was the responsibility of the Department of the Interior. Now operating under HHS, the Indian Health Service has a staff of 15,429 and a 2013 budget of $5.30 billion.

Health and Nutrition

The Department of Health and Human Services is commonly known as the federal health department because of its role in dispensing health care to targeted populations. Human service professionals as well as medical professionals acknowledge the importance of preventive health care and nutritional assistance in maintaining good health, and significant HHS resources are devoted to these aspects. In 2011, there were almost 74 million Americans between the ages of birth and 17, and some 22 percent of that population lived in poverty. Of those living in poverty, 39 percent were African American and another 34 percent were Hispanic.

Approximately 96 percent of the eligible poor receive nutritional assistance. In a study conducted by Children's HealthWatch, researchers found that programs such as the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP) lead to reduced hospitalizations, improved academic performance, and long-term economic success for recipients. A second study conducted by the National Bureau of Economic Research revealed that the benefits of nutritional assistance for children lead to significant reductions in obesity, high blood pressure, and diabetes that continue into adulthood. Through increased spending on maternal and child health, HHS has played a major role in reducing the infant mortality rate in the United States, slashing it from 12.6 per 1,000 live infants in 1980 to an estimated 5.9 per 1,000 in 2013. The number of infants born to teenage mothers has also declined, decreasing from 61.8 per 1,000 in 1991 to 41.9 per 1,000 in 2006. Incidences of SIDS have also fallen, declining from 1.3 in 1990 to 0.6 in 2006.

As the baby boom generation continues to age, the number of elderly is expected to rise, doubling between 2005 and 2035. Thus, the demands on HHS will continue to increase. Studies on the use of preventive health care measures and prescription drug assistance for the elderly have proved that these measures reduce hospitalizations and delay the need for long-term care, resulting in benefits to the greater society as well as to individuals involved. The passage of the Medicare Prescription Drug Improvement and Modernization Act of 2003 has proved successful in significantly improving the health of the elderly who no longer have to choose between medicine and food.

The three most important elements in keeping the elderly healthy is providing access to both physical and mental health care and keeping them involved in life. The trend toward assisted living and away from nursing home care is considered a major step in enabling seniors to retain this involvement.

HHS is involved in all three elements of providing health and human services to the elderly and in decreasing the number of seniors who are placed in long-term care facilities.

In all segments of the population, preventive care benefits such as those dispensed by HHS help identify diseases such as cancer in early stages, saving both lives and reducing medical costs. Assistance with prescription drugs helps keep diseases such as high blood pressure and diabetes under control and helps recipients when health crises do occur.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths; Child Welfare Services; Department of Education, U.S.; Disability Services; Group Homes for Adults: Head Start and Prekindergarten Programs; Medicaid; Medicare; Poverty; Race and Clients; Welfare Reform, Role of.

Further Readings

Conlon, Annemarie and Patti Aldredge. "Department of Health and Human Services Changes: Implications for Hospital Social Workers." Health and Social Work, v. 38/1 (2013).

Kenney, Mary, et al. "Federal Expenditures on Maternal and Child Health in the United States." Maternal and Child Health Journal, v. 16/2 (2012).

Leavitt, Michael O. "U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS)." Congressional Digest, v. 87/14 (2008).

National Association of Social Work. Social Work Speaks: National Association of Social Work Policy Statements, 2009-2012. 8th ed. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 2009.

Radin, Beryl. "When Is a Health Department not a Health Department? The Case of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services." Social Policy and Administration, v.44/2 (2010).

Radin, Beryl A. and J. M. Chanin, eds. Federal Government Reorganization: A Policy and Management Perspective. Boston: Jones and Bartlett, 2009.

Winstead, Don and Ann McCormick. "Activities of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services." Gender Issues, v. 24/1 (2007).

Zielinskie, Ginger. "Simplifying Access to Improve Outcomes." Policy and Practice, v. 71/6 (2013).

Developmental Disabilities, Attitudes and Myths in Services for

A number of myths exist about people with intellectual/developmental disabilities. Some of these myths have been sustained over time and have become so ingrained in society that people take them as truths. It is important to recognize that these myths, which affect societal and personal attitudes, also impact the services that people receive and how they receive them.

A myth is a popular idea or belief that is connected to somebody or something, but is exaggerated or untrue. Sometimes a myth is used to justify the perpetuation of a certain state of affairs. Similarly, myths may reflect stereotypical attitudes toward something or someone, although they may also be challenged as unfair representations.

When people talk about attitudes, they are discussing the ways someone thinks or feels about something or somebody. These ideas or feelings are often evaluative in nature. However, people may not be explicitly aware of their attitudes toward certain ideas, objects, or people. People's attitudes may affect or influence their behavior.

Myths and attitudes can operate in tandem. For example, a myth may serve to perpetuate a certain set of attitudes, which may then further perpetuate the myth itself. Because attitudes are evaluative, it is helpful to understand (as Wolf Wolfensberger, who has written extensively about the devaluation of marginalized groups, and Hanoch Livneh suggest) that people do not evaluate or judge something or someone in a vacuum. Many factors can be at play, such as a person's direct or indirect experiences with the subject, childhood influences, the social environment in which they live, or their sociocultural conditioning, such as values, norms, and societal beliefs. Thus, both attitudes and myths can very much affect how people perceive and act toward issues and other people.

Intellectual/Developmental Disabilities

The terms intellectual and developmental disability are sometimes used interchangeably and have a long history behind them. Words such as idiot, imbecile, moron, and mental retardate were used as bona fide medical terms to describe certain classes of disabled individuals, but these words have become highly pejorative over time.

Today, the American Association on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities provides a different definition: An intellectual disability is a disability that is characterized by limitations in intellectual functioning and adaptive behavior. Intellectual functioning refers to mental capacity, and adaptive behavior is the ability to perform conceptual, social, and practical skills. Usually these limitations are significant and manifest themselves before 18 years of age.

Historical and Contemporary Devalued Roles

People labeled as having intellectual/developmental disabilities have endured a difficult history. Many myths about these individuals have been created and sustained over time. Often these myths were built around a number of demeaning roles into which people with intellectual/developmental disabilities have been cast. According to Wolf Wolfensberger, some of these roles include (1) a menace to society or being evil in some way, (2) the subject of pity and charity, (3) the child who is never expected to mature into an adult, (4) the patient who is always sick and diseased, and (5) someone less than or not quite human.

Many of these mythical roles are deeply woven into the fabric of society and have negatively impacted public attitudes toward people with intellectual/developmental disabilities. It is helpful to look at some examples to better understand the power these roles have on society. These illustrations will help shed light on how myths have impacted and continue to impact human services and human service professionals.

The menace. From the late 1800s to well into the 20th century, residential institutions were seen as the answer to keeping society safe from people with intellectual/developmental disabilities, who were thought to be a menace to society on several levels. First, a commonly held belief was that their disabilities were linked to many of society's most pressing social ills—alcoholism, laziness, sexual promiscuity, and criminal activity. Second, it was thought that these behaviors were transmitted through their genes to subsequent generations. This link between moral behavior and genetics, coupled with the assumption of promiscuity, led to the passage of numerous laws prohibiting people with intellectual/developmental disabilities from marrying. When these laws proved ineffective, some states and provinces enacted sexual sterilization laws, allowing these individuals to be sterilized against their will and without their consent. The last of these laws was not repealed until the 1970s. The myth of the menace continues to live on today. For example, battles are still fought over whether group homes for people with intellectual/developmental disabilities ought to be allowed into certain neighborhoods, based on unfounded fears that the residents are sexual deviants or other kinds of menaces.

The object of pity and charity. There is a long-standing connection between people with intellectual/developmental disabilities and the ideas of pity and charity. This connection can be traced back to biblical times. Some of the earliest institutional facilities for affected individuals were started and run by various religious orders. However, to be seen as objects of pity disempowers people with intellectual/developmental disabilities and tends to elicit a paternalistic attitude from nondisabled people. Attitudes of pity and charity have not yet disappeared. Many disability organizations continue to be based on charity models, tugging at people's heartstrings for donations. Charity can be a problematic concept for those who receive it, as they are often portrayed as burdens on the goodwill of others. When donors no longer feel compelled to give, recipients are left unsupported. This mind-set becomes especially dangerous when it seeps into the provision of services. When the charity model becomes embedded in human service provision, basic supports become tied to unreliable sources of funding and the will of a government. This means that essential supports may be withdrawn at any time.

The child. As previously stated, people with intellectual/developmental disabilities have difficulties in intellectual functioning. This fact has often been interpreted as a declaration that these individuals are childlike and cannot do things for themselves, thus reflecting on a perceived incompetence. This idea of incompetence began circulating as early as classical Greek and Roman times, when laws were enacted to provide for guardians to manage the affairs of people with intellectual/developmental disabilities. These laws became the basis for many of today's guardianship laws. Although laws have begun to change in favor of presumptions of competence, in practice the belief remains that people with intellectual/developmental disabilities cannot make certain decisions. For example, doctors, lawyers, and bank employees often require additional signatures on formal documents, even when an individual with an intellectual/developmental disability has the legal authority to sign on his or her own behalf. Organizations delivering services to people with intellectual/developmental disabilities may institute similar rules, thereby further reflecting the childlike role and downplaying their competence and ability to learn.

The patient. Ever since scientists and physicians began their quest to gain a better understanding of intellectual/developmental disabilities in the 18th and 19th centuries, people so diagnosed took on the role of the patient, notwithstanding the actual state of their health or well-being. In addition to seeing people with intellectual/developmental disabilities as perpetual patients, another related issue arose: the proliferation of professionals in various allied fields. Thus, people with intellectual/developmental disabilities became victims of the professional gaze. Many aspects of their lives came under the domain of professionals and were subject to official approval. The prominence of professionals acting as gatekeepers to services and supports is a practice that continues today. For example, access to certain tax credits; to educational, residential, and workplace supports; and to transportation options are all strictly regulated by professional testing, labeling, and assessment.

The not quite human. Unfortunately, the history of people with intellectual/developmental disabilities is replete with examples of inhumane treatment. Their institutional confinement in human warehouses, forced sterilization, and use as human guinea pigs in scientific and medical experimentation are all 20th-century examples of their treatment as less than human beings. The belief that these people are not quite human continues today. With the advent of genetic screening and prenatal testing, physicians routinely suggest selectively aborting fetuses with the markers of Down syndrome. In addition, the argument of medical futility has been used to withhold or withdraw medical care in cases where people with intellectual/developmental disabilities are not deemed worth keeping alive.

Fairfax County Board of Directors in Virginia designated March as Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities Inclusion Month in 2011, with a goal of enhancing understanding of the issues affecting developmentally disabaled citizens. Funding is one key to ensuring that people with intellectual/developmental disabilities receive the services and support they need.

Implications of Attitudes and Myths on Human Service Professionals

As members of society, human service professionals hold certain attitudes and beliefs. However, because of the work these professionals do, it is important that they are explicitly aware of these attitudes, beliefs, and perceptions so that they can provide the most effective support possible with the least amount of negative bias. This awareness is also crucial because attitudes toward people with intellectual/developmental disabilities play a key role in deciding which conceptualizations of disability will be relied upon as models of service provision. These models in turn help (1) define the kinds of services people receive, (2) outline the requirements for education and training for service providers, (3) identify which individuals are deserving of or entitled to receive which services, (4) delineate who is responsible to provide the services, (5) describe where services are to be received, and (6) articulate the circumstances under which services will be provided.

Funding is one key to ensuring that people with intellectual/developmental disabilities receive the services and support they need. However, it must be recognized that the mechanisms in place that either permit or deny funding are based on a professionalized process that is concerned with attaching labels to people and focusing on their deficiencies. This reality encourages the myth that people with intellectual/developmental disabilities are patients and/or incompetent children and should be subject to the gatekeeping authority that society vests in certain professionals, particularly in the medical and allied fields. Reconceptualizing how society sees and values people with intellectual/developmental disabilities can change attitudes, challenge stereotypical myths, and alter the models behind service provision. For example, when supports are accorded to people who are recognized as citizens, another safeguard is in place to encourage and protect services for people with intellectual/developmental disabilities. The role of the citizen provides society with a very different perspective about who people are and what they deserve.

Sometimes it can be difficult to analyze these issues in the field, particularly in situations where the service system is operating largely in a reactive or crisis-driven mode. It is also difficult to take a systemwide perspective when human service professionals are intimately involved in providing intensive support to a smaller group of individuals. People should evaluate the work they do in the context of myths and attitudes. Understanding roles and the implications of holding these roles is crucial to deconstructing the myths about people with intellectual/developmental disabilities. This understanding, in turn, will help challenge and change societal attitudes that have been perpetuated over time and have had significant impacts on all aspects of these people's lives, including the social service industry upon which they rely.

Karen D. Schwartz
Zana Marie Lutfiyya
University of Manitoba

See Also: Disability, International Variation in Attitudes Toward; Disability Services; Disability Studies.

Further Readings

American Association on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities. "Definition of Intellectual Disability." http://www.aaidd.org/content_100.cfm (Accessed June 2013).

Livneh, Hanoch. "On the Origins of Negative Attitudes Toward People with Disabilities." In The Psychological and Social Impact of Illness and Disability, 6th ed., Irmo Marini and Mark A. Stebnicki, eds. New York: Springer Publishing, 2012.

Wolfensberger, Wolf. A Brief Introduction to Social Role Valorization: A High-Order Concept for Addressing the Plight of Societally Devalued People, and for Structuring Human Services, 3rd ed.. Syracuse, NY: Training Institute for Human Service Planning, Leadership and Change Agentry, Syracuse University, 1998.

Developmental Disabled Individuals

As defined in Public Law 98-527, the Developmental Disabilities and Bill of Rights Act, a developmental disability is a severe chronic disability in an individual 5 years of age or older that is attributable to a mental or physical impairment or a combination of such impairments. Developmental disabilities are manifested before the age of 22 years and are likely to continue indefinitely.

These disabilities result in substantial functional limitations in three or more of the following areas of major life activity: self-care, receptive and expressive language, learning, mobility, self-direction, capacity for independent living, and economic self-sufficiency. These limitations are reflective of the individual's need for special, interdisciplinary, or generic services, supports, or other assistance that is of lifelong or extended duration and is individually planned and coordinated.

Persons classified as developmentally disabled may include those with mental retardation, Down syndrome, autism, cerebral palsy, and traumatic brain injury as well as some individuals with hearing impairment, vision impairment, and attention deficit disorders. Other terms included in the condition are "learning disability" as defined in the United Kingdom and international definitions of "intellectual disability" (ID).

People with mental retardation are the majority group, and it is toward this group that services have traditionally been targeted. The historic focus on this group has also driven attention to the labels used to describe such individuals. Terms have moved from feeblemindedness, to mental deficiency and retardation, and then to a growing emphasis on the so-called people-first language, such as "person with a developmental disability." This is the term used in this article. (Persons with Down syndrome are considered a subgroup of persons with mental retardation.)

There are no precise prevalence figures for developmental disabilities. The American Psychiatric Association (APA) cited a rate of 2–3 percent of the population in 2000, but more recently researchers C. A. Boyle and colleagues estimate that one in six children has a developmental disability, an increase of almost 14 percent since 1997 figures. Also, the life span of people with developmental disabilities has increased. Scholars A. Factor, T. Heller, and M. Janicki, using 2010 census data, estimate that there were 850,600 people with developmental disabilities age 60 and older in the United States, and that this would increase to 1.4 million by 2030.

History of Services

Throughout history, service delivery for the developmentally disabled has included the following:

- The development of protective residential facilities with educational and self-sufficiency programs in the 19th century (Villages of Happiness).
- Early-20th-century concerns that such disabilities were a manifestation of deviance, encouraging warehousing and sterilization.
- Mid-20th-century scandals over the mistreatment and dehumanization of people with developmental disabilities in large institutions.
- Major movement of services into the community and in support of independent living and family care.

There has also been movement from segregated special education services to inclusion in mainstream classrooms, reduction of reliance on sheltered employment services and development of competitive job opportunities, and greater utilization of mainstream health services. Drivers of these changes have been advocacy, legislation, court action, and Medicaid waiver–driven change processes.

Trends for movement to the community have been supported by reports that people with developmental disabilities living in community settings display (1) increased adaptive behavior, (2) better health compared to those living in nursing homes, and (3) improved quality of life. However, other reports state that community presence is easier to achieve than true community integration.

Of note is the continuing impact of the U.S. Supreme Court's Olmstead decision (Olmstead v. L.C., 527 U.S. 581, 119 S.Ct. 2176, 1999), which observed that "institutional placement of persons who can handle and benefit from community settings perpetuates unwarranted assumptions that persons so isolated are incapable or unworthy of participating in community life"; and > confinement in an institution severely diminishes the everyday life activities of individuals, including family relations, social contacts, work options, economic independence, educational advancement, and cultural enrichment.

Related litigation has established the concept of the most integrated setting expressed as where people live, spend their days, work, and participate in their communities.

Health Care and Aging Concerns

Individuals with ID appear to have a greater variety of health care needs compared to those of the same age and gender in the general population. Researcher H. M. van Schrojenstein Lantaman-De Valk and colleagues found that people with developmental disabilities served in mainstream health services had 2.5 times the health problems of those without such lifelong disabilities. Health conditions are reported to be highly influenced by lack of information, lack of exercise, poor mobility, poor eating habits, and medication use. People with developmental disabilities are more likely to lead unhealthy lifestyles, and their health problems go unrecognized even when they attend health clinics. Controversial evidence shows that the experience of poor health and early mortality among people with developmental disabilities may be related to the types and quality of health care services they receive.

Rates of mental health concerns also appear higher. Social, cultural, environmental, and developmental factors and the consequences of polypharmacy and inadequate medication review have also been reported to increase rates of physical, psychiatric, and behavioral disorders. People with developmental disabilities, particularly those with Down syndrome, are reported to be at higher risk for onset of dementia and of premature aging.

Despite these risks and health care delivery concerns, there have been marked increases overall in the longevity of persons with developmental disabilities.

Service Provision

A range of service options are available for people with developmental disabilities, including residential care, family support, and day programming, although access varies across the United States.

Residential care. A range of residential options are available privately, but most residential care for the developmentally disabled is publicly funded. Some large institutions remain, but residential services are generally delivered through group homes, ranging from four to 16 beds, located in community neighborhoods, and supported by a paid staff; apartments and other independent living programs with some staff support; and paid adult foster care. On a more limited basis, homes have been bought and managed by people with developmental disabilities themselves or their families, again with some staff or volunteer support.

Family support. Family support programs are designed to help parents or other family members continue to support an individual with a developmental disability in the home where they have always lived. Supportive services, such as time-limited assistance from professionals, are targeted at the individual with a developmental disability but there may be offerings such as respite care, transportation, educational programs, and support groups that also benefit the caregiver. A core intent is that these services help reduce the need to access out-of-home care.

Day programming. There is recognition that everyone benefits socially as well as economically from opportunities to engage in work, so vocational options are available that include sheltered workshops, job coaching, competitive employment placement, and job training. Not everyone is able to access and benefit from employment programs, however, and there is also recognition of the need for postretirement activities, which means there are often staffed day programs available.

Service Approaches

Four major concepts now influence services provision: self-determination, person-centered planning, participant direction, and permanency and futures planning.

Self-determination. Self-determination refers to an individual having control over all aspects of his or her life and exercising basic rights such as citizenship, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. For persons with developmental disabilities who have impaired decision making and difficulties in managing their day-to-day life, there must therefore be processes to discover their desires for their lives and to utilize planning and service delivery processes that fulfill self-determination and the realization of the person's wishes. Person-centered planning is a mechanism for realizing self-determination.

Person-centered planning. Person-centered planning is a "process of continual listening and learning; focused on what is important to someone now and for the future; and acting upon this in alliance with their family and friends." Originating in ideas such as normalization, social role valorization, and the promotion of positive approaches to disability, person-centered planning is designed to offer a planning process by which individuals are able to harness services of their own choosing to engage positively in everyday relationships, participate in the community, and exercise choice in their own lives.

Participant direction. Participant direction is a facet of the larger self-determination philosophy in which participants with developmental disabilities actively direct their own chosen services by working with a care coordinator, a financial manager, and service providers. Participants may also designate another person as a consumer representative to carry out all or some of these tasks on their behalf.

Permanency and futures planning. As persons with developmental disabilities age, future living arrangements and the associated legal and financial concerns become major issues. This circumstance can occur because older caregiving parents are no longer able or available to provide care, or because prior out-of-home placements no longer seem suitable for age-related needs. Residential living permanency planning considers best options among independent living; shared households with siblings, other relatives, or family friends; and transitions into supervised apartment, adult foster care, and group home programs. Legal protection issues include legal guardianship, trusteeship, and conservatorship of person and property issues, including the drafting of wills and other documents. Financial issues address arrangements that will ensure continued financial eligibility for needed services for the person with a developmental disability.

Diversity

People with developmental disabilities represent a diverse population in their own right, and there is also growing diversity in terms of race, ethnicity, and socioeconomic status among those seeking and receiving services. Growing numbers of people with developmental disabilities accessing general services rather than those specific to developmental disability also mean that this is a population with whom all human services organizations must engage.

Philip McCallion
State University of New York, Albany

See Also: Disabilities, International Variation in Attitudes Toward; Disability Services; Disability Studies.

Further Readings

American Psychiatric Association (APA). American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-IV). Washington, DC: APA, 2002.
Boyle, C. A., et al. "Trends in the Prevalence of Developmental Disabilities in US Children, 1997–2008." Pediatrics, v.127/6 (2011).
Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act 2000 (Public Law 106-402; 114 STAT. 1677), October 30, 2000. http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/add/ddact/DDACT2.html (Accessed December 2013).
Factor, A., T. Heller, and M. Janicki. Bridging the Aging and Developmental Disabilities Service Networks: Challenges and Best Practices. Chicago: Institute on Disability and Human Development, University of Illinois at Chicago, 2012.
McCallion, P. and L. Ferretti. Manual and Online Training in Consumer Directed Care. Albany, NY: Center for Excellence in Aging & Community Wellness, University at Albany, SUNY, 2010.
McCallion, P., et al. "Meeting the End of Life Needs of Older Adults With Intellectual Disabilities." In Contemporary and Innovative Practice in Palliative Care, E. Chang and A. Johnson, eds. Rijeka, Croatia: Intech, 2012.
van Schrojenstein Lantman-De Valk, H. M., J. F. Metsemakers, M. J. Haveman, and H. F. Crebolder. "Health Problems in People with Intellectual Disability in General Practice: A Comparative Study." Family Practice, v.17/5 (2000).
World Health Organization (WHO). International Classification of Functioning, Disability and Health. Geneva: WHO, 2001.

Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Cultural Responsiveness of

The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) is a reference guide that provides standardized criteria for evaluating mental disorders. The DSM is used by many professionals, including health care providers, social workers, clinicians, legal representatives, and researchers. The objective of the DSM is to create a common language for members of diverse professions to coordinate meanings across professional boundaries. The DSM closely resembles the World Health Organization's (WHO) International Classification of Diseases (ICD) in terms of function. Both reference systems are used by those working in human services for medical coding and insurance billing purposes. First published in 1952 by the American Psychiatric Association (APA), the DSM is currently in its fifth edition.

By the end of World War II, several branches of the armed forces and military affairs had each developed their own criteria and terminology for diagnosing military personnel. That, along with the diagnostic criteria put forth by the ICD, made for widespread disagreement and misunderstanding within the field of mental health. In an effort to allow for cross-contextual communication, the APA commissioned its first task force to develop a uniform way of evaluating, identifying, and diagnosing mental conditions.

The first and second editions of the DSM primarily reflected psychodynamic approaches to psychiatry that were dominant at the time. Psychoanalysis represented the most notable psychodynamic approach, and thus the first authors of the DSM were heavily influenced by the work of Sigmund Freud and Carl Jung. In line with psychoanalytic principles, the DSM founders believed that human behavior could be explained by basic drives and motivations, both conscious and unconscious. As a result, disorders and the symptoms of disorders were interpreted in relation to an individual's experiences, not in terms of a predefined classificatory system.

It was not until the release of the third edition (DSM-3) a few decades later that the manual assumed the form by which it is recognized today. Due to the perceived arbitrariness of psychiatry as represented by psychoanalysis, the 1960s and 1970s were characterized by a great mistrust and skepticism toward the mental health field as a whole. In 1961, sociologist Erving Goffman published his treatise Asylums, which read much like an exposé of the current mental health system. Goffman reflected on the ways in which mental health institutions dehumanized patients.

A decade later, within psychology, David Rosenhan conducted his infamous Rosenhan Experiment. The experiment entailed Rosenhan and his colleagues claiming to hear voices in order to be admitted into a psychiatric facility. Once admitted, Rosenhan and colleagues engaged in what would otherwise be considered sane behavior, yet because of the initial diagnosis of mental illness, this behavior was nonetheless interpreted as evidence of a mental disorder. Following the experiment, Rosenhan published his study's findings in an article, "On Being Sane in Insane Places," wherein he discussed the enduring quality of diagnostic labels, such as those featured in the DSM, and how once assigned a diagnosis, a patient bears that stigma throughout his or her life.

Recognizing the antagonism toward psychiatry at the time, the task force for the DSM-3 sought to legitimize psychiatry by grounding diagnostic criteria in evidence-based research. Researchers initiated extensive clinical studies to measure the validity of diagnostic proposals. As part of the movement to make psychiatry an objective science, revisions to the DSM included a five-part axis scheme for comprehensively assessing patients. Axis one comprised mental disorders; axis two, personality disorders; axis three, medical conditions; axis four, environmental factors; and axis five represented a global assessment of functioning (GAF).

Robert Spitzer was a key figure in the production of the DSM-3. As chairperson for the DSM-3 task force, he not only redirected the tone of the DSM from theoretical to empirical, he revolutionized how society conceived of difference. Particularly in the case of homosexuality, certain behaviors that deviated from the norm (heterosexuality) were pathologized and regarded as abnormal by psychiatrists as well as by the general public. Under Spitzer's leadership, the APA struck homosexuality from the pages of the DSM, making it no longer a mental disorder.

Criticism

Two editions followed the DSM-3. Like the editions preceding them, the DSM-4 and the DSM-V were not without criticism. Some of the most vocal criticism came from two social workers, Herb Kutchins and Stuart Kirk, who wrote Making Us Crazy. In their text, the authors issued what is now a somewhat common criticism of the DSM; they asserted that the DSM pathologizes otherwise normal behavior. To illustrate, the authors provided the example of the Anita Hill–Clarence Thomas court case. During the hearings, a psychiatrist for the defense speculated that Hill may have been a victim of erotomania, a mental disorder in which the individual subscribes to delusions of another person's love. From this perspective, Hill's behavior was a symptomatic expression of a mental disorder, not evidence of sexual harassment.

The DSM has received further criticism because of its perceived cultural bias. Some argue that the diagnostic criteria featured in the DSM privilege a Western perspective, and pathologize culturally specific behavior. An example is taijin kyofusho, which refers to a deep fear of social interaction. Because this specific syndrome is largely associated with individuals of Japanese heritage, many question whether it is an idiosyncrasy of that culture or a social anxiety disorder, as the DSM-V currently classifies it.

Complaints concerning the DSM's pathologization of normal behavior have also been issued by the DSM-4 former task force chairperson, Allen Frances. In his book, Saving Normal, Frances raises suspicions about the correlation between the rise in disorders featured in the DSM, diagnoses, and pharmaceutical profits. Critics, including Frances, question whether a child's temper tantrum, for instance, is indicative of oppositional defiant disorder, or whether it is typical child behavior. In light of his objections to the DSM, Frances offers a reminder to practitioners who use it. He advises that individuals consulting the DSM treat it not as an absolute authority with respect to diagnoses, but simply as a guide.

When consulting the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Allen Frances, former task force chairperson of DSM-4, advises using the DSM as a guide rather than an absolute authority on the mental health diagnosis.

Shelby Forbes
University of South Florida

See Also: Children With Special Needs; Counseling and Psychiatry Services; Deinstutionalization; Mental Health Services, Adult; Psychiatric and Psychological Assessment.

Further Readings

Decker, Hannah S. The Making of DSM-III: A Diagnostic Manual's Conquest of American Psychiatry. New York: Oxford University Press, 2013.

Frances, Allen. Saving Normal: An Insider's Revolt Against Out-of-Control Psychiatric Diagnosis, DSM-5, Big Pharma, and the Medicalization of Ordinary Life. New York: HarperCollins, 2013.

Kutchins, Herb and Stuart A. Kirk. Making Us Crazy. New York: The Free Press, 1997.

Mayes, Rick and Allan V. Horwitz. "DSM-III and the Revolution in the Classification of Mental Illness." Journal of the History of the Behavioral Sciences, v.41/3 (2005).

Diaspora

The term diaspora refers to individuals who live outside of their countries of origin. The word diaspora is Greek in origin and is literally translated as scattering or dispersion (dia, meaning over, and speiro, meaning to sow). The term has ancient roots, having been originally used in reference to the historic Jewish exile chronicled in the Old Testament. The term diaspora has since been used not only to describe ancient groups of migrants, such as Jewish and Greek populations, but also to describe other migrant groups, such as the Armenians, who have persisted in a desire to return home after centuries of forced exile from their historic homelands.

Human services professionals have a long history of working with migrant populations, and the likelihood of having increased exposure to this often vulnerable and marginalized population is significant due to the ongoing internationalization of the human services profession. Currently, many human services professionals work with refugee and exile populations on micro- and macrolevels, including providing such direct services as assisting in resettlement efforts, providing case management and trauma counseling, to engaging on a macrolevel in policy work and advocacy efforts on behalf of displaced populations. As such, it is imperative that those in the human services fields become aware of the global dynamics that often result in the migration of large groups of people to other countries, particularly when such migrations are forced due to conflict and natural disasters. Gaining greater understanding of diaspora populations, including the unique nature of their exile status, the reasons for their migration (e.g., forced or voluntary, historic or recent), the cultural context of different diaspora groupings, and their orientation toward their respective homelands, is important for human services professionals, particularly those working with diverse populations.

Diaspora groups fall into three timeline categories: (1) historical diaspora, which existed in premodern times (including the Jewish diaspora after the Babylonian exile); (2) new diaspora, which existed in the post–Industrial Age (this includes the Turkish-Armenians in the early 1920s); and (3) incipient ethnonationalist diaspora, which is the most recent group of diaspora that exists in modern times. Thus, according to most diaspora scholars, contemporary diaspora are often considered ethnonationalist by definition since most are members of groups that were dispersed due to ethnic conflict in their home countries.

Some debate exists about what groups of migrants should be considered diaspora. For instance, sometimes definitions of diaspora are based on historic models of Jewish and Greek diaspora, whereas others are narrower, including only those migrations generated from the conflict of people who retain a wish to return home. The latter definitions often include a set of criteria relating to forced dispersion: a collective identity, an ongoing relationship with the home country, a desire to return home, and some level of alienation from the host country. Diasporas are not a homogeneous group, even if they migrate from the same region, but they often do display similar attitudes, beliefs, and behaviors related to their homelands, as well as relating to their homelands in similar ways.

Relations With Homelands

In addition to being members of an ethnic group and their forced migration to a foreign region being generated from ethnic conflict, diasporas differ from other migrant groups because they never really assimilate to their host countries—they remain committed to returning home. Their desire to keep memories of their homelands alive and to eventually return to their homelands often manifests in the development of a so-called imagined homeland, in which homeland becomes almost a mythical place represented symbolically. The desire of diaspora to keep collective memories of their original homelands alive is often rooted in the conflict that caused their violent, forced migration.

The forced migration experiences of many diaspora were marked by violence, trauma, suffering, pain, and loss. Diaspora also often feel alienated from their host countries, even if they live in a country that is open to different cultures, such as the United States. Even when diaspora do successfully adjust and assimilate into their host country, they tend not to let go of their desire to return to their home country. To keep alive memories of their original homelands and their migration experiences, many diasporas maintain themselves as a distinct community that reflects their ethnic and/or religious traditions and practices. Operating as a collective serves many purposes—chief among them is the way in which collective interactions solidify and reinforce their memories and perspectives of their homelands. Despite an enduring desire to return to their respective homelands, most diaspora members remain in their host countries permanently, but they remain transnational in the sense that they have a foot in each world—their original homeland (and its culture) and their new host country.

Diaspora relate to their original homelands in many of the same ways that other migrant groups do, including financially by sending remittances to their family and friends still living in the original country. They also relate to their original homelands socially by remaining connected to friends and family, in the home country as well as throughout the world, and in a humanitarian manner by establishing charities in the home country that benefit various social causes, such as poverty alleviation, women's issues, education, and child welfare. What is different about many diaspora is that they also relate to their homelands politically. Political engagement may be on behalf of the homeland government and can involve lobbying the host government for causes that benefit the diaspora and/or their home country government. Diaspora who are generated from conflict and are opposed to their homeland's government may engage politically in homeland conflict by lobbying their host country for causes against their homeland's government.

Diaspora increasingly use the Internet to engage in various politically related activities. In fact, many diaspora communities, particularly those in the West, are increasingly referred to as digital diaspora, reflecting their prolific use of the Internet, particularly social media for political purposes. Diaspora communities can make conflict in their home countries worse by having uncompromising attitudes and by taking the side of their coethnics, thus exacerbating conflict. But diaspora are often in the unique position to contribute positively to their homelands, particularly in situations of conflict. For instance, diaspora can serve as liaisons between warring parties, serving as mediators in conflict resolution processes. Diaspora can also contribute positively to their homelands by returning home, even temporarily, to build up social capital that has been depleted through years of war.

Diaspora can contribute positively to their host countries as well, by introducing new ideas and perspectives to their host country societies. With increasing acceptance of multiculturalism in many host countries, diaspora members can retain their transnational identity while successfully acclimating and integrating into their host countries and becoming valuable members of society.

Michelle E. Martin
DePaul University

See Also: African Immigrants; Displaced Persons; Refugee Assistance.

Further Readings

Abdile, M. A. (2010). "Diaspora and Their Role in Homeland Conflicts and Peacebuilding: The Case of Somali Diaspora." Diaspeace Working Paper No. 7. https://jyx.jyu.fi/dspace/bitstream/handle/123456789/36881/DIASPEACE_WP7.pdf?sequence=1(Accessed December 2013).
Baser, B. and A. Swain. "Diasporas as Peacemakers: Third Party Mediation in Homeland Conflicts." International Journal on World Peace, v.7/7 (2008).
Brinkerhoff, J. M. "Diasporas, Skills Transfer and Remittances: Evolving Perceptions and Potential." In Converting Migration Drains into Gains: Harnessing the Resources of Overseas Professionals, C. G. Wescott and J. M. Brinkerhoff, eds. Manila: Asian Development Bank, 2006.
Brinkerhoff, J. M. "Digital Diasporas and Conflict Prevention: The Case of Somalinet.com." Review of International Studies. v.32 (2006).
Cohen, R. "Diasporas and the Nation-State: From Victims to Challengers." International Affairs, v.72/3 (1996).
Cohen, R. Global Diasporas: An Introduction. London: UCL Press, 1997.
Horst, C. "The Role of Diasporas in Civil War." Working paper presented at the Centre for the Study of Civil War (CSCW) Workshop on the Transnational Facets of Civil War. Oslo, Norway, 2007.
Lyons, T. "Diasporas and Homeland Conflict." In Globalization, Territoriality, and Conflict, M. Kahler and B. Walter, eds. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

Directly Observed Therapy

Directly observed therapy is defined as a treatment method in which patients are under direct observation when they take their medication or receive their treatment. This method is designed to reduce risks and ensure patient compliance. The significance of directly observed therapy is great, and more dialogue must be continued to promote yet sustain this treatment option. The method by which individuals receive treatment is paramount to the proper delivery of medical services by medical professionals and the receptiveness of treatment by patients. The strategy proves cost-effective yet it seeks to protect the patient's dignity and autonomy. Current research of directly observed therapy indicates positive, negative, and mixed reviews of directly observed therapy approaches in a large proportion of clients who are afflicted with malaria, tuberculosis, and HIV/AIDS. Most important, research has shed light with regard to cost-effectiveness, patients' adherence to medical treatment, and the ability to provide this therapy to indigent patients (e.g., persons who are homeless and underinsured) in dire need of treatment. Therefore, the scope of directly observed treatment seeks to promote wellness and sustain life not just at a given cost but at all costs.

