The historical roots of MHA are integrally connected to the late 19th- and early 20th-century American social reform movements in education, public health, juvenile justice services, and state asylum and local almshouse improvements. The mental hygiene reform movement of this era was greatly advanced by the remarkable efforts of Clifford W. Beers. As an educated and rising young Wall Street financier, he encountered an initial bipolar episode involving an attempted suicide that resulted in three years of private and public mental hospitalizations. During his period of institutionalization, he wrote a personal diary that chronicled the abusive and inhumane experiences he shared with other patients. Following his hospitalizations in 1908, Beers published his biographical account in A Mind That Found Itself. The book received considerable attention and gained attention of other reformers such as the renowned philosopher William James and well-known psychiatrist Adolf Meyers. These men and other contemporaries joined with Beers in the mental hygiene reform campaign and championed the formation of the National Committee for Mental Hygiene in order to advance institutional settings and patient treatment conditions.

These efforts led to state-by-state legislative reform and improved financing for state-run psychiatric hospitals, promoted interest in psychiatry as an emerging medical specialty, and unified U.S. and European reform efforts. The long mental health advocacy of MHA was a catalyst for more recent psychiatric care reforms that unfolded after World War II in part related to the development of new psychotropic medications that proved effective for major long-term psychiatric disorders. The organization advocated for the federal government's establishment of the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH) in 1949 to promote research on the cause of major mental disorders and their treatment. MHA lobbied for the congressional passage of the 1963 Community Mental Health Centers Act that facilitated the creation of local, community-based facilities supporting the deinstitutionalization of mental health patients and advanced the foundation of outpatient care. It engaged in nationwide advocacy partnerships that mobilized passage of the 1990 Americans With Disabilities Act and the 2008 Mental Health Parity Act and more recently lobbied successfully for inclusion of significant mandated mental health insurance coverage within the 2010 Affordable Care Act.

State and Local Affiliates

The activities of state and local MHA affiliates are in part guided by national MHA initiatives. These initiatives are presented in the form of mental health position statements that necessitate ongoing and new directions of advocacy and mental health promotion. As nonprofit organizations, the affiliates operate with various amounts and types of professional staffing, but all rely heavily on citizen and consumer volunteer participation. Regional multistate mental health policy advocacy forums are facilitated by efforts of the national MHA in order to disseminate innovative program models, organizational resource acquisition strategies, and legislative advocacy approaches. These organizations strongly support the mental health recovery goals of consumer-driven programs and services. They are committed to the establishment of programs that reflect the cultural and linguistic diversity in response to the local diversification of mental health care needs among the high-risk community populations.

The national organization strongly promotes local models of cultural diversity that increase accessibility for diverse, underserved groups. Model programs such as mental health outreach to the migrant farmer worker network and mental health respite care for African American caregivers have helped promote cultural diversity program transfer. Many of the organizations are engaged in the creation and management of supportive housing adapted as residential alternatives for the chronically mentally ill homeless. Improvement of mental health care within correctional facilities is a goal shared by many organizations. Statewide legislative advocacy focused on governmental mental health department budgetary priorities and care access for the lowest-income consumers remains a continuous focus as state legislatures perpetually erode public mental health care expenditures.

Eloise Rathbone-McCuan
University of Missouri, Kansas City

See Also: Homelessness; Housing Services; National Institute of Mental Health.

Further Readings

Burns, Jonathan K. "Mental Health and Inequity: A Human Rights Approach to Inequality, Discrimination and Mental Disability." Health and Human Rights, v.11 (2009).

Hasenfeld, Yeheskel, and Eve Garrow. "Nonprofit Human-Service Organizations, Social Rights and Advocacy in a Neoliberal Welfare State." Social Services Review, v.86 (2012).

Kramer, Cortney. "Mental Health America." Consumer Health on the Internet, v.15 (2011).

Mechanic, David. "Seizing Opportunities Under the Affordable Health Care Act for Transforming the Mental and Behavioral Health System." Health Affairs, v.31 (2012).

National Minority AIDS Council

The National Minority AIDS Council (NMAC) is a nonprofit organization founded in 1987 for the purpose of developing awareness about the disproportionate impact of human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) on people of color in the nation. Two years later, NMAC partnered with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) to assist in building the capacity of community- and faith-based organizations in their efforts to provide HIV/AIDS services. NMAC subsequently changed its mission from raising awareness to building leadership in communities of color to address the challenges posed by HIV/AIDS. Due to recent advances in biomedical interventions for HIV/AIDS (i.e., microbicides and preexposure prophylaxis [PrEP]), the NMAC adjusted its mission again in 2011, from addressing the challenges of HIV/AIDS to ending the HIV/AIDS epidemic.

One of the nation's leading HIV/AIDS organizations, NMAC does not work alone but in partnership with a coalition of other community, faith-based, and AIDS service-providing organizations in delivering health care and support to individuals and families infected and affected by this epidemic.

Programs of the NMAC

The work of the NMAC is carried out through four programmatic divisions:

1. The Division of Community Advancement and Leadership Strategies (D-CALS) lends capacity-building assistance to community-based organizations, planning groups, and health departments in formulating or implementing HIV/AIDS initiatives.
2. Conferences and Meeting Services (CMS) is designed to bring together leaders in the fight against HIV/AIDS to exchange information, network, and provide education and training. One example is the annual U.S. Conference on AIDS, the largest gathering of AIDS activists in the country.
3. Legislative and Public Affairs (LPA) focuses on advocacy and promoting health care policies pertaining to HIV/AIDS that are aimed at social justice and access to care for people of color. This division also engages in grassroots education and mobilization.
4. The Treatment Education, Adherence, and Mobilization (TEAM) works to ensure that minorities of color have access to HIV testing and counseling as well as newer biomedical interventions and provides the means necessary to eliminate or contain new HIV infections and related comorbidities.

Funding comes from membership dues, private donors, the United Way, and federal grants such as those from CDC for capacity-building assistance provided to community agencies.

Advocacy Positions Taken by the NMAC

NMAC has made HIV/AIDS issues more visible to all sectors of the American public, including lawmakers at state and national levels. It has been quite active in testifying on Capitol Hill and in state legislatures, recommending policy and program reforms to benefit minorities living with HIV/AIDS and addressing social and economic conditions that help drive the epidemic in communities of color. As such, NMAC has made the following recommendations: (1) increase the number of drug prevention and treatment programs, including a needle exchange program instituted for current drug users. In the opinion of NMAC, this initiative would not encourage individuals to use drugs but would greatly curtail the transmission of HIV through the sharing of contaminated needles; (2) reduce the impact of incarceration on new infections by distributing condoms to inmates in state and federal prisons, and provide HIV testing upon entry and release. In the opinion of some knowledgeable HIV activists and educators, this initiative would decrease the rate of transmission of HIV in prisons and in the communities to which inmates return; (3) develop a program at the federal level that would provide stable, affordable housing in the African American community for those infected by HIV; (4) provide more culturally relevant HIV education to minority youths in school settings; (5) increase funding for HIV research, critical to further development of biomedical, social, and behavioral interventions; (6) encourage and expand HIV testing that would lead to early identification of the virus; and (7) reduce stigma and marginalization of men who have sex with other men. The NMAC also supports the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (ACA) and the National HIV/AIDS Strategy (NHAS) and believes that the full implementation of these two initiatives will provide a pathway to ending the nation's HIV/AIDS epidemic.

Challenges Faced by the Organization

The first challenge of the NMAC is to continue getting its HIV/AIDS messages of education, prevention, treatment, community mobilization, and leadership development across to communities of color—in other words, keeping them involved in the battle. Second is to work toward getting the ACA fully implemented so that it has the intended impact on those living with HIV/AIDS as well as those at risk for transmission.

This will require educating communities of color at the grassroots level so that they are aware of ACA's benefits. NMAC will also need to advocate for fair and effective regulations to govern implementation of ACA. Third is advocacy for additional funding for HIV/AIDS research and capacity-building activities. Compared to 2010, NMAC's income and net assets dropped in 2011, resulting in a loss of grants to various HIV organizations. Funding for capacity building will be significant as health organizations become involved in implementing the ACA.

Legislative Agenda for 2013 and Beyond

In addition to issues identified under advocacy and challenges, some of the organization's other priorities include the following: (1) the reauthorization of the Ryan White CARE Act, providing last-resort access to care for many uninsured and underinsured persons living with HIV/AIDS; (2) passage of the Employment Non-Disclosure Act (ENDA), providing legal protection against employment discrimination based on sexual orientation, gender identity, or gender expression; and (3) reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), providing protections for Native American women, immigrants, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) individuals.

Barbara J. Haile
Florida A&M University

See Also: AIDS/HIV Programs; Health Care Delivery, Models of; LGBT Clients.

Further Readings

Fullilove, Robert E. "African Americans, Health Disparities and HIV/AIDS." National Minority AIDS Council. img.thebody.com/nmac/blacks_aids.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

National Minority AIDS Council. "Ending the Epidemic." http://www.nmac.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/10/Ending-the-Epidemic_NMAC.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

National Minority AIDS Council. "Legislative Agenda for the 113th Congress." http://www.nmac.org/issues-advocacy/nmac-releases-2013-legislative-priorities (Accessed December 2013).

National Minority AIDS Council. "Programs, Agency Mission." http://www.nmac.org/about/nmac-programs (Accessed December 2013).

National Organization for Human Services

In 1975, the National Organization for Human Services Education (NOHSE) was founded at the Fifth Annual Faculty Development Conference of the Southern Regional Education Board. The mission of the organization was to unite educators in preparing effective human services professionals. In 2005, the organization removed the word education from its name and became the National Organization for Human Services (NOHS), with a greater focus on the overall community of human services. In addition to educators, membership now includes students and practitioners.

The mission of NOHS is to strengthen the community of human services by expanding professional development opportunities, enhancing internal and external communications, nurturing the financial sustainability and growth of the organization, promoting professional and organizational identity through certification, and advocating and implementing a social policy and agenda.

NOHS promotes collaboration of all members in the human services community and advocates for social justice. The guiding principles include the beliefs in the capacity of human growth and change while recognizing and utilizing people's strengths and abilities. NOHS supports a holistic approach to wellness including physical, mental, emotional, and spiritual health.

The national organization includes six regional associations. The Mid-Atlantic Consortium of Human Services (MACHS) includes Delaware, New Jersey, New York, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Washington, D.C. The Midwest Organization for Human Services (MWOHS) serves Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

The New England Organization for Human Services (NEOHS) covers Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont. The Northwest Human Services Association (NWHSA) comprises Alaska, Colorado, Guam, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming. The Southern Organization for Human Services (SOHS) contains Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia. Finally, the Western Region of Human Service Professionals (WEST) incorporates Arizona, California, Hawaii, Nevada, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Texas.

Each of these regional organizations operates independently while maintaining an affiliation with the national organization. When members join the national organization, they also become a member of their designated regional association.

In addition to regional associations, the NOHS board of directors approved the establishment of Tau Upsilon Alpha (TUA), the Human Services Honor Society in 2006. Members include students, faculty, alumni, at-large members, and honorary members who are invited to join when they meet the required criteria. For example, students must demonstrate at least a 3.25 GPA for a designated period of time in their human services program. The mission of TUA is to honor academic excellence; to foster lifelong learning, leadership and development; and to promote excellence in service to humanity.

Once a year, NOHS also publishes a national peer-reviewed journal. The Journal of Human Services, formerly known as Human Services Education, is the leading source of research in the profession and includes articles, brief notes, and critical reviews of scholarly books.

NOHS also provides Ethical Standards for Human Service Professionals to enhance professional decision making. Finally, NOHS collaborates with the Council for Standards in Human Service Education (CSHSE) as the council determines accreditation standards for human services education programs.

Membership to the national organization includes the benefits of a quarterly newsletter, an annual peer-reviewed journal, access to online discussions and job postings, discounts on national conferences, and eligibility for member-only scholarships and grants. Discounted rates are given to student members.

Kathleen Levingston
Old Dominion University

See Also: Code of Ethics of the National Association of Social Workers; Education for Diversity in Human Services; Journal of Human Services; National Mental Health Association; Social Workers.

Further Readings

Harris, Howard S., David C. Maloney, and Franklyn M. Rother. Human Services: Contemporary Issues and Trends. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson, 2003.

National Organization for Human Services. http://www.nationalhumanservices.org/ (Accessed September 2013).

Neukrug, Edward S. Theory, Practice, and Trends in Human Services. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole/Cengage Learning, 2012.

Woodside, Marianne R., and Tricia McClam. An Introduction to Human Services. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole/Cengage Learning, 2011.

National Survey of Family Growth

The National Survey of Family Growth is an interview tool conducted seven times since 1973 to gather information on health topics from fertility and family size to cohabitation and contraceptive use. Sponsored by the National Center for Health Statistics, a branch of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), the National Survey of Family Growth is used in the public and private sectors to identify patterns of population growth, inform policy-making discussions, and guide the development of health programs and social services.

History and Uses of the National Survey of Family Growth

The National Center for Health Statistics lists several topic areas that the National Survey of Family Growth addresses, including the efficacy of existing planning, medical, and infertility services, and historical and biological influences on marriage, divorce, and cohabitation. It measures adoption and nonbiological parenting rates as well as sexual health behaviors across categories of race, geography, education level, and socioeconomic status. Social and behavioral scientists use the data from the National Survey of Family Growth to calculate the circulation of health-related goods and services, to detect patterns in human reproductive behavior, and to increase the efficacy of health messages—from fear appeals to food advertisements.

The National Survey of Family Growth was established in 1971 at the National Center for Health Statistics to standardize less-expansive fertility surveys. The survey was conducted five times between 1973 and 1995, each with a national sample of women. The first survey to include samples of both men and women was conducted in 2002, and the survey was in continuous use from 2006 to 2010, with samples of both men and women. The 2006 to 2010 cycle marked the first time the survey was fielded using a continuous design, in which interviews were conducted 48 weeks per year for four years, instead of completing the entire set of interviews in eight to 12 months. In 2011, interviews began for the next continuous four-year cycle from 2011 to 2015. The next public use data file, including data from interviews conducted from September 2011 to September 2013, was planned for release in fall 2014.

Cycles of the National Survey of Family Growth

Each cycle consists of several years of planning and organization. The first two cycles, in 1973 and 1976, conducted an average of 9,500 interviews with married women between the ages of 15 and 44. The next three cycles, in 1982, 1988, and 1995, included all women between the ages of 15 and 44. The sixth cycle, in 1995, again expanded the survey to 12,571 interviews with men and women between the ages of 15 and 44. The continuous survey, begun in 2006, divided the sample into groups and conducted more concentrated and cost-effective interviews with 5,000 men and women between the ages of 15 and 44 each year from 2006 to 2010.

The National Center for Health Statistics produces a researchers' user guide that describes the procedures used by the survey designers and participants in this most recent survey cycle. Using a computer-assisted personal interviewing technique that allows for in-person interviews with laptop computers, researchers conducted 60- to 80-minute interviews in English and Spanish with more than 12,000 women and 10,000 men between the ages of 15 and 44.

The initial cycles, in 1973 and 1976, collected information on a number of topics, including the habits of working pregnant women and the percentage of the labor force made up of pregnant women. Also, they included numbers of wanted and unwanted or unplanned births, expectations of family size at different periods during the childbearing period, and the longitudinal use of family-planning services among married women of various races and socioeconomic statuses. Additionally, the project collected some of the first data on the efficacy of contraceptive use among married women, the habits of breast-feeding mothers for first and subsequent children, and the employment practices of women before, during, and after pregnancy.

The 1976 cycle included some additive contributions to the 1973 cycle, including data on fecundity impairment or unintentional conditions preventing childbirth among married couples. It also allowed for comparisons with the 1973 data for contraceptive use among married, widowed, divorced, and separated mothers, and updated the figures on wanted and unwanted births and subsequent use of family planning services. Last, it developed an extensive demographic profile of teenage wives and mothers.

The 1982 and 1988 cycles of the National Survey of Family Growth again compared findings with the 1973 and 1976 cycles to more longitudinally define pregnancy and family growth patterns. These cycles collected additional data on the timing of first and subsequent prenatal visits as well as acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS)-related behaviors and smoking and alcohol use before, during, and after pregnancy. Results from the subsequent 1995 and 2002 cycles included trends in teenage sexual behavior and condom use among cohabitating men and women.

Finally, the 2006 to 2010 cycles continued to refine the data-collection, interviewing, and survey-administration techniques of the project. Using data collected from these continuous trials, researchers were able to assess the prevalence and efficacy of sex education programs and detect trends in sexual health, most notably a sharp decline in the percentage of never-married teenagers who have had sexual intercourse.

The seven cycles of the National Survey of Family Growth have been influential in the public and private sectors. The National Center for Health Statistics lists 91 journal articles and book chapters that emerged from the 1972 and 1976 cycles, close to 200 journal articles and book chapters from the 1982 and 1988 cycles, and more than 350 journal articles and book chapters from the 1995 and 2002 cycles.

In addition to more than 20 reports issued by the National Center for Health Statistics, there have been 93 journal articles, books and book chapters, and other papers and reports in medical, communication, economics, and sociology journals for the 2006 to 2010 continuous cycles.

David DeIuliis
Duquesne University

See Also: Family Pregnancy Planning; Family Services; Pregnancy and Parenting Services; Profile of Parenting Study.

Further Readings

Copen, Casey, et al. National Center for Health Statistics. “First Premarital Cohabitation in the United States: 2006–2010 National Survey of Family Growth.” http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/nhsr/nhsr064.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Daniels, Kimberly, et al. “National Center for Health Statistics. Contraceptive Methods Women Have Ever Used: United States, 1982–2010.” http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/nhsr/nhsr062.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Jacobs, Josephine and Maria Stanfors. “Racial and Ethnic Differences in U.S. Women’s Choice of Reversible Contraceptives, 1995–2010.” Perspectives on Sexual and Reproductive Health, v.48 (2013).

National Center for Health Statistics. “Responsive Design, Weighting, and Variance Estimation in the 2006–2010 National Survey of Family Growth.” http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/series/sr_02/sr02_158.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

National Urban League

Founded in New York City in 1910, the National Urban League is one of the oldest and largest civil rights organizations in the United States. At the core of its mission is a goal of full economic, education, and political equality for African Americans by facilitating access to housing, health care, employment, and financial management services. Unique among civil rights organizations in the United States, since its founding, the league has been both nonpartisan and biracial. By 2013, the league had chapters in 35 states, and its services directly reach more than 2 million Americans.

Early History

The origins of the National Urban League date back to the first decade of the 20th century, with the founding of the Committee on Urban Conditions among Negroes on September 29, 1910, by Ruth Standish Baldwin, a wealthy widow who was known as a champion of the poor, and George Edmund Haynes, a social worker and the first African American to earn a doctorate at Columbia University. The organization was founded to assist African Americans who had migrated recently from the agrarian south to the industrial north in adjusting to challenging urban conditions. The group's focus was the amelioration of social, economic, housing, and educational conditions for blacks new to living in northern cities.

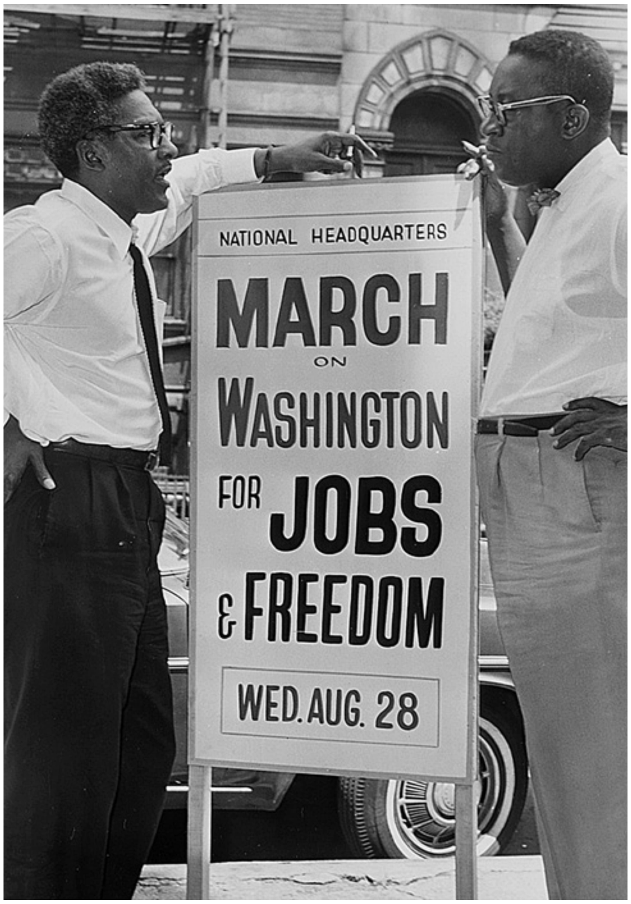
The organization's reach expanded considerably in 1911 when it merged with two grassroots advocacy groups, the National League for the Protection of Colored Women and the Committee for the Improvement of Industrial Conditions Among Negroes in New York; the committee was rechristened the National League on Urban Conditions Among Negroes, which was truncated to the National Urban League in 1920. Its campaigning to improve the living and working conditions of African Americans during World War I allowed the league to grow in size and influence.

During the 1920s and 1930s, under the leadership of Eugene Kinckle Jones, the league led boycotts against businesses that were unwilling to hire African Americans, worked to integrate labor unions, and even lobbied President Franklin D. Roosevelt to include African Americans in New Deal initiatives. The league continued fighting against segregation at the workplace in the 1940s by supporting A. Philip Randolph and Bayard Rustin's March on Washington Movement, which led to the end of racially discriminatory practices in the military with Executive Order 9981 in 1948.

The League and the Civil Rights Movement

Whitney M. Young Jr., a trained social worker and human services provider, took the helm of the league in 1961 and became even more active in the Civil Rights Movement, from facilitating Randolph and Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, planning of the March on Washington in 1963 to engaging community leaders to address local-level issues affecting black Americans to influencing President Johnson's Great Society legislation. Young launched the league's congressional lobbying arm, the National Urban League Policy Institute (NULPI) in Washington, D.C., in 1962. In addition, he instituted a set of apparatus, under which the league's fund-raising capabilities flourished; during his 10 years as executive director, the annual budget increased almost 900 percent, from $625,000 to $6,100,000.

Vernon Jordan, who later would become a close adviser to President Bill Clinton, served as the president from 1971 to 1981, expanding the scope of the league's services to new areas that included conservation and the environment, voter turnout, and expanding professional opportunities for African American women. Jordan also developed the "State of Black America" report, an annual commentary on the economic status of the black community, culled from interviews with scholars, activists, civic leaders, and everyday citizens.



The National Urban League continued fighting segregation in the workplace in the 1940s by supporting the March on Washington Movement. Here, Bayard Rustin and Cleveland Robinson are shown at the March on Washington in 1963.

As urban areas changed over time, so did the agenda of the National Urban League. Addressing the increase in single-parent homes, reducing the rates of teenage pregnancies, eradicating high levels of drug use and drug-related crime, and supporting affirmative action policies were among the top priorities of the league during the 1980s. In 1989, the league partnered with the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence in order to address rising crime rates in African American communities. All proceeds from the hip-hop single "Self-Destruction," which featured noted rappers Public Enemy, Heavy D, Doug E. Fresh, MC Lyte, Ms. Melodie, KRS-One, and Kool Moe Dee, were donated to support National Urban League efforts in this area. Assuming the mantle of president in 1994, Hugh Bernard Price, an attorney with a background in philanthropy, made education and urban youth empowerment the focal points of his time in office. He also established the Institute of Opportunity and Equality, which conducted research and policy analysis in support of the league's initiatives.

In 2003, Marc H. Morial, a popular former mayor from New Orleans, was selected as the eighth president of the National Urban League. Among Morial's most significant contributions to the National Urban League was the creation of a business incubator, with more than $125 million earmarked for services and resources to support African American entrepreneurs. Mature workers, foreclosure prevention, community health, and financial literacy programs comprised other major league initiatives during the 2000s. By way of NULPI, the league publicly supported a number of policy positions that were considered progressive in their time, including universal health care, reform of government-sponsored enterprise regulations, and the extension of unemployment insurance for all Americans.

Print Media as a Means of Outreach

Beginning with the founding of its scholarly periodical, Opportunity Journal, in 1923, the National Urban League utilized a number of printed materials to appeal to its constituents. In addition to the aforementioned "State of Black America" report, the league published Urban Influence, an instructional magazine targeted at entrepreneurs of color, and "To Be Equal," a nationally syndicated newspaper column written each week by the organization's president.

Leon James Bynum
Columbia University

See Also: African Americans; Business Incubator; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Office for Civil Rights; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health; Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Further Readings

Armfield, Felix L. Eugene Kinckle Jones: The National Urban League and Black Social Work, 1910–1940. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 2011.

Weiss, Nancy J. The National Urban League, 1910–1940. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.

Wilson, Sondra Kathryn. The Opportunity Reader: Stories, Poetry, and Essays From the Urban League's Opportunity Magazine. New York: Modern Library, 1999.

National Youth in Transition Database

The National Youth in Transition Database (NYTD) is a nationwide data collection system in the United States developed to help gather and track information about independent living services (ILS) provided by states to youth in or transitioned out of foster care. The aims of NYTD are to facilitate the tracking of ILS provided to youth currently or formerly in foster care and to measure the collective outcomes of youth who age out of care. Similar to how data collected for the Adoption and Foster Care Analysis Reporting System (AFCARS) are used to assess young people's status and outcomes while in state foster care, data collected for the NYTD is used to monitor states' performance in preparing youth for transitioning out of foster care into adulthood.

For purposes of the NYTD, states are required to collect and report four types of data on a semiannual (twice a year) basis: (1) information regarding ILS provided to youth previously or currently in foster care; (2) basic demographic characteristics of all youth who received ILS during the reporting period; (3) early adulthood outcomes of selected youth surveyed at ages 17, 19, and 21; and (4) basic demographic characteristics of youth for whom outcome data are reported.

The population of young people in foster care is both racially and socioeconomically diverse. Although child maltreatment is prevalent across all social groups, children of minority race and ethnic groups, particularly children of black or Native American descent, are especially overrepresented in the U.S. foster care system. Supporting young people transitioning out of foster care thus works to promote the safety and well-being of vulnerable young people from predominately minority race and ethnic backgrounds.

Legislative Background

In 1986, the Title IV-E Independent Living Initiative (Public Law 99-272, ILI) was signed into law by President Ronald Reagan, providing federal funding that allowed states to make available ILS for youth in foster care, age 16 to 21. The Foster Care Independence Act (FCIA) of 1999 (Public Law 106-169) improved upon the ILI by establishing the John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program (CFCIP) and increasing states' flexibility in serving and supporting youth in their transition out of foster care into adulthood. FCIA redefined eligibility to receive ILS to include any youth likely to remain in foster care until at least age 18, thus removing age restrictions for receiving or participating in ILS programs.

FCIA also required that the Administration for Children and Families (ACF) develop and implement a system for collecting data related to ILS provided by states to youth in foster care. Namely, FCIA requires that the ACF collect data to (1) track the ILS states provide to youth and (2) develop outcome measures that may be used to assess state performance in the operation of their ILS programs. Final rules and regulations regarding NYTD were finalized in 2008. States began implementing data collection on October 1, 2010, and submitted their first reports for the NYTD in May 2011.

ILS Data

In late 2010, states began collecting data regarding the types and extent of ILS provided to youth who are or were previously in foster care. Specifications regarding the type, frequency, and delivery of services provided to youth are left to the jurisdiction of the states. Thus, in an effort to collect more standardized data that may be used to compare across locales, states are asked to report information regarding ILS provided to youth according to the following 11 categories: independent living needs assessments, academic support, postsecondary educational support, career preparation, employment or vocational training programs, budget and financial management, housing education and home management training, health education and risk prevention, family support and health and marriage education, mentorship, and supervised independent living.

Categories were purposely left broad to allow states flexibility in developing and providing their ILS programs. In addition to reporting on services provided, states are also required to identify demographic characteristics of each youth who received ILS during the reporting period, including educational level, sex, and race or ethnicity.

Early Adulthood Outcome Data

Unlike ILS data, states are not required to report NYTD outcome data for all youth in foster care, only youth in foster care who turned age 17 during the reporting period. The first data reporting period began with federal fiscal year 2011, and all 17-year-old youth in foster care who were surveyed during this period will be followed until their 21st birthdays. Outcome data will be reported at ages 17, 19, and 21. States will be required to select a new baseline population of 17-year-olds to survey every three years, with the second group of 17-year-old youth in foster care to be selected for survey in federal fiscal year 2014. Outcome data are to be reported for all youth in the baseline population, regardless of whether they received any ILS during the reporting period.

Similar to the broad categories identified for ILS, states are asked to provide data on youth outcomes according to the following six categories: financial self-sufficiency, educational (including academic or vocational) attainment, connections with adults, housing, engagement in high-risk behavior, and health insurance.

Why Collect Data on Older Youth Transitioning Out of Foster Care?

Decades of research highlight the difficulty that adults with child maltreatment and foster care histories have had in becoming self-sufficient adults. Low levels of educational attainment, unstable and low-wage employment, homelessness, and limited networks of support are well documented, particularly among youth who age out of foster care. One of the most recent and comprehensive studies of youth aging out of care, known as the Midwest Study, began in 2002 and followed youth from age 17 through their mid-20s. Study findings indicated low educational attainment, housing instability, and difficulty in finding and maintaining gainful employment among many study participants.

The John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program was established to confront the growing evidence of young people out of foster care faring poorly in adulthood, especially upon aging out of care. The NYTD is one strategy that aims to increase more positive outcomes among youth who age out of foster care by helping document existing supports and services provided to youth in care and highlight areas where additional services are needed.

Chris Lee
University of Calgary

See Also: Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System; Children in Foster Care; Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008; John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program.

Further Readings

Children's Bureau/Administration for Children and Families. "NYTD." http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/research-data-technology/reporting-systems/nytd (Accessed December 2013).

Courtney, M., et al. (2012). "Midwest Evaluation of the Adult Functioning of Former Foster Youth." http://www.chapinhall.org/research/report/midwest-evaluation-adult-functioning-former-foster-youth (Accessed December 2013).

Dworsky, A. (2009). "APHSA-Chapin Hall National Youth in Transition Database Initiative." http://www.chapinhall.org/research/report/aphsa-chapin-hall-national-youth-transition-database-initiative (Accessed December 2013).

National Resource Center for Child Welfare Data and Technology. "National Youth in Transition Database (NYTD)." http://www.nrccwdt.org/nytd (Accessed December 2013).

Native Americans

Historically, behavioral and mental health providers, counselors, and psychological services practitioners working with Native American populations in the United States have been apt to impose predominant Western values. Often met with resistance and seen as ineffective, mainstream methods and therapies have largely been Eurocentric and monocultural. Simply put, standard methods of treatment and intervention for the culturally different have been viewed as insensitive, alienating, and disparaging—if not altogether harmful—to minority groupings.

Given that there are more than 500 federally recognized tribes in the Unites States, blatant disregard for the differentness of the American Indian experience has led the varying helping professions to better recognize the need for culturally proficient and competent professionals. That is, the respective fields have begun to better recognize the diversity and variation of both lived and generational experiences that may negatively impact Native Americans. These include group psychological trauma from forced migration, discrimination and cultural isolation, as well as racism and societal oppression—each of which may perpetuate and contribute toward individual anguish, grief, and psychological distress as well as indigenous collective community suffering.

Indigenous Healing Versus Eurocentric Helping

Over hundreds of years, many American Indians grew wary and distrustful of government interference due to historical experiences largely stemming from forced migration from sovereign homelands in the Indian Removal Act of 1830. In one well-documented event, government-sanctioned troops forcibly removed thousands of Cherokee Indian families from their homes in the middle of winter without warning and no time to gather belongings—many with just the clothes on their backs. These tribes left belongings, livestock, and family treasures, all of which were left for white looters from the Deep South ready to occupy their fertile lands. This forced removal cost Indians thousands of lives lost due to exposure, disease, and starvation along the months-long journey to government-sanctioned settlements west of the Mississippi. Along the way, children were born, and the displaced who perished were buried in makeshift graves without time for either tribe or family members to pay respects or grieve, as they were forced to keep moving toward new tribal settlements in Oklahoma in what has been called the Trail of Tears. Though this was the plight of the Cherokee tribe, other so-called civilized tribes also experienced similar events of forced migration and subsequent loss of lives, property, and native lands—as well as emotional trauma inflicted.

After many months up to a year of treacherous travel, as tribes settled in new lands, Westerners attempted to acculturate indigenous tribes with Western values and ways of living. American Indians strongly resisted all Western influence as interference. As a people, many American Indians, still reeling from loss of homeland and family, were dealing with deep pain and experiencing feelings of loss, grief, depression, and a sense of helplessness. Though many Westerners were sincerely pained and sympathetic to the plights of the tribes' forced removal and subsequent mental anguish and genuinely desired to assist, their Westernized attempts at healing American Indians' psychic pain were often in stark contrast with American Indians' traditional ways of healing.

Native American storytelling is believed to heal through the native storyteller making peace and meaning through the revealing and telling of his or her story. Here, Dia Molnar, a Navajo woman, tells the history of the Navajo nation.

Spiritual Wellness Versus Mental-Illness Approach

From the outset, well-intentioned nonnative treatment methods of healing and Native American ways of dealing with trauma were often in direct opposition. Western methods included diagnosing and treating symptoms and maladies with talk therapies and prescribed antidepressants. American Indians' ways of healing were centered primarily on herbal remedies, deep meditation, and narrative storytelling. Many American Indians were also deeply suspect and spurned Western practices and treatment as they did not want to be diagnosed altogether or were distrustful of Western medicinal therapies. Generally speaking, American Indians were more apt to rely upon each other within the tribe and trusted their own tribally distinctive indigenous methods (e.g., talking circles or healing ceremonies) to address the ailments that plagued them.

As Native Americans settled into new tribal territories, some American Indians yielded more readily to Western influences and vices such as alcohol and illicit drugs—perhaps finding temporary solace and relief from emotional pain. However, many were also soon mired in the throes of addiction, notwithstanding their pain, grief, and loss itself were both unresolved and at times intensified through self-aggression, violence toward others, and criminal acts perpetrated upon their own native peoples. Addiction and related negative consequences such as domestic violence and an increase in suicides and posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) among the Native American population were seen by some as direct evidence of intrapsychic pain unaddressed altogether or spiritually unhealed.

Storytelling Versus Talk Therapy

Western ways of healing through psychological services often include talk therapy, which typically involves an ongoing dialogue between therapist and client and is often therapist directed. The therapist leads the session by asking questions of the client, whose answers may bring follow-up questions and so forth. In contrast, Native American storytelling is narrative in nature, and it is believed to heal the afflicted through the native storyteller him- or herself making peace and meaning through the revealing and telling of their story. Traditional Western therapies were often viewed in direct contradiction to narrative storytelling. By way of generalization, many clients access traditional therapies through insurance and are bound to the counseling parameters established. Additionally, cost and accessibility issues often deter Native Americans from seeking services. Furthermore, some insurers will reimburse only for certain types of therapies; for example, cognitive behavioral therapy or solution-focused brief therapy, which often begin and conclude in six to eight weeks' duration. Thus, traditional Westernized therapeutic techniques may at times be seen in conflict with narrative storytelling because storytelling is client centered, allowing the client storyteller to reveal the story at his or her own pace and time or place so as to derive meaning, clarity, and healing from the recounting of the story.

Modern Practices to Address Group Psychological Trauma

Familial accounts and stories of relatives' forced removal and acculturation have been passed down through the generations to present-day Native American families, along with resultant residual anger, resentment, and pain and grief. In an attempt to gain a deeper understanding of the Native American experience, it is necessary for those working with Native American clients to acknowledge lived personal, familial, and collective trauma experienced. Feelings of shame, governmental distrust, and helplessness may emerge and linger as American Indian ancestors attempt to make sense of the injustices experienced by elder generations. Furthermore, practitioners should not lose sight of ongoing and continuing discrimination and cultural isolation as well as racism and societal oppression that may be ever present for Native Americans who seek psychological help. Simply put, novel methods of treatment and intervention for Native Americans as culturally different clients include utilization of Historical Trauma Theory as well as the practitioner being sensitive to and aware of the need to view each client as expert about his or her own family and culture, generationally transmitted attitudes and beliefs, and lenses from which they see and experience the world—so as to weave indigenous healing, spiritual, and storytelling methods should they be welcomed by Native American clients with whom they come into contact.

Todd Gomez
Northeastern State University

See Also: Acculturation; American Indian Movement; Cultural Competence, Model of; Ethnocentrism and Ethnorelativism; Help-Seeking Behavior, Cultural Differences in; Tribal Social Services.

Further Readings

Bassett, Deborah, Ursula Tsosie, and Sweetwater Nannauck. "'Our Culture Is Medicine': Perspectives of Native Healers on Posttrauma Recovery Among American Indian and Alaska Native Patients." Permanente Journal, v.16/1 (2012).

Coyhis, Don L. Understanding Native American Culture: Insights for Recovery Professionals and Other Wellness Practitioners, 2nd ed. Colorado Springs, CO: Coyhis Publishing, 2009.

Myhra, Laurelle, L. "'It Runs in the Family': Intergenerational Transmission of Historical Trauma Among Urban American Indians and Alaska Natives in Culturally Specific Sobriety Maintenance Programs." American Indian and Alaska Native Mental Health Research, v.18/2 (2011).

Thomason, Timothy. "Recommendations for Counseling Native Americans: Results of a Survey." Journal of Indigenous Research, v.1/2 (2011).

Whitbeck, Les B., Gary Adams, Dan R. Hoyt, and Xiaojin Chen. "Conceptualizing and Measuring Historical Trauma Among American Indian People." American Journal of Community Psychology, v.33/3–4 (2004).

Native Americans, Suicide Among

Native Americans, sometimes identified as American Indian or Alaska Natives, are a racial group that contains people having origins in any of the original peoples of North America, South America, and Central America, maintaining tribal affiliation or some level of community attachment. According to the 2010 U.S. Census, approximately 3 million people reported their sole race as Native Americans, and 2.3 million people reported their race as combined Native American and one or more other races.

These current numbers indicate a shift from the census in 2000, where 2.5 million people reported their sole race as Native American and 4.1 million people reported their race as combined Native American and one or more other races. With a combined total of approximately more than 6 million people, Native Americans make up about 2 percent of the U.S. population. There are currently 566 federally recognized Native American tribes in the United States and more than 100 state-recognized tribes. There are also active tribes that exist without any state or federal recognition. Although many perceive Native Americans as residents of remote reservations, separated from the rest of America, the majority live in urban areas; only about one-third live on reservations and tribal trust lands.

Suicide Statistics in the United States

There are more than 38,000 deaths by suicide each year, averaging about 100 per day in the United States. Within the general U.S. population, suicide is the tenth-leading cause of death. However, among Native Americans age 15 to 34 years, suicide is the second-leading cause of death. Native Americans within this age group are 2.5 times higher than the national average to commit suicide. Young Native American males have the highest rates of suicide compared to other Caucasian, African American, and Asian or Pacific Islander males of the same age group. The suicide rate among Native American adults grew 65.2 percent in the beginning of the 21st century. The rate of suicide grew overall to 18.5 percent in 2010, which is the largest increase of any racial or ethnic group in the United States.

Contributing Factors

The percentage of Native American adults living in poverty was among the largest compared with other racial or ethnic groups. Native American youth age 12 to 17 years and adults age 18 years or older had the highest prevalence of smoking compared with other racial or ethnic groups in the United States. Native American mothers had the second-highest infant death rate compared with all other mothers. Native American adults who owned or rented housing more often lived in inadequate and unhealthy housing compared with white adult householders. Diseases of the heart, malignant neoplasm, unintentional injuries, and diabetes mellitus are leading causes of deaths in Native American communities. Overall, Natives Americans who are born today have a life expectancy that is 4.1 years less than all races in the U.S. population. The overall health (physical and mental) of Native American communities has improved over the last few decades with advances in health care practices, medical advancements, and increased healthy behaviors. However, when compared to the nonminority population in the United States or with other racial and ethnic minority groups, Native Americans' health still remains poor compared to the rest of the United States population. For many health indicators, Native Americans have the poorest health and greatest health disparity of any population in the nation.

As with other populations, contributing factors that lead to suicide among Native Americans are previous suicide attempts, history of mental disorders, history of alcohol and substance abuse, family history of suicide, family history of child maltreatment, feelings of hopelessness, impulsive or aggressive tendencies, barriers to accessing mental health treatment, and loss (relational, social, work, or financial). For Native Americans, loss also includes loss of land and cultural practices. In addition, Native Americans also experience higher rates of exposure to traumatic events coupled with the overarching cultural, historical, and intergenerational traumas, which make this population more vulnerable to post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) resulting in suicide.

"Historical trauma" is the term used for the idea of the collective emotional and psychological harm over a person's life span and throughout generations. It is the result of systematic internalized oppression. Historical trauma can be experienced as a prolonged experience (as in removal or relocation), as a cumulative effect (individual or community violence), or as a personal event that continues its impact over several generations (denial of education or boarding school). Some researchers distinguish historical trauma from multigenerational trauma, which is unresolved trauma that has been passed from previous generations to the next.

Suicide Prevention and Treatment Efforts

The most effective way to generally prevent suicide is to recognize risk factors and know how to respond to warning signs. All warning signs of suicide should be taken seriously, and professional help should be sought when warning signs are present. In the United States and other countries, suicide is usually viewed as a reaction to an individual's psychological pain, such as depression.

The prevention and treatment process under this approach is to psychologically or medically intervene using traditional Western models. For instance, Western practices treat depression with psychological counseling or pharmaceuticals, trusting that such interventions will lower the risks associated with suicidal behaviors. Unfortunately, these types of interventions might have limited impact in Native American communities. Local customs and historical viewpoints may view suicide as the result of historical traumas, oppression, social injustices, or the loss of Native American sacred ways of life and living.

While there are differences of opinion regarding best suicide prevention practices within Native American communities, established practices require some kind of adaptation process prior to implementation with Native American clients. For instance, some Native American communities may view the problems of alcohol, drugs, smoking, suicide, and overall poor health as the result of their community losing their traditional, sacred ways and being forced into European lifestyles.

Using a standard medical model to treat a psychological problem rather than approaching this as a historical problem would seem an illogical best practice. Partnering with community members to better understand local worldviews and traditions paves a way to best practices when working with Native American clients. Practitioners could adapt evidence-based therapies, such as trauma-focused cognitive-based therapy, to the specific community as well as integrate traditional ways of knowing and language into their practice. Professional practices should be grounded and offered in the social context of each unique community.

David A. Patterson Silver Wolf
Amy Hertel
Shanondora Billiot
Washington University in St Louis

See Also: Alaska Natives; American Indian Movement; United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.

Further Readings

Aisenberg, E. "Evidence-Based Practice in Mental Health Care to Ethnic Minority Communities: Has Its Practice Fallen Short of Its Evidence?" Social Work, v.53/4 (2008).

Duran, E. Healing the Soul Wound: Counseling With American Indians and Other Native Peoples. New York: Teachers College Press, 2006.

Gone, J. P. "We Never Was Happy Living Like a Whiteman: Mental Health Disparities and the Postcolonial Predicament in American Indian Communities." American Journal of Community Psychology, v.40/3–4 (2007).

National Institute of Mental Health. Suicide in the U.S.: Statistics and Prevention. Bethesda, MD: National Institutes of Health, 2006.

Natural Disasters, Services for

Natural disasters occur frequently and impact significant portions of the population each year. When these disasters occur where people live, there is a human toll leading to emergency needs. Disasters often place people in a situation where they are unable to provide for their necessities, or where they have such significant needs that, without help, they are going to experience physical, emotional, or economic decline. In the United States, an impressive network of service providers has been developed to help individuals recover from, and adjust to, the losses they have experienced in disasters. There is often overlap between those who provide services after a natural disaster and those who are there to help after man-made disasters. The service needs of individuals will depend on the scope of the natural disaster and the time frame after the disaster.

The array of natural disasters is broad and can include weather-related hazards and events, wildfires, earthquakes, tsunamis, landslides, sinkholes, and nonweather floods such as from a dam break. Loss of life, physical injury, emotional injury, damage to property, and loss of income are among the kinds of losses that can result from a natural disaster. The human services provider network available to meet the needs of those impacted by natural disasters is extensive, and many parts of this network respond to the needs of individuals, depending on the response phase to the natural disaster.

The first phase is the period when there is the opportunity to save lives and deliver emergency medical care. Those often referred to as first responders are the initial human services providers on the scene of the natural disaster. The need for medical care due to injuries or from ongoing medical issues is one of the most urgent issues following a natural disaster. This may follow rescues from the midst of the disaster. Police, firefighters, and emergency medical technicians (EMTs) are the first responders often first to arrive on the scene. They assess the situation and call for the kinds of additional help needed. People might have to be plucked from flood waters or from the roof of a building partially submerged in water. Earthquakes give rise to attempts to rescue those who may be caught in rubble. If specialized rescue crews are needed, those making early assessments will call for additional help.

The images from the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina are still vividly in the minds of those who viewed the countless scenes of those being plucked from roofs or from the flood waters. Individuals had put together different kinds of calls for help on their roofs and when rescued showed how much they appreciated those who had themselves risked their lives to come and rescue them. National guard troops often respond during this phase as well. Nonemergency medical professionals also make themselves available in disaster settings. They are able to provide medical triage services and supplement the work of EMTs. All of these first responders provide service that is essential to save lives. People impacted by the disaster also begin to receive from these first responders the first emotional support that is so critical for survivors of natural disasters.

With its vast network of volunteers, partnerships, and resources, the American Red Cross (ARC) is positioned to offer almost immediate help when victims of natural disasters are present. Here, U.S. Navy, Royal Dutch, and Mexican sailors work alongside ARC personnel to hand out water, food, and relief supplies to residents in Biloxi, Mississippi, following Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

The second stage of recovery from a natural disaster can be described as disaster relief. In this phase, survivors begin to reorient themselves. Survivors will need to know that the necessities of life will be available for them. These individuals may have to travel great distances to find help, depending on how geographically widespread the disaster is and what resources are available in the vicinity. They will often need help finding a place to live. This may involve temporary shelters. Food will be an issue. It is in this phase of recovery that the human services provider network begins to exhibit its strength.

When the term natural disaster comes up, we often think immediately of the role of the American Red Cross (ARC). With its vast network of volunteers, partnerships, and resources, the ARC is positioned to offer almost immediate help when victims of natural disasters are present. This organization is known for setting up temporary shelters to aid those who have permanently or temporarily lost their homes. The ARC has preexisting agreements with many organizations that have buildings capable of housing people. The Red Cross is able to go into these buildings and set up shelters when there is a need. These shelters become avenues for a vast array of services available to survivors of natural disasters. In addition to a place to sleep, food is provided. The ARC also has agreements with organizations like Southern Baptist Disaster Relief to provide meals for its shelters and for distribution in disaster settings. Red Cross emergency response vehicles (ERVs) deliver meals into areas where people may still be in their homes but are left with no way to prepare food.

ARC shelters, as well as other kinds of shelters, also provide emotional support for survivors. Trained counselors and social workers are made available to help those who have faced the trauma of a natural disaster. These trained professionals are able to engage those who may be experiencing grief, post traumatic stress, and other emotional issues. In addition to professionals, ARC volunteers are often trained to be able to give basic emotional support. This is important because there may not be enough professional counselors available. Referral services are made available to those staying at these shelters. Information is made available so that people know where they can go to apply for food stamps, help from the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), and other assistance.

Hundreds of religious and nonprofit organizations around the country will make their presence known in the wake of natural disasters. These groups provide a wide variety of service to individuals and families. Among the help provided is food distribution, cutting and removal of downed trees, removal of mud and ruined household items from homes, emotional and religious support, assessment of damaged homes, and child care for residents who may need help with their children in a disaster setting.

After the initial rescue phase and when the immediate necessities of life have been arranged, individuals are ready to begin the recovery phase. During this phase, people begin to make decisions about how they will put their lives back together. One of the major concerns is the necessity for permanent housing, but there are other important issues as well. Many organizations will provide case management services to individuals and families. Case managers are trained to help people address the issues they face and to be able to find resources that may help them deal with these issues. This may mean referral for counseling, government benefits, volunteer help, or a myriad of other kinds of aid. Some organizations specialize in rebuilding homes. Some of these rebuilding entities provide the volunteer labor and some provide materials and labor. Case managers help survivors find the help they need.

Those offering services must be sensitive to the culture of those in need of help after a natural disaster. Care should be taken to respect the sensibilities that may characterize a group impacted. In addition to providing language-appropriate guidance, helpers should familiarize themselves with cultural norms, taboos, and food traditions.

Ken B. Taylor
New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary

See Also: Case Management Services; Childhood Trauma; Crisis Services; Displaced Persons; Information and Referral; Legal Services; Temporary Aid to Needy Families; Trauma-Focused Services.

Further Readings

Bergeron, J. David, et al. First Responder, 8th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 2008.

Crutchfield, Melissa. "Phases of Disaster Recovery: Emergency Response for the Long Term." http://reliefweb.int/report/world/phases-disaster-recovery-emergency-response-long-term (Accessed March 2014).

Dill, Ann P. Managing to Care: Case Management and Service System Reform. New York: Aldine de Gruyter, 2001.

Godschalk, David, et al. Natural Hazard Mitigation: Recasting Disaster Policy and Planning. Washington, DC: Island Press, 1998.

Naturalized Citizens

The United States is a nation of immigrants. As a result of the immigration reforms since 1965, immigration to the United States has continued to rise. According to the U.S. Bureau of the Census, the foreign-born population in 2010 stood at nearly 40 million or accounted for 13 percent of the total U.S. population. About 83 percent of the foreign born hailed from Latin America and Asia. The majority (roughly 56 percent) of the foreign-born had not become U.S. citizens at that time. Over time, most immigrants will go through the naturalization process to become naturalized citizens. The decision of immigrants on naturalization can have significant impact on their lives, their family members, their communities, and society as a whole. This entry defines naturalized citizens, outlines requirements for naturalization, discusses the benefits and costs of naturalization, and highlights the determinants of naturalization. The information provided here could be very useful for those who plan to become a naturalized citizen and anyone who wants to understand the naturalization process. The emphasis is on the United States, but with some modifications, the information may be pertinent to some other nations as well.

Who Are Naturalized Citizens?

There are two ways to become citizens of a nation: by birth or through naturalization. In the United States, one can automatically acquire U.S. citizenship by birth within the jurisdiction of the United States or in the territories or outlying possessions of the United States, including Puerto Rico, the Panama Canal Zone or Republic of Panama, the U.S. Virgin Islands, and Guam. This is referred to as birthright citizenship. Birthright citizenship can be acquired by jus soli (i.e., born in the United States) or jus sanguinis (i.e., born to one or both parents who are American citizens on foreign soil).

One can also become a citizen of a country via naturalization. Naturalization is the process through which a foreign citizen or national acquires the citizenship of a host country. Thus, naturalized citizens are citizens who were born in foreign countries but acquire the citizenship and nationality of the host country through the process of naturalization.

Requirements for Naturalization

Certain conditions must be met before immigrants can become citizens of a host society. In the United States, there are five general requirements for naturalization. One is the age requirement. Naturalization law generally requires an immigrant to be 18 years of age or older. However, minor children of naturalized U.S. citizens can derive U.S. citizenship through their parents. Another is the residence requirement. Normally, a permanent resident must have resided continuously in the United States for at least five years after admission to permanent resident status in order to be eligible for naturalization. Out of the five years, the applicant must be physically present in the United States for at least 30 months. The length of continuous residence can be shortened to three years for a spouse of a U.S. citizen. The periods of residence and physical presence may not apply to military members and certain military family members.

The third general requirement is good moral character or character that measures up to the standards of average citizens of the community in which the naturalization applicant resides. The English and civics requirement is another requirement. In general, the applicant must be able to read, write, speak, and understand English and have knowledge and an understanding of U.S. history and government. Finally, the attachment to the U.S. Constitution requirement requires an applicant to attach to the principles of the U.S. Constitution and be well disposed to the good order and happiness of the United States during all relevant periods under the law.

Benefits and Costs of Naturalization

Citizenship grants immigrants certain political, civic, and social rights and privileges to which permanent residents are not entitled. One of the most important privileges of citizens is political rights, namely, the rights to vote and run for public office. Only U.S. citizens are able to vote in all elections and therefore to influence political decisions and outcomes at the national, state, and local levels, which may have bearings on their lives. As naturalized citizens, immigrants can run for any public office except that of president and vice president.

It is a widely held belief that many immigrants primarily pursue naturalization not for political rights but for immigration benefits accompanying U.S. citizenship—easier and faster immigration of their relatives to the United States. Under the U.S. immigration system operating from 1965 to 1991 and the current immigration system created by the Immigration Act of 1990, permanent residents can only sponsor their spouses and unmarried children as immigrants within a numerically limited category (the second preference or the second preference of family-sponsored immigrants). On the other hand, citizens can sponsor not only their immediate relatives with no numerical restriction but also their unmarried or married adult children and their siblings. The earlier the immigrants become citizens, the shorter the waiting time for their relatives to immigrate.

A third significant advantage of acquiring U.S. citizenship is the qualification for a U.S. passport. A U.S. passport is often considered the most desirable to possess. It confers U.S. citizens worldwide protection of the United States, and it makes travel abroad easier. For immigrants who want to travel abroad, U.S. citizenship is certainly attractive.

Access to broader life opportunities is another naturalization benefit. Although citizens and permanent residents now enjoy similar opportunities in employment and education, certain restrictions do apply to noncitizens. For instance, certain government jobs (e.g., some jobs in federal government agencies, bureaus, think tanks, and many public safety positions with state and local governments) and certain private sector jobs, such as defense contractors, require U.S. citizenship. As a result of the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996, most legal immigrants are no longer eligible for publicly funded services such as Medicaid for the first five years of residence, supplemental security income, and food stamps, but U.S. citizens can still enjoy those benefits of welfare assistance. Noncitizens who retire abroad are denied full Social Security benefits. Some educational opportunities, loans, and fellowships (e.g., Rhodes Scholarships, Fulbright Graduate Study Abroad Program and Fulbright Teacher Exchange Program, White House Fellowship Program, all National Science Foundation Fellowships, and all Ford Foundation Fellowships) also require citizenship. Naturalization qualifies immigrants for those jobs, programs, and fellowships for which citizenship is a prerequisite. It offers immigrants important avenues of economic and social mobility.

There are other kinds of convenience provided by citizenship. For example, immigrants will no longer have to carry their alien registration cards or notify the United States Citizen and Immigration Services (USCIS) of their addresses. Citizens can also participate in a jury. It should be noted that, while the value of citizenship in political rights, immigration benefits, and international travel has remained stable over the past several decades, the specific marginal value of citizenship in the sphere of civic and social rights has changed over time.

Citizenship also entails costs. These costs include at least four types: (1) increased citizen obligations in the host country, which, in addition to universal obligations of all residents such as paying taxes and obeying laws, include the responsibilities to participate in the political process, to uphold the Constitution, to serve in the military if necessary, and to remain loyal to their adopted country during wartime; (2) lost or reduced political, civic, and social rights previously enjoyed as nationals in the country of origin; (3) voluntary renunciation of their former nationality and of allegiance to their native land through oath, which in some sense can be considered as a psychological cost; and (4) the actual input in a long, complicated application process. As mentioned earlier, to obtain U.S. citizenship, a minimum of five years of continuous residence in the United States is required, and applicants must also have resided for six months in the state where they file their petitions. Once the residence requirements are met, applicants have to file their applications; do fingerprinting; go through an interview in order to meet the language, civic, and other requirements; and attend a ceremony. Applicants are also charged a fee. Some immigrants do not bother to apply for citizenship because they either find the naturalization procedures too complex or are afraid of the examination.

Once the residence requirements are met, applicants have to file their applications; do fingerprinting; go through an interview in order to meet the language, civic, and other requirements; and attend a ceremony. Candidates for U.S. citizenship recite the oath of citizenship during a naturalization ceremony at Naval Air Station, Sigonella, Sicily, Italy.

Determinants of Naturalization

Why do immigrants become naturalized citizens of the host country? Or what factors determine or explain immigrant naturalization? Built on previous works, in 1994 Philip Yang put forward a comprehensive framework called contextual perspective, which incorporates immigrants' individual characteristics and larger social contexts in the country of origin and the country of destination to explain the likelihood of citizenship acquisition. A number of hypotheses derived from this framework were proposed for testing. Specifically, poorer economic conditions and lower standards of living in the home country, tighter political control in the home country, an origin from a refugee-sending country, cultural similarity between the home and host country (e.g., use of the same language, common history, or similar traditions), and recognition of dual citizenship by the country of origin encourage immigrants to take root and become naturalized citizens of the host country, while proximity of the home country to the host country reduces the likelihood of naturalization.

A larger immigrant community from the same country of origin and greater urban concentration of an immigrant population in the country of destination also facilitate the naturalization of immigrants. The better the immigrants' cultural and economic adaptation to the host society, the more likely the immigrants are to naturalize. In addition, several demographic variables such as age at immigration, gender, marital status, presence of minor children, and service in the U.S. Armed Forces also influence the likelihood of naturalization.

The framework and hypotheses were tested for a cohort of immigrants using the Public Use Microdata Sample data from the 1980 U.S. Census with appended records of the countries of origin. The results show that economic, political, social, cultural, and geographical conditions in the country of origin, and immigrants' ethnic communities and urban concentration in the country of destination, to a large extent influence immigrants' propensity for naturalization and that, net of the contextual factors, many of the immigrants' adaptation and demographic characteristics are also significant predictors of citizenship acquisition. Notwithstanding some refinements later, Yang's analytical framework has remained to this date the most influential model that predicts immigrant citizenship acquisition.

Philip Q. Yang
Texas Woman's University

See Also: Immigrant Population, Human Service Needs of; Immigration Law, History of U.S.; Immigration, Human Services Issues; U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

Further Readings

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. http://www.uscis.gov/portal/site/uscis (Accessed September 2013).

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. "USCIS Policy Manual, Volume 12, Citizenship and Naturalization Guidance." http://www.uscis.gov/policymanual/HTML/PolicyManual-Volume12.html (Accessed September 2013).

Yang, Philip. "Explaining Immigrant Naturalization." International Migration Review, v.28 (1994).

Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation

The Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation (NRC) is affiliated with the National Housing System (NHS) and was established by Congress in 1978 to carry out the work of the Urban Reinvestment Taskforce. The organization focuses on promoting reinvestment in older neighborhoods by working with financial institutions, residents of the community, and the local government.

However, this initiative by Congress was not a new one but can be traced back to a campaign by residents for better housing in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania's, Central North Side neighborhood. NeighborWorks, an affiliation of NRC, was created when the Ad Council joined with Neighborhood Reinvestment to build a new face for NHS. Today, NRC works in conjunction with NeighborWorks to revitalize communities through residential leadership initiatives that focus on organizing communities, strengthening neighborhood associations, developing resident leaders, and building capacity in communities. It targets not only populations of need such as first-time homeowners and minorities and low-income households, but also geographic areas of need. Private investments, practitioner training and innovation, and homeownership creation are trademarks of NRC.

History and Development

The groundwork for NRC began in 1968 and is tied to the work of Dorothy Mae Richardson, a community activist who worked with her block club to improve her neighborhood. Their efforts garnered revolving loans from financial institutions and resulted in the birth of the NHS. The Federal Home Loan Bank (FHLB) also provided training to savings-and-loan officers across the country and evolved into workshops for the starting of other neighborhood housing services organizations.

The Development of NHS can also be linked to President Richard Nixon and the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). In order to soften an impending moratorium on federal housing programs, an agreement was made with FHLB to expand NeighborWorks in the United States. This initiative was coordinated by a specially created Urban Reinvestment Taskforce; funding and staff were provided by HUD and FLHB, respectively. Later, the partnership was expanded to include the Federal Reserve, the Comptroller of Currency, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC). However, despite combined efforts of these agencies, the network's effectiveness and further expansion was threatened by limited access to funding. This triggered the enactment of the Community Development Block Grant (CDGB) by Congress.

Home Ownership Creation: Private Investment and Practitioner Training

In the early years, much of the work of NRC was centered on perfecting core services for owner-occupied housing in the initially targeted neighborhood. This included helping residents with referrals to reputable contractors, with follow-up inspections to assure work quality; providing counseling and assistance in work-related financing; and referrals to participating financial institutions for credit-worthy clients. Local organizations were forced to reorganize their strategies through expansions in other neighborhoods and through adaptation of new programs. For example, NRC staff worked to promote home ownership and revitalize apartment buildings and shopping areas that were run down. They also provided training in home construction for youths without jobs. NRC was beginning to look like a formidable organization with long-term goals that focused on neighborhoods in need.

However, in the 1980s, the network organizations were threatened by inflation and a sharp decline in state and federal resources. Fewer residents were able to participate in banking, loan funds were exhausted, and even raising operating funds became a challenge. This led to the incorporation of private investment, practitioner training, and other innovative measures. For example, NRC partnered with selected insurance companies, testing out new insurance products and marketing strategies and securing millions of dollars to expand lending through the network. Local organizations garnered public support in areas such as major in-fill housing and owner-built homes. The organization's efforts did not go unnoticed; in 1984, they were recognized as a part of a national network in the first Congressional proclaimed NeighborWorks week.

In an effort to stay afloat, some local organizations looked at the practicality of adapting the European concept of mutual housing to American neighborhoods. Mutual housing is a variation of the cooperative housing model. It provides reliable affordable housing for a community's long-term renters. Single-room occupancy and transitional housing projects were also used to help ease the problem of the country's growing homeless population. Training institutes provided professional training opportunities and helped executive directors, board members, and key staff members to keep abreast of the challenges of revitalizing neighborhoods. Another aspect of achievement was the network organization confirming its financial stability as it partnered with residents, government officials, and businesses. NRC also attracts investments from national financial partners. In order to harness the investment, NRC developed new strategies in areas such as homeownership, asset management, community organizing, resident leadership, and access to affordable financing and insurance products. NRC is also responsible for the launching of RNA Community Builders, Inc., an alliance of NeighborWorks organizations. These corporations focus on identifying creative ways of addressing rural housing concerns, with special attention being given to garnering resources for rural development.

In the 1990s, NeighborWorks launched a campaign for homeownership, a need that is evident in high poverty areas. This venture grew to evolve into a network of organizations assisting thousands of families into homeownership and attracting more than a billion dollars in total investments. Strategies focusing on full-cycle lending, a comprehensive system of pre- and post-purchase buyer education and flexible financing products, were developed. Customers were also offered services and training in regards to locating, purchasing, rehabilitating, insuring, and maintaining a home. While the NeighborWorks system is viewed as an innovative and effective force in revitalizing America's urban, suburban, and rural communities, it is believed that it lacks measures that focus on changes or outcomes in the lives of those it assists.

Nelseta Walters
University of Maryland Eastern Shore

See Also: Community Development Block Grants; Fair Lending Practices; Neighborhood Watch Programs; Primacy of Place.

Further Readings

Hara, Sabine U. "Community Based Development: A Strategy for Improving Social Sustainability."

International Journal of Social Economics, v.26 (1999).

Jefferson, Asia, and Carolyn M. Brown. "Revitalizing Urban Neighborhoods." Black Enterprise, v.34/11 (2004).

NeighborWorks America. http://www.nw.org/network/aboutUs/history/default.asp (Accessed December 2013).

Neighborhood Watch Programs

In 1972, the National Sheriff's Association started the Neighborhood Watch program to promote citizen involvement in preventing crime in their respective neighborhoods. Although a similar Town Watch program was active when night watchmen patrolled the streets during the Colonial period, the concept was revitalized in the late 1960s in response to an increase in reported burglaries in suburban communities and rural areas of America.

Initially, the program focused on educating people about how to secure their homes to make them less vulnerable to burglary. In the coming years, the scope of the program grew to include engaging and empowering citizens to report suspicious or criminal activity to law enforcement as a way to prevent crimes. As a volunteer neighborhood organization, Neighborhood Watch encouraged communication with neighbors and law enforcement to prevent crime and to increase community safety but discouraged direct confrontation or action against a person thought to be committing a crime. Today, volunteers are still instructed not to directly intervene to stop criminal activity but to immediately call the local law enforcement agency and report their concerns.

In 2002, when USAonWatch was established by President George W. Bush, it resulted in the further expansion of Neighborhood Watch programs to one that supported Homeland Security endeavors to detect and prevent acts of terrorism. Three years later, after a series of devastating hurricanes struck the Gulf Coast in 2005, the program again grew to include emergency response and disaster preparedness activities. The success of these local ventures has resulted in an increase in the number of Neighborhood Watch programs nationwide. At present, there are a number of watch initiatives, such as business watch, crime watch, and block watch, that are recognized by USAonWatch and considered integral in preparing communities to use an all-hazards approach in preparing for all types of human-made and natural disasters.

Starting a Neighborhood Watch Program

Neighborhood Watch programs are typically started by people who are interested in improving or maintaining the safety and security of their neighborhood. Initial meetings usually include educating people about the mission of watch programs; prioritizing issues of concern; describing possible activities; identifying the geographical reach of the designated watch area, such as a residential subdivision, an apartment complex, or homes governed by a homeowners association; and developing a telephone calling tree and e-mail contact list. These methods of contact are used to enhance and expedite communication among watch members and law enforcement. To provide program support and begin an ongoing dialogue, a local law enforcement officer is assigned to serve as a liaison to the group.

Structure of Neighborhood Watch Programs

Most law enforcement agencies have a sworn officer who is designated as a crime prevention officer. The role of the crime prevention officer liaison is to facilitate the education process, assist in watch program organizational efforts, and work closely with the watch coordinator and block captains. The watch coordinator is responsible for ongoing communication with the law enforcement liaison and keeps the block captains of the group advised of new information pertaining to neighborhood crime, safety, and quality of life.

Block captains assume responsibility for interacting with the neighbors on their respective streets, blocks, or buildings. They provide information and organize meetings with the block residents to address concerns, implement watch activities, and set up a telephone, e-mail or personal chain of contact for use in an emergency to keep people informed of critical information in a timely manner.

Block watchers work closely with captains to maintain up-to-date contact information for residents and to foster involvement of block residents in the Neighborhood Watch program. Leadership teams that are comprised of active watch coordinators, block captains, and block watchers are necessary for initiating and sustaining successful Neighborhood Watch programs.

Neighborhood Watch Program Activities

All citizens are encouraged to establish or join a local Neighborhood Watch program. In partnership with local law enforcement, programs are formed with the goal of increasing the safety and security of home and community. The diverse activities carried out by watch groups vary significantly from neighborhood to neighborhood. For example, a rural community located in a flood zone may elect to focus on disaster preparation and response as well as home safety, while an urban program might work to educate residents about common crimes and empower residents to take appropriate action. Neighborhood Watch activities are selected that reflect the desires of the participants and the needs of the community.

Many states have statutes in place to protect citizens who participate in Neighborhood Watch programs. Neighborhood Watch volunteers do not have police powers; any action on their part is considered an act of a private citizen, and the appropriate state laws apply to their actions. The local law enforcement liaison covers the types of protection offered by the state and describes appropriate responses to suspicious or criminal activity. Suspicious activity is anything that appears abnormal or uncommon to the neighborhood. This may include illegal activities, unusual persons or vehicles, or dangerous incidents.

An emphasis of the Neighborhood Watch program is to increase interaction between neighbors as a way to keep property and communities safe and secure. Effective Neighborhood Watch programs are valuable allies for local law enforcement agencies in preventing crime. Most agencies have limited resources that make it impossible to have a constant physical presence in all neighborhoods. Neighborhood Watch programs provide eyes, ears,

Community members review information about the Citizens Corps Neighborhood Watch program after a community meeting. All citizens are encouraged to establish or join a local Neighborhood Watch program. In partnership with local law enforcement, programs are formed with the goal of increasing the safety and security of home and community.

and boots on the ground by the people who know the neighborhood best.

Over the years, Neighborhood Watch programs have developed into an effective, proactive crime prevention tool for communities of all types. In recent years, activities have expanded to include an all-hazards approach for preparing and responding to natural and human-made disasters. The program provides guidance for people who want to work with neighbors, law enforcement, and other community organizations to plan and implement a range of activities that enhance the safety, security, and quality of their neighborhoods and communities.

Lisa M. Brown
University of South Florida
Ben R. Patty, Jr.
Security Consultant

See Also: Abduction; AMBER Alert; Community Organizing; Gangs: Social Issues and Intervention; Homelessness: Interpersonal Violence; Natural Disasters, Service for; Volunteer Services.

Further Readings

Bartels, Elizabeth C. Volunteer Police in the United States: Programs, Challenges, and Legal Aspects. New York: Springer, 2013.

Neighborhood Watch Program—National Sheriff's Association. "About Neighborhood Watch." http://www.usaonwatch.org/about/neighborhoodwatch.aspx (Accessed November 2013).

USAonWatch—National Neighborhood Watch Program. "Neighborhood Watch Manual." https://www.bja.gov/Publications/NSA_NW_Manual.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

NeighborWorks America

The primary goal of NeighborWorks America is safe, affordable housing for low-income people. The organization works to create sustainable community development that fosters healthy environments for children and families. Through the organizational motto, "Working Together for Strong Communities," NeighborWorks America conveys its team-oriented, community-based orientation. Toward its goal of safe, healthy, sustainable communities, NeighborWorks America offers several forms of assistance, including financial, educational and training, and technical.

NeighborWorks America sponsors a diverse set of national programs, each of which seeks to develop and strengthen the nation's communities. These national programs assist affiliates with shared resources useful in community development.

The national network of affiliates includes more than 200 entities and provides assistance to more than 4,000 communities. Approximately two-thirds of these communities are urban, and the other one-third are rural. Examples of national programs include HomeOwnership, Real Estate, Awards, Center for Foreclosure Solutions, Center for Homeownership Education and Counseling, Community Building and Organizing, Green Organization, Financial Capacity, and Stable Communities, among others.

Because NeighborWorks America and its affiliates in the NeighborWorks network are interested in providing assistance to struggling communities, there also is keen interest in federal and state policy making, especially policies related to housing and community revitalization. The organization's Public Policy and Legislative Affairs Division handles communication with governmental bodies and offices and collaborates with partner organizations advancing similar goals.

Organizational History

NeighborWorks was born from activist efforts. In 1968, Dorothy Mae Richardson led a campaign to improve housing in her neighborhood, the Central North Side of Pittsburgh. With the assistance of local bankers and government officials, Richardson secured commitments from several financial institutions to approve conventional loans for housing in the neighborhood. Resulting from these efforts was an organization named Neighborhood Housing Services (NHS).

Shortly thereafter in 1970, the accomplishments of NHS were noted by the Federal Home Loan Bank (FHLB) as good examples and potential training models for loan officers lending to older neighborhoods in urban areas. As FHLB training expanded, the approach increasingly relied on NHS tenets, with the focus shifting to creation of other NHS entities. Thus, within a relatively short period of time, this Pittsburgh model had become nationwide for community-centered housing development.

In 1978, Congress established the Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation (NRC), charging it with the goal of expanding the NHS's work in urban communities across the nation. Key priorities were to assist with reinvestment in older communities through partnerships among public, community, and private groups. The focus expanded beyond one-family housing to include multiple-party dwelling and retail shops and beyond urban areas to rural communities. This expansion necessitated the creation of new programming as well. For example, educational and training programs were developed on responsible home ownership and home building.

The 1980s presented considerable challenges to the NRC. Inflation and funding cutbacks called for new innovations in order to continue work toward organizational goals. Public support was gleaned through several high-profile projects, such as neighbors voluntarily painting in neighborhoods and owners' building homes as well as the first congressionally created Neighborhood Housing Services Week, which is now called NeighborWorks Week. Additionally, NRC provided assistance to homeless individuals through transitional housing and single-room arrangements. During this period, the entity also was rebranded as NeighborWorks.

The 1990s held many changes for the organization and its affiliates. New strategic initiatives, underwritten by several financial partners, focused on owning homes, managing resources, procuring affordable financing, and leading and organizing within communities. For example, educational and training programs on home purchasing and maintenance, coupled with affordable financial packaging, were developed. Two of these programs, Full-Cycle Lending and NeighborWorks HomeOwnership Centers, received acclaim as model programs incorporating several best practices. By the end of the decade, direct investment into targeted neighborhoods and distressed communities reached $1 billion, a reinvestment milestone.

In the new century, the NeighborWorks focus has been on capacity development throughout the network of interlinked organizations and their sites and on overall community development. To address the foreclosure crisis, the NeighborWorks Center for Foreclosure Solutions was created. This center takes a multipronged approach to foreclosure solutions and involves multiagency collaborations, including involvement from nonprofits, governmental organizations, and financial institutions. Based on its successes, NeighborWorks America was selected to manage the National Foreclosure Mitigation Counseling program. Further, the Emergency Homeowners' Loan Program, with $1 billion in funding, is coordinated through collaborative efforts between the organization and the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). Although the official organizational name is still the NRC, NeighborWorks America has become the name typically employed.

The growth from a grassroots effort in one area within a city to a nationwide network of sites and a history of successful programming characterizes the success of the organization. Now more than 35 years old, NeighborWorks America has made positive strides in many communities across the nation.

Structure and Oversight

NeighborWorks America is headquartered in Washington, D.C., overseen by a board of directors, and managed by several officers. Board members, as specified by statute, hold key positions in several financial agencies as well as HUD. Organizational funding comes from corporations, private entities, and the government.

Joy L. Hart
University of Louisville

See Also: Economic Support and Services; Home and Community Services; Homelessness; Housing Services; Housing Support and Homeless Services; Low-Income Housing Tax Credits; Supported Housing.

Further Readings

Hecht, Ben L. Developing Affordable Housing: A Practical Guide for Nonprofit Organizations (3rd ed.). Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley and Sons, 2006.

Jefferson, Aisha, and Carolyn M. Brown. "Revitalizing Urban Neighborhoods." Black Enterprise, v.34 (2004).

Mueller, Elizabeth, and Rosie Tighe, eds. The Affordable Housing Reader. New York: Routledge, 2012.

NeighborWorks America. “History of NeighborWorks America and the NeighborWorks Network.” http://nw.org/network/aboutUs/history/default.asp (Accessed October 2013).
NeighborWorks America. “Home.” http://nw.org/network/ (Accessed October 2013).

Neonatal Care

Newborn babies in need of intensive medical care are treated in neonatal intensive care units (NICUs), where trained doctors and nurses have access to specialized, advanced technology. NICUs are usually directed by a small number of neurologists and staffed by resident physicians, nurses, nurse practitioners, respiratory therapists, pharmacists, physician assistants, and medical social workers. Together, these health care professionals provide intermediate or continuing care for babies who require specialized nursing as well as counsel and support for parents. Hospitals without NICUs must transfer critical patients to hospitals better equipped to care for premature or sick infants. Babies admitted to NICUs are born prematurely, before 37 weeks of pregnancy, have low birth weight (5.5 pounds or less), or have a medical condition requiring special care. Approximately 13 percent of U.S.-born babies are preterm, many of whom have low birth weights. Multiples (e.g., twins or triplets) are often admitted to NICUs because they tend to be smaller than single birth babies.

History of Neonatal Care

Treating preterm or ill babies was a point of interest as early as the 17th and 18th centuries, when scholarly papers were published, attempting to share interventions. Prior to the industrial revolution, premature or sick babies were born and cared for at home, living or dying without medical intervention. The infant incubator was first developed in the mid-19th century by Stéphane Tarnier (1828–97) as a way to keep premature infants in Paris warm in the maternity ward. Other methods were used before; however, the incubator was the first closed model; Dr. Tarnier also advocated this treatment to other physicians. The modern incubator is designed to measure temperature, respiration, cardiac function, oxygenation, and brain activity. It protects infants from cold temperatures, infection, noise, drafts, and excess handling. It also provides nutrition through an intravenous catheter, or NG tube, and is a way of administering medicine.

France became an early forerunner in assisting premature infants as a result of concern about falling birth rates. Pierre Budin followed in Dr. Tarnier’s footsteps but noted the importance of breast milk and mother’s attachment. Dr. Budin is known as the father of modern perintology—the branch of obstetrics that focuses on maternal–fetal medicine. Budin’s The Nursing was the first major publication on neonatal care. Hospitals started grouping newborns into one area in 1922. The first intensive care unit for neonates was established at Vanderbilt University in 1961. Professor Mildred Stahlman was the first to use a ventilator to assist a baby with breathing problems. By the 1970s, NICUs were part of hospitals in the industrialized world. Technological monitoring and therapy increased as babies were born in hospitals more often than at home. Moving a baby from home to the NICU in an emergency was nearly over, though babies still were moved in an incubator occasionally.

A respiratory therapist takes a blood sample from a 3-day-old infant. Newborn babies in need of intensive medical care are treated in neonatal intensive care units, where trained doctors and nurses have access to specialized, advanced technology.

Reasons for Neonatal Care

New techniques and instruments assisted careful nursing for preterm or ill newborn babies. Not unlike adult intensive-care units, monitoring and life support are part of neonatal treatment, and adjustments are made for tiny and immature bodies. Smaller ventilators were created that would not damage babies' lungs, requiring gentler techniques and smaller pressure changes. Despite these new ways of treating and saving low-birth-weight babies, premature labor remains a key issue that has yet to be resolved.

Common diseases requiring NICU treatment include perinatal asphyxia, major birth defects, sepsis, jaundice, and infant respiratory distress syndrome; the most common cause of NICU death is necrotizing enterocolitis. Infants spend anywhere from a day to several months in neonatal units. While units are designed to bring infants around to health, the environment can be challenging due to continual light, high levels of noise, separation from the mother, reduced physical contact, procedures that are frequent or painful, and interference with breast-feeding. Having a child in the NICU is also extremely stressful for parents, particularly because, while birth problems might be resolved, an infant can still suffer severe brain damage or have long-lasting health problems.

There are three levels of neonatal care in the United States. Level 1, the well-newborn nursery, where basic care is administered, has the capacity to provide neonatal resuscitation at every delivery, evaluates and stabilizes infants born at 35 to 37 weeks' gestation and are physiologically stable, and stabilizes infants born at 35 weeks' gestation until transferred to the appropriate level of neonatal care. Level 2A resuscitates and stabilizes preterm or ill infants, including continuous positive airway pressure for infants born at 32 weeks suffering from physiologic immaturity, inability to maintain body temperature, or inability to take oral feedings. Level 2B builds on 2A and can provide mechanical ventilation for 24 hours or continuous positive airway pressure. Level 3A, the advanced specialty unit, provides comprehensive care for infants born at 28 weeks, sustains life support, and performs minor surgical procedures such as placement of a central venous catheter. Level 3B provides advanced respiratory support, advanced imaging with urgent interpretation, pediatric surgical specialists, and pediatric anesthesiologists on site for major surgery. Level 3C is located with an institution that provides extracorporeal membrane oxygenation (ECMO) and surgical repair of complex lung and heart problems. At any level, neonatal care is important to the welfare of babies who otherwise would not survive, in addition to prenatal care of mothers, all of whom are vulnerable despite ethnicity, class, religious affiliation, or ability.

Neonatal Care and Community Health Centers

Community health centers (CHCs), which provide accessible, affordable, comprehensive health care services to those who are medically underserved, provide pre- and postnatal care. Prevalent in the United States since the 1960s, CHCs are a safe haven for marginalized populations in both urban and rural areas. Their mission is to increase access for care within communities and to serve vulnerable populations, including women and children of marginalized racial, ethnic, and socioeconomic groups. These groups, funded by the government if they adhere to particular community requirements, also provide enabling services such as case management, transportation, health education, translation, and child care. These services, primarily for racial and ethnic minorities, low-income families, and uninsured or Medicaid-enrolled patients, are vital to continuing care to mothers and newborns who are vulnerable and marginalized.

CHCs providing translation services for non-English speakers and health care professionals knowledgeable about cultural perspectives on breast-feeding, childbirth, and child rearing, for example, greatly contribute to culturally competent care. About 60 percent of mothers in CHCs receive first-trimester prenatal care, while more than 70 percent receive postpartum and newborn care. At the turn of the 21st century, Asian mothers were most likely to receive both postpartum (81.7 percent) and newborn (80.3 percent) care; Latinas (75 percent and 76.3 percent, respectively), blacks (70.8 percent and 69.6 percent, respectively), and whites (70.7 percent and 66.7 percent, respectively) followed. African American newborns had higher rates of low birth weight (10.4 percent), though the disparity between blacks and whites was smaller in CHCs (3.3 percent) as compared to national disparities for low-income mothers (5.8 percent). Such racial and ethnic disparities in certain prenatal and birth outcomes were lower in CHCs despite patients' high-risk status. Within CHCs, first-trimester prenatal care increases could lead to greater improvement overall in birth outcomes for minority groups.

Cultural Diversity and Neonatal Care

Cultural competence in neonatal care is vital to the health and continued well-being of premature babies and postpartum mothers. Research underscores the importance of attending to needs of culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) mothers. Swedish researchers reported increased rates of prenatal mortality among women giving birth at Swedish hospitals who were born outside Sweden compared with Swedish-born women. Among women born outside Sweden, sub-Saharan Africans had significantly increased frequency of adverse prenatal, neonatal, and postnatal outcomes.

CALD parameters—including birth nation, ethnicity, refugee status, primary language spoken, and need for an interpreter—can impact health and obstetric or neonatal outcomes. Researchers in Australia report that, because women belonging to CALD groups often have lower incomes and less-established social networks, and due to language, cultural transportation, other barriers, and less ability or willingness to seek health care or understand advice, their health and pregnancy outcomes can be negatively impacted.

The importance of breast-feeding promotion for CALD mothers in neonatal care units has also been researched. A UK study highlighted close, continuing, skin-to-skin contact between mother and infant, effective breast milk expression, peer support in the NICU and community, and staff training. Researchers argue breast-feeding in neonatal units must be included in public health surveillance and policy development. The United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) UK Baby Friendly Initiative standards for neonatal units encourage best practices for breast-feeding and relationship building when babies are preterm or ill in NCIUs. Mothers giving birth in UK hospitals where Baby Friendly policies are fully implemented are more likely to initiate breast-feeding and to continue to breast-feed exclusively at 4 weeks of age, compared to mothers in other hospitals. The impact of breast-feeding promotion is stronger for less-educated and more economically disadvantaged mothers.

Organizations such as the Association of Women's Health, Obstetric, and Neonatal Nurses (AWHONN) underscore the need for culturally and ethnically diverse neonatal care. AWHONN and others acknowledge the serious detriments that can result from disparities in neonatal care. Not recognizing the importance of health care equality leads to prolonged and unnecessary inequality within the health care system that can be perceived as racist, ethnocentric, classist, or sexist.

Privilege for members of culturally and socioeconomically dominant groups could be more likely to be given prompt and comprehensive prenatal care because of their socioeconomic status and the health care that privilege affords them. It is important that culturally and linguistically diverse mothers and their newborns are given care by health care professionals who understand and respect their values and beliefs.

Stephanie Salerno
Lara Lengel
Bowling Green State University

See Also: Early Childhood Development; Fetal Alcohol Syndrome and Drug-Exposed Infants; Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey; Immunization Campaigns; Infant Mortality/Sudden Infant Death Syndrome; Infant/Toddler Development; KIDS COUNT; Maternal/Infant Health Services; Maternity Homes; Midwifery; National Center for Children in Poverty; Parenting Skills Training; Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in; Postpartum Depression; Pregnancy and Parenting Services; Prenatal Care; Women, Minorities.

Further Readings

Burns, M. D., et al. "Increasing Prevalence of Medically Complex Children in U.S. Hospitals." Pediatrics, v.126 (2010).

Chapman, Donna, and Rafael Pérez-Escamilla. "Acculturative Type Is Associated With Breastfeeding Duration Among Low-Income Latinas." Maternal and Child Nutrition, v.9 (2013).

Lawn, Joy, et al. "Born Too Soon: Accelerating Actions for Prevention and Care of 15 Million Newborns Born Too Soon." Reproductive Health, v.10 (2013).

McCormick, Marie, et al. "Prematurity: An Overview and Public Health Implications." Annual Review of Public Health, v.32 (2011).

McDorman, Marian. "Race and Ethnic Disparities in Fetal Mortality, Preterm Birth, and Infant Mortality in the United States: An Overview." Seminars in Perinatology, v.35 (2011).

Miller, Amalia, and Catherine Tucker. "Can Health Care Information Technology Save Babies?" Journal of Political Economy, v.199 (2011).

Renfrew, Mary. "Breastfeeding Promotion for Infants in Neonatal Units: A Systematic Review." Child: Care, Health and Development, v.36 (2010).

Rochefort, Christian, and Sean Clarke. "Nurses' Work Environments, Care Rationing, Job Outcomes, and Quality of Care on Neonatal Units." Journal of Advanced Nursing, v.66 (2010).

Spong, Catherine, and Marian Willinger. "Disparities in Perinatal Medicine: Focus on Infant Mortality, Stillbirth and Preterm Birth." Seminars in Perinatology, v.35 (2011).

Thomas, Penelope, Michael Beckmann, and Kristen Gibbons. "The Effect of Cultural and Linguistic Diversity on Pregnancy Outcome." Australian and New Zealand Journal of Obstetrics and Gynaecology, v.50 (2010).

Neurodiversity

Neurodiversity is a concept that refers to the idea that people experience the world differently due to their neurological attributes. An idea promoted primarily online throughout the world by the autistic self-advocacy movement, neurodiversity is a term usually associated with people on the autism spectrum. However, it is sometimes also used to describe certain mental illnesses, learning disabilities, and other forms of neurological difference. Parallel to biodiversity or cultural diversity, neurodiversity as a concept generally recognizes neurological disorders as a form of natural variation in the human genome. Thus, instead of focusing on "cures," neurodiversity advocates emphasize valuing and supporting neurological differences.

Advocates for neurodiversity look for ways to promote social support systems (inclusion-focused services, accommodations, communication and assistive technologies, occupational training, and independent living support) for the neurologically diverse. This way, rather than being forced to embody and enact accepted ideas of normalcy in an unthinking manner, they can live their lives as they are and as they wish. Many advocates place an emphasis on subjective well-being, along with adaptive rather than typical functioning. For example, some advocates believe that verbal communication in itself is not as important as having some form of communication that is reliable and understandable. They also usually oppose any interventions that seek to eliminate unusual but harmless behaviors such as the avoidance of eye contact or repetitive body movements without any regard for the coping mechanisms that they often are.

Consequently, many self-advocates are quite critical of intensive behavioral interventions such as applied behavioral analysis (ABA) because they believe there is too much of a focus on normalization for its own sake rather than an emphasis on the health and happiness of the individual being treated. Envisioning a world in which autistic people enjoy the same access, rights, and opportunities as others, proponents of neurodiversity believe that the acceptance of such differences is an essential condition that will allow all people to live up to their potential and contribute to society on their own terms according to their specific gifts and strengths.

According to philosophers Andrew Fenton and Tim Krahn, advocates for neurodiversity strive to have society reconceptualize autism and other related conditions in concrete ways through (1) recognizing that neurodiversity does not need to be cured; (2) replacing current medical terms such as condition, disease, disorder, or illness with more neutral or positive descriptions of neurodiverse individuals; (3) acknowledging new types of autonomy for those classified as neurodiverse; and (4) providing neurodiverse people with more control over their treatments or with decisions about whether they should even be treated at all.

In his own efforts to inform a larger segment of the public about this concept and the potential benefits to societies that embrace this perspective, Thomas Armstrong, an educational psychologist and well-known proponent of neurodiversity, has additionally articulated eight core principles around this concept. These principles can be summarized in the following manner:

Neurodiversity refers to the idea that people experience the world differently due to their neurological attributes. Here, Christopher Adams holds his 3-year-old son, diagnosed with severe autism spectrum disorder, while board-certified behavior analyst (BCBA) Kenna Nelson coaches the child to touch his father's nose during an in-house therapy session.

1. The human brain is more like an ecosystem than a machine; consequently, we need to come up with language that better reflects more recent understandings of the architecture of the brain.
2. Instead of conceiving of disability categories as discrete entities, it is more appropriate to think in terms of spectrums or continuums of competence when talking about the differing gradations of social competence and other abilities enacted by individuals.
3. It is very important to remember that notions of human competence are strongly determined by the values of the culture to which one belongs; consequently, there needs to be an acknowledgment that diagnostic categories are never simply scientifically based but also reflect deeper social biases about certain competencies or abilities within a particular culture.
4. When and where you were born determines whether you are seen as disabled or gifted; thus, diagnostic labels should never be conceived of as absolute realities but as relative terms that only exist in particular social settings.
5. In order to be successful in life, you need to adapt your brain to the needs of the surrounding environment; thus, the use of tools such as psychoactive medication or intensive remediation programs can be very useful and beneficial in helping people adjust to their particular environments.
6. You need to modify your surrounding environment to meet the needs of your unique brain (what Armstrong terms "niche construction").
7. You need to use diverse tools, resources, and strategies to alter the environment in ways that will serve the needs of the neurodiverse brain (essential steps that must be taken in the process of niche construction).

8. Through positive niche construction, the brain is directly modified and a more complex network of neuronal connections form in the brain, thereby enhancing individuals' abilities to adapt to their particular environments.

History of the Concept

In the 1990s, an autistic civil rights movement led by many autistic writers and activists came into being. During this time, people such as Jim Sinclair, a Canadian autistic advocate, began to assert that neurological differences should be recognized and respected as a social category on a par with gender, ethnicity, sexual orientation, and disability statuses. A principal and early organizer of the international online autism community, Sinclair is generally credited with coining the word neurotypical, a term that originally denoted nonautistic people but is now used to refer to typically developing people and the cultures built by and around such people. Other people such as Judy Singer, an Australian social scientist on the autism spectrum, and Kathleen Seidel, an American and creator of the Web site Neurodiversity.com (a site that indexes material from a vast number of Web sites on autism that reflect a diverse range of information and perspectives), were also quite active in efforts to educate and inform the public about the personal and societal implications of these wide-ranging neurological differences.

The term neurodiversity itself was coined to challenge prevailing views that conceived of certain forms of neurological diversity as inherently pathological. According to most sources, the word neurodiversity first appeared in print on September 30, 1998, in an article in The Atlantic titled "Neurodiversity: On the Neurological Underpinnings of Geekdom." In this article, journalist Harvey Blume reflects upon the social and political ramifications of geekdom and speculates about what he describes as the possible neurological underpinnings of the rise of self-described geeks in the computer industry and other related fields. After analyzing the content of a satirical Web site titled the "Institute for the Study of the Neurologically Typical: The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of 'Normal' Disorders" (a parody of the institutes and journals dedicated to the study of autism and a tongue-in-cheek critique of their so-called quest to make everyone "normal" at http://isnt.autistics.org/dsn.html), he puts forth the idea that neurodiversity is an attribute as essential for the evolution of humans as biodiversity is for all life forms. Furthermore, he advances the notion that cybernetics and computer culture may favor what he calls a more autistic cast of mind. This particular article is also notable for accurately predicting the role the Internet would play in furthering the international neurodiversity movement.

The concept gained broader exposure in 2004 when it appeared in a New York Times piece written by Amy Harmon. Titled "Neurodiversity Forever: The Disability Movement Turns to Brains," this article examined the rise of a new kind of disability movement calling for greater tolerance for different neurological constitutions. Since that time, the term has been progressively applied to other conditions and has taken on a more general meaning; in the United Kingdom, for example, the Developmental Adult Neurodiversity Association (DANDA) uses the concept when talking about developmental coordination disorder, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), Asperger's syndrome, and related conditions. In the meantime, other people such as Adam Larsen (a documentary filmmaker) have attempted to make the concept of neurodiversity more familiar to the general public through media vehicles such as Neurotypical, a 2012 point-of-view (POV) documentary that features autistic people as narrators of their own experiences.

Controversies and Critics

Neurodiversity as a concept is still quite controversial to many for varying reasons. For example, those who endorse the medical model still believe that such differences are actually medical conditions that can and should be corrected. Such adherents of this view include self-identified and diagnosed autistics such as Jonathan Mitchell (http://www.jonathans-stories.com/non-fiction/neurodiv.html), who has explicitly expressed the desire for a cure for his autism.

Other critics of the neurodiversity movement do not have as much of a problem with the concept itself but do express concerns that broadening the definitions of neurological disorders might lead those with serious physical and psychological needs to be overlooked, thereby precipitating the loss of essential government support services for those who depend upon them to function successfully in their daily lives.

On a more philosophical level, there are people who believe that there really is no such thing as a neurodiverse individual. For example, educator Nick Walker argues that one can conceive of all people being neurodiverse in one way or another. Thus, as an alternative, he proposes the use of the term neurominority as a nonjudgmental and nondiscriminatory way of referring to all individuals who cannot be classified as neurotypical.

Yet another point of view can be found in the views of people such as Pier Jaarsma and Stellan Welin, who find no problem in applying the concept of neurodiversity to so-called high-functioning autistics. They believe that individuals in the "high-functioning" group might be more harmed than helped by having medical labels applied to them. On the other hand, they also express the opinion that endorsing a broader definition of neurodiversity that includes so-called low-functioning autistics is problematic due to considerable differences in their ability to engage in self-care and other independent living behaviors.