Patient adherence to medical treatment increases the likelihood of improving the health of the patient while significantly decreasing the costs associated with medical care. Directly observed therapy is a treatment strategy modality related to improving a patient's adherence to medical professionals' directives pertaining to regimens. A multimethod approach relieves any transparencies related to treatment. Medical practitioners can alleviate the issues of nonadherence (i.e., reviewing patient's health reports and monitoring pill counts). L. Martin and colleagues reported that 40 percent of all patients have either ignored the advice of health care professionals or had inadequately followed the advice of health care professionals with regard to the proper regimen needed to improve health in cases of debilitating illnesses. Such nonadherence becomes costly, as hundreds of billions of dollars are spent by the health care industry due to noncompliance.

Recent scholarly reviews regarding the directly observed treatment modality have explored various regimens of patients diagnosed with life-threatening ailments. Global medical research, specifically in countries such as Ethiopia, which has a high mortality rate, have adopted the direct observation strategy because it assures that medical professionals have adequately diagnosed the illness and that patients comply with the processes involved to control endemic diseases. Consequently, it has been revealed that patient autonomy, dignity, and integrity pose a threat, particularly with regard to the effectiveness of the delivery of observed treatment to patients.

Justifications

Five justifications must be assessed properly when public health interventions conflict with ethical behavior outlined by the health care community: (1) effectiveness, (2) proportionality, (3) necessity, (4) least infringement, and (5) public justification. These justifications are essential to protect the patient and the general public from unwarranted harm. Burdens that lay with the patient at the request of public health officials should be reciprocated with the community at large. Health care professionals are obligated to identify and remove any program that unjustifiably infringes on the rights of the patient or proves to be ineffective.

The most notable of such unfair programs involves directly observed treatment that works well for individuals with few financial burdens but creates extra financial burdens for indigent individuals, who lack the economic resources needed to successfully comply with specific treatment. John Rawls concurs by stating simply, "All lives have equal value." Therefore, the allocation of resources must be readily available for those who desperately need medical treatment for survival. Thus, some form of moral justification based upon the greater good for humanity and reflected in policies are at times revisited or implemented based on what is deemed to be the most efficient and cost-effective.

Practitioners often must rely upon directly observed therapy as a mode of medical delivery services for proper diagnosis and effective medical practices rendered to the patient. Commonly this involves seeing to proper dosage and other medicinal services needed to combat endemic diseases. Patient adherence is complex and contains multiple concepts with the intent to integrate the data that identifies factors that affect patient adherence with regard to medication management. Studies have shown that exogenous factors relate to patient adherence, not excluding changes in lifestyle. If physicians assume that patients are taking the proper dosage as prescribed, failures may be improperly assessed, leading to the risk of other illnesses that are not related to the principal illness. Most important, it is of paramount importance that patients communicate with health care professionals in earnest with regard to any risks associated with receiving any type of treatment to properly address the patient's medical needs. Complications occur if and when there are additional side affects compounded by the presence of other lingering illnesses. Multiple illnesses will increase the likelihood of a patient interrupting one specific treatment plan in order to give more attention to other health needs that are of equal or greater importance.

With regard to nonadherence of individuals participating in programs that promote directly observed therapy, common problems are closely related to the side effects linked to ingesting additional medicines that are prescribed for patients during the proposed treatment cycle. Research has shown that patients receiving treatment for HIV/AIDS are more apt to be consistent with taking the proper dosage of medicines required to slow down the effects of the illness. For example, patients receiving treatment for HIV/AIDS are required to ingest multiple pills or "cocktails" to combat illnesses that could develop. However, taking various medicines during specific regimen schedules can possibly create side effects that are not related to the prescriptions.

Patients whose immune systems and/or patients who incur low tolerance for pain and illness may discontinue taking certain medicines with the assumption that more powerful prescriptions would offset the prescriptions that are less potent with fewer side effects. Also, the physical effects of more powerful drugs might not be desired by the patient. This would pose a problem for medical care professionals in diagnosing the patient's health, further putting the patient at risk of incurring other illnesses. Directly observed therapy is an effective approach, depending upon the patient's adherence to treatment, affordability, and proper diagnosis of illness.

Julian Scott
Prairie View A&M University

See Also: Home and Community Services; Home Care Services; Homelessness.

Further Readings

Catz, S. L., et al. "Patterns, Correlates, and Barriers to Medication Adherence among Persons Prescribed New Treatments for HIV Disease." Health Psychology, v.19/2 (2000).

DiMatteo, M. R. "Evidence-Based Strategies to Foster Adherence and Improve Patient Outcomes." Journal of the American Academy of Physician Assistants, v.17/11 (2004).

Martin, L., et al. "The Challenge of Patient Adherence." Therapeutics and Clinical Risk Management, v.1/3 (2005).

Rawls, J. A Theory of Justice. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Sagbakken, M. "Ethical Aspects for Directly Observed Treatment for Tuberculosis: A Cross-Cultural Comparison." BMC Medical Ethics, v.14/25 (2013).

Takeuchi, R., et al. "Directly-Observed Therapy for the Radical 14-Day Primaquine Treatment of Plasmodium Vivax Malaria on the Thai-Myanmar Border." Malaria Journal, v.9/308 (2010).

Disabilities, International Variation in Attitudes Toward

Research has shown that attitudes toward people with disabilities vary among countries and even within various subsets of people within countries. At variance also is the definition of disability, as consensus of this definition has not been achieved due to factors of ethnicity, religion, and race, which add variables of cultural bias onto attitudes. Distinctions between physical disability and neural-cognitive disability and among rural, suburban, and urban environments also play roles in disability perceptions. Ultimately, perceptions of disability, in the general sense, tend to be negative.

This article focuses on international variations in attitudes toward disabilities in Europe, North America, Central and South America, the Middle East, Africa, and East Asia and the Pacific Islands as well as Australia. Not all citizens of the countries and municipalities discussed share the same views; for instance, people in the United States have been shown to react less favorably to those with physical impairments than their Chinese counterparts. Also, oftentimes people's empathic feelings toward those with disabilities vary, depending on the type of disability. In addition to the individual-level attitudes displayed by citizens, this article touches on government-level macropolicies concerning those with disabilities. At times, the micro- and macrolevel attitudes and policies converge and have a mezzo-level effect on the individual with disabilities.

Historical Notes

The history of attitudes toward people with disabilities has been well documented over hundreds of years, with odd bits of information that predate that time frame. Trends in these attitudes have changed as society has changed from agrarian to manufacturing to service. During the 1500s, Martin Luther perceived the disabled child as evil and worthless. As far back as the 1600s, John Locke distinguished mental illness from intellectual disability. The most positive attitudes toward disabilities were held by practitioners of Islam who held people with disabilities as equals to all other human beings because every human being was equally special to Allah.

European and North American Attitudes

Many European and early North American settlers perceived people with disabilities as evil, a reflection on the devil's works. Perhaps as a result of the agrarian society in which many lived, it was incumbent that all people contribute to their own subsistence as well as that of their families and their communities. In those circumstances, attitudes toward the disabled were pragmatic, and those who could not hold their own were shunned.

During the late 1700s and early 1800s, advances in education in Europe gave hope to training and ability to learn for people with disabilities. With education reform, people with disabilities began to be viewed more positively. This filtered its way to the United States in the mid-1800s. However, these positive gains were short lived with the advent of social Darwinism and mechanisms to measure intelligence (e.g., Alfred Binet's Intelligence Quotient test). By the early 20th century, attitudes moved to distrust, fear of perpetuating inferior human beings, and congregate isolation—the advent of large self-sustaining institutions.

Ties to thinking about and responding to people with disabilities were closely intertwined into the 20th century between European culture and that in the United States. From the 1930s forward, however, a distinct change in attitudes and services began to take place. From that point forward the United States and Canada began to bring their own imprint and advances on thought and policy.

Wolf Wolfensberger proposes that clear patterns of attitude toward disability were evident in history. He advanced the idea that disability was a social problem as opposed to a problem of personhood. That is, communities create in their identity what constitutes normal and deviant, and furthermore, communities identify what is important to them. Once that identity is firmly established, people and groups on the fringes who are perceived as negatively disabled are increasingly treated by lowered social status. Status can change over time, or once communities reassess how they perceive a group or class of people.

To justify lowered status, communities cast people into roles. These roles clearly place the individual and group outside the positive parameters of the community identity. For example, as Wolfensberger argues, people with disabilities are perceived as menacing or dangerous, piteous, a burden of charity, childlike or eternal children, sick, or nonhuman/subhuman. Once cast into these roles, society takes wounding action, including, for example, rejection, segregation, involuntary material poverty, impoverishment of experience, and relationship incongruity. In other words, attitudes proceed from perception, to feeling, to typecast, to isolation/extinction.

One cultural anthropologic theory proposed that attitudes about disability are framed by the codes and laws that govern people. In contemporary Western discourse, particularly in the United States, a primary construct is that of equality, often understood as sameness or similarity. The problem arises in which attitudes toward disability are affected by the tension arising when sameness converges on intolerance. That is, equality is innately opposed to diversity and individualism. People with disabilities can be neither equal nor individual.

Where personhood is equated with being human in valued and meaningful ways, then individuals can achieve personhood to a greater or lesser extent. Characteristics that drive perceptions on personhood are divergent: autonomy and independent versus membership and inclusion. The thought was that people with disabilities often rely on others to accommodate their development; they are rarely able to achieve full personhood, and thus they never can become fully human.

Conceptually, positive attitudes toward disability are found in higher-educated people and in children in North America and Europe. Children have had the advantage of growing up in an era of inclusion such that the mystery of disability is removed. Since attitudes are changing, concepts about inclusion are incorporated into policy and programming. However, as disabled people age, inclusion becomes less successful. Attitudes that hinder opportunities speak to a feeling of disability making the person less competent to participate in meaningful ways, therefore providing less social programming that focuses on inclusion.

Latin America (South America, Central America, and Mexico)

A wide variance in attitude pervades Latin American thinking on disability. Tolerance and treatment are most well established among college-educated persons, particularly women. However, the dominant cultural perspectives on disability are drawn from a focus on family as a linchpin from which attitudes are derived.

In Latin American culture, families take care of their own. Consequently, disability becomes a family matter for help and support. The reason for the presence of disability is varied (i.e., from divine will or as the result of some heretical or physical insult). One of the overriding features, however, is that families manage the disability. This leads to the notion that people with disabilities need to be taken care of. That notion of protection, or overprotection, inherently stymies independence and independent growth for the affected person. Since families take care of their loved ones, disability can be stigmatizing from a community standard, even within extended families.

Mental health challenges are further ostracized within Latino cultures. Attitudes that people are crazy (loco) marginalize individuals and discourage open discussion about the disease. Because of the taboos associated with mental illness, services are underutilized. Frequently, treatment efforts go toward encouraging the individual to try spiritual rituals or traditional lore to cure themselves of their affliction.

A dominant attitude in Mexico is said to be pity. It is not a pity of compassion but of negative feelings. Charity becomes the predominant way people with disabilities are supported. Particularly in rural settings, disability is often managed by hiding people within the nucleus of family, with little opportunity for inclusion in groups. In urban settings, a common attitude is that disability prevents development as a whole person. There are no expectations regarding capabilities; thus, the community will provide support through charity.

Frequently, a distinction arises between a physical disability and a neurodevelopmental disability in that people with physical handicaps can overcome their burden and be productive citizens in many ways. People with neurodevelopmental or intellectual disabilities are perceived in different ways, including that they are cursed or thought of as beautiful. These conceptions are derived from cultural variances.

Africa

Attitudes toward people with disabilities vary throughout the disparate societies within the African continent, with the most pervasive attitude one of feeling helpless and lacking hope. The etiology of disabilities may be attributed to sorcery, paranormal forces, interventions by a deity, and/or sexual causes.

Perceptions and treatment of individuals with disabilities in Africa vary widely. For instance, the Chagga in East Africa perceive those with physical disabilities as pacifiers of spirits of an evil nature. This serves a protective function for those with these disabilities within this group. Similarly, in West Africa law enforcement officials are chosen from those with noticeable physical impairments among the Benin. Within this same community children with physical impairments are thought to be protected by paranormal forces and to bring good luck to those around them.

In contrast, to the Chagga and Benin, the Ashanti of central Ghana exclude men with physical defects or impairments from becoming chiefs in the community. If a chief were to develop an impairment, he would be removed from the position. Traditionally, children with obvious physical disabilities are rejected. Children with severe developmental disabilities, believed to be animal-like, are often abandoned at the edge of a water source to facilitate a return to their so-called own kind. Within Ghana, however, there are variations in attitudes. Those with developmental disabilities are often revered and thought to be a reincarnation of a divine being among the Ga.

Within Kenya and Zimbabwe, a child with a disability may be thought of as a curse to an entire family. This brings shame to the family and often results in rejection. Rejection comes with medical, social, and educational costs, including comparatively little food and medical care compared to other children, less attention and nurturing from parents, and fewer educational opportunities. While social perceptions may influence academic chances, the Kenyan constitution calls for inclusive education, as does the Kenyan Persons with Disabilities Act of 2003. This inclusion was further updated in 2010 in a policy regarding special needs education adopted by the Ministry of Education.

In some communities, those with physical disabilities are looked upon favorably, but these perceptions can vary within a singular community, as is the case with the Ibo of Nigeria who may look upon those with disabilities with a range of attitudes from favoritism to disdain.

East Asia

The World Health Organization (WHO) has stated that the Asian and Pacific areas are home to more than 400 million people with disabilities, which constitutes two-thirds of the world's disabled population. After realizing the dearth of resources available and provided to this population, WHO designated the period from 1993 to 2002 as the Asian and Pacific Decade of Disabilities. The year 2007 marked only the second time that the Special Olympics was held in east China. The Special Olympics is the world's largest sports organization for people of all ages with intellectual disabilities. The Chinese showed the largest delegation, despite a perception, at times, that questioned the abilities or the extent of ability in those designated as having disabilities. China has made progress in creating a national focus on accepting and supporting those with disabilities.

The Special Olympic games at Fort Gordon, Georgia, on March 24, 2010. Conceptually, positive attitudes toward disability are found in higher-educated people and in children in North America and Europe. With attitudes changing in this way, more frequently concepts about inclusion are incorporated into policy and programming.

Like others, Asian governments have also made educational provisions for students with disabilities. In China, education is required for all children, including those with disabilities, through the Law on Compulsory Education and the Law of the Protection of the Rights of the Disabled. In 2003, a cluster of "sunshine homes" were created in China that provide supported employment for teenagers and young adults with intellectual disabilities. In the mid-1990s, the Lao People's Democratic Republic also required compulsory education for all children, including those with disabilities.

Even given the advances in education reform for those with disabilities, East Asian disabled children continue to have the lowest access to education. When the person with a disability is also a female, the rate of educational access is even lower. The concept of karma may play a role in the perception of the disabled child as punishment for an individual's or family's wrongs or misconduct. As a result of these feelings, a family member may be hidden from public view and subsequently miss opportunities for community activities as well as educational opportunities. This phenomenon has been confirmed in almost all developing East Asian countries, as well as in Cambodia and Thailand.

The 1997 Fiji Poverty Report confirmed that those with disabilities are often treated as though they have no value, and therefore they are not provided with the necessary resources to capitalize on their abilities. Those with disabilities were confirmed to be the most disadvantaged in the country.

Middle East and North Africa

Within the Middle East, variations in perceptions of disabilities exist as they do in other areas. Throughout many countries in the Middle East and North Africa, amputations are a common cause of disability. Afghanistan, for instance, has one of the largest populations of disabled people in the world, due mainly to encounters with land mines. Discrimination continues to impact the disabled of Afghanistan, despite interventions and aid from numerous international organizations. Physical and verbal abuse are common, and deficits in access to health care and education are frequent.

Social stigma as well as lack of access to transportation, buildings, and services continue to exist throughout the Middle East and north Africa. The stigma and environment of exclusion encountered are not just outside the home—many families also stigmatize family members with disabilities. As is the case in many areas, women are further burdened in this regional context. Women are the main caretakers of those with disabilities. Disabled women are stigmatized or denied access to services, education, or opportunities only because they are female and disabled.

In Saudi Arabia, a plethora of programs for the disabled exist in urban and metropolitan areas, but programs are lacking in rural areas, where over half the population resides. Statistics regarding disability prevalence are underreported, but it is known that the cause of many disabilities arises from consanguineous marriages of closely related relatives. The issue of disability is a sensitive one, although Islamic Sharia stresses human rights for everyone, including those with disabilities. Provision of health care services is emphasized over providing educational and vocational opportunities.

In Egypt, about 3.5 percent of the population has a disability. Egypt has developed programs to assist those with disabilities, and the Ministry of Education has implemented special education services in more than 160 specialized schools and at least one special education classroom in more than 200 schools. Despite this, these services reach only about 10 percent of those with disabilities.

The Jordanian Law for the Welfare of Disabled Persons states that an education must be made available for those with disabilities, specified as students with special needs (including medical conditions and intellectual disabilities), learning disabilities, behavior problems, and speech and language issues. Laws such as this one exist in some areas, but laws creating an inclusive environment are nonexistent in other areas and lack systematic application in still others.

Australia

In contrast to other nations, issues around treatment of those with disabilities as well as provisions of services are similar throughout Australia. The Australian perceptions of those with disabilities within their own borders is unique, however, given their extremely diverse population, including indigenous Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander populations with their own history of discrimination and strife. Within this indigenous population, those with disabilities are reported to require services at twice the rate of nonindigenous people with disabilities. This is attributed in part due to general socioeconomic disparities and histories of discrimination, but also increased risks such as high body mass index, smoking or exposure to smoke, substance abuse, and poor nutrition, among others. The National Disability Insurance Scheme (now known as Disability Care Australia) has created a specific focus on supporting indigenous populations, and has also refocused the goals to an early intervention and prevention model for both indigenous and nonindigenous populations.

Recent reform efforts in Australia have highlighted the fact that the population is aging in increasing numbers with trends similar to different countries around the world. This growth also is seen in those with disabilities, who are living longer as opposed to the quite shortened life spans that were predominant among this group 30 to 50 years ago. While discrimination, social exclusion, and a lack of understanding of the ways in which those with disabilities can be integrated into the common social culture may still exist, government reforms are attempting to remove the gap between services for the aged and services for those with disabilities. The government initiatives are also focusing on person-centered and self-directed services for those with disabilities, as well as encouraging choice and participation through the process of obtaining and executing those services.

Shanna L. Burke
John Struth
Nonotuck Resource Associates, Inc.

See Also: Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cultural Paradigms; Developmental Disabilities, Attitudes and Myths in Services for; Developmental Disabled Individuals; Disability Services; Education, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Ethnic Diversity and Values Institutional Oppression.

Further Reading

Bigby, Christine. "A Five-Country Comparative Review of Accommodation Support Policies for Older People with Intellectual Disability." Journal of Policy & Practice in Intellectual Disabilities, v.7/1 (2010).

Munyi, Chomba Wa. "Past and Present Perceptions toward Disability: A Historical Perspective." Disability Studies Quarterly, v.32/2 (2012).

Reynolds-Whyte, S. and B. Ingstad. "Disability and Culture: An Overview." In Disability and Culture, S. Reynolds-Whyte and B. Ingstad. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

Scheerenburger, R. C. "A History of Mental Retardation." Baltimore, MD: Paul H. Brooks Publishing, 1983.

Wendel, Tim. "Special Olympics Brings New Hope and Prospect to China." Exceptional Parent, v.38/1 (2008).

Wolfensberger, Wolf. "The Principle of Normalization in Human Services." Toronto: National Institute on Mental Retardation, 1972.

World Bank. "A Note on Disability Issue in Middle East and North Africa." Human Development Department, Middle East and North Africa Region." http://web.worldbank.org (Accessed August 2013).

Disability Services

Service delivery to persons with disabilities, their families, and their communities occurs at multiple levels and through many funding streams. Understanding this delivery requires a clear understanding of (1) the frequent presence of coexisting intellectual and developmental, sensory, communication, or cognitive disabilities; (2) multiple funding streams; and (3) types of disabilities. This article reflects general trends in service delivery. Services for persons with disabilities tend to be relatively advanced compared to human services for other populations because this group has many family members and other advocates seeking reliable and effective programs.

Across the different types of disabilities, individuals and their advocates increasingly focus on concerns to improve environmental accessibility and inclusion in their communities. Recent decades have seen the shift from services being provided based on a diagnosis to a functional approach. Under this functional approach, individuals receive services based on what is required to improve quality of life, increase their own decision making, and support community inclusion. Vital issues include conceptualizing new perspectives arising from the field of disability studies in which the traditional medical model is rejected in favor of full inclusion and the assumption that people with disabilities are best served if their lives are interconnected through their peers, who may or may not have disabilities. In this shift from a traditional medical model (that assumed a deficit in the individual) to a social model of disability (focused on inclusion), relevant employment issues and services lead to increased community participation (e.g., supported employment); housing services; and a community in which approaches such as person-centeredness, peer support, consumer-driven, and independent-living movements are provided to increase a disabled person's likelihood of becoming a fully participating citizen.

At a U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) National Disability Employment Awareness Month event in Washington, D.C., hiring and employing individuals with disabilities pose questions to panel members. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack is dedicated to establishing the USDA as the lead federal agency in employing individuals with disabilities.

Systems of Delivery

Delivery schemes for persons with disabilities are provided both publically and privately. In the public realm, this may include special education services for children with disabilities through the public education system in either a regular classroom or through segregated settings, disability services offices at colleges to support students by discerning and recommending reasonable accommodations, and rehabilitation services for veterans through the U.S. Veterans Administration. The federal government also funds three core functions provided in each of the 50 states and territories. These core functions include advocacy and protection; funding for disability councils so these political jurisdictions can support local initiatives; and University Centers for Excellence in Disabilities, which provide research, technical support, preprofessional training, and other services within a state or territory.

In the private realm, services are provided by not-for-profit and for-profit organizations. The not-for-profit organizations include those that primarily receive funding through a combination of fees, insurance payments, and governmental contracts from local, state, and federal sources. These organizations typically serve those persons with intellectual and developmental, communication, sensory, or psychiatric disabilities. Often persons receiving services are referred and funded by local (e.g., county) governments. In the for-profit sector, persons receiving services frequently have a disabling condition that may be temporary or long term, such as traumatic brain injury, with third-party insurance or first-party fees covering the cost of providing the services.

Types of Services Provided

Service types range from income support and maintenance to direct services. Services include those operating under a medical model (which assumes a deficit in the individual), to a psychosocial model, to a full community inclusion model. Similarly, this range reflects services being provided in varied settings, from segregated settings (e.g., special education schools) to those reflecting full inclusion. In the inclusion model, natural supports—in the form of peers without disabilities, friends, employers, and others—help to attain the inclusion of the individual, often through providing assistive technology and reasonable accommodations.

Two programs dominate the provision of income support and maintenance, Supplemental Security Income (SSI) and Social Security Disability Income (SSDI). Those who receive SSI typically have no or little work history and therefore do not quality for SSDI. Those on SSI often include persons with a lifelong or congenital disability (e.g., Down syndrome), whereas those receiving SSDI more likely acquired disability during their adulthood as a result of injury. SSDI is funded through the Social Security Administration, whereas the costs of SSI are provided by the federal government and matching funds from the states. Similarly, Medicare pays the health care costs of persons with disabilities who have had a significant employment history, whereas Medicaid covers the costs of persons without a significant employment history. Community support services provide advocacy, housing services, and other programs so that individuals can live and thrive in their communities.

Employment services cover a broad range of options. Current best practice reflects an inclusive approach over the more traditional approaches such as sheltered workshops and enclaves. Current practices include competitive supported employment, in which a person with a disability works in a competitive position and receives job-coaching supports. These supports are delivered according to the need of the individual and typically are reduced over time.

Education services in the United States have evolved from segregated education services, in which students attended separate schools, had special education instructors, and rode separate transport systems, to education settings in which students have become included in classrooms and schools with their peers who do not have disabilities. Services are provided to students who may have learning disabilities, sensory and communication disabilities, and intellectual or developmental disabilities. Housing services for persons with intellectual and developmental disabilities have shifted predominately from the traditional institutional scheme to apartments and other community-based options.

Funding of Disability Services

Disability services are funded through a variety of mechanisms. For example, within the private sector of the economy, employers and public spaces are required to make reasonable accommodations under the Americans with Disabilities Act, in order to make their job sites and locales accessible. The majority of funding, however, comes from federal, state, and local governments, with federal sources dominating services affecting quality of life, functioning most often by not-for-profit organizations. The majority of public funding originates from the federal government in the form of block grants to the states. The states then allocate funding to their counties or other local entities. These public local entities then subcontract with private not-for-profit and for-profit entities to provide an array of services at the local level.

Models of Service Delivery

Since the 1970s, disability services have increasingly reflected an inclusion model in which the disabled person participates fully as a citizen within the community. This scheme differs radically from previous ones in which the person with a disability typically resided in institutions, training centers, or other segregated environments. This new wave of services is further reflected in programs such as employment services via supported employment versus the traditional sheltered workshops, travel training in order to learn to use fixed route public transit versus paratransit systems, and planning of services where person-centered planning has replaced multidisciplinary teams.

Acquired Versus Congenital Disability

Disabilities can be either acquired or congenital. An intellectual or developmental disability either develops in the fetus, results from genetic factors, or occurs at the time of birth. People who acquire a disability will access the various delivery systems differently than those with congenital disabilities.

The most common types of acquired disabilities involve veterans who have lost a limb or those who have post-traumatic stress disorder. If determined eligible, these individuals typically receive services through the Veterans Administration. Other acquired disabilities are through accident or injury. These may include spinal cord injury and traumatic brain injury. Another and growing group are people who have acquired a disability because of the aging process.

Services provided to people with congenital disabilities tend to be lifelong and include screening and assessment, education, employment, housing, income assistance, health, and other services to support individuals who have conditions that limit their functioning.

Michael Wolf-Branigin
George Mason University

See Also: Accommodation; Americans with Disabilities Act; Assistive Technology; Autism and Asperger's Syndrome, Services for; Behavior Support and Management; Children With Special Needs; Deaf/Hard of Hearing; Developmental Disabled Individuals; Disability Studies; Life Skills Training; Reasonable Accommodations.

Future Readings

Braddock, D., R. Hemp, M. C. Rizzolo, E. S. Tanis, L. Haffler, A. Lulinski, and J. Wu. State of the States in Developmental Disabilities 2013: The Great Recession and Its Aftermath. Washington, DC: American Association on Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities, 2013.

DePoy, Elizabeth and Stephan F. Gilson. Studying Disability: Multiple Theories and Responses. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2011.

Longmore, P. K. and L. Umansky. The New Disability History: American Perspectives. New York: New York University Press, 2001.

May, G. E. and M. B. Raske. Ending Disability Discrimination: Strategies for Social Workers. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2005.

Disability Studies

Disability studies, as an academic discipline or critical field of inquiry, arose from a desire to challenge the ways in which the idea of disability and society's response to it have been understood over time. The field was not created in a vacuum. It has strong ties with the disability movements and disability rights movements in Great Britain, the Nordic countries, and North America. As people with disabilities began to protest the ways in which they were being treated and the inequalities they faced on a daily basis, so, too, did academics (particularity those living with disabilities) begin to take a critical look at the ideas defining and shaping disability. The goal of those in disability studies is not simply to critique or to theorize. Rather, the ultimate goal is to effect positive change in the lives of people with disabilities. The first step in this process is to recognize the lived experience of disability as authentic, valued, and valuable.

This article provides some general context of how disability was conceptualized historically; explores the responses in Great Britain, the Nordic countries, and North America that have led to some of the foundational formulations of disability studies; examines some of the new approaches to disability; and concludes with a brief discussion of how these new understandings of disability affect practices in human services.

Historical Approaches to Disability

In the Western world, disability has traditionally and historically been seen not only as something different, but as something negative. Disability has been seen as a moral stain or punishment, as a problem in need of fixing, and as an illness or something wrong with a person. This approach has had several major consequences for people with disabilities and how they have been seen by nondisabled people, the effects of which are still evident today. For many people with disabilities, having their disability framed as something "bad" has often meant social stigmatization and societal rejection.

Not only were people with disabilities stigmatized, many were institutionalized. Facilities were built to take care of people who were seen as being incapable of caring for themselves. Children and adults were removed from their families and friends and sent to live in these institutions, which were often located outside urban areas, thus creating a physical distance between the disabled and the nondisabled. Sometimes the rationale for this process was defended as being in the best interests of those with disabilities. Although these centers initially were seen as places to educate and train people, they eventually became places in which to house anyone who was seen as a problem for society. Severe overcrowding meant people lived in extremely inhumane conditions, which further emphasized their role as less than or not quite human beings.

As scientific knowledge began to progress, the idea of disability as a deficit or deficiency took on new meaning. Scientists sought to better understand different disabilities, and were concerned with origins, classifications, and treatment. This approach cemented the notion that disability was an unacceptable condition that science should address through cure, or if that failed, through amelioration, making the individual as close to so-called normal as possible. Scientists and physicians were soon joined by other professionals, such as psychologists, nurses, and therapists, each claiming to have unique knowledge to deal with disability. This resulted in the creation of professionalized and medicalized lenses through which disability was viewed, and resulted in people with disabilities being cast into the role of the patient, notwithstanding their actual state of health.

Over time, charitable groups began to form around these disabilities. For example, organizations to further the interests of people with visual impairments, Down syndrome, and cerebral palsy were established. One of the major goals of these kinds of organizations was to raise funds, often to cure the disability or rehabilitate the disabled. This mind-set reinforced the idea that people with disabilities were to be pitied because of their disability and led many nondisabled people to think of disability as some kind of personal tragedy of others and their families. People with disabilities became the recipients of the charity of the nondisabled.

New Approaches to Disability

The cumulative effects of these approaches to disability and people with disabilities meant that nondisabled people often had little, if any, contact with people with disabilities. This served to reinforce the notion of difference, defect, and deficiency. Able-bodied society was not used to having people with disabilities as contributing members. As a consequence, nondisabled people became suspicious and intolerant of difference, and as a result, disabled people became further stigmatized and devalued. When people with disabilities finally began to take their places within their communities, these communities were ill equipped to accommodate the diversity that came with the movement toward full inclusion. People with disabilities were seen as a problem because they simply did not fit.

The result of this disconnection prompted people with disabilities, their families, and their allies to begin to respond to physical and social exclusion and discrimination in more systematic ways. These responses had different foci in different countries. However, the common theme across these various regions was a demand for inclusion and the development of new approaches to how to understand and respond to disability. The following sections highlight only some of the nuances of the constantly evolving field of disability studies:

The British Focus. In the early 1970s, disabled people began to organize in an effort to effect change in their lives. Their original focus was to eliminate the segregated facilities in which they lived, worked, and went to school. Their goal was to be integrated into society. This was accomplished by shifting the focus from disability as a personal tragedy to disability as a form of social oppression. This idea of moving from the individual to the social is sometimes referred to as the social model of disability. A critical gaze was directed at society itself and how it was actually organized to exclude people with disabilities.

This movement originated with and was promoted by and on behalf of people with physical disabilities, both activists and academics, such as Michael Oliver. Thus, it developed more specifically around issues facing people with physical disabilities. One hallmark of this approach is the distinction made between the two terms impairment and disability. The former term is used to explain the limitation actually experienced by the individual, be it sensory, physical, or mental. The latter term is used to describe the lack of participation and/or loss of opportunities experienced by the disabled person as a consequence of the social and political ways in which society is organized.

For example, traditional responses to people who are unable to walk likely focus on rehabilitative strategies to gain some ability to walk and/or medical research into spinal cord regeneration, with the ultimate goal of enabling these individuals to walk. Little attention is paid to the social exclusion when disabled people simply aren't able to gain access to places and spaces within their communities. Essentially, they are not expected to be in those places and spaces.

However, the social model approach began to ask why the built environment was so hostile to people with physical disabilities. If, for example, stairs were eliminated and replaced with ramps, many people would benefit from the removal of this structural barrier. In addition to wheelchair users, people with walkers, strollers, luggage, and those using canes or crutches would all be able to avoid awkward negotiations with steps.

The Nordic Focus. Nordic countries have established a very strong social welfare consciousness that has led to the development of robust social welfare policies. In the context of people with disabilities, this has put a focus on best practice in the area of community-based services and supports. The origins of this focus lie within the principle of normalization, first envisioned in the 1960s in Denmark and Sweden. Normalization stresses the importance of community inclusion and participation rather than segregation for people with disabilities. It promotes the idea that the "rhythms" in which people with disabilities live their lives should be as close as possible to the rhythms of nondisabled people. This way of thinking challenges traditional notions that people with disabilities are best served in institutional settings, which in no way mirror the ways in which nondisabled people live. Normalization also considers people with intellectual disabilities, a group that was largely ignored in the formulation and theorization of the British social model.

The relational model of disability, developed in the Nordic countries largely by academics, is heavily influenced by normalization. This approach contains the following three key aspects:

- Like the social model, it acknowledges that there is a need to adapt the environment to people with disabilities to correct the mismatch between the existing environment and people with disabilities.
- In addition, the relational model suggests that disability is situational. This means that, depending on the context, a person may not be disabled. For example, in a power outage at night, a person with a visual disability is not disadvantaged by a lack of light, whereas a sighted person likely is. Similarly, if a community were fluent in both English and a sign language, a person who could not hear would experience no communication disadvantage because of deafness.
- Finally, proponents of this approach reject the view that people are either able-bodied or disabled, instead recognizing that disability is one part of a continuum of different ways of being.

The North American Focus. In the North American context, several complementary influences were at work in the 1960s and 1970s that advanced the cause of people with disabilities. The first was the rise of the minority model approach to disability, which was based on the U.S. civil rights movement. This approach focused on people with disabilities as another minority group who have been discriminated against and denied their rights.

Demands were made for access to spaces, places, and services that were equal to what was available to nondisabled people. For example, the independent living movement called for support for people with disabilities to live independent and self-directed lives. Such support, offered through a variety of services, enables people with disabilities the opportunities to be actively engaged within their communities.

The advent of the minority model, originally led by disability rights activists, expanded to a concerted effort by parents of children with intellectual disabilities to deinstitutionalize their children and provide support for them within the public school systems, communities, and general workforces. This resulted in the formation of the community living movement. People with intellectual disabilities themselves also began to mobilize, forming a self-advocacy organization called People First. Disabled members of this organization, reacting to the derogatory and often hateful references to which they have been subjected, insist on being seen as people first.

Another influence in North America was the importation and adaptation of normalization, which was ultimately reframed as social role valorization (SRV). At its heart, SRV focuses on identifying the ways in which the devaluation of marginalized groups occurs and provides strategies for human service professionals to help develop valued social roles for people with disabilities to combat this devaluation.

A third influence is an academic response to the prejudice endured by people with disabilities, arising from the field of sociology, which emphasizes the fundamental nature of disability as socially constructed rather than inherent in the individual. Such thinking challenges the assumption that disability is a real, objective, and uncontested category. It stresses the importance of accepting and valuing the lived experiences of people with disabilities. There continues to be an ongoing discussion of new ways of conceptualizing disability using a social construction framework to critique established views and practices.

The inclusion and full participation of people with disabilities as equal citizens links these various approaches to a common goal, although the path to achieving it may differ. Reaching this goal has been aided by laws such as the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.

Implication for Human Services Practice

The field of disability studies offers human service professionals as well as those interested in and affected by disability a framework in which to broaden their understanding of disability and challenge more traditional responses and ways of thinking. The analyses from disability studies encourage people to think about and react to disability and people with disabilities in new and more positive ways. Disability studies offer a multifaceted lens for understanding the experiences of people with disabilities. Despite the differences of the various approaches within the field, disability studies suggest that disability should be problematized for society and not for the individual.

Two major implications exist for professionals and nonprofessionals alike. The first is one of perception and attitude. The ways in which many people think about disability often go unnoticed. In forcing society to reexamine some of its deeply held beliefs about what it means to be disabled, disability studies provide a clear articulation of the ways in which traditional approaches to and understandings of disability have served to create a highly marginalized and devalued group of people.

The second implication is more practical but no less important. Society must consider how it might organize, or reorganize, the physical and social worlds so as to incorporate people with disabilities in more genuine and authentic ways. In the end, it is insufficient to guarantee equality without directly addressing the ways in which policies, practices, and service systems act as barriers to the full and equal participation of people with disabilities. It is vital that human service professionals provide services and supports in ways that do not promote, or at least minimize, the stigma associated with disability.

Conclusion

The field of disability studies offers the tools to reimagine disability as simply another of many human conditions. It forces society to open its eyes and allows people to challenge their own misperceptions and unchallenged misconceptions about people with disabilities. Above all, it encourages society to see the person beyond the disability and provide valued, respectful support to a group of people who deserve to be viewed in this light because they are fellow human beings.

Karen D. Schwartz
Zana Marie Lutfiyya
University of Manitoba

See Also: Accommodation; Americans with Disabilities Act; Assistive Technology; Developmental Disabled Individuals.

Further Readings

Braddock, David L. and Susan L. Parish. "An Institutional History of Disability." In Gary L. Albrecht, Katherine D. Seelman, and Michael Bury, eds. Handbook of Disability Studies. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2001.

Ferguson, Phil M., Diane L. Ferguson, and Steven J. Taylor. Interpreting Disability: A Qualitative Reader. New York: Teachers College Press, 1992.

Shakespeare, T. Disability Rights and Wrongs. London: Routledge, 2006.

Wolfensberger, Wolf. A Brief Introduction to Social Role Valorization: A High-Order Concept for Addressing the Plight of Societally Devalued People, and for Structuring Human Services, 3rd ed. Training Institute for Human Service Planning, Leadership and Change Agentry. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1998.

Disabled Clients

Disability issues have increasingly become a subject for discussion in the last few decades. In this article, the term disabled clients refers to people who access services within a variety of health and social care organizations and come into contact with a diverse range of staff at different points in their lives.

Critical to this discussion of disabled clients are a definition of disability and an understanding of the three key models of disability, namely the medical model, the social model, and the International Classification of Functioning Disability and Health (ICF). Further, a discussion of the potential impact of having a disability is explored, and key developments such as technological changes, media coverage of disability, and development of equality legislation and health promotion are examined in relation to their impact on disabled clients. The discussion concludes with some suggestions for the future to improve the lives of disabled clients. At this point, however, it is critically important to examine the complex and diverse nature of disability, as any narrow understanding of the issue may be limiting at best and may overlook the diversity within disability.

The Complexity and Diversity of Disability

Disability is complex and this has led to much debate without any consensus regarding definitions. The World Health Organization (WHO) and World Bank jointly published the World Report on Disability, which suggests that more than a billion people in the world live with a disability of some kind, and estimates that among those affected, 200 million people have problems in being able to function. Disability is multifaceted, and it would be very simplistic to view and diagnose disabled clients as a homogenous group.

In some cases, disability can be temporary, as for an older person sustaining a hip fracture and being unable to walk for six weeks, resulting in a temporary disruption in usual activities. Disability can also be long term and life changing, as in the case of a young person being diagnosed with multiple sclerosis, a neurological condition with fluctuating symptoms and abilities that may require long-term management. In addition, some forms of disabilities may be life limiting and progressive, such as a diagnosis of terminal cancer. In some cases, disability is attributed to people who have cognitive difficulties and problems with reasoning, learning, and understanding. Examples include individuals with learning disabilities, or those who experience difficulties with social functioning and empathy, as seen in some forms of autism. It is critical to underline that disabilities may not always be outwardly obvious or visible (e.g., some mental health conditions such as depression or sensory disabilities involving hearing loss).

Disability and impairment may be a result of an event or encounter that will have happened at different points in time in a disabled client's life story. For instance, an event may have occurred in the period leading to birth or during birth, such as cerebral palsy. This condition may lead to weakness or paralysis in the upper limb, thereby having a significant adverse impact on a person's ability to wash and dress. Or the disability may be a result of something that occurred later in life, such as a cerebral vascular accident resulting in paralysis and mobility problems.

Given the diverse range, nature, severity, and context within which disabilities may be understood, it is critical to consider how disabilities may impact the affected groups and individuals. Crucially, the impact of disability on disabled clients may differ from person to person, depending on factors internal to the person. Example factors include the severity of the disability, gender, personal coping strategies, financial factors, spirituality, levels of personal capacity, personality, self-esteem, age, and culture. As a matter of caution, though, it would be simplistic to conclude that any of these factors in isolation or combined articulate the impact on affected individuals without appropriate and targeted assessment.

In addition to such internal factors, external factors impact significantly on disability. The cultural, social, political, and physical environment surrounding the disabled client and support systems are critically important to address issues around disability and its diverse nature and needs. For example, the World Report on Disability acknowledges that there is a link between poverty and disability in developing countries in that high rates of untreated illnesses may lead to disabilities. Importantly, individuals' economic and social environments may play a significant part in their risk of becoming disabled.

These diverse factors surrounding disability present many challenges for people working with disabled clients. Disabled clients are not a homogenous group and should therefore not be subjected to one-size-fits-all solutions and diagnostic yardstick approaches. Disability has been recognized and understood in different ways over time, and several models have been proposed that consider disability in different ways, each having an impact on how a disabled client is understood by others, including people who provide services.

Models of Disability

Medical model of disability. Under the medical model of disability, disability is generally associated with a particular medical diagnosis and prognosis and focuses on signs and symptoms. The model suggests that disability is situated entirely within the disabled person. The medical model of disability essentially highlights what disabled clients cannot do due to whatever impairment or dysfunction they possess. The aim of the medical model is to treat symptoms and problems arising from the disability. Commonly, this model assumes that people working with the disabled client are the experts.

Some proponents of the medical model argue the importance of identifying and addressing signs and symptoms and what a disabled person cannot do because of their diagnosis as a means of getting appropriate support and treatment. Critics argue that this approach to disability is too narrow and that the focus should be on the environment around the disabled client rather than considering only the disability itself. Further, the medical model is sometimes criticized as potentially leading to clients being treated as passive recipients of care as opposed to them being the experts on their own disability and able to work collaboratively to find solutions to any problems they experience.

Social model of disability. The main thrust of the social model of disability is the emphasis on considering a disabled client from a more holistic perspective. The social model suggests that the disability is predominantly not the diagnosis, signs, and symptoms, but the disabling and inaccessible environment surrounding the affected people. An example of this is a full-time wheelchair user who would like to utilize the local gym facilities, but the bus to the gym does not have enough space for a wheelchair, and several steps leading up to the gym make it inaccessible. This leads to the disabled being excluded from an activity that may be meaningful and purposeful to them and being denied an opportunity to access leisure activities that may enhance their overall health and well-being. Indeed, the World Report on Disability argues that disability is a human rights issue, as disabled people face many barriers affecting multiple areas of their lives that nondisabled people do not necessarily face.

The disabling environment goes beyond consideration of the physical environment within this model and includes the attitudinal barriers and stigma associated with disability and disabled clients. Stigma is defined in this context as people making negative stereotypical assumptions about people with a disability. This can translate into some people with disabilities being excluded from groups or communities because they do not feel welcome. It may also lead to clients with disabilities not being recognized for their talents and what they can potentially contribute toward society because emphasis tends to be placed on incapacities and deficits rather than strengths and capabilities.

Negative attitudes toward people with mental health issues have been highlighted frequently; in particular, tabloids have been criticized for their sensationalist portrayal of schizophrenics commonly linked with violent crimes, stirring up fear among the general public. Inequalities in job opportunities due to stigma and discrimination have been highlighted frequently by service users with mental health problems. The social model of disability would attribute some of these inequalities as being the result of employers' lack of understanding. A number of programs have been developed to try to demystify mental health problems and raise awareness in the workplace.

Overtly identifiable disability may in some cases be recognized and perhaps dealt with differently from disabilities not blatantly obvious, such as those related to mental health. People with mental health problems have stated that they commonly experience stigma, and many service user groups have described how this impacts negatively on their lives and opportunities. Such issues sometimes arise in the process of people with mental health problems applying for jobs and disclosing their diagnoses. This disclosure seems to have the likelihood of putting them at a disadvantage in getting jobs, even though with relevant support in place they would potentially be productive in the job. These experiences may impact negatively on self-esteem and self-belief.

Proponents of the social model perspective would argue that if some changes—in some cases very minor—are made within the work environment, people with mental health problems would be able to do the job successfully. As can be seen, the social model underscores the importance of

The Opportunities Fair and Beyond Art Exhibition, held in Hockley, United Kingdom, was a free event focused on people with learning disabilities, physical disabilities, mental health difficulties, autism, visual and hearing impairments, adults 65 and over, and all carergivers. The event allowed these groups to find out what services, support, and opportunities are available to them.

working in collaboration with the disabled clients by way of assessing the clients' perspectives in capturing both the barriers they face as well as aspects that would enable them to function and participate in a given environment.

Examined from another angle, it could be argued that the social model of disability is a less hierarchical approach compared to the medical model of disability. Of course, the medical model of disability at times has a place within the client-support interaction, considering that different clients have differing needs. What is appropriate to one client may not necessarily be beneficial or appropriate to another. Thus, each of these models has its advantages and strengths. Some critics argue, however, that the medical and social models are often presented as occupying opposing ends of a continuum when they should both be recognized as offering different perspectives on disability.

International Classification of Functioning Disability and Health

Fragmented perspectives to understanding disability can be problematic in addressing the genuine and diverse needs of disabled clients. Thus, the need to appreciate the complexity and diversity of disability and the context surrounding it have been encapsulated in another framework, the International Classification of Functioning Disability and Health. The ICF was collaboratively developed by a team of people from clinical practice, academic institutions, and the disabled population. It aims to offer a universal approach toward defining and understanding the impact of disability through the use of comprehensive and neutral language.

The ICF represents a dynamic and interactive perspective on understanding individual disabled clients and the impact of disability across populations. Three main interconnected areas are proposed:

- Impairments emphasize the person's specific disability (e.g., left-sided upper limb weakness).
- Activity limitations focus on challenges faced by the disabled person in carrying out activities (e.g., dressing, cleaning teeth).
- Participation restrictions are centered around difficulties the disabled person may experience in any area of life (e.g., access to leisure facilities or inaccessible university buildings impacting access to education and progression).

The ICF considers disability to be the result of any difficulties within these three domains and considers positive areas within them that may lessen the impact of the disability. The ICF proposes that disability is a dynamic concept that can change rather than a static and fixed concept that is easily categorized. How the environment (positively or negatively) impacts the disabled client is a key part of the model, emphasizing some of the aspects of the social model of disability highlighted earlier. Indeed, the environment and its impact on disabled clients are viewed broadly to encompass many dimensions, including attitudinal, institutional, social, physical, and political factors.

Personal factors of disabled clients constitute an important part of addressing issues around disability. Personal factors can have a significant impact on participation in desired activities and life, and as such they form some of the key features of the ICF, including self-efficacy and personal drive. Both the taking part in activities and the degree of potential to participate are critical starting points for informed engagement.

Within the ICF is a strong emphasis on the interaction among personal factors, such as health, impairment, and capacity, and the environmental context and barriers. Indeed, this is important because people with disabilities worldwide have historically lived, worked, and socialized in segregated settings. However, awareness, lobbying, and sensitization of these needs have contributed to significant shifts in Western countries and progressively so internationally. Political shifts and the ability to appreciate the issues brought about by the disability movement have resulted in significant changes in the way disability is viewed. Such changes have led to more inclusive legal, economic, social, and financial approaches, as well as a more prominent and effective platform for discussions with and about disabled people.

Advocates of the ICF argue that it offers a less concrete simplistic perspective on disability, which can enhance the understanding of disabled clients. The framework acknowledges strengths and also recognizes barriers in the environment that could be changed to facilitate and enable participation of people with disabilities. This recognition and acknowledgment may promote disabled clients' involvement in valued activities, potentially leading to a more socially inclusive society where disability is viewed across a continuum of abilities and difficulties. This perspective is rather different from situations whereby disabled clients are categorized and potentially labeled by their diagnoses. The above discussion thus naturally leads to how clients' disabilities affect them.

The Impact of Disability

Although it has been acknowledged that disability experiences are diverse, disability is commonly associated with disadvantage, stigma, and discrimination. The World Report on Disability highlights that people with disabilities are often more likely to experience health inequalities and difficulties in accessing the services they need and to have problems gaining work and participating in community activities. In addition, they are not always able to live independently, and they experience poverty and reduced access to education.

The impact of stigma and discrimination can be significant and potentially lead to people with disabilities experiencing low self-esteem and loss of belief in their capacities and self-efficacy, potentially leading to a negative cycle of loss of motivation and withdrawal. For various reasons—cultural, social, economic, and political, among others—people with disabilities in parts of the developing countries are sometimes shunned and excluded from communities; the impact may be more severe than in more developed countries. Some of the experiences and attitudes toward disabled clients may not necessarily be worse in developing countries, but the political, legal, and economic environments alongside awareness frameworks in developed countries have brought this issue to popular discussion.

The impact of disability could be a result of an interaction between the person with disabilities and the barriers within their context as outlined above in the social model of disability and the ICF. However, although the impact is significant, a number of developments have made a positive difference in the experiences of some clients with a disability; these will be explored next.

Positive portrayals of disability encouraging attitude change. Advances in technology have had a noticeable impact on the lives of disabled persons in terms of enabling them to overcome some of the physical barriers that exist. The 2012 Paralympics in the United Kingdom demonstrated that the use of technology combined with natural ability and determination can lead to positive results and highlight the strengths of disabled persons. An example is the U.S. paralympian Jerome Singleton, whose lower leg was amputated at the age of 18 months, and who uses a carbon blade prosthesis to run. Another is South African double amputee Oscar Pistorius, who became known as the blade runner. These prostheses have played roles in overcoming physical limitations for amputees, and such positive achievements may also have impacted social attitudes toward persons with disabilities.

Health promotion. As the World Report on Disability highlights, the rates of disability are forecast to rise, predominantly because of the increase in diseases that can cause disabilities (e.g., diabetes, cardiovascular disease, cancer, and mental health problems). Health promotion has been developed as a means of preventing diseases and taking a proactive stance in addressing health needs across individuals, communities, and societies. Health promotion approaches seek to address three main areas:

- Primary prevention seeks to prevent the disease/illness from happening in the first place through education (e.g., dietary education to prevent cardiovascular disease).
- Secondary prevention focuses on identifying and responding to disease in its earliest stages (e.g., breast cancer screening and early intervention to minimize the impact of the disease).
- Tertiary prevention targets individuals and populations who already have an established disease and attempts to successfully manage it to prevent further disease and disability and promote quality of life (e.g., stroke rehabilitation programs).

Health promotion approaches translate across physical and mental health, are cost-effective, and can be delivered in many settings outside of traditional care settings. Individuals and communities should be actively engaged and motivated to take responsibility for their health within these approaches, which may present challenges if people are unwilling to engage.

Assistive technology creating more accessible environments. Technology in some countries has also had a positive impact on clients with disabilities, particularly in enabling them to be able to live safely and independently for as long as possible in their own homes. Assistive technology is a broad-based term that encompasses products, devices, and any equipment that aims to enhance or maintain safety and independence for disabled clients in a range of settings. Telecare, for example, is an advanced alarm system with sensors placed around a disabled client's home so that if the client falls, the sensors pick up on this and set off an alarm without the person needing to be near an alarm button.

In addition, advancements made in the areas of assistive technology and dementia have been beneficial not only to the clients but also their caregivers. For example, reminder messages can be recorded and then activated to remind a person with dementia to lock the door or pick up keys.

Sensors placed around disabled clients' homes can trigger alarms if they leave water running or forget to turn off the gas. More controversial forms of telecare used with people with dementia are tracking devices—the person wears a tag, and satellite devices alert caregivers as to their whereabouts. Some critics have called the use of tagging devices inhumane and have warned that use of such devices may lead to staff not giving the care and supervision needed to people with dementia. Other critics have suggested that overuse of any equipment emphasizes a person's disability and may have a detrimental impact.

Indeed, advocates of telecare have suggested that consent must be gained for any equipment and the person with a disability needs to be proactively involved in the whole process of choosing which equipment will be important for them and their circumstances. Although this is deemed good practice, challenges emerge when disabled clients may not have the capacity to consent to equipment even though it may be beneficial to them and their health and safety.

Celebrity culture and its portrayal of disability. Popular culture has played a significant role in bringing issues about disability to the forefront and has encouraged people to talk more openly about disability and appreciate the human face of disability. Films such as A Beautiful Mind have illustrated some of the complexities around having a mental health diagnosis. This film illustrates the narrative of a gifted mathematician and his coming to terms with having a diagnosis of schizophrenia and then going on to win the Nobel Prize.

The comedienne Ruby Wax has talked openly about her own experiences of depression. She wrote a play, Losing It, that has successfully toured the West End in London in which she uses personal examples to illustrate the complexities around mental illness and tries to raise awareness of it as a hidden disability that is part of the human condition.

Art and culture have also played roles in promoting disabled people and in encouraging debate and discussion around disability issues. For example, in 2007, Alison Lapper, an artist who was born without arms and with shortened legs, was made famous by a marble sculpture of her while pregnant placed on a plinth in Trafalgar Square in London. The motivation behind the sculpture, according to the sculptor, Marc Quinn, is that disabled people are underrepresented in art.

Well-known and highly respected theoretical physicist Stephen Hawking is another example of a high-profile person with a disability who has overcome many barriers and challenges. Diagnosed with motor neuron disease in 1963, he is a positive example of what can be achieved.

Legislation Promoting Equality

Despite best intentions, if calls for good practice, physical adaptations, pronounced declarations of appreciation, and understanding of issues around disability are not underpinned by legislation efforts, they can prove futile. Although most people working with disabled clients will endeavor to work in their best interests, a legal framework is always an important part of understanding and addressing disability issues. In the United Kingdom (UK), for example, as a direct result of legislation such as the 1995 Disability Discrimination Act, most buildings currently being constructed will ensure access and usability by disabled employees and clients likely to use the building. Within this legislation, employers are required to make reasonable adjustments to a job if a person discloses a disability. In addition, the 2010 UK Equality Act consolidated and developed equality legislation further by bringing together all antidiscrimination legislation. The United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities entered into force in May 2008, explicitly highlighting disability as a human rights issue. It aims to protect the rights of disabled people to live and participate as fully engaged citizens and identifies where changes need to be made to enable this to happen.

Conclusion

The developments discussed above relating to disability may contribute toward the vision and realization of disabled clients being able to feel socially included in each sphere of their lives and to live fulfilling lives that enhance their health and well-being.

Some evidence suggests that negative and stereotypical attitudes are changing, but there are still some developments to be made in this area. Indeed, although positive portrayal of disability in the media as well as equality legislation may have had an impact, there are challenges in measuring attitude change and the impact of policy developments and whether they translate across all areas of the world. Further, disabled clients themselves need to be encouraged to play key roles in terms of policy development and identifying structural inequalities that exist as well as identifying the best solutions for these issues.

Technological developments have enhanced opportunities for disabled clients to live safely and independently. It is crucial, however, that disabled clients be enabled to play active roles in consenting to equipment and that their capacity to consent is assessed. Also, equipment should not replace excellent humane care; rather, it should enhance good practice. It is also questionable whether such technological advances have translated into developing countries where the financial and legislative infrastructure may not always be in place to support such developments.

Although positive changes have occurred, more proactive approaches will need to be harnessed to address the barriers facing people with disabilities (e.g., education), preventive approaches such as health promotion, and redesign of towns and cities to enable accessibility. Most important, the inclusion of people with disabilities in the development of policy, organizational, and cultural modifications has proved crucial in realizing real and sustained change.

Kathleen Nthakomwa-Cassidy
Coventry University

See Also: Accommodation; Americans with Disabilities Act; Assistive Technology; Developmental Disabled Individuals.

Further Readings

"United Nations, Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities." Geneva: United Nations, 2006.

World Health Organization. "The International Classification of Functioning Disability and Health." Geneva: World Health Organization, 2001.

World Health Organization and World Bank. World Report on Disability. Geneva: World Health Organization, 2011.

Discrimination and Institutional Racism

In his writings in the 1900s about race relations, W. E. B. Du Bois often asserted that the problem of the 20th century was the color line (i.e., barriers between white and nonwhite people). This idea rings true today, even as the overt racism that characterized that period has transformed to more covert but no less destructive forms. Institutional racism, in which the values, beliefs, and principles underlying organizations' policies and procedures affect racialized groups, provides a powerful mechanism to exclude stigmatized populations, marked as not white. Both public and private institutions are extensions of larger society and are not immune to racist attitudes and values of the white dominant group, in which the need to exercise power and control over others is preeminent.

Racism is always harmful, but discrimination perpetrated by service-oriented organizations is particularly vexing because it can deny help and support to the very people who come to these organizations for assistance. The disadvantages caused by lack of access to such services can have consequences in all areas of life, including, among others, social, economic, educational, and legal. For human services in particular, the issue must be faced and a solution sought.

Today, many people of privilege feel that they live in a color-blind society, and that racism is a problem of the past. Such thinking was likely behind the June 2013, U.S. Supreme Court decision in striking down section 4 of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, a key piece of U.S. civil rights legislation. Historically, however, racism has been an accepted—and legal—aspect of North American culture. For example, in Canadian residential schools in the 1940s and 1950s, aboriginal peoples were used as test subjects for government-sponsored malnutrition studies, perfectly legally, and without their knowledge or consent. They were selectively studied for these experiments simply because of their status as a minority group. In the southern United States, the legacy of Jim Crow segregationist and racist laws has persisted unabated; racist sentiments that have devalued African American lives allowed the murder of Trayvon Martin to go unpunished. George Zimmerman, of mixed Hispanic and white racial heritage, fatally shot Martin, an unarmed 17-year-old black male youth, in February 2012. Zimmerman was acquitted in July 2013 by a mostly white jury, but debates continued to rage as to whether this was a racially motivated crime. Although Zimmerman's act was adjudged to be legal under Florida's Stand Your Ground statute, his acquittal served to reduce black people's confidence in the criminal justice system and sent a message that violence perpetrated by those in power against black people was acceptable in society.

Institutional racism is more a question of organizational policies and practices, not laws. Racial discrimination by institutions is a particularly insidious and concerning type of cruelty, and it may lead to more damaging outcomes than other forms of racism. Racist attitudes and beliefs are embedded within institutions, including schools, governments, religious or faith-based organizations, and law enforcement. But institutional racism is often ignored or denied, so that nothing is done to correct the oppressive situation. An example within law enforcement is the New York Police Department's controversial stop-and-frisk policy, under which officers can stop and search citizens with no need for reasonable suspicion of any criminal activity. Racialized people, most of them African American and Latino men, have been selectively targeted for stop-and-frisk. From an economic perspective, moreover, labor market outcomes for racial and ethnic minorities are strikingly disadvantaged. Consistent with findings in the United States regarding job applicants with African American–sounding names, academic studies show that Canadian immigrants with Indian-, Pakistani-, or Chinese-sounding names were significantly less likely to receive a job callback than equally qualified applicants with English-sounding names. These experiments demonstrated evidence of implicit bias on the part of employers against prospective job applicants on the basis of race or ethnicity; such violation may have discriminatory effects, including sustaining caste-based economic inequality, in which racialized groups are denied full participation and inclusion in society.

Historical Overview

Racism has been prevalent in North America since colonial days. Some of the first instances of institutional racism to take place in Canada and the United States were governmental policies of assimilation that discriminated against and denied rights to aboriginal peoples and Native Americans. Slavery of African Americans and black Canadians is another prominent example of state-sponsored federal ordinance. In addition, early immigration policies discriminated against several groups, including Chinese, Jewish, and non-Protestant European immigrants. At the start of the 21st century, when populations were becoming more ethnically diverse, racism was deemed unacceptable, and new legislation was put in place with the goal of preventing discrimination. Although these attempts to prevent discrimination served to make racism more subtle, it still remained.

The concept of institutional racism emerged in 1967 in the work of Black Power activists Stokely Carmichael and Charles Hamilton. In their book Black Power, they discussed the pervasiveness of racism in the United States. They wrote of a type of racism linked to unjust bureaucratic policies. Their analysis divided racism embedded within organizations into individual racism and cultural racism. Although connected, these forms of racism can be seen as separate phenomena. Individual racism comprises the racist attitudes, beliefs, and actions of a single person. Cultural racism is racism embedded in a society's collective beliefs and values. Cultural racism leads to institutional racism, which in turn can cause individual racism.

In the 1970s and 1980s, some of the first North American antidiscrimination legislation appeared. In Canada, laws such as the 1986 Employment

Stokely Carmichael, pictured in the 1967 Michigan State yearbook. Carmichael and Charles Hamilton wrote Black Power, which discussed racism in the United States.

Equity Act and the 1988 Multiculturalism Act were created with the purpose of ensuring equal opportunities in employment as well as promoting social diversity. Similar legislation appeared in the United States in the form of affirmative action policies. These new policies and laws, designed and meant to regulate discrimination by organizations, took into account the idea of institutional racism as suggested by the 1981 Scarman Report, which defined institutional racism as something that must be conscious within an organization. However, because institutional racism can operate without the conscious knowledge of institutional actors, it is often overlooked, and, unfortunately, the new laws and policies did little to fix the problem.

Effects

Institutional racism operates in many different settings, but regardless of its professional context, the outcome is the same—it denies legal rights and limits life opportunities for racialized groups. A cycle of oppression, it creates disadvantages in one area that lead to further disadvantages in others. For instance, unequal distributions of educational resources create disparities in the quality of schooling available to white and nonwhite children. Minority residential communities are also more frequently located near highways, factories, and industrial plants, which can pose various health problems. Low employment contributes to crime levels in already suffering communities, and policing in these areas tends to be generally strained and impelled by racial animus. Racialized groups in any neighborhood are more likely to be singled out or harassed by police. Once arrested, they are more likely to be charged with an offense. They also represent a higher proportion of the prison population. This is particularly true for young black men, and increasingly for men of Arab and Middle Eastern descent. Since the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, Muslim men have increasingly and dramatically been stigmatized throughout North America. They are at high risk for experiencing Islamophobic discrimination and violence.

This cycle of oppression can have serious consequences on individuals' well-being. Some people who suffer from the effects of racism may go on to develop physical and mental health complications such as anxiety, depression, and heart disease. Exposure to traumatic events, in the case of aboriginal peoples, may precipitate experiences of posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD), often referred to as residential school syndrome. Human services providers may not be aware of the cultural differences of the clients they serve, as their practices are based on majority (i.e., white) norms, so that when people suffering from racism turn to human services organizations for assistance, they may face the same racist policies and discrimination that led them to seek help in the first place.

Those who seek services from such institutions may face barriers, such as discriminatory eligibility criteria for services, or policies that interfere with cultural practices. Many individuals who become aware of institutional racism within agencies that operate under racist policies may take offense and cease to use those organizations. Fearing a loss of clients and decreased service utilization, such organizations may deny and cover up their racist tendencies. Agencies operating under racist policies are not fulfilling their mandate to serve the public when they serve only a portion of the populace. In a recent example, a young boy in Québec was denied a place on a soccer team because he was not allowed to wear his turban during games. This uniform policy selectively discriminated against Sikhs and other minorities. The premier of Québec initially supported the decision to ban turbans.

However, after a backlash of criticism from the general public, the Québec Soccer Federation decision was reversed, and a formal apology was given. New controversy has since emerged in Québec regarding the prohibition of overt display of religious symbols and articles of faith by civil servants, under the guise of a separation of religion and state. The proposed secularism charter targets racial, ethnic, and religious minorities, who may feel pressure to choose between their religious convictions and their livelihood. Such a policy can severely curtail employment opportunities for certain segments of the population, further reducing public access to trained employees, especially those with sociocultural backgrounds different from the dominant (i.e., white francophone) social group.

Employees of agencies operating under racist policies are themselves not free from harm. Working in a racist environment, they may develop individually racist attitudes that will carry over into their social environment. Today, people do not wish to admit to racist attitudes and may not be fully aware that they are participating in racist practices. Institutions cannot solve these inherent problems by denying or ignoring them; that would serve only to allow their racist practices to continue. The Québec Soccer Federation's apology made no acknowledgment of institutional or structural racism; rather, it denied that racism had been a factor in the decision making. This contrasted with the Canadian government's apology for institutionally racist practices related to the Chinese head tax and Indian residential schools. These actions followed the example of the Mulroney government, which issued a formal apology for the internment of Japanese Canadians. In each case, redress was offered in the form of monetary compensation, but only if survivors could prove, through substantial and intrusive assessments, that they suffered under federal policies of racial segregation and legal discrimination.

The legacy of institutional racism in North America is such that standard practice is to discriminate as long as an apology eventually follows, along with a denial of racism designed to protect the image of racist institutions.

Solutions and Strategies

Many laws, regulations, and organizational policies have been put in place, but applying them in everyday practice has proved difficult. Institutions have attempted various policy changes, including changes in regard to hiring, promotion, evaluation, and compensation. Two methods in particular have been used: cultural awareness training and racism awareness training. Cultural awareness training aims to give frontline workers and management an understanding of different cultural backgrounds; for example, how a person's background may influence the way that person sees the world and relates to others. Essentially, cultural awareness training explores the nature of differing perspectives. When it comes to tackling racism, it is more of a preventive approach. Racism awareness training, in contrast, confronts racism more directly. This type of training focuses on how racism manifests in societies and organizations and teaches strategies for how to address it.

These methods have each been shown to be effective at the individual level, but very little has changed at the institutional level. Training programs that are designed and intended for individuals need to be combined with changes to policy and power structures within organizations. Ideally, institutions should encourage people to challenge the conventions and foundations of their own organization. Human service organizations especially need to critically analyze who they are, who they serve, and how those services are offered. Many individuals who are able to recognize discrimination and wish to report it are denied the opportunity to do so as a result of institutions that are bent on denying their claims of discrimination. They can be denied the ability to report through the lack of an established complaint system within their organization or through fear of being penalized as a result of a complaint. Often, those who make complaints receive fewer opportunities for advancement or may be transferred to less desirable work within institutions. Those who have been marginalized need to be empowered and come together in collective action.

A major problem is that a primarily white management has difficulty in determining what constitutes racism and recognizing it within their own organization. A racist environment within an organization will affect how procedures are carried out and how further policies are created, including the policies designed to prevent discrimination. Operating inside a culturally racist society, even the most well-meaning organizations have failed to eliminate racism embedded in their workplaces. The results of some strategies that may have proved effective are difficult to replicate because institutions vary in the ways racism is perpetrated.

The first step toward a solution is to understand the meaning of institutional racism and what constitutes it as such. The next step is to learn to recognize it within one's own organization. Only when these two criteria are met can organizations implement and monitor strategies to prevent institutional racism from happening. Additionally, what is needed is an understanding of cultural racism and how this contributes to the racism within institutions, to get at the root cause of discrimination and institutional racism, so that structural changes can be carried out for the betterment of the institutions and of society.

Sulaimon Giwa
Kaelen Boyd
York University

See Also: Institutional Oppression; Prejudice, Theories of; Racial Microaggression; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; Social Work Practice and People of Color.

Further Readings

Bourne, Jenny. "The Life and Times of Institutional Racism." Race & Class, v.43/2 (2001).
Brasfield, Charles. "Residential School Syndrome." BC Medical Journal, v.43/2, March (2001).
Du Bois, W. E. B. The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co., 1903.
Griffith, Derek M., et al. "Dismantling Institutional Racism: Theory and Action." American Journal of Community Psychology, v.39/3–4 (2007).
Gurnah, Ahmed. "The Politics of Racism Awareness Training." Critical Social Policy, v.4/11 (1984).
Howitt, Dennis and Joseph Owusu-Bempah. "The Pragmatics of Institutional Racism: Beyond Words." Human Relations, v.43/9 (1990).
Lopez, Richard E. and Donald Cheek. "The Prevention of Institutional Racism: Training Counseling Psychologists as Agents for Change." The Counseling Psychologist, v.7/2 (1977).
Miller, Joshua and Ann Marie Garran. "The Web of Institutional Racism." Smith College Studies in Social Work, v.77/1 (2007).
Mosby, Ian. "Administering Colonial Science: Nutrition Research and Human Biomedical Experimentation in Aboriginal Communities and Residential Schools, 1942–1952." Histoire sociale/Social History, v.46/91 (2013). http://muse.jhu.edu/login?auth=0&type=summary&url=/journals/histoire_sociale_social_history/v046/46.91.mosby.html (Accessed November 2013).
Oreopoulos, Philip and Diane Dechief. "Why Do Some Employers Prefer to Interview Matthew, But Not Samir? New Evidence from Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver." http://ideas.repec.org/p/ubc/clssrn/clsrn_admin-2012-8.html (Accessed November 2013).

Displaced Persons

The term displaced persons refers to individuals who are forced to flee from their homes, often suddenly, due to some type of crisis, such as conflict or a natural disaster. This type of crisis is also commonly referred to as forced migration. Mass forced migration that results in large numbers of people fleeing their homes is a relatively new phenomenon; it is often the result of violent armed civil conflict that causes thousands, sometimes millions, of people to leave their communities, often across international borders.

Even though people become displaced for a range of reasons, the primary cause of displacement is conflict. The pattern of world conflict has changed considerably in the last few decades, with a shift away from interstate conflict over territory and toward a pattern of intrastate conflict involving one or more rebel groups fighting against government forces. Most of these conflicts are in sub-Saharan Africa and southern Asia, where violent civil wars have cost the lives of millions, with millions more being displaced from their homes.

Typically with a natural disaster, the displaced populations can return home as soon as their communities become safe again, and life goes back to normal. But when people are forced to flee their homes and communities due to conflict, their situations and the response from the international community become far more complicated.

International law stipulates different categories of displacement based upon the circumstances surrounding the forced migration. Thus, different terms are used to describe displaced populations. It is important to understand the various legal designations of displacement since it is often the designation that determines the level of protection and services provided to the displaced population. Essentially, there are three legal designations, or legal statuses, for individuals who are forced to flee their homes: (1) refugee status, (2) internally displaced person (IDP) status, and (3) stateless person status.

- According to international law, individuals may be granted refugee status by the United Nations (UN) if they meet the criteria set forth by the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, which states that refugees are those individuals who have a reasonable fear of persecution based upon their race, religious beliefs, nationality, or membership in a particularly social and/or political group. One of the most significant requirements for gaining refugee status is that the individual must have fled across international borders.
- When people are forcibly displaced from their homes and communities but do not cross international borders, they are referred to as internally displaced persons. IDPs may also include situations involving cycles of violence (not rising to the level of civil war), natural disasters, or mass human rights violations.
- Stateless persons are defined as people who have no nationality. People become stateless for a variety of reasons, including situations in which a country no longer exists, such as Palestinians living in Jordan, or the Roma people, who have migrated throughout Europe for more than a century.

Nyanzale, in the Masisi, a small town where the population has more than doubled with the arrival of 20,000 people displaced from villages up to a day's walk away. The people fled out of fear because of fighting between rebel forces and the Democratic Republic of the Congo armed forces. Most of the world's displaced populations come from Africa and Asia.

The number of displaced people that the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) is responsible for has increased dramatically in the last decade because of the dramatic increase in worldwide conflict. Among the more than 42 million refugees worldwide, the UNHCR is responsible for just over 10 million. Most of the world's displaced populations emanate from Africa and Asia and remain within their general area of displacement. For instance, of all refugees from the continent of Africa, 80 percent remain in the region and only 20 percent are relocated outside the region. This situation can be good when many such individuals return home once conditions allow, but it can be bad when individuals who are forced from their homes but remain in the region continue to engage in the conflict.

The goal of the UNHCR is to find durable solutions for displaced situations with the best option always being a resolution of the conflict so that displaced populations can return home. In fact, most refugees and IDPs are able to return home once the civil unrest in their communities subsides, but sometimes people are not able to return home quickly because their homelands are experiencing multiple cycles of violence and civil unrest. Often, even if groups of individuals can return home, this does not always mean resuming life as it once was because many countries recovering from conflict are at high risk of renewed conflict and are often struggling with destroyed infrastructure and a lack of human capital. Thus, many displaced individuals often experience a cycle of repeated displacements in which they are forced to reside in UNHCR refugee camps, sometimes for extended periods of time, before they can return home, only to be displaced again when the violence resumes. These repeated disruptions in personal and community stability are often devastating for individuals and families, as well as the community as a whole. A cycle of repeated violent forced migration, resettlement, and reintegration into the home county (or a host country) is devastating and can affect every domain of the lives of those impacted—everything from individual and family psychosocial functioning to the ability to earn an education, build a career, or even build a family.

Unfortunately, for most of the world's refugees, conflict-generated IDPs, and stateless persons, a durable solution to their displacement is not easily found, leading to millions of displaced groups residing in refugee camps for extended periods of time. This dynamic is often referred to as protracted refugee situations (PRSs). In PRSs, large groups of individuals (hundreds of thousands to millions) are forced to flee their homes due to violence, and may be forced to live in UNHCR refugee camps for decades if conditions in their homelands remain dangerous and no other long-term solutions, such as permanent resettlement in a third host country, can be secured. Individuals in PRSs are often filled with hopelessness and are often forced to endure violence, including gender-based violence similar to that which forced them from their communities. They are also forced to endure a state of perpetual limbo as they wait for the international community to make determinations about their futures.