Neurodiversity advocates respond to critiques of the concept by countering that the notion of neurodiversity does not in any way imply the trivialization or dismissal of the mental, emotional, and physical needs of neurodiverse individuals who require personal assistance or health-related services for their well-being. To the contrary, many readily agree that autism is indeed a disability and are often quite frank about the challenges they have faced and continue to face due to their own neurological constitutions. At the same time, however, they also assert that there is a need for a term such as neurodiversity to encapsulate the real needs and desires of the autism community. They also stress the importance of having a say in their own treatment, along with continuing access to the appropriate educational, governmental, and private supports to help them successfully lead satisfying and independent lives.

Neurodiversity and Research Studies

In recent years, some researchers have conducted studies that have looked at the impacts of reframing autism within more positive paradigms such as neurodiversity. In one such study, conducted by Edward Griffin and David Pollak in 2009, 27 students with autism, dyslexia, developmental coordination disorder, ADHD, and stroke were separated into two categories according to how they saw their particular neurological conditions. The first group consisted of those who adopted a difference view, that is, those who saw neurodiversity as a form of difference composed of a set of strengths and weaknesses. The second group was made up of those who took the medical or deficit view; that is, they saw neurodiversity as a disadvantageous medical condition. While all of the students in the study reported problematic schooling histories that included exclusion, abuse, and bullying, those who identified with the difference view exhibited higher levels of academic self-esteem and confidence in their abilities. Additionally, many of the students who expressed the difference view articulated substantial career ambitions with specific, constructive goals.

In another study published in 2013 by Steven K. Kapp and several other investigators, researchers found that parents of children on the autism spectrum and people on the autism spectrum who were able to reframe autism in terms of a neurodiversity perspective exhibited higher levels of coping behavior in their own daily lives. On a related note, the authors of the study concluded that parent education programs using ABA that focus on strengths rather than deficits also appear to strengthen parent–child interaction and help make use of a person's interests and strengths to address such challenges in a positive manner. Consequently, they concluded that a shift to a neurodiversity perspective and a positive emphasis on the restricted interests of individuals on the autism spectrum (a core characteristic of autism) greatly enhance the social-communicative development of autistic people and provides them with selective advantages when it comes to certain job skills and independent living behaviors.

Advocacy

The Autistic Self-Advocacy Network (ASAN, http://autisticadvocacy.org) is arguably the most well-known neurodiversity advocacy group today. Founded as a national nonprofit in 2006 by Ari Ne'eman and Scott Michael Robertson, both autistic adults, ASAN seeks to increase the representation of autistic people across society. Another prominent advocacy group in this area is Autism Network International (http://www.autreat.com), an autistic-run self-help and advocacy organization for autistic people.

Conclusion

Advocates find the concept of neurodiversity to be a very important tool in the fight against the ableism and discrimination experienced by those not viewed as neurotypical. For those who don't see themselves or who are not perceived of as neurotypical, the notion of neurodiversity offers the hope that they will be extended the same rights and privileges extended to other human beings and that they will ultimately be recognized and rewarded for possessing specific talents crucial to the functioning of society. For many proponents, concrete evidence of the utility of embracing neurodiversity as a concept can be found in the examples of software firms that have acknowledged the programming talents of a number of people on the autism spectrum and have hired an appreciable number of neurodiverse people to boost productivity in their workplaces. In their view, companies and individuals who employ neurologically diverse people can experience the satisfaction of providing people who have traditionally been marginalized in the workforce with the means for independent living while also benefiting from the substantial talents of such individuals, a win-win situation for everyone.

Danielle Roth-Johnson
University of Nevada, Las Vegas
Celeste T. G. Tuman
Independent Scholar

See Also: National Database for Autism Research; Office for Civil Rights; Partial Care Services for Adults, Mental Health; Partial Care Services for Children, Mental Health; Social Services, Disabled Children and; Sociology of Disability; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and; Western Communities and Cultural Competence.

Further Readings

Armstrong, Thomas. The Power of Neurodiversity: Unleashing the Advantages of Your Differently Wired Brain. Cambridge, MA: DaCapo Lifelong/Perseus Books, 2011.

Baker, Dana Lee. The Politics of Neurodiversity: Why Public Policy Matters. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2011.

Dubin, Nick. "Neurodiversity: A Balanced Opinion." Autism Asperger's Digest. http://autismdigest.com/neurodiversity (Accessed October 2013).

"Facing Autism in New Brunswick." http://autisminnb.blogspot.com/ (Accessed October 2013).

"Institute for the Study of the Neurologically Typical: The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of 'Normal' Disorders." http://isnt.autistics.org/dsn.html (Accessed November 2013).

Isaacson, Ashley. "The Conversation of Neurodiversity and Autism." Autism Daily Newscast. http://www.autismdailynewscast.com/the-conversation-of-neurodiversity-and-autism/3260/ashleyisaacson (Accessed October 2013).

Kapp, S. K., K. Gillespie-Lynch, L. E. Sherman, and T. Hutman. "Deficit, Difference, or Both? Autism and Neurodiversity." Developmental Psychology, v.49/1 (2013).

Krieger, Diane. "Neurodiversity and the University." USC Trojan. http://tfm.usc.edu/summer-2013/neurodiversity-and-the-university (Accessed October 2013).

Langan, Mary. "Parental Voices and Controversies in Autism." Disability and Society, v.26/2 (2011).

Lutz, Amy S. F. "Is the Neurodiversity Movement Misrepresenting Autism?" Slate http://www.slate.com/articles/health_and_science/medical_examiner/2013/01/autism_neurodiversity_does_facilitated_communication_work_and_who_speaks.html (Accessed October 2013).

Mitchell, Jonathan. "Neurodiversity: Just Say No." http://http://www.jonathans-tories.com/non-fiction/neurodiv.html (Accessed October 2013).

Nicolaidis, Christina. "What Can Physicians Learn From the Neurodiversity Movement?" American Medical Association Journal of Ethics, v.14/6 (2012).

Robison, John Elder. "What Is Neurodiversity?" Psychology Today (October 7, 2013). http://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/my-life-aspergers/201310/what-is-neurodiversity (Accessed October 2013).

Rothstein, Aaron. "Mental Disorder or Neurodiversity?" New Atlantis: A Journal of Technology and Society. http://www.thenewatlantis.com/publications/mental-disorder-or-neurodiversity (Accessed October 2013).

Silberman, Steve. "Neurodiversity Rewires Conventional Thinking About the Brain." Wired. http://www.wired.com/magazine/2013/04/neurodiversity (Accessed October 2013).

Walker, Nick. "Throw Away the Master's Tools: Liberating Ourselves From the Pathology Paradigm." In Loud Hands: Autistic People, Speaking, Julia Bascom, ed. Washington, DC: Autistic Self Advocacy Network, 2012.

No Child Left Behind Act

Melting pot is a remarkably meaningful phrase often used to characterize American society. Due to historical facts forming the country with the contribution of several nations even at the beginning, the United States seems to have started out as a quite diverse country. Among other reasons, what is called the American Dream is likely to be an important reason as to why the United States has one of the most, if not the most, diverse societies in the world. Several people from all around the world seek ways to find a better life in this country, bringing their cultures, unique contributions, and differences.

The current demographics of U.S. society show a clear picture of diversity with a rich mixture of several vivid heritages of different cultures. Diversity seems to have a certain impact on shaping the American educational system as well as several other aspects of modern life in the United States. The comprehensive law aimed to deliver education of higher quality by fixing the problems particularly stemming from this diversity is called the No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB). This entry examines the basic definition, brief history, goals, components, as well as criticisms of the NCLB, particularly as it relates to the diversity of the American society.

History, Definition, and Goals of NCLB

The historical background of the NCLB goes back to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) of 1965, which aimed to provide federal funds for the betterment of economically disadvantaged students through education. The ESEA is revised every five years. The act was reauthorized and revised in 1994 and served as the predecessor of the NCLB. The NCLB was originally proposed in 2001 and signed into federal law in the following year. In President George W. Bush's own words, the NCLB is summarized as "[a]n act to close the achievement gap with accountability, flexibility, and choice, so that no child is left behind." The act aims to improve individual outcomes of education through two fundamental elements: setting high standards by the state and establishing measurable goals. It is intended to compensate for the disadvantages in education caused by social and economic status.

The NCLB can be considered a comprehensive move in the U.S. educational system that requires schools to direct more focus to students with various disadvantages due to their backgrounds. These groups of students include minorities like African Americans and Latinos, children of low-income families, nonnative speakers of English, and students with disabilities.

Its primary goal is to close the achievement gap so that every student has fair and equal learning opportunities in terms of social and economic status. Initially, mathematics and reading were included in testing requirement, then later in 2007, science and social studies were also covered. This change is believed to bring potential changes in curriculums of relevant subject matters, which accordingly has had certain impacts on the way courses are taught.

Some of the major titles of the act covered the following issues: improving the academic achievement of the disadvantaged; preparing, training, and recruiting high-quality teachers and principals; language instruction for limited English proficient and immigrant students; 21st-century schools; promoting informed parental choice and innovative programs; flexibility and accountability; and Indian, Native Hawaiian, and Alaska Native education.

The NCLB allocated considerable amounts of financial support on the one hand, and it placed strict performance standards. According to these standards, all students were supposed to be proficient in mathematics and English by the 2013 to 2014 school year. The Obama administration, however, softened this provision, leaving a door open for waivers for willing states.

Officially, there is no standard K through 12 curriculum in the United States. Instead, each state has its own curriculum, mostly different from others. With the introduction of nationwide standardized tests after the NCLB, states started to adjust curriculum in a way so that students can succeed in nationwide tests and the schools can keep receiving federal funds. In other words, the NCLB paved the way toward standardizing the curriculum and assessments nationwide.

The NCLB also aimed to enhance teacher quality nationwide, requiring higher standards for employment such as holding a bachelor's degree at least, state certification, and proof of competency in the subject area taught. Requirements slightly vary for different groups like elementary or secondary teachers.

The NCLB and Diversity

The United States is possibly the most diverse country in the world, with people from many different cultural and ethnical backgrounds. As a result, problems with English and resulting language barriers are issues of concern, especially for the people of immigrant and migrant minorities. The NCLB required language instruction in schools in order to compensate the disadvantages of immigrant students with limited English proficiency. One of the specific goals of the NCLB was that all students, including those with limited English proficiency, be proficient in English by the 2013 to 2014 school year. The NCLB demonstrated real concern for academic achievement of those who make the American society a diverse one. The law reserved no exemption for short-term residents who had language barriers. English language learners (ELL) are granted extra time in standardized tests and allowed to use bilingual dictionaries. Additionally, school administrations are required to follow up the academic success of ELLs and report to the authorities to make sure that they do not fall behind the native speakers of English due to their disadvantages with language.

Students with disabilities are also taken into account within the comprehensive perspective of the NCLB. Students who need special accommodations due to their cognitive disabilities are subjected to alternative achievement standards. Schools are allowed to use alternative assessment standards for such students with a percentage limitation of 1 percent. Nevertheless, schools that have students with cognitive disabilities more than 1 percent seem to be disadvantaged.

Criticism of NCLB

The NCLB started out with idealistic goals and statements, which also theoretically sounded reasonable. When a huge change is being made on a nationwide scale, theory and practice may differ as in many fields. Unanticipated impediments, delays, side effects, and similar factors may cause unexpected results or falling behind the planned goals. Critics of the NCLB focused on such drawbacks and voiced their concerns publicly. They contend that the law has not improved the quality of education, particularly in high schools. They refer to the results of standardized test results since 2002. Standardized tests are also criticized as the sole means of assessment of academic success. According to critics, standardized tests are given priority over other methods of assessment, and it is not reasonable to use such a shallow tool, as compared to other methods, to measure student performance.

Another aspect of this is the use of arbitrary cut scores, which means a kind of threshold determining whether a test is passed or not regardless of the number of correct answers. This threshold is determined by the government, and it can be changed by the government any time, opponents contend. The strict policy of NCLB on teacher qualification is also criticized by opponents. They argue that such policies worsen the already existing problem of teacher shortage nationwide.

Possibly the most notable of these criticisms comes from teachers, who are an important part of the general picture. Some teachers complain that the course of teaching moves toward being a test-oriented process rather than a real, idealistic process of knowledge transfer.

Irfan Demir
Independent Scholar
Gulay Demir
Yildiz Technical University

See Also: Americans With Disabilities Act; Asian Immigrants; Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development; At-Risk Youth Services; Behavior Support and Management; Bullying; Children With Special Needs; Disability Services; Early Childhood Literacy; Education for Diversity in Human Services; Educational Services; Educational Support Services; Individuals With Disabilities Education Act; Language Assistance; Multicultural Education; Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services; School Counselors; Social Services, Disabled Children and; Special Education; Yale Center for Dyslexia and Creativity; Zero Tolerance Approach in Schools.

Further Readings

Aske, David R., Laura S. Connolly, and Rhonda R. Corman. "Accessibility or Accountability? The Rhetoric and Reality of No Child Left Behind." Allied Academies International Conference (Proceedings of the Academy for Economics and Economic Education), v.15 (2012).

EdSource. "No Child Left Behind (NCLB)." http://www.edsource.org/iss_fedlaws_nclb.html (Accessed July 2013).

Guisbond, Lisa. “NCLB’s Lost Decade for Educational Progress: What Can We Learn From This Policy Failure?” National Center for Fair and Open Testing (FairTest) (2012).

House, Jenny. “NCLB Waivers: Good News and Bad News.” T.H.E. Journal, v.40 (2013).

Johnson, Wendell G. “No Encyclopedia Left Unopened: Researching No Child Left Behind (NCLB) in the Reference Shelves.” Reference Librarian, v.15 (2010).

National Education Association. “No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB)/ESEA.” http://www.nea.org/home/NoChildLeftBehindAct.html (Accessed August 2013).

Pinder, Patrice Juliet. “Exploring and Understanding Maryland’s Math and Science Teachers’ Perspectives on NCLB and Increase Testing: Employing a Phenomenological Inquiry Approach.” Education, v.33 (n.d.).

Winstead, Lisa. “The Impact of NCLB and Accountability on Social Studies: Teacher Experiences and Perceptions About Teaching Social Studies.” Social Studies, v.102 (2011).

Nursing, Public Health

Public health nurses promote health behavior change and maintenance and work to prevent disease. Sometimes referred to as community health nurses, public health nurses are responsible for integrating their nursing expertise and skills into the theory and practice of public health. They are focused on reducing health disparities among at-risk populations; providing timely, evidence-based health care to individuals in need; and staying abreast of the changing face of health systems and their effects on diverse communities. Public health nurses practice in a variety of settings that are quite different from a traditional hospital or outpatient care center. They provide care in local, state, and federal health agencies; home-based settings; community and religious centers; and mobile health units. Nurses in public health consider themselves in community-oriented practice and must perform their duties with limited resources and time. They often work collaboratively with professionals representing public health, health policy and advocacy, governmental agencies, medicine, social work, and even local religious and community leaders to accomplish goals.

Public Health Nursing as a Subset of Professional Nursing

Public health nurses provide care to individuals in diverse community populations. The populations they interact with are diverse with regard to age, race, gender, family structure, religion, and socioeconomic status. Public health nursing is a unique subset of the nursing profession because care begins with an assessment of the community the nurse has identified as a potential population with need. This is distinctive from other forms of nursing, such as hospital-based care, in that the health needs of the population may not be completely known.

A hospital-based nurse is often assigned a patient who has a diagnosis with specific care goals that must be assessed and addressed. Comparatively, the public health nurse must first identify the need of the community and then move into the process of discovering the best ways to address the identified issues. Public health nurses treat individuals as members of communities. Many public health nurses in the United States manage family cases, and the acuity from one family or patient to the next can be quite variable.

Most positions in public health nursing require a nurse to obtain a bachelors of science in nursing (BSN) and complete the registered nurse (RN) licensure process. Public health nurses can also obtain a masters of science in nursing and specialize in public health as a focus of practice. Nurse practitioners in public health possess additional skills in examining, treating, and managing community health issues. During education and training, public health nurses and nurse practitioners learn disease treatment and prevention and how to motivate individuals situated in complex and diverse cultures to make knowledgeable health behavior decisions, thereby effecting more lifelong behavior changes. The ability to evaluate and assess public health situations; communicate with diverse individuals, families, and communities; collaborate with other professionals; and devise plans of care are often identified as the core competencies of public health nurses.

Public health nurses assess groups or communities struggling with health disparities. Examples of public health nursing initiatives include preventing and ending intimate partner abuse, promoting diabetes self-management, substance use prevention and treatment, exercise and weight management, and teen pregnancy assistance. The nurse (or nurses working collaboratively in a small group) evaluates the community's resources, what processes are in place to address health issues, and the scope of the disease or health condition of concern. Public health nurses must implement only evidence-based practice to ensure the efficacy of public health interventions. Following the community evaluation, the public health nurse plans an intervention, develops a plan, acquires necessary resources, and then executes his or her plan.

Education and behavior change motivation are significant components of the intervention, and the interventions are designed for individuals, families, population subgroups, and larger populations. The public health nurse must execute his or her plan in a timely fashion and allocate resources such that the population or population subset feels enhanced. Close formative evaluation is necessary to ensure the population takes ownership of their stake in the intervention and the intervention reaches and affects those identified as having disparities. The public health nurse evaluates the intervention implementation and assesses for issues needing correction or if further resources are needed.

A Day in the Life of the Public Health Nurse

Public health nurses' daily duties are as diverse as the populations they serve, and they travel often. For example, a public health nurse may identify a high-risk and underserved Latino population in the inner city that may have health needs to be addressed. The nurse conducts a windshield survey noting the community does not have safe play environments and many of the children are obese. The nurse then meets with community and religious leaders to discuss concerns, assess past and current obesity-prevention programs in place, and evaluate the community's readiness for change.

Upon building relationships with key stakeholders in this Latino population, the public health nurse creates an intervention strategy to create organic community garden space and employ limited grant funds for playground equipment. The public health nurse then implements the intervention and evaluates outcomes.

The Past, Present, and Future of Public Health Nursing

Beginning in the 19th century, public health nurses dedicated themselves to treating physical, economic, and social ills. Public health nurses once primarily focused on case management, including providing access to services; home care; and community-level prevention measures such as vaccinations. Members of this profession focus on these concerns today but are now better situated to collaborate with other health and governmental officials and emphasize health promotion and behavior change as opposed to merely treating individuals with poor health.

As the health care system in the United States continues to evolve and expand, public health nurses will become more and more in demand. Public health nurses can provide high-quality care at a lower premium and to more diverse populations given their training in cultural diversity and foreign languages.

Jennifer J. Moreland
OhioHealth Research Institute
Janice M. Moreland
Nationwide Children's Hospital

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Health Promotion Services; Medical Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for; Midwifery; Public Health.

Further Readings

American Public Health Association. "About Public Health Nursing." http://www.apha.org/membergroups/sections/aphasections/phn/about/ (Accessed April 2014).

Fee, Elizabeth, and Bu Liping. "The Origins of Public Health Nursing: The Henry Street Visiting Nurse Service." American Journal of Public Health, v.100 (2010).

Jacobs, Julie A., et al. "Tools for Implementing an Evidence-Based Approach to Public Health Practice." Preventing Chronic Disease: Public Health Research, Practice, and Policy, v.9 (2012).

James, Kathy Shadle, et al. "Family-Based Weight Management With Latino Mothers and Children." Journal for Specialists in Pediatric Nursing, v.13 (2008).

Kulbok, Pamela, et al. "Evolving Public Health Nursing Roles: Focus on Community Participatory Health Promotion and Prevention." Online Journal of Issues in Nursing, v.17/2 (2012).

Reckinger, Dawn, et al. "Public Health Nursing Competency Instrument: Scale Reduction and Reliability of Factors." Public Health Nursing, v.30/6 (2013).

Nursing Home Care

Advances in health care and medical technology have increased longevity, and the older adult population in the United States is increasing. As a result of this growing population, the need for nursing home care is a distinct possibility for many older adults. Nursing homes provide long-term care for chronic conditions and assistance with the activities of daily living. Nursing homes offer medical and personal care for the frail elderly with health needs. Round-the-clock physician and nursing services are also available during nursing home care.

A nursing home is an institution with three or more beds that provides personal and medical care for older adults and those with chronic illness in privately owned settings. Three levels of care are provided: Skilled nursing care includes the management and treatment of chronic conditions. Rehabilitation, another level of care, includes short-term medical care and other rehabilitative services (physical therapy, occupational therapy, or speech therapy) after an injury or illness. Long-term care involves medical and nursing care offered over a long period of time. Nursing home placement decisions are made with the patient, family, and physician. Placement can occur after hospitalization, or the patient can be transferred directly from his or her home.

Before a patient can be placed in a nursing home, an assessment is conducted to determine health care status, current level of function, and ability to perform activities of daily living (ADLs). "ADLs" is a term used to describe daily self-care activities such as bathing, dressing, toileting, walking, eating, and continence. Ability to perform ADLs is an indication of the level of nursing home care that is required. Assessment involves independent measures of functioning. An assessment instrument, such as the Katz Index of ADLs, may be used to evaluate health status. Assessment results that indicate impairment in daily functioning form the basis of decisions that determine care needs. Assessments, care plans, and treatment activities are documented in the medical record. Nursing homes are required by law to provide care plans and maintain medical records for all residents.

Prior to the 20th century, the elderly who could afford it were maintained in their own homes or in homes established by religious or charity groups for the care of the aged. Those elderly who were impoverished or isolated from family landed in almshouses. In 1935, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the Social Security Act into law. The Social Security Act made it possible for payments to be made to privately owned nursing care facilities. During the 1950s, the Social Security Act was amended to requirw that states license and regulate these nursing facilities. In 1986, a study commissioned by Congress found widespread incidents of nursing home abuse, neglect, and inadequate care.

After the study findings were published, reforms to the nursing home industry were proposed. In 1987, these reforms were passed into law as part of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1987. New standards were established, and more effective regulation measures were implemented. These licensing regulations provided a new level of oversight that ensured the safety and well-being of nursing home residents and offered better protection against abuse and neglect.

Nursing Home Services

Twenty-four-hour skilled nursing care is provided in nursing homes. Skilled nursing refers to care that is provided by a licensed nurse, including wound care, tube feedings, intravenous medication therapy, medication management, and ongoing nursing assessment (blood pressure, pulse, respiratory assessment, and blood sugar screening), along with ongoing physician communication and consultation. The primary care physician is responsible for medical oversight of the patient. In addition to physician and skilled nursing services, nursing home patients may require other services as well.

Physical therapy is provided after an illness or injury and helps improve mobility, strength, endurance, flexibility, and coordination, and aids in pain reduction. Physical therapy helps increase or maintain overall physical functioning and is also an important tool that can be used to prevent injury or accident in the nursing home. Along with physical therapy, some patients may require occupational therapy, a type of therapy that helps restore or enhance ADLs.

Occupational therapy may include teaching residents to use equipment to assist with these activities or making modifications to the environment to increase the possibility that the resident can maintain a higher level of independence. For example, a bar may be installed in a bathroom to allow a nursing home patient to use the toilet on his or her own. Another service is recreation therapy, a service that helps improve functioning and independence. Recreation therapy is usually time limited and, as is the case with other forms of therapy, is physician ordered and used to achieve the objectives of the care plan. Recreation therapy may include activities to promote physical functioning such as exercise and stretching. Activities that promote cognitive functioning may include card or other games that require concentration. To decrease issues such as depression or anxiety, recreation therapy may involve increasing social participation by including nursing home residents in activities such as support groups. Nursing home care also includes pharmacy services, dental care, podiatry, and optical care.

Oversight and Certification

All skilled nursing homes must meet both federal and state regulations that guarantee that they operate within established guidelines. Skilled nursing homes are required by law to maintain compliance with federal requirements to be eligible to receive Medicare and Medicaid payments. A site-based survey is completed to determine compliance and eligibility. Each state is responsible for conducting nursing home certifications. The nursing home does not know when the certification visit will take place as they are not announced in advance. The certification visit may be conducted 24 hours a day, during the week, or on weekends. Nursing homes must meet federal requirements that include having a sufficiently staffed facility and conducting initial assessments of all residents to determine their functional capability. After an assessment is conducted, each resident must have a comprehensive care plan. Certification also involves a review of protocols that ensure that residents do not develop pressure sores (bed sores). If pressure sores develop, the nursing home must provide necessary treatment to heal existing sores and prevent infection and development of new sores. The nursing home must also have procedures that ensure residents receive any necessary assistive devices that may be needed to maintain vision and hearing.

According to federal guidelines, nursing homes must provide services that ensure that ADLs can be carried out. Appropriate provisions must be made to ensure that residents have the right to determine their schedules, activities, and health care. To receive federal certification, nursing homes must have protocols in place for assistance to incontinent residents. Fluid intake must also be monitored so that dehydration can be prevented. Compliance with federal guidelines is necessary to safeguard nursing home residents against injury, abuse, or neglect. Nursing home residents, whether they are elderly or recovering from an illness or injury, are vulnerable and may not have the capacity to look out for their own best interests; therefore, oversight must be in place to guarantee that the highest-quality services are provided and the potential for abuse and neglect is mitigated.

Diversity Issues in Nursing Home Care

Nursing homes are highly diverse organizations, reflecting the diverse society in which we live. Diversity exists in the backgrounds of residents and staff and may include ethnicity, gender, race, religion, sexual orientation, and socioeconomic status. Diversity may also exist in education level and language. The provision of quality nursing home care involves acknowledging and addressing these differences in a responsive and respectful manner. Organizational policies and staff training should highlight the importance of delivering culturally competent nursing home services. Cultural competence involves valuing diversity, making a conscious effort to understand cultural beliefs and values, and incorporating this understanding into the care that nursing home residents receive. Responding to nursing home care needs of economically disadvantaged groups is also an important diversity issue, which involves increasing access to quality nursing home care for these groups.

Abuse and Neglect in Nursing Home Care

Abuse involves intentional physical or emotional harm caused by one person to another. In nursing home settings, the abuse victim is a patient, although agitated nursing home patients have been known to strike out against staff and other residents. Physical abuse includes hitting, slapping, kicking, shaking, or sexual contact that is not consensual. Emotional abuse may involve threats, intimidation, criticizing, name calling, or other acts that belittle and humiliate.

Nursing home neglect may be physical or medical. Neglect involves failure to adequately provide for the needs of the resident. Failure to maintain proper hygiene and provide adequate medical treatment and services also constitute neglect. Inadequate staff training and facility resources and indifference among staff and administrators are risk factors for abuse and neglect.

Benefits of Nursing Home Care

The frail elderly and those recovering from injury and illness have many needs that nursing home care can provide. The provision of personalized health care is a significant benefit to the safety and well-being of patients. Twenty-four-hour monitoring of residents also facilitates health and well-being. Receiving balanced, nutritious meals provides a degree of certainty that the patients are getting the right amounts and types of food that are necessary for better health outcomes. Nursing home care can maximize safety and security and decrease isolation that some older adults experience because a built-in social network is available. Nursing home care is an important resource when the care needs of older adults are beyond what family members can provide. Caregiver burnout is a serious issue for family members who care for elderly relatives. Nursing homes strive to maintain the dignity of all residents and ensure their rights are protected. Human services professionals are an integral component in the provision of nursing home care services. From the time the decision is made for nursing home placement to service coordination during the nursing home stay, human services professionals provide an array of services that contribute to the quality of life for patients.

Desiree Stepteau-Watson
University of Mississippi

See Also: Abuse and Neglect; Adult Day Care; Aging and Adult Services; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Longitudinal Studies of Aging; Long-Term Residential Care; Medicare; National Institute on Aging; Respite Care; Social Security Administration.

Further Readings

Cross, T. L. "Culture as a Resource for Mental Health." Cultural Diversity and Ethnic Minority Psychology, v.9 (2003).

Gendron, T., et al. "Cultural Competence Training for Healthcare Professionals Working With LGBT Older Adults." Educational Gerontology, v.39 (2013).

Katz, S., T. D. Downs, H. R. Cash, and R. C. Grotz. "Progress in Development of the Index of ADL." Gerontologist, v.10 (1970).

Lahaie, C., A. Earle, and J. Heymann. "An Uneven Burden: Social Disparities in Adult Caregiving Responsibilities, Working Conditions, and Caregiver Outcomes." Research on Aging, v.35 (2013).

Schiamberg, L. B., et al. "Physical Abuse of Older Adults in Nursing Homes: A Random Sample Survey of Adults With an Elderly Family Member in a Nursing Home." Journal of Elder Abuse and Neglect, v.24 *(*2012).

Nutritional Services and Assessment

Nutritional services in a society imply specific measures aiming to give meals or subsidies for the purchase of food to different groups in a population. These measures can mean providing meals to preschool or school children and elderly people, or providing food to women, infants, and children in low-income groups as in the Special Supplemental Nutrition Program for Women, Infants, and Children, the WIC program in the United States. It can also mean providing economically vulnerable groups economic subsidies to buy food. These services can be provided with or without the ambition to meet the special nutritional needs for the respective group.

From a public health perspective, it is important to enhance and promote healthy eating habits and encourage physical activities in order to prevent obesity. Nutritional services should reflect dietary recommendations in order to enable promotion of a healthy population. The Dietary Guidelines for Americans are based on recommended nutrient intake. Recommended nutrient intake in turn is the daily intake, which meets the nutrient requirements of almost all (97.5 percent) apparently healthy individuals in an age and sex-specific population group. Daily intake corresponds to the average over a period of time. The nutrient requirement aims to cover prevention of deficiency while avoiding toxicity.

Breast milk is the recommended food for infants; its composition is optimal for infant growth and not only represents the nutritional needs of the growing infant but also includes the infant's need for immunological components. Breast milk has been the benchmark for creating replacement diets. Breastfeeding is important from a public health perspective. Suboptimal breast-feeding rates were estimated to cost the U.S. economy at least $8.7 billion in 2011 for pediatric health costs and premature death.

The WIC program is an example of a program with a multisided approach that includes providing nutritious foods and nutrition education (including breast-feeding promotion and support). WIC serves to safeguard the health of low-income pregnant, postpartum, and breast-feeding women and infants and children up to age 5 who are at nutritional risk.

The Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP), the former food stamp program, provides financial assistance for purchasing food to low- and no-income people living in the United States. This program can be used to purchase any prepackaged edible foods, regardless of nutritional value.

Nutritional Assessment

Nutritional assessment can be defined as the interpretation of the information from dietary, laboratory, anthropometric, and clinical studies. The purpose of nutritional assessment is to identify individuals or population groups at risk of becoming malnourished, and to identify individuals or population groups that are malnourished. The nutritional status of an individual is often the result of many interrelated factors. Nutritional status is the balance between the intake of nutrients by an organism and the expenditure of these in the processes of growth, reproduction, and health maintenance. It is influenced by food intake (in terms of both quantity and quality) and physical health. The spectrum of nutritional status is spread from obesity to severe malnutrition. The obtained data on nutritional status must be compared with reference data to produce an indicator of nutritional status. Nutritional assessment gives information to form the basis for developing health care programs that meet the community needs. It can also be used to measure the effectiveness of nutritional programs and interventions. Nutrition can be assessed by direct and indirect methods. The direct methods deal with the individual and measure objective criteria, while indirect methods use community health indices that reflect nutritional influences.

Direct and Indirect Methods

Direct methods can be anthropometric methods, biochemical and laboratory methods, clinical methods, and dietary evaluation methods. Anthropometry is the measurement of body height, weight, and body proportions. It is an essential component of clinical examination of infants, children, and pregnant women. The measurements can be performed relatively quickly, easily, and reliably provided standardized methods and calibrated equipment are used. To interpret anthropometric data, they must be compared with reference data. To aid the interpretation of the anthropometric data, the raw measurements are generally expressed as an index, like height for age. In infants and children, growth charts have been developed to allow assessment of their growth. This is used to evaluate both under- and overnutrition. The measured values reflect the current nutritional status and do not differentiate between acute and chronic changes.

Obesity has become an overriding public health problem in the Western world. A useful nutritional measure to identify the extent of obesity is the body mass index (BMI) measured in kilograms per meter squared. BMI greater than 30 is assumed to be due to excessive adiposity. There are exceptions where completely healthy and muscular people may have a BMI over both 25 and 30 without being considered overweight or obese. This is because muscle weighs more than fat. BMI does not say anything about the proportions of fat and muscle tissue within an individual. Waist circumference has shown to be a useful measure on an individual level to identify obesity. Research studies have given support to define abdominal obesity as a waist circumference over 88 centimeters in women and 102 centimeters for men.

Dietary assessment—that is, to measure the nutritional intake of humans—can be performed by different methods like a 24-hour dietary recall, food frequency questionnaire, food dairy record, dietary history since early life, and observed food consumption. Data on dietary intake in combination with data on nutritional status for different population groups will provide data to form national policy for nutritional interventions or programs and monitor progress of nutritional programs. Data on dietary intake form a base in epidemiological studies aiming to investigate the relationship between dietary intake and development of disease.

Indirect methods can be ecological variables including crop production, socioeconomic factors, population density, social habits, vital health statistics, age-specific mortality rates, and fertility index.

Conclusion

In a society where diversity is growing, nutritional assessment can serve to identify vulnerable groups and create interventions and programs to promote health in these groups.

Elisabeth Kylberg
Diana Stark Ekman
Ali Kazemi
University of Skövde

See Also: Food Support; Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey; National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey; Overweight and Obese Adults and Children.

Further Readings

Bartick, M. "Breastfeeding and the U.S. Economy." Breastfeeding Medicine, v.6 (2011).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "Eligibility and enrollment in the Special Supplemental Nutrition Program for Women, Infants, and Children: 27 States and New York City, 2007–2008." MMWR Morbity Mortal Weekly Report, v.62/10 (2013).

Duggan, C., et al. Nutrition in Pediatrics, 4th ed. Hamilton, Canada: B. C. Decker, 2008.

Food and Nutrition Service, USDA. "National School Lunch Program and School Breakfast Program: Nutrition Standards for All Foods Sold in School as Required by the Healthy, Hunger-Free Kids Act of 2010. Interim Final Rule." Federal Registry, v.78/125 (2013).

U.S. Department of Agriculture and U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "Dietary Guidelines for Americans, 2010." Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, December 2010.

O

Occupational Therapy

Occupational therapy is a person-centered, nondirective intervention aimed at maintaining, recovering, or developing the client's health and well-being through occupation.

Occupation is a broad term that encompasses all the activities in which people participate in life, including self-care, productivity, leisure, interacting with their environment and socializing. Occupational therapy is useful and effective in acute treatment, rehabilitation, and secondary and tertiary prevention programs.

Historical Background

Throughout history, many scholars believed that exercise, work, recreation, and amusements could positively influence physical and mental health and well-being. Among them was Galen, a physician living in the 2nd century, and some physicians working in psychiatric institutions at the beginning of the 19th century: Philippe Pinel, Johann Christian Reil, William Hallaran, William Ellis, and W. A. F. Browne. Following their prescriptions, many patients structured their time in a balanced, productive, and gratifying manner, doing leisure activities and working in the kitchen, laundry, and garden of the psychiatric institutions they lived in. In the first part of the 20th century, occupational therapy was used to improve the daily life of the victims of epidemics and people suffering from physical disabilities caused by war.

Although the concept of occupational therapy was known for centuries, the term occupational therapy was coined at the beginning of the 20th century: The founders of this rehabilitation technique, the physicians Adolph Meyer, Herbert Hall, and William Dunton, believed that creative and manual work could help people with a physical, mental, or developmental condition to improve their skills, contributing to their physical and psychosocial rehabilitation. In 1917, the National Society for the Promotion of Occupational Therapy was founded in the United States.

Candidates for Intervention

Occupational therapy may be helpful for people who have impairment in their mental, sensory, or movement functions; damage to their skin or neuromusculoskeletal systems; or disabilities concerning mobility, communication, memory, learning, and applying knowledge. The intervention may be beneficial also to those who demonstrate an imbalance among self-care, productivity, and leisure; lose initiative spending a large amount of time in passive activities or rest; cannot define occupations they consider interesting or meaningful; or experience distress or limited enjoyment in activity. Candidates for the intervention are not only those who suffer from disorders that cause significant disability and are of long-standing duration, such as dementia, traumatic brain injury, stroke, schizophrenia, developmental disorders, serious cardiovascular complaints, and severe panic and anxiety disorders, but also children with learning disorders, refugees, and homeless persons.

Wounded soldiers from World War I practice their knitting skills. In the first part of the 20th century, occupational therapy was used to improve the daily life of the victims of epidemics and people suffering from physical disabilities caused by war. The physicans who founded this therapeutic technique believed that creative and manual work could help people with a physical, mental, or developmental condition to improve their skills, contributing to their rehabilitation.

Purpose and Objectives

The fundamental mission of occupational therapy is to promote the clients' personal autonomy and their participation in social life, fostering their health and wellness. This includes helping clients adapt to their condition, learning or relearning activities whose performance they wish to master, adopting healthier lifestyles, preventing disease and trauma, and providing environmental adjustments suitable to promoting the effectiveness of performance skills, maintaining daily occupations, and keeping or obtaining paid employment. In order to fulfill these goals, occupational therapists (OTs) implement strategies that help their clients to acquire skills in the management of self-care, housework, medication, time, and stress—in this way, enhancing their assertiveness, cognition, self-awareness, and self-sufficiency. Specific objectives connected to the general purpose are set by OTs basing on the assessment of their client's gender, ethnicity, cultural background, socioeconomic status, individual strengths, and weaknesses.

An important part of the assessment process is taking into account the client's age group. In treating toddlers and children, the OT assesses whether the clients' physical, cognitive, emotional, and social skills and abilities correspond to their age; rest and activity phases are balanced; and regular leisure activities promote proper development. In treating adults, the OT determines whether the clients can attend to their self-care without assistance, organize their time in a meaningful way, use the available space in a proper manner, manipulate objects with both hands, pursue leisure activities that are meaningful for them, and promote their participation in a social community. In treating elderly people, the OT determines whether the clients use adequate self-care techniques, can handle and use everyday items properly, and are able to pursue their usual leisure activities and actually wish to. Once specific areas of weakness are determined, the therapist identifies appropriate goals in order to convert weaknesses to strengths.

To set specific objectives, the OT takes into consideration also the prognosis of the client's condition. If recovery is possible (i.e., after a knee replacement), the goal may be to restore the client's functional ability; if the client's condition is a permanent state (e.g., in hemiplegia), the goal may be to help the client to maintain the current occupational performance. If a decrease in functional status is expected (such as in degenerative disorders), the goals may be to compensate for the client's lost abilities and prevent risks for his or her health by adapting occupations and environment.

The Role of the Occupational Therapist

Because of their theoretical knowledge and professional skills, OTs conduct interventions performing different roles: They act as promoters of health, teachers of functioning, managers of adaptations, consultants, and coaches.

As promoters of health, they build trust with clients and their families, determine the clients' levels of functioning, organize the sessions and select appropriate activities, and conduct individual interventions. As teachers of functioning, they teach new ways of approaching tasks—for instance, breaking down a complex activity into achievable components and placing them in a logical sequence. As managers of adaptation, they evaluate the clients' homes and job sites, suggesting adaptations to remove obstacles or make them manageable, recommending the use of adaptive equipment, and training their clients on how to use them. As consultants and coaches, they cooperate with those who interact with the clients, providing expert advice and guidance to the clients' families, friends, coworkers, and caregivers.

In order to help the client to achieve his or her aims, OTs design and implement a specific program, making a baseline assessment, setting outcome goals, monitoring progress, and determining if the client's needs are being met; if not, the goals will be reviewed and the intervention strategy modified.

As each client is unique in how his or her physical, psychological, emotional, relational, and spiritual health are intertwined and interrelated, OTs have a deep responsibility to respect people's differences such as the values rooted in different cultures. Research has highlighted that OTs relying on a single approach may be not representative of most of the populations they serve. Indeed, already in 2004, the Sullivan Commission on Diversity in the Healthcare Workforce pointed out that increasing diversity in the health care professions can improve health care access and quality for all patients, strengthening health care delivery systems at multiple levels and promoting forward-looking research. Therefore, some scholars claimed that an OT's age, gender, ethnicity, and social, cultural, and linguistic background should correspond as much as possible to those of his or her clients; in this way, the clients' deeper needs would be more easily understood and answered in a professional way. Moreover, in order to provide a high level of service to their clients, OTs should embrace a wide diversity of approaches and techniques and keep abreast of the latest developments in their discipline.

Alessandra Padula
Independent Scholar

See Also: Adult Day Care; Disability Services; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Rehabilitative Services; Senior Services.

Further Readings

Schaber, Patricia and Deborah Lieberman. Occupational Therapy Practice Guidelines for Adults With Alzheimer's Disease and Related Disorders. Bethesda, MD: AOTA Press, 2010.

Söderback, Ingrid, ed. International Handbook of Occupational Therapy Interventions. New York: Springer, 2009.

Sullivan, Louis W. "Missing Persons: Minorities in the Health Professions. A Report of the Sullivan Commission on Diversity in the Healthcare Workforce." http://www.aacn.nche.edu/media

-relations/SullivanReport.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Office for Civil Rights

The Office for Civil Rights is an agency of the U.S. Department of Education, which was founded on October 19, 1979. Part of the executive branch of government, the Office for Civil Rights is headed by the U.S. assistant secretary of education for civil rights. He or she reports to the U.S. secretary of education and is appointed by the president of the United States. The primary mission of the Office for Civil Rights is the protection of students' civil rights by ensuring equal educational opportunities and access. Civil rights are a broad range of rights and privileges for individuals that are upheld by the government. They guarantee fundamental liberties and include but are not limited to freedom of speech and expression, the right to own property, and the right to have opportunities in education. The agency enforces civil rights laws in programs or activities that are federally funded by the Department of Education.

These programs and activities include but are not limited to elementary and secondary schools, colleges, universities, vocational schools, and many others. The agency is primarily concerned with students facing discrimination on the basis of their race, ethnicity, sex, disability, and age. They resolve discrimination complaints and work to create strategies to help prevent discrimination. Headquartered in Washington, D.C., the Office for Civil Rights has 12 offices throughout the nation, and each office has a territory that it oversees. These offices are also organized into four separate divisions. The divisions are preventing, identifying, ending, and remedying occurrences of discrimination. These are the core areas of work for the Office of Civil Rights.

Civil Rights Laws Enforced by the Office for Civil Rights

In order to protect students against discrimination, the Office for Civil Rights enforces several civil rights laws. These laws protect against forms of discrimination such as race, national origin, color, sex, disability, and age. To protect students against discrimination on the basis of race, national origin, and color, the agency enforces Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VI specifically protects against segregation in schools, racial harassment, and refutation of language services for those who do not have English as their primary language. Another important aspect of Title VI is that it protects those who file an Office for Civil Rights complaint. This means that, when one files an Office for Civil Rights complaint, he or she is legally protected from retaliation coming from the institution or individuals involved in the claim.

Another civil rights law enforced by the Office for Civil Rights is Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. Title IX prohibits discrimination based on sex, such as sexual harassment, in athletics and against pregnant women. Title IX provides legal protection from retaliation for those making a claim. Discrimination against those with disabilities is enforced by the Office of Civil Rights following Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. Examples of discrimination of those with disabilities prohibited under Section 504 are not providing accessible entries into buildings and not making accommodations for the disabled in higher education settings. Section 504 also protects those who file a discrimination complaint from retaliatory acts.

Finally, discrimination on the basis of age is prohibited by the Age Discrimination Act of 1975. The Age Discrimination Act does not protect against employment discrimination, which is covered under the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The Age Discrimination Act of 1975 protects against discrimination in federally funded programs.

Institutions Adhering to and Areas Covered by the Office for Civil Rights

Institutions that are subject to laws enforced by the Office for Civil Rights are those that receive federal funding from the U.S. Department of Education. These include state education agencies such as elementary and secondary school systems, vocational schools, proprietary schools, colleges and universities, and even libraries and museums. Areas covered by the Office for Civil Rights are many and diverse because discrimination comes in many forms and can take place in many areas. A few examples include the admission and recruitment processes, student services such as counseling and financial aid, physical education, housing, and classroom-specific occurrences such as disciplining and grading. All of these situations have the potential for discrimination to take place, but the Office for Civil Rights is aware of this potential and can take necessary action to prevent or remedy any problem.

Resolving Discrimination Complaints and Prevention Efforts

The Office for Civil Rights handles the numerous educational complaints concerning discrimination made each year and has to deal with and attempt to resolve each claim. The agency is one of the largest federal civil rights agencies in the United States and had a budget for 2013 of $105,318,000. Also in 2013, there were approximately 650 people working for the Office for Civil Rights, many of whom are attorneys and investigators whose jobs are dedicated to resolving and investigating discrimination complaints. These complaints can be made by the victim but can also be made on the behalf of the victim or victims by anyone who suspects or witnesses discrimination. Implementing effective procedures for addressing complaints is crucial. These procedures are first attempted at the local level, and if they cannot be resolved there, they then have the chance to move up to the federal level.

However, recently the Office for Civil Rights has been actively shifting its focus to proactive prevention of discrimination compared to reactive investigation of complaints. The agency has been focusing resources aimed at developing strategies and programs to prevent discrimination from happening in the first place as compared to remedying the problem after it has already occurred. The agency does so by concentrating on the local level. They aim to assist parents, students, schools, and universities specifically by providing them with the resources, tools, and knowledge to prevent discrimination. The initial starting point for discrimination prevention is to have comprehensive policies put into place at the local level within individual educational locations. These policies should have clear expectations and consequences laid out for actions of discrimination. These policies can also lay out actions that will be taken when specific acts of discrimination are committed such as sexual harassment or racial discrimination.

Workshop attendees from the Oregon Department of Transportation participate in a discussion group at the 2013 Diversity Conference. The Office for Civil Rights has been actively shifting its focus to proactive prevention of discrimination. It does so by concentrating at the local level, providing schools and other institutions with materials to evaluate and improve their approaches to discrimination.

The Office for Civil Rights has also created self-evaluation materials for schools and other institutions to use in order to evaluate and improve their approaches to discrimination. The agency offers many self-evaluation materials for many different areas. These areas include different forms of harassment, students who are learning English as their second language, athletics, and science, technology, engineering, and math (STEM). These self-evaluations are used not just by the federally funded institutions but also by parents, the surrounding community, and the students themselves in order to better prevent and remedy any issues. These systems were developed from past experience working in school systems and have been shown to be effective.

Joel T. Nadler
Candace B. Meyer
Southern Illinois University Edwardsville

See Also: Department of Education, U.S.; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights.

Further Readings

Ford, D. Y., and M. F. Trotman. "The Office for Civil Rights and Non-Discriminatory Testing, Policies, and Procedures: Implications for Gifted Education." Roeper Review, v.23/2 (2000).

Marquardt, R. G., and F. A. Karnes. "Gifted Education and Discrimination: The Role of the Office for Civil Rights." Journal for the Education of the Gifted, v.18/1 (1995).

Rabkin, J. "Office for Civil Rights." In The Politics of Regulation. New York: Basic Books, 1980.

Office for Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships, White House

The White House Office for Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships is an entity created to ensure equal government funding for faith-based service organizations. Congregations and other diverse houses of worship have acted as service providers to millions of people for many years. Often, they provide more services than secular organizations. The federal government has gotten involved to make sure these groups receive an adequate and equal amount of federal funding in order to continue to provide services. The three main world religions, Christianity, Judaism, and Islam, are actively involved in social services provision. Christianity is based on the teachings of Jesus Christ. Judaism is the monotheistic religion of the Jewish people. Islam is a monotheistic faith based on the belief that the prophet Muhammad is Allah (God)'s chosen messenger. Often, people are connected with these free services through their places of worship, word of mouth, and news advertisements.

History of Faith-Based Organizations

Faith-based organizations can be dated back to the 19th century, when leaders of Christian churches created service organizations that carried forward their Christian values. A historical example of a faith-based organization is the Salvation Army, which is a Christian-based service organization founded in 1865. Faith-based organizations are service providers that have a distinct religious component. Services provided include but are not limited to education, child services, housing, and elderly care. These organizations may or may not integrate their religious beliefs and practices with the provided services. The three main world religions (Christianity, Judaism, and Islam) all have several organizations within each group that provide services across the world. Organizations in these faith traditions tend to name accountability to God as the reason for service provision. Examples of these initiatives include Catholic Charities USA, the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, and Islamic Relief Worldwide.

Natasha Falle, herself a survivor of sexual abuse, a former sex worker, and now an activist and professor, has teamed with a variety of organizations opposing human trafficking, including the Salvation Army. The Salvation Army is a Christian-based service organization that was founded in England in1865 and now operates internationally.

Government and Faith-Based Organizations

President Bill Clinton's administration created Charitable Choice in 1996 to allow government funding for religious organizations that provide social services. In 2001, President George W. Bush issued an executive order that created the White House Office of Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships. A second executive order created equality in regards to funding among faith-based and other community organizations. Several government agencies have centers specifically to execute this order, including the Departments of Health and Human Services, Education, and Veterans Affairs. The Task Force for Faith-Based and Community Initiatives is the center for the Department of Justice. President Bush issued a third executive order in 2002 compelling the federal government to treat all faith-based and other social organizations equally in regards to social services funding. This order prohibited discrimination on the basis of religion and mandated how federal money could and could not be used to comply with constitutional requirements. In 2004, the Department of Justice's Equal Treatment Regulations made sure that faith-based organizations were able to apply for federal grants and contracts from the Department of Justice on an equal level with non-government organizations.

Recently, Secretary of State John Kerry appointed a special advisor to be in charge of the State Department's new Office of Faith-Based Community Initiatives. This office's goal is to ensure that faith communities will be heard in foreign policy and will work with other government officials regarding diplomacy and religious issues.

Faith-Based Organizations as Service Providers

Faith-based organizations provide a plethora of services. Most often, faith-based groups provide specialized services such as rehabilitation of criminals, substance and alcohol abuse counseling, health services, food, clothing, and shelter for the poor, partnerships with neighborhood schools, educational resources, employment assistance, and voter registration. Communities in which the majority of its residents have a low socioeconomic status rely heavily on faith-based organizations to provide essential social services. Services such as Alcoholics Anonymous are faith-based, as are many homeless shelters, food banks, and clothing services.

Faith-based organizations use volunteers to provide services through a variety of roles within the respective groups. Volunteers fill in the gaps when there is a high staff turnover within an organization. The religious component of faith-based organizations is the most common reason why volunteers offer their time and services. Those who volunteer most often in a faith-based organization do so because of a religious obligation to help those in need and as a way to concretely express their religious faith.

For many years, the government has provided funding for faith-based organizations that provide social services, which raises questions about the separation of church and state. Temporary Aid to Needy Families, Welfare to Work, and Community Services Block Grant funds have provided the majority of financial assistance for these organizations. At no time can the funds be used for specific religious practices such as worship and evangelism. Many faith-based organizations rely on funding from volunteers and donors, but government funding has led to better organization of the faith-based groups.

Small faith-based organizations often have trouble applying for and being awarded government grants and funding because they do not know the protocols and process. Currently, the staff of the Department of Justice Task Force for Faith-Based and Community Initiatives provides workshops for instruction on how to properly apply for government funding and contracts. Lutheran Services, Catholic Charities, and Jewish Federations are some of the funding groups that raise and disseminate financial assistance to faith-based organizations.

Kaprea F. Johnson
Krystal L. Freeman
Old Dominion University

See Also: Community-Based Services; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Religion and Clients; Temporary Aid to Needy Families

Further Readings

Biebricher, T. "Faith-Based Initiatives and the Challenges of Governance." Public Administration, v.89/3 (2011).

Bielefeld, W. and W. Cleveland. "Defining Faith-Based Organizations and Understanding Them Through Research." Nonprofit and Voluntary Sector Quarterly, v.42/3 (2013).

Bielefeld, W. and W. Cleveland. "Faith-Based Organizations as Service Providers and Their Relationship to Government." Nonprofit and Voluntary Sector Quarterly, v.42/3 (2013).

Daly, L. "Why 'Faith-Based' Is Here to Stay." Policy Review, v.157 (2009).

Sinha, J. "Unintended Consequence of the Faith-Based Initiative: Organizational Practices and Religious Identity Within Faith-Based Human Service Organizations." Nonprofit and Voluntary Sector Quarterly, v.42/3 (2013).

Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention

Although there were a series of acts pertaining to juvenile justice and prevention in fragmented forms beginning in 1912, the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (JJDP) Act (Pub. L. No. 93-415, 42 U.S.C. § 5601 et seq.) of 1974 was the first to introduce a comprehensive, nationwide approach at the federal level. Consequently, the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) was established under the same act to provide organizational infrastructure to this approach. Even though the OJJDP does not actively enforce laws, oversee trials, or conduct interventions, they provide comprehensive information regarding policies, programs, and grants for all activities involving youth and violence prevention. Staff serve on various committees and partner with myriad organizations locally and nationally to ensure standardized procedures for violence prevention programs, procedural aspects of the juvenile justice system, and rehabilitation programs. Their involvement can be as intensive as providing oversight and funding to specific prevention programs or as general as providing an online programming framework and a support network for local and national organizations.

A Lewis Wicks Hine photograph, one of a series documenting the issue of child labor in 1912. Although laws were in place to prevent young children from working, some families had no choice but to force their children into work, where they were often arrested and put on probation (the two older boys pictured were on probation at the juvenile court). Although a series of acts pertaining to juvenile justice and delinquency prevention began in 1912, the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (JJDP) Act of 1974 was the first to introduce a comprehensive, nationwide approach at the federal level.

History

Until the mid-1900s, the criminal courts were primarily concerned with adult crimes and treated children in a paternalistic manner. Policy makers pushed for youth to have the same rights as adults, even if being tried within a juvenile court, by mandating due process in the judicial procedure. Further, the term delinquent was used arbitrarily by law enforcement officers, judges, or lawyers without any evidence of precriminal behavior, thereby introducing a bias in the process. Further, the separation of children and adults during the incarceration period became a concern secondary to negative outcomes for youth in nondivided environments. The need for uniformity and standardization of such procedures and preventive measures resulted in the establishment of the JJDP Act and consequently the OJJDP. This act ensured that the OJJDP worked in coordination with law enforcement and the criminal justice system to improve all aspects of youth violence issues and services.

Partnerships and Collaboration

The administrator of this office spearheads the support of local and state programs in their efforts to prevent delinquency and improve the juvenile justice system, with a particular focus on youth. The office has expanded its scope by focusing on prevention programs and rehabilitation resources. The OJJDP is also involved with the Coordinating Council on Juvenile Justice and Delinquency prevention, an independent body within the executive branch of the federal government, and the Federal Advisory Committee on Juvenile Justice, a consultative body composed of appointed representatives of state advisory groups. The OJJDP releases annual reports documenting the office's efforts in strengthening the juvenile justice system, combating delinquency, preventing victimization, and enhancing public safety. As an organization, it consists of the Office of the Administrator, the Office of Policy Development (including the communications unit), three program divisions (child protection, demonstration programs, and state relations and assistance), and the Grants Management Unit.

Purpose

As stated in their mission statement, the focus of the OJJDP is to prevent and respond to juvenile victimization and delinquency by providing leadership, coordination, and resources at a national level. They also work with states and local communities to develop and implement prevention and intervention programs. The OJJDP partners with stakeholders to improve the juvenile justice system by providing treatment and rehabilitative services for juvenile offenders and their families, protecting public safety, and holding offenders accountable.

Current Programs

The programs that OJJDP has provided resources for include the following: Children's Advocacy Centers, which work on child abuse cases; Crimes Against Children Research Center; Disproportionate Minority Contact; Enforcing Underage Drinking Laws; Formula Grants Program, for state and local delinquency prevention programs; Gang Reduction Program; Information Sharing to Prevent Juvenile Delinquency; Juvenile Information Sharing (JIS), a training and technical assistance project; Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force Program; Juvenile Accountability Block Grants Program; Juvenile Drug Courts and Reclaiming Futures Program; Model Dependency Courts Initiative; National Center for Missing and Exploited Children; National Gang Center; Program of Research on the Causes and Correlates of Delinquency; Programs for Tribal Youth; Safe Start, for young children and their families living in particularly violent circumstances; and the Truancy Reduction Demonstration Program.

The OJJDP as a whole contributes to human services and diversity by ensuring that racial minorities are given a special interest through purposeful integration into research and intervention programs. It provides a plethora of resources for organizations involved in youth violence prevention, families of delinquent youth, and the youth themselves, while simultaneously conducting research and advocating policy pertaining to juvenile justice issues. The Disproportionate Minority Contact (DMC) and Programs for Tribal Youth (PTY) in particular focus on ensuring that all racial and ethnic differences in the juvenile justice system are addressed. The DMC takes into consideration the number of youths from each minority group and advocates for legislative and systematic improvement efforts that reduce the identified disproportion. It also works with intervention programs to ensure that there are evidence-based objectives targeted at this disproportion. The PTY hosts a wide range of services, resources, and initiatives specifically for youth from the tribal population or living under the tribal government. It has also conducted leadership conferences and mentoring programs for at-risk Alaskan and other Native American youth as a part of the prevention and advocacy efforts.

Grants and Information Dissemination

OJJDP provides a variety of grants and assistance in the grant proposal process through their performance measures and grant management system. The focus of these initiatives has been on evidence-based intervention and innovative research methods. In conjunction with grant funding, the OJJDP provides substantial data and statistics in this field through the judicial system records and the National Research Council. They continue to disseminate programming guidelines, evaluation methods, and critical statistical information to states, as well as individual prevention organizations through their reports, newsletters, and publications.

Jeff R. Temple
Swathi Anantha
Chorong Kim
University of Texas Medical Branch at Galveston

See Also: American Correctional Association; Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators; At-Risk Youth Services; Community Development Block

Grants; Disposition of Juvenile Records; Gangs: Social Issues and Intervention; Incarceration and Sentencing, Racial Disparities in; Jail Diversion Programs for Children and Adolescents; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Detention Centers; Juvenile Justice System; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Fagan, Jeffrey, and Franklin E. Zimring, eds. The Changing Borders of Juvenile Justice: Transfer of Adolescents to the Criminal Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.

Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, "2010 Annual Report." http://www.ojjdp.gov/pubs/237051.pdf (Accessed October 2013).

Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, "About OJJDP." http://www.ojjdp.gov/about/about.html (Accessed October 2013).

Platt, Anthony M. The Child Savers: The Invention of Delinquency. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.

Ryerson, Ellen. The Best-Laid Plans: America's Juvenile Court Experiment. New York: Hill and Wang, 1978.

Watkins, John C., Jr. The Juvenile Justice Century: A Sociolegal Commentary on American Juvenile Courts. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 1998.

Office of Refugee Resettlement

The Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) is a federal agency of the U.S. government that aids refugees after their entry into the United States. The United Stated admits scores of thousands of individuals who meet the definition of refugee status agreed upon by the international community and a treaty dealing with refugee issues. A yearly quota is set for the number of refugees that will be admitted into the country.

The Department of Homeland Security grants refugee status to those people the agency approves before they enter the country. The U.S. State Department is responsible for moving the refugees to the United States. Once refugees arrive in the United States, the ORR, along with partnering organizations, begins to provide them with many kinds of aid and resources as they begin the process of resettling.

Definition of a Refugee

The accepted definition of a refugee includes the fact that a person is away from his or her home country and, due to persecution or substantial fear of persecution due to race, religion, nationality, being a member of a certain group, or having certain political opinions, cannot return to his or her home country. The United States passed its first refugee laws after World War II, when there was a large influx of refugees from Europe. Further legislation was passed after other refugee crises that led to influxes over succeeding years. After the end of the Vietnam War, a heavy burden was place upon the country with the large number of refugees created by that war. Various temporary measures were enacted to provide relief to these refugees. In 1980, permanent legislation was passed to provide a more constant source of aid to those coming in as refugees.

Establishing Laws and Procedures

The Refugee Act of 1980 established U.S. policy toward refugees and provided concrete aid for those resettling in the country. As a direct result of this legislation and later statutes, the ORR was formed as an agency under the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to provide essential aid to those refugees seeking a new start in the United States. The Administration for Children and Families is the section of HHS under which the ORR is housed.

In the years after the establishment of the ORR, laws were enacted that broadened the scope of help provided by the ORR to include others beside refugees. One class of people to which help was extended was immigrants from Cuba and Haiti. In many ways, people from these countries were treated as refugees. Cuba was a special case as a result of our country's long-standing conflict with Fidel Castro and the repression in that country. Haiti received special status because of the political oppression faced by many Haitians and the sheer number of those from Haiti reaching our shores in any way possible. Many Amerasians in southeast Asia left because, being of mixed parentage and often with American fathers, they were looked down upon in places like Vietnam. Congress passed legislation allowing many of these individuals and their families to immigrate to the United States, and they were given the right to claim many of the same benefits offered by the ORR to refugees. Three other classes of those who could receive refugee benefits were asylees, those entering the country and then claiming the same kind of persecution or fear of persecution as refugees and then given approval for asylum, certain torture victims, and victims of human trafficking.

The ORR and Its Partners

Although the ORR does not work directly with most refugees and others beneficiaries, the agency works with a variety of partners, both governmental and private. The ORR partners with a wide array of departments and agencies of the federal government. Being an agency under HHS, it naturally works with other agencies in the same department. Some of the issues dealt with by partner HHS offices are civil rights, drug abuse, mental health, the Head Start program, and aging. The ORR works with the departments of State, Justice, and Homeland Security. The ORR also partners with Mutual Assistance associations, community-based organizations whose leadership boards are made up of a majority of refugees or former refugees. These organizations are often better equipped to help refugees resettle, because those who lead the group have been where newer refugees are. The ORR also partners with the 50 states; each state has a refugee coordinator. States rely, in large part, on federal funds to carry out programs to help refugees.

An important class of partners for the ORR are resettlement voluntary agencies (VOLAGs). VOLAGs contract with other federal agencies to provide immediate reception into the United States. Many VOLAGs also contract with the ORR to provide ongoing help for refugees in the resettlement process once initial settlement has begun. A small handful of these VOLAGs provide a significant portion of refugee services in the United States. These VOLAGs are crucial lynchpins to the process of the ORR, giving help to refugees. Among the larger VOLAGs are the Church World Service, World Relief, U.S. Committee for Refugees and Immigrants, and United States Conference of Catholic Bishops.

A number of benefits are available to refugees and to those who are eligible for help from the ORR. One of the biggest benefits is direct cash assistance. The ORR provides the funds so that refugees can apply in their states of residence for this help. Those who meet certain qualifications can receive these payments for up to eight months. During the same time period, these individuals are eligible for refugee health insurance and often other health benefits. The ORR also arranges for those eligible under its programs to be able to receive certain social services. These services include assistance that would help a refugee get gainful employment such as social adjustment, child care, citizenship and naturalization efforts, and language issues.

With many of these services, priority is given to those who have been in the country for less than five years. The goal is that through these kinds of social services, refugees will be able to gain employment within one year. The ORR has also contracted with a number of entities to provide those who have survived torture or other abuse with emotional, medical, legal, social, and psychological help to facilitate recovery. The ORR has also developed a Refugee Agricultural Partnership program. This program supports and encourages rural and urban farming efforts of refugees and provides some income, food, and mental and physical health support. The ORR furthermore provides funding to school districts to enable better care and integration in schools for school-age children of refugees. Through the ORR, every effort is made to successfully integrate into their new home country those who have been through difficult circumstances.

Ken B. Taylor
New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary

See Also: Case Management Service; Family Reunification; Immigration, Human Service Issues; Information and Referral; Legal Services; Refugee Assistance; United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees; U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services; Vietnamese Americans; War and Terrorism, Survivors of.

Further Readings

Bruno, Andorra. "Refugee Admissions and Resettlement Policy." CRS Report 7-5700. U.S. Library of Congress, Congressional Research Service (August 8, 2013). https://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/RL31269.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Office of Refugee Resettlement. "U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and Administration for Children and Families." http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/orr (Accessed September 2013).

Refugee Council USA. "History of the U.S. Refugee Resettlement Program." http://www.rcusa.org/index.php?page=history (Accessed September 2013).

Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools

The Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools (OSDFS) was created in September 2002 to unite several programs concerned with the safety, health, and citizenship of the nation's schools that had previously operated under the direction of a number of different federal offices. Functioning under the auspices of the U.S. Department of Education, the OSDFS provided financial assistance for drug and violence prevention activities and activities that promoted the health and well-being of students in elementary and secondary schools and institutions of higher education; participated in interagency committees, groups, and partnerships related to drug and violence prevention; participated in the formulation and development of Department of Education program policy and legislative proposals and in overall administration policies related to violence and drug prevention; cooperated with other federal agencies in the development of a national research agenda for drug and violence prevention; and administered the programs of the Department of Education relating to character and civics education. After seven years of operations, sometimes marked by controversy, OSDFS faced congressional budget cuts of several programs that it had administered. In the wake of these cuts, on September 26, 2011, OSDFS's name was replaced by the Office of Safe and Healthy Students.

The Predecessors of OSDFS

In 1986, Congress passed the Drug-Free Schools and Communities Act. From 1987 to 1994, an increasing number of elementary and high school teachers reported physical conflict and weapons possession as a moderate to serious problem in their schools. In 1994, about 3 million violent crimes and thefts occurred each year in or near schools. In response to the concerns raised by this increase, on October 20, 1994, President Bill Clinton signed the Improving America's Schools Act. The act reauthorized the Elementary and Secondary Education Act and created the Safe and Drug-Free Schools Act as Title IV. This legislation extended, amended, and renamed the Safe and Drug-Free Schools and Communities Act and added violence prevention to the original drug prevention purpose. It authorized funding for federal, state, and local programs to assist schools in establishing an academic environment free of violence and drug use (including alcohol and tobacco).

The No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB), sponsored by powerful congressional leaders such as Representative John Boehner (R–OH) and Senator Edward Kennedy (D–MA), passed both houses of Congress with broad bipartisan support and was signed into law by President George W. Bush on January 8, 2002. Although NCLB is best known for its accountability and standardized testing components, it also reauthorized the Safe and Drug-Free Communities Act as Part A of Title IV and created the OSDFS under the Department of Education.

The Work of OSDFS

Operating under the supervision of the assistant deputy secretary of the Department of Education, who reported to the secretary and the deputy secretary on policy and program administration matters, the OSDFS provided leadership and coordinated programs in five areas: health, mental health, environmental health, and physical education; drug violence prevention—state programs; drug violence prevention—national programs; character and civic education; and policy and cross-cutting programs. The office distributed discretionary grants to local educational agencies and community-based organizations to promote health and prevent violence at the primary, secondary, and higher education levels.

Specific programs were varied in purpose and design. The Carol M. White Physical Education Program provided grants to initiate, expand, or enhance physical education programs, including after-school programs for students in kindergarten through 12th grade, which included activities such as development of and instruction in cogni-

The Gay, Lesbian, and Straight Education Network (GLSEN) marching in the 38th annual Capital Pride parade on June 8, 2013. GLSEN was founded by Kevin Jennings, who made antibullying the focus of his controversial tenure from 2009 to 2011 as assistant deputy secretary in charge of the Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools (OSDFS). The GLSEN works on improving the climate in schools for students who may face problems because of their sexual orientation.

tive concepts about motor skills and physical fitness that support a lifelong healthy lifestyle; opportunities to develop positive social and cooperative skills through physical activity participation; and opportunities for professional development for teachers of physical education to stay abreast of the latest research, issues, and trends in the field of physical education. Governors' grants gave priority to programs targeting unreached or inadequately reached student populations such as youths in juvenile detention facilities, runaway or homeless youth, pregnant and parenting teenagers, and school dropouts. One national project supported school-based mentoring programs and activities to serve children with the greatest need in grades four through eight who lived in rural areas, high-crime areas, or troubled-home environments or who attended schools with violence problems.

Controversy at OSDFS

Department of Education Secretary Arne Duncan appointed Kevin Jennings as assistant deputy secretary in charge of the OSDFS in 2009. Almost immediately, conservatives began attacking the appointment of Jennings, a gay man and founder of the Gay, Lesbian, and Straight Education Network, which works on improving the climate in schools for students who may face problems because of their sexual orientation. A group of 53 Republican members of Congress wrote President Barack Obama charging that Jennings would promote a pro-homosexual agenda in America's schools in violation of the values of many parents and requesting that the president remove Jennings from his position at OSDFS.

Jennings, who took office at a time when the media had reported a rash of suicides by gay students, made antibullying a particular focus of his tenure. He worked with groups such as the National Association for Pupil Transportation to create the first federal antibullying intervention program for bus drivers, and his office helped convene the first White House Conference on Bullying Prevention. Some in the school safety field felt that his focus was too narrow and that other areas suffered during the period of bullying emphasis, citing cuts in funding for emergency school grants that could be used to train staff members as one example. Jennings resigned in 2011, acknowledging the difficulty of enduring the firestorm of attacks but expressing his satisfaction that the national momentum to control bullying and make schools safer places for all students would continue.

Also in 2011, after cutting almost $80 million from the OSDFS budget, Congress eliminated a number of the programs administered by the office including the mentoring programs, charter education and state grants, mental health integration in schools, foundations for learning, grants to reduce alcohol abuse, and civic education. OSDFS announced that, while their commitment to their mission remained unchanged, it was necessary to maximize their newly limited resources. On September 26, 2011, the OSDFS ceased to exist. It was replaced by the Office of Safe and Healthy Students within the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education.

The Office of Safe and Healthy Students

The Office of Safe and Healthy Students is divided into three subordinate units: the Safe and Supportive Schools Group, the Healthy Students Group, and the Center for School Preparedness.

The Safe and Supportive Schools Group administers the safe and supportive schools grant program and coordinates interagency focuses on bullying, school recovery research, data collection, and drug and violence prevention activities. In addition, this group provides leadership character and civic education. The Healthy Students Group administers programs that provide financial assistance for activities that promote the health and well-being of students in elementary and secondary schools and institutions of higher education. The Carol M. White Physical Education Program is the responsibility of this group. Finally, the Center for School Preparedness is in charge of programs that improve the ability of schools to prepare for and respond to crises and disasters (natural and human-made). The center also oversees issues related to homeland security and maintains contact with school security police chiefs, school resource officers, and emergency first responders.

Wylene Rholetter
Auburn University

See Also: Department of Education, U.S.; Educational Services; Education Support Services; School Health Services; School Mental Health Project.

Further Readings

Shah, Nirvi. "Exiting Official Made Anti-Bullying a Priority." Education Week, v.30/35 (2011).

U.S. Department of Education. "ODFS." http://www2.ed.gov/about/offices/list/osdfs/index.html (Accessed December 2013).

U.S. Department of Education. Office of Elementary and Secondary Education. "Office of Safe and Healthy Students." http://www2.ed.gov/about/offices/list/oese/oshs/aboutus.html (Accessed December 2013).

Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services

The U.S. Department of Education operates the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitative Services (OSERS) to provide programs and support that assists those with special needs. With a dual focus on programs and research, OSERS works to implement some of the key legislation dealing with disabilities. OSERS is composed of the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services, one of four offices reporting to the deputy secretary of education. To serve its intended mission, OSERS operates three programs. These three programs are the Office of Special Education Programs, the National Institute on Disability and Rehabilitation Research, and the Rehabilitation Services Administration. Together, these three programs serve as the U.S. government's primary policy supports for individuals with disabilities.

Background

Although the Department of Education was first created in 1979, various offices and agencies of the U.S. government had worked to support individuals with disabilities before this. Previously a part of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, itself formed in 1953, the Department of Education was made independent in an effort to collect better data from U.S. schools as well as to establish policy for and administer federal aid to schools. The Department of Education also enforces federal civil rights laws and the privacy rights of students and families. This oversight has been especially significant with regard to the rights of individuals with special needs, as many of these are grounded in federal laws and regulations.

Beginning in the 1960s, more attention and funding were directed at the education of individuals with special needs. Prior to this, many children with special needs were provided with no education or housed in institutions that separated them from the general education programs in most schools. In 1967, however, James Gallagher, formerly a professor at the University of Illinois, became the director for the Bureau for the Education of the Handicapped, later the Office of Special Education Programs (OSEP).

Although the federal government has begun OSEP, many states and local school districts made few changes to provide educational services to children with special needs until 1975, when Congress passed the Education for All Handicapped Children Act (later the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act [IDEA]). This act required all schools accepting federal funds to provide children with cognitive or physical disabilities equal access to education. To this end, school districts were required to assess children who might have a disability. If a child was found to have a cognitive or physical disability, the school was required to form an individualized education program for him or her, and to monitor the child's progress over time. This change in law created many new opportunities for children with disabilities, many of which were monitored by the OSERS.

Operations and Responsibilities

OSERS is responsible for administering programs and monitoring compliance with a variety of federal laws. These laws include IDEA, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Education of the Deaf Act, the Act to Promote Education of the Blind Act, the Assistive Technology Act of 2004, the Randolph–Sheppard Act, and the Helen Keller National Center Act. To that end, OSERS is organized so that it provides programs in three areas, OSEP: the National Institute on Disability and Rehabilitation Research (NIDRR), and the Rehabilitation Services Administration (RSA). Each of these programs is responsible for formulating and disseminating policy, monitoring compliance, and supporting research and programming that benefits individuals with disabilities.

OSEP provides support for school personnel and others who work with children with disabilities. Specifically, OSEP helps ensure that children with disabilities are provided with a free and appropriate public education in the least-restrictive environment possible. To do this, OSEP works to formulate and promote policies related to early intervention programs, preschools, elementary schools, middle schools, and high schools so that children with disabilities are provided with the educational services they need. Because of the importance of skilled personnel to work with children with disabilities, OSEP promotes the training of professionals as well as volunteers, parents, and others. OSEP monitors compliance with federal rules and regulations regarding special education services, and it also coordinates the review of its own activities by relevant stakeholders. To ensure the continued evolution and improvement of services provided to children with disabilities, OSEP also provides competitive and state-administered program grants to promote discretionary programs and funds research and innovative services that show promise.

NIDRR works to improve the lives of individuals with disabilities regardless of their age. As the primary federal agency that supports applied research regarding as well as the training and development for individuals with disabilities, NIDRR seeks to improve available rehabilitative services. This is done in two ways. First, NIDRR seeks to generate new knowledge regarding disabilities and rehabilitative services and then to promote its effective use to permit individuals with disabilities to perform activities of their choice within their own communities. Second, NIDRR works to expand society's capacity to support individuals with disabilities and to provide them with full opportunities and accommodations necessary to live and thrive. NIDRR funds and monitors a series of grants that supports these goals and disseminates the findings to appropriate stakeholders.

The RSA was specifically established to monitor grant programs that were established pursuant to the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. As that act prohibits discrimination based on a person's disability, the RSA works to fund programs that allow individuals with cognitive or physical disabilities to live as independently as possible and to obtain suitable employment. To ensure this, the RSA provides funding for supports that will make these outcomes more likely, such as counseling, job training, and other individualized vocational services, along with medical and psychological care. State programs that provide these supports are funded by the RSA through a formula-based program. The RSA monitors these programs to ensure that individuals between the ages of 14 and 24 receive services in a timely and adequate manner. The RSA also audits financial records of the programs it funds to ensure compliance with financial requirements of various statutes and regulations. Results of the Title I funds that RSA provides to state vocational rehabilitation agencies are maximized through publicity that is shared with other groups.

OSERS works to coordinate efforts devoted to special education, vocational rehabilitation, and research devoted to support these programs. These efforts are intended to allow children and adults with disabilities to be, as much as possible, fully included in school, employment, and life. Through rigorous analysis of the various programs it funds, OSERS is able to identify those approaches that work best to foster success in schools for children and employment opportunities and independent living options for adults. As a result, the opportunities for individuals with disabilities have grown dramatically over the past five decades.

Stephen T. Schroth
Knox College

See Also: ADHD, Services for Individuals With; Administration on Developmental Disabilities; Children With Special Needs; Department of Education, U.S.; Head Start and Prekindergarten Programs; School Psychologists.

Further Readings

Bichenback, J. E. Ethics, Law, and Policy (The SAGE Reference Series on Disability: Key Issues and Future Directions). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2012.

Harwell, J. M., and R. W. Jackson. The Complete Learning Disabilities Handbook: Ready-to-Use Strategies and Activities for Teaching Students With Learning Disabilities. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2008.

McDonnell, J., and M. L. Hardman. Successful Transition Programs: Pathways for Students With Intellectual and Developmental Disabilities, 2nd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2010.

Outpatient Medical Care

Outpatient medical care is care that is not provided in an inpatient (acute care, subacute care, or residential) setting. Outpatient medical care takes place in physician's offices, clinics, testing centers, and in designated areas of most hospitals. Outpatient services are utilized by everyone, creating a very diverse clientele for service providers. Physicians, nurses, therapists, mental health professionals, and others all provide services regularly to an ethnically and racially diverse population.

Cost constraints and resource limitations in the United States have caused a shift in recent decades related to the delivery of many medical services. Procedures and treatments that were once typically inpatient hospital services are now provided on an outpatient basis or with limited inpatient treatments. In the early 1980s, Medicare changed the way it provided payment to hospitals. Prior to this time, if a person was hospitalized, his or her care, treatment, and procedures would be itemized, and insurance would have paid the bill—a process that made it very difficult to contain costs. Policymakers changed this to a system of diagnosis-related groups (DRGs), which categorized reasons for hospitalizations and paid the hospitals a set rate for delivering the services. Every admitting diagnosis, from heart failure to pneumonia to vaginal delivery, has a set price attached to it. If a patient is hospitalized for one of these diagnoses, the hospital receives the set rate for the diagnosis regardless of how long the patient actually stays in the hospital. The longer a patient stays in the hospital under the DRG payment system, the more money the hospital loses.

Costly inpatient treatment, combined with DRGs limiting the amount of money the hospitals can get paid, have created the implementation of increased outpatient services. Unless a person is hospitalized for an acute illness or acute symptom management, most tests and treatments are completed in outpatient settings. Inpatient acute and subacute care is much more costly than outpatient treatments and is reserved for medical management of illnesses and conditions that cannot be addressed in outpatient settings.

One of the drawbacks to increased delivery of care in outpatient settings is reduced access to care. Patients who do not have health insurance or have limited funds will have difficulty accessing care on an outpatient basis. These services are often administered in office-like settings, with a check-in point that requires payment prior to the service being completed. If a patient does not have the money to pay for the service, it can be difficult to have the service performed. The facility may have a payment plan or charity care application or may require either health insurance coverage or payment in full as the only options. Inpatient care or emergent care is, in this case, the only way a person is able to meet his or her medical needs. There are also outpatient health clinics and health departments that serve patients who are uninsured or have limited resources, but they may not provide all necessary services, and they also may exclude patients who make too much money to qualify for their services but not enough money to afford to pay for their care.

Medical Services

There are many types of outpatient medical care services. Radiological services including X-rays and other scans are typically performed on an outpatient basis. Laboratories used for blood draws and testing provide services that are generally for outpatients. Therapy services, including physical, occupational, and speech, are often performed in outpatient offices or clinics as opposed to during lengthy inpatient hospitalizations.

When determining the need for inpatient services, it is useful to ask the question: Is there something being done in the hospital that cannot be done anywhere else? In cases of acute illness or severe medical instability, 24-hour monitoring may be a necessity and thus require acute hospitalization. In subacute or acute rehabilitation settings, patients may be receiving such a large amount of therapy services during the day that keeping them in the facility where the services are being provided is most beneficial to their care and well-being. There are other times when this question yields a different answer, as in the case of a patient who has a wound that needs dressing. If the wound can be cared for either by the patient at home or with medical assistance at home or in the doctor's office, the patient will not meet the criteria to receive further inpatient care.

Cancer is one medical condition that has seen a shift in the way the treatment is provided. Many cancer treatments are now performed on an outpatient basis. In the past, chemotherapy was administered in the hospital during an inpatient stay. This has changed as now chemotherapy is provided on an outpatient basis except for special circumstances. Not only is it more cost-effective to administer chemotherapy to outpatients, but it is also proven to be safer. Chemotherapy patients can be highly susceptible to infections, making a hospital that houses hundreds of ill people a potentially very dangerous place to be.

Childbirth is another condition that has seen a shift in inpatient care. While there are not yet standards in place for complete outpatient deliveries, the amount of inpatient care is steadily shrinking. Gone are the days when a woman could stay in the hospital for four or five days after giving birth to a child. Currently, the average length of stay for a vaginal birth is 24 to 48 hours and three to four days for a cesarean birth. Other pregnancy-related care is administered as outpatient, including ultrasounds, glucose testing, and exams.

Psychological and Psychiatric Services

Most psychiatric and mental health services are also provided on an outpatient basis. Chronic mental illness is treated by outpatient psychiatry appointments, regular therapy, and sometimes even an intensive outpatient program (IOP). These programs provide more intensive care than weekly or biweekly hourly sessions but less than full-time residential care. Inpatient psychiatric treatment is provided on a very limited basis. If a patient is deemed appropriate for an outpatient level of care, then inpatient services will not be covered by insurance. In cases of substance abuse treatment, there are inpatient and outpatient services as well. Severity is not the only factor used in determining whether substance abuse treatment is inpatient or outpatient. If a patient has had multiple inpatient and outpatient treatments, insurance companies are often less likely to authorize additional costly inpatient services.

Kathryn Martinelli Brzozowski
Temple University

See Also: Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Diversity and Quality in Health Care; Health and Sickness, Differing Attitudes Toward; Health as a Human Right; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Disparities, Role of; Health Insurance; Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996; Public Health.

Further Readings

"National Hospital Ambulatory Medical Care Survey: 2006 Outpatient Department Summary." Medical Benefits, v.26/1 (2009).

Pathman, D. E., A. Fowler-Brown, and G. Corbie-Smith. "Differences in Access to Outpatient Medical Care for Black and White Adults in the Rural South." Medical Care, v.44/5 (2006).

Tehrani, A. B., S. R. Feldman, F. T. Camacho, and R. Balkrishnan. "Patient Satisfaction With Outpatient Medical Care in the United States." Health Outcomes Research in Medicine, v.2/4 (2011).

Overweight and Obese Adults and Children

Weight management has become an increasingly pervasive issue among Americans. Education on and intervention upon obesity are critical because the steady increase in obesity among adults and children has resulted in serious health consequences for the overall health and welfare of American citizens. To date, a variety of campaign and intervention initiatives have been developed and implemented to combat obesity among target populations.

Individuals who are categorized as overweight or obese have a body mass index (BMI) that falls above that of an individual who is within a healthy weight range. One's BMI is calculated using height and weight. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention categorizes an individual with a BMI between 25 and 29.9 as overweight. If a person has a BMI that falls above 30, he or she is considered to be obese.

It is important to note that BMI should not be the only indicator used in determining whether or not an individual is at a healthy weight. In certain cases, athletes who have a substantial amount of muscle mass may fall above the recommended BMI because their muscle mass places them at a much higher weight than a nonathlete. Given this, additional tests may need to be taken into consideration, such as body fat measurement, when determining whether an individual can be categorized as overweight.

Prevalence of Obesity

Weight problems are an increasingly common issue among American citizens. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has tracked the progression of obesity throughout the last two decades. Through this practice, it has been found that the average adult obesity rate has drastically increased from around 10 percent in the 1990s to nearly 33 percent in 2010. The Robert Woods Johnson Foundation has also projected that this rate will increase to nearly 50 percent or 60 percent in most U.S. states by 2030. Given this, it is imperative for new health interventions and campaign initiatives to focus on how to reduce obesity and prevent future incidences of this problem.

Obesity Among Children

Adults are not the only individuals suffering from obesity problems in the United States. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has reported that nearly 13 percent of American children were categorized as obese in 2011. To receive a categorization of obese, a child must be at or above the 95th percentile for BMI. As a result, these children are likely to suffer from detrimental health outcomes such as sleep apnea, type 2 diabetes, high cholesterol, anxiety, breathing problems, and joint problems. Many children who suffer from obesity issues have overweight or obese family members as well.

Obesity Implications

Obesity is a focal issue for public health practitioners because it can have serious negative consequences on the overall health of adults as well as children. Adults who experience obesity are likely to develop issues such as coronary heart disease, type 2 diabetes, cancer, hypertension, stoke, liver disease, gallbladder disease, sleep apnea, osteoarthritis, and infertility. These negative health outcomes can impede upon one's personal quality of life and the quality of life of his or her close family members. Additionally, these severe health issues are extremely costly for patients, health care systems, and taxpayers.

Factors Contributing to Obesity

Several different factors have been identified by the Mayo Clinic as contributors to obesity. One of the most basic contributors to this problem is an inactive lifestyle. People who lead sedentary lifestyles do not burn many calories. Many Americans who have sedentary jobs and drive vehicles to work do not take time out of their day to ensure that they are getting extra physical activity. This is why many obesity campaigns attempt to persuade target audience members to engage in small behavior changes that can easily be integrated into one's daily life. These behaviors include climbing the stairs instead of taking the elevator or going for short walks over one's lunch hour.

Another primary contributor to obesity is unhealthy dietary practices. Adults and children who consume diets that consist of foods with very high caloric value are more inclined to gain weight. These foods can include but are not limited to fast food, fried food, candy, and alcoholic beverages. Scaling back the amount of high-calorie foods an individual consumes can help that person lose weight over time.

Family history and genetics can also influence one's risk for obesity. Genetics can impact how fast an individual's metabolism runs and how quickly one's body can change calories into energy. Furthermore, genetics can influence where the body stores fat and how evenly it is distributed. Given this, it is important for people to consider familial history when developing a weight loss plan.

Household income and environmental factors have also been linked to obesity. This link is partially related to environmental issues such as the limited availability of nutritious food in lower-income communities. Low-income communities tend to have limited options in terms of stores and markets that offer fresh fruits and vegetables. Oftentimes, members of these communities are forced to make do with less-than-nutritious options provided at corner stores rather than full-fledged grocers. As a result, these individuals are not provided with a wide array of nutritious options that people have access to in middle- and higher-income communities.

Another risk factor for obesity is ethnicity. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reports that, in most U.S. states, blacks have the highest prevalence of obesity, followed by Hispanics and whites. The disparities in obesity levels among ethnicities may be the result of a couple of different factors. Specifically, different cultural groups may engage in different behaviors that contribute to weight gain. Alternatively, some cultural groups differ in what is deemed acceptable in terms of body weight and norms.

Media use is also a risk factor for obesity among children. Specifically, children who spend more time using media such as television, movies, the Internet, and video games are more likely to have weight problems than children who do not. This is likely due to the sedentary nature of consuming media. It is also important to note that televised content may impact weight issues among children as well. During children's programming, kids are exposed to advertisements for many different sugary snacks and beverages. Many of these children, in turn, request sugary snacks and beverages from their parents and subsequently gain unneeded weight.

Obesity Campaigns and Interventions

Given that weight issues can negatively influence one's health and welfare, it is unsurprising that numerous health initiatives have been undertaken in an attempt to curb this problem. Many health communication campaigns have focused on decreasing obesity levels among American adults. Oftentimes, these new and mass media initiatives attempt to persuade consumers to change their nutrition and exercise habits through messages disseminated via print materials, commercials, and radio spots.

In recent years, various campaign endeavors have attempted to curb obesity among children through messages disseminated via traditional mass media outlets (e.g., television, radio, and billboards) and new media channels (e.g., Web sites, social networks, and so on). One of the most notable recent campaigns has been the Let's Move campaign spearheaded by First Lady Michelle Obama. This campaign has disseminated messages promoting healthy consumption and physical activity through various means such as social networking Web sites, print materials, and television commercials. This initiative has also used entertainment–education to weave relevant health messages into children's entertainment television programs such as Sesame Street.

In addition to mass media campaigns, small group and face-to-face interventions have been implemented around the country in an effort to promote healthy lifestyles. Among adult populations, many interventions have been implemented at worksites. Some successful worksite interventions have focused on solving problems through individual and group counseling, skill-building activities, building social support networks for workers, and focusing on both diet and physical activity modifications.

To conclude, weight management issues have become an increasingly pervasive problem for American adults and children. The steady rise in obesity has had a detrimental impact on the overall well-being of U.S. citizens. Given the various factors contributing to weight management issues and obesity, it is critical for campaigns and interventions to be targeted toward and tailored to the needs of focal populations.

Carolyn Lagoe
University of New Haven

See Also: Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Public Health; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health; Social Determinants of Health; Workplace Health Services.

Further Readings

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, "Childhood Obesity Facts." http://www.cdc.gov/healthyyouth/obesity/facts.htm (Accessed November 2013).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, "Overweight and Obesity." http://www.cdc.gov/obesity/ (Accessed November 2013).

Mayo Clinic. "Obesity: Risk Factors." http://www.mayoclinic.com/health/obesity/DS00314/DSECTION=risk-factors (Accessed November 2013).

Robert Woods Johnson Foundation. "F as in Fat: How Obesity Threatens America's Future 2013: Adult Obesity Rates Hold Steady but Remain High." http://www.rwjf.org/en/research-publications/find-rwjf-research/2013/08/f-as-in-fat--how-obesity-threatens-america-s-future-2013.html (Accessed November 2013).

Encyclopedia of HUMAN SERVICES AND DIVERSITY

P

Pacific Islanders

Individuals who identify themselves as Pacific Islanders belong to a unique group of ethnic minorities. Pacific Islander Americans are also known as Oceanian Americans, with ethnic origins belonging to native populations of Oceania. The words Pacific Islander represent people whose heritage belongs to either Polynesia, Melanesia, or Micronesia; these represent subregions of Oceania. The northern Mariana Islands and American Samoa are regions, Guam is a U.S. territory, whereas Hawai‘i is a state. They are still seen as perpetual foreigners even if they are either natural-born citizens or native to Hawai‘i. Provided is an overview of the diversity within the ethnic group, demographic information, cultural values and social problems, mental health concerns, and implications for human service professionals as service providers meeting the needs of these clients.

Diversity Within the Group

The fact that there are at least 50 or more ethnic groups with subgroups and more than 100 languages makes it extremely difficult to sum up this group as a whole. In the past, the U.S. Census Bureau has also made it challenging for practitioners and researchers working with this ethnic group in providing culturally relevant services due in part to the changing definition on the census survey to help define this group. The concept of ambiguity in naming this group has had an impact on research and information disseminated about Pacific Islanders. The last U.S. Census in 2010 had a somewhat clearer description of Pacific Islander, yet most literature found still lumps Asian American and Pacific Islanders together. New terms added to Native Hawai‘ian and Other Pacific Islander include check boxes for Guamanian or Chamorro, Samoan, and Other Pacific Islander, with an area to write in other entries, which can include but are not limited to Polynesian (Tahitian, Tongan, or Tokelauan), Micronesian (Marshallese, Palauan, or Chuukese), and Melanesian (Fijian, Guinean, or Solomon Islander). This could have an overall impact on both studies and research.

Demographics

According to the National Education Association, Pacific Islanders or Asian American Pacific Islanders are one of the fastest-growing groups in the nation. In the 2010 census, the approximate total of single-race Asian Americans was reported as 14,674,252. The Native Hawai‘ians and Pacific Islander population was recorded as 540,013. American Asians as a single race account for 4.8 percent of the U.S. population, and Native Hawai‘ian and Pacific Islanders account for 0.1 percent. Yet the overall population total from 2000 to 2010 jumped from 281.4 million to 308.7 million, and that includes all other Pacific Islanders and subcategories that identified with this race, so this population has grown significantly by 9.7 percent since 2000. Pacific Islanders consist of an extremely diverse population who differ in all areas to include cultural norms, traditions, values, and languages. The growth for this ethnic population by the U.S. census is projected at a rate of 200 percent by 2050; this further implies that human service professionals may see an increase in clients seeking services. Large portions of Pacific Islanders are geographically located in the western-most states, with southern, northern, and midwest states gaining popularity.

Cultural Values

Cultural values differ from each group or ethnic subgroup; however, there have been some identified values that might be considered as useful knowledge for practitioners. For Pacific Islanders, family can take on several different meanings to include nuclear family, extended family, and members of a household. Extended families are still the primary structure of the family unit when possible, which is an essential component of collectivism within their culture. A sense of family obligation is a strong tie for families of the Pacific. Age and intelligence are honored due to wisdom gained and more life experience; therefore, elders should be more respected than youth. Educated individuals command respect, and in some Pacific Islander subgroups, educational achievement is a priority.

Filial piety is associated with deep respect for parents, and children are to love and obey parents. Shame is connected to filial piety and used by family members to disrupt inappropriate behaviors as well as diminish an unwanted reputation, which may highlight the family or individual. Self-control in emotional situations and calmness help maintain a sense of dignity. Modest behaviors and unassuming attitudes are expected in individuals, which are representative of their collectivistic nature. Individuals' needs are often repressed in order to satisfy group needs and goals.