Michelle E. Martin
DePaul University

See Also: African Immigrants; Asian Immigrants; Diaspora; Refugee Assistance.

Further Reading

Council of Europe, Commissioner for Human Rights. "Many Roma in Europe Are Stateless and Live Outside Social Protection" (July 6, 2009). http://www.unhcr.org/refworld/docid/4a7023c72.html (Accessed April 2013).

Fagen, P. W. "Refugees and IDPs After Conflict: Why They Do Not Go Home." U.S. Institute of Peace, Special Report 268 (April 2011). http://www.usip.org/files/resources/SR268Fagen.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Martin, D. A. "The United States Refugee Admissions Program: Reforms for a New Era of Refugee Resettlement." Columbia Human Rights Law Review, v.36 (2005).

Martin, D. C. and J. E. Yankay. "Refugees and Asylees: 2011." Annual Flow Report. Department of Homeland Security Office of Immigration Statistics, 2012. http://www.dhs.gov/xlibrary/assets/statistics/publications/ois_rfa_fr_2011.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. "Evaluation of Protracted Refugee Situations (PRS) in Burundi and Tanzania" (2010). http://www.oecd.org/countries/sudan/47164501.pdf (Accessed April 2013).

U.S. Department of State. "Protracted Refugee Situations." Bureau of Populations, Refugees and Migration (2011). http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/157337.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Disposition of Juvenile Records

Traditionally, the names of juveniles who commit crimes have not been publicly released because keeping them private has been considered a major step in the rehabilitation process. It has been considered a given that juveniles who commit minor crimes may still become contributing members of society. As such, they should not have to be labeled as criminals for their entire lives. As a rule, juvenile justice records have tended to remain sealed or be expunged when former offenders reach adulthood if they have committed no further crimes. Because criminal laws come under the province of state governments, each state is responsible for determining the dispensation of juvenile justice records. Consequently, laws vary significantly among the states. The privacy right of juvenile offenders has become a heated issue since the final decade of the 20th century because the offenses juveniles commit have become increasingly violent. Many states are now charging juveniles as adults in extreme cases, and adults have no right to privacy in criminal courts. Educational institutions from elementary to college are also demanding access to records of violent juveniles in order to provide protection on school grounds.

By the mid-1990s, 27 states had passed amendments stipulating a bill of rights for victims of crimes, and victims' rights advocates began demanding that victims and their families be given the right to testify in court during the trials of violent juvenile offenders. Members of the public are also insisting that they have a right to know what crimes are being committed in their own neighborhoods, regardless of the age of the perpetrator.

Background

Until the end of the 19th century, there were no separate courts for juvenile offenders. In 1899, Chicago established the first juvenile court as a way of providing rehabilitation for juvenile offenders and keeping them away from hardened criminals. The practice of limiting access to juvenile justice records was completely voluntary on the part of the courts and the media, and both entities cooperated in protecting the records of juvenile offenders from public scrutiny.

As the crimes committed by juveniles became more serious in nature, positions on privacy rights shifted. In 1980, only six states provided public access to juvenile justice records. By the mid-1990s, 21 states had begun opening up trials of violent and repeat juvenile offenders. In 1995, 26 states mandated public access to juvenile court proceedings. Maryland began publishing both the names and photographs of juvenile offenders, insisting that the practice added as a deterrent. That same year, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear a hate crime case, United States v. Three Juveniles (61 F. 3486). That refusal allowed to stand a lower court decision permitting individual judges to exercise responsibility for determining whether juveniles were entitled to privacy.

Access to Records

All states have recognized the need to allow certain individuals and groups access to the criminal records of juveniles. Those with access include attorneys; federal, state, and local law enforcement officials; court officials; parents or guardians; agencies that supervise juveniles who are incarcerated; probation officials; victims and potential victims; and school officials. Criminal justice researchers are allowed access in almost all states.

New York allows access only to the juvenile and his/her parents and to the judge with jurisdiction over the juvenile's trial. In West Virginia, a court order is needed to obtain access to juvenile records. Alabama, Mississippi, North Dakota, and South Carolina recognize the public's right to know that a violent crime has occurred, but the name of a juvenile offender cannot be released to the public. Alaska allows identities to be made public only when the safety of a school or the public is at issue. California, Louisiana, and Pennsylvania permit public release of a juvenile's name only if the juvenile was older than 14 years of age when committing a serious felony. In Utah and Virginia, the names of individuals older than age 12 and 13, respectively, are released if that juvenile is accused of murder, manslaughter, aggravated assault, arson, or a sex crime. Tennessee and Wisconsin release names when it is deemed to be in the best interests of the juvenile. Maryland releases names for good cause, and Illinois attempts to balance the rights of juvenile offenders with those of individuals or groups requesting access.

The Current Situation

States retain the right to control if, when, and how juvenile records are permanently sealed or expunged. In general, sealing or expunging occurs when a juvenile offender reaches a certain age without committing additional serious crimes. Oklahoma and New Jersey also seal records of juvenile offenders who enlist in the military. Twenty-two states treat juvenile justice records that have been sealed as if they never existed. In Florida, records are sealed unless a former juvenile offender applies for employment in a criminal justice agency, a school, a seaport, or a venue that would allow the former offender access to children or vulnerable adults. Juveniles whose records have been sealed or expunged may truthfully answer that they have no criminal history.

As juveniles continue to engage in increasingly violent crimes, many of which take place on school grounds, states continue to pass laws that require authorities to notify schools of criminal records of violent juveniles. By 2006, 44 states had enacted such laws. At the college and university level, prospective students are usually asked about any criminal history, and some schools ask specifically about juvenile offenses. By 2009, 66 percent of U.S. colleges were routinely requesting access to juvenile records of students and prospective students.

Victims' rights are a significant factor in the battle to open up criminal records of violent juvenile offenders. Members of the public have also entered the fray, demanding the right to be told about violent juveniles. The demands of victims and the public are particularly insistent in the case of sex crimes, deeming it important for entire communities to know about the presence of sexual predators living nearby. In such cases, the right to protect the privacy of juvenile sex offenders is considered less important than the public's right to be made aware of the danger their presence presents. Bills dealing with the subject have failed to pass Congress, and in the absence of federal laws, state laws continue to range from those of Kansas, where judges have the right to decide whether to release the name of a juvenile sex offender to the public, to Missouri, where the names of juvenile offenders are not included in public registries. Since courts at both the federal and state levels have held that juvenile offenders have no constitutional right to privacy, the dispensation of juvenile justice records continues to be hotly debated.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Justice System.

Further Readings

Belair, Robert R. Privacy and Juvenile Justice Records: A Mid-Decade Status Report. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, 1997.

National Criminial Justice Reference Service. "Juvenile Justice Reform Initiatives in the States 1994–1996." http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles/reform.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

National Institute of Justice. State Laws on Prosecutors' and Judges' Use of Juvenile Records. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, 1995.

Peterkin, Caitlin. "Colleges Grapple with Applicants' Juvenile Records and Criminal Histories." Chronicle of Higher Education, v.59/7 (2012).

Sickmund, Melissa. Juveniles in Court. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, 2003.

Walters, Laurel Shaper. "States Try to Rewrite Crime and Punishment." Christian Science Monitor, v.88/7 (1995).

Washington State Legislature, Joint Legislative Task Force. "Patterns of Juvenile Record Confidentiality in the United States." http://www.leg.wa.gov/JointCommittees/JRS/Documents/Sept282011/USJuvenileRecordPatterns.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Diversities

Diversities, formerly the International Journal on Multicultural Societies (IJMS), is a scholarly and professional journal established in 1998 by the social sciences research and policy division of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). The journal is now jointly published by UNESCO and the Max Planck Institute for the Study of Religious and Ethnic Diversity at Göttingen, Germany. Its objective is to improve the linkages between academic communities in various regions and across different social science disciplines. In May 2010, IJMS changed its name to Diversities. The new International Standard Serial Number (ISSN) for Diversities (2079-6595) has been linked to the ISSN for IJMS (1817-4574) for bibliographic reference and records. Its editorial office is located at the Max Planck Institute for the Study of Religious and Ethnic Diversity. Diversities is a peer-reviewed, open-access, online-only publication, available on the Web site, www.unesco.org/shs/diversities and on the directory of open access journals at www.doaj.org.

Diversities provides a platform for international, interdisciplinary, and policy-related social science research in the fields of migration, multicultural policies, and human rights. One of its particular features is to promote policy-relevant social science research. Each issue is devoted to a coherent, thematic debate on a key issue in the field of migration and multicultural society. Topics and contributors represent the full range of global regions. Examples of the themes include exploring religious pluralism (1999), the human rights of linguistic minorities and language policies (2001), national identity and attitudes toward migrants (2005), depicting diversities (2010), and skilled migration and the brain drain (2012). Diversities publishes two issues per year, each issue generally including five to eight thematic publications in addition to unsolicited manuscripts in the open forum section (i.e., any topic within the domain of the journal) and book reviews.

The IJMS published policy-relevant social science research on multiculturalism, and established itself as a successful electronic journal with a broad audience worldwide. Following the traditions of IJMS, Diversities explores a wide range of topics related to social differences, including ethnicity, religion, language, gender, sexuality, disability, social status, and age. It focuses on how these notions are socially constructed, how they unfold in different contexts, and how they are addressed in policy and practice. The journal provides a forum for discussion, debate, refinement of social theory, and development of key ideas at the nexus of research and policy.

Editorial Board

As of 2013, the journal's publication director is Golda El-Khoury, team leader at UNESCO, Sector for Social and Human Sciences. Its editor is Gabriele Alex, professor at the Department of Social and Cultural Anthropology, Eberhard Karls Universität Tübingen, who first served as the editor-in-chief for Diversities in 2010 when working as a research fellow at the Max Planck Institute for the Study of Religious and Ethnic Diversity. She assumed the editorship from Matthias Koenig, who was the founding editor of IJMS. The journal's editorial board includes professionals and experts drawn from various fields. The editorial board members include Rainer Bauböck (Austria), Matthias Koenig (Germany), Lily Kong (Singapore), Peter van der Veer (Netherlands), Yinong Zhang (China), Brenda Yeoh (Singapore), and Patricia Mohammed (Jamaica). These editorial board members are from diverse disciplines, including anthropology, geography, sociology, religious studies, linguistics, and feminism, among others.

Submission, Review, and Publication Processes

Diversities makes announcements and open invitations for future publications. Articles are normally commissioned by the editorial office with the assistance of an external guest editor for the issue. The UNESCO Web site provides information about the requirements and time lines for manuscript submission. The publication guidelines include information about word limits, citation style, quality of language, and formatting style.

All articles are peer reviewed to ensure that they meet the desired quality. Published studies generally are clearly understood and easily accessible to all, including nonexperts. Authors are encouraged to formulate clear and direct arguments and to avoid excessive technicality, jargon, and methodological protocol.

Diversities emphasizes the importance of respecting differences in beliefs and backgrounds of diverse groups. Authors are encouraged to discuss controversial ideas and doctrines in a positive manner to avoid others attributing ulterior motives. Further, the articles should not be offensive to member states of UNESCO or jeopardize the spirit of international understanding and cooperation. The journal makes explicit claims, noting, "The opinions expressed in Diversities are those of the authors and do not necessarily reflect the views of UNESCO." UNESCO also reserves the right to editorial revision and abbreviation of the text, although any revision involving substantial change will be forwarded to the author for accord before publication.

As of 2013, abstracts of articles published in Diversities appear in the following indexes: Cambridge Scientific Abstract (CSA), Sociological Abstracts and Worldwide Political Science Abstracts, Elektronische Zeitschriftenbibliothek (EZB), International Bibliography of the Social Sciences (IBSS), Public Affairs Information Service (PAIS), Social Science Information Gateway (SOSIG), and Zeitschriftdatenbank (ZDB). All articles can be accessed in portable document format (PDF) through an open access channel known as the directory of open access journals (DOAJ).

Grace Karuga
Elaine Hsieh
University of Oklahoma

See Also: Journal of Immigrant and Minority Health; Journal of Ethnic and Cultural Diversity in Social Work; Multiculturalism; Spirituality/Religion and Diversity; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity of.

Further Readings

Max Planck Institute for the Study of Religious and Ethnic Diversity. "Welcome to Diversities." http://www.mmg.mpg.de/subsites/diversities/home (Accessed October 2013).

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. Diversities. http://www.unesco.org/new/en/social-and-human-sciences/resources/periodicals/diversities (Accessed October 2013).

Diversity and Equality in Health and Care

The international journal Diversity and Equality in Health and Care (http://www.ingentaconnect.com/content/rmp/dehc) can trace its origins to a pilot 2004 special fifth issue of the well-known journal Health and Social Care in the Community, coedited by professors Paula McGee and Mark Johnson. British publisher Radcliffe Medical of Abingdon offered these editors the opportunity to create their own journal, which would join the publisher's stable of world-class medical journals, including Education for Primary Care, The London Journal of Primary Care, Mental Health in Family Medicine, and Quality in Primary Care. The journal adheres to the standards of the International Committee of Medical Journal Editors (ICMJE) and the Committee on Publication Ethics (COPE), and all papers are peer-reviewed.

Originally published as Diversity in Health and Social Care (ISSN 1743-1913, e-ISSN 1743-4904), the first volume of this journal appeared in late 2004, with a major focus on migration, ethnicity, and health, as well as health inequality in general. Over time, the journal increasingly attracted papers that also examined issues of gender, disability, and sexual orientation. Starting in January 2009, the title was revised to Diversity in Health and Care (ISSN 1759-1422, e-ISSN 1759-1430), following a refocusing of the publisher's interest on health service delivery. In 2012, after the purchase of the publisher by Electric Word, the title was finally revised to reflect the increased focus on inequality and diversity, including attention to intersecting inequalities across more than one strand of disadvantage, to the present Diversity and Equality in Health and Care (ISSN 2049-5471, e-ISSN 2049-548X). Earlier issues are indexed in the same sequence but may be identified using older International Standard Serial Number (ISSNs) numbers.

Diversity and Equality in Health and Care dedicates space for the publication of research and debate papers that address issues relating to the equitable provision of health care and services for members of diverse social groups and settings in all countries worldwide. The journal recognizes that many such papers may not gain acceptance in mainstream discipline-led journals, which view such issues as marginal or contentious and therefore not always acceptable to conventional reviewers. Diversity and Equality in Health and Care welcomes papers relating to all aspects of diversity in health and care and the inequalities experienced as a result of ill health, marginalization, prejudice, stigma, and issues in service provision. Published papers report on qualitative or quantitative research, describe and evaluate good practice, put forward arguments for debate, or discuss educational matters. The journal particularly encourages papers that present multiprofessional perspectives, that give attention to the views of service users and caregivers, and that explore the international dimensions of diversity and equality across and within cultures.

Diversity and equality are seen as very broad concepts, embracing areas that include, but are not limited to, race, culture, and ethnicity; sexual orientation; gender; migrants; caregivers; physical, communication, and learning disabilities; spirituality; and underserved or marginalized populations. Diversity also extends to the wide variety of settings in which care takes place as well as the multidisciplinary nature of professional practice. Diversity and Equality in Health and Care carries theoretical papers but also insists that materials published should contribute to the improvement of practice and professional development.

All issues include a section titled Knowledge-share, which carries a mixture of good practice studies, book reviews, and reports of meetings. A regular feature on continuing professional development in each issue highlights new knowledge in a specific field of practice. Selected papers may be offered on open-access terms. The journal is hosted online by IngentaConnect, and enjoys worldwide readership.

The editorial board of Diversity and Equality in Health and Care includes individuals representing the United Kingdom, South Africa, Switzerland, Jordan, the United States, Saudi Arabia, and New Zealand. The editors welcome the following:

- Research papers that address any aspect of diversity, including evaluative studies and methodological debates
- Practice papers that provide examples of culturally competent practice, or address the practicalities, policy, or managerial aspects of delivering services to members of diverse groups
- Debate papers that address key issues in diversity or focus on underresearched topics
- Knowledge-sharing reports, which may include book, Web site, video, and other resource reviews and papers about specific initiatives to improve practice

Submissions to the journal come from all around the world. Nearly all submissions undergo two independent, blind reviews, and are then returned to the authors with the reviewers' comments. Approximately one-third of the submissions are subsequently accepted for publication following revision. Diversity and Equality in Health and Care is indexed in:

- CINAHL
- Health Policy Reference Centre
- SocIndex (FT)
- Family and Society Studies Worldwide
- Gender Studies Database
- Race Relations Abstracts
- Social Care Online
- British Nursing Index
- Health and Social Care Abstracts
- CSA Sociological Abstracts
- CSA Social Services Abstracts
- DH-Data
- Ulrich's International Periodicals Directory
- SCOPUS (SciVerse)
- NHS Evidence

Subscriptions to Diversity and Equality in Health and Care include printed issues, access to online current content, the full text archive, Internet reference linking with search facilities, and an e-mail contents alert service. Individuals can also purchase online-only access to the journal, which excludes only the printed issues, for a reduced rate.

M. Scott Young
University of South Florida
Mark Johnson
De Montfort University

See Also: Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Disabilities, International Variation in Attitudes Toward; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Health Care, Disparities in; Journal of Ethnic and Cultural Diversity in Social Work.

Further Readings

Johnson, Mark and Paula McGee. "Dual Jeopardy or Double Pride? Disability, Difference, Diversity and the Gentle Art of Handicapping." Diversity and Equality in Health and Care, v.9/4 (2012).

McGee, Paula and Mark Johnson. "Issues in Minority Ethnic Health." Health & Social Care in the Community, v.12/5 (2004).

Diversity in the Workplace

Workplace diversity refers to the similarities and differences among workers within organizations. Workplace diversity initiatives emerged from two divergent forces that exerted separate but significant influences on workplace diversity policies and practices. Protections found in equal employment legislation and penalties enacted to protect workers from discriminatory hiring and dismissal practices developed first as a result of the civil rights movement during the 1960s and 1970s. The business case for diversity emerged later as a result of increased competition for talent and a desire to improve organizational bottom lines through greater retention, engagement, and organizational commitment of employees from diverse backgrounds. Workplace diversity programs initially focused exclusively on the recruitment of workers based on race and gender characteristics. As more women and minorities entered the workforce, workplace diversity programs expanded to address concerns of retaining and promoting women and minorities through mandated diversity and sensitivity training for all employees. Dimensions of diversity now include age, ethnicity, gender, physical abilities, sexual orientation, educational background, geographic location, income, marital status, parental status, caregiving responsibilities, religious beliefs, work experience, work preferences, and job classification. Current diversity practices have expanded to focus on the climate of the organization as a means to promote inclusion.

The term diversity typically refers to organizational focus on the personal and interpersonal, whereas the term inclusion refers to a focus on the systemic. Inclusion focuses on how workplaces create opportunity, interaction, communication, information, and decision making as means to leverage diversity. Inclusive organizations employ a holistic approach to create structures, policies, and practices that reflect an understanding of the multiplicity of views and an appreciation for differences through better interactions among employees, clients, and vendors. Organizations that practice inclusion are thought to create cultures that invite collaboration; support problem solving; and promote creativity, flexibility, and responsiveness to change. Organizations can be diverse but not inclusive in the sense that they might have recruitment and retention policies and practices to promote diversity among employees but not change the way that these interactions are structured. Conversely, an organization might have internal policies and practices that are inclusive but may not be diverse. Diversity and inclusion practices within organizations are viewed today as a means to promote workplace fairness and organizational effectiveness.

Workplace diversity is intrinsic to human services because the workplace represents a community in which a significant proportion of a variety of adults participate for most of their lives. Engagement in paid work has financial, emotional, cognitive, and social benefits for individuals and provides a benefit system that includes wages as well as benefits and services directed at the social, financial, and health needs for which individual workers and their families are eligible. These benefits provide individuals and families with security against the privatization of human services through access to low-cost health care, health care savings, retirement and income savings, disability and death benefits, and education and child care credits. Systemic bias and discrimination against individuals based on gender, race or ethnicity, disability, religion, sexual orientation, sexual identity, and caregiving responsibility limits participation in work, which in turn limits human potential.

Discrimination in the Workplace

Diversity and inclusion practices within organizations are meant to reduce discrimination and exclusion of particular groups from full participation in the workforce. Discrimination in the workplace occurs when individuals, institutions, or governments treat an employee differently because of personal characteristics, such as race, age, gender, sexual orientation, disability, and caregiving responsibilities, instead of how well they can carry out their work. This treatment results in a negative outcome, such as limited access to jobs, denial of a promotion, unfair dismissal, or reduced compensation. Discrimination within the workplace has a number of distinct facets: it can be overt or covert, and it can be enacted intentionally or unintentionally. Overt acts of discrimination refer to explicit policies or laws that generate unequal treatment among groups. Covert discrimination refers to the implicit effects of overt laws or policies governing the workplace. Discrimination is labeled "individual" when it refers to a single act carried out by a worker within an organization. It is labeled "institutional" when it occurs as part of organizational policy or practice.

Workplace discrimination is a significant social and economic problem today. According to the Center for American Progress, discrimination is estimated to cost businesses $64 billion a year in lost productivity, poor job performance, and turnover, and it exposes organizations to costly litigation. A recent study conducted in California by the UCLA-RAND Center for Law and Public Policy found the average individual discrimination lawsuit costs employers $550,000 in court fees and compensation. Class action discrimination lawsuits can cost organizations millions of dollars in sanctions. The social costs associated with workplace discrimination are also high, seen through untapped human potential, loss of self-esteem, lost productivity, and organizational commitment.

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) is responsible for enforcing all federal laws related to protecting workers from discrimination. Most employer organizations are covered under the EEOC (minimum of 15 employees; organizations with labor unions and employment agencies also are included). The EEOC receives, investigates, and resolves complaints of employment discrimination and may in certain cases pursue litigation if discrimination is found. The EEOC also conducts outreach, education, technical assistance, and evaluation programs related to diversity practices and policies. Organizations work with EEOC guidelines to ensure that they are meeting federal requirements on recruitment, hiring, and compensation, training, and firing of employees. According to the EEOC, employment discrimination charges have increased over the past 15 years by 23 percent, from 80,680 in 1997 to 99,412 in 2012. Of the cases filed with the EEOC in 2012, approximately 34 percent were related to discrimination based on race, 31 percent on sex, 23 percent on age, and 21 percent on disability.

Laws Protecting Workers From Discrimination and Bias in the Workplace

Workplace diversity practices originated with legal protections and strategies aimed at protecting certain classes of workers from discrimination through the use of nondiscriminatory hiring practices. Two responses characterize these protections against discrimination. Laws prohibiting discrimination based on personal characteristics are considered negative actions and were originally meant to promote equity and fairness in employment practices for women and minority groups. The Equal Pay Act of 1963 and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 exemplify this type of action by prohibiting wage discrimination based on gender, age, or race; mandating equal wages for performing the same job; and prohibiting discrimination in hiring based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

Subsequent legislation attempted to redress sustained and systemic discrimination through the creation of positive actions, designed to right past wrongs by providing disadvantaged groups with better opportunities. An example of a discrimination law meant to embody a positive action is found in Executive Order 11246 of 1965, which stipulates that organizations must ensure equality in hiring employees through the creation of action plans meant to increase the presence of women and minorities in workplaces and participation in managerial and leadership positions. Affirmative action policies in general are thought to increase organizational diversity in two ways, through (1) mandating requirements on the composition of the public workforce by specifying recruitment and promotion strategies aimed at designated groups, and (2) incentivizing private businesses to actively recruit and promote employees from key demographic groups by granting preferential access to government contracts to businesses engaging in equal opportunity employment practices. Businesses awarded government contracts are required to report their organizations' affirmative action plans and organizational demographics annually to the EEOC.

The successes of earlier legislative efforts to increase the participation of women and racial minorities into the workforce led other marginalized groups to fight for and win protections to the right to work. For example, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1963 protects older workers by prohibiting discrimination in hiring, promotion, or dismissal due to age. The Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1971 expanded protections to pregnant workers by prohibiting employers from not hiring, retaining, or promoting women who are pregnant. Workers with disabilities were extended specific protections from workplace discriminations in Title I of the 1990 Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The Family Medical Leave Act of 1993 secures unpaid job protections for workers with family care responsibilities, and the association provision within the ADA protects this group of workers with family care responsibilities from discrimination in hiring, promotion, compensation, and termination due to their caregiving responsibilities. Workers who identify as gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgendered have protections under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. Twenty-one states and the District of Columbia have specifically outlawed employment discrimination on the basis of gender identity. Federal employees have further protections against this bias through Executive Order 11478 (Section 1).

Legislation protecting key groups from discrimination in the workplace also serves to defend protected employee groups from employer retaliation. Employer retaliation complaints represent 38 percent of all discrimination complaints filed with the EEOC. Employer retaliation refers to any adverse action by an employer, employment agency, or labor organization against a covered individual when that individual is engaged in a protected activity. Adverse actions are categorized as an action that attempts to keep someone from opposing a discriminatory practice such as termination, denial of promotion, threats, unjustified negative evaluations, or increased surveillance. Covered individuals are people who have opposed unlawful employment practices, participated in legal proceedings, or asked for accommodations based on the legal protections afforded individuals based on race, color, sex, religion, national origin, age, or disability. Protected activities include opposition to activities believed to be unlawful, such as complaining to anyone about alleged discrimination against oneself or others, threatening to file a charge of discrimination, picketing, filing a charge of employment discrimination, or cooperating with an internal investigation of alleged discriminatory practices.

Demographic Trends Influencing Workplace Diversity Needs

A number of economic and demographic factors impact the current workforce and make workplace diversity a priority for organizations. First, the global economy predicates a need for organizations to work across national boundaries with their different languages, customs, and expectations. Most large companies have offices in multiple countries with customers as well as employees who most likely speak a variety of languages, and have customs and practices that may be very different from those of the parent organization. Failure to understand cultural customs and expectations can negatively affect organizational bottom lines through high turnover rates and decreases in employee commitment and productivity. As technology improves, access to more diverse populations is expected, as companies will expand to foreign locations in an effort to remain profitable and competitive.

The demographics of the workforce are also changing in several significant ways that require workplaces to attend to the diversity of the workforce. A key demographic shift is in the number of women who are entering and remaining in the labor force. U.S. census data show the participation rates of women in the workforce have increased significantly, from 37 percent in 1965 to 63 percent in 2011. Women compose nearly half (47 percent) of the labor force in the United States, and they are the primary wage earners in approximately 40 percent of households with children under the age of 18 years. The entry of large numbers of women into the workforce has created tensions in the workplace because, prior to this shift, women historically had acted as family caregivers while men worked outside the home as breadwinners. This gendered division of labor has allowed employers to structure the type, duration, and benefits associated with paid work on the assumption that men did not have child care responsibilities within the home. With more women in the workforce, workplaces have had to address the dual roles occupied by women by reexamining the structure, duration, and positive aspects of work through enhanced benefits packages and work-life initiatives as a means to recruit and retain women.

The U.S. Army defines diversity as "the different attributes, experiences, and backgrounds of our soldiers, civilians, and family members that further enhance our global capabilities and contribute to an adaptive, culturally astute Army."

The aging of the workforce is a second demographic trend influencing diversity of the workforce. U.S. Department of Labor estimates suggest that by the year 2020, 25.2 percent of the workforce will be 55 years of age or older. Between 1977 and 2007, the employment of workers age 65 years and older increased by 101 percent compared to 59 percent for all workers in the population (age 16 years and older) during the same period. The rate of people age 75 years and older in the workforce has increased by 172 percent from 1977 to 2007.

The aging of the workforce is thought to be due to three occurrences: the aging of the baby boomer generation, the fact that older adults are staying in the workforce beyond traditional retirement age, and the economic crisis of 2008. Labor force participation rates for older adults (those age 65 years and older) have been steadily increasing since the mid-1990s, a complete reversal from previous trends in the 1970s and 1980s. Older workers are also much more likely to be employed in full-time rather than part-time work, which represents another reversal. This trend, coupled with low birthrates across most industrialized countries, means that fewer workers will be entering the workforce, older workers will hold onto jobs for longer periods of time, and, as they exit, labor shortages across all employment sectors are expected to occur.

Fertility rates, in contrast, are expected to remain at replacement levels. This means that any growth in the labor force will increase the need to pull workers from untapped parts of the labor pool (e.g., more women with children, people with disabilities, and immigrants). Immigration currently contributes 40 percent to the growth of the U.S. population overall and represents 16 percent of the labor force. Both these numbers are expected to grow over the next decade, which will increase the need for organizations to attend to workplace diversity and inclusion needs in order to attract and retain workers from these key demographic groups.

Diversity and Inclusion Practices

Human resource professionals enact the human service functions of organizations. They are responsible for recruiting, selecting, training, motivating, and rewarding employees. Human services professionals create training programs aimed at promoting diversity initiatives within organizations. They are also key influencers of organizational climate and culture through their strategic business relationships with top executives and managers. Within organizations, human resource managers are often the creators and disseminators of key policies meant to promote diversity within the workplace. In larger organizations, human resource professionals whose function is to manage diversity within the organization may hold specialized titles and training in diversity and inclusion practices.

The type and scope of diversity practices enacted by organizations are determined by a number of factors, including organizational size as well as commitment to and belief in the business case for diversity. The seven most common diversity and inclusion practices found in organizations are defined as follows:

- Affirmative action plans are action-oriented strategies carried out on an annual basis as a means to identify, evaluate, and achieve fair representation of women and minorities within organizations.
- Diversity committees and task forces are formed for the purpose of bringing people from disparate parts of an organization together to oversee diversity initiatives through brainstorming needs, identifying solutions, and monitoring progress.
- Affirmative action and diversity managers are dedicated positions that manage affirmative action and diversity initiatives within organizations through the tracking and reporting of recruitment, retention, training, compensation, and promotion of women and minority employees.

- Diversity training is the most common diversity practice found in organizations. It developed as a means to educate managers on antidiscrimination legislation, suggest behavioral changes to address bias, and raise cultural awareness and cross-cultural communication. Diversity training has evolved further to focus on the need to create inclusive culture and climate through the creation of opportunities for women and minorities. This training is often offered to management or to all employees as part of an overall training plan.
- Diversity evaluations for managers refer to organizational assessments of attitudes and behaviors meant to provide managers with feedback on how their day-to-day decisions impact employee diversity.
- Diversity network programs are meant to build inclusion by creating networks for employees to facilitate the sharing of career information, advice, and opportunities for advancement through the development of professional networks. Diversity network programs vary in form from informal brown bag lunches on selected diversity topics to structured national conferences.
- Mentoring programs operate in a more deliberate fashion than do networking programs by matching junior employees on the management track to senior counterparts, with the goal of providing opportunities to meet and discuss career opportunities and seek informal career advice.

Impact of Diversity Practices Within Organizations

Organizations spend between $200 million and $300 million per year on diversity management alone. Yet very few comprehensive studies on the impact of diversity practices have occurred. Studies that have looked at whether diversity practices create and sustain a diverse workplace found some practices to be more helpful to women than to minorities and identified others as harmful to team processes by promoting feelings of difference instead of similarities. One consistent finding is that organizations who adopt diversity and inclusion practices for structural rather than symbolic reasons are more likely to attract and retain a more diverse workplace. This is because these organizations create institutional supports for diversity and inclusion, which are effective at changing the culture of the organization. The allocation of authority, accountability, and expertise (seen through affirmative action plans, diversity committees and task forces, and diversity managers and departments) to responsible stakeholders within organizations ensures that someone bears responsibility for insuring that diversity goals are developed, monitored, and met.

Lisa M. Stewart
California State University, Monterey Bay

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Education for Diversity in Human Services; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Equal Pay Act of 1963; Fair Labor Standards Act; Medicine, Workplace Diversity in.

Further Reading

Akabas, S. H. and P. A. Kurtzman. Work and the Workplace: A Resource for Innovative Policy and Practice. New York: Columbia University Press, 2004.

Blaisi, G. and J. W. Doherty. California Employment and Discrimination Law and its Enforcement: The Fair Employment and Housing Act at 50. Los Angeles: UCLA-RAND Center for Law and Public Policy, 2003.

Burns, C. The Costly Business of Discrimination: The Economic Costs of Discrimination and the Financial Benefits of Gay and Transgender Equality in the Workplace. Washington, DC: Center for American Progress, 2012.

Diversity Council. "Business Case for Diversity." Diversity Toolkit for Business. http://www.diversitycouncil.org/toolkit/BusinessCase_CostofDiscrimination.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

Kalev, A., F. Dobbin, and E. Kelly. "Best Practices or Best Guesses? Assessing the Efficacy of Corporate Affirmative Action and Diversity Policies." American Sociological Review, v.71 (2006).

Kochan, T., et al. "The Effects of Diversity on Business Performance: Report of the Diversity Research Network." Human Resource Management, v.42/1 (2003).

Mor Barak, M. E. Managing Diversity: Toward a Globally Inclusive Workplace. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2013.

Singer, A. "Immigrant Workers in the U.S. Labor Force." Metropolitan Policy Program. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 2012.

Toossi, M. (2012). "Labor Force Projections to 2020: A More Slowly Growing Labor Force." Washington, DC: Monthly Labor Review. http://www.bls.gov/opub/mlr/2012/01/art3full.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. "Charge Statistics FY 1997 through FY 2012." http://eeoc.gov/eeoc/statistics/enforcement/charges.cfm (Accessed June 2013).

Wang, W., K. Parker, and P. Taylor. "Breadwinner Moms: Mothers Are the Sole or Primary Provider in Four-in-Ten Households with Children; Public Conflicted about the Growing Trend." PEW Social & Demographic Trends. Washington, DC: Pew Research Center. http://www.pewsocialtrends.org/files/2013/05/Breadwinner_moms_final.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

DiversityRx

The entity known today as DiversityRx evolved from an amalgamation of organizations and associations that came together with a central objective—to provide information, and in that process, offer education as it relates to the provision of health care services that meet the needs of culturally and linguistically diverse members of society. Cultural and linguistic differences historically had placed groups at a strong disadvantage for receiving health care. The DiversityRx alliance includes, among others, Resources for Cross Cultural Health Care (RCCHC) and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) Office of Minority Health. Support also came from, among other organizations, the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation, the California Endowment, the National Conference of State Legislatures, and Drexel University School of Public Health's Center for Health Equality. The 1995 launch of RCCHC soon produced the first DiversityRx Web site (funded by the Henry J. Kaiser Foundation) and the CLAS-talk listserv, as well as the National Conference on Quality Health Care for Culturally Diverse Populations.

Much of the strength of DiversityRx is attributed to its many alliances. In conjunction with a number of partners, DiversityRx supports the Your Voice initiative of the Tides Center, which operates as a nonprofit management service and does work in a vast array of areas, including health, community development, and social justice. In addition, research and policy projects of DiversityRx and RCCHC have received funds and support from a number of agencies related to HHS, such as the Office of Minority Health and the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality.

The Target

Understanding the cultural and linguistic concerns that serve to insulate and often isolate diverse members of society is central to the focus of DiversityRx and its many partners to provide services for impacted groups. These groups include minority members of society, immigrants, and indigenous communities. In its mission to serve this group, DiversityRx has embraced partnerships with a wide spectrum of health care providers, policy makers, researchers, and other public and private entities. These committed providers strive to address the disparity created in both accessing and thus ultimately receiving health care comparable to other segments of the population. With its strong focus on promoting education, DiversityRx's role, in addition to providing information to its partners that can be used to effect changes that will ultimately result in the identified group accessing needed health care, is one of support. This has been the mission of DiversityRx since 1997.

Tools

To address the objective of providing information, DiversityRx and its partners have elected to utilize the forum that speaks loudest today—technology. Much of their information sharing utilizes virtual learning events in the form of Webinars and mini-conferences, and the provision of resource databases, by which distance issues and other institutional obstacles are tackled. The objective is to identify topical issues and, through these and other media, to give members access to relevant information and facts that will guide their actions. The learning has been described as bottom-up peer learning, by which each member and participant contributes to the education of the others via the open medium provided by the constructed network mechanism. A big part of the success hinges on participation and the learning and problem solving that is accessible and anticipated through the "virtual" learning approach. No limit or boundaries are set on the collaborations because the open nature of the forum fosters current information as well as unfolding problem solving. The plan is to continue to implement peer-learning networks. This approach has received favorable reviews from member organizations and individuals. With more community involvement and a more direct approach to raising and sharing issues and the responses to these issues, the vision is that more interaction will result in a wider dissemination of appropriate information, techniques, and best practices, which will ultimately filter down to the population at the heart of this project.