Social Problems Encountered by Pacific Islanders

Westernization has had an impact on Pacific Islanders and contributed to forms of oppression and racism. Most Pacific Islanders are original inhabitants of the United States and share the experience of other natives whose lives changed as a result of European explorers. Historically, these events and circumstances have shaped the mental health status of this ethnic group. One of the features of the traditional Pacific Islander family was the clearly defined roles of the individual within the family system. Pacific Islanders who migrate to the United States may find roles being disrupted depending on acculturation or assimilation. For those who migrated and those who are U.S. residents, forms of assimilation can impact the family and lead to stress with the acceptance of family violence as a way to cope. Disruption of communication between parents and children lead to breakdown of family structures. Changes in the status of women and children may be a source of tension for the family. The loss of culture or traditions such as breaking patterns in collectivism and having to reshape identities if migration occurred has affected families.

Urbanization as a whole on Pacific Islanders has included drug and alcohol abuse, issues regarding low educational achievement with a prevalence in poor housing and overcrowding, and a significant decrease in health status. Low levels of income among Pacific Islanders contribute to the high rates of poverty; almost 20 percent of Pacific Islanders live in impoverished conditions. Inadequate coverage of health care for Pacific Islanders is an obstacle in receiving proper medical care and mental health services. Close to 16 percent of all Pacific Islanders lack health insurance, and financial stressors may contribute to this problem. Pacific Islanders face the model minority myth, which stereotypes all Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders as doing exceedingly well in terms of education and income. There is an expectation that they are equally intelligent and that average income is relatively high, yet the educational achievement and economic attainment varies greatly within this complex group. Additionally, compared to any other group, Pacific Islanders are overrepresented in the military at an alarming rate of 249 percent. Military families have unique hardships, and with the high rate of service members, this is a stressor of modern-day family life for enlisted Pacific Islanders.

Mental Health

For many cultures of the Pacific, there is no direct translation for mental illness because emotional and psychological problems are often integrated

Compared to any other group, Pacific Islanders are overrepresented in the military at an alarming rate. Military families have unique hardships, and with the high rate of service members, this is a stressor of modern-day family life for enlisted Pacific Islanders. Here, dancers and performers prepare for the Asian American and Pacific Islander Heritage Month Celebration at Contingency Operating Base Adder, Iraq, honoring the soldier diversity of Asian/Pacific Americans in the U.S. Army.

holistically with biological, cognitive, and spiritual functions. Not only are there many family alterations due to social structures changing that cause stress, but the alarming statistic on the rate of military service from this ethnic group suggests that veterans of this population could be at greater risk for many mental health problems, which could include post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), substance abuse, increased suicide rate, and homelessness. Rates of depression and anxiety are reported as high, but this varies among the subgroups within Pacific Islanders.

Implications for Human Services

Human service professionals should be aware of the differences that exist for each client within the Pacific Islander ethnic group and subgroups. Knowledge about assimilation and acculturation levels for the client may be helpful for human services professionals within this group and may be helpful in determining appropriate services. Barriers to seeking services include lack of trust, not recognizing mental health issues as problems, cultural values placed on self-disclosure, language barriers, and family conflict, lack of insurance or finances are also significant.

Human service professionals should have a basic understanding of barriers and look for ways to improve or change how services are provided. Cultural sensitivity should be displayed by acknowledging an awareness about how the client identifies him- or herself in terms of ethnic identity. Human service professionals should also be aware of any biases held about this group.

As depression, anxiety, PTSD, family violence, substance abuse, low academic achievement, and stressors related to poverty and housing conditions are current issues, human service professionals should be skilled at finding resources and providing necessary services.

Community-based preventative programs could reach a larger segment of this population. Pacific Islanders are more likely to see health care providers than seek mental health services; it may be necessary for human service professionals to provide insight to medical practitioners about Pacific Islanders and inform them of services or resources available to this population. Family and extended family members are important to this ethnic group; when providing services it may be helpful to suggest that all family members are welcome. Human service professionals should understand the impact the family has on a Pacific Islander client.

Mia K. Swan
Norfolk State University

See Also: Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Ethnic Diversity and Values.

Further Readings

Choi, K., J. Paul, G. Ayala, R. Boylan, and S. E. Gregorich. "Experiences of Discrimination and Their Impact on Mental Health Among African American, Asian and Pacific Islander, and Latino Men Who Have Sex With Men." American Journal of Public Health, v.103/5 (2013).

Cook, W. K., C. Chung, and W. Tseng. Demographic and Socioeconomic Profiles of Asian Americans, Native Hawaiians, and Pacific Islanders in the United States. San Francisco, CA: Asian and Pacific Islander American Health Forum, 2011.

Hixson, L., B. B. Hepler, and M. O. Kim. The Native Hawaiian and Other Pacific Islander Population: 2010. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Commerce, U.S. Census Bureau, 2012.

Kick, C. G. "The Changing Pacific Island Family and Children's Welfare." International Community Development Conference, Rotorua, New Zealand, April 2001.

Lee, S. J., and K. K. Kumashiro. A Report on the Status of Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders in Education: Beyond the "Model Minority" Stereotype. Washington, DC: National Education Association of the United States Human and Civil Rights, 2005.

Tautolo, E., P. J. Schluter, and G. Sundborn. "Mental Health Well-Being Amongst Fathers Within the Pacific Island Families Study." Pacific Health Dialog, v.15/1 (2009).

Tsai, J., and R. Radhakrishnan. "Characterizing Asian American and Pacific Islander Veterans Who Use Health Services." Military Medicine, v.177/1:1 (2012).

White House Initiative on Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders (WHIAAPI). Fact Sheet: What You Should Know About Native Hawaiians and Pacific Islanders (NHPI's). http://www.whitehouseaapi@ed.gov (Accessed January 2014).

Pain Management

More than one-third of Americans suffer from chronic pain. Their medical care, lost work, and disability benefits cost about $100 billion annually. Chronic pain is associated with illness and injury, and patients often develop co-occurring disorders of depression, anxiety, and addiction. As 76 million baby boomers approach old age, issues associated with chronic pain and its management will increase the demand on human service providers.

The Nature of Pain

Pain is an unpleasant sensory experience associated with actual or potential tissue damage. Acute pain usually subsides when the site of a trauma heals. Persistent pain is associated with medical conditions such as cancer, neuropathy, and arthritis. Pain can also be associated with treatments such as chemotherapy and physical therapy. The assessment of pain relies heavily on the report of the patient. Pain can be perceived as pressure, aching, or burning. A pain assessment includes evaluation of the etiology of the pain, its location in the body, the physiological system that is affected, the frequency and duration of painful episodes, and the patient's rating of its intensity.

How pain is experienced, expressed, and treated differs among races, ethnicities, and cultures, placing some minorities at risk for inadequate treatment. Generally, African Americans, Native Americans, and Asians receive less-intensive pain treatment than Caucasians. African Americans use prayer to cope with pain, while Caucasians are more likely to ignore the pain. It is difficult to determine if the discrepancy in treatment is caused by a difference in how the patient perceives and reports the pain or if it is a result of misattributions by health care providers. Some research suggests that health care providers who speak the same language as the pain patient are more likely to match their objective assessment of a patient's pain to the patient's subjective report.

Treatment of Chronic Pain

Since the 1980s, when the use of opioids to treat pain came into question, pain management has emerged as a medical specialty. Advances in medical technology have increased treatment options for patients who enter pain management programs when physicians fail to treat conditions underlying the pain, do not believe the pain is as great as the patient is reporting, or suspect that the patient is drug seeking.

Interdisciplinary pain management teams may include physicians, counselors, nurse practitioners, physical and occupational therapists, and providers of massotherapy and acupuncture. Effective pain management is individualized and multimodal to include medication, physical therapy, exercise, and application of ice or heat. Procedures associated with pain reduction include injections to block the perception of pain, massage, and acupuncture.

Massotherapy helps to manage pain by decreasing inflammation. Eastern cultures use acupuncture, a method of placing small pins in the patient's skin, to regulate the flow of energy. Physical therapy builds strength and mobility. Psychological treatments include biofeedback, cognitive therapy, life management training, and support groups.

The World Health Organization (WHO) has developed guidelines to determine the appropriate medications for each type of pain and the correct dosages for the intensity of pain. Opioids are effective in managing pain but are highly addicting and can impair cognitive and motor functions. If the patient states that a medication relieves pain but the physician does not assess improvement in functioning, assessment for substance abuse is indicated. Some aging baby boomers were recreational drug users in their youth, putting them at high risk for abuse and addiction as they age.

In almost half of the United States, cannabis is legal for pain management. Most medical marijuana comes in pill form. In some states, it is legal to grow and smoke marijuana for medical use. Advocates for legalizing medical marijuana argue that it is effective in managing pain with a reduced risk of addiction. Opponents caution that extended use of marijuana causes amotivational disorder, which has the potential to interfere with the patient's participation in other therapies that support treatment goals of better physical, cognitive, and social functioning. In most people, marijuana increases appetite. The subsequent weight gain has the potential to burden the musculoskeletal system and ultimately worsen the pain.

An effective pain management program incorporates psychological services that address issues of loss, grief, depression, anxiety, stress, family dynamics, and coping with the pain itself. Biofeedback is a method by which a patient gains awareness of the body and control of his or her pain. The therapist teaches the patient techniques to decrease the perception of pain using a connection to a biofeedback machine that provides auditory or visual feedback. Hypnosis is a pain management method that alters consciousness to change the perception of pain. Relaxation training can assist a patient in decreasing muscle tension that is often associated with headaches and backaches.

Because pain interferes with serotonin production, even localized pain can diminish a patient's sense of well-being. Pain patients often lose the ability to work, play sports, do household tasks, or be intimate because of limitations in bending, lifting, or mobility. Counseling can assist these patients in identifying and grieving the losses associated with pain. Pain is invisible to others. Some families and friends are not supportive. Others overaccommodate the pain patient, creating secondary gains and inadvertently creating learned helplessness. Family therapy can help families to rework their roles. Addiction counseling addresses dependence upon pain medications. Self-help groups are a strong adjunct to pain management programs. Groups may be dedicated to pain management or to an underlying condition such as cancer, lupus, fibromyalgia, or arthritis. Cognitive-behavioral therapy can empower a chronic pain patient to redistribute time and energy, mobilize resources, and reestablish a sense of self-worth.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Webster University

See Also: Assistive Technology; Disabled Clients; Quality of Life, Measurement of.

Further Readings

Elkins, Gary, Mark Jensen, and David R. Patterson. "Hypnotherapy for the Management of Chronic Pain." International Journal of Clinical and Experimental Hypnosis, v.55 (2007).

International Association for the Study of Pain. "Culture and Pain." Pain Clinical Updates, v.10/5 (2002).

Main, Chris J., Michael J. L. Sullivan and Paul J. Watson. Pain Management. Philadelphia: Elsevier Health Sciences, 2007.

Palliative Care

Palliative care is a universally available approach to health care that addresses both the needs of patients and families experiencing serious, progressive, or life-threatening illnesses and also the costs of delivering such needed services. Different from a traditional disease-model approach to medicine, palliative care is a paradigm of care focused on anticipating, preventing, and alleviating the suffering of serious, progressive, or life-threatening illness. The goal of palliative care is to improve quality of life by holistically addressing the physical, emotional, social, and spiritual needs of patients and their families. By emphasizing clear communication among medical professionals, patients, and their families, palliative care enhances the coordination of health care services, which usually results in reduced costs.

The Benefits of Palliative Care

There are several benefits of palliative care. From a medical perspective, patients receiving palliative care usually show physical improvement, as their symptoms are addressed early, leading to longer survival as well as higher quality of life. A specific emphasis of palliative care is addressing pain levels. By focusing on reducing pain levels, palliative care increases the comfort of patients and gives them peace of mind. Moreover, numerous studies show that palliative care can help control fatigue, anxiety, breathlessness, nausea, depression, constipation, and other sources of symptom distress, leading to improved medical outcomes.

When patients receive palliative care, their psychosocial, emotional, and spiritual well-being are just as important to caregivers as their physical well-being. Likewise, the concerns and wellness of families and friends is important in palliative care. The financial benefits of palliative care are also significant. The costs of palliative care, when compared to usual methods of treatment, are lower at every juncture of the health care process. For example, when individuals received palliative care, their costs of treatment per day were usually lowered by almost $300, as costs for hospital admissions, laboratory tests, medications, and treatment in intensive care units (ICUs) were all reduced. By reducing reactive medical decisions and emphasizing patient-informed treatment, medical care is tailored to the specific needs of patients while minimizing costs incurred from expensive procedures that may be ordered indiscriminately in emergency situations.

Palliative Care and Diversity

Cultural, racial, and ethnic differences exist in how different groups of people experience palliative care. For instance, although the benefits are clear, significant differences exist between African Americans and whites in the use of palliative care. African Americans hold less-favorable views of palliative care than whites, hold greater distrust of the health care system, and are more likely to seek aggressive treatment at the end of life. Cultural differences also shape patient and family views of receiving palliative care. For example, the belief that people are individual free agents with the right to make their own decisions about accepting or receiving treatment is a Western-held assumption that does not always translate to other cultures. Patients and families from Asian, Middle Eastern, or African cultures may view individuals as part of a unit, extended family, or tribe where family members are always involved and have a major say in all important personal decisions. Competent human service providers must, therefore, remember to assess and value the role of diversity in working with patients receiving palliative care.

Palliative Care and Hospice Care

Palliative care is sometimes considered the same as hospice care. While both forms of care are based on similar principles of patient-centered holistic care, there are two important distinctions between the approaches to medical treatment. Hospice care is offered to patients and families during the last few weeks or months of life. Physicians refer patients to hospice care when all other efforts to find a cure are exhausted. Palliative care, in comparison, is provided at any time during the trajectory of treating patients. Patients, therefore, can receive curative medical treatment while receiving palliative care. Perhaps the best way to think about palliative and hospice care is to consider both approaches as part of a continuum of care. Palliative care is a broader approach for anyone, while hospice focuses on minimizing pain and enhancing the quality of life for patients expected to live less than a few months.

Roles for Human Service Professionals in Palliative Care

There are important direct and indirect roles for human service professionals in palliative care. Palliative care is usually provided by an interdisciplinary staff. Physicians, nurses, social workers, chaplains, nutritionists, rehabilitation counselors, and occupational therapists normally work together as a team to coordinate care. Human service professionals are also needed as advocates and educators of palliative care. There is an increased need for community education about the benefits of palliative care. Hospitals and health care clinics need professionals with the communication skills necessary to engage patients and families in conversations about palliative care. They also need to educate more physicians to understand the medical, psychosocial, emotional, spiritual, and fiscal benefits of referring patients for palliative care sooner rather than later. In summary, as the population ages and health care spending escalate, human service professionals need to bring palliative care to the forefront of health care discussions as a viable approach to cost-effective, high-quality care.

Michael E. Sherr
University of Tennessee at Chattanooga

See Also: Adult Day Care; Aging and Adult Services; Alternative Medical Systems; Case Management Services; Community-Based Services; Continuum of Care; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Hospice Services.

Further Readings

Byock, Ira. The Best Possible Care: A Physician's Quest to Transform Care Through the End of Life. New York: Penguin Group, 2013.
Emanuel, Linda L., and Lawrence S. Librach. Palliative Care: Core Skills and Clinical Competencies. St. Louis, MO: Saunders, 2011.
Mackinlay, Elizabeth. Palliative Care, Aging, and Spirituality: A Guide for Older People, Carers, and Families. Philadelphia: Kingsley Publishers, 2012.
Meier, Diane E., Stephen L. Isaacs, and Robert Hughes. Palliative Care: Transforming the Care of the Serious Illness. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2010.
Sherman, Deborah W., and Jooyoung Cheon. "Palliative Care: A Paradigm of Care Responsive to the Demands for Health Care Reform in America." Nursing Economics, v.30/3 (2012).

Pandemics

The roles of the human service professional include promoting the welfare of humanity and mobilizing efforts to meet individuals' needs. As such, they are uniquely positioned to impact efforts at addressing societal epidemics and global pandemics. This entry will define epidemics and pandemics, examine the impact of such crises, and address various roles the human services professional can take in preparation and response at the individual and systemic levels.

Defining Epidemics and Pandemics

Public health issues that are simultaneously experienced by a disproportionately large number of individuals can be defined as an epidemic or a pandemic. They differ by geographical coverage. An epidemic is focused to a particular city, region, or nation, while a pandemic is global. When both local regions and international communities are concurrently experiencing a crisis, the terms pandemic and epidemic may be used interchangeably. When a health issue is contained to no more than a single area, the crisis is specified as an epidemic. Efforts to address community needs are very similar for both pandemics and epidemics. However, because they are experienced by such a large number of people, pandemics result in far greater costs to society both economically and socially. Epidemics and pandemics can be infectious diseases transmitted from human to human or noninfectious conditions that result in health consequences.

Types of Epidemics and Pandemics

Infectious disease epidemics and pandemics include influenza, cholera, HIV/AIDS, dengue fever, and measles. The most common include strains of influenza. Of these, in recent years, avian flu (or bird flu) and swine flu have been most prevalent. Currently, cholera and HIV/AIDS are deemed examples of pandemics while the others are examples of present epidemics in various countries. Consequences of infectious disease epidemics and pandemics include social phobias, mandatory vaccinations, overtaxed health care systems, high rates of mortality, and prejudice and discrimination against specific individuals and/or regions affected by the disease.

Pandemics and epidemics that are noninfectious conditions resulting in health consequences include bioterrorist attacks, salmonellosis outbreaks, hurricanes, obesity, and nonmedical use of prescription drugs. Health consequences of these pandemics and epidemics can be both physical and mental. They include but are not limited to heart disease, diabetes, debilitating levels of stress and anxiety, increased prevalence of social phobias, substantial economic loss, malnutrition, displaced populations, fraudulence and criminal behavior, social stigma, and death.

The World Health Organization developed a scale for identifying stages of influenza pandemics. However, its phases are applicable to categorizing virtually any type of epidemic or pandemic. In general, the scale ranges from phase 1 in which there is no infectious or noninfectious condition to phase 6 in which there is a full-blown pandemic. Specifically, in phase 1, while animals may be experiencing a particular condition, no human cases would have been reported. In phase 2, human cases have been noted and thus an epidemic and/or pandemic threat exists. Phase 3 consists of clusters of individuals experiencing the condition yet a community outbreak has not yet occurred. In Phase 4, the condition is epidemic; entire communities, regions or a nation is affected. Phase 5 is identified by the condition existing in two countries and indicates that a pandemic is inevitable. Finally, phase 6 is characterized by the condition existing in multiple countries and is indicative of a global pandemic. These phases can be used to guide the development of appropriate prevention and response efforts at each level.

Human Service Professionals' Roles

The primary goal of efforts aimed at addressing epidemics and pandemics is to minimize the number of individuals affected by an infectious or noninfectious condition and ultimately prevent mortality. Many of these efforts are nonpharmaceutical community mitigation strategies. With training in advocacy, prevention programming, collaboration, systems theory, brokering, and cultural competence, human service professionals are well equipped to positively address community needs with regard to these societal crises. They may play an important role in providing interventions at pre-epidemic, epidemic, and post-epidemic stages.

In particular, the human service professional is capable of developing strategies that prevent health conditions and death and ultimately attempt to mitigate the impact of an impending epidemic. These may include efforts to disseminate information through the media, in academic institutions, and in various health care settings. This information may be psychoeducational in nature and include physical health-related topics such as reminding individuals to obtain annual vaccinations, cover their mouth when coughing and sneezing, engage in frequent hand washing, routinely clean their surroundings, stay home when ill, engage in safe sex practices, and eat nutritionally. Human service professionals may also engage in advocacy efforts to prevent stigmatization of those who become afflicted by a condition. They may also advocate for policy development in agencies to address mobilization of resources and personnel as well as coping strategies for addressing the consequences of epidemics. This may include flexibility around absences due to either experiencing the condition or preventing exposure to the condition, as well as allowing employees to work from home during epidemic crises.

Once a health condition has reached epidemic proportions, a human service professional can continue psychoeducational efforts to minimize the spread of the condition, correct misinformation, and prevent discrimination of those with the condition. In general, psychoeducation expands to promoting the wearing of facemasks, encouraging household isolation upon exposure to the condition, and early accessing of health care. Human service professionals may also work collaboratively with other health professionals to establish continuum of care plans for those directly impacted by the condition. Direct service initiatives include support to those affected, including family members and caregivers. For those experiencing the condition directly, human service professionals can assist in accessing and navigating health care systems, addressing employers, and coping with the psychosocial consequences of affliction, including isolation, discrimination, and failing health. Families and caretakers may also benefit from psychosocial support to assist in coping with fears associated with losing a loved one and/or becoming afflicted with the condition oneself.

They may also need coping skills to manage the stigma encountered as a result of being associated with an afflicted individual. Skills associated with crisis counseling may be employed. Human service professionals may advocate for company follow-through with policies related to sick leave and working from home. Ultimately, efforts are aimed at minimizing social disruption, mitigating economic consequences, and curtailing mortality. These efforts should be maintained until population immunity is achieved.

In the post-epidemic/pandemic stage, recovery becomes the focus. Prevention and intervention strategies and policies should be reviewed for effectiveness. Economic recovery efforts should be taken due to disruptions to both production and consumption during the epidemic. Individuals may also need assistance recovering financial losses through insurance agencies or covering expenses through social service agencies. Mental health services for individuals will be particularly important during the post-pandemic/epidemic stage. Addressing post-traumatic stress symptoms, developed phobias, and persisting anxiety may be necessary.

Finally, being skilled in grief counseling to address individuals struggling with losses associated with the epidemic are paramount. In addition to addressing the obvious grief associated with the loss of a loved one due to death from an epidemic condition, individuals may need assistance in coping with factors such as the loss of physical abilities due to exposure to the epidemic condition, loss of economic stability due to prolonged absenteeism from work, and/or loss of a sense of safety and security in society.

Tammi F. Milliken
Robert A. Dice
Old Dominion University

See Also: AIDS/HIV Programs; Community Health Centers; Crisis Services; Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Health Care Delivery, Models of.

Further Readings

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "Epidemic Intelligence Service (2013). http://www.cdc.gov/EIS/downloads/EIS_Brochure.pdf (Accessed March 2013).
Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "Nonpharmaceutical Interventions" (2013). http://www.cdc.gov/nonpharmaceutical-interventions (Accessed March 2013).
Department of Health and Human Services: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "Interim Pre-Pandemic Planning Guidance: Community Strategies for Pandemic Influenza Mitigation in the United States: Early, Targeted, Layered use of Nonpharmaceutical Interventions (2007)." http://www.flu.gov/planning-preparedness/community/community_mitigation.pdf (Accessed March 2013).
Eliadis, E. E. "The Role of Social Work in the Child Obesity Epidemic." Social Work, v.51/1 (2006).
Tomaszewski, E. P. "HIV and AIDS: Introduction. International Federation of Social Workers (2012)." http://ifsw.org/policies/hiv-and-aids (Accessed March 2013).

Parenting Skills Training

Parents have a major influence on their children's development. Good parent–child interactions have a positive influence, while poor parent–child interactions may yield negative outcomes. Parenting styles—that is, the typical ways parents think, feel, and behave in terms of child rearing—matter, and optimal parenting can be taught. Furthermore, what is optimal in one culture may vary in another culture or ethnic group. Parenting skills training programs are designed to help parents become better parents through skill development and education; these programs focus on developing appropriate and positive parenting practices. Parent training programs allow families to break negative cycles, and parents learn improved family management skills and positive parenting skills and are given information about child development and how that influences their interactions with their children.

Programs

Parenting skills programs emerged in the late 1960s and have grown in popularity since that time. These programs developed with a shift in focus from changing the behavior of the child to changing the behavior of the parents. Evidence had emerged suggesting that parents could help their children change their behavior as well as therapists could. Parent training programs are only one type of intervention, but they appear to be the treatment of choice, especially for young children.

Originally, parenting programs focused on correcting problem behaviors in children, but programs have expanded to include improving the cognitive development of children, treating internalizing problems such as anxiety disorders, and treating or managing physical health issues, and have been used for parents and families with children who are at risk for maltreatment. Parenting programs vary in focus, but they tend to cover similar material and teach similar skills. Programs may be active, passive, or both. While both active and passive parent training programs appear effective, active programs, especially programs that require parents to practice learned skills with their own children and those that include coaching, yield better outcomes.

There are many different parent training programs that have been developed. Some, such as the ones described, have been identified as evidence based for the treatment of disruptive behaviors in pre- and school-aged children. Helping the Non-Compliant Child is a program designed for children ages 3 to 8 years and involves parent training aimed at teaching skills to stop or reduce the negative parent–child interactions. The Incredible Years involves both a parent training program and a child training program. The parent training component uses small groups in which parents view videos that demonstrate desired parenting skills and parents are taught how to teach their children problem-solving skills. In parent–child interaction therapy (PCIT), parents are taught specific skills and techniques to improve interactions with their children. PCIT includes two phases: the first is child-directed interactions, and the second is parent-directed interactions. The Parent Management Training Oregon Model (PMTO) teaches parents to encourage and monitor their children's behaviors as well as teaching parents about how to use behavior modification programs with their children.

The Triple P-Positive Parenting Program is a multilevel and multidisciplinary, evidence-based system. It provides different levels of treatment intensity depending on the expressed need. These levels range from public access to intense mental health care. Parents are taught skills and are guided by therapists through live coaching during interactions with their children. Support strategies are designed to prevent or reverse behavioral, emotional, and developmental problems in children. Currently, the Triple P program is receiving much attention and has been implemented in a number of countries with much success. In general, there is a lot of evidence supporting the use of behavioral parent training programs for many different types of problems.

One of the major challenges facing mental health practitioners is getting help to all individuals who need it, including those in rural or remote areas. Health care services are expanding with the advent of telehealth and telerehabiliation technologies. Parenting skills training programs are usually time limited but are intensive, requiring multiple hours of commitment each week. Families in rural areas are at a significant disadvantage when it comes to accessing evidence-based treatments. Parenting training programs have been developed to require only minimal therapist involvement. Research has shown that programs can be delivered over vast distances and can result in a decrease in negative child behaviors and an increase in positive parenting skills. Parents were also supportive of the help received even though it was done over a distance. The ability to provide treatment even to families who live in isolated areas will only continue to get better. This potential is especially salient for smartphone technologies. The potential associated with these devices is large and may increase program adherence and participation.

Although it is universal that good child and parent outcomes are dependent on good family interactions, different cultures may have different views as to what constitutes good parent–child interactions and what contributes to good emotional and physical outcomes. Cultural differences can influence whether parents are willing to participate in a parenting program, whether they view a particular behavior as a problem, and whether a particular intervention strategy would be acceptable. Because most parent skills training programs have been developed to reflect European American child-rearing beliefs, minority parents may not benefit as much from these parent skills training programs.

There is considerable debate as to whether culture-specific adaptations to parent skills training programs are needed. Several studies have examined the differences between PCIT and culturally adapted versions of the program. Both PCIT and the adapted programs were found to decrease symptoms better than traditional therapies, but there was no difference among the versions. The effectiveness of the Incredible Years program has also been examined for African American, Asian American, Caucasian, and Hispanic mothers, and significant improvements were found across all groups. These results suggest that culture-specific parent skills training is not needed; however, the design of the Incredible Years program may allow parents to incorporate skills learned into their own belief systems, which may account for why the program was beneficial across groups. The Triple P program acknowledges and respects the diversity of family types and cultural backgrounds and aims to empower families by building on existing parenting strengths and focusing on self-regulation of parental skill in order to enhance parental self-sufficiency and preparedness for future problem solving. By focusing on self-regulation, it allows parents to choose meaningful and culturally relevant personal goals. It has been found to be an effective and acceptable program in a number of countries.

In sum, culturally adapted versions of parent skills training programs have been found to be as good as traditional programs. It remains unclear, however, as to whether there is a need for these culturally adapted versions of parent skills training programs. There is a lot of research that does recommend that clinicians take an individual’s culture into consideration during treatment. Because this may be particularly important when looking at parent–child interactions due to the influence culture may have on these interactions, future research will determine if culture-adapted parent training versions are necessary or whether generic versions work as well. When evidence-based training programs are adapted to reflect the culture of participants, families may be more drawn to participate. Adaptations, if used, must ensure the core principles of the programs remain. Using local language and visual materials that reflect the culture are important considerations. There is, however, a need to do further research to compare results from culturally adapted parent training programs to standard versions. What does seem clear is that parent skills training programs have been shown to be beneficial for improving interactions between parents and children.

Elizabeth Levin
Jennifer Drummelsmith
Laurentian University

See Also: Child Support Agencies and Services; Children, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in.

Further Readings

Cuzzocrea, F., O. Patrizia, L. Rosalba, and M. A. Maria. “Parent Training Intervention for Parents From Different Cultural Backgrounds With Children With Behavioral Problems.” Psychology, v.4/3A (2013).

Eyberg, S. M., M. M. Nelson, and S. R. Boggs. “Evidence-Based Psychosocial Treatments for Children and Adolescents With Disruptive Behavior.” Journal of Clinical Child and Adolescent Psychology, v.37/1 (2008).

Jones, D. J., R Forehand, L. G. McKee, J. Cuellar, and C. Kincaid. “Behavioral Parent Training: Is There an ‘App’ for That?” Behavior Therapy, v.33/4 (2010).

Kaminski, J. W., L. A. Valle, J. H. Filene, and C. L. Boyle. “A Meta-Analytic Review of Components Associated With Parent Training Program Effectiveness.” Journal of Abnormal Child Psychology, v.36 (2008).

Reid, M. J., C. Webster-Stratton, and T. P. Beauchaine. “Parent Training in Head Start: A Comparison of Program Response Among African American, Asian American, Caucasian, and Hispanic Mothers.” Prevention Science, v.2/4 (2001).

Sanders, M. R. “Triple P-Positive Parenting Program as a Public Health Approach to Strengthening Parenting." Journal of Family Psychology, v.22/3 (2008).

Wade, S. L., K. Oberjohn, K. Conaway, P. Osinska, and L. Bangert. "Live Coaching of Parenting Skills Using the Internet: Implications for Clinical Practice." Professional Psychology Research and Practice, v.42/6 (2011).

Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in

Parenting is defined as the process of caring for, raising, and supporting a child from the time of birth to adulthood. The parenting process affects a child's emotional, cognitive, physical, and social well-being. The age at which parenting involvement declines or stops depends upon the culture in which the children are raised. Traditionally, the parenting role has been viewed as a cooperative relationship by both parents. Individuals in the nuclear family may also take part in the parenting role if the biological parents are unable or incapable of doing so. In some cultures, the family elders have a significant role in the caring and support provided to the family.

Family is a primary source of support and serves multiple functions, but the definition of family can vary across cultures. There are four types of parenting styles, and each style can differ within cultures whether or not one conforms into the mainstream culture. The four general parenting styles are authoritative, authoritarian, permissive, and neglectful. While there are many factors that can affect the degree of parenting style, economic status tends to hold the greatest impact.

Types of Parenting Styles

Authoritative parents set rules and expect them to be followed at all times. While holding high expectations of their children, authoritative parents encourage independence while being balanced and actively responsive in their parenting. In cases of discipline, the authoritative parent will punish the child while sharing the reasons for doing so. These parents are attentive to the well-being and needs of their children and share explanations for the parenting style. In this parenting style, the voice of the child is not silenced but encouraged.

Similar to authoritative parenting, authoritarian parenting styles emphasize high expectations. Where the two begin to differ is that authoritarian parents are not necessarily as responsive to their children's behaviors and needs. Authoritarian parenting does not leave room for open discussion with the children about their relationship or how they are being parented. Explanations from parents are not usually common in authoritarian parenting styles. Obedience is always expected, and strict rules are created to be followed by the children of authoritarian parents. This parenting style does not openly leave room for the child to question or discuss the parent's actions.

In the permissive parenting style, the parent is very much responsive and involved in the life of the child either directly or indirectly. The parent is available and takes an active position in the relationship with the child. While the child is continually provided for, the permissive parent does not hold any expectations on the child. The parent does not provide limits on the child's behavior, and behavior tends to be unregulated. This approach can lead to acting out, involvement in risky behaviors, and the development of an attitude of entitlement. By growing up in an environment without expectations, the child may not learn about concepts related to hard work, responsibility, gratitude, and socially acceptable behavior. Lack of these understandings may impede upon the child's future adult relationships.

With a neglectful parenting style, parents are neither actively involved in the life of their children nor have any expectations. Here, parents do not take part in being an active member of their children's lives due to circumstances surrounding financial strain, outside pressures, and the prioritizing of others. A negative parenting style includes dismissing the behaviors, attitudes, and emotions of the child. In this parenting style, children do not have clear boundaries or a support system. The child is left alone to understand and navigate through the social world.

Factors Affecting Parenting Style

In order to fully understand each parenting style, it is important to take into account the culture of the family. Cultures can vary in attitudes, behaviors, expectations, and values—and is not limited to the customs, language, religion, beliefs, and support systems held by the family. Considering all the differences in culture, it is important to acknowledge different cultures to understand the parenting style of an individual. Overgeneralizing and stereotyping should be avoided when trying to get an accurate understanding of how each culture impacts an individual's parenting style. For example, the same behavior can hold a different meaning across cultures.

Culture is highly correlated with parenting styles. How close or far one chooses to embrace his or her culture has an impact on children. Individuals may choose either parenting styles similar to those they experienced in their own upbringing or those styles that are the opposite. With the experience of a particular parenting style, individuals have two choices: participate in a parenting style that is familiar to them or differ from it slightly or even entirely. It is very common for a parent to select a parenting style that is most beneficial for him or her. Oftentimes, the parenting style is adjusted to the age level and lifestyle of the parent and child. Factors that influence a change in parenting styles are those such as time, money, ethnicity, and lack of support.

Religious beliefs can also affect a parent's decision in selecting a suitable parenting style. Religion that is practiced and actively shared within the culture will have much say in the parenting style. Religious elders, figures, and customs all can be factored in the decision of parenting. More demands may be put on the parents and child to follow a prescribed attitude, behavior, identity, and life role. Even if religion is not strictly practiced, understanding the meaning and value it has in a parent's life is important. Oftentimes, families share that they are more spiritual than religious, and that is also helpful in developing a clearer understanding of the parenting style.

Now—more than ever—we are witnessing diversity in parenting. There are less traditional family units and more family lifestyles that adopt beliefs from different family systems. There are new groups of single parents in all ethnic, cultural, social, and age groups. Gay, lesbian, and transgender parents also add to the varying degrees of culturally followed parenting styles. The definitions, beliefs, and customs each parent values continue to vary among and within groups of these subpopulations.

Culturally understanding parenting styles includes the acknowledgement of multiple factors. There is not a superior model of parenting style to follow or a superior culture. Keep in mind that culture defines both strengths and weakness. What is considered acceptable and normal depends highly on the social context. One cannot attempt to separate from all cultural aspects because, as you attempt to leave one, you can just as easily find yourself in another.

Monique N. Mercado
Allison M. Atkinson
St. Mary's University

See Also: Acculturation; Administration on Children, Youth and Families; Alloparenting, Cultural Aspects of; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Parenting Skills Training.

Further Readings

Emery, R. E. "Interparental Conflict and Social Policy." In Interparental Conflict and Child Development: Theory, Research, and Applications, J. H. Grych and F. D. Fincham, eds. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Knee, C., and A. Uysal. "The Role of Autonomy in Promoting Healthy Dyadic, Familial, and Parenting Relationships Across Cultures." In *Human Autonomy in Cross-Cultural Context: Perspectives on the Psychology of Agency, Freedom, and Well-*Being, V. I. Chirkov, R. M. Ryan, and K. M. Sheldon, eds. New York: Springer Science and Business Media, 2011.

Rose, G. M., V. Dalakas, and F. Kropp. "Consumer Socialization and Parental Style Across Cultures: Findings From Australia, Greece, and India." Journal of Consumer Psychology, v.13/4 (2003).

Partial Care Services for Adults, Mental Health

Partial care services for adults with mental health needs in the United States encompass the Partial Hospitalization and Intensive Outpatient Programs and can be provided in either a hospital setting or by a free-standing community mental health center (CMHC). In partial hospitalization, the patient continues to reside at home but commutes to a treatment center up to seven days a week. Partial care services are run by relatively egalitarian multidisciplinary teams, with treatment programs focusing on the overall treatment of the individual, and are intended to avert or reduce inpatient hospitalization. The partial care programs for adults catering for those with substance abuse problems and various mental disorders ranging from Alzheimer's disease or schizophrenia to eating disorders have individualized care plans and include group therapy and psycho-education modules. These services have state funding and legislative support.

The day hospitals concept emerged during the deinstitutionalization and community mental health (CMH) movements in the 1960s, heralding the beginning of partial care mental health services. In 1988, the U.S. Congress approved a major benefit change for the Title XVIII Medicare program by including reimbursement for partial hospital programs that meet a strict definition and provide a series of treatment services. In 1990, Congress expanded the partial hospitalization benefit to allow CMHCs to deliver this benefit. Partial care services are historically known as the partial hospitalization programs (PHP). More recently with the inclusion of intensive community programs, they are frequently referred to as the Ambulatory Behavioral Health Services. In this entry, all three terms are used interchangeably.

The U.S. Congress defined partial hospitalization as a community treatment program specifically designed for the diagnosis or active treatment of a serious mental disorder when there is a reasonable expectation for improvement or when it is necessary to maintain a patient's functional level and prevent relapse or full hospitalization. That definition and the service components are endorsed by the National Association of Private Psychiatric Hospitals (NAPPH) and the American Association for Partial Hospitalization (renamed as the Association of Ambulatory Behavioral Healthcare [AABH] in 1995).

The partial care programs' cost-effectiveness and better client-related outcomes with reduced need for full hospitalization was established by a body of research worldwide by the late 1980s. The major benefits for clients include having tailored care plans meeting the individual needs, maintaining important community ties, and less disruption to living arrangements. While the names, shape, and funding arrangements of the services vary, services with similar objectives of providing treatment in the community for those needing more than an outpatient consultation and averting or reducing the need for hospitalization were developed in different countries worldwide. The shape of the services changed over time to include persons with more acute needs and continues to evolve in keeping with the contemporary sociopolitical and financial pressures between consumer groups and taxpayers alongside the medical advances.

Drawing upon the experience from partial hospitalization programs, the AABH identified a set of unifying principles to differentiate the ambulatory services from inpatient and traditional outpatient services. The first and foremost of them is that the person accessing the service have a psychiatric or chemical dependency diagnosis with a need for treatment that is more intensive than outpatient office visits and less restrictive than 24-hour care. The ambulatory services are required to coordinate an array of active treatment components, which are determined by an individualized treatment plan based upon a comprehensive evaluation of the patient needs and strengths. The service should be provided in a manner that simulates real-life experience and with the least amount of disruption to the person's normal daily functioning in the most appropriate, least-restrictive environment.

Levels of Care

Placing the ambulatory health care programs on a continuum of care between inpatient and traditional outpatient services, AABH separates three distinct levels of care as categorized on critical patient and service variables. The first level of services caters to those with maximum needs, and the services at the third level cater to those whose functional level is only moderately impaired. The patient variables that determine the level of care needed include the functional ability of the patient for undertaking tasks of daily living, their social supports, psychiatric signs and symptoms, and the risk to self or others, along with the ability to commit to the treatment and follow through with the program. The service variables that are specific to the service functioning are the specified care function of the service, including planned hours of the treatment, mechanisms by which a new patient makes contact and begins treatment, intake and admission procedures, and the routines, scheduled activities, expectations, and special treatment procedures integral to nonhospital-based services. The factors that influence the level of care offered from the point of safety of providing service are the availability of the crisis intervention and emergency services, the blanket protective services that cover the patient during nontreatment hours, degree of responsibility and participation assumed by medical and nursing personnel, and overall role of treating professionals in providing a safety net for the patient.

Providers of the services are required to pass comprehensive reviews from national, state, and insurance bodies that specify the guidelines for assessment, treatment, and facility maintenance. For instance, the providers need to specify a minimum number of hours or days of treatment offered and demonstrate the process of making the clients aware of the process of accessing emergency services. The criteria the programs need to meet may, for instance, be specifying the inclusion of appropriate individual or systemic treatment modalities in the program. The performance improvement and client outcome studies are integral to approval of partial hospitalization programs.

Partial care services are funded in the United States by insurance companies, Medicare, the U.S. national social insurance program, and in some states, Medicaid, the U.S. health program for families and individuals with low income and resources. Part B (medical insurance) of Medicare that covers certain doctor services, outpatient care, medical supplies, and preventive services covers the partial care services in addition to hospital-based and CMH service-based programs, the Medicare funds free-standing partial hospitalization programs, and the storefront operations. The storefront operations are usually family-run businesses and have attracted criticism for poor quality care and misuse of funds. Clients get Medicare funding support for joining the program only if a duly qualified physician certifies that the person would otherwise need inpatient treatment. The clients need to co-pay a certain percentage of the costs, and the number of days one can access the services may be limited. Some of the limitations imposed by Medicare were criticized as discriminatory by the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI). This situation for those in need of accessing the partial care services is expected to improve with the implementation of the Affordability Care Act as the law requires insurance companies to cover all applicants within new minimum standards and offer the same rates regardless of preexisting conditions.

Padmaja Chalasani
Aneurin Bevan Health Board, Wales

See Also: Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Day Treatment Centers; Deinstitutionalization; Medicare; Mental Health Services, Adult; Partial Care Services for Children, Mental Health.

Further Readings

Association for Ambulatory Behavioural Healthcare. http://www.aabh.org/content/continuum-ambulatory-behavioral-health-services (Accessed November 2013).

Medicare. http://www.medicare.gov/coverage/partial-hospitalization-mental-health-care.html#2847 (Accessed November 2013).

National Alliance on Mental Illness. http://www.nami.org/Content/ContentGroups/Policy/WhereWeStand/The_Medicare_Partial_Hospitalization_Benefit_-_WHERE_WE_STAND.htm (Accessed November 2013).

Partial Care Services for Children, Mental Health

Partial care is intensive therapeutic mental health treatment that, unlike other intensive mental health treatments, is outpatient rather than residential. It is sometimes, but not always, offered through a hospital, and when it is, it is sometimes called partial hospitalization. Partial care services for children and youth naturally involve their own challenges and special considerations, as is always the case when the mental health or well-being of children is involved. Partial care treatment is characterized by its high degree of structure and reliance on multiple modalities of treatment.

Treatment involves sessions of several hours, sometimes as long as five or six hours, at least twice a week and sometimes every weekday. Some programs for adolescents run daily during school holiday periods and in the summer. Partial care is typically recommended for patients who face the risk of their conditions worsening to the point that inpatient care will be necessary and who are experiencing conditions that interfere with their day-to-day existence in concrete ways.

Goals and Services

Partial care may also be a step down from inpatient or residential treatment as a way to keep the patient stable while transitioning from an inpatient situation to the end goal of the end of treatment or tapering off to less-intensive treatment, depending on the patient and the nature of the problems being addressed. For young people especially, partial care is outcome driven and centered around clinical treatment under the supervision of a medical doctor. Partial care is not a long-term treatment strategy but rather is intended to stabilize the patient. Treatment targets specific needs through a variety of means including individual and group counseling and support group activities, organized recreation, family therapy and supportive counseling, parenting skills development, as well as traditional psychiatric treatment and medication management.

Partial care services, particularly when the patient is transitioning from inpatient care, include time spent teaching activities of daily living (ADLs), a term of art in the health care field. ADL skills constitute the ability to tend to daily self care both at home and in outdoor environments and are a measure of a patient's functional status. ADLs include washing and bathing, toilet use, dressing, cooking, feeding oneself and eating, personal hygiene and grooming, functional mobility, the ability to perform housework or to do homework, managing prescribed and over-the-counter medication, money management, shopping, telephone and technology use, the use of transportation (whether driving oneself or not), and others. Occupational therapists, for example, use a list of 12 instrumental ADLs—those that most healthy people have but that are not necessary to fundamental functioning: care of others, care of pets, child rearing, communication management, community mobility, financial management, health management, home maintenance, meal preparation, religious observances, safety and emergency procedures, and shopping. With young patients, the evaluation of ADLs is informed by developmental psychology: 6-year-olds and 12-year-olds are expected to have very different skill sets. There are specific tools that have been developed for evaluating ADL skills, usually tailored toward a patient type such as patients in physical therapy, elderly patients, or young patients.

Typically, partial care services need to be coordinated with the underage patient's school hours, but in some cases, some school hours may be sacrificed in favor of a course of treatment that seeks to curtail the necessity of inpatient treatment or as a measure taken while transitioning out from inpatient treatment. In the latter case, this is especially true if it is expected that being in school will be an emotional challenge for the patient. Evaluating whether or not a patient is suited to partial care typically encompasses multiple criteria, including the patient's need for clinical and social support, a patient transitioning from a restrictive residential or inpatient treatment situation, the patient's DSM-IV diagnosis or the presence of some other behavioral and emotional disturbance, and the need for multimodal comprehensive treatment.

There are also important exclusion criteria to consider, such as the possibility that the patient is a risk to self or others or any other condition that would support the recommendation of round-the-clock inpatient supervision. Patients also will be refused partial care if their parent or legal guardian does not consent (absent a court order), if a psychiatric assessment indicates that more- or less-intensive therapeutic treatment is recommended, or if an underlying medical condition requiring treatment in a hospital setting is the cause of behavioral or emotional problems. In some cases, comparisons will be made to previous case studies and the effectiveness therein of partial care. This is particularly true when advocating for partial care as an alternative to inpatient treatment because inpatient treatment is an older modality and may be the default measure for some institutions or professionals. Some professionals also do not recommend partial care services for youths who have a particular sole diagnosis—for instance, substance abuse, autism, or developmental impairment—without accompanying symptoms consisting with a DSM-IV diagnosis.

Partial care services for children are more likely to incorporate play, group, and recreational activities than services for adults do, though neither generalization here is universally true. Treatment sessions provide safe spaces, whether individually with counselors or in groups. For various reasons, many partial care services programs have a minimum age under which they will not admit patients (often 6 or 8), and some specialize in preadolescent patients, admitting only those under 13 or 14. Groups will usually be put together according to age proximity as well. Some programs handle specific types of problems, including substance abuse or dual-diagnosis adolescents (those with both addiction and mental health problems), anxiety and mood disorders, trauma survivors, and eating disorders.

The question of how long to continue partial care is not one that is easily answered, though in some cases, the answer is determined by external forces such as the wishes of parents or the amount of coverage provided by an insurance provider. Absent those factors, the decision is informed by the severity of the patient's disturbance and the evidence supporting belief that partial care rather than more-intensive inpatient treatment is what is likely to be helpful. Ideally, discharge comes when treatment managers are convinced that treatment goals have been met.

Bill Kte'pi
Independent Scholar

See Also: Hospitals; Mental Health Services, Children; Partial Care Services for Adults, Mental Health.

Further Readings

Dishion, Thomas J., and Elizabeth A. Stormshak. Intervening in Children's Lives: An Ecological, Family-Centered Approach to Mental Health Care. Washington, DC: American Psychological Association, 2007.

Hess, Robyn S., Rick Jay Short, and Cynthia E. Hazel. Comprehensive Children's Mental Health Services in Schools and Communities: A Public Health Problem-Solving Model. New York: Routledge, 2012.

Yearwood, Edlima L., Geraldine Pearson, and Jamesetta A. Newland, eds. Child and Adolescent Behavioral Health. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley-Blackwell, 2012.

Partner Notification Programs in HIV/AIDS

Human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immune deficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) partner notification programs assist HIV-positive individuals in notifying high-risk sexual or injection drug partners of their HIV exposure. Often, it is too difficult to do this on one's own. Accepting an HIV-positive diagnosis can be challenging; having trained service providers available to assist with an anonymous notification process can be very helpful. Notified partners are not given the HIV-positive individual's name; only testing recommendations and service referrals are provided. If the informed individual had only one high-risk behavior, it is likely he or she will correctly guess the exposure source and HIV-positive status of that person. In such cases, it is possible the exposed person might disclose the HIV-positive person's identity and status.

Identifying exposed partners is key in the fight against HIV, so treatment can begin and cases of new infections can be reduced. High-risk contact information must be given voluntarily, absent of coercion or deception, to ensure comprehensiveness and accuracy. Once informed of exposure, HIV-positive partners can be careful to avoid infecting others as they might have done unintentionally prior to learning their own status.

Partner notification services should be client centered, confidential, free, and evidence based. Services and disseminated information should be comprehensive, integrative, accessible, and available to everyone while being culturally, linguistically, and developmentally appropriate. The history of HIV has included many different groups that have suffered from stigma and discrimination on the basis of race, ethnicity, or sexual orientation. Informed individuals are encouraged to be tested and to receive HIV education and treatment as needed.

Partner Notification Efficacy

Partner notification programs have become widely accepted and have demonstrated new infection reductions. In New York, for example, The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) found notification and referral services for gonorrhea to be most effective by targeting geographic areas instead of interviewing, in person, all infected individuals and their partners.

In the United States, according to the CDC, approximately 25 percent of HIV-positive individuals do not know their infection status. Partner notification provides an opportunity for outreach to persons known to be at risk. The CDC found that one in eight notified individuals was newly diagnosed as HIV positive. The Task Force on Community Prevention Services' review of studies found that 14 to 26 percent of notified partners were diagnosed as HIV positive. Overall, partner notification services have been found to be cost-effective but greatly underused.

Diversity Implications

Anyone can become HIV infected regardless of age, sexual orientation, culture, ethnicity, race, and more. Culturally sensitive protocols should be provided to each respective group; one size will not fit all, and the goal of partner notification is to identify individuals who can benefit from diagnosis and treatment. Trained service providers, knowledgeable about the special needs of a population as well as relevant laws and regulations, are integral to the success of this process. Stigma, cultural rights and wrongs, religious beliefs, as well as racial and language differences and implications must be considered in any partner notification program.

Men Who Have Sex With Men

Men who have sex with men (MSM) represent a diverse community across race, ethnic, and socioeconomic groups. The CDC reported a 34 percent increase in HIV infections among young gay and bisexual men between 2006 and 2009. In 2010, 63 percent of all new AIDS cases were among MSMs. MSMs accounted for 51 percent of the new cases within the African American population and 68 percent among Latinos. These groups have been affected by stigma and discrimination based on sexual orientation, ethnic and racial identity, and high rates of HIV. Many MSMs do not self-identify as homosexual, wishing to avoid that stigma; they may resist disclosing their HIV status to at-risk partners.

African Americans

According to the CDC, African Americans are the racial or ethnic group most affected by HIV despite representing only 12 to 14 percent of the U.S. population. The new infection rate among African Americans (68.9 percent) was 7.9 times as high as the rate in whites (8.7 percent). Sexually active African Americans are therefore at an increased risk of having sex with an HIV-positive partner. The high poverty rate among African Americans both directly and indirectly affects HIV infection risks. The CDC estimates many are unaware of their HIV status.

Latinos

HIV disproportionately affects the Latino community. While Latinos comprise 16 percent of the U.S. population, in 2009, they accounted for 20 percent of the reported HIV cases. The rate of new infections for Latino men was 1.5 times that of white men, and the rate for Latina women was four times the rate of white women. Cultural factors increase the risk of HIV infection. The fear of discrimination, stigmatization, or immigration status may impact an individual's motivation to be tested and treated. Traditional gender roles may increase women's and MSMs' risks and fears of notification and accessing services. Language barriers can inhibit HIV prevention, testing, and notification.

Immigrants and Migrants

There is limited data about HIV infection prevalence among U.S. immigrants and migrant populations. This is partly due to the vulnerabilities of a population that does not have adequate information about HIV/AIDS or access to health care, which delays HIV testing, education, and treatment. The economic disparities, as well as cultural role differences between men and women, make women more vulnerable to domestic violence and sexual abuse, reducing their abilities to protect themselves from harm, including HIV exposure. Partner notification programs can provide a unique opportunity to reach at-risk individuals who may not seek services themselves due to feelings of disempowerment and language differences. Stigma related to disclosure of one's HIV status and assumed infection methods create many concerns and fear of partner violence, particularly among women.

Conclusion

Partner notification programs and services exist throughout the country and are underutilized. Having an HIV/AIDS test is often an overwhelming experience. Add to that the requirement to disclose names and contact details of individuals who may be at risk due to shared transmission behaviors, and a simple HIV test can become traumatic.

Service providers must share information and options in culturally competent ways using relevant languages and other effective tools in order to optimize notifications, testing, education, and treatment if needed; informed partners can prevent further transmission of HIV. The best program in the world will not be fully utilized if clients do not feel safe and well attended to; many may prefer to die with their HIV status kept secret, leaving at-risk partners absent of exposure notification. Language, age, literacy, cultural competence, and more regarding available services must all be taken into consideration under the umbrella of federal, state, and local laws and regulations.

Kim Lorber
Ramapo College of New Jersey
Adele Weiner
Metropolitan College of New York

See Also: AIDS/HIV Programs; Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Ethnic Groups and Drug and Alcohol Use; Health Promotion Services; National Minority AIDS Council.

Further Readings

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). "HIV Among African Americans." http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/risk/racialethnic/aa/facts/index.html (Accessed September 2013).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). "HIV Among Latinos." http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/risk/racialethnic/hispaniclatinos/facts/index.html (Accessed September 2013).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). "HIV in Correctional Settings." http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/topics/correctional/ (Accessed September 2013).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). "Recommendations for Partner Services Programs for HIV Infection, Syphilis, Gonorrhea, and Chlamydial Infection." http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/pdf/rr/rr5709.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). "Top of Form Gay and Bisexual Men's Health: HIV/AIDS." http://www.cdc.gov/msmhealth/HIV.htm (Accessed September 2013).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). "Top of Form HIV Incidence." http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/statistics/surveillance/incidence/index.html (Accessed September 10, 2013)

Paternity, Establishing

Human services is the field that has the responsibility of caring for individuals in different settings and situations depending on their needs. Some individuals have more needs than others. Some individuals have the resources to meet their needs without the assistance of society, while others do not. Single mothers have always been in a position of need. Their situations put them in a position of disadvantage. Having to care for children's physical, mental, financial, and emotional needs alone can be difficult. Historically, single mothers have had to rely on many social systems to assist them in meeting the needs of their children. These women make up a large portion of the population that utilizes entitlement programs. Many policies have recently been created to minimize the use of such programs. Policies such as child support enforcement and paternity establishment exist to minimize the use of entitlement programs and hold the absentee parent accountable.

Defining Paternity

Paternity is a legal term referring to the man recognized by the law as a child's father for economic support purposes. When a child is born outside of marriage, although the child has a biological father, the child is considered illegitimate and has no legal father. In such a case, paternity is not assumed, and it has to be legally established.

Establishing paternity is important because it allows children born outside of marriage the same or similar rights and privileges of children born within a marriage. Paternity provides children the rights to financial support from parents, access to family medical history and records, and access to the noncustodial parent's medical benefits. Historically, the U.S. government and individual states would assume the financial responsibility for children without

A father holds his 7-month-old son for only the second time following his unit's welcome home ceremony. Soldiers on deployment when their children are born are allotted up to 10 days of paternity leave. Paternity also provides fathers with rights. Parents who are not legally united or in a civil partnership to another are faced with the challenges of establishing custodial rights and, possibly, coparenting. Paternity can minimize some of the conflict involved with visitation and other noncustodial dilemmas that fathers often face.

paternity for the purpose of providing medical care. Paternity does not exclude or exempt the federal or state government from any financial duty. However, it does obligate the legal father to care for the child or children born outside of marriage.

Paternity also provides fathers with rights. Parents who are not legally united or in a civil partnership to another are faced with the challenges of establishing custodial rights and, possibly, coparenting. Paternity can minimize some of the conflict involved with visitation and other noncustodial dilemmas that fathers often face. Interparental conflict and continued hostility between ex-spouses or never-married parents has been problematic in deciding custody, child support, and visitation arrangements. Through court administrative hearings or default custodial arrangement (if the man is served with notice of hearing and does not appear), visitation rights are defined and guaranteed to the legal father.

The Role of Paternity in Child Support Policy

In 1968, the U.S. Supreme Court negotiated several cases where children were being denied the right to parental support, inheritance, surnames, and even benefits from worker's compensation programs. This led to state-regulated, statutory procedures that mandated the identification of the biological father of children born out of wedlock for the purpose of establishing child support. The determination of paternity was thus initially established as an action to obtain financial support from an absent father.

Since the Great Depression, the United States has made great efforts to fund and support domestic economic welfare programs. Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) operated from 1935 after the Depression until 1996, when welfare was reformed, and AFDC inspired the passage of child support policy around 1968. In cases where the custodial parent is receiving AFDC, the government has leverage to adjudicate (pronounced by judicial sentence) economic support from the legal father.

In 1975, Congress passed the Child Support Enforcement Act, Part D, Title IV, of the Social Security Act, which mandated states to initiate paternity suits on absentee fathers of children that were receiving AFDC if the state was seeking reimbursement from the federal government.

In 1996, Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) replaced AFDC. Nevertheless, many Americans continue to refer to TANF as welfare or AFDC. This change in welfare system, which some describe as reform, expanded the use of technology to ensure that children receive more financial support from the noncustodial parent or legal father. The use of computers allows the government to track the Social Security numbers (SSNs) of legal fathers who are working and paying into Social Security through employment. The purpose of the changes was to reduce the government economic responsibility for children from unmarried individuals or broken homes, thereby elevating the importance of establishing paternity.

Acknowledgment of Paternity

Most adults expect fathers to acknowledge and support their children, regardless of the circumstance or situation. However, a substantial number of fathers do not take responsibility for their children where biological and legal fatherhood applies unless a court order is issued for them to do so. Failure to claim paternity may be the result of the child being born out of wedlock or because the father has separated or divorced from the child's mother, trouble securing work, or involvement with another partner. Regardless, these are all examples of situations where a child support order may be necessary. Typically, children born as a result of an illicit or dissolved relationship are less likely to receive voluntary financial support from the legal father.

When a child is born, the biological father may sign an Acknowledgment of Paternity (AOP) or a Declaration of Paternity (DOP). This document is usually part of the birth certificate (or birthing documents) in most states and is filed with the Bureau of Vital Statistics to ensure that the biological father becomes the legal father. In more complex situations where paternity is being questioned by the father or mother, DNA testing must be conducted to determine biological fatherhood before legal fatherhood is conferred and child support enforced through a court order.

In situations where two individuals are married or living together in any other type of legally affirmed relationship and the relationship is dissolved, paternity of any children who were part of the relationship is implied in most cases unless disputed. When a man is married to a woman and children were born into the marriage, the husband is assumed to be the biological and legal father and is financially responsible for those children. The husband (or his attorney) can file a written response disputing biological fatherhood to the divorce petition with the court if he is divorcing a woman who already had children and legal fatherhood (paternity) was not already established for the child or children before the marriage.

Compliance

A large proportion of absent fathers make enough money to financially support their children. Whether or not absent fathers conform to child support policies needs to be explored. Effective economic sanctions that ensure child support payments are received once paternity has been established are employer or payroll deductions and state or federal internal revenue refund deductions of a predetermined amount based on income. The current legal actors that regulate and invoke financial responsibility are family courts, social service agencies, and prosecutors. Failure to comply can result in legal sanctions of fines, court costs, and jail time.

Doshie Piper
University of the Incarnate Word

See Also: Child Support Agencies and Services; Child Welfare Services; Families, Nontraditional; Single Parents.

Further Readings

Amato, P. "Contact With Non-Custodial Fathers and Children's Wellbeing." Family Matters, v.36/1 (1997).

Argys, L., and E. Petes. "Interactions Between Unmarried Fathers and Their Children: The Role of Paternity Establishment and Child Support Policies." American Economic Review, v.91/2 (2001).

Cutright, P. "Child Support and Responsible Male Procreative Behavior." Sociological Focus, v.19/1 (1986).

Krause, H. "The Uniform Parentage Act." Family Law Quarterly, v.8 (1974).

Nichols-Casebolt, A., and I. Garfinkel. "Trends in Paternity Adjudications and Child Support Awards." Social Science Quarterly, v.72/1 (1991).

Office of Child Support Enforcement. "Administration for Children and Families." http://www.acf.hhs.gov (Accessed November 2013).

Peer Pressure

Health behavior is influenced by many factors. Behavior change theories initially focused on individual biological factors as main determinants of behavior, but as theories have evolved over time, environmental factors have been incorporated into behavioral theories. The socioecological model, a widely utilized theory in behavior change programs, indicates that there are various levels that influence individual behavior, including individual-level factors, community factors, and policy-level factors. Specifically, at the interpersonal level, peer pressure, a form of social influence, has been identified as an important factor that affects individual behaviors.

Peer pressure is defined as any influence on individual feelings, thoughts, or behaviors exerted by the real or imagined presence or actions of others. From a health behavior perspective, an individual's attitudes, beliefs, and behaviors are primarily shaped through the prevailing norms of a group; as in any given society, individuals engage in certain behaviors based on what norms are prevalent. Norms are social phenomena and refer to conforming to the expectations of another person or group. Norms provide guidelines for behavior, and two norms are particularly relevant to behavior. According to R. Cialdini and B. Kallgren, injunctive norms are an individual's perception of what other people approve or disapprove of with regard to behavior. For example, if teenagers are deciding whether or not to drink alcohol, they may be influenced by what they think they ought to do by others in their social group, as injunctive norms represent the perceived moral rules of one's peer group. According to M. Fishbein, another type of norm, the descriptive norm, reflects individuals' perception of the behaviors other people are doing. The teenager who is deciding whether to drink alcohol may be influenced by what others in his or her social group are doing with regard to engaging in alcohol consumption.

Peer pressure informed by norms is particularly important when studying the influence of peers in relation to deviant behavior. Norms define which behaviors are tolerable and which are not and provide information about what behavior is expected. The major reason why people conform to group norms is fear of sanctions for nonconformity. For example, in studies examining alcohol consumption among students at U.S. colleges and universities, students overwhelmingly perceived higher permissive norms and higher levels of alcohol abuse among their peers than what was actually reported. Studies have shown a consistent relationship between individual alcohol consumption and perceived social norms; perceived norms of higher alcohol consumption acceptability are linked with greater personal use.

Peer pressure is often thought to be more salient among young people; however, norms can influence the behaviors of children, adolescents, and adults alike. The influence of peer pressure can be as straightforward as influencing likes and dislikes, such as fashion and music, but often has a significant effect on the way individuals behave. Peer pressure can exert positive influence through the encouragement of academic achievement, good nutrition, and exercise, and participation in clubs, sports, and civic causes. However, peer pressure is often understood to be a negative influence presenting itself in the form of coercion, teasing, bullying, and rejection from social groups if the individual does not capitulate to the pressure to behave in a certain way. At younger ages, peer pressure can influence behaviors including rule breaking, lying, and shoplifting. As individuals get older, the negative behavior stemming from peer pressure can get riskier and escalate into those with significant health impacts, including reckless driving, cigarette smoking, alcohol consumption, substance abuse, sexual initiation, and risk taking.

Various programs have utilized peer pressure to influence health behavior. One of the most widely used substance abuse prevention programs targeted at school-age youths is Project DARE (Drug Abuse Resistance Education). The original Project DARE curriculum utilized police officers to educate

The original Project DARE curriculum used police officers to educate students about the dangers of drugs and used videos employing scare tactics to encourage students to reject peer pressure to use drugs. Here, fifth-grade students take the DARE pledge after learning about the harmful effects of drugs, alcohol, and tobacco and how to avoid peer pressure.

students about the dangers of drugs and used videos employing scare tactics in order to encourage students to reject peer pressure to use drugs. Meta-analyses by S. L. West and colleagues have shown that this approach has not been effective in preventing negative behaviors. Project DARE implemented a new curriculum "Keepin' it REAL," which was culturally grounded and kid-centric, with a series of videos made by children themselves teaching and demonstrating the key principles of the refuse, explain, avoid, and leave strategies focusing on risks, consequences, decision making, and communication skills. This approach has been more effective in helping students avoid negative peer pressure.

Understanding peer pressure may prove helpful in strengthening health programs because, if peer pressure through norms influence behavior, then changing normative beliefs should lead to behavior change. Additionally, various researchers have indicated the effects of peer pressure across gender, race, and ethnic groups, and although effects vary based on behavior type, the idea—that peer pressure is critical in influencing behavior in various settings—should be acknowledged when seeking to improve health outcomes. With regards to risk behavior generally, various studies have found that individuals view risk as a value and do not want to appear less risky than their peers. In essence, peer pressure is powerful because individuals want to be liked and accepted by those around them, which requires the avoidance of appearing dissimilar from the group norm. However, this could mean that an individual will engage in a risky behavior because of peer pressure. Therefore, when designing a health program that is susceptible to the influence of peer pressure, program designers must address the power of peer pressure in order to increase the chances of program success.

Rupali J. Limaye
G. Arzum Ciloglu
Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Health Promotion Services; Peer Support and Counseling Services; Substance Abuse Treatment for Children and Adolescents.

Further Readings

Cialdini, R. B., and C. Kallgren. “A Focus Theory of Normative Conduct: Recycling the Concept of Norms to Reduce Littering in Public Places. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, v.58/6 (1990).

Fishbein, M. “Attitude and the Prediction of Behavior.” In M. Fishbein, ed., Readings in Attitude Theory and Measurement. New York: Wiley, 1967.

West, S. L., and K. K. O’Neil. “Project DARE Outcome Effectiveness Revisited.” American Journal of Public Health, v.94/6 (2004).

Peer Support and Counseling Services

Peer support services are important for human services and diversity because they merge cost-effective mental health and addiction treatment practices (i.e., group and individual supportive counseling in wellness) within a culturally and spiritually responsive relationship. This mentoring relationship is designed to be the vehicle that guides people with mental health and addiction issues in their personal recoveries. Providers of these services, referred to variously as consumer-providers, peer-providers, sponsors, and peer-specialists, are individuals who are in recovery from a mental illness or addiction and use their experiences to help others struggling with similar issues by providing an array of services and support.

Peer support providers rely on their shared lived experiences with mental illness or addiction to engage with other mental health or substance abuse service users authentically and act as role models and mentors in the recovery process. Overall, peer support services have shown to be effective in improving psychiatric symptoms, social functioning, the ability to manage one’s illness, and perceived quality of life while decreasing the frequency of inpatient hospitalizations and the utilization of crisis services. Persons with mental illness or addiction who receive peer support services in addition to other professionally provided services have reported higher rates of personal empowerment and hope for the future.

In the field of addictions, mutual aid groups such as Alcoholics Anonymous, Narcotics Anonymous, Cocaine Anonymous, and Gamblers Anonymous have been in existence since the 1930s. Persons who struggled with alcoholism and other addictions formed these fellowship groups as a means to support one another in sobriety. These groups are structured around 12 common steps and traditions. These groups have no formal leadership structure and do not partner with outside organizations. They are solely member driven. All persons seeking sobriety are welcome to attend open meetings that consist of persons sharing their experiences and offering support to one another. More-structured step meetings are designed for persons at a particular stage of recovery. These groups have grown and diversified extensively. For instance, Alcoholics Anonymous has grown to more than 100,000 groups in 170 countries with approximately 2 million members.

In the United States, peer support services in the mental health sphere emerged in the 1970s from the work of grassroots activist groups consisting of current and former psychiatric patients and their allies. These groups strongly advocated for the rights of other mental health service users and formed informal self-help groups where psychiatric ex-patients used their experiences to help one another. Today, mental health peer support services and consumer-operated service programs advocate for consumers’ rights and provide a range of services delivered within the context of respect, camaraderie, dignity, and choice. These services have become a common component of traditional, professional-based mental health service delivery systems.

In 2001, Georgia became the first state to approve the peer support services provided by specially trained and certified peer specialists for Medicaid reimbursement. Since 2001, more than 30 states have implemented certification programs for peer specialists. These certified peer specialists (CPSs) provide a variety of services in a wide range of settings. These settings can include informal, voluntary self-help groups, consumer-operated service programs that are run and controlled solely by people with histories of mental illness or addiction, as well as traditional mental health or substance use treatment agencies. In these latter settings, they work alongside other mental health and addiction service providers and supervisors such as licensed clinical social workers, nurses, professional counselors, psychologists, and psychiatrists. In these more-traditional human services settings, they often provide consumers with services that can include advocacy, education about addiction, mental illness and recovery, case management, wellness programs, interpersonal support, and social skills training.

Research is emerging that shows that the combination of peer support services with clinical services such as medication and psychotherapy can assist persons with mental illnesses and addictions in achieving a more holistic sense of recovery. This recovery is defined as not only the amelioration of symptoms but also the achievement of a more-balanced and holistic sense of well-being in the domains of daily living, self-efficacy, relationships, health, and meaningful pursuits.

Michael A. Mancini
Saint Louis University

See Also: Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Mental Health Services, Adult; Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

Further Readings

Clay, S. On Our Own, Together: Peer Programs for People With Mental Illness. Nashville, TN: Vanderbilt University Press, 2005.

Cook, J. A. "Peer-Delivered Wellness Recovery Services: From Evidence to Widespread Implementation." Psychiatric Rehabilitation Journal, v.35/2 (2011).

Davidson, L., M. Chinman, B. Kloos, R. Weingarten, D. Stayner, and J. Tebes. "Peer Support Among Individuals With Severe Mental Illness: A Review of the Evidence." Clinical Psychology: Science and Practice, v.6 (1999).

Grant, E. A., C. Reinhart, S. Wituk, and G. Meissen. "An Examination of the Integration of Certified Peer Specialists Into Community Mental Health Centers." Community Mental Health Journal, v.48 (2012).

Katz, A., and E. Bender. Helping One Another: Self-Help Groups in a Changing World. Oakland, CA: Third Party Publishing, 1990.

Klein, A., R. Cnaan, and J. Whitecraft. "Significance of Peer Social Support for Dually Diagnosed Clients: Findings From a Pilot Study." Research on Social Work Practice, v.8 (1998).

Mancini, M. A., and H. A. Lawson. "Facilitating Positive Emotional Labor in Peer-Providers of Mental Health Services." Administration in Social Work, v.33/1 (2009).

Mead, S., D. Hilton, and L. Curtis. "Peer Support: A Theoretical Perspective." Psychiatric Rehabilitation Journal, v.25 (2001).

Salzer, M. S., E. Schwenk, and E. Brusilovskiy. "Certified Peer Specialist Roles and Activities: Results From a National Survey." Psychiatric Services, v.61/5 (2010).

Solomon, P. "Peer Support/Peer Provided Services: Underlying Processes, Benefits, and Critical Ingredients." Psychiatric Rehabilitation Journal, v.27/4 (2004).

People of Color: Service Delivery, Psychological Assessment, Cultural Issues

There are numerous cultural issues that can enhance or impede the psychological assessment and service delivery of people of color in the United States (e.g., African American or black, Hispanic, Asian American or Pacific Islander, Native American, and mixed racial or ethnic groups). These cultural issues may be understood broadly by examining three main cultural factors that affect an assessment and treatment setting: (1) individual characteristics and cultural beliefs of the person of color; (2) cultural beliefs of the clinician or service provider, including cultural assumptions and theoretical orientation; and (3) the type and standardization of the psychological assessment instruments chosen for use in psychological evaluation.

According to the American Psychological Association, race and ethnicity are dynamic constructs that impact all aspects of psychological practice and interactions. Thus, while noting the large heterogeneity among the many individuals that identify within the racial or ethnic groups noted here, it is nonetheless important to be aware of cultural issues that can significantly impact optimal assessment, diagnosis, and service delivery.

Individual Characteristics of People of Color

Societal institutions often operate within a dominant cultural framework in which one's behavior, appearance, communication style, and mannerisms are expected to conform to the behavioral norms of the majority. If the cultural characteristics of people of color deviate significantly from the behavioral expectations of the institution in which they operate, they may be judged as less competent or capable than their peers. An example of the pervasive effects of this form of stereotyping can be found within U.S. schools, where historically, students of color have been referred for psychological assessment of cognitive, learning, or emotional problems in disproportionately greater numbers than their white European American peers. As a result, there are a disproportionate number of students of color identified as having emotional disturbance (ED), attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), or an intellectual disability (ID, formerly mental retardation [MR]) within the American educational system. Research studies that have examined this racial and ethnic disproportionality have found a number of contributing factors, including an association between referral for psychological assessment and differences in learning styles and mannerisms between students of color and white students.

Cultural Beliefs of People of Color

For people of color, cultural beliefs of what constitutes a sign and symptom of mental illness, the meanings attributed to them, and where their origins lie also impact the psychological assessment and services they receive. In general, people tend to communicate or report mental health symptoms to service providers in ways that are culturally acceptable and meaningful to them. A person of Native American descent, for example, may believe that certain mental health symptoms are caused or correlated with a spiritual deity; as such, they may be less likely to seek out treatment and, if they do, may be more likely to use traditional healers than the mental health services found in U.S. professional settings.

Among many people of color, the degree of interpersonal connectedness, the focus on family over and above the individual, the belief in the origins of mental illness (whether from the mind, body, or both), and the stigma of mental illness factor significantly in the interpretation and communication of psychological symptoms. For example, according to Gayle Iwamasa of the Asian American Psychological Association, in some Asian cultural groups, the experience of psychological distress is not only a reflection on the individual in distress but also on the entire family. Thus, shame, humiliation, and loss of face contribute to whether an individual in this population will admit to experiencing psychological problems.

Cultural Beliefs of the Clinician or Service Provider

Cultural issues for people of color seeking psychological assessment and treatment also arise from the individual characteristics and cultural beliefs of the mental health service provider. Among these cultural beliefs are the clinician's expectations for how to treat mental health symptoms, the terminology and framework used to discuss mental health issues with the person of color seeking psychological treatment, and the theoretical orientation under which the service provider operates.

Historically, service providers who treat mental illness in the United States have been trained to practice traditional Western medicine, which emphasizes scientific inquiry and the use of prescription drugs and clinical therapy to lead to a possible cure of mental illness. The dominant Western cultural belief in the viability of psychopharmacological medication to manage mental health symptoms currently shares wide acceptability within the United States, and this can influence the assessment and treatment options that people of color are given within the treatment setting. Moreover, clinicians operating within a dominant European American perspective who work with people of color may also seek to appear color-blind—that is, they may operate under the cultural belief that people should all be treated the same regardless of race or ethnicity, and that by ignoring cultural differences they will improve relations with the people of color whom they serve. In this effort to appear nonprejudicial to their clients, however, clinicians may disregard cultural interpretations of their clients' mental health symptoms. In favor of a universal approach, they may avoid recognizing racial or ethnic differences that may help assist in treating the person of color in a culturally relevant way.

In 2003, in an effort to address the cultural issues inherent in the training and practice of psychological service providers, the American Psychological Association endorsed a set of multicultural guidelines for psychologists. These guidelines provide an overview of six main areas to address when working with culturally diverse populations; two of these areas relate specifically to psychologists becoming self-aware of unconscious biases and racial and cultural stereotypes that impact their assessment, diagnosis, and treatment of persons of color.

Type and Standardization of Psychological Assessment Instruments

Psychological assessment is defined as an evaluation of an individual's mental health by a mental health services professional for the purposes of providing data that can aid in diagnostic decision making. Psychological assessments often use a battery of assessment instruments to examine cognitive and emotional functioning and the degree of psychological distress present in an individual. In order to provide objective data, these assessment instruments are standardized, enabling the mental health professional to compare assessment scores from an individual with those of the larger population.

However, cultural issues can arise in the standardization of psychological assessment instruments for people of color as assessment instruments that are not normed on a population that represents the person of color assessed may lack adequate statistical validity for minority populations. Moreover, psychological assessments often assume a set of shared cultural understandings of mental health, and these cultural meanings may or may not be held by the person of color assessed.

Sheri A. Castro-Atwater
California State University, Los Angeles

See Also: Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cross-Cultural Skills; Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of; Mental Health Services, Ethnic Models and Multicultural Service.

Further Readings

American Psychological Association. Guidelines for Multicultural Education, Training, Research, Practice, and Organizational Change for Psychologists. http://www.apa.org/pi/oema/resources/policy/multicultural-guidelines.aspx (Accessed August 2013).

Constantine, M. Clinical Practice With People of Color: A Guide to Becoming Culturally Competent. Multicultural Foundations of Psychology and Counseling Series. New York: Teachers College Press, 2007.

Harry, B., and J. Klingner. Why Are So Many Minority Students in Special Education? Understanding Race and Disability in Schools. New York: Teachers College Press, 2006.

Iwamasa, G. Y. "Recommendations for the Treatment of Asian American/Pacific Islander Populations." In Psychological Treatment of Ethnic Minority Populations. Washington, DC: Association of Black Psychologists, 2003.

Personal Practice, Model of

While a model of personal practice is generally used by mental health professionals, it is an important part of any human service professional's tool box. The field of human services broadly encompasses any form of health care—from mental health to physical health and education to social services. It would be an asset to each practitioner if he or she incorporated a model of personal practice into his or her professional life. Included in the model are the values, principles, and practices of the practitioner. The significance and implications of this model of personal practice includes the promotion of racial, ethnic, and socioeconomic diversity in human services. This framework promotes positive interactions between health services and those being served by breaking the model into the subcategories on which the model of personal practice is based.

Values

During the process of preparing for practice, all health professionals have to determine how their own personal values relate to the values being taught in their fields of choice. Mental health professionals, whether consciously or unconsciously, have models of personal practice. Developing a tangible personal practice model helps the practitioner realize his or her pattern of thoughts, behaviors, and practices and allows the practitioner to see a multifaceted approach to mental health practice. The health professional's own values (personal and professional) are part of his or her identity—so many facets play a part in this identity.

Ethics

Each facet of the mental health profession has ethical standards set forth by a governing board, which must be followed—a code of ethics. Issues involving social justice, human value and dignity, integrity, and so forth will arise, and no hard and fast rules for solving these issues exist. By having a model of personal practice, the mental health professional can grow a living, breathing model banking on prior decisions to aid in future decisions. This helps the practitioner to solidify his or her professional identity and keep it strong and expanding in knowledge.

Knowledge of Self

The desire to be well versed in all therapeutic genres related to one's personal practice is an integral part of serving human needs and diversity. Part and parcel of being a mental health professional is incorporating diversity into a knowledge base and treatment plans. This is part of one's professional identity. Each person should be treated with respect and consideration given to each facet of his or her identity: ethnicity, culture, regional cultural, level of education, religious beliefs, gender identity, age, marital status, employment, illnesses, work history, work field, family of origin—and the list goes on from macro to micro.

After initial contact, the health services professional may need to research any areas where his or her knowledge is lacking to be able to fully address issues from a learned position. Frequent consultation with other experts in the field, including staying abreast of current cultural research and published resources, attending cultural diversity conferences, and so forth are a must.

The human services professional needs to recognize his or her own biases, preconceived ideas, and limitations to help prevent one from judging or overwhelming the identity of the client. Practitioners need to understand themselves and how they approach treatment. Are they more psychodynamic in nature or behavioristic? Do they see themselves more as my way or the highway, or are they open to trying different modalities to find the best fit for the client? The model of personal practice is an exemplary tool to address and map these areas.

Population Age

To highlight a few factors that need inclusion, let us start with age. With the population living longer, generational differences must be considered. In the United States, generational differences are presumed to be precipitated by critical events that happened during their formative years. The greatest generation refers to those who grew up during the Great Depression and World War II. The baby boomers are the post–World War II and Vietnam era. Generation X is heavily influenced by the leaps and bounds experienced in the rise of technology. The critical event for the millennials is 9/11. Mental health professionals may need to include in their considerations a question regarding where in time is this person coming from.

Technology

Technology has increased to the extent that Earth has become a global community wherein treatment may no longer be geographically restrained. It is no longer enough to have a regional thought or treatment process. Treatment is now taking place via Skype, FaceTime, even e-mail and text. If internationally recognized, then diversity plays a much larger role in treatment and personal practice. Again the model of personal practice allows the mental health professional to build a personal encyclopedia of information for future reference.

Discrimination

Self-culture is as much a part of the mental health professional's practice model as the ability to treat diverse cultures. Self-awareness and the ability to separate oneself from preconceived notions lie deep in the heart of recognizing that, through our diversity, we can create deep and meaningful relationships that may not be congruent, but many still coexist with synergy and acceptance of each perspective. When those who were mistreated become the mistreaters, progress is stymied.

Self-Health

Along with all their tools to help others, health services professionals also need tools to keep themselves both mentally and physically healthy. Self-care includes a support system—at a minimum, another professional with whom one may confide, present dilemmas in a confidential setting, and get feedback. This individual becomes basically a therapist for the therapist, one who values the colleague and meets his or her human services and diversity needs. There is a richness in diversity. Valuing human diversity and possessing cultural competence breaks down barriers and allows healing to begin.

Mary Burkhead Spencer
Walden University

See Also: Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in; Health Care Delivery, Model of; Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of; Mental Health Services, Adult; Peer Support and Counseling Services; Social Work, Diversity Practice in.

Further Readings

Austin, M. J., M. Coombs, and B. Barr. "Community-Centered Clinical Practice: Is the Integration of Micro and Macro Social Work Practice Possible?" Journal of Community Practice, v.13/4 (2005).
Diller, Jerry V. Cultural Diversity: A Primer for the Human Services, 5th ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole/Cengage Learning, 2014.
Netting, F. E., P. M. Kettner, S. L. McMurtry, and M. L. Thomas. Social Work Macro Practice, 5th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Education, 2012.

Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act

The Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act (PRWORA) was signed on August 22, 1996. Also known as Public Law 104–193, it was reauthorized in 2002 with revisions granting states greater flexibility to design their own programs. Overall, the act reduced federal welfare spending by eliminating and reorganizing cash and food welfare programs. Most significantly, it terminated entitlement to cash welfare under title IV–A of the Social Security Act and replaced the Aid to Families With Dependent Children (AFDC), which was passed during the Depression era. In place of the entitlement concept, the law created two block grants that provided funds necessary to assist states in supporting families by reducing out-of-marriage pregnancy, encouraging two-parent families and parental or adult employment, and subsidizing child care and nutrition. Specifically, the act offered annual grants to states for Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF).

The grant limited the receipt of cash benefits to five years, though the law allowed states to exempt up to 20 percent of their caseload from this provision. Furthermore, the law limited the provision of welfare benefits to most noncitizens, families on welfare for more than five years, children who are judged to be disabled based on age-inappropriate behavior standards, and drug addicts and alcoholics. In 1997, Congress created Welfare-to-Work (WtW) grants to help states move TANF recipients into jobs.

A fundamental stipulation of PRWORA law was that all able-bodied adults on welfare for two years would be required to participate in activities to help them become self-supporting, requiring states to have one-half of their recipients in work programs for 30 hours per week. Medicaid could be provided to eligible families. The purpose of the Social Services Block Grant (SSBG) was to support social services directed toward achieving economic self-sufficiency and to prevent the neglect, abuse, or the exploitation of children and adults.

Child care was provided for by a mandatory block grant to low-income families, and states had flexibility in designing child care policies. Mandatory child care and abstinence education included provisions designed to reduce nonmarital births in general and teen nonmarital births in particular. Child support enforcement required the federal and state governments to establish automated registries as a means for locating and tracking absent parents and to operate automated, centralized units for collection, disbursement, and restriction purposes. The PRWORA law required each state to have developed a unit for collecting and distributing child support payments. According to the Office of Child Support Enforcement, almost two out of every three dollars collected by child support agencies came from income withholding. This amounted to more than $6 billion in 1995.

The PRWORA law significantly affected other programs. For example, the Individual Functional Assessment (IFA) for children was eliminated, and children could only qualify through a more restrictive medical listing. Among the children most likely to lose benefits were those suffering from multiple impairments, none of which was severe enough to meet the disability criteria established by the law. Twenty to 30 percent of children with mood disorders, pulmonary tuberculosis, mental retardation, burns, intracranial injuries, schizophrenia, and arthritis were at risk to be impacted by the legislation. Additionally, alien eligibility for welfare was not granted during the first five years of residency unless there was a substantial work history or military or veteran connection. This changed in 1998, and food stamp eligibility was restored for children, elderly persons, and disability benefit recipients who were in the United States at enactment.

Notably, the PRWORA was implemented during the longest boom in postwar history and culminated out of bipartisan debate. Both political parties relied on research to argue their points. Some researchers argued that 40 to 80 percent of the reduction of caseloads was attributable to the economic boom rather than the policy reforms. Strong labor demand played an important role in creating jobs for welfare recipients to move into, while weakened labor demand in the future would make it more difficult for former welfare recipients to find or maintain employment.

While the overall health of the U.S. economy in the 1990s was a positive background factor contributing to a reduction in welfare dependence, other researchers argued that the economy was neither a sufficient nor a primary factor in that reduction. The huge state variations in the rates of caseload decline were not attributed to differences in state economic factors but were explained by differences in the rigor of work-related welfare reforms. Policy reform, not economics, was considered the principal engine driving the decline in dependence. It was, however, not that the effects of inflation, increases in populations, and economic recessions may lead to fewer opportunities for work and welfare independence, but that allocated governmental funds may be insufficient to meet the needs of adults, children, and families living below the poverty line.

In 2002, the Bush Administration amended the law by passing a bill increasing the number of working hours per week required for welfare recipients under TANF from 30 to 40 (citing issues of responsibility), and PRWORA was reauthorized in the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005. In response to the Great Recession of 2007 to 2009, the Obama Administration passed the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009 (ARRA) to stimulate the economy and provide temporary relief to those in need. A $5 million emergency fund was created to help with increasing caseloads, but this funding expired in 2010. Because of persisting low employment rates and joblessness, in 2012, the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) released a memo allowing states greater flexibility in how they operate their welfare programs, stating that they could apply for a waiver for the work requirements of the TANF program. Other changes stipulated that welfare recipients could qualify by participating in work preparation activities, such as vocational training. Because of such changes, Republicans have accused the Obama Administration of gutting welfare reform. However, according to the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, because of rising inflation and persisting economic difficulties, in 2013, TANF benefit levels were insufficient to provide family income above half of the poverty line in any state.

el-Sayed el-Aswad
United Arab Emirates University

See Also: Aid to Families With Dependent Children, Historical Role of; Temporary Aid to Needy Families; Welfare Reform, Role of.

Further Readings

Beland, Daniel, and Alex Wadden. The Politics of Policy Change: Welfare, Medicare, and Social Security Reform in the United States. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 2012.

Boushey, Heather. "The Effects of the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act on Working Families." Viewpoints. http://www.epi.org/publication/webfeatures_viewpoints_tanf_testimony/ (Accessed September 2001).

Burke, Vee. "The 1996 Welfare Reform Law." Congressional Research Service: Welfare Briefing

Book. http://royce.house.gov/uploadedfiles/the%20 1996%20welfare%20reform%20law.pdf (Accessed July 2003).

Floyd, Ife, and Liz Schott. "TANF Cash Benefits Continued to Lose Value in 2013." Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. http://www.cbpp.org/cms/index.cfm?fa=view&id=4034 (Accessed October 2013).

Midgley, James. "The United States: Welfare, Work, and Development." International Journal of Social Welfare, v.10/4 (2001).

Nathan, Richard P., and Thomas L. Gais. Implementing the Personal Responsibilities Act of 1996: A First Look. Albany, NY: Nelson A. Rockefeller Institute of Government, State University of New York, 1999.

Rector, Robert. "The Effects of Welfare Reform." The Heritage Foundation. http://www.heritage.org/research/testimony/the-effects-of-welfare-reform (Accessed March 2001).

Pharmaceuticals, Access to

Limited access to pharmaceuticals, or prescription drugs, is a problem that can have dire health consequences. The poor, minorities, and rural populations already suffering health disparities are more likely to face limited access. Using lower-cost generic medicines, when available, helps offset costs for under- and uninsured. Government programs like Medicare and Medicaid, as well as prescription assistance programs (PAPs), improve access for many.

More than 2 billion people lack access to medicines worldwide, and millions die every year from diseases that are treatable. While manufacturing, infrastructure, and distribution inadequacies limit access in developing nations, the high cost of prescription medicines is an obstacle for patients everywhere. Prescription drug prices have more than doubled over the last decade. In the United States, where drug prices are the highest in the world, costs approach $280 billion a year.

Even for those with prescription drug coverage, access can be difficult given high copayments coupled with prior authorization and restrictive refill policies. Studies show that about one-quarter of Americans routinely skip doses or split pills because of high costs. More than one-third of all prescriptions written are never filled. Not taking medicines as prescribed is associated with adverse health outcomes: Studies link poor management of high blood pressure, diabetes, and cholesterol with medication noncompliance. Inadequate access is also associated with more emergency room visits and longer hospital stays, diminishing quality of life and increasing overall health care costs in the process.

The availability and utilization of generic medicines merits discussion. There are generic medicines to treat diseases with high morbidity, like heart disease, human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immune deficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS), and diabetes, but generics are underutilized. Several studies show that generic medicines are just as effective as their more-expensive counterparts; nonetheless, patients often request brand-name drugs instead. Critics claim pharmaceutical advertising clouds consumer judgment by promoting brand loyalty, but physicians also play a role. A 2004 study found inappropriate prescribing of brand-name medicines to treat high blood pressure, while clinical guidelines recommended a cheaper generic alternative. The practice added $1 billion to Medicare costs that year alone. Many physicians may not know generic alternatives exist. They may not know how much their patients spend on medicines either and so fail to suggest cheaper alternatives. Pharmaceutical companies also impede widespread access and use; pay-for-delay deals or reverse payments to generic drug manufacturers push back production and delay access to cheaper medicines for years.

People with the most difficulty accessing medicines are often those with the greatest need. The National Institutes of Health (NIH) Health Disparities Strategic Plan identifies racial and ethnic minorities, as well as those living in rural communities, at increased risk for early death due to health disparities. These groups suffer a disproportionate number of health-related problems made worse by inadequate access to prescription medicines. Studies show that Hispanics, blacks, and the poor are less likely to take medicines to treat high blood pressure and cholesterol than whites; in addition to an increased risk for heart disease, they also experience diabetes in greater numbers. The risk of diabetes is 66 percent higher among Hispanics and 77 percent higher among blacks compared with whites.

Chronic conditions like diabetes can be effectively managed with medication; when unchecked, complications can include blindness, nerve and kidney damage, stroke, loss of lower extremities, and death. Heart disease, if untreated, can also cause premature death. Research shows that people with heart disease living in the south have higher mortality, and the death rate is strongly correlated with the number of prescriptions filled. Rural and underserved populations in the south are less likely to have employer-provided health care or prescription drug coverage. They are also less likely to receive Medicaid or Medicare benefits, further limiting access to life-saving medicines.

Government programs, like Medicaid and Medicare, can improve medication access and offset costs for the poor and elderly. Medicaid is a means-tested program providing health care and drug coverage for the poor. Jointly funded by federal and state governments, Medicaid is administered at the state level. Although the Affordable Care Act (ACA) expanded eligibility and services, programs vary widely by state. For most Medicaid enrollees, prescriptions are free due in large part to the Medicaid Drug Rebate Program. Enacted in 1991, this is a partnership between federal and state governments and pharmaceutical manufacturers that offsets the cost of drugs administered to Medicaid patients.

Medicare, however, does not provide universal drug coverage. Medicare Parts A and B cover 80 percent of hospital and outpatient care for adults 65 and older, but optional drug plans vary considerably in levels of coverage, copayments, deductibles, and formularies (number and types of prescriptions covered). The 2003 Medicare Prescription Drug, Improvement, and Modernization Act (MMA) established Part D, which covers prescription drug plans regulated by Medicare but administered by private companies. Part D plans are not standardized, and formularies vary, often making it difficult for seniors to choose the plan that best meets their prescription drug needs. Half of Medicare enrollees have three or more chronic conditions requiring many medications to manage, so choosing the right Part D plan is important. The MMA has a clause prohibiting Medicare from negotiating better prices for enrollees, so out-of-pocket costs (deductibles and copayments) are high. Although the ACA helps offset this by reducing deductibles and coverage gaps, many seniors still lack adequate access to medicines.

There are PAPs available to help cover the cost of medicines for the uninsured. Most PAPs are partnerships between drug makers, care providers, and patient advocacy groups, but they are generally administered by pharmaceutical companies. In many instances, access is limited because patients and physicians do not know about PAPs or how to enroll. Most PAPs can only be found online, limiting participation to those with computer access (according to the Federal Communication Commission, 66 million Americans lack basic skills needed to use computers and access the Internet).

Application processes vary, but most PAPs require documented proof of need and details from prescribing physicians. The complexity of the application process is a barrier for many who qualify. Agencies can help match patients with PAPs and assist with the applications, but patients are ultimately responsible for submitting and tracking all of the forms themselves. The approval process can take up to six weeks and programs can be discontinued without notice. The Partnership for Prescription Assistance offers free help and maintains a database of more than 475 PAPs offering 2,500 medicines for reduced or no cost to qualified applicants (www.pparx.org).

Barbara Cook Overton
Louisiana State University

See Also: Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Health Insurance; Medicaid; Medicare.

Further Readings

James, Wesley, and Ronald Cossman. "Using Maps to Monitor At-Risk Geographic Areas of Heart Disease: Tracking Access to Prescription Medication and Mortality Rates." Journal of Maps, v.6 (2010).

Kesselheim, Aaron. "Think Globally, Prescribe Locally: How Rational Pharmaceutical Policy in the U.S. Can Improve Global Access to Essential Medicines." American Journal of Law and Medicine, v.34/2 (2008).

Lopert, Ruth, and Sara Rosenbaum. "What Is Fair? Choice, Fairness, and Transparency in Access to Prescription Medicines in the United States and Australia." Journal of Law, Medicine and Ethics, v.35/4 (2007).

Pluralism

The precise meaning of pluralism, like many other theoretical concepts, has proved rather elusive because the term embraces multiple variants. However, there is a compelling degree of consensus that at the core of theorizing regarding pluralism is an attempt to explain, understand, or address how intergroup relations work. Pluralism is a model whereby power is centered in a range of places. Under pluralism, power is diffused in such a way that no one group or section of society can have the ability to exercise its power so as to consistently influence policy or decision making. This cultural pluralism manifests itself by way of attention to intergroup relations by developing a common core set of values to underpin the approach. Further, it is important to note, though, that the meaning of pluralism is not exclusively associated with immigrants–host community relations.

In an attempt to appreciate pluralism, it is important to discuss briefly the concept of assimilation, which was historically a forerunner to much of the pluralism discourse and led to the emergence of subsequent concepts and practice around modes of intergroup relations. Assimilation theory is grounded in the academic work of an American sociologist, Robert Park, in the 1920s. Robert Park stated that ethnic minority groups underwent phases of changing relationships with the host (dominant) communities from the point of first contact to the point whereby they were fully integrated. These phases were referred to by Park as the race relations cycle. According to Park, when groups first come into contact with each other, a kind of competition develops between them. Park further stated that migrants inevitably and gradually surrendered their home cultural traditions and embraced the values and culture of the host nation—America, in this case.

A Precursor to Pluralism

Against a tide of significant migration into America, by and large, America has historically approached cultural and ethnic difference from an assimilationist perspective. The expectation was that migrants would over time encounter a melting pot—that is, they would blend into existing American cultural, social, and political values. These expectations can, for example, be strikingly captured through speeches made by American presidents and leading politicians, particularly in the 18th, 19th, and early parts of the 20th centuries. Speeches made by President Theodore Roosevelt of the United States after leaving office with reference to the time-significant migration between 1904 and 1908 underline this point.

Although assimilation has largely been associated with the United States, such an approach to migration is often compared to the French government's assimilationist policy. Some studies focusing on identity and ethnocultural differences suggest that comparisons between what may be called assimilationist approaches in America, Canada, and France can be too simplistic in that the modes of assimilation have emerged from somewhat dissimilar contexts.

As can be observed from the preceding discussion, underlying the assimilationist practice was an aspiration by the host society to foster a state that was truly American. Thus, the American state was conceptualized in terms of immigrants learning and embracing American language, education, and political and cultural values. It is important to note though that, at times, migrants themselves deemed it beneficial to learn the host nation's language and embrace American values, religion, and education with the aim and expectation of improving their chances for employment and acceptance within social circles. However, from as early as 1915, critics of assimilationist policies such as Horace Kallen argued that Anglo-conformist policies that demanded migrants abandon their culture, religion, and language were incompatible with American democratic ideals. During the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries and indeed the first part of the 21st century, the concept of assimilation and its dominant ideologies were seldom challenged, explored, or discussed in depth. Against this background, hardly any other options were considered for dealing with cultural difference or identity.

The Rise of Pluralism as a Concept

Much of the previous three centuries had been marked by power imbalances brought about by conquest and colonialism. Issues around rights, governance, and intergroup relations were rarely discussed as long as the dominant ethnic group was comfortable with what tended to be a predominantly assimilationist model. Thus, ideologies that governed relations between groups were primarily viewed through the prism of conquerors or dominant groups.

From the early part of the 20th century and most certainly from the 1960s, migration and globalization singularly or together reconfigured the nature and quality of discussions around intergroup relations, whether from a sociological, political, geographical, or international development perspective. The nature and quality of social, economic, and cultural intergroup relations were increasingly being deemed central to effective functioning of states, and this was consistent with democratic values. Thus, attempts to grapple with historic norms, practices, and their effects on intergroup relations gave currency for seeking viable alternatives for dealing with issues of identity and difference. These developments therefore led to the discussion about pluralism.

At a superficial level, the term pluralism may erroneously be viewed as synonymous with multiculturalism. Yet the two concepts offer distinct perspectives from each other in regards to the discourse around identity and difference. While some researchers may suggest that pluralism is closer to multiculturalism, this position is somewhat misleading. By definition, pluralists are neither multiculturalists nor cultural relativists in ideology.

In an attempt to shed more light on the term pluralism, it is important to compare this term with multiculturalism with which it is often associated. The differences between multiculturalism and pluralism mainly revolve around the following areas: the nature of cultural diversity, the values promoted by the respective ideologies, and the role of public space. Pluralists will argue for a public space that is neutral for equality of opportunity and freedoms of association to be made available where people can exercise their freedoms. Multiculturalists are likely to dismiss the idea and claims of a public space being neutral enough. Multiculturalists would argue that this public space, in spite of being branded neutral, is incapable of catering for the specific needs of cultural groups and their unique identities. Thus, multiculturalists would see the position they advocate as providing a satisfying sanctuary for cultural affiliation and ethnic visibility and, from that position, gain due recognition from the other groups. Pluralists tend to accept cultures and their respective forms of expression while being opposed to the state actively resourcing alternative cultural endeavors specific to a group.

Perspectives of Pluralism

As has perhaps been observed from this discussion, pluralism is often discussed from two dimensions: the political philosophy and the sociological perspectives. From the political philosophy perspective, pluralism advocates that power must be diffused among a range of interest groups within society, including religious groups, education institutions, and professional and cultural groups, thus acknowledging the range of interests. The political philosophy perspective to pluralism advances the argument that no one single institution should dominate another in a society. This was a view principally developed by British liberals in the early part of the 20th century. At the core of the pluralism philosophy is the belief that effective defense of people's rights firmly belongs at the small group level.

Perhaps a typical pluralistic perspective may be encapsulated best in an example of a state education system as explained within this paragraph. Pluralists would, for example, not be in support of the state resourcing schools that develop or choose to be governed along specific ethnic, religious, and cultural orientations. Pluralists would argue that, while recognition and acceptance of diversity can be tolerated, schools are a public space within which citizens from all backgrounds can meet in neutral ways. Further to this, while pluralists recognize the validity and existence of other identities and cultures, they would argue that society must not have the obligation to support alternative modes of expression. Pluralists, for example, would view schools as arenas for providing neutral space for equality of opportunity and freedoms of association. Pluralists would argue that merit is rewarded through the provision of equality of opportunity; in this case, a school system that is not culturally specific in its approach.

Pluralism and Multiculturalism

In spite of liberal forms of dealing with difference, there have been other perspectives that have emerged over the past 50 years. These have been promoted as viable perspectives for dealing with increasing transnational movements and globalization. It has been suggested that the rise of multiculturalism had been influenced by liberal thinking about new forms of living with ethnic diversity. Large numbers of migrants moving into America and Europe had now been significant enough to have an impact on host populations away from the assimilationist perspective. In the middle of the 20th century, there was increasing acknowledgment that traditional connotations of assimilation with superiority of either host or conquest community's social and cultural values ran counter to democratic values.

Further to this, pluralists will view multiculturalism as contingent on cultural values and therefore not likely to accommodate or be accepting of other forms of cultural persuasions. Accordingly, pluralists will consider the predominance of cultural dimensions among multiculturalists as placing some constraints on common democratic values and, as such, not always compatible with the open values of a liberal society.

Pluralism as an issue has increasingly become a point of discussion in the United Kingdom. Leicester is a city in the United Kingdom with a population of about 320,000 residents. The city of Leicester lies about 85 miles north of London in central England. For centuries, all of its residents have been people of European descent until after World War I and World War II and certainly after the independence of India and Pakistan in 1948. People from the Caribbean, through what was known as the Windrush, and some people from India migrated to the motherland (Britain) as a matter of right as citizens of the Commonwealth. By and large, it was expected that new migrants would assimilate. Considering that most migrants into Leicester came from former colonies, it would have been expected that they would assimilate. In the 1960s, Afro Caribbean migrants settled in St. Peters, while East African Indians and Pakistanis settled in the Belgrave Road and Spinney Hill parts of the city of Leicester. The first decade was characterized by migrants establishing worship places and clubs and identifying specific places for welcoming new arrivals, shopping, and socializing. Further to the initial wave of migrants, during the 1960s when most countries in Africa were attaining independence from colonial powers, Leicester experienced the beginning of East African Asian migration. Indeed, soon there was an exodus of East Asians from Kenya, bringing the population of Indian migrants in Leicester to about 20,000 by 1971.

Considering cultural and religious differences between host and migrants, there was a growing feeling in some natives against migration. This disquiet is evidenced by low voting patterns in 1974 and 1976, rising to about 18 percent of the host community voting against immigration, and this only declined in about 1979.

The history of Leicester in the United Kingdom provides within it lessons around intergroup relations and dealing with difference. Previous to the 1970s, some migrants had settled in Leicester. The comparatively insignificant number of migrants over the period leading to the 1970s had not given rise to much tension. Migrants coming into the city previous to the 1970s melted into the community and became anglicized.

Early migrants into the city of Leicester were not perceived as in competition for resources by the majority population. Migration of East African Asians into the city during the period leading to the 1970s had evidently impacted on sections of host communities. Parallel to protests and antimigrant sentiments were new liberals and socialists who had pluralistic leanings and who became instrumental in influencing the votes, resulting in a popular acceptance of cultural diversity. Leicester occupies a unique place in the United Kingdom as one of the country's most diverse cities, with minorities accounting for about half of the residents. Despite somewhat uncertain tensions in the city of Leicester in early migrant history, few would doubt that the city had inherited a pluralistic position.

In many respects, political leaders in Leicester, like the United Kingdom as a whole, will almost never explicitly identify themselves with assimilationist policies. In the same way, both researchers and politicians would rarely align themselves with integration because of its perceived link with assimilation. However, politicians would be reasonably comfortable to claim the multicultural composition of their cities.

Within the city of Leicester, multiculturalism was highly embraced in the first decade of the 21st century. Every year, residents and the city have worked closely to organize cultural events. Residents from diverse cultural backgrounds share in celebrations. At some point, Leicester, like many cities in the United Kingdom, would translate official documents into key minority ethnic languages. In recent years, in the aftermath of Europeans acceding, states have increased the level of migration. During this time, there has been a significant increase in the number of migrants from Somalia, Iraq, Afghanistan, and Zimbabwe.

However, looked at from another political, philosophical perspective, Leicester pursues a pluralistic model of dealing with identity and difference. While initially ethnic events would have been exclusively designed with specific groups in mind, the city of Leicester has in recent years promoted inclusive events with more subtle cultural dimensions. Against an environment of disquiet against multiculturalism due to migration and largely misguided associations with terrorism, there is recently a general trend for local authorities to actively support pluralistic initiatives and projects. Decision making is diffused in many other ways, indicating more of a pluralistic dimension to policies.

Examined from a theoretical point of view and intergroup sociological and development theory, there are a few important points that can be made. Over decades of migration into Leicester, two perspectives would have provided avenues for dealing with ethnic, cultural, and racial difference. Either accept a multicultural approach to dealing with difference, or have a critical mass within the city who subscribed to a pluralist ideology, thereby minimizing tensions that may arise in acceptance and denial of difference within the range of interest groups.

As can be seen, the rise of pluralism, although attributed to liberals, may be an inevitable step in the development of intergroup relations. Globalization, good governance, associated rights, and diversity of groups with a range of interests, needs, and vulnerabilities within a range of contexts present challenges that may not be well served within assimilationist or multiculturalist modes of dealing with difference. Increases in migration resulting from disasters and voluntary migration for better prospects, employment, and personal choice, some would argue, seem to point to pluralism as an inevitable direction.

Martin Nthakomwa
Coventry University

See Also: Assimilation; Immigrant Populations, Human Services Needs of; Immigration, Human Services Issues; Multiculturalism.

Further Readings

Connolly, W. E. Pluralism. London: Duke University Press, 2005.
Ong, B. O. To Be an American. New York: New York University Press, 1997.
Taylor, Charles, et al. Multiculturalism: Examining the Politics of Recognition. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994.

Policing and Safety

The police are an organ of the executive arm of government that is constitutionally established and responsible for the enforcement of law and order, protection of life and property, and protection from any form of antisocial behavior. The cosmopolitan nature of most cities makes the work of policing more complex. For effective policing, the United Nation (UN) recommends one police officer to 400 people. Many countries of the world cannot meet this recommendation because of the huge finance and logistics that effective policing demands. Human diversity as a result of multiculturalism and neoliberalism contribute to diverse services required to provide safety for the community in modern times. The responsibility for policing and public safety rests across a number of different agencies.

The complex nature of policing made societies come up with the idea of dividing policing into public and private policing. Private policing is a personal arrangement to secure personal safety and to protect personal property. This type of policing is financed by the individual and has limited function, duty, and power under the Constitution. It involves door supervision, closed-circuit television (CCTV) monitoring, bodyguards, and supervision of money and important goods in transit.

Public policing is financed and controlled by the nation's authorities. Modern policing issues must consider public safety from crime prevention and victim support to planning. Policing and community safety partnerships are new statutory bodies established under the justice act to help make communities safer. This includes community and district policing partnerships to consult and engage in crime monitoring, identify and prioritize the safety needs of the community, and monitor performance of the police to deliver a reduction in crime and enhance community safety in the district. Effective policing requires huge financial support and cooperation of members of society to have a safe and secure society.

The responsibility for policing and public safety rests across a number of different agencies. New York Army National Guard soldiers along with New York state police troopers assist local residents arriving by military vehicle at the Long Beach City Hall for evacuation to shelters supervised by Nassau County Office of Emergency Management following subtropical storm Sandy.

Police Names

The names given to the police are different from country to country; they depend on the origin of police formation in different countries. Police could also be referred to as gendarmerie, constabulary, police department, police service, crime prevention, protective services, police authority, law enforcement agency, civil guard, or civic guard. These are synonyms based on human diversities and identities. Members of the police rank and file could also be referred to as police officers, troopers, sheriffs, garda, constables, rangers, peace officers, militsiya, or civic or civil guards.

Policing and Safe Communities

The task of making a community safe is the duty of every citizen. Historically, in America, policing is provided by the elected members of the community. In ancient Britain, every citizen participated in policing by providing security through hue and cry. The New York Sheriff Office was founded in 1826, and Albany County had elected sheriffs and local militias. The U.S. Secret Service was founded in 1865. Making society safe involves activities such as control of antisocial behaviors, which include hate crimes, excessive noise nuisances, intimidating groups in public spaces, graffiti, dumping rubbish, stray dogs, street prostitution, street drinking, and drug or alcohol misuse.

Prevention of violence against women and girls is another method of making a community safe. This includes domestic violence, rape and sexual violence, female genital mutilation, forced marriage, crimes in the name of "honor," sexual harassment, stalking, trafficking, prostitution, sexual exploitation, and drug and alcohol abuse.

To have a safe community, hate crimes must be well policed by the community. Hate crimes include physical attacks, harassment, threats, disputes with neighbors' abusive remarks, intimidation, distress, fighting, bullying at school and workplaces, arson, spitting, or making insulting gestures. If anybody feels insecure and experiences any of these antisocial behaviors, he or she can contact the police or a victim support organization. In most countries, for instance, in the United States and the United Kingdom, 911 and 999, respectively, are the designated numbers for a victim of crime.

Effective Policing

For effective policing of communities, police authorities are divided into different units based on the security needs of a particular country. There are uniformed police known as administrative, order, or patrol police; they are always in uniform and readily available for the protection of life and property. Police detectives are always in civilian clothes and hide their identities. They provide secret services and information that could aid investigation and detection of criminal plans. Detective police are also referred to as investigation police, judiciary or judicial police, and criminal police. In the United Kingdom, detective police work is in the Criminal Investigation Department. They also work in the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) in the United States.

Specialized police are those who work where specialized or high-tech know-how is needed such as traffic law enforcement, crash investigation, homicide, fraud, underwater issues, aviation, explosive device disposal (bomb squad), computer crime, light infantry, police field forces, peacekeeping, antiterrorism, hostage taking, armed robbery, and assault. Military police carry out the same duties as civilian officers but within military circles. Many Islamic nations have religious police who carry out the implementation of Sharia law. Interpol forms global webs of policing to curb internationally connected crime. There is an auxiliary police unit that provides administrative duties such as issuing fire arms licenses.

Police, as gatekeepers in the criminal justice system, are the first point of contact for the community. Police arrest, detain, investigate, grant bail, and arraign offenders in (criminal) courts. There are other policing units that provide safety measures in air and water such as air and marine police. Policing and safety are everybody's business because the police depend on intelligent reports from the general public to combat crime and criminals.

Olakunle Folami
University of Ulster

See Also: Juvenile Detention Centers; Juvenile Justice System; Neighborhood Watch Programs; Social Security Administration.

Further Readings

Bowling, Ben, and Janet Foster. "Policing and the Police." In The Oxford Handbook of Criminology (3rd ed.), Mike Maguire, et al., eds. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor. Occupational Outlook Handbook 2008/09. http://www.bls.gov/oco/ocos160.htm (Accessed May 2013).

Ortmeier, P. J., and Edwin Meese III. Leadership, Ethics, and Policing: Challenges for the 21st Century, 2nd ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 2009.

Postpartum Depression

The birth of a child is an exciting time for a family and produces a range of emotions from joy to fear to exhaustion. However, for some mothers, the birth of a child can trigger postpartum depression. Experiencing depression following the birth of a child is a common occurrence and can be managed through psychiatric and therapeutic treatment. This entry explains the types of postpartum depression including the baby blues, postpartum depression, and postpartum psychosis. Furthermore, this entry discusses the risk and protective factors, screening, and treatment of postpartum depression.

Types of Postpartum Depression

The baby blues are a transient state of heightened emotional reactivity that include depressive symptoms such as mood swings, anxiety, sadness, irritability, crying, decreased concentration, and trouble sleeping. The baby blues occur in approximately 50 percent of women postpartum, according to L. J. Miller. Postpartum blues peak three to five days after delivery and can last anywhere from a few hours to 10 days. The symptoms of the baby blues may be distressing; however, they do not reflect psychopathology, and they typically do not affect the mother's ability to function and care for her child.

Postpartum depression has similar symptoms to the baby blues except that the symptoms are more intense and longer lasting. Postpartum depression symptoms interfere with the mother's ability to care for her baby and handle everyday tasks. Postpartum depression symptoms may also include loss of appetite; insomnia; intense irritability and anger; overwhelming fatigue; loss of interest in sex; a lack of joy in life; feelings of shame, guilt, or inadequacy; severe mood swings; difficulty bonding with the baby; withdrawal from family and friends; and thoughts of harming self or the baby. Postpartum depression occurs in approximately 10 to 20 percent of women within six months after delivery. Risk factors in developing postpartum depression include a history of depressive disorders, psychosocial stress, and inadequate social support. If postpartum depression goes untreated, the symptoms can last for months.

In addition to postpartum depression, some mothers also experience postpartum psychosis. Postpartum psychosis is a rare condition that typically develops within the first two weeks after delivery and includes symptoms such as confusion and disorientation, hallucinations and delusions, paranoia, and attempts to harm self or the baby. It is important to note that many mothers with postpartum depression have thoughts of harming their infants. These thoughts are often obsessional in quality and rarely acted upon. However, when a mother with severe postpartum depression becomes suicidal, she may also consider killing her children, not typically out of anger or a desire to harm her children but rather due to a desire not to abandon her children. Episodes of postpartum psychosis can be successfully treated; however, postpartum psychotic depressions have a high likelihood of recurrence, both during and outside of the postpartum period, without maintenance treatment.

Screening

With 10 to 20 percent of mothers developing postpartum depression following the birth of a child, it is imperative that screening efforts occur by primary care physicians, obstetricians and gynecologists, maternity nurses, and pediatricians. The Edinburgh Postnatal Depression Scale (EPDS) is a commonly used 10-item measure assessing a mother's risk for postpartum depression. At a minimum, while in the maternity ward post-delivery and at the baby's well visits, doctors and medical staff should monitor and assess for potential depressive symptoms.

Screening is imperative for the early detection and treatment of postpartum depression for the mother but is also important to the support of the entire family. Partners are more likely to develop depressive symptoms in the postpartum period if the mother has developed postpartum depression. The marital relationship is significantly strained by the occurrence of postpartum depression. In addition, multiple studies have indicated the strain the mother–child relationship experiences if the mother develops postpartum depression.

Treatment

Postpartum depression is often treated with medication or therapy. It is important to know that, if a mother is breast-feeding, any medication taken by the mother will enter into her breast milk. However, there are some antidepressants that can be used during breast-feeding with little risk of side effects for the baby. Antidepressants are a proven treatment for postpartum depression, and a doctor can help the mother understand the benefits and potential risks of taking antidepressants while breast-feeding. In addition, estrogen replacement treatment may help counteract the rapid drop in estrogen that accompanies childbirth. However, research on estrogen replacement treatment is limited.

Individual and group counseling for postpartum depression focuses on helping the mother find ways to cope with depressive symptoms, utilize problem-solving skills, and set realistic goals. Cognitive-behavioral therapy is a commonly utilized therapy for the treatment of postpartum depression. Cognitive-behavioral therapy focuses on helping the mother identify distorted perceptions, change these perceptions, and discover new patterns of actions and behaviors to improve mood. The following three steps are the main focus of cognitive behavioral therapy: (1) the mother must learn to recognize depressive reactions and thoughts as they occur, usually by keeping a journal of feelings about daily events; (2) the mother is given homework to practice identifying and challenging old negative thoughts and assumptions by replacing the old thoughts with new realistic and helpful thoughts; and (3) the mother works with the therapist to identify behaviors the mother can utilize to improve her mood on a daily basis.

Cognitive-behavioral therapy has been demonstrated to be as effective as psychiatric medications in the treatment of depression. Treatment typically lasts for a period of 12 to 14 weeks and may include individual or group therapy modalities. With appropriate treatment, the symptoms of postpartum depression generally go away within a few months. For additional education and support visit Postpartum Support International (www.postpartum.net).

Amanda Mathisen
Rutgers University

See Also: Family Services; Maternal/Infant Health Services; Mental Health Services, Adult.

Further Readings

Bennett, Shoshana, and Pec Indman. Beyond the Blues: Understanding and Treating Prenatal and Postpartum Depression and Anxiety. San Jose, CA: Moodswings Press, 2011.

Kleiman, Karen R., and Valerie Davis Raskin. This Isn't What I Expected: Overcoming Postpartum Depression, 2nd ed. Boston: Da Capo Lifelong Books, 2013.

Miller, L. J. "Postpartum Depression." Journal of the American Medical Association, v.287/6 (2002).

Poverty

Poverty in the United States differs from the degree and forms of material deprivation found in less-industrialized nations, many of whose citizens barely survive on $1 or $2 a day. In the United States, there are varying opinions about the nature and extent of material hardship that poor persons experience. Those on the political left, such as economist Barbara Ehrenreich, political scientist Stephen Pimpare, and sociologist Kathryn Edin, stress the struggles poor families have to put sufficient food on the table, to put a roof over their heads, and to educate their children.

Those on the political right, such as Senior Research Fellow Robert Rector and Research Associate Rachel Sheffield at the Heritage Foundation, argue that official poverty thresholds provide a misleading indication of material deprivation or hardships—they cite things such as the presence of cable or satellite TV (two-thirds of poor families), wide-screen or plasma TV (one-third), air-conditioning in the home (80 percent), car or truck ownership (75 percent), and the like. Invariably, both portraits contain some grain of truth, in part reflecting that the poverty population in the United States is not of one piece—that is, it varies along sociodemographic characteristics, with some groups such as children, female-headed families, and black persons more likely than others to be classified officially as poor or to experience deep poverty at any given time and for longer periods of time.

How Poverty Is Determined

The U.S. Census Bureau uses a set of dollar-value thresholds that vary by family size and composition to determine who is poor. The poverty thresholds are used primarily for statistical purposes; for example, estimating the number of persons in poverty and tabulating them by type of residence, race, and other social, economic, and demographic characteristics. Relying on several official estimates of low-budget food plans, economist Mollie Orshansky, working for the Social Security Administration, developed the poverty thresholds in 1963 and 1964. The poverty thresholds became official in August 1969 when the Bureau of the Budget issued a memorandum that directed all federal branch agencies to use revised estimates as issued by the U.S. Census Bureau for statistical purposes.

Poverty thresholds are distinguished from poverty guidelines, which are issued by the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) for administrative purposes such as determining whether a person or family is financially eligible for assistance or services under certain federal programs; for example, Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) or the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP).

Based on family size and number of children under 18 years of age, in 2011, the lowest U.S. Census Bureau poverty threshold was set at $10,788 for a family of one person 65 years and older, with the highest threshold at $50,059 for a family of nine or more people with only one related child under 18 years of age. If a family's total income is less than the applicable threshold, then that family and every individual in it are considered in poverty. To account for inflation, the consumer price index (CPI-U) is used to update these thresholds annually. The official poverty definition uses money income before taxes and tax credits; it excludes capital gains and noncash benefits such as those from SNAP, formerly known as food stamps, and housing assistance. For example, imagine two families, A and B, each of which has five people living at home: three children (two under 18 years of age and the third 20 years of age with a part-time job while earning a degree), their mother, and their grandmother with income from cleaning other people's homes. Family A's and Family B's poverty threshold in 2011 was $27,517. Because their total family income, $29,000, was higher than their threshold ($27,517), Family A would not be considered in poverty; however, because their total family income, $27,000, fell below the same threshold, Family B would be considered in poverty.

Characteristics of the Poverty Population

According to the demographic makeup of the U.S. population at varying degrees of poverty in 2011, of all persons whose family incomes fell between 50 and 99 percent of their poverty threshold, more than one-third (34.3 percent) were children under 18 years of age, more than half (55.3 percent) were between the ages of 18 and 65, and the remainder (10.4 percent) were 65 years of age or older. Of all persons whose family incomes fell below 50 percent of the poverty threshold, considered extreme poverty, more than one-third (35.6 percent) were children under 18 years of age, more than half (59.8 percent) were between the ages of 18 and 65, and the remainder (4.6 percent) were 65 years of age or older.

In 2011, the official poverty rate in the United States, based on the U.S. Census Bureau poverty thresholds, was 15.0 percent: 46.2 million people were poor; 13.6 percent of males (20.5 million persons) and 16.3 percent of females (25.7 million persons) were poor. The poverty rate and the number of families in poverty in 2011 were 11.8 percent and 9.5 million. For married-couple families, the poverty rate was 6.2 percent (3.6 million); for families with a female householder and no husband present, 31.2 percent (4.8 million); and for families with a male householder, 16.1 percent (1 million).

Trends in the Poverty Population

Poverty rates are affected by the economy: Generally, as the economy grows, poverty rates decline; as economic growth slows, as is the case during recessions, poverty rates tend to increase. The poverty rate declined for all persons throughout the 1960s as the economy emerged from the 1960 to 1961 recession and leveled off in the 1970s, which had three recessions, so that the highs and lows on average evened out.

In the early 1980s, the poverty rate was about 15 percent, declined gradually throughout the remainder of the decade, but rose again in the later part of the decade, showing a gradual rise on average throughout the decade. Coming off the 1990 and 1991 recession, the poverty rate dropped precipitously throughout the 1990s, reaching historical lows at the turn of the century, before increasing again in the early 2000s in light of the Great Recession of 2007 to 2009. However, poverty rates differed markedly for non-Hispanic whites and blacks between 1959 and 2011.

Although the poverty rate declined for both non-Hispanic whites and blacks during the 1960s, at no time were more than 20 percent of non-Hispanic white persons living in poverty, hovering between 9 and 11 percent throughout most of the period. Poverty rates were about three times higher for black persons until the mid-1990s, when the gap narrowed to about twice the rates for non-Hispanic whites. The two recessions of the 2000s produced increased poverty rates for non-Hispanic whites and for blacks, with the gap between them remaining about twice as high for blacks. The U.S. Census Bureau issued poverty statistics for Hispanic persons of any race beginning in 1972. At no time were less than 20 percent of Hispanic persons living in poverty, hovering in the mid-20s in the 1970s and high-20s in the 1980s, peaking at 30.7 percent in 1994, fluctuating thereafter, and standing at 25.3 percent in 2011. The U.S. Census Bureau issued poverty statistics for Asian persons of any race beginning in 1987, when 16.1 percent of such persons were classified as in poverty.

Trends in poverty rates between 1959 and 2011 also varied by age. Those 65 years of age and older experienced the greatest decline, particularly in the 1960s through the mid-1970s. The poverty rates for children under 18 years of age also declined in the 1960s through the mid-1970s, but unlike those 65 years of age and older, their rates climbed in the late 1970s and early 1980s and again in the early 1990s and throughout the 2000s.

Paralleling the increasing poverty rates of children less than 18 years of age are the trends in the poverty rates of female-headed families, particularly those with no husband present. Whether for non-Hispanic whites, blacks, or those of Hispanic origin, for these parents and their children, poverty rates never dipped below 20 percent between 1972 and 2011.

Major Public Programs Affecting Low-Income Persons and Families

Aside from the war on poverty during the administration of President Lyndon Johnson in the mid- to late 1960s, the United States has no comprehensive antipoverty strategy per se—at least at the national level of government beyond that of growing the economy. Nonetheless, there are three major cash-related programs that directly affect poverty rates, namely, Social Security, the Earned Income Tax Credit (EITC), and Supplemental Security Income (SSI), which will be highlighted here. Other programs that provide benefits to low-income persons and their families include TANF, SNAP, Medicaid, State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP), and Head Start.

Established by the Social Security Act of 1935 for retirees and their dependents, Social Security is the pay-as-you-go retirement program funded by payroll taxes—that is, current employees pay into the trust fund that supports the current generation of retirees and their dependents. Individual workers and their employers each pay 6.2 percent of an employee's wage up to a specified maximum dollar amount ($113,700 in 2013), with self-employed persons contributing 12.4 percent. Every month, Social Security checks lift about 20 million or so persons above official poverty thresholds, including 1.1 million children under 18 years of age, 5.3 million adults between the ages of 18 and 64, and 13.4 million persons 65 years of age or older.

The mayor of Duluth, Minnesota, Herb Bergson (center), attends an antipoverty rally in 2005. Poverty varies along sociodemographic lines, with some groups more likely than others to officially be classified as poor.

Created in 1972 and launched in 1974, Supplemental Security Income (SSI) is a federal income supplement program funded by general tax revenues and designed to provide cash assistance to people who are disabled, aged, or both, and who have low income and few assets. About 60 percent of SSI recipients are disabled adults (18–64 years of age), about 15 percent are disabled children (under age 18), and about 25 percent are older adults (age 65 and over) with or without disabilities. SSI recipients are generally eligible for Medicaid and other programs available for low-income persons and families. According to the trends in the SSI population, the increase in the number of disabled adults since the 1990s is the most pronounced. By contrast, the share of the aged who participate in SSI steadily declined in the past few decades as more women qualified for Social Security benefits and as average Social Security benefits have increased. Overall, the number of SSI recipients has increased faster than the overall population over the past few decades. SSI has been estimated to reduce poverty among recipients; for example, from a pretransfer poverty rate of 80.2 percent in 2004 to 72.2 percent.

The EITC was enacted provisionally in 1975 as part of the Tax Reduction Act during the Gerald Ford administration to offset the burden of the Social Security payroll tax on low-income working parents. Low-income, full-time workers whose annual income falls below official poverty guidelines are eligible for the tax credit, and they must file tax returns to obtain a tax refund just as any other taxpayer.

The EITC generally equals a specified percentage of wages up to a maximum dollar amount. For 2012, for example, earned income and adjusted gross income (AGI) for a single adult must have been less than $45,060 ($50,270 married filing jointly) with three or more qualifying children; $41,952 ($47,162 married filing jointly) with two qualifying children; $36,920 ($42,130 married filing jointly) with one qualifying child; and $13,980 ($19,190 married filing jointly) with no qualifying children. Maximum credits were $5,891 with three or more qualifying children, $5,236 with two qualifying children, $3,169 with one qualifying child, and $475 with no qualifying children. Additionally, investment income must be $3,200 or less for the year.

From 1975 through 1987, the number of EITC claimants ranged between 6,000 and 9,000; in 1988, more than 11,100 individuals claimed the credit. By 2010, nearly 27.8 million returns were filed claiming the credit, representing nearly 19.5 percent of all tax returns filed for that tax year and $60.9 billion in revenue lost to the U.S. Treasury Department. By contrast, for fiscal year 2006, net federal expenditures for TANF, which replaced the Aid to Families With Dependent Children (AFDC) program in 1996, amounted to $13.6 billion, less than one-third of revenue lost in the calendar year 2006 because of the EITC.

Total claimants climbed to 27.4 million in 2009, surpassing the 24.8 million in 2008, with total costs increasing from $50.7 billion to $60.4 billion, respectively. In 2011, EITC kept 5.7 million low-income workers and their families out of poverty, including 3.1 million children. Had the SNAP or food stamp voucher been counted as cash income in 2011, it would have lifted 3.9 million persons above poverty thresholds, including 1.7 million children.

Richard K. Caputo
Yeshiva University

See Also: Aid to Families With Dependent Children, Historical Role of; Homelessness; Social and Economic Justice; Temporary Aid to Needy Families; War on Poverty Programs; Welfare Reform, Role of.

Further Readings

Ben-Shalom, Yonatan, Robert Moffit, and John Karl Scholz. "An Assessment of the Effectiveness of the Anti-Poverty Programs in the United States." In The Oxford Handbook of the Economics of Poverty, Phillip N. Jefferson, ed. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2012.

Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. "Social Security Keeps 20 Million Americans Out of Poverty: A State by State Analysis." Washington, DC: Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, 2010.

DeNavis-Walt, Carmen, Bernadette D. Proctor, and Jessica C. Smith. Income, Poverty, and Health Insurance Coverage in the United States: 2011. U.S. Census Bureau. Current Population Reports, P60-243. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office (2012). http://www.census.gov/prod/2012pubs/p60-243.pdf (Accessed March 2013).

Edin, Kathyrn, and Laura Lein. Making Ends Meet: How Single Mothers Survive Welfare and Low-Wage Work. New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 1997.

Ehrenreich, Barbara. Nickel and Dimed: On (Not) Getting by in America. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 2001.

Fisher, Gordon M. "The Development and History of the Poverty Thresholds." Social Security Bulletin, v.55 (1992).

Pimpare, Stephen. A People's History of Poverty in America. New York: W. W. Norton and Co., 2008.

Rector, Robert, and Rachel Sheffield. "Understanding Poverty in the United States: Surprising Facts About America's Poor." Backgrounder No. 2607. Washington, DC: The Heritage Foundation, 2011.

Power, Race/Ethnicity and

Race, ethnicity, and culture are often translated in one meaning for many characteristics. Each of the three terms are used widely to label a group or individual; however, lack of understanding of the distinction often leads to confusion, misrepresentation, or unintentional bias. The literature reveals that there are multidimensional approaches to referencing race, ethnicity, and culture.

Early research studies characterize race in terms of reference groups based on an individual's identity to physical image, social values, and individual perceptions. Ethnicity, while different from race, is often used interchangeably. The distinction of the two are defined by the construct associated with skin color and the practices and cultures associated with one's ethnic background.

Race Defined

For centuries, race has defined differences among humans to create distinctions among groups. The categorization of race has been used widely across the United States and is accepted as a blanket form of identification in government documents, personnel profiles, health care, and human services. Race is a social construct used in systems to define or categorize humans based on distinct characteristics associated with outer appearances such as the color of one's skin and facial structure; however, the literature presents multiple points related to research that this classification alone is not based on anthropological ideas centered on race.

Since the late 1700s when the first United States decennial census collected data, the white population has been enumerated. Not until the 2000 census poll did individuals have options to self-identify with more than one race. Based on the Office of Management and Budget, the U.S. Census adheres to the five racial categories. Individuals now have the ability to choose from more than 57 possible multiple race combinations. The U.S. Census Bureau in 2010 defined race and ethnicity by classification in five categories: white, black or African American, American Indian or Alaska Native, Asian, and Native Hawai'ian or other Pacific Islander.

The U.S. Census Bureau in 2010 offered an understanding of the race category questions and states: "The race categories included in the census questionnaire generally reflect a social definition of race recognized in this country and are not an attempt to define race biologically, anthropologically, or genetically. In addition, it is recognized that the categories of the race question include racial and national origin or sociocultural groups."

Historically, there have been detrimental research studies that propagated race as an inferior or superior determination of intelligence. The 1924 Immigration Act prevented groups of people from entering the United States based on quotas and limited annual immigration from particular countries. The Immigration Act allowed for a 2 percent or less admittance into the country and provided priority to specific persons, including those who who were married or related to a U.S. citizen, or had agricultural skills. In more recent years, psychologists published controversial research on the bell curve and used race as the construct to make the claim that, based on race, people were inferior or superior in intelligence and ability to achieve.

Ethnicity Defined

Researchers define ethnicity much different than race or culture. The literature reveals ethnicity is the part of an individual that identifies similar beliefs and practices. It consists of characteristics that make up the smaller groups within the larger cultural group or society. Culture and ethnicity are both important within various groups, and the traditions and practices are passed down for generations. Ethnicity looks different even within racial classifications because ethnicity comprises culture and practice. Ethnic diversity is shared commonly by people who have similar historical backgrounds and cultures. Additionally, the ethnic group may also have similar values, beliefs, and practices. In some instances, a person with a different racial background may practice more ethnic traditions of another group, and conversely, someone connected within an ethnicity may not adhere or practice their ethnic traditions.

In the development of the Smith Ethnic Identity Model, author and researcher Elise Smith defines ethnicity through identification: The ethnic identification process can be measured by observing the degree to which an individual's ethnic membership group is a salient reference group and by observing the extent to which the individual uses the signs, symbols, and language of the culture associated with the ethnic membership group.

Ethnicity is often associated with race because of the origin of the group associated with race. This labeling and identification can also lead to a power struggle or resistance within Western culture. The U.S. Census characterizes the white race with origins from European, Middle Eastern, or North African descent. Based on the size of the white population in the United States, all other races have been characterized as minority races.

Power in the United States

The U.S. system of power was developed largely to maintain control among society and provide rules and laws to adhere to in daily living. These laws govern the United States and the empirical power that the Constitution embodies yet, some would argue, separates power among various races in society. The nature of U.S. culture is identified through the historical power displayed in the forming of the nation as a democracy. Acknowledging the accomplishment of the country and the laws that govern is notable, while ignoring the differentiation among racial groups is negligent. Politics, economics, and the societal norms of this country are part of the power dynamic. Identifying how race is also a part of this construct and recognizing the disparity in power among races provides a clear indication for moving into informed thought surrounding power as a construct.

Balance of power and equity through predominate cultures can shape integration of all levels of diversity. Understanding the theoretical basis for power and norms that often do not inherently include relevance for culturally or linguistically diverse populations will also eliminate the possibility of achieving a balance of power. To achieve this balance in organizations or systemic operations, researchers on cultural proficiency suggest integrating culture within the organization, identifying biases of stakeholders and those in power, and integrating a positive approach to achieving equity, which includes community stakeholders.

Minority Versus Majority as a Classification

The racial and ethnic classifications in the United States have led to unfortunate stereotypes that have shaped our society. There are several race-related issues tied to negative occurrences in U.S. culture. Racial profiling in the criminal justice system has become a reality, and there are services put in place to mitigate such occurrences. The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) defines racial profiling as, "law enforcement and private security practices that disproportionately target people of color for investigation and enforcement." The ACLU works on behalf of individuals who have been victims of such profiling.

Race-based initiatives to assist in equalizing the level of access in economic, educational, and human services have been implemented in efforts to achieve equal opportunities. One example of such an initiative is in an executive order signed by President Barack Obama titled the White House Initiative of Educational Excellence for African Americans.

This executive order promotes the implementation of innovative education reform strategies and practices in American public schools and ensures that all African American students have comparable access to the resources necessary to obtain a high-quality education, including effective teachers and school leaders, in part by supporting efforts to improve the recruitment, preparation, development, and retention of successful African American teachers and school leaders and other effective teachers and school leaders responsible for the education of African American students.

Additionally, affirmative action set out through Executive Order 10925, signed by President John F. Kennedy in 1961, to "not discriminate against any employee or applicant for employment because of race, creed, color or national origin" and "take affirmative action to ensure that applicants are employed and that employees are treated during employment, without regard to their race, creed, color or national origin."

Some race-based initiatives are scrutinized by the predominate race, and they ridicule such initiatives for providing unfair opportunities for everyone. This led to several states banning affirmative action because of its opposition from some groups in American society related to questions of intent.

Critical Race Theory

Critical race theory (CRT) began to bring attention to inequitable practices in the United States at many levels of society. The emergence of CRT came almost a decade after the Civil Rights Act of 1964, when Derrick Bell, an African American Harvard professor, and Alan Freeman, a fellow advocate, fought intellectually to right the wrongs of race-based injustice.

While the Civil Rights Movement was a catalyst to begin setting the stage for racial equity, the level of integration and social changes were rarely occurring at best. CRT seeks to identify practices of inequity while oftentimes giving voice to those affected by providing a lens to explain true happenings in the work environment and social settings. Additionally, CRT exposes contextual factors of race by identifying historical and systemic effects on race and class in American culture. CRT is widely cited in research publications, legal briefs, and scholarly books reaching thousands of cross references and citations.

White Privilege

CRT and similar theories on the study of whiteness introduce the academic perspective of white privilege. However, the issues surrounding white privilege have historically been a part of academic discovery as early as the civil rights era. White privilege is the social construct experienced by individuals who identify within the white race based on skin color. White privilege asserts that the racialization of American culture allows whites advantage in social, economic, and cultural advancement. White privilege also identifies the biases and sometimes unintentional superiority upheld by the white race against other races that are of color. White privilege is often associated with personal self-worth, uninhibited freedom of speech, and social nonjudgmental norms that are not provided

Veiled demonstrators at a march against racially disproportionate policing in New York City. Racial profiling in the criminal justice system has become a reality, and there are services put in place to mitigate such occurrences. The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) works on behalf of individuals who have been victims of such profiling.

or acceptable from people of color. While white privilege is widely used in sociological studies, it is important to note that some consider it reverse discrimination. Understanding white privilege allows for the understanding of problems surrounding inequality and injustice as well as more prolific issues in race, ethnicity, and power.

Inequality

Race and power are controlled by the subconstruct of inequality. Inequality characterized in this discussion refers to the societal, economic, and educational disadvantage tied to a racial group or classification of race. Income distribution along with poverty comparison by race as a construct indicates disproportionate results from race to race. A number of historical factors contribute to racial inequality in the United States. The disparity among races in America and the unequal distribution of wealth attainment can be tied to slavery, immigration, and Jim Crow. Each of these historical accounts eliminated equality in wage earnings and fair hiring practices. These detriments put a bridge between wealth and poverty that has been very difficult to close.

Higher-paying jobs are given to a better-educated, highly skilled workforce, while labor demands are less attractive for less-educated workers. Initiatives implemented to increase the education level in the workforce could decrease the labor gap in the future if careful consideration is also given to culturally proficient education and job training.

The U.S. Census Bureau data shows black or African American and Hispanic families are 22.7 percent below the poverty level, while whites and Asians are 9.3 and 9.4 percent below the poverty level, respectively, and all total races are 11.1 percent below. The double in percentage increase of black and Hispanic families is daunting, especially when considering the population increase in both races.

Educational inequality is also a major challenge in U.S. communities. Surveying states and cities within states that have financial inequality and limited educational access within blocks or miles of privileged areas create a faulty system for those in poverty to overcome. Other additional barriers are placed on students within these school settings because they often have not been provided the same resources as students in upper-middle class or suburban schools. Programs such as Title I are put in place in schools with extreme poverty to equalize the access in the classroom. Far too often, though, the resources provided by the district and standard curriculum are so below par that Title I funding goes to supply critical educational resources or to implement allowable support staff to mitigate the effects of oversized classes.

There are ways in which to bridge the gap among schools regardless of economic disadvantage by providing integration in broad communities, increasing funding for schools, and eliminating the educational divide. This notion of inclusiveness to reach equality will not occur until we heal and grow from the aforementioned discussion on race and power in the United States.

Allyson Leggett Watson
Northeastern State University

See Also: Critical Race Theory; Ethnicity, Definitions of; Race, Social Definition of; Racial Microaggression; White Privilege.

Further Readings

American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). "Blog of Rights: Racial Profiling." http://www.aclu.org/blog/tag/racial-profiling (Accessed January 2014).

Cameron, Susan. C., and Susan M. Wycoff. "The Destructive Nature of the Term Race: Growing Beyond a False Paradigm." Journal of Counseling and Development, v.76 (1998).

Delgado, Richard, and Jean Stefancic, eds. Critical Race Theory: The Cutting Edge, 2nd ed. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 2000.

Hand, Victoria, William R. Penuel, and Kris D. Gutiérrez. "(Re)Framing Educational Possibility: Attending to Power and Equity in Shaping Access to and Within Learning Opportunities." Human Development, v.55/5–6 (January 2013).

Hays, Danica G., Catherine Y. Chang, and Pamela Havice. "White Racial Identity Statuses as Predictors of White Privilege Awareness." Journal of Humanistic Counseling, Education and Development, v.47/2 (2008).

O'Connell, Heather A. "The Impact of Slavery on Racial Inequality in Poverty in the Contemporary U.S. South." Social Forces, v.90/3 (March 2012).

Shibutani, Tamotsu. "Reference Groups as Perspectives." American Journal of Sociology, v.60 (1955).

Smith, Elise. J. "Ethnic Identity Development: Toward the Development of a Theory Within the Context of Majority/Minority Status." Journal of Counseling and Development, v.70/1 (1991).

U.S. Census Bureau. "Statistical Abstract of the United States: Income, Expenditures, Poverty, and Wealth. http://www.census.gov/compendia/statab/2012/tables/12s0717.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Census Bureau. "The White Population. 2010 Census Briefs." http://www.census.gov/prod/cen2010/briefs/c2010br-05.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Equal Opportunity Commission. "Executive Order 10925: Establishing the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity." http://www.eeoc.gov/eeoc/history/35th/thelaw/eo-10925.html (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Office of the Historian. "Milestones: 1921–1936: The Immigration Act of 1924 (The Johnson-Reed Act)." www.history.state.gove/milestones/1921-1936/ImmigrationAct (Accessed January 2014).

Zuckerman, Marvin. "Some Dubious Premises in Research and Theory on Racial Differences." American Psychologist, v.45/12 (1990).

Pregnancy and Parenting Services

Many services are provided to parents to assist them in their parental roles. Susanna Rautio contends that parenting can be a challenging task, especially for first time parents; they often need support and information. Services are offered during pregnancy and extend into the teenage years of the child to provide support and information to parents. These services are geared toward fostering healthy parental relationships through educational and support services. Community agencies, governmental agencies, and religious entities work to support parents by providing everything from education, counseling, and support to nutrition, medical, and career services.

Pregnancy Services

Pregnancy services are geared toward preparation of the birth of the infant. Community agencies including hospitals offer medical services including prenatal care. Many community agencies provide pregnancy testing, ultrasounds, counseling, and abortion services. These agencies are often referred to as pregnancy centers or pregnancy clinics. They are often nonprofit agencies that usually provide immediate temporary services and will provide clients with medical referrals for prenatal care. Community agencies also offer educational services. Clients are educated on the symptoms of pregnancy, alternatives to pregnancy, and the use of contraceptives. Pregnancy centers can be found in all of the United States but are often located in inner cities to service low-income populations. There are controversies over abortions being conducted at these centers. Antiabortion critics often protest near these centers.

Religious entities such as local churches provide various services to those who are pregnant. Services include shelter, food, and clothing. Many churches have food and clothing pantries. Some have clothing pantries that are geared toward providing clothing for babies. These services are typically run by volunteers. Participants must show some proof of pregnancy.

Governmental agencies such as local health departments offer a number of services for pregnant clients. These services include pregnancy testing, communicable disease testing and education, prenatal care, infant development education, and nutritional programs such as Women, Infants, and Children (WIC), services that are often free to those who qualify. Qualifying may include income level for services such as WIC. However, most pregnancy services are free to the public such as testing and prenatal vitamins.

Crisis centers are agencies that provide emergency services to pregnant teens. Crisis centers offer teen parents shelter and educational services. The services provided include temporary housing for those who have been kicked out of their homes due to pregnancy, interventions for abortions, motherhood education, and skills trainings. These agencies focus on providing teens with education and skills needed to live on their own. They assist teens in finding housing and employment. These agencies often do not endorse abortion procedures.

Hospitals offer a variety of services during pregnancy. Doctors care for patients and provide prenatal care. Specialty doctors provide care for at-risk pregnancies. These are generally patients with higher risk of loss of the infant during the pregnancy. Hospitals also offer educational courses on breast-feeding, childbirth, and delivery options. Many hospitals offer midwives for those who want home births as well as other alternative birthing locations for those who do not want to be in traditional hospital settings. Child safety seat distribution and education are offered by most hospitals. This program educates parents on proper usage of child car seats. It is a requirement that an infant have a child car seat before leaving the hospital and must leave in one. Hospitals will distribute free car seats and diaper bags to those who meet the requirements.

Parenting Services

Many programs have been designed to assist parents in their parenting skills. Much research has been dedicated to understanding parenting styles and dimensions of parenting. Research has provided the foundation of how society can support parents and encourage parenting that is healthy to the development of children. Amy Romagnoli and Glenda Wall contend that there is an expansion in parenting expectations that includes protecting children from various risks. Parents are considered a risk factor that can negatively impact the development of children. It is further found that parents are expected to meet the needs of their children, which includes physical, emotional, psychological, and cognitive needs. Services have been designed to support parenting in meeting these needs.

Parenting support groups were developed out of the need for parents to receive peer support. Parenting support groups focus on parent-to-parent communication on effective parenting strategies and dealing with some of the challenges in parenting. Support groups have increasingly been developed by parents for parents in addressing parenting of developmentally delayed children, autistic children, and loss. Support groups provide an outlet for parents and support from those who are dealing with similar issues. These groups can be directed by a parent or an industry professional but are often run by members within the group. Relationships are developed within support groups that extend outside of the group and lead to play dates. Support groups also assist in sharing community resources with participants.

A policeman stands guard near the front door when pro-life and pro-choice supporters turned out to this Planned Parenthood location in Saint Paul, Minnesota, to oppose and support the organization. Many community agencies provide pregnancy testing, ultrasounds, counseling, and abortion services. They also offer educational services; clients are educated on the symptoms of pregnancy, alternatives to pregnancy, and the use of contraceptives. Anti-abortion critics often protest near these centers.

Community agencies have focused on supporting parents during many life transitions. Programs provide educational courses, community resource referrals, and on-site support services. Educational courses focus on discipline, dealing with difficult behaviors, parental roles in child development, as well as various other resource parents can target for additional support. Programs within the community include play groups, prenatal and infant toddler education, early childhood support, school-age parenting education, divorce and mediation, grandparent parenting support, teen parent support, and parenting of developmentally delayed children. These programs offer support in a variety of ways to parents. Some offer case management assistance to assist parents in removing barriers and obtaining resources for which they qualify. Parents are often unaware of resources within their communities. Many community programs offer in-house services in which professionals come in and educate as well as provide a number of services. Dental care, medical shots, testing, tutoring, and physicals can all be done within community agencies. Supports to special populations are also provided through community agencies. There are supports for ex-offenders and substance abusers and specific supports for fathers that encourage involvement.

Government agencies also provide supportive services to parents. Parents can receive child-care assistance, temporary financial assistance, food assistance, and medical care if they qualify. Government agencies also offer parents assistance in obtaining employment and nutritional programs that provide food to needy families. These resources are often temporary and come with many restraints. Parents often look to community agencies for guidance as they go through government processes.

Pregnancy and parenting services often overlap due to the ultimate focus being on the healthy development of children. Support programs and services are offered to parents during pregnancy and extend until the child reaches the age of 18 in many cases. It is believed that supporting parents creates stronger parental bonds and provides opportunities for positive physical and psychological growth in children.

Narketta Sparkman
Old Dominion University

See Also: Family Services; Parenting Skills Training; Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in; Prenatal Care.

Further Readings

Fowler, Catherine, et al. “Parent Satisfaction With Early Parenting Residential Services: A Telephone Interview Study.” Contemporary Nurse, v.43/1 (2012).

Rautio, Susanna. “Parents’ Experiences of Early Support.” Scandinavian Journal of Caring Sciences (2012).

Romagnoli, Amy, and Glenda Wall. “‘I Know I’m a Good Mom’: Young, Low-Income Mothers’ Experiences With Risk Perception, Intensive Parenting Ideology and Parenting Education Programs.” Health, Risk and Society, v.14/3 (2012).

Rowe, Jennifer. “Supporting Maternal Transition: Continuity, Coaching and Control.” Journal of Perinatal Education, v. 22/3 (2013).

Prejudice, Theories of

In daily life, every man and woman has to deal with prejudice, whether prejudice is used by them unconsciously or they are hurt by it. These incorrect or unjustified attitudes against individuals of another social, racial, or gender background, which build a phenomenon of interhuman relations and human diversity, can be explained through different theoretical approaches. The authoritarian personality theory, the exploitation theory, the normative theory, the scapegoating theory, and the social identity theory are able to explain different forms of prejudice that are visible in human societies and definitely as a consequence of human diversities in the numerous societies around the globe.

Regarding the roots of these prejudices, different factors can determine their establishment, in individual cases or as a part of the whole society, which are responsible for the negative overemphasis of human diversities. All the mentioned theories determine different reasons for the development and existence of prejudice in our society, and the people who are confronted with prejudices will consequently always need a specially determined kind of human services too.

Authoritarian Personality Theory

Following Theodor W. Adorno (1903–69), the well-known German philosopher and sociologist, authoritarian personalities especially tend to use prejudices because these people tend to be hostile toward another person of inferior rank. In the same way, they are more servile in the presence of a superior authority. As a consequence, the authoritarian personality theory determines a particular personality as the root for prejudice, which tends to regard the world following dichotomous terms like right or wrong, good or bad, and so on. Influenced by a harsh childhood, these people can adopt prejudicial attitudes about people or things, following their own suitable lines of argumentation.

Exploitation Theory

The exploitation theory determines economic conflicts as a source of prejudice. Especially in competitive situations that force people to compete against each other to get a good job or new business clients, prejudices are used to justify their own actions, which could be directed against individuals of another racial or ethnic background, who are the competitors. A well-known and researched phenomenon that was and still is an expression of this theory is antisemitism. Because of their religious beliefs and inequality during the Middle Ages, European Jews began to specialize in trade and banking. As a consequence, many of them became rich and successful and, over the course of history, became competitors with non-Jews in modern Europe, where antisemitism became a visible expression of envy.

Normative Theory

All people live their lives following norms. These could be defined by parents, friends, social groups, or the media. Because of this, the normative theory tries to explain the development of prejudices from the experiences people have during socialization. The father hated these people, so the son hates them too could be a suitable expression for this theory. Parents, relatives, friends, colleagues, and the media are able to influence our own attitudes day by day, and with regard to the normative surroundings, people begin to adopt these norms. Following this course of events, the prejudices finally become part of an individual's thoughts. This process doesn't have to be a fast one. Ethnic communities who have bad experiences with another ethnic group will convey these experiences to the next generation, and by giving this core experience of socialization, they will lay the basis for the prejudice that follows.

Scapegoating Theory

The scapegoating theory is derived from Sigmund Freud's (1856–1939) psychological works, in which he was able to determine that some people were trying to displace their own aggression onto other people when they were not able to place their aggression on the original cause of their frustration. A subordinate who is angry about his or her superior may tend to direct those aggressions against his or her own subordinate instead of confronting the superior with his or her anger. By doing this, the personal misfortunes are displaced onto other people, who belong to a relatively weak group. As a result, this negativity will be projected on this target group. During the Middle Ages, a collective act of violence against the Jewish minorities in larger cities or small villages or witch hunts, which experienced a climax in these early modern times, could be the consequence of droughts or the deaths of animals in a town because these groups or persons were used as scapegoats for causing misfortune. The collective violence followed stereotypes and prejudices, which labeled these minorities as the cause for these evil occurrences.

Social Identity Theory

Henry Tajfel (1919–82), a British social psychologist, developed another theory for the causes of prejudice: the social identity theory. By separating people into in-groups and out-groups, the given individual is trying to generate a positive self-image. As a consequence, the need for a positive social identity is the reason for the formation of a prejudice, which helps to underline the positive image of the individual's group. Only this group can be right or positive, while any nonmember is considered worse than members, who—following the individual definition—must be friends.

Tajfel provided a proof for his theory by analyzing an experiment with young boys from Bristol. The boys were separated into two groups and were allowed to award points to either their own group or the other group. In almost all cases, the in-group members were awarded first because, due to the established social identity, the known members were favored. Despite the fact that giving points to the other group would have increased the total reward for all participants, the other group members remained discriminated against, which was a sole result of the existing categorization or classification of an in-group and an out-group. As part of the in-group, people have two aims. They first want to create a positive self-image and, second, a positive group image. By awarding points to the group, they achieved the second aim, and with the appraisal of their group members, they were able to achieve the first aim as well.

Theories Combined

Not every prejudice can be explained by using just one of these theories. Many prejudices are the consequence of different reasoning, and two or more theories could be taken into consideration to explain the causes. Despite this, prejudices are a fundamental part of modern societies, used by everyone, mainly subconsciously. The things we buy, the things we eat, the things we do—all are influenced by existing prejudices, which could be transferred through generations and be a consequence of our own social situation or negative feelings. However, not every prejudice is as bad as another, especially concerning social, racial, ethnic, and gender-related prejudice. It is the task of laws and states to protect the people who become victims of prejudices in many aspects of daily life.

Frank Jacob
Heinrich Heine University Dusseldorf

See Also: Administration for Native Americans; Arab Americans; Asian Americans; Assimilation; Bullying; Diaspora; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Diversity in the Workplace; Early Childhood Development; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Hate Groups; Power, Race/Ethnicity and; Racism, Self-Assessment of.

Further Readings

Stangor, Charles, ed. Stereotypes and Prejudice. Essential Readings. Philadelphia: Psychology Press, 2000.

Todd, Nelson, ed. Handbook of Prejudice, Stereotyping, and Discrimination. New York: Psychology Press, Taylor and Francis, 2009.

Todd, Nelson. The Psychology of Prejudice. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson, 2006.

Whitey, Bernard E., et al. The Psychology of Prejudice and Discrimination. Belmont, CA: Thomson Wadsworth, 2006.

Prenatal Care

Prenatal, or antenatal, care encompasses both preventative and treatment-based medical care that a woman receives during her pregnancy. The goal of prenatal care is to educate expecting mothers about proper health care during pregnancy in addition to implementing treatment and preventative care to help ensure that the baby receives proper nutrients and medical attention. Prenatal care is the primary method through which potential problems or risks are identified and treated during pregnancy. Two common and potentially fatal threats are preterm labor, defined as birth prior to 37 weeks, and low birth weight. Research suggests that consistent prenatal care can aid in diagnosing and treating many signs of preterm birth and low birth weight and ultimately improve quality of life for mothers and babies. These positive outcomes have spurred changes in public policy geared at increasing access to prenatal care for all pregnant women regardless of socioeconomic status, age, location, and race and ethnicity.

Prenatal Care Providers and Services

Prenatal care can be administered and overseen by a variety of health care professionals such as family physicians, midwives, or obstetricians. These professionals see a pregnant woman throughout her gestation period at regular intervals. Typically, appointments are scheduled once per month during week four to week 28, twice monthly between weeks 28 and 36, and weekly from week 36 until the birth of the baby. Expecting mothers deemed high risk, such as those over age 35, may have more frequent visits.

Prenatal doctors' visits assess risks to the health of the expecting mother and baby, track the growth and development of the baby, and educate the expecting mother on labor expectations, nutrition, and overall physical and mental wellness. Initial visits generally include a comprehensive physical exam, a review of the patient's and family's health histories, blood and urine tests, measurements of height, weight, and vitals, and determination of the due date. Visits occurring later in the pregnancy focus on growth of the baby and checking the baby's heart rate. Though the content of each appointment depends on the individual needs of the woman, each visit is imperative for thorough prenatal care.

History and Effectiveness of Prenatal Care

Although midwives throughout the world have practiced rudimentary forms of prenatal care for hundreds of years, modern conceptions of prenatal care were suggested in the early 1900s by Dr. John William Ballantyne as a means to prevent fetal abnormalities and to reduce maternal mortality rates. Shortly thereafter, the notion that prenatal care could reduce infant mortality gained support. However, the effectiveness of prenatal care was questioned in the 1960s, and connections were drawn between positive outcomes of prenatal care and initiation of prenatal care during the first trimester.

In order to assess the utilization of prenatal care, the Kessner Institute Adequacy of Prenatal Care Index was published by the Institute of Medicine in 1973. According to the Kessner Index, prenatal care adequacy is determined based on the month during pregnancy when care began and the number of prenatal visits, taking into consideration the length of the gestation period. It is rated as adequate, intermediate, or inadequate. Though this index fails to consider how routinely visits occur after care began, it became the standard measurement in public health research and planning.

The shortcomings of the Kessner Index prompted the creation of the Adequacy of Prenatal Care Utilization (APNCU) or Kotelchuck Index. The APNCU measures both the adequacy of initiation of care and of routineness of visits once prenatal care begins on two distinctive scales that then provide an overall rating. Both the Kessner Index and the APNCU examine the utilization of prenatal care rather than the quality of care. Although the Kessner Index is still used, the APNCU is generally accepted as the standard measurement for utilization of prenatal care in public health research.

The effectiveness of prenatal care has been widely studied and debated. Prenatal care is effective in diagnosing and treating preeclampsia and eclampsia, managing pregestational diabetes and human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), and reducing birth defects and maternal morbidity and mortality. Many challenges face researchers attempting to measure the efficacy of prenatal care—namely, as prenatal care has become the standard practice, research is not able to sufficiently evaluate women who receive no or little prenatal care. Although some research suggests that prenatal care may not be as efficacious as presumed, it is widely utilized and continues to be highly recommended by health care professionals.

Access to Prenatal Care

Women are strongly advised to obtain early prenatal care when pregnant and even while attempting to conceive. In 2006, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) reported that about 84 percent of U.S. women reported receiving prenatal care in their first trimesters. Though the number of women seeking first trimester prenatal care is steadily increasing in the United States, differences exist within this population.

The Child Health USA study published by the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) reported prenatal care utilization for 27 states and territories in the United States in 2008. Non-Hispanic white (76.6 percent) and non-Hispanic Asian and Pacific Islander (77.9 percent) women reported the highest rates of first-trimester prenatal care utilization. The lowest rates of early prenatal care were reported by non-Hispanic American Indian and Alaska Native (53.3 percent) and non-Hispanic Native Hawai‘ian and other Pacific Islander (54.8 percent) women.

Additionally, results demonstrate that young mothers are much less likely to utilize early prenatal care than older women. Only 32.9 percent of teenaged mothers under 15 years old reported use of first trimester prenatal care, while 54.3 percent of women aged 15 to 19 received early care. These results suggest the need for services that increase knowledge of and access to early prenatal care for diverse groups of women, including teenage mothers and women of all racial and ethnic backgrounds.

Prenatal care can be administered and overseen by a variety of health care professionals such as family physicians, midwives, or obstetricians. These professionals see a pregnant woman throughout her gestation period at regular intervals. Here, a midwife measures the height of the top of the mother's uterus at about 26 weeks to determine the probable gestational age of the fetus.

To increase access to prenatal care, all states in the United States have programs through which women can obtain financial assistance to help pay for prenatal care. Despite these efforts, many barriers exist that limit access such as lack of transportation to medical facilities, lack of financial resources or health insurance, difficulties scheduling appointments early in pregnancy, and language barriers. Additionally, women with unplanned pregnancies or those who believe that prenatal care is unnecessary are less likely to seek medical care. Minority women and those of low socioeconomic status are less likely to obtain prenatal care, as these groups often have additional barriers to overcome. Prenatal care providers will need to improve outreach and services to better meet the needs of this diverse population of women.

Though not all women have access to prenatal care in the United States, it continues to be one of the most widely utilized health services. Research on ways to improve the utilization and content of prenatal care continues to expand with the goal of improving the quality of life for women and infants.

Lindsay Labrecque
Maribel Plasencia
Butler Hospital and Brown University
Gregory L. Stuart
University of Tennessee, Knoxville

See Also: Family Pregnancy Planning; Infant/Toddler Development; Maternal/Infant Health Services; Women Minorities.

Further Readings

Alexander, Greg R., and Milton Kotelchuck. "Assessing the Role and Effectiveness of Prenatal Care: History, Challenges, and Directions for Future Research." Public Health Reports, v.116 (2001).

Jordan, Robin C., Janet Engstrom, Julie Marfell, and Cindy L. Farley. Prenatal and Postnatal Care: A Woman-Centered Approach. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley-Blackwell, 2014.

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office on Women's Health. "Prenatal Care Fact Sheet." http://womenshealth.gov/publications/our-publications/fact-sheet/prenatal-care.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

Primacy of Place

Primacy of Place is a trademarked program established as part of the Building Better Communities initiative at Ball State University (BSU) in Muncie, Indiana. The program was established according to the premise that communities can make a difference by choosing to dedicate significant resources to improving the quality of community life for residents, businesses, and visitors in areas such as wellness, cultural growth, community and economic renewal, happiness, and prosperity. The goals of the program are carried out by BSU faculty, staff, and students in partnership with businesses and private organizations across the state. Determining that human beings and the talents they possess are the greatest resources available to any state, Primacy of Place focuses on attracting new talents to communities while continuing to maximize the talents of current residents and businesses. Since it was established in the late 1980s, the Primacy of Place program has hosted an annual conference, bringing together individuals from various fields who are dedicated to improving community life. In 2013, communities across Indiana began competing for Primacy of Place awards. The Primacy of Place program also maintains the Primacy of Place practices database to provide resources to Indiana's communities.

Students interested in becoming actively involved in the Primacy of Place program can apply to enroll in Primacy of Place classes. Exceptional Me allows BSU students to study both gifted and special education students while designing a phone application that maximizes potential for specific individuals. Seniors and graduate students can enroll in the Global Reporting Initiative Sustainability Report for the Indianapolis Airport, in which teams gather data and learn about report writing and design as they study the aspects of sustainability. Igniting Indiana's Film Industry brings teams of students together with Film Indiana and the Indiana Media Production Alliance to shoot, direct, and produce their own short films. Battle of Perryville Phone App gives students the opportunity to create a phone application featuring a famous Indiana Civil War battle site. Students enrolled in the Centennial Park Tour create 12 driving and walking tours in partnership with the Indiana Department of Natural Resources.

Each year, at the Primacy of Place Conference, interested parties meet in knowledge groups to learn more about improving community life. Knowledge groups examine subjects such as arts integration in community economic development, community design, community collaboration for educational excellence, community well-being, municipal governance, and community readiness for change.

2013 Awards

In 2013, Primacy of Place awards were awarded for the first time. Out of 22 communities in 18 Indiana counties, awards went to the City of Columbus (population 44,061), the City of Valparaiso (population 31,730), and the Town of Walkerton (population 2,144). While there were similarities in the efforts of the three communities, each area tailored its program to meet the needs of the individual community.

Recognition for Columbus was the result of the creation of the Columbus Art District, which expanded both business opportunities and diversity within the community and led developers to erect 240 new apartments. The art district was the result of numerous town hall meetings, surveys, and workshops that allowed residents to work together to improve community life through promoting economic prosperity. By integrating the city's modern architecture with its historic district, Columbus officials created a downtown environment that allows residents and visitors to enjoy what the city has to offer as they walk through downtown. The total financial impact of the establishment of the art district was estimated at $214.5 million.

Valparaiso also focused on the arts, but its Primacy of Place efforts were devoted to integrating the arts with programs designed to revitalize

Valparaiso. Under the leadership of the Valparaiso Redevelopment Commission and the Parks and Recreation Department, the city revitalized a five-block downtown area and two key corridors into the city. Valparaiso also promoted wellness through its Fit City Program, which created interactive recreation areas while establishing hundreds of acres of protected parklands. Outdoor art sculptures were strategically placed along the Art Walk at Cumberland.

Efforts to attract residents and visitors to the downtown area continue through the monthly Eat Up, Wine Down program in which seven local residents provide samples of their food for a charge of $5 per person. Valparaiso officials also commissioned sculptor Lou Cella, who won the commission through a web-based competition, to erect a bronze statue of popcorn icon Orville Redenbacher, who called the town home. Funds for the statue were offset by donations from Indiana Dune Tourism and the local Rotary Club. Town officials created a Twitter account for the statue in 2012 to promote the statue's presence on a park bench in Central Park Plaza. The statue's 200 followers are mostly local residents. The Orville Redenbacher statue was named Best in Show in 2012 at the Social Media Summit.

The inclusion of Walkerton in the Primacy of Place awards was in recognition of the town's renovation efforts, which resulted in the rebuilding of 80 homes that were transformed into residences that are both affordable and of good quality. In 2009, work began on transforming the blighted neighborhood of West York, which had been thrown together in the 1940s to house veterans returning from World War II. Since the houses had no insulation, utility bills averaged more than $500 each month, a charge that was beyond the means of the poor residents who lived there. The streets were so narrow that it was almost impossible for emergency vehicles to navigate them.

Using federal grant money from the Neighborhood Stabilization Program and partnering with the Indiana Housing and Community Development Authority, Walkerton officials began revitalization efforts in 2009. Financing for creating the area that became Dogwood Estates was provided by the Neighborhood Development Association, Great Lakes Bank, Granite Ridge Builders, West York LLC, and First Source Bank. The fact that the transformation slashed utility bills by one-half has helped to make it possible for residents to become homeowners because rental payments give them ownership credits. The Primacy of Place program stands as a role model for communities throughout the United States.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Community Action Agencies; Community Development Block Grants; Community Development Corporations; Community Organizing.

Further Readings

Columbus, Indiana. "Primacy of Place." http://www.columbus.in.gov/news/watch-the-primacy-of-place-video (Accessed December 2013).

Harris, Dianne, ed. Governing by Design: Architecture, Economy, and Politics in the Twentieth Century. Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 2012.

Lynch, Robert. "Arts Mean Economic Revitalization." Public Management, v.95/12 (March 2013).

Primacy of Place. https://cms.bsu.edu/about/administrativeoffices/bbc/primacyofplace (Accessed November 2013).

Valparaiso, Indiana. http://www.ci.valparaiso.in.us (Accessed December 2013).

Walkerton, Indiana. http://www.walkerton.org (Accessed December 2013).

Wieland, Phil. "Valpo Quality of Life Earns Ball State Award." The Times (August 9, 2013).

Prisoner Reentry Programs

Reentry, according to Ram Cnaan and Jill Sinha, is defined as the process of leaving prison and returning to family, the labor force, the community, and the greater society. The process of reentry represents crucial points in the corrections system from several different perspectives. How successfully an individual fares post-release is, in part, a reflection of the effectiveness of the larger criminal justice system and may have significant consequences for the community to which a prisoner returns.

For the individual prisoner, being released may present new and sometimes daunting challenges such as finding adequate housing and employment and reconnecting with loved ones. For certain populations, these challenges are arguably more salient, making the process of assimilating back into society even more difficult. Requirements for prisoners released after serving sentences for sexual offenses, for example, including restrictions on where they can live, present these prisoners with further practical limitations. Although there may not exist the same explicit challenges to reentry as is seen with sexual offenders, prisoners released from long-term solitary confinement may also experience a great deal of difficulty adjusting back into the general population.

In addition, the diversity of the demographic profile of the released inmates deserves careful consideration. The higher incarceration rate of African American males, states E. A. Carson and D. Golinelli, inevitably yields higher numbers of African American men returning to their communities. Traditionally, men have been incarcerated at rates far greater than women. As a result, an integral part of the justice system is designed for men's needs. However, the number of women in prison has been rising faster than the number of males, report William Sabol, Todd Minton, and Paige Harrison. Approximately two out of every three people released are rearrested in three years, estimate P. A. Langan and D. J. Levin; 58 percent of women released from state prison are rearrested within three years, and 40 percent are reconvicted. The diverse nature of released people requires human services to be compatible with their needs. If the common goal is to prevent future arrest after release, transitional and reentry services to ease the burden on diverse reentering populations shall be delivered through culturally competent social service providers. Considering these conditions, it is not difficult to imagine that this segment of the prison population also experiences unique barriers to the reentry process.

Most people know that there will come a time where prisoners are released from the correctional system and will reenter back to their respective communities. What they do not know is the difficulties that the now ex-prisoners are faced with once they are out of the system. Many come out of prison and are immediately faced with obstacles that may prevent them from successfully reintegrating back to society. Chuck Colson, an ex-prisoner and former Nixon administration member, once said, "The road home is possibly the most difficult journey an ex-prisoner will ever make." When most inmates leave prison, they are already confronted with an assortment of problems such as looking for housing, good employment, and as Eugene Williams mentioned, the success or failure regarding substance abuse. Offenders are generally unprepared for reentry; they are not provided with adequate support to effectively transition back into their communities upon release.

As mentioned earlier, individuals who are released are, according to Bridgette Bassford, "forced to secure housing, obtain employment, establish a legal identity, receive treatment for substance abuse or mental health, reestablish relationships, find transportation," and "procure basic necessities such as food and clothing." These tasks seem virtually impossible and make it hard for successful reentry.

When it comes to housing and finding work, released offenders are faced with discrimination. Their criminal backgrounds, absence of legal identification (the majority of prisoners are released without proper identifications from the state), and their lack of job training allows for landowners and employers to dismiss or reject them. In addition to all this, most ex-prisoners have limited human capital; a good number of them are illiterate or have an 11th-grade education, and according to Bassford, 11 percent of the population are generally expected to enter homeless shelters within two years of their release. These issues serve to highlight the importance of developing effective release and reentry policies designed specifically to address the unique challenges that face the prison population.

Principles

Researchers formulated the principles of risk, need, and responsivity as those that have to guide rehabilitation programs in order to be effective. These principles mean that the programs that target higher-risk populations tend to be more effective because high-risk populations will have a greater need of the treatment, and there is more room for improvement. The programs must target criminogenic needs, and they have to be able to generate some improvement in those needs. According to these principles, in-prison rehabilitation programs with risk-based approaches have shown to be effective in reducing recidivism. In 2003, researchers conducted a meta-analysis of prisoner reentry. They found that vocational training, work release programs, halfway houses, and prerelease programs did reduce the risk of recidivism upon release. Other authors have also pointed out that prison-based therapeutic communities or cognitive-behavioral treatment also work in reducing recidivism. On the other hand, programs that increase surveillance or monitoring upon release are not effective. One of the reasons is that increased monitoring tends to increase the number of technical violations, which result in increased recidivism. Some of the programs that were found to be promising were educational programs (which do increase the skills of the individuals but don't seem to reduce their recidivism) and prison-based treatment for sex offenders.

One of the scholars who has studied more in depth the issue of reentry is Joan Petersilia, who analyzed the requirements for successful reentry in her work When Prisoners Come Home. She suggested four general initiatives to reduce the recidivism rates of ex-offenders. The first one is to restore discretionary parole because, as we have already seen, those released through discretionary parole tend to recidivate less than those who are released through mandatory parole. The second initiative is to start working in reentry programs, while the inmate is still in prison, and follow up upon release. These types of programs have shown some success in reducing recidivism when targeting criminogenic needs (e.g., drug abuse treatment). The third initiative is to provide post-release services, like housing, job, or substance abuse treatment referrals, at least during the first six months after being released into the community. Research shows that most of the people who recidivate tend to do so within the first months after leaving prison, so providing support during those months is critical to help the individual succeed in the process of reentry. Finally, Petersilia recommends the removal of the obstacles to reentry.

New Developments

Within the last decades, a whole array of measures has been implemented, which make it more and more difficult for ex-offenders to reintegrate successfully into the community. People who are released from prison face a large number of obstacles that, by making the process of reentry especially difficult, have as a result the increase in the likelihood of recidivism. For example, some ex-offenders are not allowed to live in public housing (e.g., drug offenders), or they are not allowed to live within a certain distance of places frequented by children. This last measure is applied fundamentally to sex and drug offenders.

Another restriction is the types of jobs that they can get. Most ex-offenders are barred from working as beauticians or hairdressers, and some offenses lead to more-restrictive obstacles in this area (like in the case of sex offenders). States are required to revoke the driver's licenses of drug offenders, without which it is much more difficult to look for or to maintain a job. The Welfare Reform Act of 1996 (PRWORA) established that people convicted for drug-related offenses (possession, use, sale, or distribution) are barred from receiving welfare benefits like food stamps or Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF). Furthermore, ex-felons lose their voting rights. Many states make criminal records publicly available, which makes it more difficult getting a job or reintegrating successfully in the society. All those obstacles make it extremely difficult for somebody who has been imprisoned to turn to a prosaic type of life and establish meaningful social bonds that help them to desist from crime.

Some correction systems, however, have implemented prerelease programs in an effort to help prisoners better transition from isolation into society, writes T. Kupers. For example, in Oregon, prior to being released, prisoners held in solitary confinement rejoin the general prison population to work and attend classes, L. Sullivan reports. Correctional facilities in Oregon also provide anger management therapy for solitary confinement inmates before they are released. The importance of such prerelease programs has been highlighted by recent research. For example, D. Lovell and C. Johnson found that individuals who participated in a prerelease program after leaving solitary confinement were less likely to commit a felony once released than those who did not.

Postprison supervision and parole policies also vary by state. Although information regarding postprison supervision for this specific segment of the prison population is scarce, it may be possible to extrapolate to a certain degree from the facts available regarding more standard procedures. For example, with a shift toward determinate sentencing, there has been a decline in the use of parole boards. These parole boards have traditionally been responsible not only for determining release dates but also for playing a major role in the prisoner's reentry process, J. Travis describes.

One of the most frequent criticisms that reentry programs have to face is the enormous cost that the provision of all those services would generate. Although this is true in some cases, there are some other courses of action that could also improve the process of reentry and therefore reduce the risk of recidivism while not generating additional costs such as the removal of some of the obstacles cited previously. For instance, returning a driver's license to those individuals who have lost it as a result of a drug conviction would help them to find and maintain jobs. The cost of this measure would be minimal, and the taxes paid by those individuals would generate benefits for the state.

Despite the advantages that these programs have, it is important to take into account that, after so many years of get-tough discourse in which offenders have been demonized, it is foreseeable that the public would oppose this kind of change as they could be interpreted as a turn toward a more lenient criminal justice system.

Conclusion

The first step in making any type of policy change regarding release and reentry procedures requires a shift in how we conceptualize these steps. In fact, in his article "But They All Come Back: Rethinking Prison Reentry," Travis suggests that, instead of thinking of reentry as an isolated step in the process of incarceration, we should begin to regard it as an overarching theme. In order to most effectively facilitate a prisoner's transition into society, Travis proposes that reentry be the continual focus of the criminal justice system from the beginning at sentencing throughout incarceration and again at the time of one's release. This more-comprehensive, long-term perspective can then help to inform important decisions that will later affect the reentry transition such as whether or not an individual requires substance abuse counseling during incarceration. Though it may appear more complicated, this type of individualized approach to incarceration appears to hold the most promise for facilitating successful reentry.

Fortunately, a number of programs have been implemented over the years to help manage the difficult readjustment period that ex-prisoners must go through in order to transition back to society. These programs provide guidance and help to those who are willing to change and maintain a positive lifestyle. The problem about evidence of efficacy of offender reentry programs is that the evidence is still weak; more research is needed.

Emirhan Darcan
Murat Ozkan
Rutgers University

See Also: Families of Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners; Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners; Probation and Parole Officers.

Further Readings

Bassford, Bridgette. "The Role of Faith-Based/Government Partnerships in Prisoner Reentry." SPNA Review, v.4/1 (2008).

Carson, E. A. and D. Golinelli. Prisoners in 2012—Advance Counts. Washington, DC: Bureau of Justice Statistics, 2013.

Cnaan, Ram A. and Jill W. Sinha. "Back Into the Fold: Helping Ex-Prisoners Reconnect Through Faith." In Research and Action. http://www.aecf.org/upload/publicationfiles/ff3622h352.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

Gawande, A. "Hellhole." The New Yorker. http://www.newyorker.com/reporting/2009/03/30/090330fa_fact_gawande (Accessed January 2013).

Johnson, Byron. "Not by Government Nor Faith Alone: Rethinking Prisoner Reentry." Innovations in Effective Compassion. http://aspe.hhs.gov/fbci/comp08/Johnson.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

Kupers, T. "Coping With the Long-Term Effects of Isolated Confinement. Criminal Justice and Behavior, v.35/8 (2008).

Langan, P. A. and D. J. Levin. Recidivism of Prisoners Released in 1994, U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics. Washington DC: National Contest Journal, 2002.

Lovell, D., and C. Johnson. Felony and Violent Recidivism Among Supermax Prison Inmates in Washington State: A Pilot Study. Seattle: University of Washington, 2004.

Sullivan, L. In U.S. Prisons, Thousands Spend Years in Isolation. http://www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=5582144 (Accessed January 2014).

Travis, J. But They All Come Back: Facing the Challenges of Prisoner Reentry. Washington, DC: The Urban Institute Press, 2005.

Williams III, Eugene. "Building the Capacity of Faith-Based Organizations to Support Prisoner Re-Entry." Reflection Series. http://www.rcno.org/_pubs/Faith_Based_Capacity_Building_Reentry_Article.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners

People enter jails and prisons with an overwhelming amount of need. These needs include health, dental, and mental health care; financial assistance; legal assistance; education and job training; addiction treatment; and parenting support. Upon release, they must secure employment and housing; reconnect with family and community; readjust to the outside world; contend with the stigma and psychological scars of incarceration; maintain substance abuse, mental health, and health treatment; and develop crime-free lifestyles to avoid rearrest. Given the large numbers of people entering and leaving jails and prisons today, increasing services to this population has the potential to reduce disparities and prevent crime in society at large.

Incarcerated Populations

With more than 2 million people in jails and prisons, the United States has the highest incarceration rate in the world. Each year, more than half a million are released, of which around 70 percent will be rearrested within a year. Prisoners and ex-prisoners are more likely than the general public to have been unemployed or homeless, to not have finished high school, to have grown up in poverty or experienced trauma, to have had an incarcerated parent, to be diagnosed with mental illness, to commit suicide, to suffer from chronic and infectious disease, and to have untreated dental problems.

A small but growing number of prisoners (7 percent) and parolees (12 percent) in the United States are women with gender-specific service needs. Prisoners in U.S. jails and prisons are disproportionately black (40 percent), Latino or Latina (15 percent), and Native American (3 percent), and services must be culturally sensitive in design and delivery.

Service needs, and the challenges of providing services, differ depending on the type of institution. Jails are county or city facilities that house people awaiting adjudication or who are serving a sentence of less than one year (or in some states two years). Prisons are state facilities where people serve sentences of one year (or two years) or more. The federal system also has prisons and detention facilities.

A majority of arrestees are released from jail within 72 hours, with an average stay of 10 to 20 days. In prisons, the average length of stay is about three years, while nearly 10 percent of prisoners are serving life sentences (30 percent of which have no possibility of parole). The service needs of and the opportunities for someone in jail for a 24-hour period will differ from those of someone in jail for one year, in prison for two years, or in prison for the rest of his or her life.

Education and Health Care

Around 80 percent of incarcerated people have not attended college, and a majority of them do not have a high school diploma. All correctional institutions offer some form of basic education (GED) and many offer vocational training, but due to the elimination of Pell grants for prisoners in 1994, college programs are scarce. GED, college, and vocational certificate programs have all been shown to reduce recidivism.

Incarcerated people have higher rates of infectious disease including human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), tuberculosis, methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA), and hepatitis. Correctional facilities are therefore an ideal place to target interventions aimed at reducing infectious diseases. Incarcerated people also have higher rates of chronic disease, including hypertension, asthma, and arthritis. Due to longer sentence lengths, including life without parole, more prisoners require care for geriatric conditions as well as end-of-life and hospice care. Given funding and security challenges, health care services in jails and prisons are often inadequate.

Mental Health Care and Substance Abuse Treatment

More than half of all prisoners have a mental health problem; rates of mental illness in county jails are slightly higher than in state prisons, which in turn are higher than in federal prisons. Inmates are two to four times more likely than the general public to have serious mental disorders including schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, and depression. As with physical health, there are many challenges to providing quality mental health care in jails and prisons including funding constraints, the stressful and unpleasant environment, high caseloads, and correctional paradigms that do not recognize the importance of mental health care.

One of the biggest service needs in jails and prisons is substance abuse treatment. A staggering 85 percent of U.S. prisoners either meet the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5) diagnosis of substance abuse disorder, were intoxicated at the time of their crime, committed their crime to get money to buy drugs, or were arrested for a drug-related offense. Despite this need, only about 10 percent receive any sort of substance abuse treatment.

Parenting and Family Connections

A little over half of incarcerated men and nearly two-thirds of incarcerated women are parents. Prisoners may need support to improve their parenting skills and maintain connections to spouses, children, and other family members. Depending on the institution, visits with family members may be limited in terms of frequency, length, and whether contact is allowed. Only six states allow conjugal visits, now called extended family visits. Inmates who receive frequent visits from family members are less likely to recidivate upon release.

Spirituality, Support, Autonomy, and Self-Expression

Due to the emphasis in jails and prisons on security, opportunities for privacy, autonomy, and personal expression are limited. Within this artificial social world, inmates must keep a constant eye out for threats to their physical and emotional well-being. In addition to stress, inmates must contend with intense boredom, monotonous routine, and countless rules. To reconnect with their humanity, incarcerated people can benefit from participating in spiritual enrichment programs; support groups; art, music, and creative writing classes; and prisoner-led clubs and organizations.

Kerry Dunn
University of New England

See Also: Families of Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners; Incarceration and Sentencing, Racial Disparities in; Jail Diversion Programs for Children and Adolescents; Prisoner Reentry Programs.

Further Readings

Davis, Lois, and Sharon Pacchiana. "Health Profile of the State Prison Population and Returning Offenders: Public Health Challenges." Journal of Correctional Health, v.10 (2004).

Newman, Anabel, Lewis Warren, and Caroline Beverstock. Prison Literacy: Implications for Program and Assessment. Philadelphia: National Center on Adult Literacy, University of Pennsylvania, 1993.

Peters, Roger, and Harry K. Wexler. Substance Abuse Treatment for Adults in the Criminal Justice System: A Treatment Improvement Protocol. Rockville, MD: Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, 2005.

Travis, Jeremy. But They All Come Back: Facing the Challenges of Prisoner Reentry. Washington, DC: Urban Institute Press, 2003.

Probation and Parole Officers

Probation and parole officers are responsible for nearly three-quarters of adults under court supervision (e.g., those in jail, prison, probation, or parole). Probation and parole officers perform similar duties as they monitor convicted criminals who live in the community and prepare presentence investigation reports (PSIs) for the courts. The community-monitoring duties of probation and parole officers include meeting with the offender in the office and in community settings such as at the offender's home or workplace. Probation and parole officers must make sure that their probationers or parolees are paying restitution, attending support meetings, passing drug tests, not affiliating with other known criminals, staying within certain geographic boundaries, and obeying the law.

U.S. History of Probation and Parole

The history of American probation and parole dates back to the 1840s in Boston, Massachusetts. John Augustus began his career as the first American probation officer, albeit unofficial, when he agreed to supervise an alcoholic who appeared in court. Augustus was successful and, in subsequent years, would come to supervise boys and girls as well. By 1869, the Massachusetts legislature had decided to require that a state agent be present with juveniles if placement into a facility was a possibility. The agent's job was to look for someone to place the child and to protect the child's interest. By the late 1870s, the Massachusetts legislature had created a paid probation officer position. Within the next 50 years, every state, with the exception of Wyoming, had developed a paid probation position.

As of the year 2010, there were nearly 5 million adults in the United States who were on probation or parole. Just over 80 percent (or 4 million) of these people were on probation. Of those on probation, three-quarters were male and one-quarter female. Just over half (55 percent) of all probationers were white, 30 percent black, and 13 percent Hispanic. Just over 850,000 of this group were on parole. For those on parole, 88 percent were male and 12 percent were female. The races of those on parole were 42 percent white, 39 percent black, and 18 percent Hispanic.

Probation and Parole Officer Characteristics and Requirements

According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, there are 88,000 probation officers and correctional treatment specialists in the United States. Nearly half (47 percent) of these are female, 72.7 percent white, 20.7 percent black, 1.3 percent Asian, and 15.0 percent Hispanic or Latino. Probation and parole officers must generally have at least a bachelor's degree, although a few states may allow experience to substitute for education.

Many probation and parole officers have degrees in criminal justice but also psychology and even graduate-level degrees in counseling. In some states, all officers are authorized to carry firearms, while in other states only those dealing with adults may carry firearms. Some states do not allow firearms at all. Probation and parole officers receive diversity training in their initial trainings and in subsequent in-service trainings. Probation and parole officers are hybrids between police officer (they carry firearms and enforce laws) with counselor (rehabilitation).

Probation and Parole Duties

The roles of probation and parole officers differ from each other because their clients have had different experiences. Those on probation, generally, have never been incarcerated in prison. While they may have spent time in jail, briefly, the general idea of probation is to keep offenders in the community while they are being punished and rehabilitated. Those on probation, then, need help improving their lives in the community but typically not establishing a new life in the community. Parolees, however, have been incarcerated for a year or for several decades. Parolees may need help reintegrating into society. Things that were once familiar may now seem foreign. Technologies such as cell phones or even ATM machines may be new. Work skills may be outdated. In any event, parolees need more help than probationers building a life after incarceration.

Besides general supervisory functions, probation may also include any number of intermediate sanctions that are more severe than simply being monitored and less severe, cheaper, and freer than incarceration. Some states make probationers pay fines. These fines are a condition of the probation, and failure to make timely payments can result in revocation of probation. Restitution is similar in that the probationer has to make timely payment, but in this case, the payments go to the victim to pay for damages done when the crime was committed.

Other intermediate sanction approaches focus on supervision. Intensive supervision provides more supervision and potentially more assistance from the probation officer. Instead of reporting to the probation officer monthly, a person under intensive supervision may report weekly or, more likely, several times a week. While intensive supervision may provide more assistance, it also creates a situation in which the probation officer is more available to notice probation violations.

Substance abuse and mental health treatment are often intermediate sanctions required for offenders. Remember that the original probationer of John

Augustus was a substance abuser. Substance abuse and mental health treatment can range from 12-step groups, to individual counseling, to medication to deal with the problem. In these situations, recovery industry professionals (e.g., social workers, psychiatrists, psychologists, and licensed alcohol and drug counselors) become a part of the criminal justice system as they report back to probation officers and judges. Their reports can potentially cause probationers to have their probations revoked.

Other intermediate sanctions may include electronic monitoring so that the probationer remains only where he or she is allowed. For instance, a probationer may be ordered to stay at home, and the electronic monitoring system will alert authorities when the probationer leaves home. If the probationer is allowed to go to work during certain hours of the day, the monitoring system can detect if the person is at work.

Additional intermediate sanctions can make a person live in a place other than his or her home. Boot camps are modeled after the military. Those who attend them are put through heavily regimented, physically demanding work days. Those who attend them are even provided a graduation ceremony. Finally, halfway houses are used by some on probation. Halfway houses are not prison, but they are places for probationers to sleep and eat. There are rules to the halfway house, and failure to follow those rules can lead to revocation of probation. The halfway house allows the probationer to live and work in the community but is cheaper than sending the person to prison.

Another duty of probation officers is to write the PSI. Prior to sentencing, the probation officer must write a PSI, which covers the convicted person's background and includes information such as mental health or substance abuse problems, past arrests and convictions, personal information, and any other information that is helpful to treating the person.

Conclusion

Probation started in the United States in the 1840s, as John Augustus successfully helped criminals who had problems with alcohol. By the 1920s, nearly every state in the United States had a paid probation position. In 2012 there were nearly 5 million people on probation and parole in the United States. Most of these people were on probation (more than 4 million), and nearly 1 million (850,000) were on parole. These two groups are supervised similarly in that each is required to stay in a certain geographic location, submit to urine tests, seek and receive counseling, to work, stay away from convicted felons, to stay out of trouble, and pay restitution. Probationers and those on parole do differ in some ways in that parolees have spent years in prison and, therefore, may need much more help than probationers when it comes to reintegrating into society.

Probation and parole officers serve roles that can be thought of as a combination of police officers on one hand and counselors on the other. The positions also require that those who occupy them have a bachelor's degree. Probation and parole officers must make sure that their clients are obeying the law and doing what they are supposed to do. Many probation and parole officers are issued firearms along with badges. Probation and parole officers may have to send people to prison. At the same time, the counselor side of the probation and parole officer wants to see clients succeed. They want them to lead law-abiding lives. The roles of probation and parole officers are crucial to the criminal justice system. For every incarcerated person, there are more than two people in the community under court supervision (i.e., probation and parole). Probation and parole officers help to make society safer, to improve the lives of their clients, and to save society money by not having to incarcerate all offenders.