Structure: The Your Voice Project

DiversityRx has identified a three-prong approach to achieving participation and information sharing: (1) the establishment of peer-learning communities, (2) virtual learning opportunities, and (3) improvements to the Web site.

With peer-learning groups, professionals hold regular monthly forums to address the practices and challenges they face. Group size is between 12 and 20 members, who are required to communicate for a year. To safeguard against attrition, which has the potential to derail potential inroads and creativity and in general simply be disruptive to progress, participants are formally screened for fit and commitment. Further, participant guidelines stipulate involvement in a number of ways—for example, monthly online meetings, each member's possible lead on a topic at one of these forums, participation in blogs and the listserv, other levels of involvement that are more likely to result in a cohesive group, and continued participation. The objective is to share what works and what does not. Forums don't end after the formal scheduled meetings; there is opportunity to continue discussion beyond the meetings via listserv. Further, information is available in a clearinghouse of sorts, and thus is always available for referral.

The purpose of DiversityRx is to improve the accessibility and quality of health care for minority, immigrant, and indigenous communities, as it is clear that significant disparities exist in health care to minority groups across the United States. In its mission to serve these groups, the organization has embraced a wide spectrum of partnerships.

The second forum type amounts to miniconferences—again, structured around very relevant issues impacting culturally and linguistically diverse groups and the need to have service delivered in a way that they can both access and understand. These conferences tackle issues of practice, research, and policy. Participants have an active part to play—they are solicited to direct the topics of these forums. As with the peer-learning group, DiversityRx chronicles and archives the forums for reciprocity. Typical working communities may be between 50 and 100 individuals. Here, commitment for at least one year is desired to foster cohesiveness. Some of the methods seen in peer-learning groups are employed, as well as others, such as invited guest speakers and participants with special expertise and collaboration(s) on specific problems.

The third approach is maintenance of a relevant Web site by which users can obtain what they need and not have technology itself become an obstacle. Updates of the site allow for full use as well as obtaining information on other useful sites. Learning events are scheduled; these may take the form of guest speakers with question and answer sessions (all via the Internet). Some conference forums may have several guest speakers and participants.

The public is able to access the Web site. They may use the listserv, get involved in seminars, and share information and resources at their disposal. To maintain the integrity of the Web site, guests are screened.

As stated earlier, a number of partners share the initiative of providing information on health care for diverse groups. Some have a more specific charge, such as Migrant Health Promotion, Inc. (MHP), which focuses on migrants, farm workers, and border communities with the overall objective of promoting sustained healthier lifestyles to these groups.

Conclusion

The literature is clear on the disparity that exists in health care to minority groups across the United States. One factor contributing to this disparity revolves around access to available services; yet another factor is the divide resulting from cultural insulations on the one hand and cultural biases on the other. Underserved populations must be reached, and the best way to achieve this is by equipping those on the front line—those who come face-to-face with clients. The difficulties they encounter because of their own inadequacies and that of the institutional structures can only begin to be countered by providing a bridge—one that understands the factors that prevent available service entities from getting to those who need it, and provides clear avenues by which providers and clients can meet in an atmosphere in which linguistic and cultural divides are overcome. DiversityRx and its many partners seek to provide that bridge through technology and education.

Lorraine A. Samuels
Huston Tillotson University

See Also: Diversities; Diversity and Quality in Health Care; Diversity in the Workplace.

Further Readings

DiversityRx. http://www.diversityrx.org/print/327 (Accessed October 2013).

DiversityRx. "Your Voice: Education, Support and Collaborative Knowledge Development to Advance Cultural Competence in Health Care." http://www.diversityRx.org (Accessed December 2013).

DiversityRx. "Your Voice Initiative," http://www.diversityrx.org/about/your-voice-initiative-0 (Accessed December 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of Minority Health. http://minorityhealth.hhs.gov/templates/content.aspx?ID=9653. (Accessed November 2013).

Divorce

Although American divorce rates are not climbing as rapidly as they did in the 1970s and 1980s, divorce remains common in modern American life. There is an abundance of data on marriage, divorce, and cohabitation in the United States; most estimates indicate that half of all first marriages end in divorce. However, accurate divorce rates are tricky to ascertain because of many variables, including a decrease in the rate of marriages, lack of reporting, small sample sizes, total population versus adults, and inability to differentiate between the number of first marriages and subsequent marriages that end in divorce. In working in human services fields in the 21st century, it is imperative to have an understanding of the trends of this data, the deficiencies in the available data and studies, and the implications of divorce in a diverse population.

Divorce Statistics

According to U.S. census data, there were 877,000 divorces in 2011—3.6 per 1,000 of the total population (of 44 reporting states and Washington, D.C.). This was a decrease from the 1990 data, which indicated that 4.7 people out of every 1,000 were getting a divorce (1,182,000 divorces). However, the decrease in divorces does not necessarily indicate a decrease in the divorce rate because the marriage rate also decreased. In 2009, there were 2,118,000 marriages in America (6.8 per 1,000 of the total population), a marked decrease from 2,443,000 marriages (9.8 per 1,000) just two decades before.

The National Health Statistics Report in 2012 reports marriage and divorce data on first marriages in the United States using the 2006–2010 National Survey of Family Growth (NSFG). These statistics use national samples of both women and men aged 15–44. The 2006–2010 NSFG was based on 22,682 face-to-face interviews— 12,279 with women and 10,403 with men, aged 15–44 years in the household population of the United States. Out of the sample of women surveyed, there were 5,534 first marriages and 1,574 first marriages that ended in divorce. Out of the men surveyed, there were 3,734 first marriages and 1,236 first marriages that ended in divorce. Even though these statistics show a higher marriage and divorce rate for women than men, the research also used a sample that consisted of more women than men. Although the divorce rate in women is still slightly higher than men in the 2009 U.S. Census data, a more equal picture of the divorce rate between men and women is portrayed—9.2 percent of men and 9.7 percent of women (per 1,000) were divorced in 2009.

The Impact of Diversity on Divorce

According to the NSFG, diversity impacts the incidence of divorce in many ways. In looking at the probability of a marriage lasting 20 years, race has an impact on the findings. The highest probability is for foreign-born Hispanic men (70 percent) followed by Asian women (69 percent). Approximately 54 percent of Caucasian women, however, will have a first marriage that lasts 20 years, followed by only 37 percent of African American women; there is no difference in the rates between Caucasian and African American men.

Socioeconomic status also has a significant impact on the divorce rate in the United States. Although Americans with a higher socioeconomic status are more likely to get married, the divorce rate is still higher in those with lower socioeconomic status. Lower-income couples experience stressors including a lack of resources to meet basic needs, difficulty in obtaining employment and housing, and the inability to achieve personal goals. They may be less likely or able to seek help or intervention in their marriage because of reduced access to psychological or social support. A higher divorce rate also maintains and/or contributes to the poverty rate: the poverty rate in children of married parents is 10 percent, whereas the poverty rate in children of female-headed families is almost 50 percent.

Religion also affects the probability of a first marriage lasting at least 20 years. Women who indicated they were raised in “other religions” had a 65 percent probability of their first marriage lasting 20 years. Women who reported being raised in a household without religion had a 43 percent probability of their marriage lasting 20 years. Educational status also impacts divorce. People with a high school diploma have a much lower probability of staying married for at least 20 years than people with bachelor’s degree (49 percent compared with 78 percent for women, and 47 percent compared with 65 percent for men).

Same-sex marriage is recent in the United States, and as such there is little data on either incidence or legal precedents regarding same-sex divorce. Same-sex divorce is an important issue, however, because having legal safeguards in place at the dissolution of a relationship is one of the benefits of having the relationship legally recognized. Divorce laws protect spouses from unequal treatment, consider the rights and needs of children involved, and ensure financial support for the lower-earning spouse. If the heterosexual divorce rate is a reliable indicator, as more states continue to adopt same-sex marriage legislation, the incidence of same-sex divorces may also increase.

Kathryn Martinelli Brzozowski
Temple University

See Also: Families, Nontraditional; Family Structure, Diversity of; Marriage Counseling.

Further Readings

Coontz, S. "The Origins of Modern Divorce." Family Process, v.46/1 (2007).

Copen, C. E., K. Daniels, J. Vespa, and W. D. Mosher. "First Marriages in the United States: Data From the 2006–2010 National Survey of Family Growth." Division of Vital Statistics: National Health Statistics Reports, v.49 (2012).

Mullins, L. C., K. P. Brackett, N. McKenzie, and Y. Djamba. "The Impact of Median Family Income, Shared Religious Affiliation and Region on the Divorce Rate in the United States." Journal of the Alabama Academy of Science, v.83/1 (2012).

Do Not Resuscitate Order

In health care settings, a do not resuscitate order (also called a DNR or no code, referring to the medical shorthand for no code blue) is an advanced directive or legal order stating that the patient wishes not to receive cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) or advanced cardiac life support (ACLS) in the event of cardiac or respiratory arrest. This order takes effect when the patient is no longer able to communicate his or her wishes.

A DNR order does not restrict treatments such as chemotherapy, radiation, antibiotics, dialysis, or nutrition/hydration for the patient. Patients will continue to get medical attention, including pain medications for comfort, but if cardiac or respiratory arrest occurs, CPR will not be started, nor will the patient be intubated. Otherwise, the medical team will continue to care for and support the patient.

More recently, some health care providers are using the term allow natural death (AND) because this term focuses on the care being provided and not what is being avoided. This shift in terminology, although not universally used, allows patients, families, and health care providers to make decisions about end-of-life care without fear that something is being withheld from the patient. This shift in terminology is seen as a way to get more patients, families, and health care professionals involved in end-of-life conversations with less trepidation about what will not be done for the patient and a focus on how the patient wants death to occur. This does not mean the end of DNR orders, as they are instructive for the health care team, but it allows for patients and families to make better-informed health decisions.

Health care professionals can follow a DNR order only if they know it exists. When in doubt, caregivers will perform CPR on a patient experiencing cardiac and/or respiratory arrest. It is important to inform doctors, nurses, caregivers, and other family members of the patient's wishes for the DNR order. If the patient is transferred to another facility or health care team, regulations from the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) require the patient (or health care power of attorney) to restate that this issue has been addressed and the DNR order is still what the patient wants. It is helpful for family members and the health care team to be fully informed of the patient's wishes so they can provide the patient's requested care when the patient is unable to communicate it. In short, DNR orders exist so the patient can receive the desired care.

Do Not Resuscitate Orders and Advanced Directives

As part of advanced directives and living wills, patients can state their wishes for end-of-life care, including DNR orders, if the time comes when they are no longer able to speak for themselves. A DNR order can also be written by a physician or health care provider as a doctor's order in the medical chart. Many states have specific forms or guidelines about DNR orders. The wishes outlined in advanced directives and living wills are not binding, so the addition of the DNR order in the medical chart is important. Some states do not recognize DNR orders in advanced directives or living wills outside of the hospital setting. For example, first responders or emergency medical services may be required to start resuscitation procedures unless a specific state form is properly filled out and cosigned by a physician or health care professional. DNR forms and rules differ from state to state, so it is important to make sure the specific state's rules are followed to assure adherence to the patient's wishes.

Making the Do Not Resuscitate Decision

Decisions about end-of-life care should be made before they are needed. If a health crisis occurs, it could be too late to communicate a patient's wishes for a DNR order. Also, starting the discussion about patient wishes early allows for family members and the health care team to effectively coordinate care and do what is best for the patient. Talking about dying is often both difficult and sad, but it allows everyone involved to honor the patient's vision for the end of life. Communication between the patient, family members, and health care professionals will let everyone involved with the patient provide care and support while respecting the patient's wishes. A DNR order, like any advanced directive, can be changed as needed, based on the patient's health care changes or preferences.

Implications for Diversity in Human Services

Professionals working with families who have or are creating DNR orders should bear in mind that not all patients and families make this decision in the same way. Health care workers need to be aware that factors such as the patient's age, health level, family structure, and culture are important influences in the decision-making process. When working with patients, personal cultural competence can help encourage and support patient advocacy and identify potential barriers in the process of honoring the DNR order. DNR orders are recognized as ethically and medically appropriate, but staff, family, and patient education are important to assist in making the best decision for that patient

Sarah E. Colonna
University of North Carolina at Greensboro

See Also: Adult Day Care; Aging and Adult Services; Case Management; Death and Dying, Cultural Attitudes Toward; Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Emergency Medical Care; Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996; Hospice Services; Medical Transportation; National Institute on Aging; Palliative Care; Respite Care; Respite Services; Senior Services.

Further Reading

Bailey, F. Amos, Rebecca S. Allen, Beverly R. Williams, Patricia S. Goode, Shanette Granstaff, David T. Redden, and Kathryn L. Burgio. "Do-Not-Resuscitate Orders in the Last Days of Life." Journal of Palliative Medicine, v.15/7 (2012).

Haig, Scott. "When Does 'Do Not Resuscitate' Make Sense?" TIME Health and Family (February 7, 2008). http://www.time.com/time/health/article/0,8599,1711170,00.html (Accessed November 2013).

Pavul, Amy. "Lawsuit Raises Issues About End-of-Life Wishes." Orlando Sentinel (July 22, 2013). http://articles.orlandosentinel.com/2013-07-22/health/os-end-of-life-rights-20130722_1_end-of-life-do-not-resuscitate-order-dnro (Accessed November 2013).

Reed, Jennifer Booth. "Do Not Resuscitate vs. Allow Natural Death." USA Today (March 2, 2009). http://usatoday30.usatoday.com/news/health/2009-03-02-DNR-natural-death_N.htm (Accessed November 2013).

Scheibel, Nicola, Sarah H. Parker, Richard R. Bessette, Eric J. Cleveland, J. Paul Neeley, Karen T. Warfield, Mellissa M. Barth, Kim A. Gaines, and James M. Naessens. "Honouring Patient's Resuscitation Wishes: A Multiphased Effort to Improve Identification and Documentation." BMJ Quality and Safety, v.22/1 (2013).

Veysman, Boris. "A Patient's Death Prompts a Doctor to Assess 'Do Not Resuscitate' Orders." Washington Post (March 9, 2010). http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2010/03/08/AR2010030802432.html (Accessed November 2013).

Domestic Violence, International Variations in Attitudes Toward

The World Health Organization (WHO) noted in 2013 that 35 percent of women worldwide have experienced either physical and/or sexual intimate partner violence or nonpartner sexual violence. Most of the violence is intimate partner violence, with 30 percent of all women who have been in a relationship having experienced physical and/or sexual violence by their sexual partner. The highest prevalence was found in central sub-Saharan Africa, with a prevalence of 65.6 percent of ever-partnered women having experienced intimate partner violence. All regions of sub-Saharan Africa were found to be above the global average of 26.4 percent. The lowest prevalence was in east Asia (with 16.3 percent); other regions below the global average are high-income regions, such as western Europe (19.3 percent), North America (21.3 percent), central Asia (22.9 percent), and southern Latin America (23.7 percent). WHO notes that even in regions where the preponderance for violence falls below the average, between one-quarter and one-fifth of ever-partnered women have experienced partner violence.

Key determinants of the existence and/or acceptance or toleration of domestic violence include the attitudes and beliefs held at the individual, community, and societal levels. These can be influenced or exacerbated by less specific but relevant stereotypes held and perpetuated about women and violence, gender, and equality, and are arguably equally influenced by matters of religion, class, education, and race. Rachael Pierotti notes, “The definition of violence against women is a cultural product; it is based on fundamental principles of world society, including universalism, liberal individualism and equality.” However, she continues, “Global inequalities affect the construction of violence against women, but the current influence of global cultural norms cannot be reduced to the unilateral imposition of Western values.” In an Australian study, respondents argued that domestic violence could be excused, for example, if it resulted from people getting so angry that they temporarily lost control or if the violent person genuinely regretted the violence.

Michael Flood and Bob Pease of Australia argue that the literature on community attitudes regarding violence against women concludes that attitudes are influenced by dominant social norms. In relation to the formation of such attitudes, they maintain that people who support traditional gender roles are more likely to express attitudes that support the use of violence. In this context, men are more likely than women to hold both traditional views about gender role and violence-supportive attitudes. Those attitudes that justify violence against women are reflected in day-to-day social and familial relationships and are arguably constantly reinforced. Children who witness violence or are direct victims of that violence are more likely to develop attitudes that support the use of violence as a means of conflict resolution. This, of course, will manifest itself in the perpetuation of violence and in the preservation and advancement of accepting attitudes toward violence. Flood and Pease found that violence against women is highest in societies in which masculinity equates to dominance, toughness, and honor; where there are rigid gender roles; and where violence is routinely drawn upon to settle disputes.

Anti–domestic violence sign located outside Entebbe, Uganda. The highest prevalence of domestic violence is in central sub-Saharan Africa, with a prevalence of 65.6 percent of ever-partnered women having experienced intimate partner violence. All regions of sub-Saharan Africa have been found to be above the global average of 26.4 percent.

Cultural Attitudes

The Innocenti Research Centre of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) noted in 2000 the influence of traditional and cultural practices upon the propensity for violence against women. Examples of such influence include female genital mutilation (with 130 million women globally reputed to have undergone this procedure, at a rate of 2 million annually); dowry-related violence (with more than 5,000 women killed annually if the conditions laid down by their husbands for the dowry are not met); with so-called accidental kitchen fires constituting a key mode of killing; and so-called honor killings for reasons including alleged adultery, premarital relations, and falling in love with someone of whom the family disapproves. Beyond these examples, UNICEF cites a range of cultural, economic, legal, and political factors through which domestic violence is perpetuated. Thus, for example, UNICEF notes the impact of cultural definitions of appropriate sex roles and values that provide men proprietary rights over women. It notes the impact of economic factors such as limited access to employment, limited access to education and training, and women's economic dependence on men. UNICEF notes further factors such as legal definitions of rape and domestic abuse and insensitive treatment of women by the police and judiciary. In addition, UNICEF notes factors such as domestic violence not being regarded seriously by politicians, perceived dangers of challenging the status quo, and limited participation of women in the organized political system.

The attitudes alluded to are important not only in terms of providing precursors to and supposed justification of violence, but also in terms of the manner in which they assist in developing the language utilized to describe and comprehend violence against women, societal response to violence, and responses of female victims. Community norms are crucial for determining whether violence is sanctioned, condoned, or condemned, and if so to what extent and why.

Possessing violence-supportive attitudes does not necessarily lead to the perpetration of violence against women. In a research review relating masculine ideology to sexual aggression, Sarah Murnen, Carrie Wright, and Gretchen Kaluzny suggest that men are more likely to have engaged in sexual assault or to profess a likelihood for committing rape in the future if they identify with traditional images of masculinity and male privilege and they hold hostile and/or negative sexual attitudes toward women. Flood and Pease note, for example, a connection between exposure to pornography—especially if frequent—and violence-supportive attitudes. Men who hold traditional, rigid, and misogynistic gender-role attitudes are more likely to be violent toward female partners. However, J. Basili and R. Brown argue that there is an important distinction to consider between implicit and explicit attitudes. Implicit attitudes are deemed to reflect one's inner feelings more accurately than explicit ones. Thus, one might express an explicit support for gender equality while harboring an implicit bias against such equality. Or one might hold an explicit attitude condemning discrimination or violence against women but implicitly approve of the social norms and gender attitudes that may perpetuate that discrimination or violence.

Global Attention

Within the European Union (EU), a recent survey indicated that the majority (84 percent) of EU respondents thought that violence against women was unacceptable and should always be punishable by law. A lesser percentage (12 percent) maintained that, although unacceptable, violence against women should not always be punishable by law. Smaller percentages thought domestic violence to be acceptable in certain circumstances (2 percent) or in all circumstances (1 percent). Within EU member states, the picture varies. Thus, 93 percent of respondents in Greece argue that violence against women is unacceptable and should always be punishable by law, but only 66 percent of people in Latvia are of the same view. Furthermore, 5 percent of respondents in Belgium argue that domestic violence is acceptable in certain circumstances, and 3 percent of respondents in Italy argue that domestic violence is acceptable in all circumstances.

Pierotti argues that in global terms, "the consensus is that a husband's physical abuse of his wife is part of a broader social system that reinforces gender inequality." In her study of attitudes toward violence against women in 26 low- and middle-income countries ranging from Armenia and Colombia to Rwanda, Turkey, and Zambia, an increasing rejection of intimate partner violence occurred in 23 of those countries, with a robust change in attitudes toward such violence in 12. Thus, for example, in Nigeria, the percentage of women rejecting intimate partner violence increased from 33 percent in 2003 to 52 percent in 2008. This increase was deemed by Pierotti to have coincided with increasing global attention raised in relation to it. Pierotti discovered that women with greater access to education and access to the media were more likely to reject intimate partner violence.

Rob McCusker
Teesside University Business School

See Also: Domestic Violence, Victims of; Family Violence Prevention and Services; Women, Battered.

Further Reading

Bassili, J. and R. Brown. "Implicit and Explicit Attitudes: Research, Challenges and Theory." In The Handbook of Attitudes, D. Albarracin, B. Johnson, and M. Zanna, eds. London: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 2005.

European Commission. "Domestic Violence Against Women Report." A survey requested by the EU Directorate-General for Justice, Freedom and Security and coordinated by the Directorate-General for Communication. EU Special EuroBarometer, v.344 (2010).

Flood, M. and B. Pease. The Factors Influencing Community Attitudes in Relation to Violence Against Women: A Critical Review of the Literature. Melbourne, VicHealth, 2006.

Murnen, S. C. Wright, and G. Kaluzny. "If 'Boys Will Be Boys,' Then Girls Will Be Victims? A Meta-Analytic Review of the Research that Relates Masculine Ideology to Sexual Aggression." Sex Roles, v.46/11–12 (2002).

Pierotti, R. "Increasing Rejection of Intimate Partner Violence: Evidence of Global Cultural Diffusion." American Sociological Review, v.78 (2013).

Taylor, N. and J. Mouzos. Community Attitudes to Violence Against Women Survey 2006: A Full Technical Report. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology, 2006.

UNICEF Innocenti Research Centre. Domestic Violence Against Women and Girls. Florence, Italy: UNICEF, 2000.

World Health Organization (WHO). Global and Regional Estimates of Violence Against Women: Prevalence and Health Effects of Intimate Partner Violence and Non-Partner Sexual Violence. Geneva: WHO, 2013.

Domestic Violence, Victims of

Given that an estimated one-third of the world's women will endure an abusive relationship in their lifetimes, it is essential that communities provide services to victims of domestic violence. More than just shelter for those fleeing abusers, victims may need legal and medical help, therapy and counseling, workforce training, transportation, child care, and more. Many domestic violence shelters or centers either provide these services or make referrals to community organizations that can provide them.

History

Prior to the Battered Women's Movement of the 1970s, no organized services were available for victims of domestic violence. Victims had to rely on their families and friends for shelter and support. Women's Advocates, established in 1974 in St. Paul, Minnesota, is considered to be the first emergency shelter for domestic violence victims. By 1982, the United States had more than 300 shelters. They were generally organized around radical feminist principles, as they were modeled after homes and operated with an egalitarian, communal structure.

A domestic violence awareness mural, titled "A Survivor's Journey" was created in 2010 by Joel Bergner in Washington, D.C. An estimated one-third of the world's women will endure an abusive relationship in their lifetimes. Research has shown that in the United States, immigrants are at 40 percent greater risk for victimization.

As the number of women seeking shelter continued to grow, advocates realized that they needed to collaborate with other agencies to meet the demand for assistance. Shelters reached out to form alliances with other groups and organizations, including local, state, and federal government entities. These coalitions helped fund the work, but, according to numerous scholars, resulted in a gradual shift away from the founding feminist principles. Some have criticized domestic violence shelters because of this change in philosophy.

Domestic Violence Centers

Today, many shelters or centers operate under a philosophy that seeks to empower victims to take control of their lives, enacted through services and support toward that goal. This assistance might include emergency shelters as well as safety planning, therapy, support groups, referrals to and collaborations with area agencies, efforts to help children who have witnessed abuse, and legal assistance, among other forms of support. However, most domestic violence victims do not stay in a shelter; thus, the support offered by these outreach services are critical. Most domestic violence shelters operate 24-hour crisis lines to counsel victims. Increasingly, domestic violence services also include an educational component.

While domestic violence shelters offer an important lifeline for victims, they struggle to meet the demand for help. Every year since 2005, the National Network to End Domestic Violence (NNEDV) has coordinated a one-day census of domestic violence centers to assess the scope of services provided and to identify areas in need of improvement. In 2012, 86 percent of the 1,924 certified centers participated in the 24-hour census. The survey found that 64,324 victims were served in one day. Three-quarters of the responding centers provided emergency shelter, and some 35,323 victims stayed in shelters or transitional housing during the 24-hour census. Of these, 24,783 were children. A total of 29,001 adults and children received nonresidential assistance and services, including counseling, legal advocacy, and children's support groups. More than 50 percent of the responding centers provided court accompaniment and/or advocacy for survivors, half provided transportation, 45 percent provided some form of group support, and 44 percent offered advocacy related to public benefits. Local and state hotlines answered 20,119 calls and the National Domestic Violence Hotline answered 702 calls, averaging more than 14 hotline calls every minute. In communities across the United States and its territories, 25,182 individuals attended 1,162 training sessions provided by local domestic violence programs.

Unfortunately, more than 10,000 requests for help went unmet during the 24-hour census. Of these unmet requests, 65 percent, or 6,818, were for emergency shelter or transitional housing. Often, all shelter beds are full, and victims in need must be referred to other services. Only 41 percent of the responding centers have transitional housing for victims. Counseling and legal assistance ranked second and third in terms of unmet requests. More than half of the centers were able to provide advocates to support victims in court, but only 11 percent could offer actual legal assistance. Centers cited numerous reasons for their inability to meet all of the requests, including lack of funding for needed programs and services (42 percent); not enough staff (30 percent); lack of available beds and/or funding for hotels (26 percent); too few specialized services (23 percent); and limited funding for translators, staff who are bilingual, or accessible equipment (10 percent).

Special Populations

Most shelters are designed for women and may not be open to male victims. Although women make up the majority of domestic violence victims, it is imperative that males who fear for their lives also have access to safe spaces. Across the United States, only a few shelters are specifically for men; thus, men must remain in dangerous situations, seek help from family or friends, or end up at homeless shelters where abusers can find them. Teen victims may find it difficult to access the support of domestic violence centers, as many are not knowledgeable about where to go, do not have the support of an adult to help them get there, or believe that the services are only for adults. Domestic violence centers can also improve on their capacity to serve elder victims.

Similarly, many shelters are not well equipped to serve victims with unique cultural, physical, or mental needs. Research has shown that immigrants on the whole (not necessarily from a specific nation or region of origin) are at 40 percent greater risk for victimization. Immigrants from other cultures may not be familiar with the laws and type of assistance offered to victims in the United States, and they may not know how to contact service providers. Language barriers may also leave some immigrant victims without help. Domestic violence centers must work to offer culturally competent services. Additionally, Native American women endure abuse at twice the rate of non-Native women, yet many living on reservation land have limited access to shelters or other services.

Domestic violence centers also must work to ensure that services are accessible to those with physical or mental disabilities. This includes, but is not limited to, special phone services or sign language interpreters for those with hearing challenges; braille for persons with visual impairments; and ramps, modified bathrooms, and other accommodations for those with mobility problems. Center staff should be trained on how to deal with specific mental or emotional disabilities, including when it is appropriate to refer a victim elsewhere for more extensive assistance. Further, crisis line and shelter staff must understand how to work with victims who may express suicidal tendencies.

Referrals

Domestic violence centers can also assist victims by referring them to other community agencies. That is, centers can and should partner with housing authorities, workforce training programs, local legal aid entities, medical doctors, and others to ensure that victims receive the help that the center cannot provide. Domestic violence centers can provide these referrals and help train professionals in these fields to understand domestic violence and to support victims. Medical professionals are encouraged to screen patients using specific questions or surveys. Well-trained medical professionals can help victims once abuse is disclosed or identified by taking careful documentation that can be used in legal proceedings or to access other services and by providing support and information about other services. Although not all victims call police, some do. Many police agencies now have victim advocates who assist in cases of domestic and sexual violence.

Middle- and upper-class victims often do not seek the assistance of domestic violence shelters due to the stigma they perceive to be attached to this form of help. Instead, these victims often seek the assistance of private therapists or counselors. Thus, therapists and counselors provide an important first line of help for many victims of domestic violence, and they must ensure that they are adequately trained on how to support and empower these victims.

Laura Finley
Barry University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Information and Referral; Interpersonal Violence; Women, Battered.

Further Reading

National Network to End Domestic Violence. "Domestic Violence Counts 2012: A 24-Hour Census of Domestic Violence Shelters and Services." http://www.nnedv.org/downloads/Census/DVCounts2012/DVCounts12_NatlReport_Color.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Sokoloff, Natalie and Ida Dupont. "Domestic Violence at the Intersections of Race, Class and Gender: Challenges and Contributions to Understanding Violence Against Marginalized Women in Diverse Communities." Violence Against Women, 11/1 (2005).

Sullivan, Cris. "Advocacy Services for Women with Abusive Partners: A Review of the Empirical Evidence." Harrisburg, PA: National Resource Center on Domestic Violence, 2012. http://www.dvevidenceproject.org/wp-content/themes/DVEProject/files/research/DVAdvocacyResearchSummary10-2102.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Dominican Americans

The Hispanic population in the United States is expected to continue to expand and become the largest identified minority group. Dominican Americans are typically defined as individuals born in the Dominican Republic or of Dominican descent living in the United States. Currently, it is estimated that 1.5 million Dominicans live in the United States. They are the fourth-largest Hispanic group, although projections foresee continued and exponential growth over the next decades. There is a need to understand Hispanics as a cultural group; however, there is increased need to further comprehend the cultural differences that define Hispanic subgroups in order to provide adequate health care.

Records of immigration from the Dominican Republic date back to 1930, and a massive exodus of Dominicans arrived in the United States during the 1960s after years of political instability and economic downfall. The U.S. military occupation of the Dominican Republic in 1965 ensued after democratic elections and a military coup d'etat triggered street revolts, further deteriorating social, political, and economic stability. However, the greatest influx of migration from the Dominican Republic to the United States occurred after 1990.

Demographic Factors

General demographic factors make Dominican Americans similar to the rest of Hispanic Americans, but some aspects are idiosyncratic to this population. Understanding both aspects, especially the latter, allows for a more accurate appraisal of the cultural uniqueness of this group and facilitates identification of needs for appropriate care.

Initially, a major concentration of Dominican Americans resided in New York. Over many years, Dominicans have moved all across the United States, but with higher concentrations in cities in the northeast. The three states with the largest populations of Dominican Americans are New York, New Jersey, and Florida. Their native language is Spanish, and the majority have Roman Catholic religious affiliation. Most Dominican Americans self-identify as mixed race, with European, African, and/or Tainos Indian ancestry. Two-thirds of Dominican Americans are foreign born; thus, they experience different levels of acculturation. More than half speak fluent English.

The educational attainment of Dominican Americans is higher than comparable groups of Hispanics living in the United States; at least one-third have some college education or an associate's degree.

Many Dominicans obtained legal status through the Family Reunification Act, but a percentage remain undocumented. Most Dominicans share a commitment to send periodic remittances back to family in the Dominican Republic and express a desire to remain in contact with the native land. Some also foresee saving money and returning to live in their country of origin.

Cultural Aspects Relevant for Health Care

Traditionally, Dominican Americans have shown respect toward the medical community, but may have reservations about mental health utilization due to stigma and lack of access to culturally sensitive and informed care. Many Dominicans defer to family, friends, and community stakeholders (e.g., priests) for mental health and emotional support. The extended family also plays an important role in the lives of Dominican Americans, providing instrumental support, financial safety nets, and emotional guidance. When professionals from the medical and psychiatric communities interface with Dominicans, it is relevant to inquire about their definition of who is considered their extended family, as some friends may be closer than biological family and sources of support may include godparents, priests, and community stakeholders.

The Dominican culture promotes familismo, which refers to developing strong family ties, as well as respeto (respect) toward spouses, parents, and the elderly. When followed for physical or mental health care, it is often important to make provision to include the extended family in important decision making and for passive consent, which may be instrumental in the follow-up, management, and compliance with medical directives.

Strong variations and intracultural differences exist among social classes. Dominican Americans from a higher socioeconomic status in the native country may have had access to U.S. culture through education, music, travel, and technology, and many may have spoken English before migrating due to access to multiple entry visas. In contrast, Dominicans from a lower economic stratus and/or from rural areas in the native land may have had more limited access to education, technology, and U.S. acculturation, and potentially fewer opportunities to gain lawful entry into the United States. There is great variability in exposure and acclimation to U.S. culture as a function of sociodemographic factors among Dominicans, and there is often a need for inquiry to replace assumption in the development of estimates of opinions, perspectives, and experience within health care.

Although the majority of the population from the Dominican Republic is of mixed race, patterns of intracultural differences still exist—the majority of the population of a higher economic level is of European descent, and the majority of the population of a lower economic level is of African ancestry. These intracultural patterns are intricately intertwined with geographic region and a range of other sociodemographic factors that make conclusive statements difficult. Covert and overt racism continues to influence Dominican society and needs to be considered as an important influence for Dominican Americans.

The different levels of acculturation of Dominican Americans may be more obvious when treating families. Foreign-born parents may be more likely to believe that their younger family members are suffering with anxiety, depression, or other psychiatric disorders because they are deemed to be oppositional to parental norms rather than that they are simply responding to the values and expectations of the host culture. Clinicians who are familiar with these patterns can often address the expectations of worried parents and normalize the experience for younger members of the family structure.

In summary, Dominican Americans living in the United States represent a wide spectrum of demographic, socioeconomic, and background experiences. Awareness of such cultural diversity will facilitate appropriate health care.

Miriam Helen Feliu
Christopher Levon Edwards
Duke University Medical Center

See Also: Central American Immigrants; Hispanic Immigrants; Undocumented Immigrants.

Further Readings

Hernandez, R. and E. Rivera-Batiz. Dominicans in the United States: A Socioeconomic Profile. Dominican Research Monographs. New York: CUNY Dominican Studies Institute, 2003.

Paniagua, F. A. Assessing and Treating Culturally Diverse Clients: A Practical Guide, 3rd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2005.

Pew Hispanic Center. "Hispanics of Dominican Origin in the United States," 2010. http://www.pewhispanic.org (Accessed June 27, 2012).

DREAM Act, The

The Development, Relief and Education for Alien Minors Act, popularly known as the DREAM Act, was first introduced in Congress in 1995 and was modernized in 2001. Building on the Deferred Action Childhood Arrivals Program of the Obama administration, the 21st century DREAM Act was intended to open up educational and citizenship opportunities for a group that ranges in number from 800,000 to 2 million. Individuals within that group arrived in the United States as the children of illegal immigrants with no control over their destination. Yet, they constantly face the threat of being deported to countries of which many have no memories. Known as Dreamers, those who qualify for the program could enter an expedited path to citizenship by pursuing degrees in higher education or by serving in the U.S. military. Various versions of the DREAM Act have included such stipulations as requiring the individual to have graduated from an American high school and having lived in the United States continuously for a specified period. Even though the bill has received bipartisan support, most detractors are Republicans who have managed to prevent passage of the DREAM Act for more than a decade. Opponents of the DREAM Act generally oppose passage because they consider that it amounts to amnesty for individuals who entered the United States illegally as children, because it presents obstacles to enforcing other immigration laws, and because it fails to adequately address border security issues. The fact that immigration reform continues to be a contentious and divisive issue has contributed to the difficulties surrounding passage of the DREAM Act. It has been suggested that President

DREAM Act protesters appear for President Barack Obama's visit to Austin, Texas. The Development, Relief and Education for Alien Minors Act, popularly known as the DREAM Act, was first introduced in Congress in 1995 and was modernized in 2001. One study estimated that if Dreamers were allowed to become citizens via the DREAM Act, they could potentially generate from $1.4 to $3.7 trillion in taxable income over a four-decade period.

Barack Obama has managed to bypass congressional action by exercising his right of prosecutorial discretion, which has allowed his administration to refuse to enforce the deportation of Dreamers.