Daniel W. Phillips III
Paula Adkins
Lindsey Wilson
Lindsey Wilson College

See Also: Families of Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners; Prisoner Reentry Programs; Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners.

Further Readings

Bonczar, Thomas P., and Lauren E. Glaze. Probation and Parole in the United States, 2010. Washington, DC: Bureau of Justice Statistics, 2011.

Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS). BLS Reports: Labor Force Characteristics by Race and Ethnicity. Washington, DC: BLS, 2012.

Maruschak, Laura M., and Erika Parks. Probation and Parole in the United States, 2011. Washington, DC: Bureau of Justice Statistics, 2011.

Profile of Parenting Study

The Profile of Parenting Study (POPS) is a questionnaire designed to assess the suitability and facilitate the decision-making of foster, kinship, or adoptive parent applicants. Developed in Tennessee, the POPS identifies needs and strengths of prospective resource parents. This entry uses the POPS manual and questionnaire to first outline the structure and purposes of the tool and second describe in detail its topics and indices.

Uses of the Profile of Parenting Study

The POPS questionnaire matches children and parents based on self-reported strengths and weaknesses. The questionnaire is not only a preparatory tool but also a record used in the private and public sectors to develop educational programs and professional development services. Prospective parents respond to 57 items within nine topic areas, basing their responses on the action they intend to take in the planning process. Although a high score may change the course of action, the tool is meant only to assess need, not to assign blame or pass judgment. By understanding appropriate principles and practices, prospective parents apply and adapt them according to the experience of both the child and parent. Parents strike a balance among the child's background, accepted parenting principles, and their own experience.

The balance depends on a number of outcomes, including several protective factors of the Strengthening Families approach, a national initiative designed to guide policy decisions and program development for family services. The measures of the POPS are drawn from several other communimetric tools and family services, including the Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths (CANS) tool, the Family Advocacy and Support Tool (FAST), and the Adult Needs and Strengths Assessment (ANSA). These are open-access tools meant to facilitate the decision making of prospective parents, not measure them according to an etiological standard.

All items listed on the POPS are descriptive, tied to planning, and include child-centered action levels dependent on cultural considerations and situational circumstances. First, the POPS questionnaire measures parental resilience, a barometer of mature and responsible behavior in response to the inevitable adversity of parenting. Second, it asks for strong social connections that ground the child in a real world of supportive friends and family. Third, it tests knowledge of parenting and child development, especially for applicants with difficult upbringings, and ensures that applicants satisfy the child's basic physiological needs and provide concrete support during crises. Fourth, it maximizes the child's social and emotional competence through early detection of problematic behaviors, and finally, it gauges the child's support network beyond the parental dyad and detects risks from other children in the family or surrounding neighborhood.

Structure of the Profile of Parenting Study

The POPS questionnaire consists of nine topic areas, each with its own subset of indices. For each prompt, applicants rate themselves on a scale from zero to three. The scores are assessed along two dimensions, needs and strengths. The needs dimension directs the preparatory plan. A zero on the needs dimension requires no action, and a one suggests possible but not immediate intervention. A two compels some level of preventive action, and a three inhibits the applicant and requires immediate action.

The strength dimension identifies areas of strength and weakness. On this dimension, a zero indicates a well-developed trait, and a one denotes a useful behavior that, with some development, can benefit the applicant's parenting ability. A two requires further development if it is to become a strength, and a three is a nonexistent behavior that requires full development. All responses initiate discussion with and reassessment by the assessment board, during which applicants further explicate their responses with written evidence and examples.

For instance, the first part of the POPS questionnaire assesses the applicant's basic knowledge of child development in 13 items as follows. The first and 10th items, knowledge and expectations of the child's needs, gauge parents' familiarity with physical or psychological conditions of abused or neglected children. Low scores mean that the parent is equipped to handle the child's needs, and high scores mean that the parent is ignorant of or unfamiliar with the child's needs. The third and ninth items, discipline and child's play, test age-appropriate limits on the child's behavior while respecting and engaging in play. Low scores create an environment with disciplined play, and high scores require disciplinary intervention.

Similarly, the fifth and seventh items of the first topic area concern age-appropriate boundaries in a learning environment conducive to intellectual development. Low scores represent an ideal place to learn and mature, and high scores may inhibit the child's intellectual development and social maturation. The 11th and 13th items, birth sibling and birth parent relationships, involve relationships with the child's birth parents and biological kin. Low scores provide support for fruitful relationships with birth siblings, and high scores cannot inculcate such relationships. The second and eighth items, primary care and nutrition management, involve the basic physiological and hygienic needs of the child. Low scores meet these needs, and high scores cannot care for the child for reasons financial or otherwise.

The fourth and sixth items, supervision and demonstration of effective parenting approaches, test proper parenting principles and commitment to supervision. Low scores model appropriate behavior, and high scores indicate an inability or unwillingness to put principles into practice. Finally, the 12th item, child and birth family background, concerns the child's cultural background and medical history. Low scores respect the child's background, and high scores overlook or cannot articulate the child's cultural heritage.

Conclusion

By juxtaposing these self-reported data with the parents' mental and physical health, s financial status, and employment situation, the POPS encourages self-reflection and, in consultation with applicants, guides a plan of action for successful foster, kinship, or adoptive parenting.

David DeIuliis
Duquesne University

See Also: Family Permanency Planning; Family Services; National Center for Children in Poverty; National Survey of Family Growth; Parenting Skills Training; Pregnancy and Parenting Services.

Further Readings

Bass, Sandra, et al. "Children, Families, and Foster Care: Analysis and Recommendations." The Future of Children, v.14 (2004).

Brown, Jason. "Foster Parents' Perceptions of Factors Needed for Successful Foster Placements." Journal of Child and Family Studies, v.17 (2008).

Chamberlain, Patricia, et al. "Cascading Implementation of a Foster and Kinship Parent Intervention." Child Welfare, v.87 (2008).

Pacifici, Caesar, et al. "Web-Based Training for Foster, Adoptive, and Kinship Parents." Children and Youth Services Review, v.28 (2006).

Tennessee Department of Children's Services. "Profile of Parenting Study (POPS) Manual." http://www.google.com/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=&esrc=s&source=web&cd=1&ved=0CC4QFjAA&url=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.tn.gov%2Fyouth%2Fdcsguide%2Fmanuals%2FPOPSToolMan.doc&ei=tvuHUpnEEZCg4AP3xoGgCg&usg=AFQjCNFlYmtKbt23pgF_RZelRPkqS9s71A&bvm=bv.56643336,d.dmg (Accessed August 2013).

Protective Services for Adults

Adult protective services has a short history in the United States but was created to designate a means for reporting abuse of adults. Since the advent of this movement, this service has expanded to include reports of abuse, neglect, emotional abuse, and financial exploitation. This service not only assists elderly adults but includes those vulnerable populations, such as people with disabilities from the age of 18 or 22 in most jurisdictions. In 2004, a survey was conducted on state adult protective services, specifically focusing on abuse of vulnerable adults. This study showed that abuse victims vary in ethnicity. In nine states, just over 65 percent of victims age 18 to 59 were Caucasian, and 32 percent were African American. In 11 states (without age-specific categories), 78.5 percent of victims were Caucasian, while 17.1 percent were African American, according to the National Committee for the Prevention of Elder Abuse and the National Adult Protective Services Association. Given the diversity of the sample of victims, it is incumbent upon service providers to expand their cultural competence in order to best serve the wide range of victims seeking their care and advocacy.

Adults With Disability Abuse and Protection

In 1975, Public Law 93-647, or Title 20 of the Social Security Act, was enacted by Congress. One provision in that legislation required that states protect children, elder adults, and adults with disabilities from abuse, neglect, and/or exploitation. In 1981, an amendment to the law created a funding stream to states through the Title XX Social Services Block Grant Program.

States were given extensive discretion to determine the services to be provided and the groups that may be eligible for services. The law allowed states to use their allotments for staff training, administration, planning, evaluation, and purchasing technical assistance in developing, implementing, or administering the state social service program. Under Title XX, states decide what amount of the federal allotment to spend on services, training, and administration.

Coinciding with the Title XX provisions was an increasing movement toward community-based services for people with intellectual disabilities and mental illness. With that, states had to establish procedures for access to services and how people's rights were to be protected.

Protection of people's rights in many states has become a two-tiered process. A primary emphasis for protection in adult services goes to clarifying people's human rights and due process. This is often managed through the use of independent human rights committees whose function is to provide checks and balances by commenting on agency practices. That can include reviewing agency policy and procedures, any medication and treatment planning, due process concerns, incident reporting, review of protective service investigations, and outcomes and other practices held by state regulation for review. These committees are frequently given advisory status within state and not-for-profit organizations. Training on rights for people receiving services, their families and staff are typically presented at least annually. Also, procedures for involving protective services are reviewed with staff.

Protective service access and investigation is a second tier within the support process. States identify and define what rights and protections are to be monitored and investigated by protective services. For example, that might include fiscal abuse, emotional abuse, physical abuse, sexual abuse, mistreatment by commission or omission, and such. They each will establish a means to contact and report alleged cases of abuse, mistreatment, or exploitation. Frequently, direct care staff, managers, and medical and mental health professionals will be designated mandated reporters, requiring them to report alleged cases of abuse they witness or become privy to. Once reported, protective service personnel will identify how or whether a case is to be investigated. In many states, if the allegation could be classified as criminal behavior, police involvement will be solicited. Investigations proceed through proscribed processes, and again, states determine, at their completion, how to discharge findings for all the involved parties.

Elder Abuse and Protection

During the 1960s, demonstration grants were provided to assist in determining whether adult abuse reporting systems should be creating across the United States. By the early 1980s, 83 percent of members of the U.S. Congress were in favor of creating adult protective services systems, and elder abuse was identified as an epidemic. Though the Prevention, Identification, and Treatment of Adult Abuse Bill of 1980 was introduced in the same year, no action was taken on a federal level, and states were left to tackle this issue on their own. By 1985, 46 states had offices in place to assist with adult protective services. Mandatory reporting laws were on the books in 46 states as of 1991, and at that time, 34 states provided protection services to not only the elderly but to vulnerable adults as well.

Each state is responsible for the creation, implementation, and maintenance of laws regarding the delivery of protective services. The areas of abuse generally covered include physical, sexual, emotional, neglect (both on the part of the elder in question or the caregiver), and financial exploitation. Oftentimes, a second layer of legal protection exists for elders residing in nursing homes, though this may vary state to state.

The services provided in these models include receiving and documenting reports, creating and following a case plan, evaluating risk, evaluating capacity for informed consent, counseling or referral for counseling services, and general case management. In more than two-thirds of states, the Department of Social Services is responsible for these tasks, although State Units on Aging and some Departments of Health and Rehabilitation may be accountable as well.

The basic principles underlying the provision of these services include the right to self-determination, using the least-restrictive alternative, preservation of the family unit where possible, utilizing community-based services as opposed to institutionalizing, avoiding blame, and the idea that inadequate service is a worse scenario than no service at all.

Shanna L. Burke
John Struth
Nonotuck Resource Associates, Inc.

See Also: Abuse and Neglect; Disabled Clients; Elder Care/Geriatric Services.

Further Readings

Almanac of Policy Issues. "Social Services Block Grants." http://www.policyalmanac.org/social_welfare/archive/ssbg.shtml (Accessed January 2013).

Brandle, Bonnie, Bitondo Dyer, Candace Heisler, Joanne Marlatt, Joanne Otto, Lori Stiegel, and Randolph Thomas. Detection and Intervention: A Collaborative Approach. New York: Springer Publishing Company, 2006.

Mizrahi, Terry, Mayra Lopez-Humphries, and Denise Toerres. "The Social Construction of Client Participation: The Evolution and Transformation of the Role of Service Recipients in Child Welfare and Mental Disabilities." Journal of Sociology and Social Welfare, v.36 (2009).

National Association for States United for Aging and Disabilities. "Adult Protective Services in 2012: Increasingly Vulnerable." http://www.napsa-now.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/06/BaselineSurveyFinal.pdf (Accessed December 2012).

National Committee for the Prevention of Elder Abuse and the National Adult Protective Services Association. "The 2004 Survey of State Adult Protective Services: Abuse of Vulnerable Adults 18 Years of Age and Older." http://www.ncea.aoa.gov/Resources/Publication/docs/APS_2004NCEASurvey.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Department of Justice and Office of Justice Programs. "Vision 21: Transforming Victim Service. Executive Summary and Recommendations." http://ovc.ncjrs.gov/vision21/pdfs/Vision21_Exec_Summary.pdf (Accessed May 2013).

Protective Services for Children

The purpose of protective services for children, often referred to as Child Protective Services (CPS), is to promote the safety and well-being of all children by protecting them from child abuse and neglect. Protective services for children are available in every state in the United States. Although definitions vary by state, the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (CAPTA) of 1974, amended by the CAPTA Reauthorization Act of 2010, sets national standards on which these definitions are based. Racial, ethnic, and cultural diversity are prevalent in the CPS population. Therefore, CPS workers must be cognizant of their own perceptions and biases and informed on cultural practices different from their own.

Mandated Reporting

Every state has child abuse and neglect reporting laws that require certain individuals to report all suspected child abuse or neglect to the CPS agency. Who is considered a mandated reporter varies by state. The failure to report child abuse and neglect is punishable for mandated reporters according to state statutes. Every state also accepts reports from individuals who are not mandated reporters.

Process of Child Protective Services

In accordance with state statutes, concerns regarding the abuse or neglect of a child are handled by CPS in a specific way. As outlined by Diane DePanfilis and Marsha Salus in Child Protective Services: A Guide for Caseworkers, there are seven basic stages to the CPS process. First, cases are received by an intake department. At this point, a CPS worker and supervisor determine if the report meets state guidelines that will allow the child to be assessed for maltreatment.

What qualifies as a report of child maltreatment varies greatly by state. If the report involves an American Indian child, the CPS agency must work with the family and the American Indian tribe to ensure compliance with the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA). Passed in 1978, the goal of the ICWA is to protect the cultural heritage of American Indian children by trying to keep them in American Indian families.

How the ICWA is implemented depends on the specifics of the case and the specific tribe. When CPS accepts a report of maltreatment for further assessment, reports are assigned a CPS investigative caseworker. In states with a dual track system, reports of maltreatment are assigned to one of two types of assessment procedures. Reports that do not indicate children are at immediate risk are assigned into one track. Reports indicating children are unsafe or at higher risk are assigned into a second track.

In the second stage of the CPS process, the CPS investigative caseworker contacts the family and attempts to engage them in an assessment of their strengths and needs. CPS works with the family to evaluate whether or not the reported allegations of child maltreatment are true to assess for the presence of any other needs in the family and to decide if there are services that could be provided to strengthen the family. CPS workers must be fully aware of their own cultural biases and seek guidance from a supervisor when assessing the parenting practices of others.

For example, coining is a common form of Chinese and south Asian folk medicine, which results in red marks on the body that can appear to be bruises. Although the practice is not considered maltreatment, coining can be misidentified as physical abuse. To prevent this, CPS agencies must be informed on the cultural practices of groups in the community and seek guidance when specific cultural practices are reported.

At the conclusion of the second stage, many outcomes are possible. Most reports result in the closure of the investigation without the provision of services to the family. In some situations, CPS recommends that a family receive services to strengthen the family. It may be voluntary for the family to receive these services, or the services may be mandated by the court system. Sometimes, it is not possible for a child or children to remain in the home with the family due to concerns for child safety or well-being. In these situations, CPS may either work with the family to voluntarily place the child outside of the home with an approved caregiver, or CPS may petition the court to legally remove custody of the child from the caregivers. Removal of the child from the home can occur at any point in the CPS process.

For those families whose CPS cases are not closed, the third stage involves further assessing the strengths and needs of a family during an open CPS case. Although this varies greatly at the state and local levels, a new CPS caseworker may be assigned to the family to work with them to either stabilize the family while keeping the children in the home or to reunite the family after case goals have been achieved. At this stage, caregivers may be involved in assessments to determine what services would be useful.

In the fourth stage, interventions and services appropriate to the needs of each family member are identified, and referrals are made to these services. A case plan may be developed with the family to list out the steps necessary to either return the children to the home or to close the CPS case. During the fifth stage, services are provided to the family. These services may be provided by the CPS agency or by agencies contracting with CPS to provide these services. In the sixth stage, the CPS worker and supervisor periodically evaluate the progress of the family toward reaching the goals of their case plan. The seventh stage is the case closure.

Kristen D. Seay
Washington University in St. Louis

See Also: Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Child Welfare Services; Children in Foster Care; Indian Child Welfare Act.

Further Readings

DePanfilis, Diane, and Marsha K. Salus. Child Protective Services: A Guide for Caseworkers. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, 2003.

Mather, Jannah, Patricia B. Lager, Norma J. Harris. Child Welfare: Policies and Best Practices, 2nd ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole/Cengage Learning, 2006.

Raman, Shanti and Deborah Hodes. “Cultural Issues in Child Maltreatment.” Journal of Paediatrics and Child Health, v.48 (2012).

Providers, Institutional Racism and

Racism is the support of a belief system that classifies people in the world in terms of the difference in their skin color and promotes the superiority of one race over another. Historically, racism has served to deny certain individuals the same rights, privileges, access, and entitlements that are afforded to other groups, namely white persons in a U.S. context. Racism implies the innate power of one group over another, often by means of a history of domination, regulation, and control. Human services workers receive diversity training that often includes how to understand and work toward eradicating systemic racism, as well as learning about the matters to keep in mind when working with others outside of one's race.

This begins with an understanding of how racism manifests itself on an individual level between persons. Individualized racism is generally the most obvious form of racism, yet other types exist that are more structural than individual. Structural racism is often perpetuated, even if the individuals who make up the structure do not individually hold racist views. Institutional racism, a form of structural racism, is the collapse, preexisting failure, or breakdown within a social interest group or institutional setting that disallows the privilege of equal access or equitable services to individuals because of the color of their skin, ethnic heritage, or cultural origin. Institutional settings include companies, businesses, educational systems, health care organizations, human service agencies, and political parties or movements.

While providers may not knowingly perpetuate institutional racism, they are part of the complex structures that were often configured with the needs of white people in mind. An imbalanced power dynamic is therefore created where the interests of people of color are not equally as paramount as that of whites or elided altogether in a way that perpetuates marginalization within the particular setting. Because the racist structures predate the providers of today, it is essential to examine how issues of institutional racism in human service and health care settings were created in order to break down the barriers to services that still exist for minority populations.

Tuskegee Experiment

One need only look as recently as the middle of the 20th century to the Tuskegee experiment to understand the mistrust that has developed between minority communities and services providers because of a pernicious example of institutionalized racism in health care research. Several hundred black men tested positive for syphilis and were not told that they were infected. They were then recruited to be research subjects under the guise of receiving free health care.

The researchers were actually interested in the effects of untreated syphilis on these men, even well after a treatment had been discovered that cured the condition. This is an often-cited example of institutionalized racism knowingly executed by health care providers, one of many in the course of history.

Though not as overt as Tuskegee, minority populations still face many barriers to accessing services when it comes to seeking health or mental health care. While universal health care is pending in the United States, many minority populations are unemployed or underemployed so they do not qualify for employer subsidized health care plans. Some qualify for Medicaid, but there are often very long waiting lists to see a provider, if the particular clinic is accepting new Medicaid patients at all.

Further, minority groups often live in areas that are medically underserved and without the staffing of minority providers that can provide racial, ethnic, or cultural familiarity to some clients who are also underrepresented in these areas. This underrepresentation can lead to language barriers for patients/clients whose first language is not English. It can be difficult to locate a translator if one is available at all, and treatment or services are unnecessarily delayed. Language barriers and the failure of agencies and providers to meet this need is an obstacle to full and complete access and a form of institutionalized racism because it says to the client that he or she is not important enough to have people on staff that speak his or her language.

There are many shelter environments in U.S. cities that cater to many monolingual Spanish-speaking Latinos, yet they do not have a Spanish-speaking staff member. This problem exists with many subjugated groups that are monolingual to their native language and enforces a sense of rejection or disrespect to the client's heritage. While it is difficult to manage all these factors in smaller nonprofit organizations that may have minimal funding, it still constructs the client as an outsider or "other" compared to clients who can enter the organization for help and immediately have their needs addressed because no such barriers exist. Because funds are not available on a federal level for these smaller agencies, the racism is embedded and therefore institutionalized within the structure of funding sources.

Doctor drawing blood from a patient as part of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study, a pernicious example of institutionalized racism in health care research. Several hundred black men tested positive for syphilis and were not told they were infected. They were then recruited to be research subjects under the guise of receiving free health care. The researchers were actually interested in the effects of untreated syphilis on these men, even well after a treatment had been discovered that cured the condition.

White Bias

Many individuals from communities of color are overrepresented in pathologizing mental health diagnoses and score lower on standard intelligence test questions. These assessments were developed with white middle-class people as the determinates of normalcy, and are therefore designed around culturally different views of the world that are far more privileged and have not been subjected to a history of domination and control, nor do they have to live in an environment that perpetuates negative stereotypes by nature of institutionalized racism. Race and racism cannot be teased out from their relationships to social class, ability, and gender.

Women of color have a much higher incidence of health care disparities, and they are subjugated by the sexism that affects them for being women and the racism or ethnocentrism that is a consequence of being persons of color. Native American men and women are often blamed for the high rate of alcoholism within their communities, and they are often viewed as intrinsically unable to employ better coping skills. The history, however, is elided in the days of land acquisition by white men; they introduced alcohol to native people through trade when it was not a part of native cultural history and they had no tolerance or experience with the risks of addiction. Often, histories of other subjugated groups are erased, and stigma and blame are perpetuated.

Less experienced providers are often ignorant of the issues of difference that prevent them from being culturally sensitive. For example, some white providers have difficulty understanding the kinship model of childrearing in the African American family (and other communities of color) and question the adequacy of parental attention toward their children, not realizing that the extended community fills in any perceived gap.

Providers can also perpetuate institutionalized racism by not speaking up when hearing or seeing examples of more individualized forms of racism from colleagues in their respective agencies. Many governing bodies or licensing entities that certify workers in human service agencies are examining how institutionalized racism is perpetuated and are taking steps to address it as individual fields. The hope is that deconstructing institutionalized racism in the history of the helping profession will trickle down to the human service providers employed by individual agencies.

Elizabeth Metcalf
Syracuse University

See Also: Race and Clients; Race, Social Definitions of; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health; Racial Identity Development, Models of; Racial Microaggression; Racism, Long-Term Effects of.

Further Readings

McKenzie, K. and B. Kamaldeep. "Institutional Racism in Mental Health Care." British Medical Journal, v.334/7595 (2007).

Randall, V. "Institutional Racism in U.S. Healthcare." University of Florida Journal of Law and Public Policy, v.14 (2002).

Van Ryn, M. and S. Fu. "Paved With Good Intentions: Do Public Health and Human Service Providers Contribute to Racial/Ethnic Disparities in Health?" American Journal of Public Health, v.93/2 (2003).

Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment

There are many aspects of a thorough psychiatric and psychological assessment, with some of the more prominent ones being conducting a clinical interview, conducting a mental status exam, making a diagnosis, and administering and interpreting a wide range of assessment instruments. A thorough psychiatric and psychological assessment may include one or all of these sources of information in an effort to gather enough evidence to make a determination or prediction about a client's status. Usually, the psychiatric and psychological assessment results in some type of evaluation or test report. Although human service professionals tend to have the training to conduct a clinical interview and to administer a mental status exam, they may or may not have training in making a diagnosis. In addition, human service professionals only have the training to give some types of tests. The following offers a brief description of these four important aspects a psychiatric and psychological assessment.

The Clinical Interview

The clinical interview is a broad-based assessment of an individual, which is generally done face-to-face by a mental health professional. Clinical interviews can be structured or unstructured and usually take between one and three hours. With both types of interview, the mental health professional attempts to gather a wide range of information from the client, including the following: demographic information, presenting problem or reason for referral, family background, significant relationship patterns, medical history, prior counseling, substance use and abuse, educational and vocational history, mental status (see next section), and other pertinent information. Human service professionals should have the training in basic counseling skills to be able to effectively conduct a clinical interview.

Whereas structured interviews have a predetermined set of questions or a checklist of items to be covered, the unstructured interview allows the client to drift and discuss items that may feel particularly important to him or her. The advantage of the structured interview is that, because it is focused, one is less likely to miss items that are typically covered in the interview process. The advantage of the unstructured interview is that items that might not be uncovered in a structured interview are discovered as the client drifts into uncharted territory about his or her life. This may reveal intimate details about the client's mental health status. Some mental health professionals will conduct a semistructured interview in an attempt to have the best of both the structured and unstructured interviews. Whether conducting a structured, unstructured, or semistructured interview, it is important to make sure that the depth and breadth of the client's experience is gathered so that an accurate psychiatric or psychological assessment is conducted.

The Mental Status Exam

A major part of the psychiatric and psychological assessment is the mental status exam, which is generally conducted during the clinical interview phase of the assessment process and assesses clients' appearance and behavior, emotional state, thought components, and cognitive functioning. This exam may be done in a deliberate fashion, where the examiner asks specific questions to ensure that he or she gathers all the necessary information, or may be an outgrowth of the clinical interview, as the examiner picks up cues from the client about the areas to be assessed in the mental status exam.

Appearance and behavior. Appearance and behavior include things such as the client's body posture, eye contact, nonverbal behaviors, tics, hygiene, manner of speech, and so forth. Appearance and behaviors give an indication of how the client presents himself or herself to the world.

Emotional state. Here, the examiner assesses the client's affect, which is how the client appears to the examiner, whereas the mood is the client's subjective sense of self, usually appearing over a period of time. A few examples of the dozens of types of affect and mood include depressed, anxious, apathetic, serious, sad, happy, and joyful. In addition, a statement about the type of affect and mood is usually made. A few of the many examples of those include constricted, exaggerated, labile, or flat.

Thought components. A client's thought components include the kinds of things a client is thinking about (content) as well as the process of one's thinking. Some examples of the many kinds of items examiners will look for include whether a client has delusions, distortions of body image, hallucinations, obsessions, suicidal or homicidal ideation, and whether the thinking process is tangential, circumstantial, coherent, flighty, logical, intact, loose, organized, or tangential.

Cognition. Some of the many items assessed when examining cognition include whether the individual knows what time and date it is, where he or she is, and who he or she is (oriented to time, place, and person), as well as a statement about the person's short- and long-term memory, insight, judgment, and intellectual ability.

Making a Diagnosis

One aspect of doing a psychiatric and psychological assessment is making an accurate diagnosis of the client, which includes the use of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (5th edition, or DSM-5). In order to make an accurate diagnosis, most mental health professionals will have conducted a clinical interview and a mental status exam. Sometimes, assessment instruments will be used to help in the diagnostic process. Any mental health professional that is adequately trained in DSM-5 should be able to make a diagnosis.

DSM-5 includes information on a wide range of disorders to help the mental health professional make a diagnosis. There are hundreds of disorders that are listed under the following broad categories: neurodevelopmental disorders; schizophrenia spectrum and other psychotic disorders; bipolar and related disorders; depressive disorders; anxiety disorders; obsessive-compulsive and related disorders; trauma- and stressor-related disorders; dissociative disorders; somatic symptom disorders; feeding and eating disorders; elimination disorders; sleep–wake disorders; sexual dysfunctions; gender dysphoria; disruptive, impulse control, and conduct disorders; substance use and addictive disorders; neurocognitive disorders; personality disorders; paraphilic disorders; other disorders; and co-occurring and substance-induced disorders. DSM-5 uses a dimensional assessment that asks the professional to identify whether the diagnosis is mild, moderate, severe, or very severe. Generally, mental health professionals are also asked to make a statement about a medical condition if it is related to a disorder as well as psychosocial and environmental issues that may have exasperated a disorder.

Conducting Testing and Assessment Procedures

The final aspect of doing a good psychiatric and psychological assessment sometimes includes the use of tests and other assessment instruments. Testing and assessment can be viewed from four broad categories: ability testing, personality testing, and informal assessment.

Ability Testing

Often, a person's cognitive functioning can have a direct impact on his or her psychological functioning. Thus, some examiners like to do an assessment of those aspects of cognitive ability that are seen as important to a particular person's functioning.

There are two types of ability testing: achievement testing, which measures what one has learned, and aptitude testing, which measures what one is capable of learning. Types of achievement testing include survey achievement tests such as tests of what you have learned in school; diagnostic tests, like tests of learning disabilities; and readiness tests such as tests to see if a person is ready to move to the next level of education. Types of aptitude tests include cognitive ability tests such as tests to measure what you are capable of in school or to measure how well you might perform in college (e.g., SATs, ACTs); tests of cognitive functioning such as intelligence tests or tests of neuropsychological assessments (e.g., tests to measure changes in brain function); and tests of special and multiple aptitude, which measure one's ability at different skills and are usually used to predict job performance.

Personality Assessment

Personality assessment has to do with assessment in the affective realm. Three kinds of personality assessment include interest inventories, objective tests of personality, and projective tests of personality. The latter two types are frequently used when conducting a broad-based psychiatric and psychological assessment, although sometimes interest inventories are also used.

Interest inventories assess a person's likes and dislikes and often result in a description of an individual's personality orientation toward the world of work. They are used to help a client in the career counseling process and are fairly predictive of job satisfaction. Objective personality tests are predominantly multiple choice and true–false instruments that provide information about a person's temperament and day-to-day functioning. Every objective test measures different aspects of personality, although the more involved ones tend to provide diagnostic information about the individual. Projective tests present unstructured stimuli, such as a series of inkblots or sentence stems (e.g., My mother was . . .), and asks the individual to respond to them. Then, the examiner interprets the client's responses.

Informal Assessment

Informal assessment techniques are created by the individual who is administering the assessment procedure or conducting the psychiatric and psychological assessment. By their very nature, these instruments are less valid or reliable than ability or personality tests. However, they are useful because they can zero in on a specific aspect of client behavior. Some of the more popular types of informal assessment instruments include observation, rating scales, classification methods (e.g., feeling word checklists), environmental assessment techniques (e.g., observing a child in school or observing a person at his or her home), and records and personal documents (e.g., diaries, autobiographies, or genograms).

Who Can Give Tests

A number of years ago, the American Psychological Association suggested that competency in test administration and interpretation can be categorized among three levels. Those who can give Level A tests should have a minimum of a two- or four-year degree. Some tests they can give include informal assessment procedures and proctoring exams. Those who can administer and interpret Level B tests include those who have a master's degree in psychology or a related field (e.g., human services) and a basic course in testing. Some tests at this level include interest inventories, some objective personality tests, and many ability tests. Those who can give Level C tests should have a master's degree, a basic course in testing, and advanced training on the test. Some tests they can give include intelligence tests, neuropsychological assessment, some learning disabilities tests, and projective tests. Generally, a human service professional can give Level A tests.

Diversity and Assessment

Although there are clearly benefits to conducting assessments with clients, the 100-year history of assessment has not always been kind to a wide range of diverse clients. For instance, two of the first assessment instruments included the Army Alpha and Army Beta tests, which were verbal and nonverbal tests, given in large groups, of what was said to be intelligence. However, a close look at these tests showed that they were filled with cultural and socioeconomic bias. Clearly, those who were white and well-off did better than others as their life experiences had exposed them to the types of questions asked on the test. In addition, the test was a far cry from what we would currently call intelligence.

Despite its faults, the tests were widely given, and the results were used by the U.S. government to prevent emigration to the United States of those who did poorly on the test, such as Jews from eastern Europe, as they were seen as intellectually inferior. One result of this policy was the murder of millions of Jews and others in the Nazi concentration camps. These tests were also used as a justification for the eugenics movement, which suggested that those who were "brighter" should be encouraged to find other bright individuals to have children with, and those who were "dull" would be encouraged to not have children and sometimes given forced sterilization. Other horrific examples of the misuse of tests include culturally biased tests of achievement and aptitude that were used throughout this country during a large part of the second half of the 20th century. These tests clearly were positively biased toward whites and were often used in important decision making such as advancement in school or placement in jobs.

A number of tests and assessment procedures were initially developed to equalize differences among people. For instance, James Conant Bryant, the developer of the SAT, was hoping that the test could identify those who were struggling academically so that they could be given additional help to achieve. Also, Public Law 94-142, the original special education act passed in 1975, was put into place to identify, through assessment, those children who had disabilities so that they could be given special attention and helped to achieve in schools at higher levels. Unfortunately, these good-hearted attempts sometimes did not have their expected results, such as when the SATs were used to prevent minorities from attending college, when tests of special education resulted in a child's label becoming a burden rather than a mechanism of helping the child do better in school, or when bias in testing misidentifies large percentages of individuals from minority groups for special education.

Over the years, as attention to bias in testing became more prevalent, test publishing companies have made a strong effort to include minorities and women in their norm samples and have tried to limit the bias in their test items. The development of the computer has helped in this process as it made the statistical analysis of tests much easier, and many studies have been conducted over the past 20 years attesting to the cultural fairness or unfairness of tests. However, there is still little doubt that many tests continue to have bias today. Test examiners need to ensure that, whenever they give a test, it has been screened for bias. They should also take into account cross-cultural concerns of the examinee such as whether the examinee understands the questions, the motivation of the examinee, and whether or not the examinee has a disability that could interfere with the accuracy of the test score. This is why test administrators need to be well trained in how to give a test and be aware of the subtle signs that an individual's score may not represent his or her true score due to bias in the test or in the testing procedures. Finally, test examiners need to be particularly careful that their own bias toward certain groups does not interfere with their interpretation of test scores.

Cultural bias in assessment is not only a concern in tests but also a concern in diagnosis. For instance, it has been found that, due to mental health professionals' bias, clients from diverse backgrounds are often misdiagnosed, given inappropriate treatment plans, and terminate from helping relationships early because they do not feel a connection with the helper. In addition, clients from diverse backgrounds often do not even seek helping relationships because they do not feel welcomed. Thus, any good helper should be aware of his or her own bias, have knowledge about different cultures, and have the skills necessary to work with a wide variety of clients.

Conclusion

The clinical interview, mental status exam, diagnosis, and assessment results can all be used in psychiatric and psychological assessment of clients.

If conducted well with an eye to potential cultural bias, information from all of these sources can be used by human service professionals and other mental health professionals to develop a broad and in-depth impression of the client.

Edward Neukrug
Old Dominion University

See Also: Case Management; Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Cultural Responsiveness of; Intelligence Testing.

Further Readings

Akiskal, H. S. "The Mental Status Examination." In The Medical Basis of Psychiatry, S. H. Fatemi and P. J. Clayton, eds. Totowa, NJ: Humana, 2008.

Goldfinger, K., and A. M. Pomerantz. Psychological Assessment and Report Writing. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2010.

Neukrug, E., and Fawcett, R. C. Essentials of Testing and Assessment: A Practical Guide for Counselors, Social Workers, and Psychologists, 3rd ed. Belmont, CA: Cengage, 2015.

Sommers-Flanagan, J. and R. Sommers-Flanagan. Clinical Interviewing. Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley & Sons, 2012.

Spores, J. M. Clinician's Guide to Psychological Testing and Assessment: With Forms and Templates for Effective Practice. New York: Springer, 2013.

Zuckerman, E. L. The Guide to Conducting Interviews and Writing Psychological Reports, 7th ed. New York: Guilford Press, 2010.

Public Health

The concept of public health is best thought of as a practice model within the wider health care system. It is primarily distinguished by focusing on population-level health and disease prevention. This contrasts with the typical practice model of health care, which focuses on patient-level health and addresses acute symptoms of illness. Public health finds its origins in urbanized settings around the world and early public works that removed human waste, decreased rodent infestations, contained outbreaks of diseases, and limited behaviors associated with alcohol and drug use and sexual relationships. Its formulation into a profession and codification in public policy are phenomena that developed in association with industrialization.

Public health draws primarily from three scientific sources: epidemiology, biostatistics, and health services. Two streams of thought have dominated how disease prevention and population health are achieved: environmental and bacterial. Under the large umbrella of public health are numerous subfields that focus on social justice; climate change; vaccination; access to community-based health services; health disparities among Native Americans, Latinos, Asians, and African Americans; public policy in regards to poverty, maternal health, addictions, and occupational safety; the economics of health care; and mental health services.

Basic Activities

Public health is concerned with preventing epidemics, protecting the physical environment (e.g., air and water quality in the home and workplace), monitoring the general health of the population, responding to natural and man-made disasters, assuring quality and accessible health care, linking vulnerable populations to health services, research, and policy advocacy. The most visible manifestations of these ideals in the United States are the system of state, county, and city public health departments, the 1,200 Federally Qualified Community Health Centers (FQHCs), the Centers for Disease Control (CDC), and the United States Public Health Service (USPHS).

A strong commitment to issues of social justice has meant that public health professionals and institutions generally are engaged in serving a variety of diverse and vulnerable populations.

Historical Highlights

The literature concerning public health is mostly Eurocentric, with a strong focus on discoveries and developments in London. Because London was the largest urban center between 1841 and 1914 and the home of industrialization, it provided ample evidence of the impacts of poverty, lack of sanitation, and environmental degradation. These same conditions, not surprisingly, also found themselves prominent in the growing cities of the northeastern United States, particularly in Boston and New York City. As a result, much of the early history of public health arises from public policy and research in London, New York, and Boston. The two streams of public health, environmental and bacterial, are seen in its early history.

Environmental approaches in public health are demonstrated in Edwin Chadwick's (1800–90) 1842 Report on the Sanitary Condition of Labouring Population of Great Britain. Chadwick's seminal report linked together poor health, poverty, and dangerous environmental conditions that included contaminated drinking sources, improperly disposed garbage, and the presence of human waste in public streets. Eight years later in 1850, Lemual Shattuck (1793–1859) authored a similar public health report about the conditions of poverty in Boston. This report identified the public health needs of Massachusetts and made recommendations to create the first state board of health. One of the most famous episodes in public health was linking the London cholera epidemic of 1854 with a contaminated public water source by John Snow (1813–58), considered one of the founders of epidemiology.

Equally important is the work of public health scientists who approached population health and disease prevention from a bacterial perspective. One of the earliest scientific public health manuscripts appeared in 1796 and was written by Edward Jenner (1749–1843). Jenner's paper sketched out the potential for inoculation as a method of preventing disease. This paper led to the development of the smallpox vaccine, which was eventually considered eradicated in 1977 as a result of population-wide inoculation. French microbiologist Louis Pasteur (1822–95) developed a system of inoculation and the first vaccine for rabies. He also created the process of pasteurization, which kills all bacteria and molds in liquids such as milk that are related to disease. German scientist Robert Koch (1843–1910) was one of the founders of bacteriology. He was instrumental in developing methods used in modern epidemiology and won the Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine in 1905 for his development of Koch's Postulates, which identify four criteria necessary to establish a causal relationship between a parasite and a disease.

Women in Early Public Health

Women played a significant role in promoting environmental and social justice aspects of public health. Examples include Sara Josephine Baker (1873–1945), a physician in New York City who focused on the role of poverty in infant mortality. In 1917, Baker compared the mortality rate of World War I soldiers to children born in the United States and found that soldiers had a better chance of survival. Her work is believed to have saved the lives of 90,000 children. Baker is also famous for catching Typhoid Mary (twice) and improving the hygiene of New York City's Hell's Kitchen, a highly impoverished immigrant community. Lillian Wald (1867–1940), a nurse, social worker, and feminist, is considered the founder of public health nursing in the United States. In 1895, Wald started the Henry Street Settlement at which she introduced the concept of public health nursing. The idea was to provide basic medical care in the neighborhoods where poor and vulnerable populations lived. Mary Seacole (1805–81), who was known as the black Florence Nightingale, was instrumental in treating cholera and yellow fever outbreaks in Jamaica during the 1850s. Most famously, she opened the British Hotel with her own resources to serve the wounded and sick soldiers of the Crimea War despite Britain's refusal to financially support her work. Her kind care was remembered by thousands of British soldiers and recognized by Queen Victoria.

Women played a significant role in promoting public health. Lillian Wald, a nurse, social worker, and feminist, is considered the founder of public health nursing in the United States.

Race and Public Health

Early in the history of public health, there is limited evidence of support for the African American community despite extensive engagement with immigrant populations. The 1918 influenza pandemic highlighted the racist theories of blacks' susceptibility to disease, racially constructed public policy, and service barriers to health care. In response to these barriers in the United States, the African American community established separate hospitals and professional organizations to address the influenza epidemic, resulting in lower incidents of the disease among African Americans.

Since the mid-1960s, race, culture, and ethnicity have increasingly been part of the public health discourse. An active discussion within the public health scholarly literature has occurred about several dimensions of race, including the meaning of race as a social determinate of health, its measurement difficulties, and the role of racism in health services. The concept of race in particular and its use in public health policy and research has garnered significant debate in the scholarly literature. Generally, the current operationalization of race is viewed as deeply flawed. This is balanced with the importance of understanding the experiences of minority groups and the health determinant of race.

Notorious Incidents

Although often at odds, public health and the eugenics movement of the early 20th century found some similarities in policy and methods. The common goal held by both movements of protecting population health created a wide range of opportunities to collaborate. One such example is the USPHS examining immigrants for hereditary as well as infectious diseases, both of which were considered threats to population health. The connection between eugenics and public health was further solidified in the 1927 Supreme Court case Buck v. Bell, which upheld involuntary sterilization. The case was based upon Jacobson v. Massachusetts, a 1905 Supreme Court case mandating smallpox vaccines. The court found in both instances that the state had an obligation to the safety of the general population over the rights of the individual.

In one of the darkest moments in U.S. scientific history, the USPHS, in cooperation with the Tuskegee Institute, began the Tuskegee Study of Untreated Syphilis in the Negro Male in 1932. The study, although intended to justify treatment programs for African Americans with syphilis, was based on racist perceptions codified in the racial epidemiology of the time. A letter from a medical researcher concerning the Tuskegee syphilis study sent to the CDC in 1965 states:

> I am utterly astounded by the fact that physicians allow patients with a potentially fatal disease to remain untreated when effective therapy is available. I assume you feel that the information extracted from observations of this untreated group is worth their sacrifice.

It was not until 1972 that the experiment was discontinued based on an exposé in the New York Times. In 1997, President Bill Clinton, on behalf of the United States, apologized to the surviving participants and their families.

The USPHS was also associated with the syphilis experiments in Guatemala that were funded by National Institutes of Health (NIH). This sad chapter in public health was discovered in 2010 during a review of records associated with the Tuskegee syphilis study. The records revealed that, in Guatemala between 1946 and 1948, research was conducted that involved intentionally infecting more than 1,300 subjects including prisoners, soldiers, and orphaned children with venereal diseases to test the efficacy of penicillin.

More recently, there has been concern about the ethical conduct of research studies on the prevention of mother–child transmission of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) in developing countries. In 1997, Peter Lurie and Sidney Wolf published an article in the New England Journal of Medicine accusing the NIH, World Health Organization (WHO), United Nations (UN), and CDC of ethical violations in these studies.

Modern Public Health

The WHO core public health functions provide an understanding of the role of modern public health.

These core functions include providing early warning for imminent public health emergencies, recording the impact of public health interventions, and explaining the epidemiology of health problems in an effort to improve health policies. Surveillance of public health challenges has led to the identification of human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immune deficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS), type 2 diabetes and obesity epidemics, zoonotic diseases such as severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS), and resistance to antibiotics, which is leading to the reemergence of infectious diseases.

The environmental history of public health is not forgotten in modern public health as reflected in the 10 greatest public health accomplishments of the 20th century identified by the CDC. These include immunization, motor vehicle safety, workplace safety, control of infectious diseases, declines in death from heart disease and stroke, safer and healthier foods, healthier mothers and babies, family planning, fluoridation of drinking water, and tobacco as a health hazard.

Immunization is considered one of the most important successes of modern public health. Since 1900, 21 vaccines have been developed to prevent disease in the general population. Of these, 11 vaccines have been recommended for population-wide use in children. These 11 have resulted in remarkable reductions in morbidity associated with smallpox, polio, measles, congenital rubella syndrome, and Hib (leading cause of childhood meningitis). The polio vaccine in particular reduced the 16,316 paralytic polio cases and 1,879 deaths that occurred between 1951 and 1954 to the elimination of wild-type viruses in the United States by 1991.

American Association of Public Health

Founded in 1872, the American Association of Public Health (APHA) is the professional organization for public health. The organization has 53 state affiliates, 29 sections that represent special interests ranging from health disparities to global climate change, and active relationships with public health organizations in 70 countries, WHO, and the Pan American Health Organization. APHA sponsors an annual conference that attracts approximately 12,000 professionals and more than 1,000 scientific sessions. Themes since 2000 that highlight public health's commitment to diverse populations include Eliminating Health Disparities (2000), Public Health and Human Rights (2006), Public Health Without Borders (2007), Social Justice: A Public Health Imperative (2010), and Prevention and Wellness Across the Life Span (2012). As well, the organization produces one of the premier scholarly journals related to public health (American Journal of Public Health).

Schools and Programs of Public Health

There are approximately 90 accredited schools of public health that belong to the Association of Schools and Programs of Public Health (ASPPH). The two widely offered degrees are master of public health (MPH) and doctor of public health (Dr.PH). Accreditation is granted by the Council on Education for Public Health (CEPH). CEPH is recognized by the U.S. Department of Education and accredits schools of public health and public health programs to assure that the school or program has been evaluated and has met accepted standards established by and with the public health profession.

Federally Qualified Community Health Centers

There are more than 1,200 federally qualified community health centers (FQHCs) in the United States that serve approximately 19 million patients. Typically, FQHCs serve a highly vulnerable group of people, 27 percent of whom are African American, 35 percent are Hispanic or Latino, and 71 percent live at or below the poverty level. FQHCs grew out of President Lyndon Johnson's War on Poverty. The federally qualified designation was created under the Health Centers Consolidation Act of 1996, which merged health care programs for migrant, homeless, and public housing populations. FQHCs are considered an important part of expanding health care under the 2010 Patient Affordable Care Act.

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention

The CDC was established in 1946. It is a federal agency within the Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS) with the goal of promoting public health and safety through the control and prevention of disease, injury, and disability. In particular, the CDC focuses on infectious disease, food-borne illness, environmental hazards to health, occupational safety, and injury prevention.

The CDC played a leadership role in the HIV/AIDS epidemic when few other health care institutions would in the United States because of the disease's initial connection with male homosexuality.

U.S. Public Health Service

The USPHS links its history back to the 1789 Act for the Relief of Sick and Disabled Seamen. It was officially designated in 1944 and is one of seven uniform services in the United States. It is led by the surgeon general and employs more than 6,000 public health professionals from a variety of professional backgrounds including environmental and occupational health, medicine, nursing, dentistry, pharmacy, psychology, social work, hospital administration, health record administration, nutrition, engineering, science, veterinary, health information technology, and other health-related occupations. The mission of the USPHS is to protect, promote, and advance the health and safety of the United States.

Christopher R. Larrison
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

See Also: Health as a Human Right; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Nursing, Public Health; Providers, Institutional Racism and.

Further Readings

Borak, J. "Five Classic Articles in Public Health." Yale Journal of Biology and Medicine, v.83/1 (2010).

Centers for Disease Control (CDC). "Ten Great Public Health Achievements in the 20th Century." http://www.cdc.gov/about/history/tengpha.htm (Accessed January 2014).

Gamble, V. N. "There Wasn't a Lot of Comforts in Those Days." African Americans, Public Health, and the 1918 Influenza Epidemic. Public Health Report, v.125/3 (2010).

Institute of Medicine. The Future of the Public's Health in the Twenty-First Century. Washington, DC: National Academies Press, 2002.

Pernick, M. S. "Eugenics and Public Health in American History." American Journal of Public Health, v.87/11 (1997).

Rosen, G. A History of Public Health. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1993, 1958.

Winslow, C. E. A. "The Untilled Fields of Public Health." Science, New Series, v.51/1306 (1920).

Puerto Ricans

In spite of common values shared by many Hispanics and Latinos (such as Spanish language, the centrality of family, and importance of community), Hispanics and Latinos from diverse regions and countries are not a monolithic culture, and thus, a uniform style of communication does not exist in their cultural spectrum. They often differ across social, political, economic, and symbolic dimensions.

In the case of the Puerto Rican population, as a result of a long historical process of colonialism and massive migrations, they have become what anthropologists, sociodemographers, and migration researchers call a nation on the move, a transnational reality, and a divided nation. According to the 2010 Puerto Rican Diaspora Atlas and the 2010 Pew Research Center's Hispanic Trends Project, "Hispanics of Puerto Rican Origin in the United States" statistical profile report, by 2010, there were approximately 4.6 million people of Puerto Rican origins living in the United States. This group represents about 9.2 percent of the Hispanic population in the United States. In contrast, 3.7 million individuals were living in Puerto Rico, with the United States' population outnumbering Puerto Rico's by nearly 1 million. Both groups manifest a strong sense of cultural identity, different from the American identity, regardless of their ideological, economic, and social differences.

The human services challenges faced by the Puerto Rican community in the United States and Puerto Rico are hardly related to the cultural, symbolic and linguistic communication patterns; their underlying attitudes, values, and belief systems; and socioeconomic, racial, political, and legal conditions. Academic literature on human services oriented toward Puerto Rican clients in the United States suggest that their cultural value system and their expectations for mental health services show that their sociopsychological and cultural orientation to therapy, its use, and expectations are seen as relatively different to that of the typical middle-class American client.

Cultural Identity Traits

Puerto Ricans in the United States and on the island have created eclectic, liminal, or hybrid cultural identity traits, which are manifested in their sociocultural struggles and survivor strategies.

Characteristic of their identity is a constant mode of coping, dealing, and resolving. A strong sense of cultural identity, different from the American identity, unites Puerto Ricans regardless of their ideological, economic, and social differences. The effort to preserve that identity surpasses the limits of political rivalries and the circumstances of socioeconomic migratory movements and demographic transformations.

They have constructed an identity in a social condition in which colonial and countercultural power discourses and practices coexist and are central to their social and cultural transnational contexts. Such identity is rooted in indigenous, African, and Spanish heritage and is often manifested during festivities, which are commonly used as survival strategies to disguise social and material scarcity. Puerto Rican nationalism in the United States displays cultural practices that show that their hybrid identity, including the use of salsa and reggaeton music, and speaking "Spanglish," which is a mixture of Spanish and English languages, as symbolic sociocultural resistance strategies.

Scholars studying Puerto Rican community migration and sociocultural patterns suggest that, in the context of cultural identity traits, Puerto Ricans demonstrate expressiveness to strangers, warmth, and a sense of hospitality in which respect for the family is critical; mothers and elders are venerated, and a strong sense of duty toward the family, including the extended family, is essential. They also show that a one-dimensional manifestation of masculinity expressed as a form of machismo is a critical element of Puerto Rican identity.

Beliefs in the intrinsic merit of humanity may be a protective factor and a source of strength. Individuals may avoid discussing problems that compromise dignity. Dissent may be communicated indirectly (e.g., nod as if in tacit agreement). Elders may not make eye contact, while younger Puerto Ricans and those born in the United States prefer eye contact.

Research on the cultural and moral dimensions of dignity and respect reveal that they are main cultural values that lay emphasis on bonds, mutuality, and faithfulness to family members beyond the limits of the nuclear family. Individuals may place family concerns above individual needs. Individuals may prefer or expect a close relationship once truthful relationships are established. Children and parents may continue a dependent relationship into adulthood. Parents may leave children with grandparents as they establish financial stability in the United States.

A one-dimensional masculinity tendency expressed as a form of machismo acknowledges both negative and positive aspects of culturally sanctioned ideas about masculinity. Privately, decision making tends to be shared by husband and wife, though publicly, men may appear to have the final word. Men may believe strongly in their fiscal and moral duties to their families. They may be judged by their abilities to make sacrifices for their families; they may hesitate to discuss problems that reveal personal weaknesses, perceive a fatalistic acceptance of problems as a courageous attitude, and be vigilant over matters of dignity and respect.

Religion

Caribbean popular religion and spiritualty play an important role as part of the Puerto Rican culture. That type of religiosity and spirituality is rooted in a Roman Catholicism that is dynamically syncretized with religious practice of the indigenous habitants of the Caribbean and the enslaved population of the 16th-century slave trade of black Africans brought to the Americas and the Caribbean Islands. Popular religions and spiritualities play a significant role in the everyday life of Puerto Ricans. Practicing religious rites, praying, keeping religious artifacts, and erecting small home altars are some common religious practices. A more recent emergent Pentecostal faith and spirituality has become a growing manifestation of a popular evangelical religious and spiritual practice between Puerto Ricans of the island and the diaspora.

Puerto Ricans and their diaspora are part of the syncretic or hybrid Caribbean religious and spiritual cultural identity. What is characteristic among this population is a constant mode of coping, dealing, resolving, and surviving, and a shared, constructed identity in a social context in which colonial and countercultural power discourses and practices coexist.

As some Puerto Rican religious studies and social scientists of religions suggest, Caribbean popular religions and spiritualities should be understood as based in a dialectical relationship between the material and spiritual worlds in which one world could affect and shape the other. This understanding provides an alternative style of human-divine relationship, primarily in confrontation with the dominant culture, but is flexible enough to appropriate from that culture the customs and practices that contribute to the nature of healing of diseases and well-being of the community and create a different force for struggle, which sustains at a conscious or unconscious level an attitude of resistance against psychosocial oppression, dysfunctions, and diseases.

Human Services Addressed to Puerto Rican Communities

Academic literature concerning human services aimed toward the Puerto Rican community in the United States and on the island suggests that key cultural Puerto Rican traditions emphasize national identity, collectivism, interdependence, and cooperation. Some manifestation of such customs are the use of their native language when talking about emotional expression to minimize possible defensiveness. These sociocultural behaviors were found to be involved in the differential psychocultural orientation to human health services therapy for Puerto Rican clients.

Other research has found that many of their stressors are related to their traditional roles in the family, role conflicts, marital conflicts, problems associated with raising adolescents rejecting parental values, inexplicable neurological symptoms among adults, and those associated with the acculturation process. The physical symptoms they present are frequently combined with anxiety and depression. Empirical data also show that women are more likely than men to engage as human services clients.

Clinical implications of certain key predicting studies data of child maltreatment among Puerto Rican children from migrant and nonmigrant families suggest that, while rates of child abuse or neglect incidents are similar in both migrant and nonmigrant Puerto Rican families, when compared to general prevalence rates in the United States, predictors of maltreatment, such as poverty, may differ. These data also imply that, given the strong identification with Puerto Rican culture in a highly populated U.S. east coast city, it is recommended that culturally competent prevention and intervention strategies in child maltreatment, such as collaboration with extended family and overcoming language barriers, should be considered in the process of providing human services to those clients.

Most Latino human services studies indicate that this ethnic group expects therapy to be directive and actually prefers family or group therapy. They also suggest that Puerto Ricans often underutilize mental health services and express pain through somatic symptoms. They turn to their families in their neighborhoods for support. Key ethnographic and theoretical research noted that Puerto Ricans may equally seek help from a physician or a religious and spiritual healer.

Héctor E. López-Sierra
Inter American University of Puerto Rico

See Also: Acculturation; Mental Health Services, Adult; Spirituality/Religion and Diversity.

Further Readings

Acosta, Belen E., and C. E. Santiago. Puerto Ricans in the United States: A Contemporary Portrait. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2006.

Alegría, M., et al. "Inequalities in Use of Specialty Mental Health Services Among Latino, African Americans, and Non-Latino Whites." Psychiatric Services, v.53 (2002).

Andrés-Hyman, R. C., J. Ortiz, L. M. Añez, M. Paris, and L. Davidson. "Culture and Clinical Practice: Recommendations for Working With Puerto Ricans and Other Latinas(os) in the United States." American Psychological Association, v.37/6 (2006).

Díaz, H. L., and T. D. Watts. Alcohol Abuse and Acculturation Among Puerto Ricans in the United States: A Sociological Study (Interdisciplinary Studies in Alcohol Use and Abuse). Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 2005.

Duany, J. "Nation, Migration, Identity: The Case of Puerto Ricans." Latino Studies, v.1 (2003).

López, I., R. Ramirez, P. Guarnaccia, G. Canino, and H. Bird. "Ataques de Nervios and Somatic Complaints Among Island and Mainland Puerto Rican Children." Neuroscience and Therapeutics, v.1/9 (2010).

Motel, S., and E. Patten. "Hispanics of Puerto Rican Origin in the United States, 2010." Pew Research Center's Hispanic Trends Project. Philadelphia: Pew Charitable Trusts. http://www.pewhispanic

.org/files/2013/06/PuertoRicanFactsheet.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Rivera, R. Z., W. Marshall, and D. Pacini-Hernéndez. Reggaeton. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2009.

Rodriguez Ayuso, I. R., K. Geerman Santana, and M. Marazzi Santiago, eds. Puerto Rican Diaspora Atlas 2010. San Juan, Puerto Rico. http://www.estadisticas.gobierno.pr (Accessed December 2013).

Rodríguez Sánchez, J. "Protecting the Self and Resisting Grandiose Narcissistic Self Objects: A Mainline Protestant Latino/a Clergy Self-Psychology Hermeneutics of Pastoral Care." Unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary, Evanston, Illinois (2003).

Sledjeski, E. M., L. C. Dierker, H. R. Bird, and G. Canino. "Predicting Child Maltreatment Among Puerto Rican Children From Migrant and Non-Migrant Families." Child Abuse Neglect, v.6 (2009).

Q

Quality of Life, Measurement of

Quality of life is a general term used by health care providers and researchers to refer to satisfaction with everyday life. Although definitions of quality of life vary, they generally involve physical, psychological, and social factors that affect individuals' life satisfaction. Additionally, the concept of quality of life has been applied to different realms of study, and a diverse collection of terminology has been established in the examination of quality of life. Researchers have estimated that there are more than 100 definitions of quality of life in the literature and more than 1,000 assessments of quality of life currently being employed. Quality of life is important to study because it can be informative about how an individual perceives his or her own level of satisfaction. Measurement of quality of life can vary greatly, and different ways of measuring can provide different insights regarding factors affecting an individuals' life satisfaction.

Definitions of Quality of Life

With more than 100 different definitions of quality of life in the literature, the conceptualization of it varies by discipline. For example, psychologists are often concerned with psychological and social factors affecting quality of life, while doctors and nurses tend to place heavy emphasis on physical factors affecting quality of life. However, most definitions of quality of life involve a blend of how to assess physical, psychological, and social factors in order to discover what provides the most informative view of an individual. Some researchers have posited that quality of life is synonymous with an individual's happiness, while others argue that the scope of quality of life delves deeper than happiness level.

A common conceptualization of quality of life is health-related quality of life. Health-related quality of life focuses on how physical (and sometimes mental) factors specifically relate to the health outcomes of an individual. Health outcomes can include physical illness (e.g., heart disease, diabetes, or obesity) or mental illness (e.g., depression or anxiety). Health-related quality of life can also be fine-tuned to examine a group of people with a specific illness or disorder. The definition and assessment of specific populations involves defining health-related quality of life by identifying factors that may be especially important to that population of individuals. For example, there are definitions and assessments of quality of life for individuals who have had a stroke, individuals with multiple sclerosis, and individuals with diabetes. These and other specific individuals by default have different factors affecting quality of life because of their conditions.

Measuring Quality of Life

Despite the multitude of means through which quality of life can be measured, there are several assessments that have been validated and are used throughout the world. For example, the World Health Organization's quality of life scale assesses three categories of an individual's subjective quality of life: general functioning, global functioning, and personal evaluations. General functioning inquiries include straightforward questions about sleep, eating, and other health behaviors. Global functioning questions assess characteristics of health behaviors described in the general functioning questions such as quality of diet or sleep. Personal evaluations tap into the individual's perception of factors affecting his or her quality of life such as satisfaction.

Another popular way to measure quality of life is through the Medical Outcomes Study Short Forms (SF-12 and SF-36). These 12- and 36-question measures rely on a five-point rating scale that individuals use to endorse factors affecting quality of life. Individuals are asked to think about their experiences in the past one to four weeks and answer the questions in these assessments. For example, questions regarding physical or psychological problems may require an individual to rate the degree to which relationships were affected by the problems. Many other measurements of quality of life assess varying factors such as quality of social networks, overall mood, financial and career factors, and community-level functioning as it relates to the individual's life satisfaction.

Measuring Quality of Life in Diverse Populations

Quality of life can vary greatly from person to person, and specialized quality of life measures have been created to investigate experiences of specific groups of individuals. Age group can be a significant factor that affects quality of life. Quality of life scales have been established for infants and toddlers and can assess factors such as how income level, ethnic minority status, and temperament can affect quality of life in very young children. While the caregiver of the child answers the questions in this type of assessment, one can imagine how the life satisfaction of an infant would be measured differently from that of an adult. Similarly, some quality of life measures assess life satisfaction in adolescents. This particular age group is well studied in the quality of life literature, as biological and social changes during adolescence can often have a profound effect on quality of life. Measures targeting college students often include specific questions that are pertinent to college life and could affect life satisfaction such as sleep patterns of the individual, diet, activity level, and academic stress. Quality of life measures aimed at older adults are also plentiful, as this age group experiences health and social issues that are very unique due to physical and cognitive aging.

For persons of ethnic or sexual minority status, some scales may be more effective than others at examining issues pertinent to these groups of individuals. Because much attention has been placed on how being gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgender can affect the social and emotional status of individuals, a scale in which measurement emphasis is placed on relationships, social support, endorsement of depression or anxiety, or self-esteem level may be the best fit.

Additionally, health or social disparities among people of ethnic minority status may be investigated best through measures that focus on those factors. For example, African American individuals have been shown to have a greater risk for coronary heart disease compared to Caucasian individuals, which is a major factor in health-related quality of life. Specialized measures have been created to target these types of phenomena.

Rachel H. Messer
Oklahoma State University

See Also: Economic Support and Services; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Life Skills Training; Nutritional Services and Assessment; Overweight and Obese Adults and Children; Pharmaceuticals, Access to; Poverty; Prenatal Care; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment; Public Health; Racism, Self-Assessment of; Social Determinants of Health; Wraparound Services/Systems of Care; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Barofsky, I. "Can Quality or Quality-of-Life Be Defined?" Quality of Life Research, v.21 (2012).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). Measuring Healthy Days. Atlanta: CDC, 2000.

Guyatt, G. H., D. H. Feeny, and D. L. Patrick. "Measuring Health-Related Quality of Life." Annals of Internal Medicine, v.118 (1993).

Testa, M. A., and J. F. Nackley. "Methods for Quality-of-Life Studies." Annual Review of Public Health, v.15 (1994).

The WHOQOL Group. "The World Health Organization Quality of Life Assessment (WHOQOL): Position Paper from the World Health Organization." Social Science and Medicine, v.41/10 (1985).

R

Race, Social Definitions of

The notion that the diversity of the human race can be reliably subdivided into a small number of uniform groups is an invention of the Enlightenment. From its origin as a justification for slavery, the notion that biology has causative effect on an individual's interests, aptitudes, and potential had a long legacy that persisted until the middle of the 1950s. The slow growth of scientific racism from the assertion that races were variations of a single human species through the notion that human races were, in fact, separate species demonstrates the various social purposes that the race concept has been put throughout its history. Nevertheless, an increasing scientific consensus developed in the 20th century that showed there is no reliable way to draw distinct lines among human races. Today, one is inclined to assert that race is a social concept, by which one means that race is defined to serve social purposes. This is by no means to trivialize the concept of race. Race has important political uses, such as seen in the civil rights movement. Furthermore, to assert that race is not a valid biological category is not the same as saying that racism does not exist; to the contrary, the fact that biology is not the source of human differences suggests that racism is all the more pernicious. Overall, the history of scientific definitions of race demonstrates how conceptions of race are more likely to be tied to social imperatives than they are to scientific fact.

Rise and Fall of the Biological Definition of Race

Historians suggest that it was not until the modern era, in the period known as the Enlightenment, that the rigid notion of distinct racial groups took form. Although one sees the word race in classical Greek texts, for instance, the word that is in the original text has a meaning more like kin, group, or type. Each region was thought to have its own type of population, and there was no thought of dividing the entirety of the human species into a limited number of biological groups with distinct boundaries between them.

Collectively, a group of European natural historians built on each other's work to craft the idea that large swaths of the human population were alike in their aptitudes and attitudes and could be distinguished by superficial characteristics like skin color and hair type. One of the first was François Bernier, writing in 1684, who proposed to divide the human species into four broad types, each distinguished by their facial features and the area of the world in which they lived. The idea that each corner of the known world would excite a different humor in the human body led Carl Linnaeus to distinguish four types of humans in the 18th century: Homo americanus (regulated by custom), Homo europaeus (regulated by law), Homo asiaticus (regulated by opinion), and Homo afer (regulated by caprice).

Johann Blumenbach was the first to use the term Caucasian, a term he assigned to a small group from the Caucasus Mountains in modern-day Georgia, and suggested that, in the climate of the border region between Europe and Asia, the most beautiful women were found. Blumenbach distinguished four other races—Malay, Ethiopian, [native] American, and Mongolian—and suggested, like Bernier, that each was a degeneration of the ideal type due to environment. Blumenbach, like Bernier and Linnaeus before him, argued for the unity of the human species. "I have desired nothing so much as that the arguments which I have brought forward for the unity of the human species," he writes in 1775. "Innumerable varieties of mankind run into one another by insensible degrees." These authors might be termed monogenists due to their belief that there is only one human species.

An undercurrent of opinion that there might, in fact, be more than one human species had been simmering since the exploration of the New World. One of the first to articulate this position in the context of the age of exploration was Theophrastus Paracelsus in 1520, who asserted that the presence of humans on remote islands and continents could never have been the progeny of Adam and Eve. Paracelsus's opinion was that they were born after the Biblical flood, and not being descended from Adam and Eve, they had no souls. This theory was considered variously and, in 1655, this group was given the name pre-Adamites by Isaac Peyrere in his book Prae-Adamitae.

The monogenists, who focused on the environmental influences on the human body, differed from those who espoused the pre-Adamite position of multiple human species. Historians like Siep Stuurman and Londa Schiebinger, however, point out that both groups were similar in result: Their work was used to support the claim that some humans were natural born slaves. With their assertion that there was something physically different in the bodies of people of color, and that this difference influenced their capacities and interests, one could go so far as to say that slavery was beneficial to the enslaved because it would help the victims quell their supposed savage tendencies, giving them the opportunity to better experience reason and the love of God.

Nineteenth-century notions of evolution were enlisted to support the notion that the separate human species were in fact distinct races. Stephen Jay Gould, in his well-known study The Mismeasure of Man, has detailed the founding of this American school of anthropology based on contradictory measurements of individual skulls. In antebellum America, the notion that there were distinct human species, each with its own evolutionary inheritance that led to separate aptitudes and capacities, was an important part of the argument to support slavery as well as to prevent the mixing of the races.

At the end of the 19th century, it was argued that each race, whether it had originated separately or from a common stock, had through successive generations added on features that suited its climate. The minute changes built up over millennia to such an extent that the different races had diverged into separate strands of humanity. The concern over miscegenation, or the mixing of the races, was based on the belief that combining the races would be a disservice to the offspring. Mixing the attributes necessary for survival in a tribal society with the traits needed in a society of law, for instance, was thought to produce an individual who was suited for neither society. The individual would have, it was supposed, the passions necessary for survival in barbarism but none of the idealism needed to submit to the law. Or, perhaps, the individual would have the dexterity needed in a machine age but find him- or herself in an environment when brute force was necessary for survival. This belief in the power of racial physiology led the states to establish antimiscegenation laws in order to prevent what was believed to be an inappropriate mixture of human races that would result in a generation that would become a burden to the states.

This belief in biological determinism saw its high watermark in the United States with the American eugenics movement, led by Charles Davenport. He and his followers attempted to incorporate the work of Gregor Mendel to make a science out of the theory that one's ancestors had an influence on one's abilities. Taking a cue from the British anthropologist who coined the word eugenics, Francis Galton, American eugenicists proposed that the tendency of a generation to revert to the range of traits seen in the previous generation, even if only a certain type of parent were allowed to breed, meant that there was a racial type that guided the development of an individual. If one selected offspring only from tall bean plants, for instance, the next generation would nevertheless show the range of heights found in its parents' generation. American eugenics thus supported legislation to keep the races apart and, to ensure that no unwanted mixes would be born, mandated sterilization for individuals it saw as problematic.

The eugenics movement was successful in its agenda as evidenced by the number of states that established laws allowing court-enforced medical sterilization at the start of the 20th century. In addition, Davenport and his colleagues were instrumental in the Immigration Act of 1924, which took a race-based approach to limiting the number of people who could immigrate to the United States based on the relative proportion of nationalities in the country in 1890. This approach, eugenics proponents believed, would help keep the racial influence of immigrants on the overall population. Outside the United States, eugenics was felt in Adolf Hitler's policies, which were based on the research of U.S. practitioners. The Nazi party sought to encourage mating between individuals it saw as providing a positive influence on Germany's racial mix (so-called positive eugenics) and eliminate the progeny of those whose status as a separate, degenerate race could never improve the population through sterilization and murder (negative eugenics).

Development of the Culture Concept

Until the 1920s, it is difficult to find scientists who promoted anything but a biologically determinist viewpoint in their work. Coincident with the development of American eugenics and the German final solution, however, was the work of scientists who sought to undermine the biological determinism of the 19th century. One of the most prominent of these was Franz Boas, an American anthropologist who is most famous for inspiring his students to promote the idea of cultural relativism. What is sometimes less appreciated, however, was the way in which Boas made a systematic investigation of scientific racism in order to overturn the racial ideology of his time.

Some of Boas's earliest published work included reviews of books in the field of physical anthropology, which at the time was concerned with the use of measurement to quantify the differences between human species. Also, in The Mind of Primitive Man and other works, Boas sought to support the idea that one culture was not necessarily better than another. The keystone to the scientific racism of the 19th century was the idea that human races passed through successive stages from savagery through barbarism into civilization, each with their antecedent biological changes that allowed the individuals of a society to progress to the next level. For Boas, the idea of culture was transcendent, and so his work sought to demonstrate the powerful way that all humans were cultural creatures.

In addition to his promotion of the culture concept, Boas engaged in important analytical work to disrupt the notion that the different races were distinct biological categories. As early as 1871, Charles Darwin's Descent of Man had disputed the notion that mixing races caused infertile and weakened offspring in the same way that donkeys and horses—two distinct species—could produce infertile offspring. Based on this analogy to the natural world, proponents of polygenism had asserted that mixing different races of humans would result in a defective progeny. In order to test this proposition, Boas made a statistical study of mixed-race individuals to determine whether they were weakened and infertile. By looking at the children of Europeans and native Americans, Boas came to the startling conclusion that mixed-race individuals were as vigorous as their supposedly pure-race parents but also that they were even more fertile than the earlier generation. This work, first published in 1894, was one of the first blows against the racialized notions of the 19th century.

Another figure who is worth remembering for his insistence that culture, and not biology, accounted largely for the differences between human aspirations and aptitudes was W. E. B. Du Bois. His sociological study The Philadelphia Negro, first published in 1899, sought to determine that it was not biological differences that were to blame for the higher incidence of crime and poverty among the black population. In fact, his study was careful to show that the crime was correlated with poverty and the incidence of crime was not uniformly distributed throughout the black population. In order to account for the presumption that the black population was riddled with crime and, contrawise, that the white population was prejudiced against the blacks, Du Bois made the interesting observation that the higher classes of blacks were segregated from the higher classes of the whites so that the upper classes of the black population were confronted by the lower classes of whites and the upper class white population was in closer proximity to the lower-class blacks. Thus, a situation that seemed uniform was in fact an accident of cultural attitudes.

Du Bois went on to popularize the notions of the talented 10th and the submerged 10ths. In this statistical argument, Du Bois proposed that the way to uplift the black population was to address the highest and lowest 10 percent of the race. The highest group, the most talented, he suggested needed to be enriched through education so that they could become the race leaders, doctors, lawyers, and professors for the next generation. The lowest 10th, he believed, was in need of uplift so that they would not inflict the rest of the population through the ills caused by their poverty. Although this notion is rightfully thought of as elitist today—certainly few would believe that only the top 10 percent of a population is in need of uplift—it is the cultural notion of this program that is notable. Du Bois did not assert that black people were biologically destined to certain abilities and circumstances, and to the contrary, he sought a social program that would use learning and the arts (i.e., culture) to transform the material circumstances of the race.

In addition to literary writers, like Charles W. Chesnutt, it was social scientists like Boas and Du Bois who were the first to convincingly argue that it was culture, and not biology, that accounted for human difference. By 1920, there were a number of eugenicists who began to seek a more nuanced approach to race that reduced the primacy of racial difference. Julian Huxley is a famous example of an individual who started from a racist eugenic outlook in the 1910s but became interested in the diversity of the black "species" in the 1930s, suggesting that there was much variability in the so-called black race as there was among humans at large. This insight led naturally to the conclusion that scientific definitions of a limited and uniform race were motivated by something other than direct observation.

The movement away from racism was aided by what today is known as the modern synthesis, the scientific movement that found support for Darwin's theory of evolution by an interdisciplinary study of human development. Drawing together strands of insight from embryology, endocrinology, Mendelian population genetics, and other fields, scientists were beginning to imagine the way in which Darwin was correct: All life comes from preexisting forms of life, and human beings are not all that different from each other. Whereas scientific racists had asserted that humans recapitulated all of evolution in their development, with people of color and women being left at an earlier stage and white men proceeding through additional stages that resulted in their supposedly superior physiology, after the great synthesis, it became clearer that human beings were made largely from the same material and that superficial differences, such as skin color or the ability to grow a beard, were induced by hormones and not connected to other individual traits.

W. E. B. Du Bois published a sociological study in 1899 that sought to determine that biological differences due to race were not the cause of higher incidences of crime and poverty among the black population.

Theodosius Dobzhansky, one of the population geneticists who was part of the modern synthesis, sought to explain why the 19th-century notion of a race as a distinct group with a clear biological boundary was incompatible with modern knowledge about genetic inheritance. The habit of the 19th century, Dobzhansky writes in 1941, is to think of a particular group as having an average of certain characteristics such as height or weight. However, this convenient fiction is unhelpful when it comes to understanding the mechanism of human variation. Just as Mendel had asserted in the earlier century, Dobzhansky reminds his readers that there is no such thing as a gradual diffusion of traits; it is not as if a child is the average of its mother and father's traits. Traits are not inherited in diffuse particles so that characteristics do not mingle like dye in water. If this were true, then certainly breeding groups would quickly form into uniform races. It is the case, however, that many individuals hold characteristics that are markers of a different race.

Taking this idea further, Dobzhansky reminds his readers that one group may be distinguished from another based on the presence of a particular trait. The task of forming those distinct groups into races, however, is complicated by a number of factors. One is that not all traits are acted upon by natural selection, meaning that an individual contains some traits that have given its group an advantage in an environment, yet there are others that are neutral with regard to natural selection. In this way, it is possible to find similar traits in organisms even over wide geographic areas. He concludes his investigation that the notion of a pure race "is not even a legitimate abstraction," and he goes on to state that the notion of a pure race "is a subterfuge used to cloak one's ignorance of the phenomenon or racial variation."

Insights from the evolutionary synthesis like Dobzhansky's lie behind the 1950 and 1951 United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) statements on race. In their effort, a group of scientists assert that the mental capacities of all humans are similar, there is no biological deterioration from hybridity, and there is no correlation between national or religious groups and race. This reversal of attitudes that were so prevalent in the 1920s is remarkable, but in 1950, there was a considerable support for the idea that reducing human cultural differences to a matter of biology was suspect. Indeed, the scientists asserted that all normal human beings can learn to share in modern life and respect social contracts, and those biological differences that do exist do not have any relevance to social and political organization, morality, or communication.

In the UNESCO statement, scientists asserted an early finding of the growing sentiment against the clear delineations of biological race: When considered as groups, human races did not vary from each other in any remarkable fashion. Each individual in a purported race shares many characteristics with its fellows, but at the same time, due to the independence of inherited characteristics, each individual does not have all of the markers one would consider to be part of the race. What is more, statistical analyses could be used to demonstrate that the degree of difference among the races as a whole was less than the variation among individuals within a purported race. In other words, the variability of the biology of individuals of the same races was higher than between their racial group and another. One of the early proponents of this principle was William C. Boyd, whose work on the nonuniform distribution of blood factors dispelled the notion that people of different races literally had different blood.

Elaborating the Social Definition of Race

The statement that there is no reliable biological definition of race and the failure of the project to limit the diversity of humanity into four or five distinct groups that were akin to species having been established at mid-century had the perhaps unexpected consequence of calling attention to racial disparities. If there is no reliable way to distinguish races by means of their biology, then why is it that there are racial distinctions in health, education, and economics? The removal of the biological underpinning of race thus called attention that there were social and historical, and not physiological, causes of racial differences. Indeed, given that there were no longer biological excuses, differences in achievement and ability among the races were soon seen as more insidious. Race was no longer a reliable concept, so paying attention to racism seemed increasingly important.

One of the first works to appear after the UNESCO statement that elaborated the social construction of race was Frantz Fanon's Black Skin, White Masks (published in 1952 as Peau noire, masques blancs). His biography of moving from Martinique to France to study medicine provided the groundwork for his study: How can a young person of color be expected to perform well in school when all of a culture's resources are marshaled to signal that blackness is bad and whiteness is good? It is not surprising, he suggests, that students who are quite serious in a black-only environment lose their sense of purpose in a mixed environment. In his 1967 The Wretched of the Earth, Fanon goes farther to explore how intrinsic notions of race are a necessary corollary of colonialism. In this way, the definitions of human races are shown to be constructions that solve certain social problems rather than neutral descriptions of scientific fact.

Following on this work, Michael Banton began a series of publications, beginning with his 1968 Race Relations, that sought to elaborate the contingent nature of definitions of race. In other ways, Banton's work shows how there are many different ways in which concepts of race are used to divide populations, and so the particular way in which a society chooses to make claims about race tells us about the expectations of the society as a whole. His cross-cultural approach served to illuminate the ways that definitions of race serve social purposes rather than being descriptive arguments about biological facts.

The evidence for the shifting sand in the history of the race concept was studied extensively by Martin Bernal in his three-volume Black Athena, published in 1987. This controversial work has inspired several follow-up volumes, but its central thesis is unavoidable: There was a time in antiquity that African societies were seen as the wellsprings of civilization, and classical Latin and ancient Greek authors alike made direct allusion to the esteem in which they held schools and philosophers from the continent. In spite of the many direct assertions of this fact among Greeks and Romans, there was an increasing pressure in the modern period to review this assertion. Certainly, the geographical system asserted by Linnaeus and his contemporaries would have difficulty with the notion that Africa was the source of human civilization, and Bernal demonstrates how new theories of how Greece gained prominence were developed that suggested invaders from the north—what would be asserted were the Aryans in Europe—were what caused Greece to develop civilization. At the same time, the importance of African and Asian civilizations were downplayed so much that, by the 19th century, their reputation had fallen. Bernal's study demonstrates clearly how ideas of race influence even the acceptance of information of the humanities and, in turn, how findings from the humanities were used to support notions of racial hierarchy.

The notion of racial identities being shaped by social imperatives drew significant attention in the 1990s. Noel Ignatiev's 1995 How the Irish Became White tells the story of how the once-despised immigrant group rose in the ranks of racial hierarchy. In 1996, Ian Haney Lopez's White by Law demonstrates how arguments about who qualified for protection under the nation's immigration and naturalization statutes shaped U.S. conceptions of racial difference. Matthew Frye Jacobson's 1999 Whiteness of a Different Color shows how the various strands of European stock at the end of the 19th century—strands that were thought of needing to be kept separate by the American eugenicists—came together at midcentury under the banner of Caucasian as a means to maintain political power.

With the decoding of the human genome, the project's head scientist Craig Venter asserted that race was proved to be an invalid concept. Nevertheless, in the genomic age, race seems to be returning as a biological concept. Ann Morning's research into depictions of essentialist and constructivist notions of race, published in her 2011 The Nature of Race, shows why it is important to detail the process of racialization. In the United States, some students and professors assert that science has overwhelmingly rejected a biological concept of race, and yet others believe that tidy categories of biological race have been largely retained. Her explanation for the resurgence of the essentialized notion of race is notable. Her argument is that it is a reaction to the seeming failure of social programs to make meaningful progress for racial differences. While one could conclude that the lack of progress in alleviating the racial disparities in health, income, and educational achievement is evidence of the strong cultural and structural supports of racism, this answer is unsavory given the many years of effort to change this view. It would seem, Morning suggests, that it is easier to disregard the notion of social constructivism and blame an individual's biology, which cannot be changed, rather than examine the political and economic structures that could be changed with difficulty.

Christopher Leslie
Polytechnic Institute of New York University

See Also: Racial and Ethnic Categories, U.S. Census; Racial Identity Development, Models of; Racial Microaggression; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; Racism, Self-Assessment of.

Further Readings

Barkan, Elazar. The Retreat of Scientific Racism: Changing Concepts of Race in Britain and the United States Between the World Wars. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Gould, Stephen Jay. The Mismeasure of Man. New York: W. W. Norton, 1981.

Roberts, Dorothy. Fatal Invention: How Science, Politics and Big Business Re-Create Race in the Twenty-First Century. New York: The New Press, 2011.

Schiebinger, Londa. Nature's Body: Gender in the Making of Modern Science. Boston, MA: Beacon Press, 1993.

Stuurman, Siep. "François Bernier and the Invention of Racial Classification." History Workshop Journal, v.50 (2000).

Race and Clients

Race in the United States has traditionally been seen as an issue involving blacks and whites, but in the 21st century, Americans have been forced to realize that race is more complex than earlier generations realized. The Hispanic population increased to 50.5 million in the first decade of the century, 16.3 percent of the total U.S. population. Approximately 16.6 million Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders, representing over 30 countries, reside in the United States, about 5.4 percent of the population. Experts predict that number will reach 40 million by 2050. Although American Indians and Alaska Natives make up less than 2 percent of the total population, this group grew at almost triple the overall population increase between 2000 and 2010. Additionally, those who identify as more than one race grew dramatically during the same period. Those identifying as white and black or African American increased by 134 percent, and those identifying as both white and Asian increased by 87 percent in the same period.

All of these groups are represented in the client base of human services. Despite advances in civil rights and ethical guidelines of the human service professions that expressly forbid discrimination on the basis of race or ethnicity, personal, institutional, and systemic racism affects human services at all levels. Decades of research have shown that racial minorities in the United States are more likely than non-Hispanic whites to have limited access to employment, educational opportunities, and health services. The same groups are disproportionally represented among Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program and Temporary Assistance to Needy Families clients and on the rolls of the incarcerated. Human service professionals have stressed "cultural competence" as a means of serving such a diverse population, but proponents add that cultural competence requires informed action as well as greater sensitivity.

Poverty, Race, and Human Sevices

According to the 2007–2011 American Community Survey, 14.3 percent of the U.S. population (42.7 million people) had incomes below the poverty level. American Indians and Alaska Natives had the highest poverty rates (27.0 percent), with the rate for African Americans only slightly lower (25.8 percent). Among Hispanics, national poverty rates ranged from a low of 16.2 percent for Cubans to a high of 26.3 percent for Dominicans. Native Hawai'ians and Other Pacific Islanders also had a high rate at 17.6 percent. Among the Asian population, rates were highest for Vietnamese (14.7 percent) and Koreans (15.0 percent). The rate for non-Hispanic whites was 11.6 percent. One of every three African American children and one of every four Latino children live in poverty—two times higher than the rate for white children.

Given the color of poverty in the United States, it seems only logical that minorities would account for the majority of clients served by human services. However, research reveals that residents of a predominately black or Hispanic neighborhood have access to roughly half as many social services as those in predominately white neighborhoods. Individuals in high-poverty neighborhoods are the least likely to have access to food pantries, child care, transportation, job training, substance abuse treatment, and other services, which are more likely to be located in low-poverty communities and is predominantly white areas. Ninety-three percent of poor families do not use all the resources available to them. Twenty-five percent of the working poor receive no benefits even though they are eligible for them. Only 7 percent of the working poor access all of the four major supports: tax credits, Medicaid, food stamps, and child care subsidies.

Regardless of such statistics, most Americans think of human services primarily as benefits for poor people who are not white. The very word welfare is racially charged in the United States. Although, according to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, in 2009 recipients of what is informally known as welfare were 31.2 percent white, 33.3 percent black, and 28.8 percent Hispanic, the popular image of those on welfare rolls is an African American mother with several children. This image prevailed in 1996 when Congress passed the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Act, which changed the program that had been known as Aid to Families with Dependent Children to Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF), with a five-year lifetime limit on cash benefits and a requirement that recipients be working or in a job-training program. States with denser populations of African Americans and Hispanics were more likely to impose lifetime limits, family caps on benefits, and stricter sanctions for noncompliance.

With the money allocated to states in block grants, each state decided which clients it would serve and to what degree. The number of people on welfare rolls immediately began to decline. In 1996, 4.4 million families received welfare; in 2008, only 1.6 million did. Eligibility standards and benefits ranged widely. In 2011, benefits ranged from a low of $170 a month for a single-parent family of three in Mississippi to a high of $753 for the same family living in New York. On the national level, TANF funding has been set at $16.6 billion since 1996, with no adjustment for inflation.

The Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP), formerly known as the Food Stamp Program, is another component of the national safety net for the poor that has inspired political debate with racial subtexts. The implication is that such assistance overwhelmingly goes to racial minorities, which in popular imagination includes undocumented immigrants, and that abuse of the program is rampant.

In reality, SNAP eligibility is limited to households with gross income of no more than 130 percent of the federal poverty guideline, and 83 percent of SNAP households have gross income at or below 100 percent of the poverty guideline ($19,530 for a family of three in 2013). A majority of families receiving SNAP have gross income at or below 75 percent of the poverty guideline ($14,648 for a family of three in 2013). Although SNAP recipients are no longer required to identify themselves by race, and 20 percent do not, among those who chose to indicate race in 2010, 34 percent were white, 22 percent were African American, 16 percent were Hispanic, 3 percent were Asian, and 4 percent were Native American.

The average SNAP household has a net monthly income of $338 after the standard deduction. Children, the elderly, and the disabled are the most frequent SNAP beneficiaries. Households that include one or more people from these groups make up 76 percent of SNAP households, and these households receive 83 percent of all SNAP benefits. Undocumented immigrants are not (and never have been) eligible for SNAP benefits, and documented immigrants, with few exceptions, are eligible only after five years of residency in the United States. Fraud has actually decreased since the 1990s, when the rate was about 4 percent to about one cent of each SNAP dollar between 2006 and 2008.

The Criminal Justice System and Racial Disparities

People of color make up approximately 30 percent of the U.S. population, but they account for 60 percent of those incarcerated in U.S. prisons. One in 15 African American men and one in 36 Hispanic men are incarcerated, compared to one in 106 non-Hispanic white men. The U.S. Department of Justice projects that if current trends continue, one out of every three black males born in 2010, as well as one out of every six Latino males, will go to prison at some point during his life.

Although women generally constitute a small percentage of the prison population, disparities exist in this group as well. African American women are three times more likely than white women to be jailed, and Hispanic women are 69 percent more likely than white women to receive a prison sentence. One of every 100 African American women who is 35 to 39 years old is in prison or jail, compared with one in 358 white women of the same age group.

Both males and females of color are more likely to be arrested on drug charges than are whites, although, according to Human Rights Watch, they are no more likely to use or sell illegal drugs. In nearly three decades of the War on Drugs, one in three of the 25.4 million adults arrested for drugs was African American. Disparities persist at every level of the system. The Department of Justice reports that African Americans and Hispanics were approximately three times more likely to be searched during a traffic stop than white motorists, and African Americans were twice as likely to be arrested and almost four times as likely to experience the use of force during encounters with the police.

The longer sentences meted out to racial minorities are reflected in the harsher punishments given to students of color for infractions of school rules. Such infractions often lead to incarceration as well. Black and Hispanic students represent more than 70 percent of those involved in school-related arrests or referrals to law enforcement. African Americans make up 40 percent and Hispanics 20 percent of youths who receive prison sentences. The Sentencing Project, a nonprofit organization that advocates for a fair and effective criminal justice system, reports that even though African Americans account for about 16 percent of the youthful offenders, 37 percent of their cases are moved to criminal court and 58 percent of African American youth are sent to adult prisons.

The collateral consequences of a felony conviction include bans on entering certain occupations, voting, serving on juries, and receiving federal college loans and grants. While these bans apply across racial lines, racial disparities exaggerate their effects. Eleven states deny the right to vote to more than 10 percent of their African American population on the ground of felony conviction. Race is a factor for those released from prison who apply for jobs. One study found that employers were not only twice as likely to hire a white applicant as an equally qualified black applicant for an entry-level position, but they were also just as likely to hire a white person recently released from prison as a black applicant with no criminal history. Following release from prison, former black inmates found their wages grew at a 21 percent slower rate than that of white ex-convicts. Some states have bans on people with certain convictions working in domestic health service industries such as nursing, child care, and home health care—areas in which women of color are disproportionately concentrated.

Racial Disparities in Health Services

Despite the medical advances and ever-evolving technologies that have led to an average life expectancy of 78.8 years in 2010, health disparities in access, quality of service, and outcomes persist among races in the United States. Such differences are connected to the social, economic, and environmental disadvantages of racial minorities, with a broad range of factors including poverty, employment, neighborhood violence, community disorganization, underperforming schools, trauma, racism, discrimination, social isolation, and acculturation stress playing a role. Consequently, individuals from racial minorities are more likely than the non-Hispanic white majority to die as infants, have higher rates of diseases and disabilities, and have shorter life spans. A 2009 report, "Economic Burden of Health Inequalities in the United States," commissioned by the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, placed the three-year costs of health inequalities and premature death in the United States at $1.24 trillion.

Infant mortality rates, generally considered to be sensitive indicators of a group's health status, reveal the disparities that characterize the health system. African Americans have 2.3 times the infant mortality rate of non-Hispanic whites. They are almost four times as likely to die as infants due to complications related to low birth weight than are non-Hispanic white infants. American Indian/Alaska Natives have 1.6 times the infant mortality rate of non-Hispanic whites, and American Indian/Alaska Native babies are 2.2 times as likely as non-Hispanic white babies to die from sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS).

Among Hispanic Americans, the infant mortality rate ranges from 4.5 per 1,000 live births for Central and South Americans to 7.2 per 1,000 live births for Puerto Ricans. Puerto Rican Americans have a 40 percent higher infant mortality rate than non-Hispanic whites. Although the infant mortality rate among Asian/Pacific Islanders is lower than for other racial minorities, the rate is twice as great for mothers under 20 years old as for those 25 to 29 years old. SIDS is a leading cause of infant mortality in this group. Most racial-minority mothers are also more likely than non-Hispanic white mothers to begin prenatal care in the third trimester or not receive prenatal care at all.

Similar disparities are evident in diseases that affect the quality of life and longevity. The rate of diabetes among African Americans is more than three times that of non-Hispanic whites, and the rate for the same disease among Native Americans is more than twice that of whites. The Pima tribe of Arizona has one of the highest rates of diabetes in the world. The incidence of end-stage renal disease, a known complication of diabetes, is higher among American Indians and Alaska Natives than for both whites and African Americans.

Hispanics are twice as likely as non-Hispanic whites to die from diabetes. African Americans suffer from heart disease at a rate 40 percent higher than that of whites, and the rate for prostate cancer is more than double that of whites. Although American Indians and Alaska Natives are less likely to die from cancer and heart disease, they are five times more likely to die of alcohol-related causes than are whites. Hispanics exceed whites in rates of high blood pressure and obesity. Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders have lower death rates attributable to cancer and heart disease than other minority groups, but Native Hawai‘ian men have higher rates of lung cancer than white men do, and the incidence of cervical cancer among Vietnamese women in the United States is more than five times greater than that among white women.

According to some sources, mental disorders in the United States rank second only to cardiovascular disease in their impact on disability. Minorities are overrepresented among the high-need groups, such as the homeless and incarcerated persons, and these subpopulations typically have higher rates of mental disorders than do people living in the community. Yet, disparities in mental health services are as great as the inequities in physical health care. Racial minorities have less access to mental health services than do non-Hispanic whites. When minorities receive care, it is more likely to be poor in quality. Cost of care, societal stigma, and the fragmented organization of services contribute to the poor quality of mental health care, and limited English proficiency creates an additional barrier for some.

The greatest barrier to health care service generally is the lack of health insurance. Multiple studies over many years have shown that the uninsured are less likely than those with insurance to receive preventive care and services for major health conditions and chronic diseases. The uninsured are at higher risk for preventable hospitalizations and missed diagnoses of serious health conditions; even after diagnoses of chronic conditions, they are less likely to receive needed care. Not surprisingly, research also suggests a link between the lack of insurance and the presence of depression and debilitating stress.

Racial minorities are significantly less likely than the rest of the population to have health insurance. Individuals living below the poverty line account for 38 percent of all the uninsured, and significant numbers of racial minorities fall in this group. Regionally, individuals in the south and west, areas with large racial minority populations, are more likely to be uninsured. In 2010, three in 10 individuals of Hispanic origin (30.7 percent) were uninsured; by 2011, the number had risen to 40 percent. African Americans were also more likely to be uninsured, with 20.8 percent lacking insurance, and 18.1 percent of Asians were uninsured, compared to 11.7 percent of non-Hispanic whites. The lack of insurance is directly related to unemployment and poverty, and both factors affect racial minorities disproportionately. Although the Affordable Care Act possesses the potential to expand coverage of uninsured people through the expansion of Medicaid eligibility, 24 states have chosen not to accept federal funds for the expansion. Researchers have pointed out that the approximately 8 million uninsured individuals in those 24 states will include women who will not be screened for breast and cervical cancer, diabetics who will go without medication, and people with other diseases that will go undiagnosed and untreated leading to a predicted 7,000 to 17,000 additional deaths. In such conditions, health disparities along racial lines will continue.

Cultural Competence

Cultural competence is a strategy implemented by human service workers to address the racial disparities in the various fields of human services. Sociocultural barriers exist at the organizational, structural, and clinical levels. Training in cultural competence ideally results in human service workers who are knowledgeable about the clients they serve, self-reflective to a degree that enables them to recognize their own biases and the biases within their particular organizations, and skillful in integrating their cultural knowledge and self-awareness with cultural sensitivity and cultural action.

The health professions were among the first to support training in cultural competence because they realized that cultural misunderstandings could have serious, even fatal, consequences. In 2007, New Jersey became the first state to require physicians who practice there to complete cultural competency training. Five other states adopted similar provisions.

Training in cultural competence has also proved invaluable for social workers involved in international or cross-racial adoptions. Culturally competent social workers can assist adoptive parents in understanding their child's cultural heritage and ease the child's transition to a new environment. A culturally competent worker will also understand that Western approaches may violate practices and customs of non-Western cultures with values that are antithetical to the individualistic, analytical method. Cultural competence on an organizational level may also include minority recruitment, interpreter services, and language-appropriate materials.

However, knowing facts about a client's race or ethnicity, social class, religion, acculturation, and other relevant information is inadequate to address racial disparities in human services unless the knowledge is accompanied by the ability to recognize problems or issues of concern that clients face, the understanding of possible consequences of the problems and empathetic responses, and actions that produce an effective outcome for the clients.

Wylene Rholetter
Auburn University

See Also: Bias in Service Delivery; Cultural Competence, Training in; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Insurance.

Further Readings

Diller, Jerry V. Cultural Diversity: A Primer for Human Services. 4th ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson Brooks/Cole, 2011.

James, Carl E. Perspectives on Racism and the Human Services Sector: A Case for Change. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.

Lin, Ann Chih and David R. Harris, eds. The Colors of Poverty: Why Racial and Ethnic Disparities Exist. National Poverty Center Series on Poverty and Public Policy. New York: Russell Sage Foundation Publications, 2010.

Office of the Surgeon General. "Mental Health: Culture, Race, and Ethnicity: A Supplement to Mental Health: A Report of the Surgeon General." Center for Mental Health Services, National Institute of Mental Health. (August 2001). http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/books/NBK44246 (Accessed February 2014).

Pinderhughes, Elaine. Understanding Race, Ethnicity, and Power: The Key to Efficacy in Clinical Practice. New York: Free Press, 1989.

The Sentencing Project. "Racial Disparity." http://www.sentencingproject.org/template/page.cfm?id=122 (Accessed February 2014).

Sperry, Len. "Cultural Competence: A Primer." Journal of Individual Psychology, v.68/4 (2012).

U. S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of Minority Health. "HHS Action Plan to Reduce Racial and Ethnic Health Disparities." (April 2011).

Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health

The population in the United States is becoming increasingly diverse along several dimensions, including racial, ethnic, and other forms of diversity (e.g., religious, sexual orientation, or political). With increasing diversity comes a need to address a wider range of health issues that may be linked to distinct populations. This entry is organized to provide the reader with an overview of (1) racial and ethnically based health issues and inequities, (2) social determinants of health among racial and ethnic groups, and (3) strategies to enhance health promotion efforts among racial and ethnic-majority communities.

Extent of Racial and Ethnic Health Inequities

There are large racial and ethnic inequities in health in the United States. This includes health outcomes, access to health care, and systemic factors (e.g., environmental health), all of which impact one's overall health. All this contributes to disparities, and in the United States, minorities typically shoulder the greater burden of adverse health outcomes. Data from the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) indicates that, while the incidence of breast cancer among white women is higher than non-Hispanic black women, the latter's survival rate is significantly lower; 86 percent of white women survive versus 71 percent of non-Hispanic black women. Cervical cancer among Vietnamese American women is five times higher than white women. Prevalence of human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immune deficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) prevalence among Hispanics and Latinos is about 585 cases per 100,000 people compared to 224 among whites.

Whites in the United States are not immune from negative outcomes of health issues. According to statistics from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, nearly 20 percent of whites in the United States have used cocaine, compared to approximately 10 percent of non-Hispanic blacks and Hispanics. A CDC-supported study shows that 32 percent of non-Hispanic black and 24 percent of Asian youth (ages 12–17) admit to using illicit substances, compared to 39 percent of white youth. White males from Appalachia and Mississippi Valley areas have lower life expectancies (71.8 years), compared to Asians males (82.8) overall. In all of these examples, whites have adverse health outcomes at a higher rate than minority groups to which they are compared. Clearly, health inequities are not limited to being a minority health issue.

These health inequities appear to be segmented along racial or ethnic bases. However, the situation is much more complicated. Guided by a socio-ecological framework, community health promotion specialists understand that social and behavioral determinants play important roles in how people achieve and maintain health. Communities are one level of the socio-ecological framework and present a unique opportunity to conduct health promotion interventions that will have wide impact on diverse populations. While health inequities impact a wide range of diverse populations, we will focus on community health issues specific to select racial and ethnic groups, as other entries of this volume address human services issues related to other diverse groups.

Race, Ethnicity, Culture, and Other Social Determinants of Health

In order to have a coherent understanding of the complex relationships among race, ethnicity, and health, clear definitions of these terms, as used in health promotion, need to be established. Race is generally defined as a way to group people by ancestry and visible phenotype and as a simple but inaccurate way of determining genotype. It is determined by how a person appears but is often incorrect or unclear. Ethnicity, also unclearly defined, is generally considered a connection among people via shared history or origin. This may include ancestral origins. Culture is defined by the Office of Minority Health (U.S. Department of Health and Human Services) as "integrated patterns of human behavior that include the language, thoughts, communications, actions, customs, beliefs, values, and institutions of racial, ethnic, religious, or social groups." It is transmitted socially, meaning that it is shared with people by other members of the culture. Culture influences one's dress, language, foods, customs and traditions, and other behaviors. It is also considered a better way to understand and explain health disparities among minority and ethnic groups compared to race and ethnicity.

In the practice of community health promotion, race and ethnicity are often used as proxy indicators for culture. For example, community health assessment efforts may yield statistics that indicate non-Hispanic blacks residing in inner cities relative to nonblacks residing in urban areas suffer disproportionately from a variety of adverse health conditions. It may appear to be reasonable to identify race as a risk factor. A more accurate explanation could be culture—that is, customs—and income. For example, non-Hispanic blacks in urban areas are more likely to be poor and consequentially have a lifestyle (i.e., culture) that reflects their reality: nutrient-poor diets, substance use to deal with stress, and low levels of physical activity due to dangerous outdoor conditions.

These social and behavioral factors contribute to poor health outcomes for this group. Due to gentrification of inner cities, whites who live in urban areas are likely to be from higher-income backgrounds—in other words, a different culture—and have access to food, gym memberships, and other resources that make positive contributions to health. Geographically, the groups are similar, but culturally, they are worlds apart. In this case, race is readily identifiable and therefore used as a shortcut to determine a population's culture and lifestyle.

Community-Based Participatory Approaches

Health promotion efforts based in racial and ethnic minority communities face several challenges. Historically based distrust of health professionals is one barrier, which leads to difficulties with access to those communities with the critical needs. Sustainability is another challenge, particularly for communities viewed as being low in assets and resources. In such cases, progress is made while program funding is available. Yet maintenance of positive changes becomes problematic when external financial resources are no longer available. These challenges need to be addressed for community health interventions to take hold and be maintained.

Community-based participatory research (CBPR) approaches—also known as participatory action research (PAR)—are designed to involve community members with program and research specialists in a team in which all members are considered equal partners. The aim of CBPR is not research. Rather, the aim is to achieve social justice, which would be reflected by improved community health outcomes, which occurs under the power and direction of community members. Indeed, partnerships between health promotion researchers–practitioners and community members should be formed before a community health issue is identified.

Irrespective of the community health issue being targeted, CBPR or PAR is effective because the outcomes include empowerment of the community members so that they may carry on and take care of problems themselves. In other words, this approach advocates for self-determination. Among the best examples of the success of this type of approach can be seen abroad, such as work in Australia with Aboriginal populations. Barbara Israel provides a clear yet succinct summary of the principles of CBPS.

A key to successful community health programs using CBPR or PAR approaches is to have a mutually respectful and trustful relationship with the community before a health problem is identified. Therefore, it requires establishing a presence in target communities, meeting with key stakeholders, and investing time and resources as a show of good faith. Seeking community partners after a funding or program opportunity has been identified is counter to key CBPR or PAR principles.

Once relationships have been established, then communities (or their representatives) work with members of health organizations to identify and prioritize community health issues of concern. Note that a major benefit of utilizing this approach is that, in this phase, assets and strengths are also identified. No community is absolutely bereft of assets and strengths. They may be difficult to identify from an outsider's perspective, but including community members fully as part of the CBPR or PAR approach will yield information in nontraditional ways.

Program Design, Recruitment and Execution

Like all the other steps, designing and executing any health promotion program will require guidance from the community. Without community buy-in and endorsement, programs will encounter difficulty with protocols being accepted by community members. Similarly, CBPR or PAR approaches will enhance recruitment and improve retention efforts because of the investment by community members. Utilization of CBPR or PAR approaches in developing interventions will improve the cultural sensitivity and relevance of the program. This is important regardless of the efficacy of a particular strategy. If a community refuses to participate, the effectiveness of a given health promotion program will be zero.

Data Analysis, Interpretation, and Dissemination of Results

Consistent with every other step of this process, community members continue to be an integral member of the team and fully participate in the data analysis, interpretation, and dissemination process. Their contributions will be especially important in contextualizing the findings, by bringing a perspective that reflects the relevant culture and beliefs. Health promotion specialists risk misinterpreting statistics (or other results) without information regarding contexts. Among health promotion researchers, dissemination of findings typically occurs via academic venues (e.g., conference presentations or peer-reviewed journals). Similarly, community health practitioners share program results with stakeholders via various venues such as professional development seminars. However, CBPR or PAR approaches require that community members be fully integrated into this process. One example is inclusion as coauthors and presenters at venues where laypeople may typically not be representatives.

Including community members in dissemination activities at all levels sends a powerful message: Their contribution is important enough to recognize at the venues deemed most valuable to our professions (research and practice). It sends a mixed message when they are included as coauthors in an article submitted to a local magazine but excluded as a contributor for a peer-reviewed manuscript.

Summary

Community health promotion must occur from the inside out. That is, ideas, efforts, and accountability must arise from the communities themselves if there is any hope of positive effects and sustainability. Regardless of how many challenges a community may face (e.g., poverty, crime), there will be assets and strengths. These need to be identified, capitalized upon, and utilized to effect change and to further inspire the community's own people. Therefore, one must remember that people are not deficient. Instead, social systems may be deficient and consequently result in unequal access and opportunities. Nevertheless, CBPR or PAR approaches include strategies that reveal and make most of the inherent positives all communities have.

Finally, CBPR or PAR approaches are ideal for minority and other disenfranchised populations because of the egalitarian nature of the process. It ensures that programs are appropriate for the racial and ethnic contexts in which they need to function. A CBPR or PAR approach is designed so that, regardless of the community, culture, racial, or ethnic representation, health promotion programs will be tailored to fit.

E. Lisako J. McKyer
Ledric D. Sherman
Kayce Solari-Hall
Texas A&M University

See Also: Community-Based Participatory Research; Empowerment Research; Social and Economic Justice.

Further Readings

Cross, W. E., Jr. "The Cross and Thomas Models of Psychological Nigrescence." Journal of Black Psychology, v.5 (1978).

Cross, W. E., Jr. Shades of Black: Diversity in African American Identity. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1991.

Health and Human Services. Office of Minority Heath (OMH). A Strategic Framework for Improving Racial/Ethnic Minority Health and Eliminating Racial/Ethnic Health Disparities. http://minorityhealth.hhs.gov/images/78/PrintFramework.htm (Accessed January 2014).

Racial and Ethnic Categories, U.S. Census

The U.S. Census Bureau provides data about the nation's people and economy through a decennial census. The U.S. Census counts every resident in the United States, helps to determine the number of seats each state will have in the U.S. House of Representatives, and is used to define how federal funds will be allocated across the country. All levels of government require information on Hispanic origin and race to implement and evaluate programs or enforce laws such as the Civil Rights Act, Voting Rights Act, Fair Housing Act, and the Equal Employment Opportunity Act.

Every 10 years, households of the United States receive a census form through the U.S. mail, that requests information about those who reside within the household. On the census form, questions are asked: How many people were living in the household? What is the name of each person living in the household? What is the age of each person living in the household? And, what is each person's Hispanic origin and race? An individual's responses to the race and Hispanic origin (ethnicity) question were based upon self-identification. However, some individuals may have experienced difficulty in answering the questions.

Ethnicity and Race Questions Defined

The Hispanic origin and race question was revised for the 2010 U.S. Census. The U.S. Census Bureau collected Hispanic origin and race information following the guidance of the U.S. Office of Management and Budget's (OMB) 1997 Revisions to the Standards for the Classification of Federal Data on Race and Ethnicity. The OMB serves the United States president through the executive branch and, in response to criticisms; the OMB undertook a comprehensive review of the current categories for data on race and ethnicity. Both public and private organizations use Hispanic origin and race information to determine areas where groups may need special services and to plan and implement education, housing, health, and other programs that address these needs. Accurate data of racial and ethnic categories collected by the U.S. Census is critical in the distribution of federal funds to groups that need funding the most.

These federal standards mandate that race and Hispanic origin (ethnicity) are separate and distinct concepts and advised that two different questions must be used. For the 2010 census, a new instruction was added immediately preceding the questions on Hispanic origin and race, which was not used in the 2000 census. The instruction stated that Hispanic origins are not races because, in the federal statistical system, Hispanic origin is considered to be a separate concept from race. However, the new standards were to be used by the Bureau of the Census in the 2000 decennial census. The U.S. Census Bureau reports that it followed the guidelines of the OMB in creating the race and ethnicity questions on the 2010 census, which is used to determine the distribution of federal funding. The OMB requires federal agencies to use a minimum of two ethnicities: Hispanic or Latino and not Hispanic or Latino. It states that Hispanic origin can be viewed as the heritage, nationality group, lineage, or country of birth of the person or the person's parents or ancestors before their arrival in the United States.

The Hispanic origin question included five separate response categories and one area where respondents could write in a specific Hispanic origin group. After answering the Hispanic origin question, the respondents would answer the race question next. The OMB required federal agencies to use a minimum of five race categories: (1) white, (2) black or African American, (3) American Indian or Alaska Native, (4) Asian, and (5) Native Hawai'ian or other Pacific Islander. For respondents unable to identify with any of these five race categories, OMB approved the Census Bureau's inclusion of a sixth category: some other race. Those who identified their origin as Hispanic, Latino, or Spanish could have reported to be any race. The U.S. Census defined the race categories as follows: White refers to a person having origins in any of the original peoples of Europe, the Middle East, or north Africa. It includes those who identify as Irish, German, Italian, Lebanese, Arab, Moroccan, or Caucasian. Black or African American refers to a person having origins in any of the black racial groups of Africa. It includes people who indicated their race as black, African American, or Negro as well as those who identified as Kenyan, Nigerian, or Haitian. American Indian or Alaska Native refers to a person having origins in any of the original peoples of North and South America (including Central America) and who maintains tribal affiliation. This category includes people who classified their race as American Indian or Alaska Native or reported their principal tribe, such as Navajo, Blackfeet, Inupiat, Yup'ik, or Central American Indian groups or South American Indian groups.

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, Asian refers to a person having origins in any of the original peoples of the Far East, southeast Asia, or the Indian subcontinent, including, Cambodia, China, India, Japan, Korea, Malaysia, Pakistan, the Philippine Islands, Thailand, and Vietnam. It includes people who indicated their race as Asian, Asian Indian, Chinese, Filipino, Korean, Japanese, Vietnamese, and Other Asian. Native Hawai'ian or other Pacific Islander refers to a person having origins in any of the original peoples of Hawai'i, Guam, Samoa, or other Pacific Islands. It includes people who indicated their race as Pacific Islander or Native Hawai'ian, Guamanian or Chamorro, Samoan, and Other Pacific Islander. Some other race includes all other responses not included in the race categories described above. Respondents who identified as multiracial, mixed, interracial, or a Hispanic or Latino group in response to the race question are included in this category.

Responses to the Ethnicity and Race Categories on the 2010 Census

In 2000, Hispanics made up 13 percent of the U.S. population. In 2010, they made up 16 percent of the U.S. population but accounted for half of the population increase over the 10-year period. The U.S. Census revealed that more than half of the Hispanic population identified as white and no other race, while about one-third provided responses that were classified as some other race alone when responding to the question on race. The racial distribution of the non-Hispanic population was mostly white alone (76 percent), black alone (15 percent), and Asian alone (6 percent). Less than 1 percent of non-Hispanics provided responses to the race question that were classified as some other race alone (0.2 percent). In the 2010 census, 97 percent of all respondents reported only one race. The non-Hispanic population grew slowly over the decade, and the number of people who reported their race as white alone grew even slower (1 percent). The responses of the 2010 U.S. Census revealed that the largest group reported white alone (72 percent of all people living in the United States). The black or African American alone population represented 13 percent of the total population. There were 0.9 percent of respondents who indicated American Indian and Alaska Native alone. Approximately 5 percent of all respondents identified their race as Asian alone. The smallest major race group was Native Hawai'ian and other Pacific Islander alone and represented 0.2 percent of the total population. The remainder of respondents who reported only one race (6 percent of all respondents) classified as some other race alone.

Summary

The current standards in OMB's Statistical Policy Directive No. 15 were developed to provide consistent data on race and ethnicity throughout the federal government. The revised standards required five minimum categories for data on race: American Indian or Alaska Native, Asian, black or African American, Native Hawai'ian or other Pacific Islander, white, or some other race. There were to be two categories for data on ethnicity: Hispanic or Latino and not Hispanic or Latino. Those who identified as Hispanic were required to choose one of the racial groups listed above, and most identified as white and no other race.

The OMB reports the racial and ethnic categories of the standards should not be interpreted as being primarily biological or genetic in reference. It adds that race and ethnicity may be thought of in terms of social and cultural characteristics as well as ancestry, but the categories represent a social–political construct designed for collecting data on race and ethnicity and are not anthropologically or scientifically based. However, it also states the concepts and terminology should reflect clear and generally understood definitions that can achieve broad public acceptance and should be developed using appropriate scientific methodologies, including the social sciences.

The results of the census are important in that they are used to allocate federal funding for important programs such as the Civil Rights Act, Voting Rights Act, Fair Housing Act, and the Equal Employment Opportunity Act. One program that could be impacted by the results of the census is the Health and Human Services Office of Minority Health (OMH). The OMH reports its mission is to improve the health of racial and ethnic minority populations through the development of health policies and programs that will help eliminate disparities. The OMH suggests it builds upon current science and expert consensus about racial and ethnic minority health disparities and systems problems and provides a rationale for efforts funded. The report of ethnic categories from the census could have a direct impact on the funding of health programs, which are designed to improve the health of racial and ethnic minority groups.

Some programs are crucial in supporting marginalized groups, as funding is based on the number of individuals who represent those groups. In addition to impacting health programs, the census data are used to make decisions about what community services to provide and affects how funding is allocated to neighborhood improvement, public health, and education. Failure to accurately complete the 2010 U.S. Census could result in funding that is not distributed to programs equitably.

Michelle R. Cox
Azusa Pacific University

See Also: Ethnicity, Definitions of; Race, Social Definition of; United States, Demographics of.

Further Readings

Health and Human Services. Office of Minority Heath (OMH). A Strategic Framework for Improving Racial/Ethnic Minority Health and Eliminating Racial/Ethnic Health Disparities. http://minorityhealth.hhs.gov/images/78/PrintFramework.htm (Accessed January 2014).

The Office of Management and Budget (OMB). "The Mission and Structure of the OMB." http://www.whitehouse.gov/omb/organization_mission (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Census. Explore the Form. http://www.census.gov/2010census/about/interactive-form.php (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Census. Overview of Race and Hispanic Origin. http://www.census.gov/prod/cen2010/briefs/c2010br-02.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Census. What Is the Census? http://www.census.gov/2010census/about/ (Accessed January 2014).

Racial Identity Development, Models of Race can be studied from a psychological perspective. For decades, researchers and psychologists, primarily within the United States, have conceptualized, analyzed, interpreted, and produced models of racial identity development. Models of racial identity development offer insight into race-related behaviors, perceptions, attitudes, and emotions.

Definitions of Racial Identity

Scholars and researchers are inconsistent in defining race, thus the concept of racial identity is often misunderstood. Some meanings of race are derived from presumed biological dimensions, whereas other meanings are derived from social dimensions. As a biological category, race concerns one's physical features (e.g., skin color) and genetic background, while race as a social construction has to do with one's belief that one has a shared heritage with a specific racial group. Racial identity is both an individual and a collective construction. In societies (such as the United States) where racial group membership is emphasized, it is assumed that members of all racial groups will go through a racial identity development process.

Racial Identity Development

Racial identity development is assumed to differ between racial groups because racial identity development processes occur within a social context, and they are based on how groups are racially classified and socialized. It is a result of differential socialization (based on dominate/subordinate relationships) and differential responses to that socialization. Socialization in the context of racial identity development refers to the acquisition of values, beliefs, attitudes, and behaviors of racial groups. For example, in the United States, individuals who identify with the dominant culture have been socialized in an environment that sends the message that their race is normal or superior to that of nondominant cultures. On the other hand, individuals who do not identify with or are not connected to the dominant culture will likely hold worldviews linked to historical and experiential racial oppression.

A model of racial identity development typically used to describe the African American experience in the United States is William Cross's model of black identity development. According to the Cross model, there are five stages of black racial identity development: pre-encounter, encounter, immersion/emersion, internalization, and internalization-commitment. In the first stage, pre-encounter, black individuals perceive race as unimportant and would prefer to be accepted as "human beings." They tend to accept and adopt the dominant culture's values and beliefs without question. Those in the second stage, encounter, have had a profound event or series of experiences directly linked to their race. Realizing that they are not perceived as equal to white people or those of the dominant culture, they are forced to reexamine their current identity and find or further develop their black identity. The third stage, immersion/emersion, is described as being problack and antiwhite. Externally, individuals immerse themselves in black culture by surrounding themselves with visual symbols of their racial identity; yet internally, they have not made a commitment to support all values and traditions associated with black culture. The fourth stage, internalization, is characterized as individuals having a sense of satisfaction and a feeling of security with being black. The final stage, internalization-commitment, represents those who are comfortable with their race as well as the races of others around them. They are willing to translate their internalized identities into a plan of action that benefits other oppressed groups.

A model of racial identity development typically used to describe the African American experience in the United States is William Cross's Model of Black Identity Development.

Janet Helms created one of the first and most widely accepted models of white racial identity development. Her model presupposes that all individuals who identify as white begin with racist perspectives. Further, she proposed two phases by which white individuals move from a racist perspective toward a nonracist white identity; they are "abandonment of racism" and "defining a nonracist white identity." Moreover, the Helms model describes six statuses of white racial identity development. The first three statuses, contact, disintegration, and reintegration, outline how a white person abandons a racist identity before moving to the next three statuses, pseudo-independence, immersion/emersion, and autonomy, where he or she discovers a nonracist white identity.

Individuals in the contact status lack an understanding of racism and have had few experiences with people of a different race. During the disintegration status, white individuals begin to have an increased awareness of white privilege and the reality of racism. They start to question inequality and they may experience dissonance. The dissonance associated with this status can lead some white individuals to deny racism and white privilege and avoid future contact with people of a different race. The reintegration status is characterized as a regression when a white individual returns to his or her previously held prejudices, negative stereotypes, and racist beliefs. A person is likely to move into the pseudo-independence status because of a painful or an insightful event or experience that jolts the individual from the reintegration status. This status is marked by a white person's attempt to abandon racism. At the immersion/emersion status, a white individual has a greater understanding of him or herself as a racial being. There is a readiness to challenge one's biases. The individual may question to what extent he or she can be proud of being white without being racist. The autonomy status is characterized as an internalization of a positive white identity. At this status, race is not perceived to be a threat because the white individual begins to make the connections between racism and inequality.

These models of black and white racial identity development present monoracial comparisons between two different racial groups. Whether black or white, racial identity development models or any other model such as Asian American, Latino, American Indian, multiracial, biracial, or multidimensional, there are common themes among all models.

Common Themes Among Models of Racial Identity Development

All models of racial identity development focus on the psychosocial process of defining one's racial identity with regard to the dominant race or culture. Each provides the basis for stages of development in which there is a nonrecognition of the individual's racial identity, a self-examination in which the individual struggles with his or her racial identity with regard to the dominant race or culture, and then a resolution of the conflict where an individual arrives at a better understanding, appreciation, and/or acceptance of his or her race. Models of racial identity development tend to be organized around stages or statuses. The specific content or themes of the stages or statuses, however, are assumed to differ between racial groups because of socially ascribed power dynamics among racial groups. The stages or statuses range from the least developmentally sophisticated to the most developmentally advanced.

There are variations in the processes in different models; however, most tend to follow a general linear or step-wise progression in which one developmental stage needs to be resolved before another can be achieved. Contemporary models recognize that stages or statuses are not fixed; they fluctuate. Individuals move back and forth from stage to stage or status to status, but when they return to a former stage or status, that stage or status will seem different because of new events and experiences.

Models of racial identity development support the notion that individuals will not become receptive to different racial groups unless they develop a positive sense of self, including an understanding and appreciation of their racial group. Achieving higher statuses or stages along the continuum of racial identity development could lead to better acceptance of racial differences, reduced racist behavior, and a greater appreciation for diversity, all of which would contribute to a more humane and socially just world.

Wanda B. Knight
Pennsylvania State University

See Also: Race, Social Definitions of; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; Racism, Self-Assessment of.

Further Readings

Bernal, M. E. and G. P. Knight, eds. Ethnic Identity Formation: Formation and Transmission Among Hispanics and Other Minorities. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1993.

Cross, W. E., Jr. Shades of Black: Diversity in African American Identity. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1991.

Cross, W. E., Jr. “The Cross and Thomas Models of Psychological Nigrescence.” Journal of Black Psychology, v.5 (1978).

Helms, J. E. A Race Is a Nice Thing to Have: A Guide to Being a White Person or Understanding the White Persons in Your Life. Topeka, KS: Content Communications, 1992.

Phinney, J. S. “A Three-Stage Model of Ethnic Identity Development.” In M. E. Bernal and G. P. Knight, eds., Ethnic Identity Formation: Formation and Transmission Among Hispanics and Other Minorities. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.

Ponterotto, J. G., J. M. Casas, L. A. Suzuki, and C. M. Alexander, eds. Handbook of Multicultural Counseling. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 1995.

Racial Microaggression

Racial microaggressions are daily hostile, derogatory, and negative insults that can be covert or overt and encompass behavioral and verbal slights against a person or racial group. The literature first identified African Americans as a race that is often associated with microaggressions; however, these behavioral and verbal slights can be directed at any racial group. Racial microaggressions are often used as a form of racism and to perpetuate racist views about a specific racial group. Microaggressions reflect the conscious and unconscious worldview that is racist in nature, first used to oppress African Americans.

The understanding of racial microaggressions as racism is important because much of the overt displays of racism have become more unacceptable, thus more covert forms of racism, such as racial microaggressions, have become more common. Racial microaggression is linked to racism in environments and situations that limit opportunities and access to people of color. Racism is the false belief that a person is inferior based on the color of his or her skin, specifically, the darker the skin color, the more inferior. Microaggressions are deliberate and explicit in nature, and the person issuing the aggression is conscious of the impact.

Psychological Impact

Microaggressions serve to perpetuate the belief that people of color are somehow intellectually inferior and hold some inferior status than the dominate culture and that each person of color making up each racial group is monolithic rather than accounting for the wide diversity that occurs within groups. The intent of the microaggressor is to oppress and discriminate against people of color, hence there is a deep psychological impact associated with microaggressions. The psychological harm caused by microaggressions calls into question the integrity and cultural identity of the person of color, while causing increased psychological distress. Because racial microaggressions are daily and can have multiple microaggressors, the psychological distress is constant and is often linked to increased exhaustion, low self-esteem, anxiety, and increased levels of depression in people of color. Experiencing racial microaggressions can foster feelings of not belonging and feeling isolated in people of color.

The psychological consequences and feelings of those experiencing racial microaggressions in their everyday lives encompass a sense of invisibility, powerlessness, and personal sacrifice of culture in order to better conform to United States and dominate culture beliefs and values. Another psychological consequence often expressed by people of color is the feeling of being forced to be responsible for representing the entire racial group. The increased interest in the psychological impact of racial microaggressions on various populations has opened the study of the topic in the field of mental health care.

Professional Training

Historically, there has been a mistrust of the mental health professionals and the medical field due to long-standing racism in the health care field in regards to studying and providing care to people of color. Racial microaggressions have been studied extensively in all fields of human service, often being discussed regarding the relationship between the health professional and those they are helping. The impact of microaggressions on the helping relationship has been linked to fostering a weaker alliance between the helping professional and the patient. Racial microaggressions have also been linked as a predictor of health outcomes for the patient. Additionally, helping professionals that are unaware of their use of microaggressions were linked to demonstrating less awareness of how culture and environment impacted their patients.

People of color are linked to receiving less-sufficient health services and are often less willing to seek mental health care because of high occurrences of mental misdiagnosis, suspicion of health care providers, and feelings of being pathologized by health care providers. In an effort to better train and limit racial microaggressions in the health professions, training programs are paying more attention to the impact of historically promoting only Eurocentric training. More programs are training students to look beyond conforming patient issues and behaviors into the dominant U.S. culture and behavioral changes that are only congruent with the values of American culture. Health care training programs have recently pushed for the inclusion of courses and workshops that specifically discuss moving away from a Eurocentric worldview when accessing people of color for health services and incorporating a multicultural worldview that accounts for the patient's culture and experience as a person of color.

Organizational Impact

Racial microaggressions reflect an invisible worldview that white culture holds supremacy over all other cultures. This viewpoint permeates and is manifested in individuals, institutions, and organizations that all people participate in and in the U.S. culture as a whole. Because microaggressions are embedded in U.S. culture, it serves as a barrier to equality in education, employment, and health care. Racial microaggressions serve to perpetuate injustice for people of color in all aspects of life, thus people of color's access and opportunity to human services is also impacted. The impact on people has been studied as well as long-term consequences at the institutional and organizational level; continued investigation of the impact on professional training and individual psychological impact is needed in mental health care.

Kimberly N. Frazier
Texas A & M University-Corpus Christi

See Also: African Americans; Bias in Service Delivery; Conflict Resolution and Diversity; Conflict Resolution and Diversity Cultural Competence; Cultural Competence, Model of; Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of.

Further Readings

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. WSIQARS Injury Mortality Reports: 1999–2005. http://webappa.cdc.gov/sasweb/ncipc/mortratelO_sy.html (Accessed October 2008).

Constantine, M. G. "Racial Microaggressions Against African American Clients in Crossracial Counseling." Journal of Counseling Psychology, v.54 (2007).

Constantine, M. G., and D. W. Sue. "Perceptions of Racial Microaggressions Among Black Supervisees in Cross-Racial Dyads." Journal of Counseling Psychology, v.54 (2007).

Diala, C. C., C. Muntaner, C. Walrath, K. Nickerson, T. LaVeist, and P. Leaf. "Racial/Ethnic Differences in Attitudes Toward Seeking Professional Mental Health Services." American Journal of Public Health, v.91/5 (2001).

Roysircar, G., P. Arredondo, J. N. Fuertes, J. C. Ponterotto, and R. L. Toporek. Multicultural Counseling Competencies 2003: Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development. Alexandra, VA: American Counseling Association, 2003.

Sue, D. W., P. Arredondo, and R. J. McDavis. "Multicultural Counseling Competencies: A Call to the Profession." Journal of Counseling and Development, v.70 (1992).

Sue, D. W., C. M. Capodilupo, and A. M. B. Holder. "Racial Microaggressions in the Life Experiences of Black Americans." Professional Psychology: Research and Practice, v.39 (2008).

Sue, D. W., C. M. Capodilupo, G. C. Torino, J. M. Bucceri, A. M. B. Holder, K. L. Nadal, and M. Esquilin. "Racial Microaggressions in Everyday Life: Implications for Clinical Practice." American Psychologist, v.62 (2007).

Stie, D. W., K. L. Nadal, C. M. Gapodilupo, A. I. Lin, G. C. Torino, and D. P. Rivera. "Racial Microaggressions Against Black Americans: Implications for Counseling." Journal of Counseling and Development, v.86 (2008).

Racism, Long-Term Effects of

Early scholars disseminated research about the long-term effects of racism in historical documents that attempted to explain within-group behaviors among culturally marginalized groups. These works noted the disparities in housing, employment, education, crime, and health. Unfortunately, much of this work was deficit oriented in that it blamed marginalized communities for the outcomes of systemic racism rather than focusing on the contextual factors that created these outcomes. Today, scholars focus on the disparities as an outcome rather than a causal element in the disproportionate effects of racism. Much of this work utilizes the term traumatic stress to identify the key outcomes of historical bias and racism and place a greater emphasis on environmental factors and the resulting psychological outcomes, including depression, low self-esteem, and interpersonal problems. Effective human service, personnel are encouraged to enhance their cultural competence.

Traumatic Stress

Scholars have focused on the topic of traumatic stress to highlight the emotional and psychological outcomes of systemic or institutionalized oppression. Systemic oppression refers to structural biases embedded in society that create economic, educational, and health disparities for specific segments of the population. These disparities are often historical in nature and have roots in sociopolitical issues. Thus, marginalized communities can experience multilayered effects of racism in which current acts of oppression can trigger prior experiences with racism. Emotional and psychological outcomes have included depression, hypertension, and anxiety. Secondary effects, such as substance abuse, community violence, familial conflicts, and persistent academic underachievement, have also been cited.

Examples of racism-related traumatic stress can be found in the United States and globally. For example, Native Americans and other indigenous peoples have been historically vulnerable to social and political oppression. Refugees such as southeast Asians, Haitians, Rwandans, South Africans, eastern Europeans, and others who have been forced to flee their homelands due to political oppression have also shown symptoms of traumatic stress. It is also important to remember that children can be affected by traumatic stress and are often overlooked as potential victims of trauma. Racial marginalization may cause their peers to treat them differently or view them as inferior.

Traumatic stress is often contextualized through the lens of structural racism and the subsequent social positioning of groups of individuals in society. Racism can be categorized as individual, cultural, or structural. Individual racism relates to interpersonal interactions in which mainstream individuals enact their internalized privilege when interacting with members of marginalized groups. Cultural racism refers to the socially embedded values and worldviews that are widely held as normative within society and place other value systems and realities as aberrant or nonexistent. Structural racism is evident through systemic unequal distributions and outcomes in society such as in education, employment, housing, health care, and politics. As a result, racially marginalized individuals are left with the message that one's race or culture is inferior to that of the mainstream.

Historically marginalized groups in the United States include African Americans, Latinos, Native Americans, and Asian Americans, among others. Historically, racism in the United States has been based upon physical characteristics creating a race-based social system whereby nonwhite individuals were treated and viewed differently with little or no path to become a mainstream group member. Further, macrosystematic efforts were made to destroy vestiges of nonmainstream cultures, including forms of language, traditions, and customs.

Structural Racism

Today, the outcomes of structural racism can be seen in the persistent underachievement of African American, Latino, southeast Asian, and Native American students. These students, often tracked in low-achievement academic programs, also experience disproportionality in special education placement (e.g., behavior disorder, mild retardation, learning disabled, or attention deficit disorder) and disciplinary action such as expulsion and suspensions. Social-justice-oriented educators have asserted that it is important to differentiate between symptoms of racism-related traumatic stress and actual lower cognitive functioning. Another area in which racism related to stress is evident is in the criminal justice system wherein African Americans and other racially marginalized individuals experience disproportionate convictions compared to their white counterparts. As a result, marginalized group members experience secondary effects of racism that influence their ability to secure jobs, attend postsecondary institutions, and earn livable wages.

Over time, macro- and microaggressive encounters with discrimination and marginalization can cause psychological distress for individuals who are members of racially marginalized groups. Microaggressions or traumatic stress events are often described as experiences that individuals perceive as negative, sudden, and uncontrollable. These events, due to discrimination and racism, are often pervasive and can disrupt individuals' functioning. Responses to traumatic events can depend on several factors such as the severity of the stressful event, the developmental level of the individual, prior history of trauma, intergenerational trauma, or other personal, lived experiences. In addition, interacting factors, like gender, social class, or sexual orientation, can further exacerbate the racial marginalization of individuals.

Some of the psychological reactions to racism-related traumatic stress include depression, anxiety, shame or guilt, decreased self-esteem, negative perceptions of self-identity, social withdrawal, and problems in interpersonal relationships. Additionally, studies investigating hypertension and high blood pressure among racially marginalized individuals have shown a link between traumatic stress and physical health. In addition, researchers are investigating the coping skills used by individuals in response to racism, such as avoidance or withdrawal, combating, and seeking a support system.

It is imperative for human service professionals to be aware of and skilled in working with clients who are suffering from racism-related traumatic stress. Due to the harmful effects of racism and discrimination, individuals might not seek the assistance of human services personnel. Moreover, the consequences of inadequate care, due to the service provider's cultural encapsulation, can lead to mistrust of human service professionals and contribute to individuals' traumatic stress symptoms. An understanding of traumatic stress is important for case conceptualization, treatment planning, intervention, and assessment. It is important to conceptualize these symptoms by considering environmental factors such as racism and other forms of systemic oppression. Furthermore, lack of cultural competence can lead to misdiagnosis and ineffective treatments. This can serve as another systemic barrier for individuals of racially marginalized groups. Awareness of racism-related traumatic stress can assist human service professionals in identifying the environmental barriers in clients' lives. The ability to promote coping skills and highlight resilience is warranted.

Intervention

Human service professionals working in this area utilize racial or cultural identity and traumatic stress assessment tools to address the long-term effects of racism. Studies have shown correlations between racial or cultural identity and the various health, education, relational, and economic outcomes. Assessing for traumatic stress focuses on internalizing (anxiety and depression) and externalizing behaviors (anger and interpersonal problems). At the community-wide level, assessment of the long-term effects of racism might include the use of a needs assessment to gather interview data from community residents about their perspectives on community strengths and challenges as well as archival data from reports on and by the community.

Interventions to address the long-term effects of racism have been multipronged, and those routed within the community's own worldviews are particularly effective. The bulk of the literature has focused on identity development interventions to counter the impact of the cultural dominance of Eurocentric ideals on culturally marginalized groups. Additionally, culture-centered counseling interventions have been shown to assist culturally diverse individuals in resolving clinical issues related to racism-related trauma. Mental health and education professionals have investigated the influence of cultural awareness, rites of passage, and creative arts programs on individuals' racial or cultural identity, and their subsequent self-actualization.

To gain more information about the long-term effects of racism, it is recommended that human service professionals seek out books by behavioral scientists and mental health professionals who discuss the impact of racism and other forms of oppression on individuals, such as Yael Danieli's International Handbook of Multigenerational Legacies of Trauma. Other resources include research articles published in professional journals and conferences dedicated to disseminating information about trauma, oppression, and social justice issues.

Human service professionals are also encouraged to seek out information from stakeholders within culturally diverse communities who may have knowledge about significant events and coping strategies that relate to systemic oppression. Museums such as the Smithsonian's National Museum of the American Indian can also be an excellent resource to acquire historical information about sociohistorical oppression. Finally, Web sites can also offer insightful information about the pervasive effects of racism and other forms of oppression on individuals and how to counter institutional racism, including the People's Institute for Survival and Beyond (http://www.pisab.org).

Cirecie A. West-Olatunji
University of Cincinnati
Melanie A. Varney
University of Florida

See Also: African Americans; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Incarceration and Sentencing, Racial Disparities in; Providers, Institutional Racism and; Rites of Passage; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Danieli, Yael. International Handbook of Multigenerational Legacies of Trauma. New York: Plenum Press, 1988.

Goodman, Rachael D. and Cirecie A. West-Olatunji. "Educational Hegemony, Traumatic Stress, and African American and Latino American Students." Journal of Multicultural Counseling and Development, v.38 (2010).

Harrell, Jules P., Sadiki Hall, and James Taliaferro. "Physiological Responses to Racism and Discrimination: An Assessment of the Evidence." American Journal of Public Health, v.93 (2003).

Racism, Self-Assessment of

The term self-assessment is used in social psychology to refer to the process of examining one's thoughts and behaviors in order to uncover values, habits, and biases, especially when they do not accord with one's self-image. In the case of racism, it is not sufficient for a person to ask themselves if they are a racist; many people who commit racist behaviors, harbor racist beliefs, and are burdened with racist biases do not self-identify as a racist. They may adopt a slippery definition of racism in order to absolve themselves or hide behind supposed "facts" that justify racist views, or they may simply harbor unexamined biases that influence their perceptions and decisions without making them "feel" like a racist. Self-assessment of possible racism is useful for human services workers in order to make them best able to deal with their clients.

Racism is the belief that subsets of the human race are substantively or qualitatively different, a definition that is vague because the concept of race is vague, and though referring to groups of hereditary traits is nevertheless socially and culturally constructed. The Oxford English Dictionary defines racism as "the belief that all members of each race possess characteristics, abilities, or qualities specific to that race, especially so as to distinguish it as inferior or superior to another race." Racism is often extended to encompass discrimination and racist-like beliefs predicated on differences in ethnicity or religion, as with discrimination against Arabs (who are not recognized as a separate race by the racial classification system used by the U.S. federal government); against the Irish or Italians in the historical United States; or against Jewish people (Jewishness being an ethnicity, a cultural identity, and a religious identity). There is considerable disagreement about how large a tent racism is and which behaviors or beliefs related to racial differences constitute it, which is why legal frameworks specifically focus on discrimination: preferential treatment for one group over another, predicated on racial or ethnic differences. The United Nations, for instance, condemns racism but does not define what it means by racism, while defining racial discrimination in the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

Internalized Racism

This focus on the concrete makes sense when it comes to forming policy: The law cannot legislate the heart. However, it can lead to public discourse focusing on discrimination to such an extent that stereotyping, symbolic racism, and institutional racism are given short shrift. This, in turn, leads many people—especially people who are not regularly victimized by racism—to internalize a model of racism that is largely made up of behaviors of which they are not guilty, or in which they do not consciously partake. In popular culture, racists are more often portrayed as malicious and willful, perfectly conscious of their biases and giving voice to an explicit hatred of another race, which presents an image of racism with which few people would relate. And yet it is well understood by sociologists and psychologists that most racist behavior comes from people who are far less overt, and may be thought of as more neglectful or thoughtless than malicious. Sociologists often focus on issues of privilege: Even people who believe that they are actively opposed to racism may have racist beliefs or practices that they are blind to, in part because of the group privilege that they enjoy; as a result of the fact that they are not themselves victimized by racism, their thoughts on racism and racist institutions are not mature or well-formed, and they draw erroneous conclusions about the world by drawing on their privileged experience without making allowances for the effects of that privilege. White people will perceive banks to be fairer lenders than nonwhites, for instance; non-Arabs will have a very different experience of airport security in the post-9/11 world than Arab Americans.

Orthodox Jews, who are often subject to racism in spite of the fact that Jewishness is an ethnicity, a cultural identity, and a religious identity, but not a race.

For instance, a 2004 study found that job applicants were 50 percent less likely to be invited to interview for a job if they had a "black-sounding" name when compared to "white-sounding" applicants with identical credentials. The study did not suggest that this was the result of conscious racism and deliberate exclusion, but of unconscious racist biases, biases that the biased would deny. Several follow-up studies have confirmed these results in multiple cities and industries. This is a small-scale version of a phenomenon that sociologists and historians have long discussed: the economic and social disparity that has arisen as a side effect not only of overt racist institutions like slavery, segregation, and restricted immigration, but also unconscious racist biases. The result of such biases is that between two similar candidates for a given good—a job, loan, act of charity, acceptance to a school or professional organization—in the aggregate, the white candidate is more likely to receive it than the nonwhite candidate. These minor benefits accrete over time, creating more wealthy and middle class white families, more entrenched wealth, more predominantly white social and professional groups, and perpetuating the idea that whites perform well.

Self-Evaluation

Racism self-assessments seek to reveal these hidden biases. They often begin simply by asking individuals to describe their ethnic and racial identity including the racial and ethnic heritages that have played a role in their lives, their family lives and their identities, and to describe events in their lives in which their races or ethnicities were relevant. They are also asked whether there are cultures with which they identify or that have influenced them, whether or not they are a member of such a culture (this may be the result of a spouse's culture, for instance, or of places they have lived). They may then be asked to list everything they know about a particular ethnic or racial group, to identify the sources of their knowledge about that group, to reflect on how that knowledge has influenced their interactions with members of that group, and whether they have had interactions that changed any of the assumptions built on that knowledge. They may also be asked about systemic racism, what they know about its effects, and whether it has affected them.

Self-assessment is one element of self-evaluation, along with self-enhancement, self-verification, and self-improvement. In some ways, it is the simplest: It seeks to create an accurate picture of the self, and self-assessments are often conducted with a professional (e.g., a therapist, social worker, or sociologist) who provides feedback and can help formulate follow-up questions or point out when answers could go into more detail. On the other hand, self-enhancement is rarely objective; it is a tendency to look at the self in the manner that accentuates the positive in one's self-concept, playing up virtues and downplaying faults (or contextualizing them so as to defend or excuse them). Self-verification is perhaps the simplest motive involved in self-evaluation: It reflects the desire of people to find that their self-image is accurate, and to confirm that they are, and act and behave as if they are, the person they seem to be to themselves. Even negative behaviors can be self-verifying when they affirm that a person has correctly assessed his or her faults.

Bill Kte'pi
Independent Scholar

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Race and Clients; Racial Identity Development, Models of; Racial Microaggression; Racism, Long-Term Effects of.

Further Readings

Harrell, Jules P., Sadiki Hall, and James Taliaferro. "Physiological Responses to Racism and Discrimination: An Assessment of the Evidence." American Journal of Public Health, v.93 (2003).

Prager, Devah, Bruce Western, and Bart Bonkowski. "Discrimination in a Low Wage Labor Market: A Field Experiment." American Sociological Review (2009).

Roberts, T.S., ed. Self, Peer, and Group Assessment in E-Learning. Hershey, PA: Information Science Publishing, 2006.

Rape as an Instrument of War

Rape and war can be more readily defined than understood. Both involve violence against others, and when combined, the effect is devastating. Rape is not a sexual crime; it is one of violence predominately against women. Paul Kirby describes wartime rape as "a social act marked by gendered power."

The impact of war on soldiers and others who live in contested, dangerous regions results in unimaginable trauma. Some participants find justification and opportunities to act on their own violent agendas. However, in the context of this entry, the focus is on evil rape, a deliberate attempt to humiliate, provoke fear in, dominate, and disperse and forcibly relocate communities or ethnic groups. War rape humiliates the victim and respective society.

While atrocities can be motivated by a variety of intentions, the act of rape, independently and in conjunction with the horrors of war, leave permanent, multilayered damage on the victims of any age, sex, race, ethnicity, or gender. Rape has become part of the arsenals of some combatants who have calculated the social, cultural, and ethnic fallout to victims. For example, in cultures or religions requiring women to be virgins before marriage, deliberate campaigns of rape have been launched, making the victimized women unable to marry. They may be received by families and communities as if they had voluntarily participated sexually instead of as survivors of very real violent attacks and permanent trauma.

Intentions and Results

Wartime rape is often perceived as an inevitable consequence and dismissed as such. In wartime, the number of reported rapes seems likely to be more underreported than in nonwar times. This is likely due to survival priorities of those impacted directly and indirectly as well as potentially reduced availability of police jurisdictions during such crises. However, in ethnic wars, rape is often used as a way of shaming and subjugating members of minority ethnic groups. Eva Fogelman describes the rape of Jewish women during the Nazi Holocaust as based on "three motivations (entitlement, sadism, and masculine ego gratification)," which fueled such violence.

Gang rape is more common during war than at any other time. Dara Cohen names ethnic hatred, gender inequality, opportunism and greed, and forced recruitment that human service providers must understand as underlying factors of war rape. The purpose of war rape is to instill as much harm as possible including, but not limited to, sexual violence. Many victims experience serious physical, psychic, and psychological torture. Physical violence including gang rape, stabbings, cuttings, amputations, and rape with foreign objects and substances are all too common. Rape can happen in a woman's home, in the woods, streets, at border checkpoints, within jails and combatant and refugee camps, as well as in displacement settlements. Rape can also be part of abductions.

Raping the women of the enemy humiliates the males, intentionally engendering feelings of impotence of an inability to protect their women. This is part of the larger picture of ethnic cleansing and genocide. There is no specific authority to whom one can report such rapes, so precise data is not available.

Rape as a War Crime

In the context of war, rape was considered to be collateral damage, something that happens, a by-product. It was not considered a violation of humanitarian law until the establishment, in 1994, of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. This resulted in an important understanding of such rapes as crimes against humanity related to the objective of genocide. Instead of viewing rape as something that happens in war, it became identified as a war objective.

Male Rape Victims

Sexual violence in war is mostly perpetrated against women. However, Will Storr shared the experiences of many traumatized survivors in Uganda, including male rape survivors. Seeking help from a counselor, a wife talked of her husband's inability to have sex. Meeting one-on-one, the husband confided his rape experience, three times a day for three years, in the company of other male victims, and the permanent damage and infection he bears; seeking medical assistance would mean admitting what happened, risking a label of homosexuality punishable, in some cases, by family rejection, arrest, or death. During World War II, most rape victims were women but not all. It is likely that men underreport their own victimization; rapes are underreported in general. Thus, the focus of war rape remains on women.

In the 1980s, 76 percent of male political prisoners in El Salvador reported having experienced sexual torture at least once. Sri Lankan males treated at a London torture treatment center reported being sexually abused in 21 percent of cases. Eighty percent of 6,000 male concentration camp inmates in Sarajevo reported having been raped. Cases of male rape have been reported in Chile, the former Soviet Union, Croatia, Kuwait, and Greece.

Relevance to Human Service

Human service providers comprise a broad range of practitioners from paraprofessional and credentialed case workers to mental health and medical professionals. All must be culturally sensitive and competent to understand the physical and unseen wounds as well as the critical challenges to healing necessary to resume fulfilling lives. Practitioners must function within societies holding values and power hierarchies different from their own. Human service providers must be culturally competent to help war rape victims of different ages, sexes, genders, ethnicities, sexual orientations, and opposing war party affiliations.

Conclusion

Rape is an instrument of war that impacts victims in many ways. Societies impacted by rape as an instrument of war are debilitated, families are destroyed, and victims become shells of themselves. Human service providers can assist with concrete services, family reunification, immigration and refugee issues, and family losses. To this end, practitioners must be culturally competent and respectful of individual needs and beliefs. They must understand the magnitude of such violence, treating all victims humanely and with compassion while remaining realistic regarding the limitations of comprehensive healing in the face of values and cultural norms with which they are unfamiliar.

Kim Lorber
Ramapo College of New Jersey

See Also: Children and War; Mental Health Services, Ethnic Models and Multicultural Service; Refugee Assistance; Sexual Abuse Survivors; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and.

Further Readings

Cohen, Dara Kay. "Explaining Rape During Civil War: Cross-National Evidence (1980–2009)." American Political Science Association, v.107/2 (2013).

Fogelman, Eva. "Rape During the Nazi Holocaust: Vulnerabilities and Motivations." In C. Rittner and K. Roth, eds., Rape: Weapon of War and Genocide. St. Paul, MN: Paragon House, 2012.

Kelemen, Michele. In War Zones, Rape Is A Powerful Weapon. http://www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=114001201 (Accessed August 2013).

Kirby, Paul. "How Is Rape a Weapon of War?: Feminist International Relations, Modes of Critical Explanation and the Study of Wartime Sexual Violence." European Journal of International Relations (2012).

Pavšič, Petra. "War Rape: A Planned and Targeted Policy in War." http://www.consultancyafrica.com/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=1115:rape-a-planned-and-targeted-policy-in-war&catid=60:conflict-terrorism-discussion-papers&Itemid=265 (Accessed August 2013).

Reasonable Accommodations

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) is a civil rights law intending to remove barriers to employment, transportation, public services, and telecommunication for Americans with disabilities. Human service providers can proactively support those with disabilities in accessing legal rights. The ADA prohibits discrimination in all employment practices, and employers must provide reasonable accommodations to all qualified people with disabilities. Under the ADA, a person is considered disabled if he or she is limited in one or more life functions, has a record of disability, or is regarded as having a disability. An applicant or employee is qualified if he or she is capable of performing essential duties of the job.

A reasonable accommodation is any adaptation that enables the individual with a disability to equally apply for a job, perform essential job duties, and be involved in the rights and privileges of the job. A reasonable accommodation must effectually meet the needs of the individual. An accommodation is considered reasonable if it appears feasible on its face or is commonsensical.

Reasonable accommodations commonly implemented include making existing environments accessible; restructuring a job; modifying a work schedule; purchasing or adapting equipment; altering tests, materials, or policies; providing interpreters or readers; or reassignment to a vacant position. The ADA defines what is considered reasonable. An accommodation is unreasonable if it eliminates or substantially alters the fundamental duties of the position or if production standards would be reduced. Also, a reasonable accommodation should not cause undue hardship to the employer, defined as significant difficulty or expense. Employers are also not required to provide personal items used outside the workplace such as glasses or hearing aids.

Unfortunately, terms such as "reasonable," "undue hardship," and "qualified" are vague and have proven difficult to define. Many cases have been litigated, and courts have made progress in clarifying terms, leading to the reauthorized ADA in 2008.

Implementing Reasonable Accommodations

After the 2008 reauthorization, the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) put forward a document offering guidance on enforcing reasonable accommodations. Generally, reasonable accommodations are decided on a case-by-case basis, but employers should follow the EEOC's advice. Key elements from the EEOC's guidance explain the following.

Employers should attempt to advertise job opportunities in accessible locations and formats. For instance, if a phone number is listed on a job advertisement, a telecommunication device for the deaf number should also be listed.

During the prehire process of a job interview, disability-related questions should not be asked. Reasonable accommodations must be made at this stage, even if an examination is required. For instance, during an examination, the employer should provide an interpreter for a person who is deaf or a modified test for a person with a learning disability.

During any stage of employment, a person with a disability may request a reasonable accommodation, and requests may come in a variety of formats. A person with a disability may verbally request an accommodation in plain English or in writing. Another individual such as a human service professional or family member may also make a request on an individual's behalf.

An employer has the right to request reasonable documentation proving the individual has an ADA-defined disability. Professionals with expertise about the disability can supply the documentation. If the disability diagnosis has been previously established or is obvious, the employer may not request documentation.

In determining the appropriate accommodation, an interactive process should take place between the employer and the employee. However, the employer may choose from a range of effective accommodations. If multiple available accommodations are equally effectual, the employer should take into consideration the preference of the employee. Ultimately, the employer may choose the cheaper or easier option. For example, a vision-impaired employee requests software that reads text aloud. The employer instead offers a magnifying glass with the hopes it will be as effective. The employee, however, is less productive with the magnifying glass, thus it is determined that the software is the most reasonable accommodation. Once a reasonable accommodation is requested, the employer should respond expeditiously and process the request within 30 business days.

Outside of typical duties of employment, employees with disabilities must be provided access to workplace communication, trainings, services, or social functions. All communicative information must be disseminated in accessible formats. All facilities that nondisabled employees enjoy must be accessible, such as a lunchroom, gymnasium, or work-related transportation. If a social event is held, it should be accessible. For example, an employer assures that all office-wide communications occur through e-mail and that all training videos are captioned so a deaf employee can access all work-related information.

An employer may not make it public knowledge that an individual has requested or received a reasonable accommodation. This violates the employee's right to privacy. If the employee–employer interactive process fails and a lawsuit results, the burden of proof falls on the employer if it is determined that the requested accommodation is reasonable on face value.

Goals and Conclusions

The ADA has helped reduce discrimination and supported people with disabilities to become productive members of their communities. Employers who proactively work with employees with disabilities are successful in reducing discrimination in the workplace and often find that American's with disabilities are productive, creative, and competent employees.

Becoming knowledgeable about the legal rights of people with disabilities is key for employees with disabilities, employers, and human service professionals to ensure the fundamental rights of all Americans.

Jessica Bacon
Lehman College, The City University of New York

See Also: Ableism; Accommodation; Americans with Disabilities Act; Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990; Disability Services; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Individuals With Disabilities Education Act.

Further Readings

Ara, Allison. "The ADA Amendments Act of 2008: Do the Amendments Cure the Interpretation Problems of Perceived Disabilities." Santa Clara Law Review, v.50/1 (2010).

Parry, John. Equal Employment of Persons with Disabilities: Federal and State Law, Accommodations, and Diversity Best Practices. Chicago: American Bar Association, 2012.

United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Procedures for Providing Reasonable Accommodations for Individuals With Disabilities. http://www.eeoc.gov/eeoc/internal/reasonable_accommodation.cfm#E (Accessed January 2014).

Recreation Services

Recreation services and leisure services are often used interchangeably. By definition, both recreation and leisure play a vital role in promoting individual free time. This means the individual is not obligated to do any form of structured work. Recreational and leisure services were also designed as a resource that benefited everyone in a community and are viewed as a public good. These two emphases were aimed at helping to create higher-quality lives and communities through increased psychological and physical health and eliminate social issues through social reform.

Over the last decades, recreation and leisure services have gone through various transformations. These changes were dependent upon culture, social, and political dynamics. In the late 1800s, commercial recreation services such as a small theater and dance hall services served as a form of entertainment and encouraged wholesome, enriching experiences to counter the negative effects brought on by the Industrial Revolution. In the late 1900s, opportunities for structure and policy implementation to organize recreation and leisure services were developed as a consequence of the settlement houses and playground movements. As a result, many saw leisure and recreation as the perfect solution to the political, economic, and social inequities found in America. For example, the implementation of policies such as juvenile curfew laws, child labor laws, and extended education help to promote positive youth development. Today, recreation services can be found in major cities and communities throughout the United States. In most local neighborhoods with recreation services such as playgrounds, swimming pools, athletic fields, and community facilities are funded through the local tax base by members of that particular community. The benefit of recreation services is to increase the lives of individuals through mental and physical health, family and community relationships, environmental stewardship, arts, entertainment, and sharing of cultural traditions. Most programs are geared toward different age groups, genders, health issues, and cultural beliefs. Other recreation services address social issues such as helping immigrant children with acculturation to their social environments. Another benefit of recreation services is to help youth develop positive attributes and skills, which can expose them to different mechanisms away from the home environment. The overall purpose of recreation services is to address individual and community needs in a holistic fashion.

Training for Recreation Services Providers and Staff

Traditionally, individuals who peruse a career in recreation services focus on programming and management. Professional preparation is offered at major colleges and universities. Today, more than 500 programs are identified across the United States. These programs award associate-level through doctoral-level degrees. The degrees' concentration areas include leisure studies, therapeutic recreation, leisure and recreation administration and management, outdoor and natural resources, commercial recreation, tourism, and recreation leadership. College and university recreation programs are accredited by the National Recreation and Park Association and the National Council of Therapeutic Recreation Certification agencies. These accrediting agencies set criteria for the institutions in order to promote quality standards and ethical practices. Persons who are certified by these institutions must maintain continuous certification through the accrediting boards.

Recreation Services Jobs

Recreation services can be found in government, nonprofit, and for-profit commercial organizations. Individuals who are employed in the government sector usually work at the federal, state, local, and municipal level jobs. These services are funded by taxpayers' dollars and provided to all citizens for participation. Municipal government jobs are available in administration, park management, planning, aquatics, golf course management, facility supervising, cultural arts programming, athletics, and various other support positions. Recreational services jobs in the nonprofit arena are geared toward education, recreation and social services; thus, recreation is not their main purpose. Examples of these facilities are the Salvation Army, local charitable foundations, the Girl Scouts, and the Boy Scouts. The staff in these organizations work as youth leaders, camp and center directors, adventure planners, and recreational therapists. Commercial recreation services offer recreation and leisure for profit. Employees in this segment of recreation and services specialize in the hotel and hospitality management, tourism, travel, sports, arts and culture, and professional event services businesses. All these sectors of recreation and leisure services offer some benefit to humans and society as a whole. The field covers a wide spectrum of employment opportunities and is expected to increase as more individuals devote free time and money to increase their pursuit of leisure and recreation experiences.

The Influence of Recreations

Today, recreation services have influenced our society in many different ways. It strengthens the relationship and interactions between individuals and communities to achieve more positive outcomes. Increased diversity has forced recreation leaders to develop new techniques and management skills such as conceptual and human relations dimension. Also, the concept of leisure has encouraged Americans to take yearly vacations with family or friends to explore new personal, social, and cultural experiences. These efforts have contributed to our society's economic, social, and educational systems and provide an opportunity to enhance the richness of our society.

Andrea E. McDonald
Texas A & M University

See Also: National Assessment Governing Board; Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation; Primacy of Place; Regional Cultural Competence; Role Flexibility, International Differences in; Tribal Social Services.

Further Readings

Cordes, Kathleen A. and Hilmi M. Ibrahim. Applications in Recreation and Leisure: For Today and the Future. No. Ed. 2. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1999.

Henderson, et al. Introduction to Recreation and Leisure Services. State College, PA: Venture Publishing, 2001.

McLean, Daniel and Amy Hurd. Kraus' Recreation and Leisure in Modern Society. Boston: Jones & Bartlett Publishers, 2011.

Redlining

Redlining is the practice, currently illegal in the United States, of color-coding different neighborhoods on residential maps based on mortgage default risk (as a proxy for race). While race may not have been explicit, race was a factor in neighborhood ratings and whether lenders would approve mortgages in an area; red was the lowest category in the rating system, and mortgages were rarely (if ever) approved to buy properties in redlined areas.

History

In the 1930s, the U.S. federal government initiated programs to increase the availability of home ownership and simultaneously increase employment in construction and related industries. As a result, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation (HOLC) was birthed in 1933 with the purpose of refinancing urban mortgages and providing those who lost their homes due to foreclosure opportunities to buy them back with low-interest loans. In developing a rating system to evaluate the risk of loans made to specific urban areas, the HOLC institutionalized and formalized redlining.

The ranking system put neighborhoods into one of four categories: type A (green), type B (blue), type C (yellow), and type D (red). These colors were drawn onto residential security maps, which were used to inform lending decisions. The actual term redlining was coined by sociologist and activist John McKnight in the 1960s and was in reference to the red lines on residential security maps. Those homes located in yellow or red regions on residential security maps rarely (if ever) were approved for HOLC loans. The ranking systematically undervalued older, more racially and ethnically mixed, central-city neighborhoods, placing a priority on new construction in suburban areas. Additionally, African Americans were almost always redlined, ranked in the lowest rating category. As a result, mortgage funds were channeled away from

African American neighborhoods as well as those suspected to be likely to contain substantial African American populations in the future.

The HOLC residential security maps became somewhat of a standard, and soon, private banks and lenders in the 1930s and 1940s relied on the HOLC maps or created their own similar maps when making lending decisions. The redlining issue was thus not restricted to the HOLC but became a massive disinvestment by private institutions in predominantly African American communities as well.

Redlining was enforced by racially restrictive covenants implemented through neighborhood associations, which were contracts among property owners stating that they would not lease to an African American, sell to an African American, or otherwise let an African American occupy their property. If restrictive covenants were violated, as contracts, they could be taken to court and the violator could be sued for damages. Contract terms were typically 20 years in duration and required 75 percent of neighborhood association property owners' backing to be enforceable. Peer pressure often served as an effective means to gain the necessary backing.

In April of 1968, partly in response to conclusions drawn from the race riots in the 1960s, Congress passed the Fair Housing Act, officially banning discrimination in the sale or rental of housing. Unfortunately, enforcement provisions under the act were relatively weak—these provisions were weakened as the bill passed through Congress—and residential racial integration did not follow after its passing. The act had a short statute of limitations (180 days from the alleged violation) and relied on individual efforts to combat housing discrimination rather than a large-scale institutional effort. Housing testers at local fair housing commission offices continue to be the primary means of prosecuting or uncovering housing discrimination, and no systemic federal government approach to deal with housing discrimination or residential segregation has been established to date.

In a further effort to combat redlining, Congress passed the Community Reinvestment Act in 1977, requiring banks to demonstrate evidence that they were providing credit to low-income areas that had been historically unable to secure capital.

Impact

The impact of redlining is multifaceted and substantial. Redlining has contributed to lower property values in the urban inner city, reducing home ownership in those areas. Additionally, with fewer potential owners of inner-city properties due to the inability to secure mortgages for such properties, redlining increased landlord abandonment. Abandoned buildings often become hotbeds for criminal activity in urban areas. Refusing to provide mortgages for central city areas and instead opting toward suburban or rural communities, redlining has contributed to sprawl, decreasing population density.

An obvious consequence of redlining has been the persistence of racial residential segregation, but another consequence is the social reproduction of racial wealth inequality. With blatant housing discrimination and the discrimination of lenders, African Americans who were able to invest in housing when redlining was legal were unlikely to see the same return on their investments as white Americans. Not only were African Americans more likely to rent than own homes, but those who bought homes often were not approved to buy homes in suburban areas where property values skyrocketed. Instead, loans were approved in urban and inner-city areas, where redlining was a key factor in the decimation of property values and increase in crime. The result, from the perspective of the racial wealth gap, is that, while many white Americans owned homes with values that increased to perhaps 10 times the purchase price, securing some form of inheritance for their children, African American children were much less likely to generate any substantial inheritance from their property and much less likely to own property in the first place.

Current Issues

With redlining prohibited but residential segregation persisting, a number of additional issues have come up. One such issue is known as reverse redlining; this is where the lender or insurer targets minority consumers in order to charge them more. Indeed, rather than ignoring minorities or not considering them for loans, reverse redlining targets minorities for exploitation. Meanwhile, some still practice redlining but get around the letter of the law by using sponsor concentration or rental concentration as an excuse to redline. While this is still technically illegal, there is evidence to suggest that this is practiced as an internal policy. Finally, some recent research has suggested that in the foreclosure crisis that coincided with the Great Recession of 2008, residential segregation made possible a targeted marketing of subprime loans to minorities. As a result, minorities were hit particularly hard when it came to foreclosures.

While redlining is currently prohibited by law, lax enforcement of regulations for fair housing and an absence of a systemic solution has resulted in a perpetuation of residential segregation and numerous multifarious consequences that are particularly detrimental to African Americans and other people of color.

David J. Luke
University of Kentucky

See Also: African Americans; Community Reinvestment Act (1977); Environmental Racism; Fair Lending Practices; Isolated Communities and Cultural Competence; Socioeconomic Status.

Further Readings

Massey, Douglas S. and Nancy A. Denton. American Apartheid: Segregation and the Making of the Underclass. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1993.

Pietila, Antero. Not in My Neighborhood: How Bigotry Shaped a Great American City. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2010.

Rugh, Jacob S. and Douglas S. Massey. "Racial Segregation and the American Foreclosure Crisis." American Sociological Review, v.75/5 (2010).

Squires, Gregory D. and Thomas J. Espenshade, eds. Insurance Redlining: Disinvestment, Reinvestment, and the Evolving Role of Financial Institutions. Washington DC: Urban Institute Press, 1997.

Refugee Assistance

According to the 1951 convention relating to the status of refugees, a refugee is any person who is being persecuted or has a realistic fear of being persecuted due to his or her race, religion, or nationality, or because he or she is a member of a particular group or hold a particular political opinion. A refugee must also live outside of his or her country and be unwilling or unable to return home because he or she is afraid that he or she will not be protected by the home country. U.S. federal law defines refugees in a similar way, with the added distinction that, in order for someone to be considered a refugee, he or she must either be designated as such by the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) or a U.S. embassy, or be the member of an identified group that has been granted priority status by the U.S. government. Refugees receive their status prior to arriving in the United States, and a political asylum seeker receives his or her status after arriving in the United States (often arriving on visa such as a conference or student visa).

Currently, there are approximately 42 million refugees worldwide. While the number of refugees the United States accepts has ranged in recent years, there were approximately 58,000 refugees resettled in the United States in 2012, and just over 29,000 individuals were granted political asylum. Refugees are processed by the U.S. Department of State through the U.S. Refugee Admissions program in coordination with U.S. embassies around the world. Each year, admissions criteria and admissions limits are established. Refugees are then interviewed to ensure that they meet the established criteria. Once eligibility is confirmed, refugees undergo security and medical screening and are referred to a U.S. resettlement agency approved by the State Department. Then travel arrangements are made. This process can be extended or may occur swiftly depending on a variety of circumstances, including the urgency of the situation in the host country where the refugee is residing. For instance, protracted refugee situations, illness, and security situations may facilitate the resettlement process.

Refugees in the United States are eligible for several legal entitlements such as the right to work, and a fast track to citizenship, as well as a range of services. Refugees are forced to leave their home country for a range of reasons, most of which involve psychological and physical trauma. Many refugees have survived war, torture, rape, and a range of other traumatic experiences. Most refugees have been forced to flee their homes and communities, often with very little notice. They have lost loved ones or have endured illness, often on long treks in search of safety. Prior to refugees being resettled to the United States, many have spent years living in tenuous situations with minimal services. They come to the United States frightened, traumatized, confused, and vulnerable.

Because of the dire conditions and grave situations, refugee services are broad and include language training, vocational assistance, housing assistance, trauma counseling, and family counseling. Many services are provided by the original refugee resettlement agencies, which receive funding (albeit minimal) from the federal government for the resettlement process. Initial services include assistance with housing, medical care, and school registration, with a particular focus on services that encourage economic self-sufficiency such as employment services.

In many respects, the current U.S. Refugee Resettlement program has not kept pace with contemporary refugee dynamics. For instance, many of the world's refugees are now resettled due to violent civil conflict and often remain in protracted situations for decades before being resettled in the United States. This dynamic reflects a significantly different picture than refugee dynamics during the Cold War, when individuals and families were fleeing from communist countries. Not only does this shift have ramifications for refugee services with regard to the type of assistance needed (i.e., most incoming refugees have experienced far greater trauma than in previous decades), but historic programs that were designed to be positive may have a negative effect on many refugees' resettlement experience. For instance, all refugees are provided with a no-interest travel loan to cover the cost of travel, facilitated through the International Organization for Migration (IOM).

While this may have been a helpful program for incoming refugees several decades ago, compelling refugees who have lived much of their lives from UNHCR-facilitated camps located in war-torn regions to pay for their travel seems to be an unreasonable expectation and can set new refugees up for failure. This is particularly a risk for female heads-of-household with numerous children, histories of trauma, limited education, and minimal employment skills. Some families are burdened with thousands of dollars of debt the moment they arrive in the country. They are expected to learn English, gain employment skills, gain employment, find child care, and within a relatively short time, begin making payments on a loan.

Women and children in a refugee camp in Darfur, Sudan. Many of the world's refugees are now resettled due to violent civil conflict and often remain in protracted situations for decades before being resettled in the United States.

One of the greatest challenges in providing services for refugee populations is the complex nature of the challenges they experience—both in their country of origin, as well as in the country of resettlement. As the need for self-sufficiency is so urgent, human services such as employment assistance programs often take precedence over other types of human services such as trauma counseling. Refugees who do not receive adequate psychological counseling often struggle the most with the resettlement process. Many refugees are children, some of whom are unaccompanied and have experienced various types of trauma and loss and have poor or no education, and yet they are expected to adapt quickly and successfully to the U.S. educational system. Many refugees are women who are survivors of gender-based violence. Sometimes, this violence follows them in the form of domestic violence, and they are in need of family counseling as well as women's empowerment counseling and advocacy. Men need counseling as well, not only to deal with the trauma they have likely experienced but because many come from countries that are patriarchal in nature, and adjusting to the egalitarian nature of U.S. society is challenging.

Although initial refugee services are provided primarily by the government-contracted refugee resettlement agencies, longer-term services are provided by a range of human service agencies such as child welfare agencies, domestic violence shelters, counselors at schools, homeless shelters, public health agencies, and churches. In time, many refugees adapt quite well to U.S. society, yet others continue to struggle with poverty, underemployment, domestic violence, and substance abuse and remain marginalized and vulnerable for years.

Michelle Martin
DePaul University

See Also: African Immigrants; Displaced Persons; Diaspora.

Further Readings

Bruno, A. U.S. Refugee Resettlement Assistance. Darby, PA: Diane Publishing, 2011.

Hanna, T. E. "No Refuge for Iraqi Refugees: How the United States Can Improve Its Refugee Resettlement Policies." California Western International Law Journal, v.42 (2011).

Vongkhamphra, E. G., C. Davis, and N. Adem. "The Resettling Process: A Case Study of a Bantu Refugee's Journey to the USA." International Social Work, v.54/2 (2011).

Young, W. and M. McKenna. "Measure of a Society: The Treatment of Unaccompanied Refugee and Immigrant Children in the United States." Harvard CR-CLL Review, v.45 (2010).

Regional Cultural Competence

The term cultural competence first emerged in the United States in the 1980s in response to the need for more diversity among providers serving social sector services such as education, social work, and health to better meet the needs of an increasingly diverse immigrant population of the country. This concept is now taken up in many other English-speaking immigrant-receiving countries, like Canada, to respond to the needs of their growing immigrant populations whose English is a second language. In the health sector, there is increasing evidence of inequity experienced by minority populations.

The focus of this entry is to examine the components of cultural competency and its importance in the health system in its entirety within Canada. Although the Aboriginal and First Nations population has a long history of inequities in this country, in this entry, we focus on immigrants and visible minorities only.

Country Context

Canada is a growing multicultural and multiracial country. It attracts more than 200,000 newcomers annually. Immigrants accounted for 20 percent of Canada's population in 2006, and according to Statistics Canada, this proportion is projected to reach between 25 and 28 percent by 2031. The 2006 census reported that nearly 5,068,100 people surveyed belonged to a visible minority group, accounting for about 16.2 percent of the total population. These growing numbers reflect change in Canada's demographic composition since 1971, when the majority of the population were of European heritage.

In recent years, a majority of the immigrants are arriving from countries in Asia, the Middle East, Latin America, and Africa, and now south Asians constitute the largest visible minority group in the country. The 2006 census also reports that about 72.8 percent of the immigrant population have a mother tongue other than English or French. The growing cultural and linguistic diversity indicates the need and the importance of cultural competency within social and health systems.

Canada also receives a substantial number of refugees. Depending on the background circumstances, they may have specific physical and mental health needs and may not have the language abilities or skills common among other types of migrants. Health care providers who do not have training in cultural competency may be inadequately prepared to work with such diverse populations.

Defining Cultural Competency

There is no consensus on a universal definition of cultural competency, and the terms culture, ethnicity, diversity, and race are generally used interchangeably in the literature. Some scholars have defined cultural competency as a term that synchronizes behaviors, attitudes, and policies to help a system, organization, or profession to work effectively with culturally diverse populations. There is, however, an ongoing discussion as to how this important social construct can be better defined and operationalized. The need for an operational definition has increasingly been sought because of growing ethnocultural diversity in the composition of immigrant population and their children.

In the health sector, the importance of the construct of cultural competence is well recognized and considered an integral component to providing quality and equitable health care services to all. However, the lack of clarity in the definition of the construct has limited its application for practice.

Further complexity occurs because terms like race, ethnicity, and culture are used interchangeably and are interrelated in complex ways that are difficult to disentangle in practical situations. In order to develop an understanding of cultural competence, therefore, the meanings of commonly used interrelated terms need to be clarified. In the following section, these interrelated terms are defined.

Race

Race is a social construct and has no biological and genetic basis. It refers to conferred identities based on gross morphological features such as skin color, hair type, body proportions, and other supposed biological expressions of group inferiority. Many social scientists have replaced the term race with the word ethnicity to refer to self-identifying groups based on shared beliefs, culture, religion, and history. The term historically signifies stereotyping, exclusion, and other forms of social injustices.

Racism is the force by which superiority and inferiority of a race are characterized, and skin color plays an important role in such classifications. For example, in Western societies where the predominant group in the population is white Caucasian, African Americans and other groups with darker skin pigmentation are viewed as inferior to whites.

In recent years, scholars are increasingly challenging the biological basis of race. Due to globalization and high migration flows, the rates of interracial marriages have increased, and children of mixed-race couples tend to have varying degrees of skin pigmentation, yet they share the same genetic characteristics and social and cultural specifics of their parents.

In the health sector, evidence shows that, in North America, blacks and other minority populations of color are disadvantaged in various aspects of life in addition to socioeconomic disadvantage. For example, African Americans are more likely to receive inadequate treatment for pain as compared to the white population. Similarly, in Canada, visible minority newcomer; women are less likely to undergo screening tests, for example, screening for breast and cervical cancers.

Ethnicity

The term ethnicity may mean different things to different people. In multiracial and multicultural societies such as Canada, the term ethnicity may incorporate the meaning of both race and culture in a positive sense. Often, the two terms ethnicity and race are used interchangeably or in combination, such as race and ethnicity. The main difference between race and ethnicity is that race denotes a physical attribute, whereas ethnicity is considered a self-chosen category and reflects culture, religion, language, and ancestry that can help in identifying a group with a particular country or heritage. Although both terms are recognized by people's actual behavioral and physical characteristics, the context in which the two terms are used can have very different meanings. Racial characteristics are described as predetermined that do not change under social pressures, whereas ethnicity is amenable to change under social and other pressures. Ethnic groups, therefore, assimilate over time with other ethnic groups, while racial groups' identifications are kept separately in the mainstream context. When these terms are used interchangeably, it can potentially obscure or narrow the meanings of both the terms. The context in which identification of people in terms of their race or ethnicity is made is important. In racist societies, oftentimes, ethnicity is used to conceal racism.

In the context of health, there is substantial evidence indicating inequities among members of these groups in both the state of health and the accessibility and quality of health services available to them. The social differentiations based on cultural and racial identity may promote discrimination, lead to social isolation, and impose other stresses and deprivations in their lives. To tackle these issues, the existing health system, which was originally developed to address the needs of the majority population, may need to adapt to the needs diverse populations. These changes should expand to all social services and not only to the health sector to help address health disparities.

Culture

Culture is an anthropological term, and its definition is variable. The term signifies more than race, ethnicity, gender, class, religion, disability or ability, or sexual orientation. Culture is often confused with race, mainly because people who are seen as racially different are also conceptualized as having different cultural backgrounds, and the term is generally used to hide racism in society.

In contrast to other terms, culture signifies a dynamic process of developing understanding of other people's backgrounds and experiences that are different from their own. That is to say, culture is not static like race but changes over time as people resettle, adapt, and assimilate in new environments. In the process of this resettlement, members of a particular culture or ethnicity will not always think and act in ways that are consistent with their previous social and cultural practices.

Culture plays an important role in the health care sector, including determining the quality of services and reducing health disparities. The knowledge of culture and training in cultural competency helps service providers in establishing a therapeutic relationship with patients and clients from the very first encounter. Cultural beliefs are well known to shape understandings of and responses to health and illness, and when there is a mismatch between the belief system and the care provided, the outcomes are usually poorer. For example, in cultures where mental health issues are stigmatized, symptoms of depression may be expressed as somatic pain, which is likely to be misdiagnosed if the provider does not have a comprehensive understanding of diversity and other cultures. These issues are of particular importance in an immigrant country like Canada, where health care is designed on the Western biomedical paradigm and may not meet the needs of all client groups.

Visible Minority

About 75 percent of immigrants who have arrived in Canada since 2001 are considered by Statistics Canada to be visible minorities. Visible minorities are identified by Statistics Canada as "persons, other than Aboriginal persons, who are non-Caucasian in race and non-white in colour." The groups included in this category are: "Chinese, South Asians, Blacks, Arabs, West Asians, Filipinos, Southeast Asians, Latin Americans, Japanese, Koreans and other visible minority groups, such as Pacific Islanders."

Some scholars contest the term visible minorities. They argue that the term agglomerates diverse groups of people who are historically different, and their experiences as immigrants are different. New immigrants and ethnic minorities, because of their low economic status, tend to occupy a less-favorable social position in a new country. Research indicates that an individual's socioeconomic position is strongly linked to less access to care and greater health problems. Often, the disadvantaged positions held by visible minority groups are confounded by race and ethnicity.

Diversity

Diversity is also a very broad term and not well defined. Diversity can be visible or invisible. Visible diversity refers to individual characteristics that are always evident such as age, gender, race, ethnicity, physical appearance, and speech accents or dialects. Invisible diversity refers to characteristics that are not evident such as sexual orientation, religion, social class, occupation, and religious beliefs.

Visible diversity is always apparent as is the case of visible minority groups in Canada; the risk among this group to encounter discrimination, marginalization, stigmatization, and stereotyping is considerably increased. Thus, visible or invisible characteristics of diversity can have real advantages or disadvantages to the individual.

Intersectionality

More recently, in the Canadian context, race and ethnicity are viewed as intersectional because racial diversity occurs within ethnically defined groups. Intersectionality recognizes that identities (e.g., ethnic, racial, or gender) are fluid and individuals' multiple identities intersect and interact depending on context. Thus, it avoids essentializing identities and further reinforcing stereotypes of difference. Intersectional frameworks also consider power dynamics and its shifting contextual basis. However, application of intersectional frameworks to health care practice is in its earlier phases in Canada.

There is usually contention between supporters of cultural competency approaches in health care and those of antioppressive practitioners in the community. However, research shows that, when knowledge from cultural competency and antioppressive practice are combined, best practices and policies to address health disparities can be developed. These practices can address social determinants such as class, gender, and immigrant status in multicultural society. Understanding these intersections will allow the recognition and the needs of marginalized groups in the society.

Cultural Competence and Health

Changing Canadian demographics, increasing workforce diversity, and disparities in health access and outcomes call for change in the health and social services system as a whole. The Canadian Multicultural Act (1970) and the Canadian Human Rights Act (1981) recognize and promote the understanding that multiculturalism reflects the cultural to racial diversity of Canadian society. The policies stipulate that all individuals have equal opportunity and have their needs accommodated. Under the Human Rights Act, an individual based on his or her particular characteristics such as age, gender, race, culture, and disability can demand service providers to accommodate his or her needs; for example, interpreters for those who do not speak English or French.

Cultural competency refers to the ability of service providers to understand, respond, and provide appropriate care according to the needs of diverse groups of people. An inaccurate diagnosis can be made due to lack of cultural understanding during health communication, which can lead to serious consequences for the patient. In health care, therefore, cultural competency in health care programs are aimed at preventing medical errors and increasing access to quality care for disadvantaged populations such as immigrants.

Research shows that, for health care providers to be culturally competent, they need to value cultural diversity, have the ability to do cultural self-assessment, be conscious of the factors when cultures interact, and be able to apply knowledge and skills to adapt to service delivery that reflect an understanding of cultural diversity. This does not mean that a service provider needs to know about every culture; rather, it means to be able to respect the differences, be willing to adapt to differences, and be able to provide the care the patient requires.

Cultural Competency Continuum

Seminal work on the cultural competency continuum framework was done by researchers. In the literature, cultural competency is described as a dynamic process that evolves over time. Cultural destructiveness is at the bottom and cultural proficiency on the top of the continuum. The framework describes six stages or characteristics through which the continuum establishes over an expanded period of time. The characteristics start from the extreme negative end of the continuum and are described as (1) cultural destructiveness, (2) cultural incapacity, (3) cultural blindness, (4) cultural precompetence, (5) cultural competence, and (6) cultural proficiency. These characteristics were developed to help systems and organizations to self-monitor their work and plan accordingly.

Cultural destructiveness is characterized by attitudes, practices, structures, and policies established in the system or organization that creates distinctions among cultural groups and can be destructive to certain cultural groups.

Cultural incapacity is the weakness in the system or organization to effectively deliver services to diverse clients according to their needs. Characteristics may include institutional practices that may result in discrimination in hiring and promotion or not providing enough allocation to fulfill the needs of certain cultural groups.

Cultural blindness occurs when organizations within a multicultural society treat everyone the same and do not appreciate culture differences. As a result, no value is placed on appropriate training of workforce on cultural competence.

Cultural precompetence refers to systems and organizations that are aware of the changing needs and are prepared to respond effectively to culturally diverse populations.

Cultural competence refers to systems' or organizations' awareness to respond to the needs of culturally and linguistically diverse populations. Characteristics of cultural precompetence include the desire to deliver high-quality and cost-effective services; commitment to civil rights and social justice; community participation; policies for hiring a diverse workforce and training in cultural competence; and inclusiveness of all groups.

Cultural proficiency is the last characteristic of the competency continuum. Organizations that have reached cultural proficiency will reflect their commitment through emphasis in their mission statement and all other documents; the commitment to serve culturally and linguistically diverse populations; adopting good practices; continuously monitoring its progress; policies and structures to recruit and train a diverse workforce; resources for evaluating cultural competence of staff and the organization as a whole; and community participation in planning and governance of the organization.

Good Practices

Some of the strategies suggested in the literature for improving cultural competence within organizations include the following.

Training of workforce—evidence shows that training and refreshment courses are essential for developing cultural competence. However, these trainings should be for all staff, including administrative staff, researchers, managers and policy makers. The purpose of such intervention is to increase institutional capacity for providing appropriate care to diverse populations. Currently, there is no consensus on the content of these courses, and there is paucity of data on the cost-effectiveness of such interventions

Diversification of the workforce—the need for diversification in the health sector workforce is increasingly being sought. Organizational policies and structures need to be in place to ensure that service providers reflect the diversity of the populations they serve.

"Cultural mediator" is a term used in some European countries, such as in the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Belgium, France, Italy, and Spain, who have experience improving services for the Roma population. For people with English as second language, it can be a major obstacle in accessing services. Providing good-quality interpretation services can help in translating what the patient or client is saying but would not be able to extract the meaning. Proper translation would require the appropriate language skills, considerable medical knowledge, and having knowledge of the care seekers' cultural and social contexts. Experience shows that this is a dual need: Interpretation and understanding the cultural and social contexts could be filled by cultural mediators. These are people from the same minority groups that work as brokers between service providers and patients. Their roles are very varied; for example, some help in connecting the communities with services, while others help in improving health workers' understanding of the community and the community members' understanding of the health system, and yet others may guide people to treatment by guiding them in the initial stages of the intake process. The potentials of using cultural mediators for improving access to services and for reducing access barriers for minority groups is promising; however, legal and training issues are yet to be resolved.

Communication and Cultural Competence

Research indicates that language is one of the most common communication barriers in the multicultural society of Canada. As a result, the need for good communication skills among health care professionals has become important. Both verbal and nonverbal communications skills are required to communicate effectively with diverse communities who have varied needs, language abilities, and literacy. Without proper communication skills, service providers may misdiagnose a patient, not be able to obtain informed consent, have difficulty in explaining the treatment process in nontechnical language to patients, and may fail to build the relationship needed for ongoing health maintenance.

Challenges

The major challenges to the system are lack of commitment at all levels of the health and social system; lack of diversity in leadership and workforce within the health and social system; not enough information and understanding of the needs of diverse groups of population; a health system designed to fulfill the needs of the dominant population but not yet modified to meet the needs of diverse populations; and poor communication between health care providers and clients or patients of different cultural, ethnic, and racial backgrounds whose English is a second language.

Nasim Haque
Nazilla Khanlou
York University

See Also: Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural and Linguistically Appropriate Services Standards; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Competence, Training in; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Measuring and Assessing; Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Diversity and Quality in Health Care; Ethnicity, Definitions of; Health Care, Disparities in; Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of; Journal of Ethnic and Cultural Diversity; Journal of Immigrant and Minority Health; Medical Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for; Medicine, Workplace, Diversity in; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health; Race, Social Definition of; Universal Access/Universal Design.

Further Readings

Campling, J., ed. Mental Health, Race and Culture. Hong Kong: Macmillan Press, 1991.

Georgetown University Center for Child and Human Development. "Cultural Competence Continuum." National Center for Cultural Competence. http://gucchd.georgetown.edu/nccc (Accessed January 2014).

Srivastava, R. H., ed. Guide to Clinical Cultural Competence. Toronto: Elsevier Canada, 2007.

World Health Organization. "How Health Systems Can Address Health Inequities Linked to Migration and Ethnicity." In Briefing on Policy Issues Produced Through the WHO/European Commission Equity Project. Copenhagen: World Health Organization, Regional Office for Europe: Copenhagen, 2010.

Rehabilitation Centers

The goal of rehabilitation centers (rehab centers) is to assist individuals to function effectively within their environments. These environments include major social institutions like religious institutions, families, and educational and occupational institutions. Although individuals may continue to need accommodations, they are able to function as a part of society. For rehab to be effective, it must produce a physical, mental, or social change in the individual. Prison officials believe that prisons achieve this goal, perhaps in part but not fully.

Initially, rehab centers were only for the deviant members of society, such as those with mental illness, cognitive or intellectual disabilities, substance dependence, or physical or sensory limitations until sociologists, psychologists, medical doctors, and mental health advocates recognized that separating these individuals from society further handicapped these populations. Confining individuals to institutions only enabled the individuals to develops a certain mentality that might be described as an institutionalized or prison mentality, where the individuals believe themselves unable to be independent. As these negative effects of institutionalization became apparent, efforts were made to shift care back to the community, thus contributing to what is currently known as rehabilitation.

Rehabilitation has adopted the definition of returning individuals with a physical disability or medical or social impairment to independent functioning. These individuals are expected to adjust normally within society. The criterion of adjustment is crucial to defining rehabilitation, according to R. Wilmot. Adjustment to socially defined norms for behavior also defines rehabilitation. Did the individual relapse or reoffend? As such, rehabilitation is teaching individuals to cope with the stresses and strains of daily living. Stresses and strains can be physical challenges or mental obstacles. Various agencies (rehabilitation centers) respond to the rehabilitative needs of the special populations to address the stress of daily life in an appropriate manner. Additionally, each rehab center offers different resources and therapies to respond to the needs of their population.

Evolution of the Rehabilitation Center

Historically, prisons and psychiatric hospitals were considered rehabilitation centers. Both were used as places of isolation. The assumption consistently made by policy makers, family members, and loved ones was that the socially deviant needed to be separate from the remainder of society in order to protect them or to protect society. Furthermore, there existed the belief, report F. Cullen and P. Gendreau, that offender treatment should be an integral goal of the correctional system and not mainstream society.

Robert Martinson and his Nothing Works doctrine assisted with the separation of correctional facilities from rehab centers. The social and political context associated with prisons was not one associated with rehab but punishment. These ideologies are what separate correctional facilities from rehabilitation centers. Correctional facilities have rehabilitative components and programs; nonetheless, they are still correctional facilities, with the intended goal of retribution. Rehab is not punishment; this distinction is very apparent with facilitates with a focus on physical or sensory limitations.

During the 1970s, prisons and psychiatric wards became crowded with individuals who abused alcohol and drugs or were dependent on these, C. F. Levinthal found, and this forced political ideology and policy changes. Correctional agencies were no longer the sole option, and the rehab center emerged. Various types of rehab centers emerged: drug rehab, alcohol rehab, addiction rehab, and cognitive rehab. These adapted to the needs of the individuals who were once imprisoned.

Much different from prisons, psychiatric hospitals, and alcohol and drug treatment facilities, physical impairment treatment facilities provide treatment to individuals with spinal cord damage or neurological injuries. The Warm Springs Institute, founded by President Roosevelt in 1927 as a post-polio rehabilitation center, was an establishment that emphasized physical health and the sense of social normalcy, describes L. Patterson. However, this institution only serviced whites and had its limitations.

However, this concept has led to what is known today as medical rehabilitation. These rehab centers not only deal with medical and physical problems but also provide psychological assistance. Individuals with major medical problems that have suffered a brain or neurological injury and lost some or all functioning have additional problems. Feelings of hopelessness that may turn into suicidal tendencies need to be addressed. This makes the psychological services rendered a very important component of all rehab centers.