In 2013, existing immigration laws stipulated that minors could obtain permanent citizenship status only if their parents become citizens. An estimated 11.5 million undocumented aliens were living in the United States at the time. Children who entered the United States illegally with their parents had the right to obtain a free public education. Beyond secondary school, however, states retained the right to refuse admittance to state schools to undocumented aliens, regardless of the age at which those aliens entered the United States. Also, because Dreamers have no documentation, they may be denied the right to obtain drivers' licenses. Since they may be unable to obtain Social Security cards, they may also run into major obstacles when looking for employment. Dreamers have found their voices as they lobby, protest, and fight for their rights to become U.S. citizens.

Congressional Action

In 1995, Senator Dick Durbin (D-IL) brought the issue of the rights of illegal immigrants who had come to the United States as children to public attention by introducing the DREAM Act for the first time. At the same time, Lincoln Diaz Balart (D-FL) introduced the bill in the House of Representatives. The purpose of these bills was to pave the way for permanent residency for Dreamers and prevent their being deported as a result of the Illegal Immigrant Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act (IIRIRA) of 1996. In 2001, the modern version of the DREAM Act (S. 1291) was introduced in Congress for the first time. Subsequent versions of the bill have repeatedly made their way through congressional channels, only to be ultimately defeated.

In 2006 and 2007, the DREAM Act was introduced as part of the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act. With bipartisan support under the leadership of Senators Ted Kennedy (D-MA) and Arlen Specter (R-PA), the bill won significant support. However, invoking cloture and ending debate failed to win sufficient votes. Thus, its opponents managed to prevent its passage. The 2009 version of the DREAM Act was one of the more liberal versions to be introduced in Congress. It would have allowed Dreamers to obtain permanent residency over a six-year period if they earned a two-year college degree or if they served in the U.S. military for at least two years. Any individual who failed to complete these requirements became subject to deportation from the United States.

In 2010, the DREAM Act received its strongest support and came within five votes of passage before it was defeated by a vote of 55 to 41 in the Senate, falling short of the 60 votes needed for passage. The 2010 version had already passed the House by a vote of 216 to 198. The next year, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-NV), who has repeatedly demonstrated a strong commitment to helping Dreamers, Durbin and Robert Menendez (D-NJ) reintroduced the DREAM Act in the Senate. In the 2011 version, Dreamers could qualify for benefits if they were between the ages of 12 and 30 at the time the DREAM Act became law, had arrived in the United States before their 16th birthdays, were of good moral character, had lived in the United States continuously for five years before passage of the act, and had received either a high school diploma or a General Educational Development (GED) diploma while living in the United States.

Current Status

In a 2013 article for the Texas Law Review, Robert J. Delahunty and John C. Yoo argued that the Obama administration had found its own way to protect Dreamers from deportation despite the failure of Congress to pass the DREAM Act. In 2012, for instance, when the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) mandated the deportation of Dreamers, the president used prosecutorial discretion and ordered immigration officials not to enforce the law.

The 2013 version of the DREAM Act required that all applicants for benefits have arrived in the United States before the age of 16 and have lived in this country continuously for at least five years before the date that the bill became law. In June, the Republican-controlled House voted 224 to 201 along strict party lines to resume deporting Dreamers by adding the stipulation to a routine spending bill for the Department of Homeland Security. The action was a symbolic move that allowed Republican opponents of the bill to express their lack of support for the issue of immigration reform. A study conducted at the University of California, Los Angeles, estimates that if Dreamers were allowed to become citizens via the DREAM Act, they could potentially generate from $1.4 to $3.7 trillion in taxable income over a four-decade period. That potential is one of the strongest arguments in favor of the passage of the DREAM Act.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Children of Undocumented Aliens; Immigration Law, History of U.S.

Further Readings

Corrunker, Laura. "Coming Out of the Shadows: DREAM Act Activism in the Context of Global Anti-Deportation Activism." Indiana Journal of Global Legal Studies, v.19/1 (Winter 2012).

Delahunty, Robert J. and John C. Yoo. "Dream On: The Obama Administration's Nonenforcement of Immigration Laws, the Dream Act, and the Take Care Clause." Texas Law Review, v.91/4 (2013).

"DREAM Act 2013." http://www.dreamact2009.org (Accessed November 2013).

"Legislative Background on the DREAM Act." Congressional Digest, v.89/9 (2010).

Olivas, Michael. Plyler v. Doe and the Education of Undocumented Schoolchildren. New York: New York University Press, 2012.

Schwab, William A. Right to Dream: Immigration Reform and America's Future. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 2013.

Sternhauer, Jennifer. "Senate Democrats Reintroduce Dream Act." New York Times (May 11, 2011).

Drug and Alcohol Screening

The purpose of screening for drug and alcohol misuse is to identify the possibility of a problem, which warrants a more in-depth substance abuse evaluation. Hallmarks of effective screening are that it is short, diverse, and sensitive enough to capture most cases of misuse. By design, screening is meant to be overinclusive, detecting a person who may not have a problem with drugs and alcohol so as not to miss capturing anyone who actually does have a problem. Screening for drug and alcohol abuse is a vital function for those working in human service organizations, from hospitals to child protective agencies to elder care to criminal justice facilities.

Given the goal of screening to capture all those with drug and alcohol use problems, the process of screening must be sensitive to the unique presentation of these issues among various groups of people. For example, patterns of alcohol use among adolescent boys, where binge use at parties is more common, differs significantly from the use of alcohol by older women, whose symptoms mimic signs of aging and often complicate screening. As a result, screening for substance misuse among these two groups would need to be sufficiently sensitive to capture the unique drug and alcohol use problems within each group. Not only do the characteristics of age and gender impact substance misuse screening, but also numerous factors, such as race/ethnicity, sexual orientation, the presence of co-occurring mental health disorders, and varying abilities and/or disabilities, as well as socioeconomic status, impact the ability to effectively screen for drug and alcohol use issues.

Gender

Substance abuse screening tools have been found to be less effective in capturing a woman's substance misuse as compared to a man's. This results partly from the increased stigma experienced by women who misuse substances, which causes them to often underestimate or conceal their substance use. An additional concern is that women experience more significant health and social consequences, such as organ damage, cancer, and losing custody of children, from consuming less alcohol and other drugs than their male counterparts. Both of these factors contribute to making screening for substance misuse among women more challenging. Accommodations that can be made to reduce these challenges include allowing women to self-administer screening tools to reduce the effects of stigma. Also, reducing the threshold of screening tools for women may capture risky substance use earlier, which would result in earlier intervention for substance use disorders among women.

Alcohol screening tools that have been recommended for women's use are the CAGE, TWEAK, and AUDIT. Suggested scoring thresholds for women are one point for the CAGE, two points for the TWEAK, and four points for the AUDIT. The CAGE also has a modification, the CAGE-AID, to successfully capture drug use among women.

Furthermore, specific screening tools have been shown to be preferential for use with pregnant women, including the T-ACE, TWEAK, and the 5P's. Tailoring substance use screening to reflect the unique substance use patterns and experiences of women make achieving the goal of screening to capture all women misusing substances more likely.

Age

Most screening instruments are developed on adults and therefore do an adequate job in capturing substance misuse in populations in their 20s through midlife. Groups that have significantly different use patterns reflective of their developmental stage are adolescents and college students as well as older adults.

Adolescents and college students. Adolescence is a time of considerable risk for beginning substance use as well as the further development of a substance use disorder in adulthood. Researchers have found that of the adults who currently struggle with a substance use disorder, 90 percent began using substances prior to age 18, and 50 percent of them began using prior to age 15. Hence, the importance of delaying the onset of substance use as well as identifying and treating those who already have begun misusing is imperative. Addressing substance use among adolescents is centered on risk factors. Most instruments have a narrow focus on particular risk factors, and the National Institute on Drug Abuse developed the Problem-Oriented Screening Instrument for Teenagers (POSIT), which covers many of the identified risk factor domains.

In regard to college students, binge-style drinking has long been a concern. A specific tool has been created to detect heavy and risky drinking among students aged 18 to 25. The Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention of College Students (BASICS) was created to assist college students in making less destructive decisions regarding alcohol use.

*Older adult*s. Drug and alcohol use among older adults is often underidentified not only by human service workers but also by various professionals and family members alike. This oversight is due in part to the bias that older people don't have problems with substances. Screening for substance misuse in the aged is complicated because many of the signs of substance use problems mimic the common signs of aging, including memory loss, impaired balance and gait, neglect of hygiene, and sleep disruption. With the obvious parallel to the usual signs of aging, screening older adults for substance misuse requires further scrutiny. Furthermore, given the loss of lean muscle mass, which results in less water in the body, it is recommended that older adults drink less alcohol as they age. Thus, the quantity of alcohol cutoffs for screening tools must be reduced for older adults.

Race, Ethnicity, and Culture

Issues of consideration around race, ethnicity, and culture require human service workers to be mindful of several factors that may impact drug and alcohol screening. Paramount among them are issues of language, acculturation, bias, and norming of screening instruments. Although it is obvious that individuals should be screened for substance misuse in a language in which they are fluent, other concerns related to acculturation are less straightforward. For example, often related to the level of acculturation, individuals may be skeptical of the medical system in the United States, and given the stigma often associated with drug and alcohol use, people may find screening questions intrusive and threatening. This may more often be the case if the substance is illegal or if the person is undocumented in this country.

Another influencing factor is screener bias. Health services workers, like anyone else, have biases that stem from their experience in the world. These biases can impact effective screening. For example, a worker may be less likely to screen an Asian American than a Native American for substance misuse, given their knowledge of prevalence rates of alcohol and drug usage, thus resulting in underidentifying substance use among Asian Americans.

When using a screening tool, consideration needs to be paid to whether that tool was normed on the racial or ethnic group of the person a worker is screening. It can also be difficult to locate such information on translated screening tools. Furthermore, evaluation studies concerning screening instruments among various racial or ethnic groups suggest that the level of sensitivity of the screening tool varies not only by race or ethnicity, but by gender as well.

Socioeconomic Status

Health professionals have demonstrated certain expectations toward people of varying socioeconomic status, which have resulted in people perceived as upper class or with wealth not being screened for substance misuse as often as people perceived as poor. In no group is this demonstrated more clearly than in the case of pregnant women. Pregnant women who are perceived as middle or upper class, and who often visit private physicians, are less likely to be screened for substance misuse than pregnant women perceived to be of lower socioeconomic status, particularly if the woman receives her prenatal care in a clinic setting. Unfortunately, this results in women of means being less likely to receive substance abuse interventions, which have negative consequences for their babies.

Sexual Orientation

The Institute of Medicine has found that lesbian and bisexual women are at greater risk of developing a substance use disorder than heterosexual women, making screening among sexual minority women all the more important. Although few screening instruments have been validated on lesbian and bisexual women, the CAGE has demonstrated comparable reliability and validity among heterosexual, homosexual, and bisexual women.

Co-Occurring Substance Abuse and Mental Health Disorders

Given the high prevalence rates of people who have both mental health and substance use disorders, it is imperative that human service workers are knowledgeable in screening for co-occurring disorders. Not only is it more common for individuals with co-occurring disorders to seek treatment than those with only one disorder, but also having two disorders complicates the screening, treatment, and recovery of each disorder. When screening for both substance use and mental health disorders, the goal of screening is twofold: to capture the possibility of substance misuse as well as the possibility of any array of mental health disorders, such as anxiety, depression, post-traumatic stress disorder, bipolar disorder, and schizophrenia. Also noteworthy is that as the severity of the mental health disorder worsens, the likelihood of an accompanied substance use disorder increases. In essence, the only question that a screener needs to answer is whether this person possibly has both substance use and mental health disorders. If that possibility exists, then further evaluation and assessment are warranted.

An instrument commonly used to screen for mental health disorders is the Mental Health Screening Form-III. Although this form has demonstrated limited validation, professionals have found that it more than adequately serves the purpose of capturing the possibility of mental health disorders. In addition, a screening instrument commonly used to capture substance misuse among individuals suspected of having co-occurring disorders is the Simple Screening Instrument for Substance Abuse (SSI-SA). The SSI-SA has been found to be sufficiently sensitive and reliable in capturing substance misuse in co-occurring populations, particularly those at high risk of dual disorders, such as prison inmates. Furthermore, both the Mental Health Screening Form-III and the SSI-SA have been recommended to capture co-occurring disorders among homeless adults, a group with exceptionally high rates of co-occurring disorders.

Developmental Disabilities

Advocates purport that the incidence of substance use problems is increasing among individuals with developmental disabilities such as mental retardation, cerebral palsy, and autism. People with developmental disabilities have been found to use substances not only to deal with uncomfortable feelings, but also as a normalizing activity in an effort to be like everyone else. Given the significant variation in functioning levels among individuals with developmental disabilities, human service workers must have a clear sense of the individual's ability to cognitively understand and accurately respond to screening questions, resulting in providing varying degrees of assistance to individuals during the screening process. A few drug and alcohol screening instruments are recommended for use with individuals with developmental disabilities, including the Alcohol Use Disorders Identification Test (AUDIT), the Drug Abuse Screening Test (DAST), and the Alcohol, Smoking and Substance Involvement Test (ASSIST).

Stephanie Elias Sarabia
Ramapo College of New Jersey

See Also: Alcohol Consumption, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration; Substance Abuse Treatment for Children and Adolescents.

Further Readings

Center for Substance Abuse Treatment. Substance Abuse Treatment: Addressing the Specific Needs of Women. Treatment Improvement Protocol (TIP) Series 51. HHS Publication No. (SMA)09-4426. Rockville, MD: Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, 2009.

Frank, D., A. F. DeBenedetti, R. J. Volk, E. C. Williams, D. R. Kiviahan, and K. A. Bradley. "Effectiveness of the AUDIT-C as a Screening Test for Alcohol Misuse in the Three Race/Ethnic Groups." Journal of General Internal Medicine, v.23 (2008).

Miller, W. R., A. A. Forcehimes, and A. Zweben. Treating Addiction: A Guide for Professionals. New York: Guilford Press, 2011.

Sprong, M. E. "Screening for Alcohol and Drug Use Among Persons With Disabilities." Research Papers, Paper 151. http://opensiuc.lib.siu.edu/gs_rp/151 (Accessed November 2013).

Dual Income, No Kids

Dual (or Double) Income, No Kids, commonly referred to as DINK, describes couples who both work and have not yet had children. They are therefore able to afford a lifestyle without some of the responsibilities that come with having children. These couples also are credited with fueling retail business because they have a comparatively higher income to spend on consumer goods, although this may not be the case depending on the income level of the couple.

The DINK status is not necessarily permanent; couples who later have children may move from being labeled DINK to DIWK (Double Income With Kids). Miriam N. Kotzin points out that the term DINK as it is traditionally constructed is related to age and place in the life cycle of a couple. Contemporary usage of the term DINK applies to a couple only during the decades when they otherwise might be financially responsible for children. DINK refers to both gay and straight couples, but is not commonly used in connection with older, preretirement couples who are at the age that any children would be presumed to have become independent, or even, generally, to describe very young couples just starting their lives together.

DINK populations are believed to be increasing in overall percentage globally due to the rapid urbanization in the world coupled with such factors as increasing outside home employment opportunities for women, as well as the challenges and opportunities of modern life and the choices and independence it provides. This increased percentage of DINK couples is seen especially in the developed countries as well as big cities in the middle-income and developing countries. It is important to understand this growing demographic group and some of the factors and perceptions regarding them. This article provides a summary of some of the reasons why couples choose to stay without children, perceptions of such couples by others, and some of the wider issues with DINK couples.

Why Do Couples Choose Not to Have Children?

The following reasons can explain the desire to remain without a child:

- Work pressures. Many working couples are concerned that their busy working lives will not allow the support that a child would need. They may also worry that the attention a child would require and the various responsibilities that come with parenthood will lead to a loss of professional attention and focus and will affect career progression. Therefore, couples avoid or delay having a child until they achieve the level of career growth to which they aspire or until they feel confident to juggle the responsibilities of both work and parenting successfully.
- The cost factor. Having and supporting a child in some cities (or countries) can be expensive. Couples many times are conscious of the fact that their income (even though both are earning) may not be enough to adequately cover the expense of raising a family without affecting the lifestyle they want to maintain.
- Desire to spend time with each other. Many couples believe having a child will take away the attention that each of them bestows on the other.
- Uncertainty with partner. It is widely believed that having a child (biological or adopted) bestows a higher permanency on the need for the couple to stay together or presents more challenges in the case of separation (e.g., the cost of divorce and alimony support). In situations where either or both of the partners are not sure about the other (whether they make a compatible couple for long term), the plan of having a child is postponed until they develop the trust necessary between them.

- Biological factors. DINK status may also include couples who are unable to have their own child because of biological reasons such as infertility. Adoption is an option, although it may not be their preference and they may choose to remain childless.

The Social Consequences of Being a DINK Couple

Whatever the reasons, DINK couples may be envied or ostracized, depending on the perceptions of friends, family members, and society in general. In many societies, having children, especially within a marriage, is seen as a responsibility. Couples who do not have a child after a long marriage (the length of time being a variable depending on the social values and acceptable practices) are seen as careless, selfish, and interested only in their own well-being and pleasures. They may also be perceived as free riders, not contributing to society as those couples with children do (i.e., by supporting the economic and social support infrastructure, such as schools and various jobs that come with child care). Seen from this perspective, the term DINK can be perceived as derogatory or hurtful for the couple. Some common questions and remarks from families, friends, and colleagues are: "When are you planning on having a baby?" "If everything is fine between you, why are you not having a child?" or "You know you are not getting any younger [especially to women]." DINK couples are also constantly subjected to descriptions of how happy friends and family members who have kids are. Such close scrutiny of their lives and questioning may lead DINK couples to avoid social events or to bond with other DINK couples.

Conversely, these couples may be seen by many as having made the right decision (especially by others who have one or more children and are feeling pressured with the responsibility). These couples are seen as pursuing career growth, retaining options for mobility, and having more freedom and independence. That is, DINK couples can easily take new jobs in different locations or take the risk of switching careers if need be without worrying about children and their needs, such as schools and other support systems.

In many countries (e.g., Singapore, Russia, Germany), falling birth rates are sometimes attributed to increasingly more couples remaining without children. In Japan, these couples are called NOKS (No Kids Couples), and various types of incentives and financial support are presented to motivate them to have children. Research from Israel by Alma Cohen indicates that financial incentives have had "a significant positive effect on fertility, with the mean level of child subsidies producing a 7.8 percent increase in fertility."

The choice to be a DINK couple rests with individual preferences and what works for them. It is therefore not fair to term it as right or wrong or to use a social or moral compass to judge them.

Prafulla Kumar Mishra
Norwegian Refugee Council

See Also: Families, Nontraditional; Same-Sex Couples/Marriage.

Further Readings

Australian Institute of Family Studies. "Couples Without Children at Home." http://www.aifs.gov.au/institute/pubs/diversity/02couplesnochild.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Coeyman, Marjorie. "In Japan, Life Without Children Is Savored With Guilt." Christian Science Monitor (March 2002). http://www.csmonitor.com/2002/0327/p08s02-woap.html (Accessed September 2013).

Cohen, Alma, et al. "Do Financial Incentives Affect Fertility?" Working Paper 13700, National Bureau of Economic Research (December 2007). http://www.nber.org/papers/w13700.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Gross, Daniel. "Children for Sale—Would $36,000 Convince You to Have Another Kid?" http://www.slate.com/articles/business/moneybox/2006/05/children_for_sale.html (Accessed September 2013).

Kotzin, Miriam N. "A SINKing Feeling." Drexel University (2010). http://thesmartset.com/article/article01071002.aspx (Accessed September 2013).

E

Early Childhood Development

The literature of developmental psychology, sociology, neurobiology, cultural anthropology, social work, education, and related fields is replete with discussions of early childhood development. In an effort to avoid duplication of the readily available literature on early childhood development, this article focuses on some of the major themes and ideas inherent in early child development studies from an intersectional perspective. Intersectionality is grounded in a critical analysis of race, class, gender, and other aspects of social location through which power is constituted. This framework is utilized to increase understanding of the broad concept of early childhood development within the field of human services, with a goal of speaking directly to the issues of social determinants and power on a subject that is often held to be universal within its respective multidisciplinary contexts. Major areas of discussion include theories grounding the study of early childhood development, relational and ecosystems approaches to early childhood development theory and practice, and major areas of research and praxis, with a focus on multisystemic levels of intervention.

Early childhood development is a broad term within the human services professions. It refers to the individual processes of biopsychosocial maturation of children aged roughly 3 to 5 years, as well as the theories, literature, and interventions that drive practice, services, policy, and praxis for and about children in this age group. This article looks at the major areas of development, and discusses the theories and practices shaping current understandings of development.

Early Childhood Development in Mainstream U.S. Culture

The FrameWorks Institute, a nonprofit think tank dedicated to "changing the public conversation about social problems" through informed discourse, has identified early childhood development as a target area requiring an increasingly nuanced picture within mainstream U.S. culture. Literature from this project describes a typical understanding of the complex processes of early childhood development in the United States as a so-called black box. This discomfort leads to increased reductionist thinking, relying on what is familiar, observable, and tangible, rather than grappling with the complexity of the topic. Therefore, the default model of early childhood development in mainstream culture equates successful or healthy development with a self-reliant, autonomous individual, with physical safety, cognitive development, and socialization being the key determinants of a seemingly innate and mysterious process.

However, the vast literature on early childhood development makes it clear that the process of development is achieved in a relational context, inextricably dependent on the multiple, overlapping (and often invisible) environments in which development occurs. Fully understanding child development means also understanding an ecological or person-in-environment perspective in which individuals and their environment have active, multidirectional influences on each other. Individuals cannot be separated from the factors or influences of their immediate environments. This calls for a more precise understanding of the environmental and social contexts in which families raise children. A comprehensive understanding of early childhood development must incorporate an awareness of the dynamic interactions between individuals and their environments, particularly in defining and shaping risk and protective factors for individuals and their communities.

The Separate Self Model

Ideas that become part of a culture's dominant narrative are inherently shaped by that culture's institutions. In early childhood development, the disciplines of psychology and sociology in the United States are key players in the idealization of a separate, self-reliant individual as the desired outcome of traditional models of development.

Traditional models and theories of development (as advanced by Sigmund Freud, Margaret Mahler, Erik Erickson, and Jean Piaget, among others) conclude that self-reliance and autonomy are obtained through the mastery of a series of increasingly complex and "essential" crises, largely involving separation of oneself from others. Therefore, the individual is defined as someone whose primary identification is in his or her separation from or nonreliance on others. Within separate self models, development occurs within a vacuum, in which the relationships of the growing child to caregivers, community, and environmental context are de-emphasized, leading to an appearance of universal applicability.

Traditional models of development are the frameworks that create benchmarks for healthy or normative development in the early years. The following brief overview of three major developmental theorists who have historically emphasized a separate self model focuses on descriptions of development during ages 3 to 5 years:

- Freud (1856–1939). In Freud's three-stage psychosexual model of development, infants and children become self-actualized through increasing mastery over unconscious drives. The anal stage is the second stage of development, and occurs from ages 1 to 3 years. The goal of this stage is to increase control over one's bowel and bladder, frequently identified in the contemporary developmental goal of toilet training.
- Erikson (1902–94). In Erikson's eight-stage psychosocial framework of development, an individual resolves basic psychosocial conflicts along a continuum of positive and negative outcomes in each stage. Each stage also lays the ground for the stage above it. In early childhood, the psychosocial conflict is termed "autonomy versus shame and self-doubt," in which children are guided toward independence and individuation through exercise of free will. In this stage, Erikson notes that if children do not receive these critical opportunities in free choice, they will have a "lasting propensity for doubt and shame."
- Piaget (1896–1980). Piaget's four-stage developmental model focuses on a child's ability to make meaning of the world through physical and cognitive experiences. Motor skills, language, and abstract cognition are viewed as dependent, sequentially acquired phenomena that develop completely through the individual's isolated experience. Early childhood is described in the preoperational stage, in which children use symbols to represent and communicate about their environment. In this stage, language and imaginative play are developed.

Critiques of the Separate Self Model

The relational movement in feminist psychology, most notably the work of the Jean Baker Miller Training Institute and the Harvard Project on the Development of Women and Girls (spearheaded by Carol Gilligan), offers critiques of the universality of the separate self models. The work coming out of the Harvard Project is notable for its emphasis on the role of voice, authenticity, and power in the course of development, particularly the ways in which dominant power structures work to silence the voices and experiences of women and girls.

Gilligan was one of the first scholars to explicate the essential problems in separate self models of development—mainly, that the theories were developed based only on the experiences of (and research with) white men and boys, and that all diversity or difference in these models (and therefore experiences that may appear different) was identified by the models themselves as a deficit. This did not adequately capture experiences outside of a narrow range defined as normal, and immediately defined alternate expressions as deviant, leading to increased labeling and stigmatization along the lines of race, class, and gender. Gilligan and colleagues argued that defining a single group's experience as normative reinforced preexisting structures of social power and did not adequately capture the experiences of marginalized groups.

Gilligan's colleagues at the Jean Baker Miller Training Institute developed the relational cultural theory, which included revised models of development. Relational cultural theories of development are built on the essential premise that individuals grow in, through, and toward relationships throughout their life spans. The model notes that strength occurs in relationship, and development moves toward ever-increasing relational complexity rather than toward isolation. The goal of relational models of development emphasizes the self in relation to the world, positing that human beings are hardwired for relational connection and are inevitably shaped by their relationships to others and their environment. The concepts of relational cultural theory become particularly important in people's understanding of the importance of attachment for prosocial development and the complex web of environmental factors that form the most recent advances in early childhood development.

From Theory to Practice

Current practice in early childhood development revolves around understanding and enhancing the growth and maturation of children from ages 3 to 5 years, their families, and their communities. This area is identified as a critical period of growth for children, laying a foundation for intellectual, physical, and emotional well-being throughout their lifespans. Research and interventions focus on differences in developmental outcomes and ways of strengthening various levels of the environment to increase the likelihood of fostering ongoing growth for children and their communities. Areas for environmental interventions include (1) the microenvironment of the family, (2) the mezzoenvironment of the neighborhood or community, and (3) the macroenvironment of the wider society.

Scholar Judith Bernhardt traces the understanding of diversity in the field of early childhood development and identifies the following four phases from the discipline's formative years through the present: (1) diversity as deficit, (2) diversity as disadvantage, (3) diversity as noncore difference, and (4) diversity as fundamental heterogeneity. She notes that the stages are broad sweeping but have real impact in policy design (particularly in the definitions of need over time), implementation, and efficacy.

Major Domains in Early Childhood Development

Practitioners in early childhood development have identified the following domains as major, interconnected areas of development:

- Cognitive and neuro-development. The development of the architecture of a child's brain, leading to the capacity to make meaning of one's experiences, to engage in the world, and to regulate affect and behavior.
- Affective and social development. A child's capacity to identify, regulate, and express emotional responses, and then to utilize these experiences in relationships with family, peers, and institutions.
- Physical development. A child's internal and external biological maturation, leading to increased capacity to act in the world, locomotion, and the so-called hardwired circuitry developed in the child's body.
- Identity and relational development. A child's sense of self in the world, particularly as related to issues of social location, power, and ability to affect change in the world, achieved through relationships.

The concepts of attachment theory (a child's sense of security and stability in relationships) are included in this domain and have significant impact on affective regulation and social development.

Significant Trends in Policy and Praxis

Much of the literature and interventions in early childhood development focus on identifying differences in developmental outcomes in the four domains listed above and determining effective strategies for increasing the likelihood of optimal development. This is largely done through the identification of risk and protective factors, including stress and relationships.

Stress. The presence or absence of stress plays a significant role in the development of a child's neural circuitry, which lays the foundation for affect and behavior regulation, and later capacity to engage in educational opportunities. Children who are exposed to prolonged stress are shown to have decreased skills in executive functioning, caused by chronic activation of the flight-or-fright response in the face of pervasive stress. Children who are exposed to prolonged stress have increased difficulty with working memory, attention, and impulse control, leading to difficulties in responding accurately to actual or perceived stressors throughout their life spans. However, if children possess or develop the capacity to regulate stress effectively, they are able to manage adverse situations more effectively throughout their life spans.

The neurobiology of stress is compounded by overlapping factors of chronic poverty, exposure to racism and societal devaluation, and witnessing or surviving interpersonal and/or community violence. Thus, children in communities where there is more stress are significantly more likely than those in lower-stress communities to experience the adverse developmental effects associated with stress.

Current practice in early childhood development revolves around understanding and enhancing the growth and maturation of children from ages 3 to 5 years, their families, and their communities. This area is identified as a critical period of growth for children, laying a foundation for intellectual, physical, and emotional well-being throughout their life spans.

Relationships. The presence of caring, strong relationships with caregivers or caring adults significantly increases developmental outcomes, particularly the ability to regulate affect and behavior. Growth-fostering, mutually empathic relationships are the operative ingredient in secure attachment, increasing a child's sense of safety and mitigating the impact of stress in a child's life. When these relationships are compromised (e.g., through trauma, loss, or increased stress on the part of caregivers), children are less likely to internalize a sense of safety or expectation that their needs will be met. This sense of uncertainty can amplify the impact of stressors.

Intervention

Early childhood is the preferred time for interventions because it provides opportunities for change before patterns of neural activity and behavioral trajectories are firmly established.

The double and triple jeopardy of being a poor child of color exposed to trauma increases risk for individuals as well as communities. Thus, multiple levels of ongoing intervention are indicated. These include interventions specifically aimed at increasing individual and family capacities for managing stress simultaneously with policy and social justice interventions focused on eliminating the root causes of increased stress and adversity in disadvantaged communities. Best practices literature also stresses the efficacy of interventions developed with individual and community ownership and participation across all levels of the intervention process.

Conclusions

Early childhood development identifies major milestones and normative growth trajectories from the ages of 3 to 5 years in U.S. culture. These areas include physical development, cognitive development, and social development. Early childhood development is a broad field with implications for human services professionals in a number of fields, including education, childhood mental health, pediatrics, clinical case management, advocacy, and research across the social sciences. A comprehensive, multidisciplinary approach to this complex subject is critical to collaboration across disciplines, leading to more effective outcomes.

Christina Borel
University of Southern California
Graduate School of Social Work

See Also: Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Changing the Client Versus Changing the Environment; Childhood Trauma; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Head Start/Prekindergarten Programs; Poverty.

Further Readings

Aratani, Yumiko, Vanessa Wight, and Janice L. Cooper. "Racial Gaps in Early Childhood: Socio-Emotional Health, Developmental, and Educational Outcomes Among African-American Boys." (2011). http://www.nccp.org/publications/pdf/text_1014.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Bernhard, Judith K. "The Changing Field of Child Development: Cultural Diversity and the Professional Training of Early Childhood Educators." Canadian Journal of Education v.20/4 (1995).

Comstock, Dana. Diversity and Development: Critical Contexts That Shape Our Lives and Relationships. Stamford, CT: Thomson Brooks/Cole, 2005.

Davey, Lynn and Gil G. Noam, eds. Framing Youth Development for Public Support: New Directions for Youth Development. Number 124. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass Wiley, 2010.

Gilligan, Carol, Annie G. Rogers, and Deborah L. Tolman, eds. Women, Girls, and Psychotherapy: Reframing Resistence. New York: Haworth Press, 1991.

Jordan, Judith V., ed. Women's Growth in Connection: Writings from the Stone Center. New York: Guilford Press, 1991.

National Scientific Council on the Developing Child. Young Children Develop in an Environment of Relationships: Working Paper No. 1, 2004. http://www.developingchild.harvard.edu. (Accessed November 2013).

Shonkoff, Jack P. "Leveraging the Biology of Adversity to Address the Roots of Disparities in Health and Development." Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, v.109/Supp.2 (2012).

Snow C. and S. Van Hemel, eds. Early Childhood Assessment: Why, What, and How. Committee on Developmental Outcomes and Assessments for Young Children, National Research Council. Washington, DC: National Academies Press, 2008.

Walker, Susan, et al. Inequality in Early Childhood: Risk and Protective Factors for Early Child Development. The Lancet, v.378/9799 (2011). http://dx.doi.org/10.1016/S0140-6736(11)60555-2 (Accessed November 2013).

Early Childhood Literacy

While literacy has been a focus of primary school education for centuries, interest in identifying effective practices to promote literacy in the early childhood years is a fairly recent phenomenon. In addition, the scope of activities and competencies included within literacy has considerably broadened over the last 50 years or so. However, over the last two decades, a number of educational practices have been identified in both individual classrooms and entire schools that are associated with helping young children become literate.

The earliest focus on childhood literacy, in the first decades of the 20th century, was on determining when a child was ready to learn to read (several key theorists agreed that children were not ready to begin learning to read until the age of 6 or 7). These early approaches were heavily influenced by behaviorist psychology and used a narrow definition of literacy as decoding text. Following World War II, the scope of literacy research broadened to include social concerns (e.g., what is literacy for, and what do people do with it?) to understand literacy as including a number of complex processes, and to consider the importance of writing as well as reading in literacy.

By the 1970s, researchers realized that preschool children brought individual strategies to literacy based on printed language in their environment, and literacy was thus defined as a much broader set of behaviors than had previously been used. Many researchers also began looking at how home-based practice affected children's literacy, a substantial shift from studies of 50 or 60 years earlier that considered literacy as something taught to children in school. In 1986, George Wells published The Meaning Makers, which summarized many beliefs that still guide early childhood literacy programs. These include the fact that from a young age, children can take the initiative in literacy programs, that reading to children and engaging them in conversation about books is a key early literacy activity, and that literacy activities should be authentic and meaningful to the children taking part.

Kathy Hall reviews research into effective ways to improve student literacy while noting that this field of inquiry is fairly young, and that interest has shifted over the years from the teacher to the school as the unit of analysis. Multiple researchers noted in the 1990s that little research had been done to identify effective literacy teaching strategies, a gap remedied by a number of studies based on extensive observation of instructors in their classrooms.

The conclusion of this research was that effective literacy teachers balance and integrate learning the codes of written language (e.g., the correspondence between sound and symbol, word recognition, vocabulary, and grammar) with authentic uses of language (e.g., by having students write for authentic purposes and read and respond to a variety of literature). Excellent literacy teachers also use a variety of techniques in their classroom, including shared reading, partner reading, independent reading, lessons in the mechanics of writing, and free writing in journals, and teach students how to use a variety of cues for successful reading within ongoing reading and writing activities. Finally, they use techniques such as scaffolding and modeling, and create classrooms that are rich in print materials while being welcoming and homelike for students.

Many of these early literacy effectiveness studies were carried out with children in middle- and low-middle-income communities, with low-income children less well represented. In the early 2000s, several studies looked at literacy practices that were effective with lower-income children, looking primarily at schools in the inner cities, where students were achieving high degrees of literacy while schools with pupils from similar backgrounds were largely failing. These studies found that five characteristics separated the most effective schools from the less effective. First, effective schools made literacy a priority and devoted more time to literacy, including both reading and writing, than less effective schools. Second, effective schools emphasized small-group instruction and teacher-directed activities that allowed instruction to be customized for different levels of students, rather than primarily engaging in whole-group instruction. Third, teachers in effective schools involved parents and built on the cultural backgrounds of their students. Fourth, teachers in effective schools taught word recognition skills as strategies to immediately apply, and coached students in applying these recognition strategies in their daily reading practices. Fifth, in effective schools, teachers gave timely and effective feedback to students while understanding that the students were learners with personal interests and agendas.

Several other commonalities have been found in the most effective early childhood literacy teachers. Effective teachers are committed to helping their students make sense of authentic texts and to write for a variety of purposes. Second, effective teachers devote time to helping children understand the reasons for the different tasks that they are asked to perform, rather than simply teaching the technical aspects of literacy. Third, effective teachers believe that all of their students can become effective readers and writers, and expect them to do so.

Sarah E. Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University

See Also: Adult Literacy Programs; Educational Services; Educational Support Services; Multicultural Education.

Further Readings

Culatta, Barbara, Kendra Hall-Kenyon, and Sharon J. Black. Systematic and Engaging Early Literacy: Instruction and Early Intervention. San Diego, CA: Plural Publishing, 2013.

Larson, Joanne and Jackie Marsh, eds. The SAGE Handbook of Early Childhood Literacy. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2013.

Roskos, Kathy, Lisa A. Lenhart, and Brandi Noll. Early Literacy Materials Selector, ELMS: A Tool for Review of Early Literacy Program Materials. Thousand Oaks, CA: Corwin, 2012.