Rehabilitation Policy and Regulation

As prisons were (and some still are) used as rehab centers and the conditions of prison did not resemble a hotel resort (like Warm Springs), prisoners began to complain. Their complaints reached the U.S. Supreme Court, thus inspiring the Prisoners' Rights Movement. Supported by the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), prisoners began to advocate for prison reform. This reform addressed the issues that were problematic to incarceration, including medical care. A list of the problems that were the focus of reform included availability of mental health treatment, substance abuse services, restriction of prisoner's rights, and the overreliance of solitary confinement. Conditions of confinement would often exacerbate physical and mental health issues.

Disability activists advocated for what is known today as the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. This movement was in its prime during the 1960s and 1970s. Rehab centers provided individuals with limitations a sense of normalcy while on the grounds of the facilities. However, once the individuals left the walls of these institutions, there were still many barriers to access to overcome, both physical and social. Beyond the walls of rehab centers and summer camps, students began to form organizations that lobbied for barrier-free environments and equality.

There were very many homegrown organizations, but Disabled in Action (DIA) was the first large-scale, cross-disability organization of its kind. This organization's mission is to represent individuals with various disabilities against systemic discrimination. Why would this type of organization be needed if President Richard Nixon already enacted the Rehabilitation Act of 1973? There was still a lot of resistance to the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. School boards were not licensing teachers who were in wheelchairs who passed the written and oral exams. The failure was based on a physical or medical exam. That is just an example of the numerous disability discriminations that were prevalent after the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 was passed. Therefore, DIA worked tirelessly to get the act amended, and Section 504 was added successfully.

Additionally, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, Section 504, was integral in ensuring that individuals leaving care did not experience discrimination. The Rehabilitation Act lists the qualifying disabilities and clearly states that reasonable accommodations should be made for such an individual. This piece of legislation protects those who meet the disability definition. It also guarantees the individual the opportunity to be a contributing member of society.

Evaluation of Rehabilitation

Guiding interventions of rehab success should be based on best practices and focus on dynamic limitations that can potentially be changed. Multi-analyses reveal that rehab centers should provide meaningful activity for individuals with chronic physical and mental health problems. The prevalence of boredom is a reoccurring issue in many rehab centers. These suggest that the treatment focus should be behavioral in nature. In general, behavioral interventions are effective in changing an array of human behavior.

Successful rehab programs should motivate individuals to participate in rehabilitation activities. Motivation can be measured as minimizing the problem of boredom, according to P. Bracke, K. Bruynooghe, and M. Verhaeghe. Pinpointing organizational causes of boredom in mental health and substance abuse rehabilitation can help to enrich the rehabilitative process. One main purpose of the rehabilitation process is to provide mental health and substance-abusing clients meaningful activities that eliminate idle time.

Because effectiveness in reducing relapse or recidivism is not a perfect indicator of effectiveness and does not apply to organizations that do not handle dependencies or antisocial behavior, programs might consider the program's effectiveness in restoring some greater measure of function as one way of evaluating rehab; possibly, measures of self-care, mobility, attitudes toward self and others, personal motivation, and task completion. This list of measures can be applied to almost all rehab facilities as evaluation measures.

Doshie Piper
University of the Incarnate Word

See Also: Mental Health Services, Adult; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment; Rehabilitative Services.

Further Readings

Allen, F. A. The Decline of the Rehabilitative Ideal: Penal Policy and Social Purpose. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1981.

Bonta, J. and P. Gendreau. "Coping With Prison." In Peter Suedfeld and Philip E. Tetlock, eds., Psychology and Social Policy. New York: Hemisphere, 1991.

Cullen, F. T. and B. Applegate. Offender Rehabilitation: Effective Correctional Intervention. Aldershot, England: Ashgate/Dartmouth, 1997.

Fienberg, S. and P. Grambsch. "An Assessment of the Accuracy of the Effectiveness of Correctional Treatment. In Lee Sechrest, Susan O. White, and Elizabeth D. Brown, eds., The Rehabilitation of Criminal Offenders: Problems and Prospects. Washington, DC: National Academy of Sciences, 1979.

Gendreau, P., F. T. Cullen, and J. Bonta. "Intensive Rehabilitation Supervision: The Next Generation in Community Corrections?" Federal Probation, v.58 (1994).

Lester, D. and P. Van Voorhis. "Cognitive Therapies." In Patricia Van Voorhis, Michael Braswell, and David Lester, eds., Correctional Counseling and Rehabilitation. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson Publishing Company, 1997.

Lipsey, M. W. "Can Rehabilitative Programs Reduce the Recidivism of Juvenile Offenders? An Inquiry Into the Effectiveness of Practical Programs." Virginia Journal of Social Policy and Law, v.6 (1999).

Rehabilitative Services

Rehabilitation services are the comprehensive care of, and recovery from, illness or injury in infants through older adults. Rehabilitation involves a multidisciplinary team approach to develop a treatment plan that addresses a person's physical and cognitive deficits so that the individual can return to functioning at as high of a level as possible—and aligned with the goals he or she wants to achieve.

The role of the social worker in a rehabilitation team setting is both traditional and evolving. This is in response to the seismic changes in health care policy that affect service delivery from the micro level all the way through the macro level. This entry is about the changing role of social workers in the rehabilitation setting and the evolution of these changes.

Due to the fluctuating nature of the health care environment, it is important for social workers to be flexible in fulfilling their team roles. The social worker's primary functions on the team are to (1) advocate for the consumer's wellness goals; (2) ensure that all stakeholders are involved and informed regarding the treatment plan—this could be the family and partners, employers, funding agencies, and possibly durable medical equipment (DME) agencies to help the consumer be as independent as possible in ambulating with or without a wheelchair, using shower benches or chairs, raised toilet seats, and so on; and (3) possibly serve as the team leader in coordinating physical, cognitive, and psychosocial treatment goals. A key goal of rehabilitation services is the reintegration of people into the community. This involves all facets of life: vocational services (or return to work or other meaningful activity), speech functioning (for memory, learning, and speech), recreational activities, and occupational therapy (i.e., self-care competency).

An injured Marine receives physical therapy as part of his rehabilitative services. Rehabilitation involves a multidisciplinary team approach to develop a treatment plan that addresses a person's physical and cognitive deficits.

The social worker's role in rehabilitative services is changing rapidly as care is increasingly being moved from the hospital or subacute care settings, which are primarily residential, to the home and community, which is likely more preferred for the consumer and much less expensive for the insurance company. The evolution in any allied or primary care roles is due to the influence of several key factors: (1) changes in national health care policy, (2) an aging population that is living longer with chronic conditions that used to be deadly diagnoses (i.e., acquired immune deficiency syndrome [AIDS] and various forms of cancer); (3) the impingement of other health care specialties on what have always been traditional social work domains (i.e., case management increasingly done by nurses and rehabilitation team leadership conducted by psychologists); (4) the rapid cycling of consumers through the various health care acuity levels, who are arriving more acutely ill in the rehabilitation settings than even just five years ago; and (5) a far more expansive scope of practice, requiring a varied skill set, than has traditionally been required of social workers. This expanded scope of practice includes being familiar with medical jargon and procedures. Social workers continuously must also be aware of professional autonomy and the critical importance they play in reintegrating patients back into the community.

Social workers had much work to do to ensure that individuals' dignity and worth were preserved during these rapid change cycles and that programs were developed with consumers' input and goals. Person-centered planning (PCP) became a popular treatment philosophy in the 1980s that is still dominant today when working with individuals with developmental disabilities, mental illness, substance abuse disorders, and general disabilities and chronic conditions. The PCP promotes social inclusion (e.g., community activities, vocational training and placement, and enjoyable recreational activities) through an active, consumer goals-based process. Providers characterize the key constructs behind person-centered methods and approaches four themes: (1) seeing people first rather than diagnostic labels; (2) using ordinary language and images rather than professional jargon; (3) actively searching for a person's gifts and capacities in the context of community life; and (4) strengthening the voice of the person and those who know the person best in accounting for his or her history, evaluating the present conditions in terms of valued experiences, and defining desirable changes in his or her life.

Nowhere is person centeredness more important than in designing health care delivery systems that actively embrace the mosaic of cultures and ethnicities in people requesting services. The information about race and ethnicity has only recently been collected in some major health care systems. Yet training programs that include a diversity component often fail to include content that is relevant to health care delivery. The e-newsletter Hospitals and Health Networks constructed three case studies that highlight the importance of seeking knowledge about various cultures and ethnicities to promote inclusiveness, and the effectiveness, of care:

1. A Japanese man has a ruptured appendix and needs immediate surgery. Although he was not very anxious about the surgery initially, he started refusing to have the surgery after being taken to his room. Cultural explanation—being aware of some Japanese beliefs about death may help health care providers understand the cause of his anxiety. In Japanese, four is pronounced in the same way as the word that means death. This makes many Japanese patients uncomfortable in a hospital room with a number four.
2. Following surgery, Mr. Ramirez is reluctant to participate in self-care or to ambulate. His family has complained to the hospital administration that the nurses are not doing their jobs assisting Mr. Ramirez with activities of daily living. Cultural explanation—the American health care system's emphasis on patient self-care to hasten recovery may directly conflict with a Latino belief that a patient should be assisted in daily tasks for the duration of the illness because the patient needs to conserve energy in order to recover. Knowing this, the hospital staff could explain that it is necessary for Mr. Ramirez to get out of bed in order to prevent postoperative complications.
3. A Vietnamese mother was observed by hospital staff to be neglecting her newborn baby. After repeated attempts by hospital staff to engage the mother in conversation by praising the baby, the mother became quite agitated. Cultural explanation—some traditional Vietnamese believe that potentially evil spirits are attracted to infants. In an effort to protect their babies, parents try not to attract attention to them.

As can be seen from these examples, when sociocultural differences between patient and provider aren't appreciated, explored, or communicated, the provider risks patient dissatisfaction, poor adherence to treatment protocols, and poorer health outcomes. Confusion and conflict often can be averted when there is an understanding of cultural differences.

These are just a few, and nowhere near all, of the issues that have impacted social workers in the rehabilitation setting. Amidst these changes, however, social workers must remain true to the values and ethics of the profession as it ensures that consumer goal-directed treatment planning occurs:

"Nothing about me, without me"—this simple phrase, first heard from people with developmental disabilities, clearly states that no goals, interventions, or treatment and discharge planning should occur without the active participation of the consumer.

Least-restrictive environment—the individual should be able to live a life while in rehabilitation or recovery free of restraints, unnecessary seclusion, or exclusion, in a healthy, freedom-based environment.

Lead with education, and end with participation—this means that social workers need to make sure that consumers and their families receive all the information and education they need to make informed decisions on the care and treatment they receive. Community inclusion and full participation are the treatment goals. Culturally competent care should also include a staff training component.

Contemporary social workers who practice in rehabilitation settings often find themselves in these roles: (1) post-acute discharge planners; (2) patient and consumer educators on the nature of a person's illness or condition; (3) interdisciplinary team leaders of clinical specialists in the areas of psychology, speech pathology, vocational planners and job coaches, nursing, occupational therapy, and physical therapy; and 4) family therapists and liaisons to the clinical team. It is incumbent upon every social worker in rehabilitative and medical settings to do as much self-education as possible so that he or she is seen as a competent professional whose knowledge and skill set are critical to the successful treatment goals and outcomes of the family, caregivers, and consumers.

Here is a very brief overview of some of the functions of the interdisciplinary rehabilitation team in which a social worker may find him- or herself in the role of a member or team leader:

1. Psychology: The diagnosis and long-term treatment planning of those consumers who have mental health issues.

2. Speech pathology: More than just speech production, these professionals often find themselves working with consumers on issues related to memory, organization, and swallowing disorders.
3. Vocational planners and job coaches. These professionals often have dual roles. They recruit employers and build sustaining relationships with them as ongoing consumer training placement sites. Job coaches make sure that on-site support is provided to the consumer, if needed, so that vocational goals are on track and the employer is satisfied with the consumer's work. Social engagement with coworkers, in addition to job performance, is often an important goal.
4. Nurses monitor and oversee the medical management of consumers while in treatment. There are often comorbid medical conditions that consumer's manage that occurred either before the injury or illness or have resulted as a function of it, as is the case often in many chronic conditions. These conditions could be brittle diabetes, high blood pressure, care and maintenance of stomas or ports, or physical injuries such as broken bones, spinal cord injury, brain injury, or other neuromuscular or cognitive challenges.

Occupational therapist—practitioners are concerned with activities of daily living (ADLs) of their consumers. This involves working on skills and goals related to showering or bathing, dressing, successful completion of tasks such as laundry or cooking, and special skills needed for the consumer to be as independent as possible. To achieve these goals, occupational therapists are also concerned with issues related to vision and visual-perceptual deficits, upper extremity functioning, and grip strength.

Physical therapist—these specialists work on strengthening and conditioning and independent living skills such as balance and coordination, walking, stair climbing, and any needed aids, such as ankle foot orthoses (AFOs), that improve an individual's independence.

The importance of understanding the perspectives of other races and ethnicities has been discussed, but cultural competence also includes knowledge regarding other cultures such as the deaf culture; the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) community; and the influence of gender regarding the care provided. Consider these examples:

1. A 52-year-old lesbian woman becomes critically ill. She and her partner of 11 years have extensively discussed what measures each would like to have should one become ill. Both want to avoid heroic measures and wish to die naturally. The parents of the ill woman are actively involved in their church, known for its conservative theology. The partner is stunned to learn that the belief system of her partner's parents trump her own advocacy on her partner's behalf. Heroic measures have been instituted, such as a respiration tube and a gastrointestinal feeding tube—both measures she knows her partner would detest.
2. A 26-year-old man who uses a wheelchair is in a rehabilitation facility to address decubitus (bedsore) infections. He is his own guardian, has excellent and lively communication skills, and lives independently. He works more than 40 hours a week as a sales representative for a computer company. In a treatment team meeting, his physician turns to his parents and says, "What do you think he would like to do?"

Here are some final thoughts that social workers should keep in mind in the rehabilitation setting. Social work in rehabilitative settings is often very fulfilling work. In acute-care (hospital) settings, the work is fast-paced, and consumer movement out of the hospital setting is quick. In post-acute (home or community-based rehabilitation) settings, the ability to form longer-term relationships with the consumers and their support systems, while working on goals that can often take the consumer years to accomplish, can be very gratifying. In any case, social work in rehabilitative settings has enjoyed a rich history—founded in advocacy and currently based in consumer-directed goal setting.

Barbara Barton
Western Michigan State University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Medical Necessity; Outpatient Medical Care; Rehabilitation Centers.

Further Readings

Chan, F. and M. Leahy, eds. Case Management for Rehabilitation Health Professionals, 2nd ed. Osage Beach, MO: Aspen Professional Services, 2005.

Dell Orto, A. and P. Powers, eds. The Psychological and Social Impact of Disability. New York: Springer Publishing, 2007.

Falvo, D. Medical and Psychosocial Aspects of Chronic Illness and Disability, 5th ed. Boston: Jones & Bartlett Learning, 2013.

Nathan, P., ed. A Guide to Treatments That Work, 3rd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.

Olkin, R. What Psychotherapists Should Know About Disability. New York: Guilford Press, 1999.

Peterson, D. Psychological Aspects of Functioning Disability and Health. New York: Springer Publishing, 2013.

Wright, B. Physical Disability: A Psychosocial Approach, 2nd ed. New York: Harper & Row, 1983.

Religion and Clients

Religion is indicated by a formal system of beliefs, traditions, rituals, and worship that inform a particular worldview. Christianity is the largest monotheistic religion in the world with the majority of adherents in the United States being Protestant. Knowledge about client religious or spiritual issues as well as self-awareness that is developed over time is required to provide human services that are spiritually competent. Human service workers may address client religious or spiritual issues indirectly or directly. Ethical practice sometimes requires a referral to clergy or experienced professional for help.

Definition of Religion

Religion is a system of beliefs that are expressed through the worship of one (monotheistic) or more (polytheistic) deities. A deity is a god or goddess who is believed to have the power to influence life and the afterlife. Religious worship involves the practice of particular rituals such as prayer, meditation, celebration, communion, and offerings made in the name of the god being worshipped. Individuals are socialized to religious dictates through social institutions like family, church, temple, mosque, and government. Hence, religious affiliation helps individuals develop a sense of social identity, gain access to support, and develop behavioral norms for direction in the world.

World Religions

There are three major monotheistic religions in the world: Christianity, Judaism, and Islam. Judaism is the oldest of the three major monotheistic religions and the first to focus on the relationship between one God and the Jewish people as documented in the Old Testament of the Holy Bible. Christianity later emerged to include the worship of Jesus Christ, God's son, whose life and teachings are described in the New Testament of the Holy Bible. Islam is also a religious faith that is centered on a belief in God relative to the dictates outlined in the Qur'an (Koran) and the Old Testament of the Holy Bible. The Qur'an is said to be the literal word of God that was dictated as heard from an angel by Mohammad, who became the founder of Islam.

Christianity

Christianity is the most widespread of the three world religions, with the majority of religious adherents in the United States being Christian. Christians believe that God is the creator of humanity. Jesus Christ is believed to be God's son, who was crucified and died on behalf of humanity's sins. His death enabled those who believe in God the opportunity to experience spiritual life after death with God in Heaven. Thus, Jesus Christ is considered the savior of humankind. Separation from God or spiritual damnation is to be avoided through belief in God and adherence to religious dictates. The Holy Spirit is considered to be the breath of life that animates all things. God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are believed to represent three dimensions of one God, known as the Trinity.

Christians identify as being Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, or Protestant based on differences in doctrine and tradition. Catholicism is the largest Christian tradition in the world, although in the United States, there are more Protestants than there are Catholics. Unlike Catholics who identify as one universal church starting with the first followers of Jesus Christ, Protestants consist of loosely connected denominations that emerged out of efforts to reform the Roman Catholic Church. These denominations can range significantly based on, for example, a literal interpretation of the Bible (fundamental), mission to profess faith and convert others to Christianity (evangelical), and outward expression of the Holy Spirit during worship (charismatic). The most common, mainstream Protestant denominations in the United States are Baptist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, and Methodist.

Collaboration with clergy, such as this Catholic priest, can be an important resource for human service workers. Clergy are likely to have some training in the provision of pastoral counseling that is provided under the auspices of the clergy's religious institution.

Catholicism

Catholics recognize the authority of the Pope in Rome and others who take formal religious vows, such as the vow of abstinence and poverty, to serve as official Church leaders. The hierarchical structure consists of the Pope, cardinals, bishops, and clergy. The clergy include priests who must be single males. Priests are assigned to a church by Church authorities. There is an emphasis on liturgical worship that involves a religious rite, called the mass, which is celebrated by a priest in each church. Weekly mass attendance is expected. The mass involves reading the Bible, a sermon by a priest who interprets biblical passages relative to Catholic theology, and sharing of bread and wine.

The elements of bread and wine that are blessed by the priest during communion, called the Eucharist, are believed to transubstantiate into the actual body and blood of Jesus Christ. The Eucharist is one of seven sacraments that include Baptism, Confirmation, Penance (confession), Matrimony, Holy Orders (ordination of clergy), and Anointing of the Sick. Catholics are generally baptized as children and confirmed as adolescents to affirm their Catholic faith. Behaviors that separate one from God are considered sins that require confession to a priest who, representing God's authority, assures the confessor of God's forgiveness and assigns prayers for the confessor to say for spiritual reconciliation.

Catholics believe that they can gain access to Heaven through participation in Church sacraments and sacrifice through charitable works. Upon death, Catholics believe individuals must go to purgatory for spiritual purification before entering Heaven. The Catholic Church formally recognizes certain people who have died as being saints due to their lives of extraordinary faith. The saints and Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus, are called upon to encourage God to answer the believer's prayer. Divorce, premarital sex, contraception, abortion, and homosexual behavior are forbidden. Catholics are encouraged to use alternatives like annulment, natural family planning, adoption, and abstinence.

Protestantism

Protestants do not recognize the authority of the Pope. Congregations generally hire their own priests who, depending on the church, might be called a minister or a pastor. There is variation in theological training and religious vows required to serve in Protestant churches. Ministers are able to marry, and some churches allow women and sexual minorities to assume ministerial roles. Nonclergy or lay ministers might be employed to facilitate special programming like youth ministry or music ministry. Therefore, Protestant churches have both clergy and lay ministers, including congregational members who play central roles in determining the conduct of congregational life and style of worship.

As a result, the passages of the Bible that are read as well as the manner in which services are conducted are different across denominations and even among congregations within the same denomination. Protestants emphasize a close personal experience with and expression of God that can further result in worship services that are more charismatic than formal in liturgical in style. This might include the incorporation of contemporary Christian worship music and, in some denominations, dancing and speaking in tongues. Speaking in tongues is said to be a manifestation of the Holy Spirit that involves speaking aloud in a manner that cannot be understood by others while in a state of prayer.

A minister generally presides over worship services that involve reading the Bible and a sermon that helps congregants learn how to discern what the Bible is saying for application in daily life relative to church theology and inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Churches may also reenact the Last Supper, but the frequency of Communion depends on the denomination. In general, the elements involved in Communion are not believed to transubstantiate into the actual body and blood of Jesus Christ, but some denominations recognize the spiritual presence of Jesus Christ based on faith known as receptionism. This is just one example of some very complex theological differences between denominations; nevertheless, there are many common beliefs and practices that connect them as well.

Protestants believe that Jesus Christ died for the sins of humanity so that all who believe in God would go to Heaven. Salvation is thus considered a gift from God. As such, it is believed that salvation does not require sacrifice through charitable works or spiritual purification upon death. Neither does salvation require participation in particular sacraments, like Communion, for religious worship does not require church mediation. Some sacraments are used, however, for Protestants to share in congregational life and spiritual growth. Protestants are expected to demonstrate how Christian beliefs have transformed them as reflections of Jesus Christ in the world. For some, this began with a spiritual encounter that led to Christian conversion and formal testimony of salvation.

Given the emphasis on a personal relationship with God, Protestants do not believe that they must confess their sins to a priest for spiritual atonement, nor do they believe in asking the saints or Virgin Mary to ask for God's intervention on their behalf as spiritual intercessors. Christian life is likely to involve membership in a particular church that supports daily adherence to Christian values that inspire others to accept God as one's savior. There are Protestant denominations that believe the Bible is the literal word of God, while others rely on a contextual interpretation along with church tradition and personal discernment to guide behavior. This influences what churches accept as moral behavior.

Broadly speaking, Protestant churches accept divorce and contraception. Premarital sex and abortion are discouraged, although tolerated. The stance on homosexual behavior varies across denominations. Members of the same denomination may also vary in their beliefs given the potential for Protestants to switch denominations based on the composition of a particular church's membership or programming rather than for ideological or theological reasons. In addition, there has been a move away from denominational to nondenominational and interdenominational churches resulting in significant heterogeneity across Protestant churches.

Definition of Spirituality

Another topic that is closely related to religion is spirituality. Spirituality has been defined a variety of ways in academic literature but has often been referred to as the experience of enhanced life meaning, sense of purpose, and transpersonal connection. For people who are affiliated with a religious tradition, church membership and participation may enable a heightened sense of spirituality. Religious adherents may experience spirituality as a transpersonal connection with God through religious practice. Some people consider themselves as being more spiritual than religious, while others identify with being religious rather than spiritual. Such variation makes it even more important for human service workers to assess how clients identify themselves.

Spiritual and Religious Diversity

There is significant diversity within and across adherents of the Christian faith. Even though individuals may ascribe to a particular religious tradition such as Catholic or Protestant, individual views on particular issues may vary within a particular religious denomination as well as across churches within the same denomination. This includes those who have had negative experiences with institutionalized religion. Individuals who have been marginalized based on, for instance, having a minority status will likely require additional sensitivity.

There are some minority groups who rely significantly on religion and spirituality as a resource for coping. For example, the African American Church has been an essential resource for the empowerment of African Americans. The African American hurch is associated with the Baptist tradition. The style of preaching tends to be more interactive with an emphasis on conversion and authority of the Bible. There is significant variation across black Churches, however. Therefore, human service workers need to be sensitive not only to religious diversity but also to issues of race and ethnicity.

It is also important to explore religious beliefs beyond Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. Some of these beliefs are associated with other Christian traditions like the Greek Orthodox faith as well as non-Christian traditions associated with, for example, Native American spirituality and eastern religions of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Confucianism. Although less mainstream, there may be individuals who ascribe to New Age spirituality or Paganism. There are many other people who do not identify with a particular religion although do believe in a higher power and engage in spiritual practices.

Implications for Human Services

Religion can influence clients from birth to death. Religion can influence a client's worldview as well as functioning and problems in living. In particular, Christian beliefs profoundly shape American culture, with Christian values being established as the acceptable norm by social institutions. It is not uncommon for employers to recognize Christian holidays or to see In God We Trust inscribed on public property. This is punctuated by ongoing debate over how much the government should allow religion to inform public policy, resulting in political polarization over issues such as contraception, abortion, and homosexual marriage.

The academic literature has reflected this debate where it has been cited that social workers with conservative religious views have been marginalized for questioning dominant support for a more liberal ideology in the social work profession. Questions about the boundary between church and state have further emerged with the institutionalization of federal funding for faith-based organizations. Hence, progress in clarifying how to ethically address religious issues across systems that interface with clients has been slow. Nevertheless, it is important for human service workers to respect a client's religious beliefs, including his or her freedom not to believe.

Such sensitivity is needed because clients might solicit the support of human service workers rather than that of clergy. Understanding client religion is also important to help ensure respectful communication, particularly when clients have religious views that are different from the human service worker. Information about a client's religion can help human service workers be alert to problems that can stem from particular belief systems. This information further enables human service workers to identify appropriate resources or if a specific referral is needed. Advocacy might be required to assure that a client's religious needs are addressed within the client's formal and informal networks.

Spiritual Competence

Spiritual sensitivity starts with a human service worker's willingness to take the time to become spiritually competent. Spiritual competence is driven by a client's desire to experience spiritual well-being and the human service worker's ability to help clients realize this goal through the provision of spiritually sensitive care. Spiritual competence is reflected by a human service worker's understanding of how religion or spirituality influences a client's development and functioning as well as self-awareness and empathy to ensure that services are consistent with a client's religious or spiritual worldview. Like any other professional skill, spiritual competence needs to be cultivated through education.

There are university courses and professional seminars to educate human service workers on client religious or spiritual needs. Practice guidelines and codes of ethics have been developed by professional organizations across disciplines such as the National Association for Human Services and National Association of Social Workers. Accreditation organizations, like the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations, require client access to religious or spiritual resources, in particular treatment settings. Therefore, human service workers are expected to be spiritually competent and are given the guidelines and resources to develop this capacity.

Theoretical Models

There are a variety of theories that can help a human service worker understand a client's spiritual, faith, and ethical or moral development. One such model is James Fowler's Theory of Faith Development. According to Fowler, the concept of faith is intended to include religious and nonreligious systems of belief that inform life meaning. Fowler's theory proposes that progressive development of cognitive processing skills enables individuals to move from relying on the faith of others to questioning these beliefs and then integrating knowledge to inform personal faith. The process begins early in life and ends with a faith that gives life coherence by old age.

However, as with any developmental model, people can vary with regard to the ages at which they reach certain stages and the extent to which they achieve developmental tasks in each stage. Additional theories and models have been used to explain how spiritual development is a recursive (back and forth) rather than a linear (straightforward) process. For example, Ken Wilber's spectrum theory suggests that spiritual growth is not confined to milestones based on a particular stage of development but involves the expansion of perceptual consciousness until one is able to consistently operate within a state of awareness of one's innate connection with all things.

Caution should be used when applying these and other theories given the need for research to verify if they accurately reflect how religion and spirituality operate. Nevertheless, there has been considerable research on the health effects of religious affiliation and practice with evidence to suggest significant implications for a client's general well-being. Research has further demonstrated client interest in addressing religious and spiritual issues with trained professionals across treatment settings. These findings support the importance of spiritually competent care that first requires the ability to engage in spiritual assessment.

Spiritual Assessment

A spiritual assessment may not be required in every treatment setting but is likely to be required when clients are receiving medical or behavioral health care services. The type of spiritual assessment and who is responsible for completing it depends on the organization.

A spiritual assessment may start and end with asking if a client has a religious affiliation simply because no more information is needed for service provision. A full assessment may be in order, however, particularly if the client presents with religious or spiritual needs or the experience of spiritual pain.

Information about client beliefs may be collected along with other components of a biopsychosocial history. This process will include a series of questions that result in a narrative description of a client's religious and spiritual background. A spiritual assessment can ultimately inform a personalized understanding of the client's religious and spiritual beliefs and practices, provide an opportunity to communicate respect for the client's religious and spiritual worldview, and clarify potential religious or spiritual needs and resources that may be used throughout the intervention process.

There are assessment tools professionals use to quickly collect client religious and spiritual information identified by acronyms such as FICA (faith, importance or influence, community, and address or action) and HOPE (hope-inspiring resources, organized religious affiliation, personal spirituality and practices, and effects on care). There are also assessment activities that allow a client to visually depict current spiritual resources in the client's environment (a spiritual eco-map), key moments in one's spiritual journey (spiritual life map), and intergenerational spiritual and religious trends (spiritual genogram).

Intervention

The helping relationship provides an excellent opportunity to facilitate a connection that is profoundly nurturing. Human service workers can communicate empathy and compassion while maintaining an unconditional positive regard for clients. This allows for a spiritually sensitive style of engagement that preserves a client's sense of dignity and worth to offset one's experience of hardship, marginalization, and powerlessness. There are times when it may be appropriate to directly address a client's religious or spiritual needs, particularly when a client is in spiritual pain.

When clients present with specific religious or spiritual needs, the intervention must be relative to the client's interests and worker's expertise. More advanced clinical skills are required for spiritually oriented, spiritually integrated, or spiritually modified psychotherapy. The specific name used for this approach depends on the discipline but requires additional accommodation to address client spiritual or religious issues. This may involve the adaptation of psychodynamic, cognitive-behavioral, or transpersonal theories as well as the use of religious or spiritual practices to promote a client's spiritual well-being.

Based on transpersonal psychology, a psychotherapist might help a client expand one's sense of conscious connection to someone or something outside of oneself to experience enhanced life meaning. Spiritually modified cognitive-behavioral therapy could involve reframing cognitive distortions associated with religious beliefs to minimize spiritual distress. A 12-step program might use client prayer to bolster faith in a higher power and meet needs in a healthy way. Such interventions require a mental health evaluation to ensure that client religiosity is not a delusion or hallucination associated with mental illness.

Referral

Collaboration with clergy can be an important resource, especially when a client is involved with a particular religious organization or religious information is needed for client intervention. When clients primarily seek religious counsel or spiritual growth, a referral to clergy or experienced professional would be appropriate. Such a referral would also be warranted if the human services worker does not have the authority, time, or comfort level required to address a client's religious or spiritual needs. In any case, a client's written permission is required before connecting with this resource.

Clergy include priests, pastors, ministers, rabbis, and other religious leaders. These professionals usually have seminary training that provides a theological foundation in a particular religious tradition. Clergy have the expertise and authority to address client interpretation of scripture, teaching how to employ religious dictates in daily life, and facilitate religious rites that can be integral to client spiritual well-being. Clergy are likely to have some training in the provision of pastoral counseling that is provided under the auspices of the clergy's religious institution.

Some religious institutions also provide more comprehensive social services. In faith-based organizations, religious dictates of the sponsoring religious institution are integrated into the organization's mission, employment practices, and service delivery; however, the degree of faith integration in organizational operations can vary and be relative to funding limitations. For example, faith-based organizations that receive federal funding are required to provide services to clients without discrimination, but such organizations can hire staff based on religious affiliation.

For clients who are receiving inpatient hospital services or hospice care, a human services worker might also refer the client to a chaplain. Chaplains do not usually represent a particular religious affiliation but often have theological or other training that enables them to address issues of faith. Human service workers may also work with other professionals such as nurses and social workers to ensure a client's religious or spiritual needs are addressed. Social workers with a clinical license may provide spiritually oriented psychotherapy as well as mobilize other resources that are spiritually sensitive.

Ann M. Callahan
Middle Tennessee State University

See Also: Social Work, Diversity Practice in; Spirituality/Religion and Diversity; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and.

Further Readings

Canda, Edward and Leola Furman. Spiritual Diversity in Social Work Practice: The Heart of Helping. New York: Oxford Press, 2009.

Families in Society. "Transcendent Worldview: Understanding Spirituality in Practice." http://www.familiesinsociety.org/new/Newsletter/issue01_12.pdf (Accessed May 2013).

Hodge, David. "Developing a Spiritual Assessment Toolbox: A Discussion of the Strengths and Limitations of Five Different Assessment Methods." Health and Social Work, v.30/4 (2005).

Hodge, David and Suzanne Bushfield. "Developing Spiritual Competence in Practice." Journal of Ethnic and Cultural Diversity in Social Work Practice, v.15/3 (2006).

Seinfeld, Jeffrey. "Spirituality in Social Work Practice." Clinical Social Work Journal, v.40 (2012).
Sperry, Len and Lisa Miller. Spirituality in Clinical Practice: Theory and Practice of Spiritually Oriented Psychotherapy, 2nd ed. New York: Routledge, 2010.
Sulmasy, Daniel. "Spirituality, Religion, and Clinical Care." CHEST, v.135/6 (2009).
Svare, Gloria, et al. "Going Below the Tip of the Iceberg: Social Work, Religion, and Spirituality." Social Thought, v.22/4 (2003).

Reparations

As a public recognition of systematic disadvantages imposed on a group, reparations attempt to materially and symbolically correct harms done to marginalized populations through exclusion or mistreatment. When a group of people have been treated unjustly and have no legal recourse, a remedy is sought that acknowledges the wrongdoing and offers some sort of payment to redress the injustice. Reparations serve this purpose. In addition to material compensation, reparations represent atonement for unjust actions. Unlike purely legal settlements such as torts, reparations imply an apology to the victims and an admission of responsibility by (or on behalf of) the perpetrators. Reparations may be directed to individuals or to groups, and they may consist of one-time or ongoing compensation. Although reparations most commonly take the form of monetary payments, they also can consist of rehabilitative services (such as provision of psychiatric or therapeutic programs) or in-kind aid (such as employment or educational opportunities).

Rationale and Functions of Reparations

Philosophically, reparations often have been justified on the basis of corrective justice, which acknowledges and seeks to redress past wrongs. By contrast, advocates of retributive justice treat reparations primarily as a punishment against the offenders. This view underlies many impositions of war reparations, which the victors may impose as deliberately harsh economic penalties.

Reparations can perform several roles. As restitution, reparations can restore material losses. Return of seized possessions or assets can thus serve distributive justice, redistributing resources to their prior conditions. Reparations also signal official disavowal of the regime that authorized the initial wrongdoing. Germany's commitment to meeting its reparation obligations to Holocaust survivors has affirmed the desire to distance the nation from its fascist past.

Symbolically, reparations represent formal legal closure to acknowledged systematic oppression. The sheer act of awarding reparations, regardless of amount or form, may foster reconciliation between victims and perpetrators by recognizing prior suffering and expressing the desire to prevent its recurrence. This legal declaration of wrongdoing generates complicated questions. Heated debates center on whether restitution implies forgiveness of the perpetrators, absolving them and their descendants of further responsibilities toward the oppressed groups. Some researchers have questioned the conciliatory value of reparations, arguing that they refocus attention on past suffering rather than promote reintegration of oppressed groups into a more harmonious social order.

Instances of Reparations

Several examples illustrate the variety and degree of reparations. Germany's payments to compensate victims of the Holocaust constitute the largest and most sustained program of formal reparations. Since World War II, Germany has paid more than $89 billion in reparations for various atrocities and wrongdoings associated with the Holocaust. Payments have continued without interruption since the 1952 Luxembourg Agreement. Funds are distributed as direct payments to victims (most of whom are Jewish survivors), as aid to the nation of Israel, or to support organizations associated with promoting Holocaust education and genocide prevention. There are also ongoing efforts to restore stolen or seized property and assets to their rightful owners.

The United States has mixed experience with reparations. In 1988, Congress issued a formal apology for forcible internment of Japanese Americans during World War II. This apology was accompanied by $1.6 billion in payments to survivors. The issue of reparations for chattel slavery (legally terminated by the Emancipation Proclamation in 1863) remains contentious. Courts have consistently dismissed lawsuits against the federal government and corporations for damages resulting from chattel slavery.

Some individual lawsuits have resulted in formal apologies from private corporations. In 2009, the Senate passed a resolution that formally apologized for slavery and racial segregation but did not offer compensation. A similar congressional apology—without financial reparations—for injustices to Native Americans was issued in 2009.

Other nations have used reparations to respond to different forms of injustice. In 1992, Chile offered monthly pensions to victims and families of those affected by executions, torture, and deportation under the dictatorship of Augusto Pinochet. In 1995 and 1996, Japan agreed to pay an estimated $20 million related to the use of up to 200,000 Korean comfort women as sex slaves in occupied territories during World War II. The Japanese Parliament issued an apology in 2007 despite a denial by the prime minister at the time. In 1998, Canada agreed to pay $350 million (Canadian) to aboriginal families for forcibly assimilating children and removing them from their native cultures. The South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission's reparation recommendations in 1997 emphasized provision of resources for individual and community empowerment as an essential component. To that end, the commission recommended a broad commitment to providing sufficient housing, education, and employment services as integral to making the victims of apartheid full participants in postapartheid society.

Challenges of Making Reparations

Several challenges accompany the determination and implementation of reparations. First, who qualifies as eligible for reparations? This issue complicates cases such as reparations for slavery in the United States because all those who were actually enslaved have since died. It also remains unclear what threshold of harm would justify eligibility for reparations. Would a concentration camp survivor and someone deported from his or her homeland during the Nazi regime both deserve reparations? Second, who bears responsibility for making reparations? For example, several German corporations used slave labor from concentration camps, but those companies may have been acquired by or merged with others or gone out of business entirely. Third, what constitutes an appropriate amount and kind of reparations? This question raises perhaps the most difficult issue surrounding reparations: how to quantify the various forms of physical, psychological, and emotional suffering instigated by oppression.

Roy Schwartzman
University of North Carolina at Greensboro

See Also: Anti-Semitism; Displaced Persons; Torture, Survivors of; War and Terrorism, Survivors of.

Further Readings

Brooks, Roy Lavon. When Sorry Isn't Enough: The Controversy Over Apologies and Reparations for Human Injustice. New York: New York University Press, 1999.

McCarthy, Thomas. "Repairing Past Injustice: Remarks on the Politics of Reparations for Slavery in the United States." Global Dialogue, v.14/2 (2012).

Posner, Eric A. and Adrian Vermeule. "Reparations for Slavery and Other Historical Injustices." Columbia Law Review, v.103/3 (2003).

Respite Care

According to a 2009 survey completed by National Alliance for Caregiving and the American Association of Retired Persons, an estimated 65.7 million people, or 29 percent of the population, had served as unpaid family caregivers to an adult or child with special needs during the previous 12 months. The sample reported providing an average of about 20 hours of care per week. The economic value of their activities has been estimated at $450 billion for unpaid care provision.

In California, for example, it is estimated that family caregivers may annually provide up to $47 billion of unpaid caregiving. The need for respite care to meet culturally and socially diverse American families remains a challenge for service delivery organizations offering caregiver respite supports. Ethnic, religious, family composition, residential locale, and language are but a few of the cultural variations that must be taken into consideration to accommodate the needs of both the caregiver and person for whom respite support is being offered. Matching the respite provider to families being serviced must approach cultural diversity as a priority for effective results.

This unpaid care is often described as family caregiving. However, it is a very broad term that refers to the efforts of family members as well as other persons invested in the care of an adult or child with special needs. The activities of these caregivers are sometimes referred to as informal caregiving because they do not receive payment. The individuals assist care recipients who are at any and every stage of the life span with needs for assistance from family caregivers that may be time limited or continuous. Family caregivers, for example, assist with or complete tasks of daily living, monitor the environment to ensure safety, maintain personal hygiene, participate in medical and health care regimes, interact to reduce social isolation or stimulate sensory acuity for the care recipient. Caregiver assistance is most frequently offered in a home environment, often in the home of the care recipient. Respite care is offered to caregivers as temporary relief from their activities through planned or crisis care provided to a dependent child or adult with special needs such as autism, Down syndrome, multiple sclerosis, traumatic brain injury, and Alzheimer's disease. Formalized respite care resources have increased extensively over the past decade and are recognized as a formal service arrangement included within a long-term service and support system.

Caregiver Burden and Respite Care Need

Irrespective of the type of disability, there are some similar factors influencing the increasing demand for caregiver respite. Most significant is the demographics of the aging population, the ever-increasing longevity of aging persons, and the ethnic and cultural diversity of aging Americans. These factors crosscut needs present in disabilities, acquired brain injury, aging, and mental illness. Both individual caregivers and their families may experience high degrees of burden, consistent stress and anxiety, fatigue, relationship tension, and conflict. Some caregivers have family members and others in their social networks who may assist the primary caregiver. For instance, an elderly wife with a husband severely disabled by a stroke may have a younger widowed brother assume responsibility for financial management beyond the capacity of the wife, who is continuously engaged in spousal care. Another example is an aunt of an autistic child making use of her vacation time to live in the home to allow parents to take their other children on a family holiday. In such situations, the primary caregivers take leave for the day-to-day emotional and physical challenges of caregiving.

Caregivers vary in their desire for and actual willingness to take advantage of informal care assistance and more formal respite services. For some caregivers, their sources of informal respite have dissipated as the result of the intensification of a care recipient's needs. In other situations, individuals who previously relied on relief are no longer available because of changes in personal circumstances. Sometimes provision of respite to the primary caregiver becomes entangled in relationship conflicts, making the option of assistance unacceptable to the caregiver or care recipient. For other caregivers, far too many, they alone are giving 24-hour care to spouses, disabled children, or aging parents with no adequate, informal respite.

Providing caregivers release time from routine, rigorous care demands has been well researched in relation to deferring or eliminating the need for institutional care, enhancing relationships in the family system, and promoting self-care and the well-being of caregivers. Whether or not the respite care is provided from an informal or formal source, caregivers must be able to trust and depend on a knowledgeable respite provider. On the other hand, when respite care is provided in or out of the household, caregivers tend to evaluate service benefits in relation to the needs of the care receiver. While there is an infinite array of caregiving scenarios, there are common areas of need in the lives of a caregiver that demonstrate the necessity of more and approved respite care options.

Significant underdevelopment of respite care service alternatives is of ongoing concern to health and mental health professionals, politicians and policy makers, citizen advocates, and caregivers. National caregiver advocacy organizations, such as the National Family Caregivers Association, Family Caregivers Alliance, Alzheimer's Disease Association, American Association of Retired Persons, national- and state-level developmental disability associations, and national veteran's organizations, have effectively advocated for more respite care through state- and federal-level policy advocacy.

National Efforts to Develop Respite Care Systems

The nationwide availability of quality respite care to meet the special needs of children and adults is being supported through Title XXIX of the Public Health Services Act, the Lifespan Respite Care Act of 2006 (PL109-442). The U.S. Administration on Aging (AoA) within the Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS) is the federal oversight agency designated to competitively award grants to states for respite care system expansion. In 2009 and 2010, AoA funded 21 three-year grants to state aging and disability services departments to create and sustain life-span respite programs. The objectives of these state programs are to ensure respite services are available to families across age and disability spectrums. These programs expand and enhance respite services within the participating state, improve coordination, disseminate respite care information, fill critical respite care gaps, and promote the overall quality of available services. In order to support successful project outcomes, a technical assistance contract was awarded to the ARCH National Respite Network and Resource Center, partnered with the National Family Alliance. These organizations in collaboration with the funded states and AoA have developed respite guidelines based on consensus principles for respite care delivery models and programs.

Eloise Rathbone-McCuan
University of Missouri-Kansas City

See Also: Adult Day Care; Aging and Adult Services; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Families, Nontraditional; Medicaid.

Further Readings

Edgar, Maggie and Monica Uhl. "National Guiding Principles for Respite Models and Services." ARCH National Respite Network and Resource Center. http://www.archrespite.org/productspublications/arch-guidelines (Accessed January 2014).

Greenwood, Nan, Ruth Habibi, and Ann Mackenzie. "Respite: Carers' Experience and Perceptions of Respite at Home." BMC Geriatrics, v.12 (2012).

Nageswaran, Savithri. "Respite Care for Children With Special Health Care Needs." ARCH Pediatric and Adolescent Medicine, v.163 (2009).

Phillipson, Lyn, Christopher Magee, and Sandra C. Jones. "Why Carers of People With Dementia Do Not Utilize Out-of-Home Respite Services." Health and Social Care in the Community, v.21 (2013).

Pickhard, Joseph, G., Megumi Inoue, Letha A. Chadiha, and Sharon Johnson. "The Relationship of Social Support to African American Caregivers' Help-Seeking for Emotional Problems." Social Service Review, v.85 (2011).

Strunk, Julia, A. "Respite Care for Families of Special Needs Children: A Systematic Review." Journal of Developmental and Physical Disabilities, v.22 (2010).

Respite Services

Respite services are temporary services designed to provide relief care for families of children or adults with special needs. Respite services can range from a few hours of relief care provided on a one-time basis to overnight or extended sessions. Care might be accessed on a regular or irregular basis and may be provided by family members, friends, community members, skilled care providers, or respite care professionals. Respite services are used by a diversity of communities (race, ethnic, age, sex, religion, etc.), and services often need to be tailored to the needs of each community. The majority of respite services are geared toward children, older adults, and adults with special needs. These services need to be additionally tailored depending on the cultural and linguistic needs of the population being served. With the growing diversity of communities, especially communities comprised of large numbers of immigrants and refugees, respite services have to be increasingly provided in a variety of languages and dialects and take into consideration the traditions, cultures, and beliefs of these communities.

Respite care has the primary goal of assisting families with caretaking responsibilities and needs. The caretakers of children or adults with special needs often experience serious problems or stress as a result of having to balance caretaking with other needs and responsibilities. Respite care provides a much-needed break and allows caretakers to attend to the needs of their children, spouses, or themselves. To this end, respite services provide temporary stress relief, improve family stability, and reduce the likelihood of abuse or neglect. Accessing respite services also helps to improve long-term family stability and reduces the need for out-of-home placements or residential care.

Respite services can be provided in the home or outside of the home in a special facility. For most families, in-home respite services are preferred to out-of-home services. There are several advantages to in-home respite such as (1) the care recipient might feel more comfortable at home and in a familiar setting; (2) the home is already set up to address the special needs of the child or adult; (3) cost is usually lower than out-of-home care, especially if a relative provides care; and (4) transportation is not a barrier to accessing treatment.

Typical Models of In-Home Respite

Model 1: In-home respite. In this model, respite care is provided in the home of the adult or child. The relief caregiver goes to the home of the primary caregiver and becomes familiar with the adult or child in his or her usual environment. The adult or child receiving care is not burdened by having to acclimate to a new environment or navigate transportation.

Model 2: Sitter–companion services. Sitter–companion services are provided by individuals who are trained to care for children or adults with special needs. Such services might be the project of a service organization or specialized nonprofit agency.

Model 3: Consumer-directed respite. This model involves having a friend or relative provide respite services to a care recipient. The difference with this model is that the care provider has been selected by the family and trained by a respite program or the family itself. In this model, the care provider might be paid or unpaid. If they are paid, it is often through a voucher program offered directly to family caregivers to allow them to locate, hire, train, and pay their own providers.

Out-of-home respite provides an opportunity for the care recipients to receive respite services outside of their homes. While out-of-home care may present some obstacles, it does have some benefits. Out-of-home care allows care recipients to experience new surroundings, different expectations, peer relationships, and even cognitive and emotional stimulation. Here are some typical models of out-of-home respite:

Model 4: Family care homes or host family model. In the family care home or host family model, respite services are provided in the care provider's home. Services might be delivered in the home of a staff person from a respite program, a trained volunteer's home, a family day care home, or a licensed foster home. Homes used in this model are often licensed to provide care by regulating agencies.

Model 5: Respite center-based model. In this model, the respite program contracts with existing day care centers to provide respite to children with special needs. This model has been found to be effective in rural areas and allows children and adults to be cared for in a facility that might be close to home. These programs may be located in community centers, after-school programs, or churches.

*Model 6: Respite in corporate foster home settings for children and teen*s. This model of care provides a homelike environment monitored by trained, rotating staff. Care is provided to children and teens as vacancies occur. In particular, some teens adapt well to this model of care because it presents opportunities for semi-independent living.

Model 7: Residential facilities. In this model, long-term residential facilities set aside a specific number of beds to be used for shorter-term respite services. These services might be provided at community residences, nursing homes, state-owned facilities, assisted living homes, and nursing homes. Respite might be offered on an overnight, weekend, or extended-stay basis.

Model 8: Parent or family caregiver cooperative model. Many communities, especially in rural areas, have developed caregiver cooperatives where more formal models of respite are limited. Used primarily with children with special needs or chronic illnesses, families will often trade respite services with one another. This model has been especially helpful with young veterans who have experienced a traumatic brain injury or other disabling condition. In this model, families receive services on a regular and planned basis, and fees are usually not charged.

Model 9: Hospital based. Hospitals can also provide respite services for children and adults with special needs. This model can be especially appropriate for smaller communities where the hospital census may not be very high. Care receivers are able to receive high-quality services in familiar surroundings that might be close to home, offering a sense of security. Veterans' hospitals often provide respite for eligible veterans.

Model 10: Adult day-care centers. For more than 20 years, adult day-care centers have been providing respite services to families in need. In addition to respite services for caregivers, day-care centers also provide health services, therapeutic services, and social activities for adults with severe physical or mental illness. These services have expanded dramatically in the last decade due to new funding sources, such as Medicaid waivers, being available. Care receivers attend day-care centers for several hours a day, usually five days a week. Limited weekend services might also be provided.

Aileen Duldulao
Independent Scholar
Lorraine Escribano
Tundi Balogh
Morrison Child & Family Services

See Also: Children With Special Needs; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Respite Care.

Further Readings

Edgar, Maggie and Monica Uhl. "National Guiding Principles for Respite Models and Services." ARCH National Respite Network and Resource Center. http://www.archrespite.org/productspublications/arch-guidelines (Accessed January 2014).

Greenwood, Nan, Ruth Habibi, and Ann Mackenzie. "Respite: Carers' Experience and Perceptions of Respite at Home." BMC Geriatrics, v.12 (2012).

Nageswaran, Savithri. "Respite Care for Children With Special Health Care Needs." Archives of Pediatrics & Adolescent Medicine, v.163/1 (2009).

Restorative Justice

> "Restorative justice is a compass, not a map."
> —Howard Zehr

There is no overarching or agreed-upon definition of restorative justice. It encompasses a broad set of empowerment-based practices and decisions made in response to crime, inviting an agenda of accountability and rehabilitation strategies for diverse groups including adolescents, adults, and older adults in the criminal justice system. By the mid-1990s, several hundred victim–offender reconciliation programs (the terms victim and offender are used throughout, acknowledging the stigma associated with this language) emerged in North America and Europe alongside New Zealand-based family group conferencing. Advocates of restorative justice in social work, psychology, criminology, and other professions acknowledge the importance of responsivity to cultural traditions in addressing crime (such as First Nations' healing circles), with promising research-based outcomes. Unifying theory, practice, and research, the principles are intended to be an interface among individual rights and social justice and well-being in communities. Howard Zehr conceptualizes restorative justice as a compass that invites community dialogue regarding a continuum of offenses, including the most severe, and he emphasizes that the Western legal system may exacerbate conflicts rather than fostering healing or peace.

At the heart of restorative justice (RJ) frameworks, also known as transformational justice, are three principles advanced by Zehr: restoration, accountability, and engagement. The practice of restorative conferencing is an alternative to offender-centered sanctions and punishment that attempts to balance the needs of all the stakeholders (victim, offender, and community), which leads to restorative agreements while encouraging accountability for offending behavior and promoting victim healing from traumatic stress. Types of restorations include damaged relationships, physical and mental health, and international peacemaking. In order to effectively respond to crime, victims, offenders, families, and community stakeholders are engaged to identify and repair the harm. Questions restorative justice proponents pose include: What is the nature of the harm resulting from the crime? What needs to be done to repair the harm? Who is responsible for repair? Are all stakeholders involved?

The criminologist John Braithwaite argues for the marriage between responsive regulation and restorative justice and that standards for evaluation of restorative justice processes include how well they are aligned with fundamental human rights and foster democratic participation of stakeholders (e.g., regulation that is not shaped only by powerful legal entrepreneurs). RJ conferences would, for example, not result in imposing unreasonable punishments. Integral to restorative processes are the noncoercive values that facilitators ask of participants directly (such as respectful listening) and indirectly (such as apology and forgiveness). Scholars such as Kathleen Daly do not consider RJ to be the opposite of retributive justice.

RJ discourses have roots in the aboriginal systems of community-based decision making in Australia and New Zealand, with a range of applicability from addressing bullying in schools to healing in child sexual abuse cases, as well as situations of gendered or intimate partner violence, where conferencing and resolving conflict in a community setting can be effective. The formation of modern restorative justice emerged out of the traditions of the Mennonite Community during the 1970s in Canada and Indiana.

In the United States, Vermont, Colorado (the first state mandating that judges notify adjudicated youth of RJ options), California, Minnesota, and other states have been implementing RJ principles through the use of conferencing circles, reparative boards, and family group conferencing, with positive outcomes in restoring victim losses and reducing the likelihood of offender recidivism. In 1982, Fresno County created the Victim Offender Reconciliation Program, adopted in 1995 by the United Nations (UN) for International Restorative Justice. RJ programs such as these are in line with research corroborating the negative effects associated with the reliance on punitive sanctions (e.g., federal risk-based classification systems such as sex offender registration and notification applied to juveniles) as well as the costs and health effects of long-term incarceration on younger and older offenders. In south Australia, for example, conferencing in cases of youthful sexual assault has been shown to be more effective and less victimizing than the court process.

Efficacy

Meta-analyses have identified effectiveness factors associated with restorative justice programs: (1) victim satisfaction, (2) offender satisfaction, (3) increased offender compliance with restitution, and (4) decreased recidivism. RJ proponents emphasize that restorative justice is not focused on reducing recidivism, although that may be the outcome of the process encouraging offender accountability and involvement of those affected by the crime. The effectiveness of human service delivery (e.g., family therapy) and interventions to prevent recidivism among juvenile offenders, compared with punitive strategies, has been well documented.

Core Restorative Practices: Sentencing Circles

A structured method of equal dialogue among stakeholders using a talking piece (e.g., a rock or feather) to facilitate speaking time, designed to illicit the victim's story and foster self-governance and community safety. Examples of circles include Robin Wilson's Circles of Support and Accountability (COSA), enacted in many communities in the United States and Canada in high-risk sex offender cases as a community reintegration model in line with the UN Standards for the Treatment of Prisoners. It involves offender accountability and community safety protocols, with the acknowledgement that traditional public safety measures and notification policies have been inadequate and that accountability combined with support with community integration can prevent recidivism. Additionally, Lorenn Walker's reentry and transition planning circles for incarcerated individuals is a circle model designed to provide a space for offenders to express remorse and understand the impact of their crime, using solution-focused interventions.

Family Group Conferencing

Subsumed under restorative justice practices, family group conferencing (FGC) engages youth and their extended families in democratic decision making in both the child welfare and juvenile justice systems. Historically associated with addressing the overrepresentation of the Maori in the criminal justice system in New Zealand, FGC values family systems of care, partnerships with professionals, and healing from the impact of crime. The process involves four stages facilitated by a coordinator: opening, information sharing, deliberations and consensus, and closing, with the additional consideration of safety planning in cases of child abuse and neglect. Victim involvement can be crucial to ensure the offender's input is not central. Gale Burford pioneered the implementation of FGC in Vermont.

Reparative Boards

Community reparative boards in Vermont were shaped by RJ principles. They include community capacity-building and decision-making processes that involve recruiting and training board members who make recommendations regarding offender compliance with the probation or diversion contract, incorporating victim input (violations can result in renegotiation or a return to court). Offenders are usually considered low risk and may choose traditional sentencing rather than reparative probation. The goals include repairing the harm to victims and offender reintegration in the community, and boards can refer to FGCs or victim–offender mediation.

Other core practices and models include written or verbal apologies to victims, victim–offender dialogues, UN Truth Commissions (on human rights violations), financial restitution to victims, and community justice boards.

Conclusion

Despite evidence that RJ programs can be effective, there remains a popular belief that formal punishment is needed in order to prevent offender recidivism. Community justice boards that engage community members in understanding and addressing offenses, FGC, or sentencing circles provide compelling alternatives to legal pathways that focus solely on individualized risk assessments.

Indeed, despite the international growth of RJ models, there are controversies from a victim advocates' perspective about whether practices such as case conferences are a better option than formal court proceedings in cases involving domestic and sexual violence. One central conclusion is that it is important to implement potentially restorative approaches rather than solely rely on punitive processes. Finally, it should be noted that an ideal justice system does not draw from one approach, whether it be retributive, rehabilitative, or restorative. In fact, the retributive–restorative binary is not defensible from empirical grounds.

Tina Maschi
Fordham University
George S. Leibowitz
Lauren Mizus
University of Vermont

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Child Welfare Services; Community Corrections; Prisoner Reentry Programs; Victim Services.

Further Readings

Burford, Gale and Hudson, Joe. Family Group Conferencing: New Directions in Community Centered Child and Family Practice. New York: Aldine de Gruyter, 2000.

van Wormer, Katherine S. and Lorenn Walker, eds. Restorative Justice Today: Practical Applications. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2013.

Zehr, Howard and Ali Gohar. The Little Book of Restorative Justice. Intercourse, PA: Good Books, 2003.

Reverse Discrimination

Treating someone differently (better or worse) based on the person's race, gender, or physical attributes constitutes discrimination. Women and racial minorities were historical targets of discrimination, sanctioned by the legal system. The expression reverse discrimination has been used to characterize the "unfair" treatment that men or whites have received in admissions and employment.

Members of the historically disadvantaged (underrepresented) groups (i.e., women and racial minorities) are being admitted into professional or graduate programs, hired, or promoted over members of the majority group (i.e., men and whites). Alleged discrimination against whites or men revolves around a denial of admissions to graduate, law, and medical schools. Alleged discrimination against white males in the labor markets includes but is not limited to hiring, compensation, discipline, discharge, promotion, demotion, and layoffs in law enforcement, firefighting, sanitation, teaching, and civil service. However, reverse discrimination is not frequent.

Affirmative Action: Promoting Equality of Opportunity

In 1965, U.S. President Lyndon Johnson signed an executive order to prohibit discrimination in education and employment based on race and gender. Federal contractors are required to take affirmative action to ensure that applicants are employed without regard to race, creed, color, national origin, or gender. Employers are expected to give members of the historically (economically or educationally) disadvantaged groups (blacks, Hispanics or Latinos, American Indians, and Asians)

A group of white male businessmen, a segment of the population that may be targeted by reverse discrimination, which occurs when members of historically underrepresented groups are hired or promoted over members of the majority group.

special consideration in admissions and in hiring. The purpose of an affirmative action program is to redress past discrimination against women and minorities by pushing employers to try harder—to cast a wider net seeking out blacks among the best and not the best among blacks. The program is aimed at leveling the playing field for all in education and employment.

Critics of affirmative action have argued that the practice is an unwarranted punishment to white males. Giving special consideration to members of underrepresented groups in admissions, hiring, and promotions would give unfair advantages to women and minorities and in turn has adversely affected white males. Some label such governments intervention as positive discrimination and challenge it on legal and moral grounds:

Reverse discrimination undermines the core values of equality and fairness in American society. After outlawing discrimination based on race and gender in the society, everyone should be treated the same way (equality). Giving special consideration to members of the underrepresented groups in admissions and employment is unfair to members of the majority group.

The counterclaim would be that few have raised questions about social justice when applicants receive special consideration if they meet one of the following nonrace, nongender-based affirmative action criteria used in admissions or employment: athletes, specially talented, low-income family, geographical location, religion, disability, war veterans, children of donors (alumni, faculty, or staff), or having personal or professional ties to current (or former) workers.

Reverse discrimination violates the principle of meritocracy and lowers the overall productivity in the society. To get the best-qualified candidates, selection, rewards, and promotions should be based solely on merits and not on irrelevant characteristics such as race or gender.

The counterclaim would be that selection for many jobs is seldom based on merits alone. In addition to having the ability to do well on paper or pencil tests (merits), special consideration has been given to qualifications related to job performance such as cultural sensitivity, interpersonal skills, and communication skills.

Reverse discrimination generates a feeling of inferiority in women and minorities and creates a negative stereotype in the mind of white males. Women and minorities may see themselves merely as tokens or quota hires to meet the requirements of an affirmative action program. Others may see all women and minorities as unqualified or less qualified for the positions when compared to white males. Taken together, this can undermine the dignity of women and minorities who have the requisite skills and qualifications to meet the admissions or job requirements.

The counterclaim would be that the evidence of a self-perception of inferiority among women and minorities is anecdotal and speculative. There is no empirical evidence of lower self-esteem among women and minorities. Stigma or negative stereotypes of women and minorities have long existed before the implementation of affirmative action. Additionally, no stigma has been attached to athletes admitted to college or veterans hired for certain jobs.

Reverse discrimination extends (and does not end) gender bias and racial prejudice in the society. If it was wrong for schools and employers to treat women and minorities badly in the past, it is also wrong to start treating men and whites badly when many of them have had nothing to do with historical discriminatory policies or practices against women and blacks.

The counterclaim would be that whites and males are the direct beneficiaries of historical discrimination against women and minorities. An increase of women and minorities in colleges and in the workforce is not because they have suddenly become smarter but because discriminatory policies and practices have been outlawed. They are free to receive education and to participate in jobs that were historically reserved for men or whites only.

Prevalence

There is no evidence of widespread discrimination against whites or males. A majority of high-level positions in both the public and private sectors are still held by white males. It has been suggested that angry white males have simply misdirected anger toward minorities and women as a result of restructuring in the economy.

Incidences of reverse discrimination reported by white males are rare compared to complaints about discrimination by women and minorities. Generally, it is not easy to measure and prove discrimination. To successfully challenge discrimination by schools or employers in courts, it takes resources, organization, and mobilization among the plaintiffs. Litigations are lengthy and costly when outcomes are highly uncertain.

Cuts in government spending, corporate restructuring, and downsizing have eliminated many jobs previously held by white males, especially in middle-level management or administration. It is not easy for middle-age white males who have lost their jobs to find employment commensurate with their experience, due to skills obsolescence or competition with newcomers in their fields. Being self-employed or working as an independent contractor has become a realistic option for white males holding previously high-paying, high-status jobs.

Data reveal that the majority of high-paying jobs or leadership positions are still occupied by white males. Additionally, despite recent gains in educational and occupational attainments, women and racial minorities still trail men and whites in science and engineering education, in earnings, and in gaining promotions to supervisory positions.

The direct evidence for perceived widespread of reverse discrimination is anecdotal. For instance, lucrative job offers from top universities to women or minority scholars to launch a new program or direct a research center typically attract a lot of media attention.

Unlike mass mobilization against racial and gender discrimination, there is no evidence of collective and well-organized efforts among white males against reverse discrimination. Unlike women and racial minorities, the disproportionate control of the United States Congress and the executive branch by white males reflects the lesser importance of the courts as an instrument to protect and promote their interests in schools and workplaces.

Cases

Although cases of reverse discrimination are rare, a few historical and recent cases are particularly noteworthy.

In 1978, Allan Bakke successfully challenged the Medical School of the University of California at Davis at the U.S. Supreme Court for twice denying him admission because he was white.

In 1996, the court struck down the race-conscious admissions program of the University of Texas Law School using lower minimum criteria for blacks and Latinos than for others.

The Fulton County in Georgia was ordered by a judge to pay $300,000 to the county's deputy director of human services for being passed over for a promotion in favor of a black woman in 2007.

In 2009, a group of white firefighters won a reverse discrimination case when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the city of New Haven, Connecticut, improperly threw out the promotion test results. City officials claimed that only one but no blacks would qualify for promotion based on the test results.

Implications for Human Services

Due to dramatic demographic changes, the U.S. population has become more culturally diverse than ever. At the same time, demands for goods and services in the global economy have compelled many U.S. companies to seek, retain, and promote talented and skilled workers. Through practices and policies, leadership from the top could make a lasting and positive impact on the trends of diversity in the workplace.

First, government and corporations should take steps to ensure the selection, evaluation, and promotion criteria and processes are clear, fair, and transparent to all of those concerned. Second, employers should take a comprehensive approach in the provision and delivery of human services to a multicultural workforce. Broadening cross-cultural knowledge and skills of the workforce could improve the overall cultural competence of staff when interacting with one another and with the public. Seminars to help workers deal with gender, ethnic, and cultural differences in communication styles could foster intergroup understandings, enhance productivity, and promote job satisfaction. Third, employee assistance programs could benefit from hiring psychologists and social workers who are capable of providing counseling and therapy services, information, and referrals to a culturally diverse workforce.

Unique human services could be targeted to workers who have negative reactions or opposition to peers who look, think, and act differently from themselves or who have failed to move up the organizational ladder. Boot camps run by outside experts (or career coaches) could offer this at-risk group realistic self-assessments and counseling. Female and minority workers would potentially benefit from support and services from career coaches on career development and advancement.

Cosponsoring workshops on employment and career assistance services could improve the career prospects of a diverse workforce. A multicultural workforce could also benefit from learning about the psychological and emotional tolls of microaggressions (i.e., day-to-day behaviors, knowingly or unknowingly) such as slights and put-downs that carry covert negative connotations to the recipients.

A diverse workforce calls for different human services needs and delivery. To meet the needs of different groups, government and corporations are required to devote resources to personnel training and deployment of these services. Thus, the trend of diversifying the workforce has become the locomotive of further changes in the labor market by increasing the demands for human services professionals such as therapists, social workers, counselors, and career coaches.

Joyce Tang
Queens College of The City University of New York

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Diversity in the Workplace; Prejudice, Theories of; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Burtsein, Paul. "'Reverse Discrimination' Cases in the Federal Courts: Legal Mobilization by a Countermovement." Sociological Quarterly, v.32 (1991).

Noon, Mike. "The Shackled Runner: Time to Rethink Positive Discrimination?" Work, Employment and Society, v.24 (2010).

Tang, Joyce and Earl Smith, eds. Women and Minorities in American Professions. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1996.

Rites of Passage

Rites of passage have their roots in anthropology and are generally defined as group processes designed to structure and provide meaning to the various transitional stages in human development, from childhood into adulthood. Research on rite of passage programs began in the early 20th century by anthropologists reflecting programs that included debutante balls for the white upper class. More recent research on rites of passage programs has focused on youth in marginalized schools and communities. Schools are considered to be a place that prepares young people for their roles in society and aids them in transitioning from childhood to adulthood.

Purpose and Structure

Rites of passage programs exist in communities to assist members with any transition from one phase of life to another, such as birth, puberty, or death. N. Warfield-Coppock identified six formats for rites of passage programs: community-based, agency- or organizationally based, school-based, church-based, therapeutic, and family-based rites of passage programs. The rites of passage symbolic rituals of separation, transition, and incorporation assist individuals in gaining skills, values, norms, and morals that prepare them to accept roles in society. Rites of passage rituals are typically composed of (1) separation from the community, (2) preparation from elders, (3) a period of transition, and

(4) reintroduction to the community. Today, rites of passage programs tend to be culturally specific and focus on improving self-concept, ethnic identity development, and self-sufficiency among at-risk youth. The primary aim is to influence youth to be cooperative, understand and respect the sameness of self and of other individuals, and have a high sense of responsibility for the well-being and harmonious interconnection between self and community.

Rites of passage programs are typically designed as after-school, weekend, or summer programs. Components of rites of passage programs can include foreign language acquisition, arts and crafts, history, mathematics and science, martial arts, cultural excursions, and academic tutoring. Rites of passage programs facilitate academic improvement by requiring strict attendance, providing homework assistance, and helping students to develop conflict resolution skills. Structurally, these programs intervene at the school, family, and individual levels. Program staff frequently include administrators, teachers, athletic coaches, human service professionals, and mentors who are often members of the community.

The Role of Human Service Providers

Human service professionals are often involved in rites of passage programs to assist with the developmental needs of the participants. In order to engage in rites of passage programs, it is recommended that human service professionals first strive to become more knowledgeable about the culture of the community served and the sociopolitical realities that the families experience. Cultural understanding enables professionals to work with diverse populations in ways that validate their experiences. For many service providers, this will necessitate leaving the comfort of their workplaces and entering into culturally diverse communities. Activities, such as participating in outreach work, volunteering, and attending cultural events with community stakeholders, are ways to engage in immersion experiences and increase cultural understanding.

As staff members or consultants, human service professionals focus on psychosocial concerns and often provide psychoeducational workshops on identity development (personal, cultural, and social), interpersonal communication and conflict resolution, and decision making and moral judgement. The emphasis on psychosocial development allows for prevention and intervention with social skills, familial interactions and dynamics, educational challenges, and career planning. Service providers can provide services for program participants as well as their parents in the form of individual, group, and family counseling; psychoeducational workshops for participants; parent support groups; crisis intervention; and in-service training for staff. Human service professionals can also develop relationships with school personnel for fluid communication between the school and the program. Additionally, they can provide outreach to family members and social service agencies to connect participants to much-needed services. By partnering with community entities to provide supplemental services and culturally informed interventions, human service professionals can assist marginalized youth in developing the coping skills necessary to combat educational hegemony and social marginalization.

For more information about rites of passage programs, human services professionals can explore Web sites describing single-sex and coeducational programs. Additionally, program Web sites can be found that articulate services for specific cultural groups, such as African Americans and Latinos. Other resources include books that describe how to develop a rites of passage program (e.g., Ron Spears) and explicate the use of rites of passage programs within the human services paradigm (e.g., Jerome Schiele). Peer-reviewed journal articles are also useful in developing evidence-based interventions based upon the outcomes of research studies exploring the benefits of rites of passage programs.

Cirecie A. West-Olatunji
University of Cincinnati
Kristin Page
University of Florida

See Also: African Americans; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Providers, Institutional Racism and; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Gavazzi, S. M., K. A. Alford, and P. C. McKenry. "Cultural Specific Programs for Foster Care Youth: The Sample Case of an African American Rites of Passage Program." Family Relations, v.45 (1996).

Warfield-Coppock, N. "The Rite of Passage Movement: A Resurgence of African-Centered Practices for Socializing African American Youth." Journal of Negro Education, v.61 (1992).

West-Olatunji, C., L. Shure, M. Garrett, W. Conwill, and E. Torres. "Rite of Passage Programs as Effective Tools for Fostering Resilience Among Low-Income African American Male Adolescents." Journal of Humanistic Counseling, Education and Development, v.47 (2008).

Role Flexibility, International Differences in

In society, people perform or enact different social roles. A woman may be a corporate executive, mother, and graduate student. A man may be a teacher, the coach of his son's Little League team, and the prayer leader in his local congregation. The ability to move between varied and sometimes conflicting roles is called role flexibility. Roles are socially defined—the ease with which an individual embraces a role is to a large extent determined by personal expectations and the expectations of the community and society. Similarly, the ease with which an individual is able to transition among roles is dependent on the dynamics of the culture in which the individual participates. As such, there are marked international differences in role flexibility.

Loose Versus Tight Culture

Role flexibility is easier to achieve in a loose culture than it is in a tight culture. Loose cultures are cultures with relatively fluid norms, while tight cultures have norms that are more rigid, and there is less room for deviations. Loose cultures include countries such as Brazil, Hungary, the Netherlands, Ukraine, and the United States. Conversely, countries such as Pakistan, India, Japan, Singapore, and South Korea have been identified as tight cultures. In tight cultures, norms are preserved through the application of harsh sanctions such as the death penalty. The fear of sanctions in tight cultures mediates behavior, and people are more unwilling to strain the boundaries of established roles. In addition, people in tight cultures tend to identify with the ideals of the culture and develop self-regulatory beliefs and behaviors that parallel social expectations. As such, people in tight cultures exhibit less flexibility than people in loose cultures.

Gender Role Flexibility

One role that is significantly mediated by culture is gender. Gender role flexibility is the ability to challenge and go beyond social prescriptions of what it means to be masculine or feminine. While there have always been individuals who reject gender stereotyping, historically, masculinity has been associated with strength, dominance, independence, and assertiveness, and femininity has been associated with passiveness, expressiveness, and dependence. These definitions of masculinity and femininity are tied to social roles. In some cultures, there are clear lines of demarcation between the roles, but in other cultures, some lines are blurred. In Western societies, for example, there is a movement toward egalitarianism, and women and men are increasingly enacting roles that were once reserved for the opposite sex. This flexibility is evident in choice of occupation, dress, and domestic responsibilities.

The shift in traditional gender roles is partly a result of social and economic changes that are impacting the structure of families worldwide. An increasing number of women are now accessing education and gaining paid employment. In some instances, women are earning more than their spouses, and their income is necessary for the economic well-being of the family. These realities have influenced changes in attitudes about the roles women and men are expected to carry out.

In spite of the widespread change in gender attitudes, there are some cultures—particularly in rural areas—where gender ideologies remain fixed. In regions of some developing countries in Asia, Africa, Latin America, and the Caribbean, an androgynous or transgendered individual may experience violence for violating social norms. Even a man who carries out domestic chores sometimes receives the ridicule of other men and risks losing the respect of the women. Similarly, women who venture into traditional male roles are criticized for failing to embrace their prescribed roles as wives and mothers. On the other hand, men and women who act according to their stereotypical gender roles receive the approval of their communities. These social sanctions and reinforcements result in inflexible role boundaries, particularly among males. Internationally, men tend to have a deeper aversion to moving between gender roles, and women have greater gender role flexibility. The difference in gender role flexibility between men and women is probably most evident in social attitudes toward lesbians and gays. In general, heterosexual individuals demonstrate more favorable attitudes for lesbians than they do for gays.

Role Flexibility in the Workplace

Similar to the conflict in gender roles, workers often experience difficulty moving between their roles in the workplace and their roles in the family. Long work hours and rigid workplace structures frequently conflict with family responsibilities. Working caregivers of children and aging parents find they are pressured to find time for medical appointments and their children's extracurricular activities while advancing their careers. Also, because women often find it difficult to reenter the job market after taking time off, some working mothers experience tension in deciding whether to return to work and protect their jobs or spend time with their newborn child. In a number of countries, even if mothers decide to return to work part time, they normally do so at the expense of reduced hourly wage and loss of benefits. In the United States, part-time workers earn 21 percent less than full-time workers.

The amount of tension that arises between individuals' responsibility to their families and their responsibility to their jobs varies depending on labor laws and company policies. The United States has fewer labor laws than many European countries, and on average, workers in the United States work longer hours than their European counterparts. The limited legal protection U.S. employees receive makes it more difficult for them to move between their roles as parents and wage earners. In other parts of the world where work hours are shorter and there are more regulations that protect employees, workers may find it easier to navigate both roles. In Sweden, for example, working parents have the right to reduce their work week by up to 25 percent until their child is 8 years old or has completed first grade.

The Benefits of Role Flexibility

Role conflict theory suggests role flexibility reduces conflict between competing roles. When individuals have freedom to act in different—sometimes incompatible—capacities, they experience less anxiety and achieve greater psychological well-being. In the workplace, role flexibility can result in reduced absenteeism, lower stress levels among workers, and an enhanced ability to attract and keep high-quality staff. All of this translates into improved worker satisfaction and productivity and a better quality of life.

Lenna Dawkins-Moultin
Texas A & M University, College Station

See Also: Ethnic Diversity and Values; LGBTQ Clients; Regional Cultural Competence.

Further Readings

Christensen, Kathleen and Barbara Schneider, ed. Workplace Flexibility: Realigning 20th-Century Jobs for a 21st-Century Workforce. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2010.

Geland, Michele, et al. "Differences Between Tight and Loose Cultures: A 33-Nation Study." Science, v.332 (2011).

Runaway Youth

In the United States, there are two distinct yet frequently overlapping populations of transient minors who may be receiving a variety of human services and support: runaway and homeless youth and youth victims of human trafficking. Considering their age and legal status, these minors are highly vulnerable to injustice, oppression, violence, and general lack of access to basic human necessities like food, clothing, and shelter. It is important for human services professionals to understand some of the common characteristics of these groups and to know where and how to access resources to help these potential clients. It is also important to note that many of these youth face additional and intersecting oppressions because of previous and primary socioeconomic, sexual or gender, racial or ethnic, or other minority statuses.

Unaccompanied Homeless Youth

The first group of minors falls into the federally defined category of being runaway or homeless youth. This population has been separated from their family of origin or adults responsible for their care, either by choice via running away from home or by force, when their caregivers kick them out or throw them away (an expression used in the federal definition). According to the National Alliance to End Homelessness, it is likely that, in a given three-year period, more than 550,000 youth will fall into this category.

Additional studies conclude that one in seven young people between the ages of 10 and 18 will run away. Youth age 12 to 17 are more at risk of homelessness than adults. Out of all runaways, 75 percent are female. Estimates of the number of pregnant homeless girls are between 6 and 22 percent. Between 20 and 40 percent of homeless youth identify as gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, or questioning GLBTQ. Of all runaway and homeless youth, 46 percent reported being physically abused, 38 percent reported being emotionally abused, and 17 percent reported being forced into unwanted sexual activity by a family or household member. And, 75 percent have dropped out or will drop out of school. Reasons cited show that the most common reasons why these youth run away or become homeless are due to family problems, leaving foster care, and poverty.

A subcategory of the unaccompanied homeless youth population is made up of youth who have been forced into physical or sexual labor and essentially into an underground slave trade. Because of their vulnerability, runaway or homeless youth from the first category may become victims of human trafficking; yet another significant number of trafficked youth are illegally transported in and out of the United States by vast international networks of perpetrators. Estimates show that anywhere from less than one-quarter to more than half of the identified human trafficking victims globally are minors under the age of 18.

Programs and Services

A large majority of services for all homeless minors are funded in large part by the federal government through the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act (RHYA), which was first enacted in 1974. This legislation funnels grants through the Department of Health and Human Services' Family and Youth Services Bureau (FYSB) to private, nonprofit agencies as well as state and local governments. Among the FYSB-funded programs are a national hotline service, prevention and outreach services, emergency shelters, and transitional living programs. The Departments of State and Labor make up the largest share of fiscal responsibility for services to victims of human trafficking. If an unaccompanied minor can be certified by the federal government as a victim of human trafficking, a number of services and supports are available to assist them.

Two other important pieces of legislation that significantly impact the availability of services, especially education support, to both groups of minors in the United States are the McKinney-Vento Act of 1987, which mandates that public schools make accommodations to ensure that homeless youth have access to education, and the Chaffee Act, which provides ongoing services and financial support to youth aging out of the foster care system with the goal of preventing homelessness. There have also been important state-level legislative initiatives that have been passed to increase the accessibility of education, shelter, medical and dental care, and transportation to these youth.

Abigail Wychee
Northern Michigan University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; At-Risk Youth Services; Children, Youth, and Human Trafficking; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Bales, Kevin, and Ron Soodalter. The Slave Next Door: Human Trafficking and Slavery in America Today. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2010.

National Alliance to End Homelessness. "An Emerging Framework for Ending Unaccompanied Youth Homelessness." http://www.endhomelessness.org/library/entry/an-emerging-framework-for-ending-unaccompanied-youth-homelessness (Accessed August 2013).

National Conference of State Legislatures. "Runaway and Homeless Youth." http://www.ncsl.org/issues-research/human-services/homeless-and-runaway-youth.aspx (Accessed August 2013).

Rural Communities

The practice of human services in rural American communities presents both special challenges and unique opportunities to professionals. The human service profession is committed to meeting human needs, promoting social justice, enhancing quality of life, and developing the full potential of individuals, families, groups, and communities in society. Rural communities usually lack the social and economic resources that exist in most urban communities. The rising unemployment rates and increasing poverty, coupled with rural-life, unique risk factors, such as isolation and scarcity of services, and behavioral problems, such as domestic violence and alcohol and substance abuse, have led to a higher need for human services and safety net programs, including food stamps, job training, and direct financial assistance. Ineluctably, rural life involves a certain amount of economic risks that the individual has no control over, and there is limited capacity to support community-based human services to assist people experiencing serious economic difficulties.

The lack of adequate attention to conditions in rural communities results in a parsimonious range of choices, few opportunities for personal or community development, and living conditions and levels of income that tend to lag behind those in urban areas. Rural communities, based on census classifications, have less than 10,000 people. Usually, they include a small town that might have a grocery store, gas station, and perhaps a tavern. Such communities, however, usually lack substantial human services and resources. Residents of most rural communities often depend on the county and neighboring towns for resources. People in a rural community live under very different accompaniments than those in metropolitan areas. Communities in rural areas are characterized with low population density as residents either live relatively apart or the entire community may be populated by few people.

A rural Appalachian family in the early 20th century. As a stimulus to address rural issues, with rural communities being defined as having less than 10,000 people based on census classifications, the Appalachian Redevelopment Act of 1965 provided considerable funds for the provision of services to the Appalachian Mountain region.

Rural communities also tend to be more geographically distant than urban areas. Although rural communities, like the rest of the United States, are becoming increasingly diverse and multidimensional, they still tend to be more specialized than urban areas, which are more likely to have more room for diverse services. All rural communities, nevertheless, are not necessarily alike. Rural communities can be identified in four distinct types: (1) the farm or ranch trade center, (2) the bedroom community for an urban area, (3) the tourist center, and (4) the mining, energy, or timber company town. Although each type of community experiences unique problems, all are undergoing rapid transition and encounter difficulties in adapting to this change.

Another serious barrier is the stigma attached to having problems and receiving services in rural communities. This negative perception commonly prevents individuals and families from seeking help for their problems, particularly in the area of mental health. Rural community residents are reluctant to use human services for reasons that include concerns about the family's reputation; pride; a family tradition of self-reliance and not asking for help from social agencies; fear of being perceived or labeled as lazy or incapable of taking care of oneself; and mistrust of the social welfare system.

Developmental History of Human Services

The term human service is a broad umbrella category that includes many different kinds of work in the helping field. Among the early, prominent human service workers were doctors and nurses, teachers, lawyers, social workers, the clergy, and others. Before the period of industrialization, heavy reliance on the self-help approach remained the major means of providing human needs in rural areas. While the Charity Organization Society (COS) and the settlement house movement had significant impacts in shaping human services demand and delivery in urban settings, they had little effect on rural areas. In the past, rural residents were bound together through their dependence on the land, mostly through faming for their livelihood. For this reason, public welfare has never been as acceptable in rural areas as in urban communities. Historically, the original Social Security Act's social insurance arrangement did not provide coverage to farmers and other self-employed citizens and, as such, offered little protection to rural populations. The human service field in the United States began in the 1950s and since then has grown with the impact of deinstitutionalization, the War on Poverty program, the New Careers movement, and the proliferation of community colleges.

The reemergence of interest in professional human service in rural American communities began in the early 1960s. The unrest of the 1960s influenced human service providers, mainly social workers. Many new types of professional practices and new practice settings were developed. Since the 1960s, the human service movement has experienced tremendous growth. This growth is evidenced by the increase in the number of training programs, the unprecedented expansion in the size of the mental health delivery systems and the establishment of the human service administration at the federal level. As a stimulus to address rural issues, the Appalachian Redevelopment Act of 1965 provided considerable funds for the provision of services to the Appalachian Mountain region. Part of the funds were available to professionals in health and social services and contributed to the creation of different approaches to practice and different human service delivery patterns.

Furthermore, government expenditures on social welfare increased dramatically between 1960 and 1970. With the passage of Title XX legislation in 1975 came another infusion of funds specifically for social services. In the years that followed, a group of practitioners in various rural sectors around the country began to organize special knowledge bases for work in these settings. In 1975, the National Organization for Human Service Education (NOHSE) was founded at the 5th Annual Faculty Development Conference of the Southern Regional Education Board. The National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH), in 1976, appropriated funds to the Southern Regional Education Board (SREB) to establish national standards for training and reviewing human service programs. The efforts of SREB led to the formation of the Council for Standards in Human Service Education (CSHSE) in February 1979.

The CSHSE was established with the mandate to provide guidance and direction to education and training programs in human services by identifying criteria for faculty, curricula, field education, student admission and advisement, and essential resources. As formal organizations, both NOHSE and CSHSE played major roles in the establishment of the human services methodology as an important field of study for the helping professions. Additionally, the term human service, as opposed to “welfare,” was given the official stamp of approval in 1980, when the federal Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) changed its name to HHS. In 1982, the National Commission for Human Service Workers (NCHSW) was formed to provide a national system for voluntary registration and certification of human service workers.

Human Services and Rural Community Practice

Since the 1970s, interest in providing human services in rural areas has increased. Historically, those living in rural areas have been disadvantaged, experiencing steady erosion in population and quality of life. They are more likely to be elderly, be members of disadvantaged minorities, lack the kinds of resources and opportunities available to their urban counterparts, and be in need of the help of human service professionals and agencies. More barriers or difficulties in providing accessible and adequate services include shortages of trained helping professionals, the large distance between clients and providers, the management of confidentiality, and the coordination of care. Overall, the rural population of the United States has lower incomes, higher unemployment levels, higher poverty rates, inadequate educational service, and insufficient health and social services compared with urban and suburban areas.

Although human service practice in rural areas may not require considerably different competencies than those routinely required for the human services worker in urban settings, it must be understood that the application of activities is definitely different. The rural human service worker often is one of a very small number of professionals in a community, and as such, the worker is expected to possess broad knowledge and skills required to improve conditions for the clients of the community. It is imperative that the rural human service worker must be independently resourceful, innovative, and self-motivating and have the ability to function with minimal supervision. They are to be versatile in their practice with clients and willing, sometimes, to engage in unconventional approaches to services provision.

Rural human service practice requires much more than the transfer of an urban worker’s knowledge, skills, and urban-oriented approaches to service delivery to rural settings. A rural human service worker must be prepared to provide counseling to individuals, families, and groups; to establish support networks and engage natural helpers in providing services; and to work with local, county, and other community elites to generate needed resources. The worker recognizes the need to devote adequate attention to working with the community to develop prevention programs and to build linkages among the existing services to maximize their effectiveness. The worker, sometimes, may have to performs the role of the spokesperson for the most vulnerable people in the community.

Practice Perspective in Rural Community Human Services

Human service practice in rural communities challenges the worker to use a range of professional interventions and community skills. Rural community human services call for the worker to have practice potential and experience in broad areas such as clinical and health practice, community organization, administration and management, public welfare, and community-based services. The human service practitioner’s skills that are based on the generalist concept and training are uniquely suited to helping rural people plan their lives, families, groups, organizations, and communities to surmount adversity. Generalist rural service workers look at issues in context with the intention to find solutions within the interactions between client systems and their social environments. Human service generalists possess the knowledge, values, and skills to perform several job functions while moving beyond the confines of individually focused practice to the expansive sphere of intervention at the multiple systems level.

The generalist also works with a rural community client using both the micro and macro systems perspective. The micro system intervention focuses on work with individuals in the client’s environment, including family and small groups, and related others such as friends, teachers, coworkers, and individuals within human service delivery. Using the problem-solving process of engagement, data collection, assessment, intervention, evaluation, and termination, the worker should be able to provide assistance to different client systems. The worker engages in interviewing the client, establishing rapport, and engaging in planning and problem solving. The goal is to foster changes within personal functioning in social relationships and in the part of people's interaction with social and institutional resources. Intervention at the macro systems level addresses social problems in community, organization, agency, neighborhood, institutional, and societal systems. At this level, the generalist practitioner works as a community planner, locality developer, public educator, neighborhood organizer, and policy developer, and also engage in social action. The goal is to work with rural clients to understand the relationship between their problems and the larger environment and, therefore, find change strategies in the process.

Case management is also a viable approach for service delivery in rural communities. This approach provides for a central worker who knows and understands the client's full situation or who is charged with the responsibility for planning and coordinating intervention activities. The goal of case management is to educate those who need assistance to manage their own lives but to support them when professional expertise is needed or a crisis develops. Use of case management as a method of coordinating and delivering service in a rural setting may be suited for long-term care involving work with individuals experiencing problems associated with aging, disability, and mental illness. Essentially, case managers gather information, conduct assessments, arrange services from other agencies, and provide advocacy and direct services. They assume responsibility for the allocation of scarce resources, provide quality assurance, and most importantly, monitor services.

Case management provides a single point of access advantage rather than entry points at each agency. Furthermore, it is important that rural human service practitioners empower members of their communities to appreciate the interconnectedness of their lives in the social fabric and economic and political structures of the country. Empowerment is a process through which individuals, families, organizations, communities, and societies realize and increase their personal, interpersonal, and political power to make and advance improvement in their life situations.

Felix O. Chima
Prairie View A & M University

See Also: Appalachia and Human Services; Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in.

Further Readings

Davenport, J. A. "Rural Social Work." In Encyclopedia of Social Work. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 2008.

Mandell, B. R. and B. Schram. An Introduction to Human Services: Policy and Practice, 5th ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2003.

Morales, A. T., B. W. Sheafor, and M. E. Scott. Social Work: A Profession of Many Faces, 11th ed. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2007.

Woodside, M. and T. McClam. An Introduction to Human Services, 5th ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson Brooks/Cole, 2006.

S

Same-Sex Couples/Marriage

Same-sex couples exist in every ethnic, religious, racial, and cultural group. Respective social norms and cultural taboos can often challenge the experience of being welcomed within families or the immediate and broader society of a community or country.

Homosexuality is prevalent in approximately 10 percent of the population. Many gay individuals partner with others and, if available, may choose to have a personal, religious, or civil union or domestic partnership. Increasingly, same-sex marriage is becoming available to a greater number of global citizens. However, legislation still exists in the United States and in other countries that criminalizes such relationships and relevant sexual behaviors. Penalties may range from being completely overlooked to a death sentence.

Human service providers need to understand the needs and expectations of same-sex couples within the context of the clients' relationships and macro systems that may condemn their very existence. Effective service provision is dependent on cultural competence as well as awareness by the provider of their own attitudes toward same-sex couples and marriage. If a practitioner is not able to offer supportive and solution-based services due to personal biases, they must, ethically, refer the clients to others absent such beliefs so that the best possible services can be offered.

Same-Sex Couples: A Historical Overview

Same-sex couples have existed throughout reported history. The Bible presents the story of Ruth and Naomi, and while unclear, some find the suggestion of a lesbian relationship. Evidence suggests the acceptance of homosexual relationships in ancient Egypt in which a pharaoh's tomb was made for a same-sex couple, representing the kingdom's acceptance of that relationship. Similar relationships existed in Mesopotamia; early documents outlined types of relationships including those of male lovers and kings. The Code of Hammurabi, one of the recorded laws of Mesopotamia, contained restrictions against same-sex unions.

Plato described same-sex attractions and homosexual relationships, which were accepted in ancient Greece without condemnation. Greek mythology provided examples of same-sex involvement by the god Zeus. Homer's Iliad and The Odyssey provided subtle poetic passages discussing homoerotic love. Same-sex unions existed in ancient Rome, even among Roman emperors. Cicero, a Roman statesman, documented legal rights of individuals within same-sex marriages. Such opportunities pertained to men more than women due to the lack of equal freedoms for women economically and socially.

With the rise of Christianity, Rome experienced a change similar to that of Greece in increasing negative attitudes regarding same-sex unions as well as nonprocreative sex. Rome ultimately passed a fourth-century law to punish anyone in a same-sex marriage.

Religious traditions regarding homosexuality have changed over time. Eastern religions presented overall more-tolerant attitudes than those of Western belief systems. The Vedas, the sacred texts of Hindus, view homosexuality as a perversion but do not restrict it. Mixed-race relationships were considered much more offensive. The most-tolerant attitude toward homosexuality was in Japanese Buddhism, which praises its essence due to its mystery. Modern Japan holds no restrictions, religious or political, recognizing homosexual behavior as a private matter between consenting adults; gay unions are not yet legally recognized.

Later Buddhist texts were similarly neutral. Today, same-sex love is counter to the political norms in India; however, Hindu traditions provide community elders with the decision of determining if a marriage is acceptable.

The advent of Christianity and the power of the Church in medieval Europe stigmatized same-sex relationships. Yet some evidence shows such relationships existed freely during the early Middle Ages. There was very limited European sexual law forbidding same-sex behavior, and there is evidence in clergy literature of compassion regarding homosexuality even within its own membership. The Church tolerated such unions and even offered some ceremonies. Gay clerics performed homosexual marriages as far back as the 4th century. The first laws against sodomy appeared in the 13th century. In the West, the next few centuries provided numerous examples of behaviors deemed unnatural or deviant, which shifted the perception of same-sex couples as a threat to society, like witches and Jews. This led to violent reactions by many. Heterosexuality became accepted as the normal sexual orientation by the 19th century, resulting in a rejection of any deviations, viewed as diseases, best served by individual suppression if not treated in another way. Western society came to predominantly forbid same-sex marriage. Missionaries shared these beliefs globally, converting indigenous belief systems and practices. The Nazis classified homosexuals as part of an inferior race, leading to the greatest discrimination of this population by the mass murder of many.