Shanahan, Timothy and Christopher J. Lonigan. Early Childhood Literacy: The National Early Literacy Panel and Beyond. Baltimore, MD: Paul H. Brookes Publishing, 2013.

Eating Disorders, Cultural Aspects of

Diagnosable eating disorders share in common the presence of a persistent pattern of dysfunctional eating or eating-related behavior that results in altered food consumption or weight management approaches and significantly impairs psychosocial functioning, psychoemotional adjustment, or physical health. Diagnosable eating disorders differ from everyday problems associated with eating, weight and weight management, or body image in that they are syndromes that cause clinically significant distress and/or impairment in functioning in social, occupational, or other important life roles or areas.

In many settings, human services professionals require competencies in identifying, assessing, and intervening or referring for intervention those consumers, clients, or patients who experience eating disorders. These competencies include understanding the gender-related and other cultural aspects of these mental health needs.

Clinical Aspects: Defining Four Major Eating Disorders

The American Psychiatric Association (APA) includes in Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (fifth ed.), known as DSM-5, at least four major eating disorders important to practitioners in the human services: (1) anorexia nervosa (anorexia), (2) bulimia nervosa (bulimia), (3) binge eating disorder, and (4) other specified eating disorders.

Anorexia. Individuals experiencing anorexia present three primary features:

- Persistent severe restrictions in their food intake.
- Intense fear of gaining weight or becoming fat, or severe weight management to avoid gaining weight (e.g., self-induced vomiting, misuse of laxatives).
- Disturbances in self-perceptions of weight or body shape.

Dieting and an intense focus on weight loss is common in U.S. populations. However, normally expected weight loss attempts differ from anorexia in that eating and weight management behaviors for anorexics lead to severe, significantly low weight, which falls below what is considered minimally normal according to health standards.

Bulimia. Individuals experiencing bulimia present three characteristic features:

- Recurrent episodes of binge eating.
- Recurrent inappropriate or unhealthy compensatory behavior to prevent weight gain.
- Self-evaluation that is overly influenced by weight, body size, or body shape.

Certainly, individuals without a diagnosable eating disorder might binge eat on occasion, may periodically use unhealthy weight loss strategies, and sometimes may overly associate self-esteem with body image. Diagnosis of bulimia, however, requires all of the following for a period of three months or longer: (1) at least weekly, recurrent episodes of binging during which the person feels genuinely out of control; (2) an entrenched pattern of at least weekly unhealthy compensations for binging through recurrent self-induced vomiting, misuse of dieting medications, or overexercise; and (3) self-evaluation that is significantly influenced by body image.

Binge eating disorder. Individuals experiencing binge eating disorder present recurrent episodes of binge eating for at least three months without the compensatory behaviors of bulimia. These episodes differ from normally expected occasional overeating in that these individuals (1) feel their eating is out of control during a binge; (2) eat too rapidly, become overly full, or binge when not hungry; and (3) feel a clinically significant level of self-disgust, embarrassment, or depressed mood.

Other specified eating disorders. Individuals experiencing other specified eating disorders present clinically significant distress or impairment in role functioning due to eating-related behaviors that do not meet the full criteria for any of the other disorders described above. This behavior might include, for example, (1) experiencing all of the features of anorexia except that extreme weight loss has not produced subnormal body weight; (2) presenting all of the behaviors of bulimia or binge eating disorder, but with lower frequencies of the relevant behaviors than required (for example, less than once a week) or for a shorter duration than required (for example, for less than three months); or (3) other combinations of problematic eating-related thoughts, affect, behavior, and physiology that cause clinically significant distress or impairment. Prior to the publication of DSM-5, these were referred to as eating disorders not otherwise specified (NOS).

Gender Aspects: Prevalence and Importance in Human Services Populations

Understanding the basics of these four major eating disorders is important. Human services professionals must recognize these concerns when they occur in their consumer or client populations. As Laura Choate and others have emphasized, professionals have been responding increasingly to gender-related counseling needs. Females greatly outnumber males with eating-related problems, and the population most likely to experience eating disorders is that of late adolescent girls and young adult women. In fact, internationally, eating disorders are among the 10 most common causes of psychological distress in young adult women. A. M. Schwitzer and colleagues report that on college campuses with large concentrations of female students, “the high incidence of eating disorders is especially well-documented.” But males certainly experience eating disorders as well; for instance, as many as 30 percent of adolescent boys report body dissatisfaction and unhealthy weight management. Binge eating disorder, in particular, seems less skewed by gender than the other disorders. The APA reports that in clinical populations, the ratio of females to males with eating disorders is 10 to 1.

Further, as Schwitzer and his colleagues discuss, by far the most commonly observed eating-related disorders among females are the heterogeneous group of moderate problems characterized as other specified eating disorders. Occurrences of anorexia, bulimia, and binge eating disorder are relatively low. The authors found that in community populations, the prevalence of anorexia was less than 1 percent, the prevalence of bulimia was about 1–1.5 percent, and the prevalence of binge eating disorder was 1.6 percent. By comparison, in a variety of studies with college populations, only 6 percent of females reported anorexia or bulimia concerns, whereas 25 to 40 percent reported moderate concerns falling under the category of other specified eating disorders. These include the symptoms of body image worries, weight management problems, and out-of-control eating. Professionals must understand that other specified eating disorders are very commonly associated with a constellation of additional problems, including moderate depression, moderate stress and anxiety symptoms, low self-esteem, interpersonal dependency, and problematic perfectionism, as well as' difficulties in seeking and maintaining professional helping relationships.

Family Aspects: Genetic and Behavioral Influences

Developing an eating disorder is multidetermined. Besides gender, family of origin has an impact. There is increased risk of developing an eating disorder among individuals with family members with eating disorders. The heightened risk likely combines some increased genetic or physiological vulnerability and predisposing family psychosocial factors. Anorexia and bulimia risks are higher for those with first-degree relatives with these disorders, according to the APA. Females with other specified eating disorders are likely to have a family member with an eating disorder, highly likely to have communication and relationship difficulties with parents, and highly likely to have enacted the so-called perfect role in their families. They may be emotionally dependent in their young adult relationships with parents.

Societal Aspects: Cultural Influence of the Thin Ideal

By far, the most widely recognized societal-level cultural influence on the development of eating disorders is the so-called thin ideal. This ideal refers to the importance of extreme thinness and physical attractiveness for girls and women. The ideal is communicated directly and indirectly via interpersonal relationships, group dynamics, and media portrayals, among other societal-level messages.

Most authors agree that essentially all females in the United States and elsewhere where the thin ideal predominates are pressured to some extent to achieve these standards. Although many are able to resist these cultural pressures, about half of all young adult women develop some combination of negative cognitions and negative affective symptoms associated with body image dissatisfaction. As C. Rhodes cites, illustrations of these faulty cognitions triggered by cultural-level thin idea pressures include: "Thin equals control equals power!" "Sex equals power" "The mirror is my enemy" and "I need to look young to attract a mate." Consequently, women with body image dissatisfaction often engage in maladaptive eating practices and excessive dieting. In turn, a portion of women who experience these initial characteristics stemming from the thin ideal then go on to develop diagnosable eating disorders. This chain of effects is especially salient for practitioners—because the thin ideal is such a critical aspect of eating disorder formation, prevention and treatment almost always includes some psychoeducational and cognitive-behavioral or schema-based components aimed at reducing the impact of the cognitive distortions it produces.

Sociocultural Aspects: African American, Asian American, and Latina Women

Historically, eating disorders primarily have been associated with European American females. In the past, researchers such as R. M. Talleyrand consistently reported low prevalence rates of eating disorders among women of color; these findings were explained by these populations being seen as "less likely to be exposed to key risk factors such as a thin ideal or societal pressures to be thin." Today, however, eating-related concerns are recognized among various racial, cultural, and ethnic groups and populations. Documented eating disorder prevalence rates among girls and women of color appear similar to those for European Americans. In part, because recent eating disorder research more appropriately includes individuals of color, more accurate knowledge of this population is available.

Additionally, as Talleyrand points out, newer research suggests that the increased presence of culturally diverse celebrities and media personalities may be yielding greater body image and eating problems among girls and women of color. At least three populations deserve special attention regarding eating disorders from the human services professionals who work with them: African American, Asian American, and Latina women.

African American women often are seen as having some resilience to the major eating disorders because they are less culturally susceptible to the thin ideal. Research by Talleyrand suggests that African American women often are “less likely to have concerns about their size and body shape, less likely to view themselves as overweight, and less reliant on dieting behaviors allegedly due to African American cultural norms that support heavier body ideals,” so body satisfaction levels may be higher for African American females. At the same time, prevalence rates for eating disorder symptoms still appear high; most notably the presence of binge eating disorder symptoms is of special concern, as are high prevalence rates of excess weight and obesity.

Asian American women are underrepresented in the eating disorder literature. This may reflect bias—this population might be overlooked, according to Talleyrand, due to the “stereotypical belief that Asian Americans’ . . . smaller body sizes protect them from experiencing body dissatisfaction.” Further, there may be methodological problems with much of the research. More recent studies suggest overall rates of eating disorder symptoms in Asian American women are about the same as with other ethnicities, and may be higher for binge eating symptoms. Further, it appears Asian American women may tend to adopt Eurocentric mainstream body image ideals and therefore have similar rates of body dissatisfaction. Asian American females also may have unique negative self-attributions connected to facial features and specific body parts.

Latina females also are underrepresented in the eating disorder literature—here again, perhaps due to a biased perception that, according to Talleyrand, “Latina women are protected from being dissatisfied with their bodies because larger women are considered healthy and wealthy among Latina cultures.” A competing view is that Latina adherence to more traditional gender roles leads to an intensified focus on physical appearance and, in turn, greater susceptibility to body dissatisfaction and therefore to eating disorders. In fact, Neumark-Sztainer and colleagues report high rates of dieting and body dissatisfaction, so while this population conventionally has been seen as protected from internalizing the thin ideal, they still appear to experience eating and body image behaviors characteristic of the major eating disorders.

Alan M. Schwitzer
Old Dominion University

See Also: Help-Seeking Behavior, Cultural Differences in; Mental Health Services, Adult; Overweight and Obese Adults and Children.

Further Readings

American Psychiatric Association (APA). Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, 5th ed. Washington, DC: APA, 2013.

Choate, L. H. Eating Disorders and Obesity: A Counselor’s Guide to Prevention and Treatment. Alexandria, VA: American Counseling Association, 2013.

Choate, L. H. Girls’ and Women’s Wellness: Contemporary Counseling Issues and Interventions. Alexandria, VA: American Counseling Association, 2008.

Rhodes, C. Life Inside the “Thin” Cage: A Personal Look into the Hidden World of the Chronic Dieter. Colorado Springs, CO: Waterbrook Press, 2003.

Schwitzer, A. M., K. Bergholtz, T. Dore, and L. Salimi. “Diagnosing, Conceptualizing, and Treating Eating Disorders Not Otherwise Specified: A Comprehensive Practice Model.” Journal of Counseling & Development, v.90 (2012).

Talleyrand, R. M. “Disordered Eating in Women of Color: Some Counseling Considerations.” Journal of Counseling & Development, v.90 (2012).

Economic Support and Services

The U.S. government provides aid to its citizens through economic support and services in a variety of ways. Government spending on the poor is the primary example, with cash aid as economic support (e.g., Temporary Assistance to Needy Families, or TANF) and skilled assistance as services (e.g., casework). Public spending on social insurance programs also assists workers who meet expected challenges in the life cycle (e.g., Social Security) and larger economic cycles (e.g., unemployment insurance). In comparison to these more visible forms of economic support and services, government spending on tax deductions that mostly assist high-income individuals build wealth (e.g., the mortgage tax rate deduction) is rarely acknowledged as a form of government aid. The government provides economic support and services to people in all economic classes, but these differ in social acceptability and visibility. Knowledge of each is important for social workers to promote policies that pursue social and economic justice.

Public Aid

Pilgrims that settled land that would eventually become the United States transplanted a system of aid developed in England, most prominently the Poor Laws of the 1600s. The principles of this system were concerned with ensuring the maintenance of the social order based on the extraction of labor and acceptance of hierarchical relations in a feudal system. Whether recipients were deemed worthy of charity depended on perceptions of their ability to work to support themselves. Typically, the elderly and infirm were considered unable to work, and were thus worthy of outdoor relief. The able-bodied, on the other hand, were undeserving and were put to work in workhouses. The principle of least eligibility further dictated that the aid provided could not exceed the least amount that could be earned by the typical worker of the time so as not to create a disincentive to work. Public aid is meant to provide a minimal form of support, after all other resources such as family have been exhausted.

This system is still present today in the present-day assistance programs for TANF and General Aid (GA), a system of economic support and services that stigmatizes recipients through exhaustive questioning of their motives for applying for assistance. By focusing on individual characteristics related to deservingness, it does not promote questioning of the larger systemic reasons for poverty (e.g., high costs of housing relative to wages). The unintentional consequence of asset testing pushes families into spending down all resources to be eligible, and conversely, to discourage saving because doing so could jeopardize aid.

Social Insurance

The capitalist system is based on the idea of free exchange between the owner of labor (the worker) and the owner of accumulated wealth that can purchase labor (the capitalist). The communist critique of this libertarian ideal is that the exchange is inherently exploitative because the labor that is purchased serves to create more wealth for the capitalist. Between the two ideological extremes is the idea that the nature of the relations between the worker and employee can be regulated to bring economic gain and social good.

This system is the most widely used form of economic support and services. Far from the stigma tied to the receipt of public aid, social insurance is seen as an entitlement and reward for the years of work provided by those who are now elderly. Although there is strong public support for public insurance for the elderly, the mandatory spending on Social Security and Medicare is questioned by politicians by reframing it as a form of public aid that can no longer be supported by tax revenue. The system was not designed to adjust to demographic shifts like the aging of the large baby boomer population and advances in technology that have increased life spans. Yet, adjustments to the formula used for contributions could be considered an extension of the same fundamental principle of the government regulating economic exchange in order to serve the larger goal of providing economic support and services to those who need it most.

Support for Asset Building

The third system of government assistance provides supports for individuals to build wealth. While intimately intertwined with notions of the United States' exceptionalism, the system of federal supports that assist individuals to achieve the American dream is largely invisible. Social workers, trained to gravitate toward problems like poverty, typically stop paying attention when discussions of wealth-building activities arise. This is despite the fact that it takes wealth to truly escape the economic insecurity of poverty. However, asset building as a form of economic support and service is important for social workers to track because it is in the allocation of resources to stimulate wealth building that the economic disadvantage that results from institutional oppression can be seen most clearly.

Assets (also known as capital or wealth) such as homes and private pension plans possess economic value. Because they can be spent in times of crisis or used to generate additional income flows, measuring both assets and income presents a more accurate picture of the economic stability of a household. High-income individuals can acquire even higher consumer debt, which may quickly lead to financial ruin if their income flow is disrupted. Conversely, a low-income family may inherit a home with a mortgage that is fully paid off; such a family saves on housing costs, lowering their spending on the biggest single expenditure most families must pay, and has ownership of a very valuable commodity (e.g., they can borrow against the equity to start a small business or send children to college).

Promotion of wealth building has long been a part of federal policy, with examples ranging from the Homestead Act to favorable terms for home financing with the G.I. Bill, to the plethora of tax deductions for retirement savings, home acquisition, and other forms of wealth building.

How closely does the current arrangement of the asset-building system meet the goals of social or economic justice? A simple calculation suggests that the current direction of expenditures only compounds traditional inequities in access to mechanisms for wealth accrual. Nonwhite families were generally excluded from the Homestead Act and from home purchase through the G.I. Bill, which means that the massive wealth generated for lower-income families at that time was passed down through the generations along racial lines. For example, the Pew Center estimated in 2011 that Hispanic and African American families had 18 to 20 times less wealth after the economic crash than white families.

Analyses by the Center for Economic Development and Annie E. Casey Foundation show that currently more than half of the nearly $400 billion spent for asset building is captured by the families making the top 5 percent of earnings, while those with the lowest incomes receive nearly nothing. The key to both the invisibility and the inequity of the asset-building system is its mechanism for distribution of the funding. Only a small portion of the funding is specifically directed toward those with lower incomes, and the overwhelming majority ($35.2 billion of the $36.5 billion) of this spending is used on postsecondary education (e.g., Pell grants). As with public aid, this funding comes from the general revenue part of the federal budget, with allocations debated vigorously every year as Congress deliberates authorizing the president's proposed budget. The vast majority of the funding ($347.8 billion) is spent as tax exclusions and deductions. Although owed money uncollected is worth the same as money spent, this form of expenditure is not debated in annual budget appropriation talks because the money never appears in the pool of revenue collected in taxes. These funds are largely collected by individuals earning the highest incomes because only they itemize the deductions to their spending.

Conclusion

The economic support and services provided by the U.S. government to its population is considerably more complex than it seems when people debate the value of providing welfare to the poor. It ranges from (1) the highly contested system of public aid meant to provide the population with a minimum standard of living, to (2) the social engineering that enables entitlement programs that anticipate ebbs and stops in earning potential during cyclical economic downturns and parts in the life cycle of most workers, to (3) the largely invisible investments in the asset building of the population that mostly benefit the more wealthy minority. It turns out that they are focusing on just one ring of what turns out to be a three-ring circus.

Joanna K. Doran
California State University, Los Angeles

See Also: Education and Training Vouchers; Equal Pay Act of 1963; Fair Lending Practices; Financial Literacy Programs; Social Security, Services Funded by; Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in; Welfare Reform, Role of.

Further Readings

Gilbert, N. and P. Terrell. Dimensions of Social Welfare Policy, 8th ed. Boston: Pearson, 2012.
Howard, C. The Welfare State Nobody Knows: Debunking Myths About U.S. Social Policy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2008.
Trattner, W. I. From Poor Law to Welfare State: A History of Social Welfare in America, 6th ed. New York: Free Press, 1998.

Education and Training Vouchers

The U.S. education and training voucher (ETV) is the first federal program specifically created to address the postsecondary educational needs of current and former foster youth. The population of ETV-eligible youth (those who have been in foster care on or after their 14th birthday and those who have not been adopted before their 16th birthday) is considerable. According to the U.S. Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System (AFCARS), in September 2011, more than 26,000 young people aged out of foster care, 11 percent of the total foster care population. (Aging out means the youth is no longer in the foster care system and is solely responsible for his or her own well-being.) Despite the economic advantages of completing high school and obtaining a postsecondary education credential, foster care youth lag far behind the national trends. This is concerning because foster care youth with limited educational attainment are at very high risk for unemployment, homelessness, incarceration, and dependence on public assistance.

Foster Youth Needs

A significant gap exists between students who were in foster care and their peers who were not with regard to college readiness, enrollment, retention, and graduation. According to a study conducted by the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, at age 19, only 18 percent of foster care alumni versus 62 percent of their 19-year-old peers are pursuing a four-year degree. This study also suggests that even when foster youth do attend college, they are less likely than their nonfoster care counterparts to earn a degree. At age 25, less than 3 percent of foster care alumni compared to 24 percent of their counterparts completed a bachelor's degree or higher. Regarding pursuit of any type of postsecondary credential, only 26 percent of foster care alumni who enroll in college compared to 56 percent of their peers have earned a degree or certificate within six years of enrollment.

Not completing postsecondary education limits prospects for employment, which has significant implications on lifetime earning potential. According to a study conducted by MPR Associates, a nonprofit consulting agency for the U.S. Department of Education, persons 25 to 34 years of age who had at least a bachelor's degree earned, on average, 61 percent more than those with only a high school diploma or General Educational Development (GED).

Federal Policy

Over the past decade, federal policy makers have responded to the many educational challenges faced by young people aging out of foster care. In 2001, under Title II of the Promoting Safe and Stable Families Amendments (P.L. 107–133), Congress authorized educational and vocational training programs for older youth, leaving foster care under the John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program (CFCIP). CFCIP is a capped state entitlement program, with an initial appropriation in fiscal year 2003 of $182 million, of which $42 million is dedicated to funding ETVs. Since 2003, this appropriation has fluctuated between $44 million and $46 million. States receive an annual allocation based on their percentage of children and youth placed in foster care; they have two years to spend each year's allocation. States are required to provide 20 percent of their annual allocation through an in-kind or cash match. States can use their ETV funds to provide current and former foster youth with up to $5,000 per year for postsecondary training and education. These ETV funds can be used to defray the costs of tuition and fees, books and supplies, room and board, and miscellaneous personal expenses, including purchase of a personal computer, transportation, and child care.

Youth already participating in the program on their 21st birthday remain eligible until age 23, as long as they are making satisfactory progress toward completion of their postsecondary training program. Satisfactory progress has been defined by the federal government as the maintenance of at least a 2.0 grade point average (GPA) and no more than one incomplete or course withdrawal per semester. The most recent major federal child welfare legislation, the Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008, also contains provisions that promote educational stability, and expands eligibility for the ETV program to youth who exit foster care through adoption or relative guardianship when they are at least 16 years of age. It is estimated that around 150,000 youth nationally meet the criteria to receive ETV funds.

Conclusion

Although ETV legislation was enacted in 2001, it was not operative in most states until 2003–04, making it a relatively new federal initiative with little longitudinal research as to its effectiveness. There is need for increased investment on the part of the federal government, the states, and communities to effectively monitor the quality and quantity of services provided as well as the outcomes experienced by young people who have enrolled in the program.

Angelique G. Day
Wayne State University

See Also: Children in Foster Care; Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008; John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program.

Further Readings

The Chaffee Educational and Training Voucher Program: Six States' Experiences. Seattle, WA: National Foster Care Coalition and Casey Family Programs, 2007.

Davis, Ryan J. College Access, Financial Aid and College Success for Undergraduates From Foster Care. Washington, DC: National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, 2006. http://www.nasfaa.org/EntrancePDF.aspx?id=3893 (Accessed December 2013).

Day, Angelique, Amy Dworsky, Kieran Fogarty, and Amy Damashek. "An Examination of Retention and Graduation Among Foster Care Youth Enrolled in a Four-Year University." Children and Youth Services Review, v.33/11 (2011).

"The John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program." Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Heath and Human Services, Administration for Children, Youth and Families, Children's Bureau. http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/programs_fund/state_tribal/jh_chafee.htm (Accessed June 2013).

Wells, Melissa and Sharyn Zunz. "Challenges and Strengths Among Chafee Education and Training Voucher Eligible Youth: The Rural Service Providers' Perspective." Children and Youth Services Review, v.31/2 (2009).

Education for Diversity in Human Services

Education for diversity in human services encompasses three interrelated themes. The first is educating human services staff to deal with diverse populations. The second is ensuring that governmental and agency programs and policies do not foster or maintain discrimination and are sensitive to diverse cultural differences. The last requires increasing diversity among human services providers. Education appears to be the key to these three themes. As the makeup of the populations receiving human services changes, staff must appreciate and understand how to work with diverse groups, and organizations must comprise a diverse staff.

What Is Human Services?

According to the National Organization for Human Services (NOHS):

> The field of Human Services is broadly defined, uniquely approaching the objective of meeting human needs through an interdisciplinary knowledge base, focusing on prevention as well as remediation of problems, and maintaining a commitment to improving the overall quality of life of service populations. The Human Services profession is one which promotes improved service delivery systems by addressing not only the quality of direct services, but also by seeking to improve accessibility, accountability, and coordination among professionals and agencies in service delivery.

According to this definition, many professionals holding specialized degrees are human services professionals. In fact, most educational programs in human services include faculty with degrees in a diverse range of academic and professional disciplines.

Human services is a generic term that covers the broad range of services that are provided to people in modern society. Many human services workers are employed and supervised by professionals in social work, education, public health, mental health, and corrections as well as myriad other civil service settings. They are often part of an interdisciplinary team. Job responsibilities and titles vary, depending on the setting within which these professionals work and the client population served. The NOHS Web site (www.nationalhumanservices.org) lists 40 examples of occupational titles that human services workers may be known by in the fields of health care, social services, education, health, mental health, addiction treatment, criminal justice, and education.

The U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics indicates that human services workers serve diverse populations with a range of problems. The primary purpose of the human services worker is to assist individuals and communities to function as effectively as possible in the major areas of living. Clients may include children and families; the elderly; people with disabilities, addictions, medical problems, and mental illness; veterans; immigrants; those under court supervision, on probation, and on parole; and homeless individuals. Thus, human services workers may work with any individual, family, or group that has a problem and needs to access the formal service delivery system.

NOHS describes the generic knowledge and skills necessary for all human services professionals. Human services workers must understand the nature of human systems ranging from individuals to communities as well as the conditions that promote or limit functioning. They must have the ability to identify, implement, and evaluate interventions that promote growth and goal attainment. These interventions need to be congruent with the values of clients, organizations, and the human services profession. This last set of generic abilities becomes the basis for competency in working with diverse client populations and in both understanding and respecting differences.

History of Human Services

Prior to the 1960s civil rights movement and the War on Poverty, what is now known as human services was hosted within many different professions, including social work, mental health, medicine, education, rehabilitation, social services, and nursing. These professions required both undergraduate and graduate college degrees and specialized professional education. These professions have their own education accrediting bodies and codes of ethics to address standards of diversity in professional practice and education. Some paraprofessional staff participated in these settings and were often responsible for work that did not require professional training.

The War on Poverty led to the development of human services as a discipline based on a need for paraprofessional and community-based workers. The expansion of education, health, and social services programs was accompanied by demands for increasing numbers of qualified staff. Much of the new legislation supported local projects that employed community members in new fields and sometimes in fields traditionally reserved for credentialed professionals. Federally financed community action programs created new roles, tasks, and fields of employment for people regardless of their credentials.

Head Start and day-care programs required nonprofessional child care staff such as teacher aides and day-care providers. The Head Start program started in 1965 as an eight-week summer program for children from low-income communities who would be attending public school in the fall. As the program developed, so did the demand for child care workers, assistant teachers, and dietary staff. The number of home-based day-care programs also multiplied. Some women who were receiving Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) received training as day-care providers; their homes were certified as home day-care settings and they received supervision from social services agencies. These women were paid to watch the children of other AFDC recipients, who could then go to school and end their welfare dependence. Many of these day-care providers were also able to continue their education to earn certificates as teacher assistants, two-year college degrees as kindergarten and preschool teachers, and bachelor's degrees.

At the time of the War on Poverty, there was a separation of services program within governmental departments of social services, which separated the functions of services programs from the determination of eligibility for those programs. In the past, a social worker with a bachelor's or master's degree determined eligibility and also provided case management and other social services. With the advent of separation of services, a new level of worker was implemented. Such individuals were eligibility specialists who collected documents to determine whether an individual or family was qualified to receive benefits from these programs. In many cases, these positions required only high school degrees and offered job opportunities for good-paying civil service jobs with benefits and opportunities for job advancement and education.

These programs also created another level of paraprofessional staff that worked under the supervision of professionals. They became known by a variety of job titles, including case aides, nursing aides, and mental health aides, among others. These individuals might have received in-service training or earned certificates or degrees from community colleges and vocational training programs. Unlike clerks, they worked with clients to provide services, such as a recreation aide in a senior center or a mental health program; a nursing aide in a hospital, nursing home, or community setting; a dietary aide working with welfare clients to improve their food choices; or a case aide in a drug treatment program helping clients remain in contact with their children or helping them find housing with which to return to the community. Such workers required skills in working with people and negotiating various aspects of the service delivery system. These jobs often offered benefits and opportunities for continuing education.

President Lyndon B. Johnson signs the Medicare Bill at the Harry S. Truman Library in Independence, Missouri. The implementation of Medicare was a key part of the War on Poverty. The War on Poverty led to the development of human services as a discipline based on a need for paraprofessional and community-based workers.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 opened up access for minority populations to many governmental programs such as AFDC, food stamps, Medicare, and Medicaid as part of the War on Poverty. At the same time, unemployment in the United States was approximately 19 percent and many of the unemployed belonged to minority groups. The various War on Poverty job-training programs increased the opportunity for minority individuals to earn academic credentials, which provided them with opportunities for jobs in health care, government services, and education. Work incentive programs were specifically designed to help individuals on AFDC and welfare get training. The civil rights and welfare rights movements resulted in the inclusion of many who had been previously excluded from federal programs.

The Older Americans Act of 1965 created a number of programs to meet the needs of the aging population, which necessitated the need for staffing. Not only did this legislation provide funding for programs, it also provided "training of special personnel needed to carry out such programs and activities." Many community-based programs, including multipurpose senior centers and senior meals programs (e.g., Meals-on-Wheels), were funded to meet the mandate of this legislation, which offered additional job and training opportunities for individuals to work with seniors.

The Community Mental Health Centers Act of 1965 was designed to increase the services provided to mental health patients who needed support in returning to their communities. Paraprofessional staffing was needed to help supervise and support individuals who were released from in-patient psychiatric care to community settings. It was believed then that the use of psychotropic drugs would allow individuals to function within their communities. This did not happen, however, because adequate funding was never available to fully implement the needed numbers of community mental health settings, and the psychotropic medications either did not work for all mental illnesses, and/or once released from in-patient facilities many patients failed to take their medications. Homelessness and substance abuse became serious problems for the community-based mentally ill. The end of the Vietnam War increased the numbers of individuals needing care for mental illness and substance abuse. While the need increased, the funding for programs and staff decreased. Programs serving these populations currently continue to use many human services staff to provide outreach, intake functions, and case management services.

Education for Human Services

Educating this generic worker, who may work with different types of clients, with different types of problems, and in different types of settings, presented a challenge. Traditional education had focused on specializations within the professions, which had long used paraprofessional staff under supervision. Recognizing the need for this new professional, some colleges developed generic human services programs that used courses from other academic disciplines and added some specialty courses focused on human services. Others added courses or minor concentrations to already existing programs in psychology or sociology. Many were in two-year community colleges with a focus on career opportunities or transfer to four-year colleges. As was common in many professional programs, students were often required to do internships in community settings.

Funded by the War on Poverty legislation, various demonstration projects arose throughout the country. In 1964, Audrey Cohen had a new vision for education for human service workers. She developed the Women's Talent Corp as a demonstration project funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO). The goal was to train women who were interested in improving their communities. Program participants were placed in funded (paid) internships in community-based health clinics, day-care programs, housing projects, and legal services. In 1967, the Women's Talent Corp became the College for Human Services, which was later known as Audrey Cohen College and now is the Metropolitan College of New York (http://www.mcny.edu). The founder's name remains on the Audrey Cohen College for Human Services and Education, which offers a certificate in substance abuse counseling (CASAC), associate's and bachelor's degrees in human services and urban studies, and master's degrees in education. This college continues to serve an older, nontraditional, mostly minority student population.

To educate individuals in this new profession, Cohen and her colleagues also developed a new model of education that was designed to meet the needs of adult students, who would be working in a variety of settings with diverse clients. This model is known as Purpose-Centered Education®, which does not look like a traditional college education. The program of study has changed in the last 50 years, but many of the original elements remain the same. Currently, the program in human services remains transdisciplinary (not multidisciplinary) and incorporates knowledge from psychology, sociology, philosophy, political science, economics, education, law, history, anthropology, and social work. There are no disciplinary departments as found in traditional colleges, and students take a structured series of courses each semester. Each semester organizes all of the transdisciplinary courses around a purpose. Each purpose has five dimensions: values and ethics, self and others, systems, skills, and purpose (which incorporates field and constructive action). Therefore, students do not take, for example, Psychology 101, but rather have this course content throughout their self and others courses, which may also incorporate content from psychology, sociology, philosophy, anthropology, and philosophy.

Each semester the purpose seminar helps students integrate material from their coursework with professional performance in their field setting. Historically, field work was paid internships in community settings funded by federal programs, but now students use either their work settings or unpaid internships. Some internship settings are able to offer students stipends or, in some cases, jobs. Similar to traditional internships, students go to field settings and perform various tasks under supervision. The difference is that within their field settings, students are required to carry out constructive action projects that demonstrate integration of their learning in the purpose and their mastery of the abilities/skills necessary for professional practice. Students are asked to produce a document each semester that demonstrates their abilities to plan, implement, and assess their projects.

This purpose-centered approach, which links the classroom to the field, has been adopted in various forms by other colleges. The new Stella and Charles Guttman Community College of the City of New York college system (http://www.guttmen.cuny.edu/index.html) incorporates this approach into its human services program. Each semester's classroom learning is linked by a theme that is connected to field experiences. In addition to some specialized human services courses, the curriculum includes traditional departmental courses.

Diversity in Educational Programs

From their earliest start, many of the human services programs had diverse student bodies due to their focus on developing staffing to meet the needs of War on Poverty programs. Many of these new students had been on welfare themselves, were unemployed, and/or had been the beneficiaries of other public programs. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 opened educational opportunities to many who had been previously denied such options. Both the women's liberation and civil rights movements resulted in increasing numbers of women and African Americans attending college and training programs. Affirmative action legislation forced educational institutions to review their admission policies to redress past discrimination.

Over time, traditional college students entered the field of human services rather than the professional programs. In some cases, this was related to their idealism and interest in working to improve their communities; in other situations, they either did not wish to or could not meet the standards of professional or preprofessional programs. Human services careers offered students the option of working with people outside of the business sector and traditional accredited and credentialed service models.

Standards

Codes of ethics are one way that professions set standards of behavior for practitioners. While not law, such standards are often used by courts in making determinations of unethical behaviors or malpractice. An individual practitioner does not have to be a member of a professional organization for the courts to apply a code of ethics they consider to be the acceptable standard of care. Such professional codes are also linked to education programs, accreditation, licensure, and professional certifications. A review of the codes of ethics of the professions within the human services fields shows that they support inclusion and nondiscrimination standards. Some also suggest the importance of social justice to eliminate discriminatory actions and practices.

In 1996, the Council for Standards in Human Service Education (CSHSE) adopted Ethical Standards for Human Services Professionals. The preamble acknowledges that human services professionals have an appreciation of human beings in all of their diversity. Two specific standards relate to the role of human services in advocating for the rights of individuals who have been historically oppressed (Statement 16) and providing services without discrimination based on age, ethnicity, culture, race, disability, gender, religion, sexual orientation, or socioeconomic status (Statement 17). Statement 18 focuses on respecting cultures and beliefs. Human services professionals are expected to be aware of sociopolitical issues that differentially affect clients from diverse backgrounds (Statement 20) and to seek the training, experience, education, and supervision necessary to ensure their effectiveness in working with culturally diverse clients (Statement 21).

The Human Services-Board Certified Practitioner (HS-BCP) certification has been developed by the Center for Credentialing and Education (CCE), NOHS, and CSHSE. Compliance is voluntary and verifies educational requirements and practice knowledge for those with human services degrees. Individuals who wish to earn this credential have to comply with the HS-BCP Code of Ethics, which states that human service practitioners will:

> Refrain from unlawful discrimination in occupational activities, including but not limited to discrimination based on age, race, gender, ethnicity, sexual orientation, gender orientation, religion, national origin or disability. Occupational activities include relationships with employers, clients, and colleagues (Standard 4).

Accreditation of human services education programs is done through CSHSE, and is in the process to secure recognition by the Council for Higher Education Accreditation (CHEA). Human services programs, like other college programs, are currently accredited through their regional accrediting body, rather than the professional accrediting body.

Colleges that wish to become accredited by CSHSE must meet the established curricula standards. CSHSE has educational requirements for associate's, bachelor's, and master's degrees in human services. The standards contained in the CSHSE Member Handbook may be numbered differently for the three levels of education, but all three require the following:

> Emphasis on context and the role of diversity (including, but not limited to ethnicity, culture, gender, sexual orientation, learning styles, ability, and socioeconomic status) in determining and meeting human needs.

At both the associate's and bachelor's levels, students are required to appreciate the "worth and uniqueness of the individual including culture, ethnicity, race, class, gender, religion, ability, sexual orientation, and other expressions of diversity." All three levels of students are required to develop awareness of their own diversity and to develop practice competencies to work with culturally diverse client populations. Thus, it becomes necessary for all human services programs to include content on diversity in their educational programs and to develop practitioners who are culturally competent and dedicated to safeguard that program's function without discrimination in the delivery of services.

Conclusion

Since its inception, the development of education for human services professionals has focused on providing career pathways for individuals who are interested in working with people. The students themselves are often drawn from and represent the diverse populations they serve. Some may continue on to professional graduate programs in different fields, and others will work in agencies providing a range of services to varied clients. Beyond just the provision of services, human services workers must engage in social justice activities and empower marginalized groups to ensure the development of programs and services to meet the needs of a diverse and multicultural society.

Adele Weiner
Metropolitan College of New York

See Also: Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in; Social Work, Diversity Practice in; War on Poverty Programs.

Further Readings

Cohen, Audrey C. "Human Services." In The Modern American College, A. W. Chicering, ed. Washington, DC: Jossey-Bass, 1981.

Cohen, Audrey C. "The New Service Economy and Its Implications for the Future," Journal of State Government, v.59/40, 1986.

"Ethical Standards for Human Services Professionals." Council for Standards in Human Service Education, 1996. http://www.nationalhumanservices.org/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=43:ethics&catid=19:site-content&Itemid=90 (Accessed December 2013).

"Helping Those in Need: Human Service Workers." U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics. http://www.bls.gov/opub/ooq/2011/fall/art03.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

"History of Head Start." Administration of Children and Youth, Office of Head Start. http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/ohs/about/history-of-head-start (Accessed December 2013).

"HS-BCP Code of Ethics." Center for Credentialing and Education, 2009. http://www.cce-global.org/Downloads/Ethics/HS-BCPcodeofethics.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Lyons, Richard D. "How Release of Mental Patients Began." The New York Times (October 30, 1984).

http://www.nytimes.com/1984/10/30/science/how-release-of-mental-patients-began.html (Accessed December 2013).

"Member Handbook: Accreditation & Self-Study Guide." Council for Standards in Human Service Education, 2012. http://www.cshse.org/documents/MemberHandbookSelfStudyGuide.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Older Americans Act of 1965. http://en.wikisource.org/wiki/Older_Americans_Act_of_1965#TITLE_III_.E2.80.94_Grants_for_Community_Planning.2C_Services.2C_and_Training (Accessed December 2013).

"Social and Human Service Assistants." In Occupational Outlook Handbook. U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics. http://www.bls.gov/ooh/community-and-social-service/social-and-human-service-assistants.htm (Accessed December 2013).

"What is Human Services?" National Organization for Human Services. http://www.nationalhumanservices.org/what-is-human-services (Accessed December 2013).

Educational Services

Everything a school system does, including providing classroom instruction, can be considered an educational service. However, other educational services are offered outside the traditional classroom setting and/or for other than average students, including special education, education for gifted students, guidance counseling, and testing. Awareness and understanding of cultural diversity is key to providing optimal services for a wide range of clients.

Special Education

Special education is provided to students who have needs beyond those of the typical or average student in a school or district. Examples of students who may be placed in special education include those with an identified physical or mental disability (e.g., blindness or mental retardation), and those with emotional disturbances or behavior problems that make them unable to function in a traditional classroom. Although theoretically special education is meant to provide a student with the most appropriate educational services for their particular needs and capabilities, critics charge that special education programs are sometimes used as a "dumping ground" for children from low-income or racial and ethnic minority homes, and that children from racial majority, middle- or upper-income homes exhibiting similar behavior would not have been placed in special education. In addition, some see special education as operating as a "holding tank" for children deemed troublesome or low achieving, and this label becomes self-fulfilling because students in special education do not receive challenging academic instruction, are not held to high standards of achievement and behavior, and fall further and further behind their peers.

Although some types of special education (e.g., for the deaf) date back to the 18th century, special education within school systems became much more common after compulsory education became the norm (every U.S. state had some sort of compulsory education law by 1918). However, some children with disabilities remained excluded from ordinary school classrooms until the 1980s, when mainstreaming (placing children in the least restrictive educational environment) became popular. Today, students with disabilities are entitled to appropriate free public education that is provided by their school district, must be provided appropriate services and an individualized education program (IEP), and must be mainstreamed as much as possible (e.g., included in ordinary classrooms as feasible, possibly with some additional instruction specific to their needs outside the mainstream classrooms).

Gifted Students

Interest in identifying gifted and talented students dates back at least to the early 20th century, although sustained interest in providing specific educational programs appropriate for gifted and talented students is a more recent phenomenon. Gifted and talented students can be seen as the reverse of students in special education: Whereas for the latter, the standard educational program may be too challenging, for gifted and talented students, it may be too easy.

Interest in developing the abilities of gifted and talented students, particularly in mathematics and the sciences, was given a large boost by increased educational funding following the launch of the Sputnik satellite by the Soviet Union in 1957—nurturing gifted students became seen as one aspect of enabling America to stay competitive with the Soviet Union. Another boost was provided by the 1983 report A Nation at Risk, produced by the National Commission on Excellence in Education, which noted that American students were falling behind the students in many nations that were considered economic competitors of the United States.

School systems have adopted two different approaches to gifted students: acceleration, in which students progress through the regular school curriculum more quickly than average students, and enrichment, in which students are provided with extra educational experiences and challenges, but remain otherwise on track with other students of the same age. Although it is difficult to design studies to demonstrate the effectiveness of gifted and talented programs (finding an appropriate control group is a particular problem), there is evidence that they benefit students. However, gifted and talented programs are not universally available, and are more prone to cancellation in tough economic times because it is assumed that the students will do well enough without special help.

Gifted and talented programs are also controversial because some see them as elitist and contrary to the spirit of public schools, whereas others argue that the methods used to choose students for the programs are biased and based on economic status and/or racial and ethnic background, rather than merit. In addition, students can be coached for entrance testing to gifted and talented programs, and this type of coaching may be available to some students, but not to others. One often-cited example is that of the "examination schools" in New York City, public schools that admit students wholly on the basis of a competitive exam.

Asian students are disproportionately accepted to the top schools (e.g., 14 percent of students in the New York City school system are Asian, but over two-thirds of the students at the most competitive school, Stuyvesant High School, are Asian), whereas African American and Hispanic students are accepted at a rate far below their representation in the student body. Many attribute this discrepancy to the fact that many Asian students attend after-school coaching for the entrance test, paid for by their parents, whereas African American and Hispanic students do not have access to similar coaching.

Vocational Services

Vocational education refers to education aimed at producing skills needed for employment in a wide variety of fields, including agriculture, business, technology, trades, and health care. Vocational education may be seen as an outgrowth of the apprenticeship system used in the United States from the colonial days onward, and which is still in place in some professions. A wide variety of vocational services can be provided to students and community members, both within the framework of educational institutions (including K–12 schools, vocational schools, community colleges, colleges, and universities) and in the community (e.g., public libraries and employment offices). One distinctive aspect of vocational education is that classroom instruction and practice often includes practical skills (e.g., working on automobile engines) as well as less specific, book-based skills (e.g., learning algebra and geometry).

One controversy in vocational education is whether vocational education should be provided in consolidated high schools that also offer academic preparation for students intending to enroll in college, or whether vocational education should be provided in separate vocational schools. A related question is whether students should elect or be sorted into a vocational or academic track before they begin high school, or at some point during high school, or if they should be free to take both academic and vocational courses throughout their high school career. While the separate-track approach used to be common in the United States, and is still in use in some countries (often in conjunction with industry-sponsored apprenticeships), separate vocational education has been seen as a means to prevent some students (often those with lower socioeconomic backgrounds and/or from minority racial or ethnic groups) from entering higher education in the United States.

Although many agree that high school students who do not wish to attend college should still be educated to qualify for a career that will be satisfying to them as well as economically rewarding, the development of high-quality vocational classes and the creation of strong ties with the industries that could employ vocational graduates has lagged behind other developed countries. While a variety of factors have contributed to this situation, the historical perception of vocational education as "less than" academic education, or as a means to segregate students based on economic or demographic characteristics, plays a role in hindering the development of vocational education in the United States.

Guidance Counseling

Guidance counseling as an expected service of schools began developing in the United States in the late 19th century, in conjunction with several reforms including compulsory education, restrictions on child labor, and the development of vocational education. The development of assessment methods to determine aptitude was given a boost during World War I because the military needed to assign large numbers of young men to different jobs and to select those believed to have leadership capability. This led to the rapid development of guidance counseling in American high schools, with over 900 schools offering vocational guidance by 1918. The types of counseling expanded in the next two decades to include social, personal, and educational counseling, although some programs were cut back during the Great Depression.

Guidance counseling received another boost in 1958, with passage of the National Defense Education Act, which provided funding for guidance counseling and improved educational programs in many fields, including math, science, and foreign languages. Guidance counseling developed further as a professional field in the 1970s and 1980s, and currently all the states and Washington, D.C., require guidance counselors to have a graduate-level education, with most requiring at least a master's degree in counseling or a related field;

Deaf interpreters are an example of educational services that may be offered outside the traditional classroom setting and/or for other than average students, including special education, education for gifted students, guidance counseling, and testing. Awareness and understanding of cultural diversity is key to providing optimal services for a wide range of clients.

many also require a number of practicum hours in a school setting.

The types of services provided by guidance counselors vary according to the state, individual school system, and grade level of the school, but some commonalities exist. At the elementary school level, guidance counselors often provide individual and group counseling, do classroom presentations, act as liaisons between the school and the families of individual students, and develop behavior and educational plans for students who display negative behaviors or have special needs. At the middle school and high school level, counselors typically deal with an even wider variety of issues, including vocational and academic preparation as well as personal and social issues of individual students. Among the many issues that guidance counselors must confront at the middle school and high school level are academic failure and dropping out, gang membership, teen pregnancy and fatherhood, abusive homes, substance abuse, and bullying and school violence.

One area in which the workload of guidance counselors has substantially increased is counseling for college preparation and applications: As the process has become more complex and competitive, high school counselors are a key resource for students in terms of choosing what schools to apply to, preparing their applications, and making sure that they take the appropriate tests and meet all deadlines. This role is particularly important for students in large public schools, and for those from minority and low-socioeconomic status families, who are unlikely to have as much knowledge about how the applications process works as students from middle- and upper-income families. Highly qualified students from low-income backgrounds are less likely to apply to highly competitive universities when compared to students from richer families who may have lower qualifications, and high-quality guidance counseling can play a role in reversing this trend.

Testing Services

School systems may also be responsible for administering and interpreting various kinds of tests. This service may be handled by in-school guidance counselors or school psychologists, or it may be handled by specialized assessment psychologists who travel from school to school. Although intelligence testing is controversial because there is no agreed-upon definition of intelligence, and many common intelligence tests are culturally biased, intelligence testing as part of an overall evaluation intended to provide the best educational services to a student may be warranted in some cases. The first general test of intelligence was developed in France by Alfred Binet in the early 20th century, in part to help identify poor children with high intelligence who might otherwise be neglected by the school system. A number of other intelligence tests have since been developed, including the Stanford-Binet and the Wechsler Intelligence Scale for Children (and a corresponding Wechsler Scale for adults); these and many other intelligence tests produce results in terms of an intelligence quotient, or IQ score, which can be used to compare the results for a student with the national average for his or her age group.

Vocational interest and aptitude testing dates back to World War I, when Arthur Otis developed two tests that could be administered to large groups of recruits and used to screen and sort them into jobs: the Army Alpha A, for those who could read and write; and the Army Beta, for illiterates. The continuing influence of the military on vocational testing is seen today in the Armed Forces Vocational Aptitude Battery (ASVAB), a test intended to evaluate future success in a number of occupations, and that is taken by many high schools students, even if they do not intend a military career. Vocational interest tests such as the Myers-Briggs Type Indicator (MBTI) are also sometimes administered as part of high school guidance counseling. The MBTI, which is based in part on the theories of Carl Jung, sorts individuals on four personality dimensions (extraversion or introversion, sensing or intuition, and thinking or feeling, and judging or perceiving) and suggests careers according to how an individual is evaluated on those dimensions. As with intelligence testing, vocational aptitude and interest tests are controversial and should be used as part of a plan to help students explore their interest in and suitability for different careers, rather than the final word on any student's future career choice.

Scores on college admissions tests such as the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) and American College Test (ACT) are required as part of the application process for many colleges and universities, and many high schools offer test preparation services to help their students do their best on these exams. Test preparation may be offered by school personnel or by an outside agency contracted for that purpose, such as the Princeton Review. Although test preparation services are somewhat controversial, and their efficacy has been questioned, many students from middle- and upper-income families pay for private testing services, and thus schools sometimes offer them in order to put their students on an even footing with more privileged students.

Sarah E. Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University

See Also: Adult Education Programs and Services; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Educational Support Services; Multicultural Education; Special Education.

Further Readings

Amundson, Norman E., JoAnn Harris-Bowlsbey, and Spencer G. Niles. Essential Elements of Career Counseling: Processes and Techniques, 3rd ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson, 2014.
Dai, David Yun. The Nature and Nurture of Giftedness: A New Framework for Understanding Gifted Education. New York: Teachers College Press, 2010.
Stolz, Stefanie and Philippe Gonon, eds. Challenges and Reforms in Vocational Education. New York: P. Lang, 2012.
Tillman, Linda C., and James Joseph Scheurich. Handbook of Research on Educational Leadership for Equity and Diversity. New York: Routledge, 2013.
Zunker, Vernon C. Career Counseling: A Holistic Approach. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole/Cengage Learning, 2012.

Educational Status and Service Delivery

The U.S. education system is required to provide a free and appropriate formal education to over 54 million students, with at least 17 million additional students engaged in postsecondary education at colleges and universities. From early childhood through adulthood, students served by the U.S. education system range in ability, race/ethnicity, socioeconomic status, native language, religion, and school location (urban/suburban/rural), among other sociodemographic characteristics. In the context of this increasingly diverse population, meeting the educational needs of students in the United States is an exciting and challenging prospect. In an effort to support all students, and particularly students who have been traditionally underserved by or excluded from the education system, policy makers and educators have implemented a wide range of legislation, initiatives, and services.

Student Diversity in the U.S. Education System

In the United States, children can begin formal education in the public school system as early as 3 years of age, and continue education well into their adult years. A typical sequence of schooling includes early childhood education (e.g., preschool and kindergarten), elementary and secondary education (grades 1–12), postsecondary education (e.g., community college, undergraduate programs, and graduate programs), and adult/continuing education. Vocational/technical training programs span secondary and postsecondary education. In the United States, only elementary and secondary education are required by law. The age limit for compulsory attendance varies by state, and ranges from 16–18 years old.

The U.S. education system serves a diverse population. For example, recent estimates suggest that 40 percent of public elementary and secondary school students are racial/ethnic minorities. Historically, access to education in the United States was often limited and in some cases denied based on membership in a marginalized group. Today, the right to education is granted to everyone; however, large differences still exist in both the quality of education and the educational outcomes experienced by many groups.

For example, the most recent National Assessment of Educational Progress indicated large gaps in achievement by race and socioeconomic status. These differences in achievement are also reflected in the underperformance of many limited English proficiency (LEP) students, who are held to the same standards as native-English-speaking students, even though they often fail to receive the academic and language support necessary to achieve at the same levels.

Individuals with Disabilities Education Improvement Act

The U.S. education system is responsible for serving students with a range of learning needs, including over 6 million children with disabilities. The Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) is federal legislation that requires states to provide a free appropriate public education in the least restrictive environment for all children with special educational needs up to the age of 18 or 21. IDEA also requires early intervention services for infants and toddlers (ages 0–2). Determination of eligibility for specialized services involves a variety of evaluation procedures, such as interviews with teachers and parents, classroom observations, and the use of appropriate assessment tools. Additionally, cultural and contextual factors should be taken into consideration during evaluations to avoid mislabeling and/or overrepresentation of specific groups in special education programming. The use of multiple assessment methods is designed to safeguard against this, and other methods such as testing in the child's native language and testing by a bilingual service provider can further prevent misunderstanding children's needs.

Once a child is classified as having a disability, an individualized education program (IEP) is developed and continually reviewed. The IEP specifies an individualized plan to meet the child's specific learning needs. All services identified in the plan must be provided in the least restrictive environment, which often means that children should remain in the general education classroom with their peers as much as possible.

Response to Intervention

Response to Intervention (RtI) is a three-tiered approach that many states have adopted as a key component of identification for special education and related services. Specifically, the first tier of this approach is the promotion of high-quality, evidence-based instruction for all students. Progress monitoring is utilized to identify students who are in need of additional support beyond instruction provided in the general education classroom. These children are moved to the second tier, in which they receive evidence-based intervention and instruction, usually in small groups. Finally, intervention methods for children who are not responsive to universal or targeted small-group interventions receive intensive interventions in the third tier.

In RtI, students must progress through all levels before a referral for a special education evaluation can be made. As a result, RtI reduces the likelihood that children are mislabeled or inappropriately placed in special education services because of inadequate instruction in the general education classroom. Because this issue affects ethnic/minority and socioeconomically disadvantaged students most frequently, RtI is protective against sociodemographic disproportionality in special education. In recent years, a second form of RtI, which mirrors academic RtI, has been developed and implemented to address students' social emotional learning.

No Child Left Behind Act

The No Child Left Behind (NCLB) Act, passed by Congress in 2001, is a sweeping attempt at educational reform that seeks to repair the damages of the past, close the achievement gap, and improve the U.S. education system by providing additional funding and support to schools that are underperforming, many of which serve racial/ethnic minority children and children from low socioeconomic backgrounds. NCLB provides federal funding to states that establish annual assessments to ensure that schools are making adequate yearly progress (AYP) toward state-determined academic benchmarks. The intention behind NCLB is to provide quality education for all children through adequate, evidence-based instruction by high-quality teachers in the classroom, but the law has been surrounded by controversy. For example, NCLB requires detailed reports on school performance that are frequently seen as demeaning; it is viewed as placing sanctions on already struggling schools, making it even more difficult for them to achieve AYP; it de-emphasizes science, art, and electives; it disincentivizes programs focused on gifted, talented, or other high-performing students; and it is thought to drive administrators and teachers to narrowly focus on subjects covered by yearly assessments (e.g., "teaching to the test").

In addition, NCLB's goal to support the English fluency of LEP students has not been supported by the quality of English-language instruction for nonnative English speakers available at schools. In 2010, President Barack Obama responded to calls to reform NCLB by proposing a plan called the Blueprint for Reform of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. This blueprint included a broader range of standardized assessments that evaluate more advanced academic skills and appropriately assess all children; a focus on rewarding progress, rather than penalizing failures to achieve goals; and an emphasis on a wider range of academic subjects. The reformed law was not authorized by Congress, leading the Obama administration to grant waivers from NCLB requirements to most of the states.

Waivers provide flexibility to states within the law as long as the states have a plan to implement high academic standards, enhance teacher and principal development, and improve accountability through comprehensive assessments that reward those schools making progress toward goals. Because of its discriminatory and exclusionary past, the U.S. education system is now actively taking steps to provide equal educational opportunities and promote equivalent educational outcomes for all American children and youth.

Early Childhood Education

Nearly two-thirds of all 3- to 5-year-old children in the United States are enrolled in early childhood education programs. Common early education settings are nursery school, day care, preschool, prekindergarten, and kindergarten. Children enrolled in early education programs typically range from 3 to 5 years old. Though prekindergarten is less common, most public elementary schools offer kindergarten for 5-year-old children.

Although not required by law, many families choose to enroll their children in early childhood education programs in order to begin developing the skills necessary for school readiness and set the stage for later academic achievement. Typical activities in early childhood education focus on the development of preliteracy and language and prenumeracy skills, along with arts and crafts, music, gross motor activities like running and jumping, and free play.

Federally funded programs, such as the Head Start program, provide children from low-income families the opportunity to begin developing their preacademic skills. In addition, Head Start also provides services to promote social and emotional development and physical health and nutrition, with the goal of promoting positive academic, behavioral, and health outcomes in this traditionally underserved population.

Current estimates suggest that 29 percent of families who participate in the Head Start program are African American, and 37 percent are Hispanic/Latino. Additionally, 12 percent of Head Start students have disabilities. Other federally funded initiatives like Early Reading First focus specifically on the development of language and preliteracy skills in early childhood education settings. Early Reading First was created in response to the growing realization that many children, particularly those from low-income families, were entering formal education settings without the basic school readiness skills prerequisite for short- and long-term academic success.

Elementary and Secondary Education

In the United States, children are required by law to attend elementary and secondary school, at minimum, until age 16, but some states require attendance until 18 years of age. Therefore, 98 percent of children and youth aged 6 to 17 are enrolled in school. The majority of these students attend one of over 96,000 public elementary or secondary schools. Elementary education typically consists of grades 1 to 5, while secondary education includes middle school (grades 6–8) and high school (grades 9–12). Students typically attend schools according to the neighborhood in which they live. In accordance with IDEA, students with disabilities are entitled to an education appropriate to their needs in the least restrictive environment. Accommodations such as untimed tests or the utilization of a teacher's aide within the general education setting are a few ways in which these needs can be met.

Children in elementary school typically spend their day in one classroom with one teacher who covers a variety of subjects such as reading, language arts, spelling, math, history, social studies, and science. Length of time spent on each subject is flexible and based on classroom needs. Children may also participate in gym, art, music, and recess. During elementary school, federally funded programs such as Reading First help support the development of reading, with the goal of teaching all children to read prior to completion of third grade. To encourage the use of evidence-based instructional methods and assessments, financial support is given to states and districts that demonstrate commitment to these efforts. In line with compulsory attendance laws, recent estimates suggest that 98 percent of adults have completed elementary school.

In middle school, children typically switch classrooms throughout the day based on a set schedule. Middle school teachers generally teach a few subjects, in contrast to elementary school teachers who are responsible for teaching the entire core curriculum. In addition to topics covered in elementary school, most middle schools integrate a health class into their curriculum. In high school, students' days are typically broken up into periods. Students have a course schedule, developed with assistance by a guidance counselor and based on the students' interests, abilities, and desired career paths. Core subjects covered are English, science, social studies, and math. Students may also take elective courses such as foreign language studies or culinary arts. Honors or advanced placement classes may be made available for enrollment by high-achieving students or students trying to better prepare themselves for postsecondary education.

Vocational training may also be offered as part of, or in addition to, core coursework and electives, and provides an opportunity for specialized training in a vocational field, sometimes without the need for further education postgraduation. Providing a vocational education in American high schools has a long history, but it has recently come to light that minority students are overrepresented in vocational/career tracks as opposed to college tracks. This concept, called "tracking," has brought additional attention to the disproportionality associated with race/ethnicity and socioeconomic status endemic in U.S. schools.

A total of 85 percent of U.S. adults over the age of 25 have completed high school. The graduation rate for certain groups is notably lower. As reported by the National Center for Education Statistics, 2009–10 high school graduation rates were 66 percent for African Americans and 71 percent for Hispanics/Latinos, as compared to 83 percent for whites.

Postsecondary Education

Postsecondary education includes vocational/technical institutions, junior/community colleges, undergraduate programs, graduate programs, and postdoctoral study. Vocational/technical institutions provide job-skill specific training (beyond vocational training offered in secondary school) in areas such as business, finance, agriculture, and technology. Degree and nondegree programs are available. Junior/community colleges offer two-year associate's degree programs, and are often used to transition from high school to a university setting. They also provide education to a growing number of adult students. Colleges and universities offer the opportunity to pursue a four-year bachelor's degree, which can include advanced study in a wide range of areas including the liberal arts, sciences, architecture, and business.

These institutions also offer advanced degrees, including master's and doctoral degrees, which typically include highly focused study in a particular field, including law and medicine. Though approximately 25 percent of adults over 25 have completed a four-year degree, the graduation rates for ethnic minorities are notably lower, with the National Center of Education Statistics reporting six-year graduation rates for African Americans, Latinos, and whites as 39.9, 51, and 62.1 percent, respectively, in 2011. Targeted recruiting of ethnic minority students, financial assistance/support (e.g., loans, grants, and scholarships), and cooperative student groups (e.g., the Hispanic Student Union, Black Student Union, and the Multicultural Student Coalition) exist with the goal of bolstering the enrollment and retention of underrepresented groups in higher education.

Adult Education (Basic, Secondary, and Continuing)

The opportunity to pursue education in adulthood is not exclusive to postsecondary institutions. In contrast to colleges and universities, adult education often specifically targets groups that had reduced access to or ability to take advantage of the U.S. education system. Additional instruction in basic skills, such as reading and writing, along with the opportunity to receive an equivalent high school diploma are available for individuals who failed to complete high school. In addition, community-based organizations often offer listening,

An adult education computer lab. Adult education often specifically targets groups that had reduced access or ability to take advantage of the U.S. education system. Continuing education opportunities such as the completion of a certificate or taking individual courses for professional development, personal enrichment, or work-related skills are also available.

speaking, reading, and writing instruction to nonnative English speakers who have recently immigrated to the United States. Continuing education opportunities such as the completion of a certificate or taking individual courses for professional development, personal enrichment, or work-related skills are also available. There is a considerable amount of human difference reflected within the U.S. education system, and a variety of initiatives and services are available to meet the needs of the increasingly diverse student population. Careful consideration of the culture, context, and background of all students, especially those who have been traditionally underserved by or excluded from the education system, is critical to ensure equal educational opportunities and outcomes for all.

Veronica L. Coriano
Courtney N. Baker
Tulane University

See Also: Department of Education, U.S.; Educational Services; Educational Support Services; Individuals with Disabilities Education Act; No Child Left Behind Act; Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services; Special Education.

Further Readings

Early Childhood Learning and Knowledge Center. "Head Start Program Facts Fiscal Year 2012." http://eclkc.ohs.acf.hhs.gov/hslc/mr/factsheets/2012-hs-program-factsheet.html (Accessed November 2013).

Government Accountability Office. No Child Left Behind Act: Assistance From Education Could Help States Better Measure Progress of Students With Limited English Proficiency. Washington, DC: GAO, 2013.

National Center for Education Statistics. Public School Graduates and Dropouts From the Common Core of Data Schools Year 2009–10: First Look (Provisional Data). Washington, DC: NCES, 2013.

U.S. Department of Education, Office for Civil Rights. Free Appropriate Public Education for Students With Disabilities: Requirements Under Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Education, 2010.

U.S. Department of Education, Office of Communications and Outreach. Guide to U.S. Department of Education Programs. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Education, 2012.

Educational Support Services

Even though the general education programs of public schools strive to provide the best possible education to children, some students' needs are not met. Schools provide educational support services to assist these students in receiving a free and appropriate public education in the least restrictive environment.

Students qualifying for educational support services may have a variety of needs. Educational support services are provided for the developmentally and physically disabled, the gifted and talented, those for whom English is not their primary language, children from low socioeconomic status (SES) backgrounds, and others. Educational support services are often run separately from the general education program; these offerings are intended to supplement, not supplant, that curriculum. Funding for educational support services often comes from income streams different from that for the general education program. The consistency of that funding greatly influences the success or failure of educational support services offered.

Background

All 50 states and the District of Columbia provide public education for children from kindergarten through grade 12. Additionally, many states also fund preschool programs that permit some children as young as 3 years of age to attend classes. Historically, schools provided instruction that was directed at same-age grades. Children who struggled with material at their grade level were expected to master this curriculum without special assistance, resulting in many children leaving school. Those students who were advanced also were afforded no special treatment, although sometimes they were allowed to skip a grade to put them with children working at the same cognitive level. Children with mental or physical disabilities were often excluded from school altogether and were either kept at home or sent to asylums.

This scenario began to change in 1975, when Congress passed the Education for All Handicapped Children Act (later the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, or IDEA). This act required all schools accepting federal funds to provide children with cognitive or physical disabilities equal access to education. To this end, school districts were required to assess children who might have a disability. If a child was found to have a cognitive or physical disability, the school was required to form an individualized education plan for that child and to monitor the child's progress over time. This change in law created many new opportunities for children with disabilities. About this time, many states also began gifted education programs, intended to provide cognitively advanced children with additional opportunities in their academic work. During the last 50 years, interest also grew in assisting preschool through college students from low-SES backgrounds, and a variety of programs were developed to do so.

Types of Services

Educational support services are provided to students in a variety of ways. Some services are available to students as separate programs, offered before or after school. Other services are offered distinct from the general education program, either in the years before most children enroll in school, over the summer, or at some other time. Additional services, such as pull-out instruction or resource specialists, supplement the general education program. Which educational support services are available depends upon adequate funding, and decisions must often be made among viable alternatives. To ensure equity, many school districts provide open forums to elicit comments and input from teachers, parents, students, and other concerned individuals regarding which options to offer.

Educational support services are offered to address perceived needs among various groups of students and to address certain mental and physical disabilities that affect individual children. Schools have long noticed that children from low-SES backgrounds perform less well than their more affluent peers. To address this problem, the federal government has established a variety of programs that are separate from, although sometimes affiliated with, the general education programs offered by K–12 schools.

Head Start. The Head Start program is a program developed by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) that attempts to provide educational, health, and nutritional support to low-SES children and their families. Head Start works to establish a learning environment that develops children's cognitive skills, enhances their physical and emotional health, and fosters stable family relationships. To ensure a successful transition from preschool to kindergarten, Head Start assists children in engaging with peers outside of their families, adjusting to the space of the classroom, and meeting school expectations regarding behavior and other interactions.

Originally launched in 1965, Head Start has now served over 30 million children. An Early Head Start program, serving students from birth until age 3 years, was added because development that takes place during these early years is believed to be imperative to children's development. The perceived success of Head Start led to the formation of similar programs to augment the educational experiences of older children.

Upward Bound. Upward Bound works with high school students from rural areas or from low-SES households whose parents did not attend college. Working to enhance these children's chances of going to college or university, Upward Bound programs participate in a competitive grant process for funding that permits students to take college preparatory classes during the summer on a college campus and then to engage in weekly follow-ups and tutoring during the academic year. Usually run by colleges or universities, Upward Bound programs work with K–12 school districts to coordinate efforts with children and their families.

Educational support services. A variety of educational support services are also offered by K–12 school districts to children who exhibit programming needs that are not provided by the general education program. Students who struggle with reading, for example, may be offered a variety of educational support services to improve their performance. School-based, short-term intervention programs are offered to struggling readers in an effort to help them become proficient. Such reading intervention programs are not designed to replace good classroom instruction, but instead are intended to supplement that instruction so that children are able to engage in classroom activities. Specially trained teachers work with the struggling readers, sometimes in the general education classroom and sometimes outside the classroom. Reading intervention programs feature individually designed instruction that addresses an individual learner's needs. Special equipment (e.g., sandpaper letters, magnetic words, and other tools), is used for sorting, to assist visual discrimination, and to engage in word study, a careful analysis of how words work. Successful reading intervention programs assist children in becoming proficient readers and reduce the need for special education services.

Individual educational programs. For children with more serious needs, such as mental or physical disabilities, referrals from their classroom teachers often lead to screening by a student study team (SST). If the SST assesses a child and discovers a learning disability, the child is eligible for an individualized education program (IEP). The IEP states which educational support services that student will receive, ranging, for example, from sessions with a speech pathologist, time with a resource specialist teacher, or placement in a special education classroom. For children with severe needs, an option is full-time placement in a special school, such as a school for the blind or deaf. The efforts of most special education programs are designed to mainstream children whenever possible, so that they spend as much time as practicable in the general education classroom. For older students, the IEP also considers transitions to full-time care and vocational training, if appropriate.

Gifted and talented programs. Advanced students sometimes qualify for gifted and talented programming. These educational support services are intended to enhance highly able students' general education experience, and may involve differentiated instruction from the general education teacher, enrichment programs that take place outside of the classroom, special classes, or special schools. Some gifted and talented students are also permitted to skip grades for a single subject or even for an entire academic year in all subjects.

Although this type of acceleration has been shown to be highly effective, many classroom teachers do not favor it. By the time gifted and talented students reach high school, special programming options are sometimes offered to them. These options may include dual enrollment at a local college or university, where the high school student is able to earn college credit while still enrolled in high school. Advanced placement (AP) and international baccalaureate (IB) programs are also offered by many school districts as a way of offering special programming while keeping the students at their high school campus.

Stephen T. Schroth
Knox College

See Also: After-School Services; Assistive Technology; Department of Education, U.S.; Developmental Disabled Individuals; Early Childhood Literacy; Head Start and Prekindergarten Programs; No Child Left Behind Act; School Health Services

Further Readings

Dickenson, R. C. Prioritizing Academic Programs and Services: Reallocating Resources to Achieve Strategic Balance, 2nd ed. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2010.
Duke, D. L. The Challenges of School District Leadership. New York: Routledge, 2010.
Fullan, M. The New Meaning of Educational Change, 4th ed. New York: Teachers College Press, 2007.
Schroth, S. T. “Service Delivery Models.” In J. A. Plucker and C. M. Callahan, eds., Critical Issues and Practices in Gifted Education: What the Research Says, 2nd ed. Waco, TX: Prufrock Press, 2013.

Elder Care/ Geriatric Services

Elder care services comprise health and human services geared to those in late life. In the United States, individuals aged 65 years and older are generally defined as elderly. These individuals in late life also are referred to as older persons, aged, or elders. A growing percentage of the U.S. population is in this age group. Many services and public programs are specifically available for elders, and a growing number of health and human services professionals are specifically trained to work with this population.

Gerontology and Geriatrics

Gerontologists are trained to work with elders and study aging and late life. Generally, gerontologists are first trained in a primary discipline, such as psychology, sociology, biology, or economics. In addition, graduates of professional programs such as social work, nursing, medicine, occupational therapy, and physical therapy can specialize in gerontology, according to the Gerontological Society of America (www.geron.org). The specialty for a professional who works mainly in medicine or health care is termed geriatrics.

A gerontology or geriatrics specialist encounters three age groups: the young-old (65–74 years of age), the middle-old (75–84 years of age), and the old-old (85 years of age and older). Compared to the younger elderly, a higher percentage of the old-old need and use support services.

Many individuals incorrectly believe that most elders are lonely and sad and that many live in a nursing home. In fact, most elders live independently in the community and have positive interactions with extensive social support. Although most of the old-old have at least one chronic disease or disability, the majority do not experience any major loss of function for most of their late lives.

Demographics

In the United States, the proportion of the population aged 65 years and older is rapidly rising. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, in 2010 about 13 percent of the population were age 65 and older. This percentage is expected to rise to nearly 20 percent in 2030, when most of the youngest of the post–World War II baby boom generation will have turned 65. This rising proportion of older individuals is important because many more will need elder care services and public programs, while there will be fewer younger, working individuals to provide care or pay into the tax system to support programs for the elderly.

Life expectancy is defined as the average number of years an individual will live after birth. In the United States, people live an average of 78 years. This average is influenced by rates of infant mortality as well as late-life diseases. On average, women live longer than men, and white individuals live longer than black individuals in the United States.

During the next several decades, the older population will become more racially and ethnically diverse. In 2010, about 80 percent of those 65 years of age and older were non−Hispanic whites. The percentage of the U.S. population in this group is expected to decrease to about 58 percent by 2050. Between 2010 and 2050, the older black population is estimated to grow from 9 percent to 12 percent, the Hispanic population from 7 percent to 20 percent, and the Asian population from 3 percent to 9 percent.

Currently, race and ethnicity are correlated to educational attainment of those age 65 years and older, with non-Hispanic whites and Asians most likely to have completed high school and college. Living arrangements vary greatly for older individuals, with older black men more likely than other men to live alone, and non-Hispanic white women and black women more likely than older Hispanic or Asian women to live alone. Due to Social Security and Medicare, overall poverty rates among the elderly are lower than in younger populations. However, income disparities from younger ages continue into late life.

Health and Human Services

A variety of community-based services are available to support elders. Some services, such as skilled home health care, homemaking services, chore services, and home-delivered meals, are provided in the home. Other services (e.g., congregate meal sites and senior centers for low-cost meals and socialization opportunities, senior employment programs; adult day services, subsidized housing, and low-cost transportation), are community based. The rights of elders are protected by laws against age discrimination in employment, as well as laws against elder abuse, neglect, and exploitation. Many lawyers who specialize in elder law have expertise in wills, estate planning, and legal protections for elders unable to make their own decisions.

Long-term care involves a disease or disability that requires months of care and services. Long-term care can occur in a person's home, adult foster care, assisted living, or in a skilled nursing facility. Increasingly, individuals spend weeks in a skilled nursing facility for rehabilitation and then return home for continuing care. Patients expected to live less than six months are eligible for hospice care, which focuses on comfort and support for the individual and his or her family rather than on treatment or cure.

Geriatric medical care can be very complicated because older individuals often have multiple chronic conditions and take many medications. The complexity of the person's health condition can make diagnosis and treatment challenging. Some physician offices, medical assessment centers, and hospitals provide specialized services for older patients. Assessment, diagnosis, and treatment are often delivered and determined by a team of medical professionals.

U.S. Policies

In the United States, specific policies, social services, and health care services support elders. Social Security and Medicare are entitlement programs available to all elderly who have been employed in the United States or are married to someone employed in the United States. Social Security provides a monthly income for eligible elders, and Medicare provides health insurance for elders. Since these programs were established in 1935 and 1965 respectively, the percentage of elders in poverty has dropped significantly.