Same-Sex Relationships in Modern Society

The advent of the gay and lesbian rights movement of the 1960s provided a vocal and visual awareness for many of a population that wanted to claim rights equal to the rest of society. Religious interpretations of marriage as only appropriate between one man and one woman prevented the provision and guarantee of equal rights as denoted in the U.S. Constitution. The influence of religion on federal policies and laws was profound in this area. Studies found long-term same-sex couples as similar to heterosexuals regarding stability and longevity. Yet social stigma, prejudice, lack of many entitlements from inheritance and adoption to health care decisions and Social Security spousal qualifications undermined the legitimacy of such relationships within society, delaying legal recognition for decades.

Over time, different countries, and states within the United States, began to provide recognition of unions by domestic partnerships or civil unions and, in some cases, even marriage with full rights granted to heterosexual counterparts.

The United States enacted the Defense of Marriage Act of 1996, which defined marriage as a union between one man and one woman. The United States observes states' rights allowing each to decide jurisdictional laws independently. Many states forbid same-sex marriages and, despite a federal law that requires the recognition of a legally binding marriage in one state to be recognized by every other, federalism allowed states to not recognize same-sex legal unions from other states.

Legal Recognition of Same-Sex Marriages

An increasing number of countries provide same-sex marriage licenses. The Netherlands recognized this freedom to marry in 2001, followed by Belgium (2003); Spain, a Catholic country, and Canada (2005); South Africa (2006); Norway and then Sweden (2009); Portugal, Iceland, and Argentina (2010); Denmark (2012); and Brazil, France, Uruguay, and New Zealand (2013). In Britain, including England and Wales, same-sex couples were able to marry as of 2014.

Other countries, including the United States, have regional freedom for same-sex marriage.

Massachusetts, in 2004, became the first U.S. state to allow same-sex couples to marry. Since then, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, Vermont, Washington, and Washington, D.C., all passed their own state laws. This number of states passing laws either for or against same-sex marriage is changing rapidly. In addition, several Native American nations within the United States recognize same-sex marriages. Other states have domestic partner and civil union options, which provide some states rights.

In 2013, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the Defense of Marriage Act, which resulted in individual states already performing such marriages adding federal recognitions and benefits to their same-sex, legally married residents. However, states still banning same-sex marriage recognition continue to deny rights now recognized at federal and state levels to same-sex couples legally married in another state. This presents a range of issues that will be debated in the courts as is happening in Pennsylvania, which does not recognize same-sex marriage from any state or offer civil unions or domestic partnerships. One Pennsylvania county offering marriage licenses is being challenged in a lawsuit by the state. New Jersey's legislature voted to allow same-sex marriage; however, Governor Chris Christie vetoed the legislation saying this should be a referendum for the state to determine. However, a state judge ruled that the civil union designation illegally prevented same-sex couples from receiving equality guaranteed by the Constitution, becoming the first case applying the U.S. Supreme Court's decisions to state law. The judge ruled on September 27, 2013, that same-sex couples must be permitted to marry in the state of New Jersey; while the governor planned to appeal to the state Supreme Court, he withdrew the appeal the same year.

Several other states are in the process of offering civil unions or domestic partnerships. The majority of states still deny same-sex marriages within their own as well as recognition of those from other states. It is expected that challenges to these state laws will eventually overturn them as was done with the antimiscegenation laws banning interracial marriage in some states. In Loving v. Virginia (1967), the Supreme Court invalidated a Virginia antimiscegenation law that violated the equal-protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Challenges remain. Divorce laws for couples married in one state but living in another where their marriage is not recognized will not be able to end their marriage. Couples may have difficulty implementing parental and custodial rights if their adoption is not recognized in the state of residence.

Federal legislation has provided U.S. military benefits to same-sex couples married in states that allow same-sex marriage. A quandary arises when such couples relocate to another base in a state that does not recognize same-sex marriage. While such marriages remain recognized on the base, they are not recognized in the state, and rights are lost, at the state level, once off base. An adoptive parent may not be able to advocate for his or her child or attend to vital medical matters for his or her child or spouse. This creates inequities in experiences and rights for military-based families from one state to another. The U.S. government has extended Internal Revenue Service (IRS) federal benefits to all gay married couples regardless of the state laws of residence recognizing their marriage or not. Oklahoma, based on a voter-approved constitutional amendment, has become the fourth state, following Texas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, to stop processing benefits to same-sex legally married couples in its state National Guard despite a federal directive requiring such provisions. These fast-changing and complicated regulations lead to many issues human service providers need to address.

Human Service Providers' Obligations to Consumers

Human service providers range from paraprofessionals to credentialed professionals, all of whom work to provide referrals, services, and other benefits and entitlements to the clients they serve. Absent the issue of same-sex couples and marriage, individuals working in any human service field are likely to have personal values relevant to biases and deservedness of clients. Biases can arise from race, ethnicity, age, any type of physical or mental challenge, religious beliefs, immigration status, and legal histories. It can be challenging to provide services to members of groups with which the service provider feels uncomfortable.

Responsible practice requires such practitioners to refer any individual to whom they cannot provide full and equal support and service to another provider. Knowing one's own practice limitations regarding populations is essential. In addition, competence and knowledge of current legislation is key in providing proper services based on the most up-to-date legal decisions.

Keeping Up With the Law

Changes in legislation regarding same-sex marriage in the United States seem to be occurring almost weekly. While it took an extended period of time for states previously identified to legalize same-sex marriage within their jurisdictions, the U.S. Supreme Court made two groundbreaking decisions in June 2013.

The decision was whether or not to support a California court's decision to overturn Proposition 8, which was a ballot initiative on a California state constitutional amendment restricting marriage as between one man and one woman. The U.S. Supreme Court determined the case should not be before that court. By declining to decide if Proposition 8 was constitutional or not, the Supreme Court left the lower court's decision in place, allowing gay marriage to be the law of the state as it had been prior to Proposition 8. A second decision that same week, in June, United States v. Windsor, determined that federal law denied Ms. Windsor, a surviving spouse, inheritance protections afforded heterosexual, married, widowed partners. Married to her late spouse, she faced a tax bill of $360,000 versus no such bill for a heterosexual widow. This case quickly led to the federal government's decision to afford all same-sex married couples these IRS protections.

Same-Sex Couple and Marriage Complexities Faced by Human Service Providers

Not everyone supports same sex marriage. In fact, a number of people find homosexuality incomprehensible or sinful. Human service providers are also members of society, and while many may find ways to fairly address needs of clients of different cultures and belief systems, the ability to address same-sex couples fairly may be an especially challenging task for some. Changes in state and federal laws as well as nonrecognition of legal marriages from another state, while federal benefits like IRS recognition are legal, can become very confusing. In one day, same-sex married partners, legally married in another state, absent any recognition in their current state, might become eligible for federal but not state benefits. Human service providers must keep up with current regulations, benefits, and qualifications; in some cases, laws are being adjusted or written at the same time that clients are seeking assistance.

Challenges to Personal Values of Human Service Providers

Continuing in this vein, human service providers need to untangle available and developing referrals and services. They need to be competent in dealing with immigration issues, which now legally recognize same-sex married couples where one partner might have been previously deported or denied heterosexual citizenship benefits. Families of same-sex partners, now legally married, with children, as well as same-sex couples without children, can need a range of services that human service providers previously did not have to provide. Meeting aging, married, same-sex couples and helping them with IRS and other benefits to which they are entitled may seem distasteful, frivolous, or unimportant to practitioners. Social justice provisions in all professional codes of ethics require professionals to advocate on behalf of individuals who are being categorically denied services freely available to others.

Human service providers work within social service agencies in many cases or with other types of organizations, such as schools and hospitals. These need to address their possibly biased standards and rules regarding service provision. Many social service agencies have religious affiliations; they may not recognize abortion as a pregnancy option or approve of same-sex relationships much less marriages and adoptions. All service agencies will need to provide diversity training to all employees and volunteers, in particular, in this case, regarding issues relevant to marriage in the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) community, and appropriate referrals if they feel unable to provide adequate services.

Same-sex marriage has been a long sought-after equal rights recognition that is slowly making its way across the globe and within the United States. Service providers who work and provide services in states that recognize same-sex marriage but who find same-sex marriage to conflict with their personal beliefs will have to deal with that paradox. Such workers will need to do their best to understand their own personal biases in order to work with individuals to whom they must provide benefits for which they are now legally eligible.

Conclusion

Same-sex couples and their rights to marry have varied throughout history. This century has provided a variety of new challenges globally and within the United States regarding such couples' service needs and the abilities and demands of human service workers to provide appropriate, informed, accurate, unbiased, and nonjudgmental assistance. Too often, opinions are value laden, which is not appropriate in human service practice. Clients must, ideally, receive equal care and attention. This can be immensely challenging for some, and it should be noted that not all biases are based on sexual orientation.

Human service workers are not required to change their personal values, only to be mindful of them and how they might interfere with fair and equitable treatment of their consumers. If they cannot work with a specific population, in this case, same-sex couples, married or not, it is imperative that they excuse themselves from the professional relationship and appropriately refer the case to another practitioner who can better meet the needs of those clients who are seeking services.

Kim Lorber
Ramapo College of New Jersey
Adele Weiner
Metropolitan College of New York

See Also: AIDS/HIV Programs; Domestic Violence, Victims of; Heterosexual Privilege; Marriage and Family Therapy; Transgender Individuals.

Further Readings

Freedom to Marry. "The Freedom to Marry Internationally." http://www.freedomtomarry.org/landscape/entry/c/international (Accessed September 2013).

Liptak, Adam. "Supreme Court Bolsters Gay Marriage With Two Major Rulings." New York Times (June 27, 2013). http://www.nytimes.com/2013/06/27/us/politics/supreme-court-gay-marriage.html?pagewanted=all (Accessed September 2013).

Lowrey, Annie. "Gay Marriages Get Recognition From the I.R.S." New York Times (August 30, 2013). http://www.nytimes.com/2013/08/30/us/politics/irs-to-recognize-all-gay-marriages-regardless-of-state.html?_r=0 (Accessed September 2013).

Random History. "Same-Sex Unions Throughout Time: A History of Gay Marriage." http://www.randomhistory.com/history-of-gay-marriage.html (Accessed September 2013).

School Counselors

School counselors coordinate and assist students of diverse socioeconomic and demographic backgrounds. Employed in elementary, middle, and high schools, in public and private institutions, this unique population of human service workers engages in academic, social, and emotional counseling. Their jobs may require them to connect students to school and community resources and help students (and often their families) resolve a variety of problems. The field of school counseling (as evidenced in the curriculum of credentialing programs, professional journals, and conferences) acknowledges that working with diverse student bodies shapes counselors' practices and attitudes and that counselors' practices can inequitably impact youth. This entry focuses on public high school counselors (the group most studied by researchers). It first provides an overview of counselors' tasks and interactions then discusses how a focus on diversity and equity characterizes counselor credentialing programs and professional associations. It concludes by identifying some dilemmas facing this field of professionals.

Counseling Activities in Public High Schools

Virtually all public high schools have counselors who are part of the support infrastructure for students. Other members of this infrastructure (aside from teachers and administrators) may include any of the following: social workers, nurses, psychologists, school interns, police officers, intervention counselors, and special education teachers. Any given school is likely to employ a handful of full-time counselors and employ the other service providers on a part-time basis; the latter may work part time in multiple high schools.

The American School Counseling Association National Model of standards identifies three separate yet overlapping domains in counselors' work: academic, career, and social or personal. Academic counseling ranges from advising students on which courses they need to take, which requirements they need to fulfill, how to improve grades, whether they should transfer to an alternative or independent school program, which colleges they should apply to, and how to apply for college and for financial aid. Career counseling orients students to postgraduate work-related opportunities including jobs, careers, the military, or vocational training programs. Because students are closer to the end of the public school pipeline when they reach high school, a good deal of counseling at the high school level (in contrast to middle and elementary school) is devoted to working with students to help them identify and achieve their post-high school goals (broadly defined).

The number of counselors in any given school is determined by district and state budgets; in times of fiscal austerity and budget cutbacks, counseling departments can shrink, adversely impacting students. In the United States, this has led to a very high ratio of students to counselors in public schools who may only be able to meet with each student once a year. However, to manage this ratio, counselors also use a batch processing approach that is typical of people-processing human services organizations: They organize collective events with groups of students (and often parents), enabling counselors to reach a greater number of students and to multiply their effectiveness.

In the areas of social and personal counseling, counselors encounter and manage a broad range of issues. School counselors often are the frontline school representatives who interact one-on-one with students and often their parents for routine transactions. They are on call to take up unanticipated crises as well. Counselors act as intermediaries between students and their parents who need resources (e.g., counselors may obtain referrals for students to visit off-site mental health clinics or for parents to visit housing assistance agencies; they may contact Child Protective Services on behalf of youth; and, on occasion, they must work with a student's probation or truancy officer). They match students with resources within schools (setting up accommodations for special needs students, channeling them into appropriate academic study groups or workshops of relevance to particular students).

Counselors tend to many social-emotional problems that cannot be addressed in the classroom, thus serving an important function in the overall operation of the school. Structurally, teachers are unable to cope with such problems because of demands that they focus on academic content in the classroom. Counselors may engage in one-on-one sessions with students to help them navigate difficult peer dynamics (bullying, turf wars, or peer mediation), assist them in resolving or help them talk through problematic family situations (parental neglect, divorce, pressure, incarceration, homelessness, drug addiction, or joblessness), and help them with painful and destructive personal behaviors or situations (cutting, eating disorders, drug and alcohol abuse, anger and depression, mental illness, suicide ideation, hunger, pregnancy, or being a foster youth).

Counselors may organize and facilitate student groups that address these issues, creating spaces in which peers can share fears and concerns with one another. Many counselors organize groups around particular constituencies, recognizing that some issues are more salient to one group than to another. For example, a group addressing sexual abuse in young couples or a group dedicated to heightening awareness of hurtful body images might be organized for girls. Counselors in some schools also facilitate diversity training workshops for students, appointing student leaders to run the workshops along with guidance from the adult counselor.

Occupationally, counselors can be thought of as emotion managers (managing the emotions of youth, which can range from ecstatic to suicidal; of their parents, who might have lost a job, had a house foreclosed on, or be disappointed or angry over their child's academic performance; and managing their own emotions as they go through unpredictable workdays that may entail school tragedy or the emotional distress of others). They manage others' emotions in the course of interactions and in the way they structure and design their work spaces, creating environments that communicate norms and values through the use of posters and office artifacts.

A New Jersey high school counselor gives a presentation to students and parents to assist them through the complicated college application process.

Like many other types of human service workers, school counselors' work and the "products" of their activities are hard to quantify, codify, or measure. Much of their work is invisible because it takes place privately due to confidentiality requirements. Measuring effectiveness can be difficult if not impossible when looking at outcomes such as emotional well-being, student prosperity, or problem resolution.

Counselors' impact on student outcomes tends to be indirect: While they are expected to play a role in improving school outcomes across the board, the degree to which their personal or collective interventions into outcomes such as test scores or college attendance is difficult to gauge. This contributes to the perception that counselors are auxiliary or nonessential employees. There are concerted, ongoing efforts to further professionalize the field of school counseling to combat the impression that counselors are marginal to school outcomes and student success.

Professional Training, Diversity, and Serving Students

Historically, the high school counselor was considered to be a gatekeeper, a representative of the school who directly and indirectly created opportunities for some groups of students but limited them for others. In the post-World War II era—until roughly the 1980s—fewer students went to college after high school, and those who did tended to be white, male, and middle class. Research found that counselors played a key role in discouraging other students—girls and students from underrepresented minority groups or working-class families—from taking college preparatory classes or attending four-year colleges. The latter groups were considered noncollege material, an identification that was deepened by counselors' practices. For example, acting on negative assumptions about the aptitudes and aspirations of students they considered noncollege material, counselors tended to guide these students into vocational curricular tracks.

In recent decades, youth from diverse backgrounds planned to attend college in unprecedented numbers, a sea change that has dramatically transformed both the environment in which counselors work and the normative orientation of the field. Counselor training programs caution counseling professionals against blocking students' aspirations and goals for higher education. Training curriculum involves, in part, educating future counselors about their own biases (both explicit and latent) toward students of color, working-class students, and students whose parents are immigrants or whose educational backgrounds are limited. Many professional programs, as do professional journals, encourage counselors to develop inclusive practices. Emphasis on cultural competency—the ability to communicate and interact effectively with people from different cultures and classes—has spread into the field of counseling, just as it has grown in the fields of health care and teaching.

Many people are attracted to the field of school counseling because they consider themselves to be advocates for youth. They seek a professional role that will enable them to serve in that role. Many prospective counselors also see counseling as a field in which they can act as social change advocates, and professional counselor journals publish many articles addressing this goal.

Professional journals and conferences devote extensive space to sensitizing counselors to the unique dilemmas faced by distinct populations of underserved students, including youth who are first-generation students; gay, lesbian, and transgender youth; youth who have experienced substance abuse; youth of distinct demographic groups such as African Americans, Latinos and Latinas, Native Americans, and Asian subgroups. These professional norms inform counselors' practices; an in-depth interview study with high school counselors revealed that the majority of counselors spend some of their time on efforts to give disadvantaged students time and space for discussing these problems.

Studies find that this is significant to students whose parents lack college degrees, who don't understand the process of selecting colleges and applying for financial aid, and who can't provide information and guidance about embarking on the road through higher education. Such students tend to rely more on school representatives such as school counselors to fill in these information gaps and to help them complete college and financial aid applications. Counselors can take a parental role, and many counselors who work with disadvantaged youth see their role as to fill in the gap left by parents who are unable to assist their children with these efforts.

The Future

The field of counseling has much to offer to people who wish to work in the human services sector and to help youth and adults overcome disadvantages. However, in the case of public high school counseling, structural limits to the field make this a difficult choice for young adults who are deciding how they can contribute professionally to this mission. Very high ratios of students to counselors being the norm, regular layoffs of counselors as school districts and states experience declining funding for education, and the difficulty of finding a stable, full-time counseling job will discourage many bright young adults from pursuing this field. In addition, efforts to professionalize school counseling (as seen in the ongoing evolution and advancement of national and state standards for school counselors), with their emphases on results-based practices and counselor accountability, compete with the idealistic goals many applicants have: to work intensively with youth (rather than engage in surveys and paperwork), to help youth from a variety of backgrounds, and to help the disadvantaged. Administrators in state education bureaucracies, districts, and schools would do well to acknowledge the many immeasurable benefits counselors provide to students, their parents, and to schools.

Vicki Smith
University of California, Davis

See Also: Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development; Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Educational Services; Multiracial Individuals and Families; School Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic issues for; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and.

Further Readings

American School Counselor Association. The ASCA National Model: A Framework for School Counseling Programs (2nd ed.). http://www.schoolcounselor.org (Accessed January 2014).

Cicourel, Aaron and John Kitsuse. The Educational Decision Makers. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1963.

Krei, M. and J. Rosenbaum. "Career and College Advice to the Forgotten Half: What Do Counselors and Vocational Teachers Advise?" Teachers College Record, v.103 (2001).

Rosenbaum, J., S. Miller, and M. Krei. "Gatekeeping in an Era of More Open Gates: High School Counselors' Views of Their Influence on Students' College Plans." American Journal of Education, v.104 (1996).

Smith, Vicki. "Counseling Kids: The World of High School Counseling." The Spencer Foundation. Department of Sociology, University of California, Davis, 2013.

Smith, Vicki. "Mediators of Opportunity: High School Counselors in the 21st Century." Sociology Compass, v.5/9 (2011).

School Health Services

Children attend school for many of their waking hours, making these institutions one of the central hubs of many families' lives. While the time children spend in school is increasing, so too is the realization that many children, especially those from diverse backgrounds, do not have the access to health care services that they need. As schools increasingly take responsibility for care of the whole child, school health services are seen as an effective way to address many of the health problems addressing children and their families, especially those who might otherwise not have access to such services. School health services comprise that care or advice provided by medical, education, or social work professionals that are provided in school settings or facilitated through connections with the school. School health services are provided to improve the health and overall well-being of children or their families or both. Focusing upon early detection, correction, prevention, or recovery of diseases, disabilities, or abuse that affects school-age children and their families, school health services seek to address some of the impediments that can influence children's school performance.

Background

During the first half of the 20th century, universal education became more common in the United States. As interest in improving the educational performance of children grew, so too did the realization that children's physical ailments affected their classroom performance. Student health problems also increased the public's expense to provide education. When health issues forced children to repeat a grade, for example, school systems were forced to spend to provide these students with teachers, textbooks, classroom space, and other materials. Some studies of urban school districts found that as many as 70 percent of school children suffered physical ailments that impeded their learning such as problems with their teeth or uncorrected vision. In an effort to decrease these costs and improve children's health, schools began experimenting with providing trained nurses in order to reduce the number of days of instruction lost to illness.

The New York City Department of Education hired the United States' first school nurse in 1902. Lina Rogers, the first school nurse, sought to reduce student absenteeism by working with students and their families to address the problems caused by communicable diseases. After a month in this role, Rogers had dramatically decreased student absences in the schools she served. As a result, New York City schools were able to expand their school nurse program across their facilities. By providing evidence-based nursing care to students in schools, the New York City public school system was able to increase many children's ability to learn. This, coupled with the decrease in absenteeism, caused many other American school districts to become interested in providing nursing services in their buildings.

For much of the 20th century, school nurses served as the major provider of school health services. School nurses initially provided care that addressed the physical maladies affecting students. This soon expanded to include a variety of emotional, mental, and social problems afflicting children enrolled in schools. As the century progressed, schools became aware of other health issues facing children and their families. In an effort to ameliorate these problems, many school districts engaged school psychologists and social workers to work with students and families. Passage of the federal Education for All Handicapped Children Act (later modified as the Individuals with Disabilities Educational Act) dramatically expanded the type of health services schools provided. As the 20th century closed, a growing realization of the health problems facing American families, especially those living in rural or urban settings, led some schools to partner with medical and dental professionals to provide services to children and families who were otherwise without such care. At the advent of the 21st century, schools were seen as a major influence in the battle against childhood obesity. As additional health problems become issues of concern, American schools will undoubtedly continue to play a role in detecting, preventing, and treating diseases and other health problems facing children and their families.

Direct School Services

School nurses, counselors, and psychologists all provide a variety of services that address the health needs of children and their families. Providing school-based nursing services was the first effort that school administrators made to prevent illnesses in and to provide other health-related services for students. While the geographic setting of the school (i.e., rural, urban, or suburban) affects the role played by the school nurse, certain services are almost always provided. School nurses serve as the health care expert who helps to assure normal development and to measure the response to certain interventions offered. In this role, school nurses often assess student health and supervise interventions and administer other care required for children's wellness. School nurses also play a major role in promoting health and safety, often participating in initiatives designed to promote student and community health such as administering antismoking campaigns, monitoring student immunizations, and assessing the learning environment for risks to student well-being. As issues such as bullying, emergency plans, and violence are increasingly of interest to the public, school nurses have found their role in addressing such increasing problems. Many school nurses also interact with families and students to build their capacity for learning, self-management, and behavior modification to reduce the risk of certain health problems.

School psychologists use principles from clinical and educational psychology to diagnose and treat students' behavioral, emotional, and learning problems. School psychologists provide assessment services that identify learning disabilities and other measures of student performance. School psychologists often take a leading role in the identification of children who qualify for special education and gifted services and work with school administrators and teachers to develop appropriate interventions that will best meet a child's individual learning needs. When various crises affect a school, whether death, violence, natural disaster, or other causes, school psychologists often help to develop interventions that assist teachers and students to deal with these.

School counselors work in elementary, middle school, or high school settings to help guide students to make decisions that benefit them. Originally focused chiefly upon exploring career options, school counseling has evolved to also address personal and social issues facing children. Many school counselors today work to identify, ameliorate, and address opportunity and achievement gaps facing children, especially those from diverse backgrounds. Interested in promoting and enhancing student achievement, school counselors work with children, their families, and their teachers to address issues, including those related to health, that might impede student success. In an elementary school setting, guidance counselors assist children and their families in developing personal and social competencies by means of individual and group counseling, collaboration with teachers, and family workshops. In middle schools, school counselors work to help students address social and behavioral issues that might negatively impact their school performance, especially as it impedes their ability to attend college. In high schools, school counselors work with all students to help them make postsecondary school plans, including college and vocational options. As educational attainment has a strong correlational effect on an individual's health, school counselors work to increase college access, which directly affects the physical and mental health of those whom they serve.

Other Health Concerns

The Individuals With Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) provides the framework for how American schools identify children in need of special services and the provision of those services. Children with disabilities are defined as those with autism, hearing or vision impairments (including the deaf and blind), intellectual disabilities, orthopedic impairments, serious emotional disturbances, specific learning disabilities, speech or language impairments, or traumatic brain injuries. IDEA mandates that schools provide special services, including medical, to permit those with disabilities access to a free and appropriate public education in the least-restrictive environment. Since its predecessor legislation's passage in 1975, IDEA has greatly expanded the opportunities available to those with physical or mental impairments. In certain cases, schools must also provide nursing and other health care to the students they serve.

Schools have always played a key role in identifying certain health risks and appropriate treatment for those children for whom this was appropriate. During the 1990s, however, a growing perception of the needs of many children and their families to access medical and dental care led many schools to attempt to provide access to such services on their campuses. Although some schools worked in conjunction with other federal, state, and local agencies, others initiated such programs on their own. Believing that student health problems affected children's performance whether treated or not, these efforts attempted to provide students and their families access to the services they needed to allow them to function at their full capacity.

Although the success of such programs has been difficult to document, schools' access to children and their families will continue to make this an area of interest to many.

Stephen T. Schroth
Knox College

See Also: Administration on Children, Youth and Families; After-School Services; Assistive Technology; Dental Services; Early Childhood Development; Head Start and Prekindergarten Programs; School Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for; Uninsured Clients.

Further Readings

Franklin, C., M. B. Harris, and P. Allen-Meares. The School Services Source Book: A Guide for School-Based Professionals, 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2013.
Massat, C. R., R. Constable, S. McDonald, and J. P. Flynn. School Social Work: Practice, Policy, and Research, 7th ed. Chicago: Lyceum Books, 2008.
Williams, S. J. and P. R. Torrens. Introduction to Health Services, 7th ed. Clifton Park, NJ: Thomson, 2008.

School Mental Health Project

The academic performance of students of all ages is dependent on a variety of factors. Although psychological well-being of students is as important as their physical health in affecting academic performance, few coordinated efforts have existed to develop effective programs for monitoring mental health in school settings. To address this issue, the School Mental Health Project was founded in 1986. The primary goals of the project include researching and improving school policies as well as training teachers and mental health professionals about more effective ways to address mental health and psychosocial concerns in schools. To ensure that psychological services are available to the largest number of students, the School Mental Health Project integrates the activities of school districts, governmental agencies, and professional educators on a national and expansive scale. The School Mental Health Project also takes into account the differences that may exist among schools and among students in the same school. Among the mental health population in schools, diversity exists in students' socioeconomic status, access to mental health resources, age, cultural and religious beliefs, and developmental stages. To help meet the varied needs of students, the role of diversity in schools is a focus in the project's initiatives. Specifically, the project strives to increase cultural competence among mental health professionals in order to understand the ways in which a child's unique cultural and ethnic background can affect his or her experiences in school and, relatedly, his or her psychological well-being. By cooperating with local schools, the project also takes into account the local culture in which a particular school may be situated to create the most effective mental health program.

Mental Health Initiatives in Schools

As research has demonstrated that psychological well-being affects academic proficiency, most schools have developed programs to address students' mental health problems. These programs are critical for students with cognitive, emotional, and behavioral concerns that may interfere with their ability to learn. Unfortunately, as a result of their insufficient breadth, scarce resources, and narrow goals, the effectiveness of many of these initiatives has been limited. Collaborative difficulties between schools and existing resources in communities contributed to inadequacies within these programs and prompted the creation of the School Mental Health Project.

The School Mental Health Project was created with the intention of targeting these issues of breadth, resources, and goals. Its mission is to create and coordinate all of the components necessary for effectively addressing the psychological needs of students by developing an overarching conceptualization of school-based mental health. In particular, the project strives to introduce interventions and preventive strategies, expand the use of these resources, and advance the field of school-based mental health. The School Mental Health Project addresses topics such as psychosocial adjustment to school, attendance, truancy, physical abuse, drug and alcohol abuse, dysfunctional relationships, misconduct, criminal activities, and violence.

Center for Mental Health in Schools

The U.S. federal government established the national Center for Mental Health in Schools in 1995 to serve as the primary conduit for the School Mental Health Project. The center operates through the School Mental Health Project at the University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA). The primary mission of the center is to uphold national standards for school-based mental health programs and to work with academic facilities to coordinate more-effective programs. Addressing psychological impediments to learning cannot be accomplished without integrating the project's goals with those of individual schools and regions. Therefore, the center emphasizes reducing inequities and counterproductive competition among particular schools and school districts. It also gives priority to approaching student mental health from an extensive, structural perspective. The overarching goal is to standardize mental health interventions and preventive programs across all schools while simultaneously honoring the unique needs of each student and each school.

As the main switchboard for school-based mental health programs, the center coordinates a number of training initiatives and activities in addition to addressing conceptual and policy issues. The center gathers and develops materials including guidebooks and training curricula as a means to implement innovative prevention and treatment practices. It also delivers direct assistance to professionals in the field in the form of newsletters, electronic networking, and information on support strategies. To encourage collaboration among educators and mental health professionals, the center generates, analyzes, and provides a forum for ongoing discussions regarding the most up-to-date procedures and practices in an effort to hasten new developments without marginalizing schools that may use different approaches. The center endorses the use of evidence-based practices in an effort to ensure that those practices encouraged and taught are the most efficacious.

Perhaps the most valuable and informative resources provided by the center are four national e-mail list management systems. These systems are the primary mechanism for accomplishing the center's work and the work of school-based mental health programs around the country. Each e-mail list management system circulates specific and topical information related to public outreach and to improve collaborative efforts among administrators, educators, parents, and students.

The first is a general e-mail list management system for any person who is interested in receiving information about the field and, specifically, about any of the center's newly developed resources. The second system is designed to share special initiatives such as those that might be of interest to school superintendents and principals. The third is an inter-center system to facilitate correspondence among different program centers and facilities. The fourth is the media and Internet news outlet e-mail list management system that promotes communication with the public at large to raise awareness and garner support.

As a result of utilizing these varied and integrative resources, the Center for Mental Health in Schools within the School Mental Health Project advances the ability of everyone involved to address the mental health needs of students. The center's goal is to insert these potent mental health programs in all schools to meet the needs of students who are suffering psychosocial issues that impede their learning.

Alexis Adams-Clark
Lindsay Labrecque
Butler Hospital and Brown University
Gregory L. Stuart
University of Tennessee, Knoxville

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Department of Education, U.S.; Learning Disabilities, Services for Individuals With; Mental Health Services, Children; School Counselors; School Health Services; School Psychologists; School Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for.

Further Readings

Adelman, H. S. and L. Taylor. The Current Status of Mental Health in Schools: A Policy and Practice Brief. Los Angeles: University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA) School Mental Health Project, 2006.

Rones, M. and K. Hoagwood. "School-Based Mental Health Services: A Research Review." Clinical Child and Family Psychology Review, v.3 (2000).

Slade, E. P. "Effects of School-Based Mental Health Programs on Mental Health Service Use by Adolescents at School and in the Community." Mental Health Service Research, v.4 (2002).

School Psychologists

In the past, the field of school psychology has been associated with the gatekeeping process to special education in school systems. Since the passage of Public Law 94-192 (Education of All Handicapped Children Act) in 1975 to its more recent revisions and amendments, known as the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA), the role of school psychologists has evolved. Today, school psychologists play a key role in the prevention of problems associated with learning, such as consultation with parents, teachers, and school administrators prior to a referral for a special education evaluation. This shift in the field of school psychology frees up school psychologists to perform more tasks associated with creating positive and effective school climates and less time testing one student at a time for special education services.

Training in School Psychology

School psychologists are professionals who have obtained a master's, specialist, or doctoral degree that specializes in working with learners of all ages and working with those who intervene with these learners. At the master's and specialist level, the highest standard of accreditation of the training program comes from the National Association of School Psychologists (NASP). Typically, graduates from a master's- or specialist-level program become certified or licensed to practice in a school setting. Doctoral-level programs in school psychology can also be accredited by the American Psychological Association (APA), and graduates from these programs have the option to pursue licensure to practice independently as a health care psychologist.

Each school psychology program has required course work and training components to ensure the graduate student is competent to practice. The course work in school psychology programs allows students to learn the techniques necessary to work effectively in the areas of ethics, prevention, intervention, consultation, assessment, and research. The training aspect of school psychology programs allows the graduate student to apply his or her classroom learning in actual practice settings under supervision, which are typically school based. The final program component of a school psychology graduate student culminates in a yearlong, supervised internship experience that allows him or her to successfully navigate the day-to-day responsibilities of being a school psychologist. A key area addressed in most training programs in school psychology focuses on the global community aspect of training and application. One priority area of training includes an advanced understanding and integration of multicultural diversity that is rapidly changing the sociological and educational landscapes of the world.

Practice in School Psychology

Master's- and specialist-level school psychologists are found mainly in the public school setting, while doctoral-level school psychologists can be found in a variety of work settings, including schools, clinics, hospitals, universities, and private practice. In addition, most school psychologists assist with the development of individual education plans (IEPs) for school-age students and are an integral part of their services in special education. Regardless of practice setting, school psychologists are required to engage in an interdisciplinary team setting, typically made up of parents, school administrators, regular education teachers, special education teachers, school counselors, school nurses, school social workers, speech and language therapists, occupational therapists, physical therapists, and any other professional who is involved in the well-being and welfare of the student. Moreover, the school psychologist is typically the liaison between medical personnel and the school. The successful school psychologist must communicate well in an interdisciplinary team setting and have the ability to work with a variety of individuals from many different training backgrounds.

Besides collaborating with other professionals, a school psychologist's skill set also includes the ability to apply preventative measures to ensure that learning or social problems do not arise. For example, many school districts have a district-wide mental health screening process that is headed by the school psychologist. These screenings can be an early detection indicator for issues such as depression, anxiety, and suicide.

Moreover, school psychologists are trained to consult with teachers concerning the learning environment of their students. For example, school psychologists can collaborate with classroom teachers to address behavior problems or help them adapt to the environment to provide better classroom management. Thus, school psychologists are a resource that can be tapped to assist in averting problems before they must be addressed in a more formal manner.

Even with their skills in prevention, many school psychologists intervene with students or schools for a variety of reasons. School psychologists are trained to provide therapeutic services, such as counseling or behavior planning, to assist students to become successful learners in their environment. The therapeutic services are research based and utilize a variety of modalities such as individual talk therapy, family therapy, or therapeutic groups. Sometimes, however, school psychologists must intervene when a crisis occurs in the school district. School psychologists are typically a key part of a school crisis response team that responds to traumatic incidents in the district such as school violence and suicide. Working with other professionals in the system and within the community, they assist and organize a rapid response to ensure that the necessary staff and services are available to students and their families to help them cope with such incidents.

Finally, school psychologists utilize a wide variety of assessment procedures and instruments to assist with treatment planning for students and learners. School psychologists have been trained to use an assessment as the beginning of the treatment process. School psychologists are often required to assess students for a variety of academic, behavioral, and social conditions that may impact their ability to function well in a school environment. Informal assessments, such as parent and teacher interviews, classroom and environmental observation, and previously gathered information, allow school psychologists to analyze the referral questions and design an assessment procedure to answer these questions. This procedure can include a direct, face-to-face evaluation of the student, using instruments to test intelligence, achievement, and personality. In addition, an indirect evaluation is typically included, which uses checklists and evaluation instruments that tap the parent and teacher perceptions of the student. From this evaluation process, the school psychologist can then offer a diagnostic impression of the student and, using the collected data from the assessment, recommend community services and further treatment options regarding interventions and follow-up information to the school, and the family.

The Future of School Psychology

The field of school psychology continues to evolve as the educational and social culture shifts into being more multicultural and diverse. School psychologists should be culturally competent practitioners to adequately utilize their skill sets with families and children from a variety of backgrounds and languages. Currently, a majority of practicing school psychologists in the United States are Caucasian and female.

However, nearly all of these school psychologists provide services to racial or ethnic minority groups in their practice settings. In addition, many school psychologists are nearing retirement age, with fewer graduates from school psychology training programs available to take their places. This has the effect of increasing the student-to-school psychologist ratio, thus reducing the school psychologist's ability to provide adequate service to their students, to their schools, and to their communities. Many national organizations have made it a mission to increase the visibility of the field of school psychology and educate individuals of the critical need of culturally competent school psychologists.

Kurt T. Choate
Lina Baghal
Amy Beck
Northeastern State University

See Also: ADHD, Services for Individuals With; Children With Special Needs; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Crisis Services; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Educational Services; Education Support Services; Intelligence Testing; Learning Disabilities, Services for Individuals With; Mental Health Services, Children; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment; School Mental Health Project; Special Education.

Further Readings

Clauss-Ehlers, Caroline S. Encyclopedia of Cross-Cultural School Psychology. New York: Springer, 2010.

Merrell, Kenneth W., Ruth A. Ervin, and Gretchen G. Peacock. School Psychology for the 21st Century, Second Edition: Foundations and Practice. New York: Guilford Press, 2012.

National Association of School Psychologists. http://www.nasponline.org (Accessed August 2013).

School Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for

School social workers collaborate with other school professionals to support the academic achievement of students. Their focus is on enhancing the emotional health and well-being of students and ameliorating factors that put students at risk for poor educational and developmental outcomes. This generally includes providing direct support to students, helping them overcome any barriers to academic success that they may face. The role of school social workers may also include working with parents, agencies, and other segments of the community to prevent discrimination based on race, ethnic background, religion, and culture. The growing diversity of students in the United States makes responding to these concerns more complex.

Race is generally defined as both a biological and social construction. The biological aspect is based on the fact that members of the same race share a common lineage and, as such, are likely to have common physical and genetic characteristics. Notions of race, however, have no real basis in scientific notation. The characteristics by which racial categories are defined are instead socially constructed, as members of a society attach meaning or significance to various aspects of race or racial attributes. Ethnicity, on the other hand, relates to cultural factors such as shared traditions, practices, nationalities, and beliefs of people with a common ancestry.

A substantial problem facing schools in the United States is the long-standing gap in educational achievement and educational attainment between advantaged and disadvantaged groups in the United States. African American students and students of Hispanic origin, for example, continue to have higher rates of school dropouts than do their white counterparts. They also score significantly lower on other measures of academic performance, as do poor students and students with immigrant status. Poor performance in school can leave students at risk of dropping out and have far-reaching effects on their social mobility and economic well-being. Of note is that the achievement gap has gradually narrowed slightly over the past several decades. However, significant gaps in achievement remain.

Discriminatory discipline and harassment also impact achievement. School social workers have an ethical commitment to work toward overcoming problems of inequality and social injustice in schools. This entails the need to assess whether various mechanisms of oppression are at play and taking steps to remedy or counteract concerns when they are present.

Cultural Heterogeneity

In recent years, the population of the United States has become increasingly more diverse. This trend corresponds with the growth of minority populations and with immigration. As schools in the United States are increasingly heterogeneous, issues related to race and ethnicity have also become more complex. The cultural heterogeneity of students enrolled in school, according to U.S. Census Bureau statistics, continues to rise. Populations of school students in the United States increasingly include children of color and of Hispanic origin, and Hispanic students made up nearly 18 percent of nursery school students in 2008, an increase of 13 percent from the late 1980s. At the same time, immigrant populations in the United States continue to grow. Social workers in education settings, in keeping with this upward trend in diversity, must have the knowledge and skills required to meet the needs of diverse students.

Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964

Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 affirms the equal right of all children in the United States, regardless of their immigration status, race, color, or national origin, to attend public elementary and secondary school. Despite this guarantee, equitable access to education continues to be threatened on a variety of fronts. The promotion of equitable access, according to the Office of Civil Rights, will require substantial efforts be directed toward remedying the following: (1) unequal access to educational opportunities; (2) discriminatory discipline; (3) harassment; (4) barriers to education for students learning English; (5) equal rights for all children to attend school; and (6) racial diversity.

Cultural Competence

According to the National Association of Social Workers (NASW), "Social workers must have and continue to develop specialized knowledge and understanding about the history, traditions, values, family systems, and artistic expressions of major client groups served." The NASW defines cultural competence as a set of congruent behaviors, attitudes, and policies that come together in a system or agency or among professionals that enable the system, agency, or professional to work effectively in cross-cultural situations. Practicing in accordance with NASW standards around cultural competence entails attending to the way professional standards may conflict with the needs of diverse clients and being aware of personal values and beliefs. Cultural competence also requires the attainment of cross-cultural knowledge and skills and leadership in communicating with other professionals the importance of diversity.

Achievement Gap

The achievement gap in education refers to the disparity in academic performance among groups of students. These gaps are evident across every measure of academic performanc;, that is, standardized test scores, overall grade point averages, dropout rates, and college enrollment and completion rates. Gaps exist among groups who are less advantaged overall than other groups, including African American students, students of Hispanic origin, and Native American students. Of the 1.3 million students that fail to graduate from high school each year, for example, more than half are students of color. Sixteen- to 24-year-old students with the lowest family incomes are seven times more likely to have dropped out of high school than similar students in higher income brackets. Over the last several decades, gaps in the educational achievement of students have narrowed. However, gaps in educational achievement remain significant. Gaps also exist between low- and high-income students.

A mixed-race group of high school students. Social workers in education settings must have the knowledge and skills required to meet the needs of diverse students.

Immigrant Status

Immigrant children, especially those from Latin America, tend to have poorer school outcomes when compared to other groups. Additionally, recent immigrants tend to fare less well than those who have been in the United States for a longer time period. For children who are learning English, significantly more barriers are present. Evidence suggests that classroom support can level off differences in achievement if provided early on. Improving low levels of enrollment in preschool could also increase achievement. Another area of disadvantage for immigrants stems from policies in the United States that prevent children of undocumented immigrants from accessing postsecondary education. School social workers must practice in ways that are culturally competent and recognize that language and cultural differences can present challenges for school social workers attempting to engage with families.

The Impact of Poverty

Poverty significantly impacts the educational achievement students. According to the United States Census Bureau statistics, more than one in five children in the United States are living in poverty. These students are more likely to have developmental disabilities or learning disabilities than their more well-off counterparts, and they are less likely overall to be prepared to enter the primary school setting. Students living in poverty are disadvantage in a number of ways. First, poor children may have difficulty getting to school and can suffer from chronic absenteeism. Other responsibilities, such as caring for family members or employment, can also impact attendance and potentially lead to the need to drop out. Dropout rates are greater for students who come from low-income families, who are seven times more likely to drop out than those from families with higher incomes. Compounding these concerns is the fact that students living in poverty are likely to reside in areas where school funding is inadequate.

Harassment

Students of different races and ethnicities may be subjected to bullying and harassment in schools. Harassment can take the form of name calling, the use of racial and ethnic slurs, making racist gestures, and the display of racist materials. Students who are victims of harassment are likely to become isolated and lose trust in school officials if the situation is not remedied. School performance is likely to suffer, placing victims at risk for all of the problems associated with poor academic performance. School social workers must work to remedy harassment when it occurs and work with victims to counteract the effects of harassment. Schools are required to take measures to prevent and respond to harassment. Antiharassment policies and grievance procedures should be in place. Federal law requires schools to have policies against racial and sex discrimination and to notify employees, students, and parents of the policy. School-based harassment is a violation of Title VI and Title VII of the Civil Rights act of 1964 and Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. Schools are responsible for illegal acts they know about or should know about.

Discriminatory Discipline

Disproportional discipline of minority students has also raised civil rights concerns. Evidence consistently suggests that students of color are overrepresented among students who are disciplined. Mandatory suspensions and expulsions associated with zero tolerance policies have continued to be disproportionately applied to students of color. Mandatory suspensions or expulsions allow for no discretion and put students on a path toward juvenile delinquency and dropping out. They can also have long-lasting effects in terms of earnings potential across the life span. Additionally, school program or districts with greater rates of suspension and expulsions consistently have lower levels of academic achievement associated with them.

Laura A. Lewis
University of Buffalo

See Also: School Counselors; School Health Services; School Psychologists; Zero Tolerance Approach in Schools.

Further Readings

Lee, J. "Racial and Ethnic Achievement Gap Trends: Reversing the Progress Toward Equity?" Educational Researcher, v.31/1 (2002).

National Association of Social Workers (NASW). NASW Standards for Cultural Competence in Social Work Practice. Washington, DC: NASW, 2001.

U.S. Census Bureau. "School Enrollment: Social and Economic Characteristics of Students." http://www.census.gov/prod/2005pubs/p20-554.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

U.S. Census Bureau. "Statistical Abstract of the United States." http://www.census.gov/compendia/statab/ (Accessed June 2013).

Weis, L. and M. Fine, eds. Beyond Silenced Voices: Class, Race, and Gender in United States Schools. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2005.

Youth Indicators. "U.S. Department of Education, Institute of Education Sciences, National Center for Education Statistics." http://nces.ed.gov/pubs2012/2012026/chapter3_31.asp (Accessed June 2013).

Section 8

Section 8 of the Housing Act of 1937 (created through a 1974 amendment to the act) provides rental assistance in the form of payments to private landlords in order to subsidize the costs of renting low-rent residences to low-income households. More than 3 million American households are served through the various programs funded by Section 8, which are managed by the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD).

The Housing Act, or Wagner-Steagall Act (sponsored by Democratic Congressman Henry Steagall of Alabama and Robert Wagner of New York), was the second major housing act of the New Deal period that sought to remedy the problems of the Great Depression and the economic infrastructures that had led to it, following the National Housing Act of 1934, which had provided funding for the construction of residences for low-income families and to slow down the rate of foreclosures. The 1937 act was notable for having the support of Robert A. Taft and Allen Ellender, opponents of the New Deal overall, leaders of the conservative coalition that formed in response to the expansion of the federal government, and ideological forefathers of today's Republican Party. The 1934 act had created the Federal Housing Administration (FHA); the 1937 act created the United States Housing Authority (USHA), an agency within the Department of the Interior, which handled housing matters in the days before HUD. USHA was eventually absorbed into the Housing and Home Finance Agency in 1947, which was itself dissolved and succeeded by HUD when it was formed in 1965 as part of Lyndon B. Johnson's Great Society programs, which were designed as a continuation and maturation of the New Deal policies a generation earlier.

One reason for the support of the conservatives was that elements of the bill were perceived as a compromise between doing nothing and the possibility of a nationalized housing industry—which may seem unrealistic in hindsight but which must have seemed no more radical than some of the other changes wrought to the structure of American business by the previous years of the New Deal. This compromise also limited the extent of public housing legislation, which conscientiously maintained a spacer gap between the upper-income limits that qualified a household for subsidized housing and the lower-income limits of those who could afford the nonsubsidized housing provided by the private sector. Section 8 housing, by design, does not provide housing for all those who can't afford it but only for those least able to afford it. Section 8 housing was also originally racially segregated, then desegregated in the 1950s, though as with many neighborhoods throughout the country, de facto segregation has continued.

Other than the creation of HUD, notable amendments to the Housing Act of 1937 have included the Housing Act of 1949, which came at the economic ebb following the end of World War II and funded urban renewal programs as well as refunding public housing programs; the 1965 Leased Housing Program, which (until superceded in 1974) provided subsidized housing for eligible families by assigning them to a unit from a master list of available eligible housing, setting a rent based on need and income and separately paying the landlord the difference between that adjusted rent and the fair market value; and the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974, which created the Section 8 class of housing, essentially broadening and streamlining the 1965 program while divorcing it from its reliance on a specific list of housing units.

Until 1974, most public housing in the United States was in the form of specific subsidized units of housing—housing projects created as low-income housing, usually abbreviated as the projects and referred to in various euphemistic ways. The creation of such projects acted to concentrate poverty in specific neighborhoods, even to a greater degree than the private sector had done. While dedicated housing projects continue to exist and continue to be built, increasingly since 1974, housing assistance has been in the form of rental vouchers—a sort of housing analogue to food stamps, which are redeemable only for food but may be spent anywhere. Similarly, Section 8 recipients in many cases may live wherever they can afford (given the value of the voucher), not just in specific subsidized housing projects. This has been coupled with a tendency to replace public housing projects, as wear and tear erodes them, with mixed-income housing developments.

The largest program created under Section 8 is the Housing Choice Voucher Program, which is tenant-based rental assistance as opposed to landlord-based rental assistance, such as the creation of specific subsidized housing projects and units. Vouchers have a ceiling of $2200 a month and are based on various factors, including family size and local median rent. Vouchers need not be used toward renting and can instead be put toward home purchase, which in many cases requires less assistance for the same household. Roughly two-thirds of Section 8 aid recipients receive their aid through the Housing Choice program. Another voucher-based Section 8 program is the Veterans Affairs Supportive Housing program (VASH), operated in conjunction with the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, to provide housing rental vouchers to armed forces veterans who are in need.

In theory, one of the benefits of housing vouchers is that they do not contribute to de facto segregation the way the construction of housing projects did. While such projects are no longer segregated de jure, separate projects were often constructed in white and black neighborhoods (sometimes with separate Latino projects in areas with large-enough populations to sustain them and with nonwhites who are neither black nor Latino usually, but not always, winding up in the nonwhite projects). Concentrating poverty in one neighborhood is damaging enough in its creation of a ghetto that attracts predatory businesses (convenience stores with marked-up prices, check-cashing and payday advance stores, predatory banks, liquor stores, cigarette stores that sell cigarettes individually when that practice was still legal) and is socially and economically difficult to escape from.

Concentrating poverty in a single-race neighborhood reinforces negative stereotypes as well as laying the groundwork for the class-driven racial tensions such as those that boiled over into riots in New York in the 1980s and Los Angeles in the early 1990s. Housing vouchers allow mobility and also address a problem revealed in studies from the 1970s—that by that point in history, the main housing problem faced by low-income families in the United States wasn't the quality of housing (as it had been during the Great Depression and in most of history) but the percentage of income that they spent on housing, which had long-term ramifications (because of the money available for education, for instance, or the impact on employment choices) that impacted multiple generations.

Most households using rental vouchers pay 30 percent of their adjusted income for rent, which is comparable to what normal households are expected to spend, allowing households the freedom to budget their income and make their own choices. Though the adjusted income allows deductions for dependents (which, in and of itself, might result in a qualified household paying a smaller percentage of its income for rent than an average household), it also counts certain assets as imputed income, including noninterest-bearing bank accounts, which often offset those deductions by artificially inflating the household's on-paper income.

Not all landlords are required to accept Section 8 vouchers, though in some states the law effectively forces them to do so by forbidding them to discriminate on the basis of Section 8 qualification. Landlords in high-rent areas or areas experiencing a housing shortage may be especially reluctant to participate because there is a good chance they will be able to rent the unit for greater than the fair market value the Section 8 program would pay them. On the other hand, the housing authority is a reliable payor, and tenants may be kicked out of the program if they damage their rented properties without compensating their landlord, which makes Section 8 renters attractive tenants for some landlords.

An article by Hanna Rosin, published in The Atlantic in 2008, argued that, contrary to the prevailing view of violent crime having steadily decreased since the late 1990s (barring a minor spike in some areas during the onset of the current financial crisis), crime has simply been redistributed to a greater number of suburban and exurban neighborhoods due to Section 8's dispersal of low-income families in a wider area. However, authors of some of the studies she cited later disavowed any connection between housing vouchers and crime increases and accused Rosin of ignoring other factors.

Bill Kte'pi
Independent Scholar

See Also: Displaced Persons; Housing Services; Housing Support and Homeless Services.

Further Readings

Anrig, Greg and Harold Pollack. "False Accusation." American Prospect (July 2008).

Dreier, Peter, Todd Swanstrom, and John H. Mollenkopf. Place Matters: Metropolitics for the Twenty-First Century. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2013.

Goetz, Edward G. New Deal Ruins: Race, Economic Justice, and Public Housing Policy. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2013.
Radford, Gail. Modern Housing for America: Policy Struggles in the New Deal Era. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
Rosin, Hanna. "American Murder Mystery." The Atlantic (July/August 2008).

Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act

The Indian Self-Determination and Education Asistance Act (ISDEAA) of 1975, Public Law 93-638, was designed to give Native American tribes greater control over their own lives by giving tribal governments more control over tribal affairs and obtaining funding for educational assistance. Signed into law on January 4, 1975, this law focused government action on self-determination. It authorized the U.S. government to enter into contracts with and make grants directly to federally recognized tribes. This act created a formal statutory environment for sustaining tribal governments and allowed tribal governments to contract to perform services that had previously been done by the Departments of the Interior and Health and Human Services.

Brutal Past for California Indians

California was home of the most diverse Native American populations, with more than 200 tribes that had distinctive dialects. Indigenous orientations to land and self presented the antipode to American and European sensibilities. Spanish Franciscan established a mission system with the military to contain neophytes in missions. Entire village communities were moved to different missions, breaking down existing cultural structures. Approximately 1,699 Coast Miwok between 1783 and 1817 entered the Mission at San Francisco, but by the end of that time, only 485 survived. During the California gold rush, Indians could legally be indentured—sold into slavery if captured. The U.S. Congress passed legislation during the Civil War terminating titles to Indian land in California, thus stripping California tribes of lands. Congress passed the California Rancheria Act in 1958, terminating all 41 California Rancherias.

Tribal activists with the Coast Miwok worked with California Indian Legal Services (CILS) to obtain federal recognition as members, demonstrating descent from ancestors living in 1852. Passage of the Omnibus Indian Advancement Act (Public Law No. 106-568) in 2000 restored sovereignty to the Coast Miwoks as the Federated Indians of Graton Rancheria (FIRG). However, the legislator that promoted this legislation had a family member that profited from subsequent land deals to open a casino mandated by the act that were inconsistent with original FIGC wishes.

Tribes geographically located crossing state or national borders became physically and psychologically divided when the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) discouraged indigenous travel within Indian country that was considered to be too nomadic. An example is the Kumayyay of southern California, which has traditional tribal lands extending into Baja California in Mexico. The BIA labeled this tribe as Mission Indians so that they could not reassert their tribal name until the agency backed away from its assimilation policies. Tribal members in Mexico may have baptism records but not birth certificates needed for regular visas. It has only been since 2000 that this tribe has been able to negotiate with the United States and Mexican governments to secure laser visas to allow short visits across the border.

Additional Legislation Related to Self-Determination

Congress granted all Native Americans citizenship in 1924 if they abandoned native languages, culture, relations, and values to take on Western culture. Education, land redistributions or allotments, enfranchisement, and economic self-sufficiency within the reservations became the means that the United States and state governments used to foster assimilation. Conversely, the Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968 opened the door for a shift in tribal activism from local, tribally based protest to broader, nationally organized events as Native Americans from a variety of tribes focused on broadly shared concerns to bring attention to the federal government's past and continuing misdeeds that lasted a decade and led to subsequent legislation. Native American activists occupied Alcatraz Island in San Francisco Bay as well as organized sit-ins at the Bureau of Indian Affairs. This occupation of traditional tribal lands by non-Bay Area tribes between November 20, 1969, and June 11, 1971, not only drew attention to federal Indian policy but also became a landmark for large-scale Native American activism.

The primary goal of this occupation was to create awareness with the American people that Native Americans throughout the land were dealing with serious problems of alcoholism, poverty, and land lost that could only be resolved with Indian self-determination.

Subsequent Legislation to Restore Tribal Knowledge

The underlying theory of ISDEAA was that tribal governments know best how to identify challenges and allocate the right resources to solve problems. The loss of tribal identity in America has led to catastrophic cycles of violence on reservations, where one in three women can expect to be sexually assaulted during their lifetimes. Sexual violence is not traditional or natural to Native American cultural heritage but comes as a result of demolished tribal identities, astronomically high unemployment on reservations, alcohol and drug abuse, and a modern acceptance that crimes against women will go unpunished. Passage of the Native American Graves Protection and Reparation Act (NAGPRA) on November 16, 1990, means that objects related to funerary practices and present-day adherents are protected. In 1999, the National Congress of American Indians (NCAI) met with its Canadian equivalent, the Assembly of First Nations, in order to strengthen the sovereignty and unity of North American Indian nations, share information on the uniqueness of Indian governments, and initiate a Declaration of Kinship and Cooperation in support of tribal sovereignty, spiritual practices, traditional knowledge, economic and social well-being, and the need to protect indigenous rights to travel uninterrupted across the borders between the United States, Canada, and Mexico.

Meredith Eliassen
San Francisco State University

See Also: Indian Child Welfare Act; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; Rape as an Instrument of War.

Further Readings

Canby, William C. Jr. American Indian Law in a Nut Shell. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing Co., 2009.

Federated Indians of Graton Rancheria. “Timeline.” http://www.gratonrancheria.com/timeline.htm (Accessed July 2013).

Morain, Dan. “Commentary: Boxer’s Green Image Might Take a Hit From Old Casino Bill.” Sacramento Bee (October 13, 2010).

Stubben, Jerry D. Native Americans and Political Participation: A Reference Handbook. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC CLIO, 2006.

Van Zeller, Mariana. Vanguard: Rape on the Reservation. http://www.filmsforaction.org/watch/vanguard_rape_on_the_reservation (Accessed July 2013).

Self-Harm, Cultural Aspects of

Self-harm, or parasuicide, encompasses a wide range of behaviors that involve the intentional and deliberate infliction of damage or injury to one’s body. These behaviors include cutting, burning, scratching, scalding, bruising, breaking bones, hair pulling, biting, and poisoning oneself. Cutting is the most prevalent form of self-harming behavior. In Western culture, these acts are generally considered within the purview of psychiatry, psychology, and sociology and are often regarded as deviant or abnormal. However, the acceptability and motivations for self-harming behaviors vary depending on cultural context.

According to the Western psychological perspective, individuals engage in self-harming behaviors as a means to cope with negative emotions, psychological pain, or self-loathing. Many individuals who self-harm report that the inflicted physical pain is comforting because it arouses them from a psychologically numb state and allows them to experience sensations. Although individuals who self-harm typically do not engage in the act with the intent of killing themselves, self-harming is a risk factor for future suicide attempts. It is a common misconception that self-harm is performed mainly as a means for gaining attention. In most cases, self-harmers are embarrassed about their wounds. They restrict their inflictions to parts of the body that cannot be seen and often go to great lengths to hide their injuries. Their attempts to conceal their self-harming activities can interfere with their lives.

There are a number of methods used to treat self-harm. Many therapeutic techniques concentrate on addressing the underlying causes of the behavior as many self-harmers have experienced trauma or abuse. Therapy also may target a client's underlying mental illness, if one is present. Other treatments focus on modifying the self-harming behavior itself through behavioral therapy or by changing the maladaptive thought patterns that may lead to self-injurious behavior. Altering the thought patterns is often accomplished through cognitive therapy. Dialectic behavior therapy (DBT) is particularly effective because it combines a number of approaches including cognitive restructuring, management of emotions associated with self-harming, and mindfulness meditation.

Cultural Definitions of Self-Harm

Evidence of self-harming behaviors across many cultures has existed for thousands of years, and historically, self-harm is known to have been a customary ritual practice. For example, in the ancient Maya civilization, the religious leaders engaged in a number of physically injurious behaviors such as gathering blood by slicing and piercing their bodies. However, these acts of self-harming cannot be interpreted from a Western psychological perspective or characterized as problematic because the cultural context in which they occurred is much different.

In fact, sociologists and anthropologists have generated compelling evidence to suggest that cultural values have significant influence on attitudes toward self-harming acts around the world. Self-harming acts that fit the definition in one social context or region do not necessarily meet the definitional criteria in another, thus sparking debate over whether self-harming behavior should be considered a form of pathology. In most cultures, criteria include the motivation for engaging in the self-harming act. Whether the act has redeeming value for the culture as a whole determines if it is viewed as a sign of illness. If the act is considered socially meaningful or serves a cultural purpose beyond an individual's personal motivations, it is less likely to be considered pathological.

Many common behaviors exist that carry highly discrepant meaning across cultures. For example, body piercing, circumcision, or genital mutilation is acceptable in some societies because it carries cultural value, while in other social contexts, it is highly problematic. Even within the same culture, the same behavior may service to enhance attractiveness or adhere to social ideals by one subcultural group and yet is considered self-harming by another. For example, some people regard extreme dieting, plastic surgery, waxing, or shaving as forms of self-mutilation because these behaviors represent unnecessary deviations from the natural human condition. However, other individuals, influenced by Western and media standards of beauty, may view these activities as normal responses to environmental demands.

To make matters more complex, many mutilating practices that are considered deviant in some cultures are sanctioned in others and are even associated with healing, repentance, spirituality, and the social standing of individuals within that culture. Examples include bloodletting and decorative and commemorative skin mutilation. In some societies, individuals must endure mutilation and suffering to attain positions of prestige within a culture. This is the case with shamans who must self-immolate in order to access special curative powers. Adolescent rites of passage into the adult world often involve mutilative practices. Australian aborigines, for example, use stones to slice the initiate's penis during the ceremony. Furthermore, Buddhist culture condones specific types of self-harm associated with spiritual commitment and political challenge. Altruistically motivated suicide is even accepted, and Buddhist monks may cut off their genitals as penance for sexual temptations. Again, determining whether these acts are considered pathological involves the motivating factors as well as the extent of their effects on the larger cultural context in which they occur.

Although these rituals and cultural activities fall within the definition of self-mutilation in Western cultures, many anthropologists prefer to recognize these rituals and practices as body modification to downplay any suggestion of negative or pathological judgment and to emphasize the significance of cultural relevance. Body modification practices are often apotropaic—they serve to prevent, or even correct, conditions that represent potential social menace.

For example, self-immolation is often associated with rituals to ward off disease, crop failure, or the wrath of an angered god. Although these culturally sanctioned acts may meet the criteria for self-mutilation in Western cultures, they are not regarded as such in these other social frameworks because they serve meaningful and even spiritual purposes. The issue of meaningful symbolism is critical for determining whether a behavior is categorized as culturally sanctioned or deviant, purposive or pathological, divine or in need of therapeutic attention.

Prevalence Rates and Epidemiology of Deviant Self-Harming

Research has demonstrated that the number of documented incidents of acts defined as pathological self-harming differs among cultures and ethnic groups. However, researchers have not determined the reasons for these differences. As with suicide, rates of self-harm vary greatly among countries. Results from studies conducted in Western nations suggest that between 5 and 9 percent of teenagers have engaged in self-harming acts within the previous year. These rates have been increasing in particular in both the United Kingdom and the United States. Using household surveys to measure the incidence of self-injurious behavior across all ages of people, the results of a nine-country investigation revealed significant differences among countries. Although the incident rate is less than 1 percent in Beirut and Taiwan, it approximates 6 percent in Puerto Rico. Native populations of colonized regions have demonstrably higher incidents of self-harm.

Cultural values influence not only the definition and incidence of deviant self-harm but also its causal factors. Factors that decrease the likelihood of self-harming behaviors in some cultures are not clearly evident. It does appear that environments in which suicide is unequivocally disapproved offer some defense against self-harm. Citizens of Catholic and Islamic countries have lower incidents. On the other hand, cultures in which the mass media appears to encourage hedonism, materialism, and impulsivity have higher rates of a wide range of psychosocial problems, including suicide and self-harming, particularly in adolescents. While this is especially true for Western societies, countries in the Eastern Hemisphere are not immune. Often, excessively rapid cultural change appears to be the culprit contributing to familial and community stress. For example, younger women in rural China who have been raised in modern contexts find themselves caught between new customs and old traditions and are more susceptible to self-injury.

Despite the influence of cultural context, there are some relatively predictable societal factors that increase the likelihood of pathological self-harming across social environments. For example, being raised in a smaller nuclear family, as opposed to growing up in a larger family context, seems to be one variable that augments the probability of engaging in self-harming acts. In general, the more socially isolated and deprived of social, financial, health, and mental health resources, the higher the likelihood of destructive self-injury. This is particularly the case for people with a history of abuse and psychiatric disturbance.

The most recent research data suggest that self-harm may occur in countries throughout the world. However, its definitional criteria, incidence rates, and expressions are heavily influenced by social context.

Alexis Adams-Clark
Lindsay Labrecque
Butler Hospital and Brown University
Gregory L. Stuart
University of Tennessee–Knoxville

See Also: Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Paradigms; Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Cultural Responsiveness of; People of Color: Service Delivery, Psychological Assessment, Cultural Issues; Rites of Passage; Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration; Suicide, Cultural Aspects of; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Bhugra, D. "Cultural Values and Self-Harm." Crisis: The Journal of Crisis Intervention and Suicide Prevention, v.34/4 (2013).

Kelly, B. D. "Self-Immolation, Suicide and Self-Harm in Buddhist and Western Traditions." Transcultural Psychiatry, v.48/3 (2011).

Skegg, K. "Self-Harm." Lancet, v.366/9495 (2005).

Senior Services

Senior services are the activities and services offered by social and community programs that offer assistance and support to older adults to enhance or maintain their quality of life, physical health, and well-being. Senior services also support independent living and enhance the dignity and worth of older adults. The Older Adult Act of 1965 marked the emergence of senior centers that provide senior services. With greater attention given to the burgeoning senior adult population, the scope of senior services has increased in recent years. In fact, senior services have become an integral part of our communities and essential in the daily lives of many seniors. The topic of senior services is relevant to the Encyclopedia of Human Services because it informs human services professionals of the scope of senior services and how these services significantly impact a growing yet vulnerable segment of society. Additionally, human service professionals will better understand the framework from which human services are provided, who participates, and the benefits received from participating in senior services.

Senior services are provided to promote health and wellness in the lives of all older adults. Senior services are shown to improve the lives of older adults and allow them to age in place rather than opt for traditional, long-term care services. More than ever before, older adults desire to participate in healthy behaviors, function independently, and maintain their community-dwelling status; however, remaining in the community for some is often complicated by chronic or debilitating conditions. To meet the diverse needs of older adults, two primary models provide the framework for providing senior services.

Voluntary Organization Senior Centers provide senior services to healthy senior adults to encourage healthy behaviors and promote optimal living in the community. Senior services for healthy senior adults include services such as recreational programs, arts and crafts, trips, performances, volunteer opportunities, cultural programs, and meals. To some extent, health education and screening services are also offered. While senior services promote continued healthy living in senior adults, additionally, they provide opportunities for social interaction and companionship.

Senior services are also available for older adults who are frailer and more physically challenged to participate in activities. These services are primarily provided at Social Agency Model Senior Centers. The scope of these services is detailed under the Home and Community-Based Service program funded by the Centers for Medicaid and Medicare Services. Home- and community-based senior services vary by state and program but primarily include the following: case management services, homemaker services, home health aide services, personal care, adult day health care services, and respite care and meal services. Case management is a mandatory service where case managers assist consumers with their senior services. Case manager teams consist of a social worker or a nurse who interviews and assesses the older adult, develops an individual service plan, and monitors the services.

Homemaker services consist of assistance with general household management of the consumer's home. Homemaker services may include general housecleaning, meal preparation, grocery shopping and other household chores. Personal assistance may include supervision for safety and assistance with personal care and grooming. Home health aide services are often contracted with home health agencies in the community. Home health aides offer education and training as well as administer skilled nursing care as needed by the consumer. Adult day care centers provide nutritional, recreational, social, or habilitative services for four or more hours on one or more days per week. Ancillary services such as transportation, in-home support, and minor home modifications may be offered with the approval of the Health Care Finance Administration. According to several studies, at least one-third of those residing in institutional long-term care would have been capable of maintaining their independent living with support. Also, senior services have helped to shrink the burgeoning long-term care budget as well as aide in the deinstitutionalization of many residents in traditional long-term care settings.

Funding for home- and community-based senior services is allocated from the federal government Center for Medicare and Medicaid Services and the Older American Act. Funds for senior services are allocated through a process of devolution in which the authority to manage is transferred from a central government system to individual states to provide support to qualified older adults in the community.

Senior citizens at a senior center. Senior services are available for healthy senior adults as well as older adults who are frail and more physically challenged.

Senior Services Utilization

Senior services are offered at more than 12,000 senior centers across the country. The profile of the typical participant of senior services is a white female who lives alone and is approximately 75 years old. Also, individuals with fewer health problems use senior services more. However, given the increase in older adults and the desire to live independently, the use of senior services by diverse populations is becoming more evident. While senior services are primarily used by Caucasian Americans, diversity in the utilization of senior services is growing. African American participants follow closely behind Caucasian American counterparts in utilization of services, while service utilization by Latino and Asian Americans continues to grow at a steady pace. In fact, the first Program of All-Inclusive Care for the Elderly (PACE program), a nursing home alternative, has its roots in the Asian American community. PACE is a programming prototype that has vastly spread across the nation.

Given the diversity of the senior adult population, it is imperative to understand that culture and racial or ethnic factors can affect the utilization of available senior services. For instance, in the Korean American culture, there is low awareness of senior services. Korean Americans are also ambivalent about using these services (despite the need) due to cultural norms. In Korean, Latino, and African American cultures, many attribute conditions such as memory loss to a natural part of growing older, thereby do not see the need for formal services. Other cultural influences in utilization of senior services include the culture's perception of stigmatization, the desired level of acculturation, and the amount of reverence given to elders.

Benefits of Senior Service Use

Senior adults today are enjoying longer and healthier lives. Compared to a life expectancy of 44 years in the early 1900s, today, individuals reaching age 65 have an average life expectancy of an additional 18.8 years. Medical advances and technology have both contributed to the longevity of older adults; however, the impact of senior services in the lives of senior adults has become increasingly significant. Senior services are found to have improved the lives of older adults in many aspects of life. The benefit is evident socially, physically, psychologically, and economically. The economic benefit is extended to society in general as the emergence and use of senior services has helped to shrink the burgeoning health care budget.

Senior adults are likely to experience incidences of grief, loss of a spouse or loved one, and loss of independence, all of which increases the risk of social isolation and depression. The use of senior services is shown to improve the mental health of senior adults and lead to a greater quality of life. Senior services are shown to decrease depression and improve the stress levels in senior adults. In addition to improving the mental health of senior adults, the use of senior services expands the social networks in senior adults and aids in a more positive perception of one's health and well-being.

Aggregately, senior adults are living longer, healthier lives; yet many continue to live with chronic diseases. As participants of senior services, senior adults are educated on the onset of chronic diseases such as diabetes and cardiovascular disease, disease management, and maintenance of chronic disease. Moreover, by participating in the physical activity provided by senior service programs, active senior adults tend to have better mobility and joint function, and their risk for falls is decreased. Finally, participants in senior services have improved dietary intake, nutrition, and healthy eating habits in general.

Senior Services in the Future

Senior services have been instrumental in the improved quality of life in the lives of traditional senior consumers; however, a review of senior centers underscores the need for senior services to be expanded in order to meet the needs of the growing diverse, 21st-century senior adult. Expansive senior service programming will include services that will enhance the use of technology in senior adults, to meet the needs of bilingual seniors and otherwise diverse senior adults. Additionally, senior services in the future will be enhanced to meet the needs of senior adults with chronic mental health disorders. Finally, given the projected growth of the senior adult population, there is a growing need for service employees who are trained to deliver services to meet the unique needs of senior adults.

Cathy Scott
University of Tennessee at Chattanooga

See Also: Adult Day Care; Community-Based Services; Home Care Services; Long-Term Residential Care.

Further Readings

National Council on Aging. "Facts about Senior Centers." http://www.ncoa.org (Accessed April 2004).
Turner, K. W. "Senior Citizens Centers: What They Offer, Who Participates and What They Gain." Journal of Gerontological Social Work, v.43 (2004).
Zawadski, R. T. "Community-Based Systems of Long Term Care." Home Health Care Services Quarterly, v.4 (1983).

Service Providers and Diversity

Given the diversity of consumers who need health care, mental health care, and other social services, it is vital that service providers are able to provide professional and culturally competent care. Cultural competency is defined by the United States Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) Office of Minority Health (OMH) as "a set of congruent behaviors, attitudes, and policies that come together in a system, agency, or among professionals that enables effective work in cross-cultural situations." Culture refers to "integrated patterns of human behavior that include the language, thoughts, communications, actions, customs, beliefs, values, and institutions of racial, ethnic, religious, or social groups." Competence implies "having the capacity to function effectively as an individual and an organization within the context of the cultural beliefs, behaviors, and needs presented by consumers and their communities.

The Importance of Diversity Training

All human service providers (doctors, nurses, social workers, occupational and physical therapists, lab technicians, medical personnel, psychiatrists, psychologists, marriage and family therapists, licensed professional counselors, substance abuse counselors—the list goes on) have a responsibility to be able to assist diverse consumers regardless of their backgrounds. Service providers should be able to provide quality services to a range of persons who represent different races, cultures, genders, religions, sexual orientations, belief systems, customs, and geographic experiences. If service providers are not trained in understanding diversity issues that may impact a consumer's presentation of symptoms, this can lead to faulty assessment or even misdiagnosis on the part of the service provider. This inconsistency can be due to issues based on a continuum, from intentional prejudice to an unintentional lack of knowledge about other cultures.

Stereotyping is an example of one of the pitfalls that can occur if service providers remain untrained in diversity issues. For example, Victor Adebimpe noted stereotypes of black psychopathology such as prejudicial concepts of psychiatric illness in blacks as a possible cause of misdiagnosis. Harold Neighbors and colleagues stated that clinical uncertainty paves the way to the potential influence of stereotypes that service providers link to observable patient characteristics (such as race). Untrained service providers often reflect the attitudes and discriminatory practices of their society. For example, Vickie Mays engaged in a systematic research synthesis of the early psychological research on African Americans and pointed out the history of racism inherent in that early research. She stated that mental health models, patterned after medical models, at times deny that there are fundamental, positive differences (not deficits or pathologies) that contribute to a different state of psychological reality for people of color.

Annelle B. Primm, MD, the director of Minority and National Affairs for the American Psychiatric Association, discussed four common defenses for bias dynamics exhibited by service providers:

(1) Color blindness is the tendency to behave as if patients from other cultural groups are no different from patients of the dominant culture. (2) Color consciousness is the tendency to behave as if the patient's problem stems solely from being a person of color. (3) Racial countertransference is the emotional reactions of a therapist projected onto a patient of another race or culture. (4) Overidentification is attributing behavioral assumptions to patients who are the same race and culture as the therapist. She said, based on this, that service providers need to be conscious (but not overly conscious) of race. Service providers need to carefully consider each patient's symptom presentation, interpretation, social and environmental context, and the input of collateral informants when using their best clinical judgment.

A service provider's lack of diversity training can lead to both faulty assessment and faulty treatment. For instance, Jennifer Abe-Kim and David T. Takeuchi stated in their research that, when services lack cultural responsiveness or cultural sensitivity, sociocultural differences among groups could lead to (1) difficulties in performing valid psychological assessments, (2) differential or discriminatory forms of treatment, and (3) therapist preferences for consumer characteristics that place ethnic minorities at a disadvantage.

Demographics of Service Providers and Consumers

The demographics of health and mental health consumers are becoming increasingly more diverse. Because of the nature of changes in population trends in the United States and beyond, human service providers are more likely to work with persons of different cultures, and they are more likely to encounter clients with racial profiles different from their own. According to the 2010 U.S. Census, minorities (especially Hispanic or Latino populations) are now driving nearly all of the population growth in the United States. Out of the total population, 63 percent self-identify as white (non-Hispanic), which is lower than in previous years.

In comparison to an increasingly diverse consumer base, there is limited data available about the racial profiles of licensed clinicians (medical and mental health professionals), but that which is available show that these demographics remain primarily white. For example, Tina McRee and colleagues admitted that demographic data are extremely limited and difficult to locate in regards to the health and behavioral health workforce. However, they did determine that U.S. estimates suggest that there are fewer minority clinicians licensed nationwide when compared with the nonminority population. National estimates suggest that more than 70 percent of psychologists and social workers are non-Hispanic whites. African Americans, for example, make up less than 4 percent of mental health care providers nationally. According to the 2008 Health Tracking Physician Survey, approximately 74 percent of physicians are white, 17 percent are Asian, 5 percent are Hispanic, and 4 percent are black.

Because the service provider population is not diverse in comparison with the consumer population, it is extremely important that all service providers obtain diversity training to decrease service disparities for nonwhite populations.

Diversity Standards for Service Providers

Service providers who must obtain and maintain professional licensure status are also required to exhibit some level of competence when handling diverse consumers. There are accreditation standards for professional licensure in the fields of medicine, nursing, psychology, social work, marriage and family therapy, and other disciplines. Standards have been written regarding diversity competence within these disciplines. For example, the Association for American Medical Colleges uses the Tool for Assessing Cultural Competence Training (TACCT) in order to determine if health care professionals are educated on how demographic and cultural factors of their consumers influence health, health delivery, and health behaviors.

The American Association of Colleges in Nursing (AACN) has developed a Tool Kit for Culturally Competent Baccalaureate Nursing Education and a Culturally Competency Tool Kit for Graduate Nursing Students. Based on AACN information and standards obtained from several other sources. Marilyn Douglas and colleagues developed a set of universally applicable standards of practice for culturally competent care that nurses around the globe may use to guide clinical practice, research, education, and administration. The 12 standards include the following: (1) social justice, (2) critical reflection, (3) knowledge of cultures, (4) culturally competent practice, (5) cultural competence in health care systems and organizations, (6) patient advocacy and empowerment, (7) multicultural workforce, (8) education and training in culturally competent care, (9) cross-cultural communication, (10) cross-cultural leadership, (11) policy development, and (12) evidence-based practice and research.

The National Association of Social Workers (NASW) has also developed standards for cultural competence in social work practice. The 2001 standards, updated in 2007, were the first attempt by the clinical social work profession to delineate standards for culturally competent social work practice. NASW developed 10 specific standards that social workers are to adhere to when servicing consumers of other cultures. NASW officials mention that, with the establishment of standards for cultural competence in social work practice, there is an equally important need for the profession to provide ongoing training in cultural competence and to establish mechanisms for the evaluation of competence-based practice. NASW's 10 standards of cultural competence include the following domains: (1) ethics and values, (2) self-awareness, (3) cross-cultural knowledge, (4) cross-cultural skills, (5) service delivery, (6) empowerment and advocacy, (7) diverse workforce, (8) professional education, (9) language diversity, and (10) cross-cultural leadership.

In August 2002, the American Psychological Association's (APA) Council of Representatives approved the Guidelines on Multicultural Education, Training, Research, Practice, and Organizational Change for Psychologists. In 2008, the APA Task Force published a report on the success of their implementation of the multicultural guidelines. In contrast, marriage and family therapists had not adopted specific standards on cultural competence as late as the year 2002. An article by Roy Bean, Benjamin Perry, and Tina Bedell urged marriage and family therapists to "begin to develop a level of cultural competence."

Thus, professional standards for service providers serving diverse populations vary widely. In addition, it is unknown to what extent service providers are able to adhere to their own standards of culturally competent practice. Little research exists describing how consistently and successfully diversity guidelines are operationalized in the everyday professional life of the service provider.

The National Standards for Culturally and Linguistically Appropriate Services in Health and Health Care (the National CLAS Standards) have been developed in order to provide a blueprint for individuals and health and health care organizations to implement culturally and linguistically appropriate services. These 15 standards were initially developed by the HHS OMH in 2000 and were implemented for 10 years after development. The standards were developed in response to health and health care disparities, changing demographics, and legal and accreditation requirements. The enhanced National CLAS Standards are structured as follows:

- Principal Standard (Standard 1): Provide effective, equitable, understandable, and respectful quality care and services that are responsive to diverse cultural health beliefs and practices, preferred languages, health literacy, and other communication needs
- Governance, Leadership, and Workforce (Standards 2–4)
- Communication and Language Assistance (Standards 5–8)
- Engagement, Continuous Improvement, and Accountability (Standards 9–15)

A Blueprint for Advancing and Sustaining CLAS Policy and Practice is a guidance document for the National CLAS Standards that discusses implementation strategies for each standard. Both the National CLAS standards and the blueprint are available at OMH's Think Cultural Health Web site at www.ThinkCulturalHealth.hhs.gov.

Jennifer Shepard Payne
University of Illinois at Chicago

See Also: Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Multicultural Education.

Further Readings

American Psychological Association (APA). "Report of the APA Task Force on the Implementation of the Multicultural Guidelines." http://www.apa.org/pi (Accessed August 2013).

Association of American Medical Colleges (AAMC). "Tool for Assessing Cultural Competence Training." https://www.aamc.org/initiatives/tacct (Accessed August 2013).

Bean, R. A., B. J. Perry and T. M. Bedell. "Developing Culturally Competent Marriage and Family Therapists: Treatment Guidelines for Non-African-American Therapists Working With African-American Families." Journal of Marital and Family Therapy, v.28/2 (2002).

McRee, T., C. Dower, B. Briggance, J. Vance, D. Keane, and E. H. O'Neil. The Mental Health Workforce: Who's Meeting California's Needs? San Francisco: California Workforce Initiative at the UCSF Center for the Health Professions, 2003.

National Association of Social Workers (NASW). "Cultural Competence Standards for Social Work Practice—National Association of Social Workers." Washington, DC: NASW, 2001.

Neighbors, H. W., S. J. Trierweiler, B. C. Ford, and J. R. Muroff. "Racial Differences in DSM Diagnosis Using a Semi-Structured Instrument: The Importance of Clinical Judgment in the Diagnosis of African Americans." Journal of Health and Social Behavior, v.44/3 (2003).

Office of Minority Health (OMH). "What Is Cultural Competency?" http://minorityhealth.hhs.gov/templates/browse.aspx?lvl=2&lvlID=11 (Accessed August 2013).

Sexual Abuse Survivors

Sexual abuse is a serious social problem affecting approximately one-third of women and more than 10 percent of men in the United States. This entry defines sexual abuse and sexual abuse survivors; reviews potential effects of sexual abuse; and addresses the special needs of sexual abuse survivors, including considerations for assessment, treatment, and recovery. The term sexual abuse refers to unwanted sexual contact that may include touching or penetration or unwanted exposure to sexual material, sexual behavior, or the private body parts of others without consent. Sexual abuse may be forced or coerced by the perpetrator. Most often, the perpetrator is known to the survivor and may be a trusted family member or other trusted adult. The term survivor is used to empower those who have experienced sexual abuse by emphasizing their strength, resiliency, and power to recover.

Sexual abuse survivors have experienced sexual abuse and may be of any age, gender, ethnicity, sexual orientation, or ability level. Sexual abuse occurs across all socioeconomic levels and most cultures. Culture may significantly affect the meaning that a survivor ascribes to having been sexually abused, the ways that family members and significant others respond, and the recovery process. The experience of historical or multigenerational trauma may influence the rate of reporting and help seeking in some cultures such as Native American, people of color, and other marginalized groups.

Effects of Sexual Abuse

Survivors of sexual abuse may experience a range of effects that can occur in the hours or weeks following the abuse and may be long lasting. Some researchers suggest that the negative effects that survivors experience may be exaggerated and minimize the survivors' ability to recover. While survivors experience negative effects to varying degrees, most researchers agree that sexual abuse is harmful.

Trauma effects may include problems regulating emotion and behavior that stem from a heightened state of arousal in response to psychological reminders of the trauma or environmental stressors. Dysregulation of emotion may include increased anxiety, social withdrawal, depressed mood, anger, and shame. Dysregulated behavior may include acting in ways that can cause harm to others, such as aggressive outbursts, or self-harm, such as cutting.

The survivor may develop distorted thoughts such as believing that they caused the sexual abuse or are responsible for consequences that the perpetrator faces. These distortions are often related to messages the perpetrator used to justify his or her sexually abusive behavior or attempt to secure secrecy.

In severe cases, the survivor may experience symptoms of posttraumatic stress. These symptoms interfere with functioning and may include persistent, heightened anxiety, arousal, and reactivity (re-experiencing the abuse by thinking about it when not intending to), having nightmares, or feeling like the abuse is happening when it is not; avoiding reminders of the abuse, such as associated places or objects; having dissociative symptoms (feeling disconnected from one's self or environment); or having changes in thoughts or mood.

Sexual abuse survivors may also develop disruptions in sexual attitudes and development, sometimes reenacting elements of the abuse as a child or engaging in risky sexual behaviors as an adolescent or adult. Additional effects may include somatization that results in various physical symptoms, substance abuse, and poorer health outcomes.

Recent studies have begun to explore the relationship between trauma and changes in brain development affecting the cerebral cortex, hippocampus, and amygdala and neuron activity. Changes to the nervous system have implications for understanding the ways in which sexual abuse survivors are impacted by trauma and the recovery process.

Children and adolescent survivors often experience secondary problems related to the sexual abuse. In situations in which the perpetrator was a parent or a caregiver, the survivor may be removed from the home, enter foster care, lose contact with family members, and have reduced financial stability.

Research suggests that severe forms of sexual abuse that are repetitive and prolonged, abuse characteristics such as having a trusted relationship with the perpetrator, and causal attributions such as self-blame, lead to greater negative effects. Judith Herman and others have described repetitive and chronic sexual abuse and related trauma effects as complex trauma.

Complex trauma may lead to dissociation as a primary coping mechanism, disruptions in the sense of self and personality development, impaired relatedness with others, chronic depressed mood, erratic moods, attachment difficulties, suicidal thoughts or behavior, self-harm behaviors, and being sexually inhibited or engaging in risky or compulsive sexual behavior. The experience of complex trauma often results in a more complicated healing process.

Special Needs of Survivors

In the aftermath of sexual abuse, survivors often participate in forensic evaluations conducted by multidisciplinary teams that include medical and mental health professionals and child welfare specialists to evaluate the extent of abuse and medical treatment needs. While gathering accurate information is necessary, the survivor's emotional well-being and physical safety must be paramount. Training about trauma, trauma effects, and cultural implications for medical and mental health professionals in forensic, health care, and mental health settings is necessary to provide informed and culturally sensitive care.

Given that sexual abuse is interpersonal in nature, healing from sexual abuse best takes place in the context of safe and supportive relationships. For children and adolescents who experience sexual abuse, having at least one caring adult, such as a caregiver, parent, or therapist, who is safe and supportive promotes recovery. Survivors often benefit from individual, family, couples, or group counseling or psychotherapy. Mental health treatment combined with psychopharmacology may be most effective to address symptomatology. A collaborative relationship between the therapist and survivor is fundamental for best outcomes. A thorough assessment of multiple dimensions of the person, environment, and his or her interplay is necessary to determine the unique needs of the survivor. Assessing for safety and establishing safety are particularly important in setting the groundwork for therapeutic work with survivors of sexual abuse.

For children and adolescents, a treatment approach that collaboratively engages, educates, and includes parents or caregivers is most helpful. For adult survivors, including partners in treatment when possible may lead to better outcomes. Cognitive-behavioral treatment approaches that provide psychoeducation, teach skills to regulate emotions and behavior (e.g., relaxation or mindfulness), involve some form of exposure and desensitization, and promote safety have been found to be most effective. Play therapy and sensory-based, trauma-focused treatment approaches are also thought to be beneficial with young children.

Group therapy for sexual abuse survivors also promotes healing and recovery because it connects survivors with other survivors, reducing isolation and stigma, and provides a safe environment for group members to share their experiences. This can be particularly important for male sexual abuse survivors, who may experience greater isolation and stigma.

Karen M. VanDeusen
Western Michigan University

See Also: Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Childhood Trauma; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Group Therapy; Trauma-Focused Services.

Further Readings

American Psychiatric Association. Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (5th ed.). Washington, DC: Author, 2013.

Cohen, Judith A., Anthony P. Mannarino, and Esther Deblinger. Treating Trauma and Traumatic Grief in Children and Adolescents. New York: Guilford Press, 2006.

Fontes, Lisa Aronson. Child Abuse and Culture. New York: Guildford Press, 2005.

Herman, Judith L. Trauma and Recovery. New York: Basic Books, 1992.

National Childhood Traumatic Stress Network. "The 12 Core Concepts: Concepts for Understanding Traumatic Stress Responses in Children and Families." http://www.nctsn.org/resources/audiences/parents-caregivers/what-is-cts/12-core-concepts (Accessed October 2013).

Saxe, Glenn N., B. Heidi Ellis, and Julie B. Kaplow. Collaborative Treatment of Traumatized Children and Teens: The Trauma Systems Therapy Approach. New York: Guilford Press, 2007.

Substance Abuse Mental Health Services Administration. "National Registry of Evidence-Based Programs and Practices." http://www.nrepp.samhsa.gov/ (Accessed May 2013).

Sexual Reassignment Surgery

Gender reassignment surgery or sexual reassignment surgery refers to a set of surgical interventions undertaken with the purpose of altering the physiological or anatomical sex of an individual. Both male-to-female (MtF) and female-to-male (FtM) surgeries are available.

While in adults, gender reassignment surgery takes place voluntarily and following a clinical diagnosis, surgical interventions have been used nonconsensually to treat intersex babies and young children. This latter use of medical intervention to treat intersexuality without consent has been condemned by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture (SRT).

Transgenderism and Transsexualism

An individual who self-identifies with a gender that is incongruent with or challenges biological or physiological sex is known as transgender. Included within the umbrella term of transgender are transsexuals: individuals who opt to realign their gender and their sex through medical intervention such as hormone therapy or surgery. The precise number of transgender individuals in the general population is not known. A recent study conducted in the Netherlands suggests that the ratio for males is one in 11,900 and, for females, one in 30,400. The number of surgical procedures carried out is lower than the number of transgender individuals because not all opt for surgery.

Generally, undertaking gender reassignment surgery requires a diagnosis of gender dysphoria. The fifth version of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5) requires that such a diagnosis in adults requires a strong difference between the experiences and expressed gender of an individual and the gender assigned to that individual by society, and that differences must continue for a minimum of six months. In addition, gender dysphoria is not considered a mental disorder unless it is accompanied by clinical evidence of impairment or distress in occupational, social, or other life domains. The process or the period of time during which gender reassignment occurs is known as transition. Individuals who have undergone surgery, either successfully or unsuccessfully, may continue to be referred to as transgendered or trans.

History of Gender Reassignment Surgery

Although sexual transformation is known to have taken place in early Greece and throughout the Renaissance, the first published account of gender reassignment surgery was not published until 1931. The number of surgeries performed began to grow in the late 1960s and 1970s, with Johns Hopkins University establishing a Gender Identity Clinic in 1965—the first hospital in the United States to formally establish a gender reassignment medical program. By 1979, up to 20 major medical centers in the United States were performing the surgery. Today, MtF surgery is around three times more common than FtM surgery. Possible reasons for the difference are the increased sense of vulnerability felt by boys in developing a gender identity during childhood or the greater ease with which biological women are able to present as male without undergoing surgery. The countries that lead the way in performing gender reassignment surgery are Thailand, Iran, and Serbia.

Diagnosis and Surgical Intervention

The process involved in making a gender transition differs from country to country, but typically it is lengthy and difficult. In the UK and the United States, for example, standards for diagnosis and management of gender dysphoria are established by the World Professional Association for Transgender Health (WPATH), formally known as the Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association (HBIGDA).

The so-called Benjamin standards prescribe a three-step approach to gender realignment and require the involvement of a large number of professionals. In the UK, the process is typically begun by the patient's general practitioner (GP) who, upon recognizing the condition, should refer the patient to a specialist gender identity service. Professionals involved in that service include mental health counselors, psychiatrists, psychologists, endocrinologists, speech therapists, and reconstructive surgeons. A psychiatrist will assess the patient, obtaining a full psychiatric history and examining psychosexual development, childhood gender-type behaviors, and any cross-dressing or attempts to conform to cultural gender.

Once a diagnosis of gender dysphoria has been obtained, patients are invited to participate in the real-life experience. This involves the administration of hormones to bring about changes in physical appearance that enable the patient to more closely resemble the opposite sex. The patient is then required to live as the opposite gender for a minimum of 12 months. The purpose of this step is to assess how comfortable the patient feels living and working in society in his or her self-identified gender. Once this trial period is complete, the patient may choose to undergo gender reassignment surgery, but not all patients do so.

During gender reassignment surgery, the physical appearance and functions of the primary sex characteristics, including sexual organs, are surgically altered in order to resemble those of the opposite sex. A number of surgeries are available, depending upon the needs and desires of patient and depending on whether the surgery is MtF or FtM. In MtF gender reassignment surgery, the reshaping of the male genitals into genitals with the form and function of female genitals is known as a vaginoplasty. MtF surgeries may also involve breast augmentation, buttock augmentation, voice feminization surgery, and surgery to reduce the size and appearance of the Adam's apple, known as a tracheal shave. FtM surgeries include a bilateral mastectomy to create a male chest, hysterectomy–ovarectomy, and phalloplasty (creation of a penis).

An individual undergoing gender reassignment surgery may also opt for surgical procedures that alter facial features to provide a more masculine or feminine appearance. Common types of facial feminization surgery, for example, are cheek implantations, scalp advancement, rhinoplasty, and frontal cranioplasty.

Post-Gender Reassignment Surgery

Success rates of gender reassignment surgery vary widely. Many procedures are highly complex, and complications are likely. Generally, however, follow-up research with trans patients suggests that most are pleased with the cosmetic and functional outcomes of the surgery. One comprehensive meta-analysis of follow-up studies with FtM and MtF patients undergoing surgery between 1961 and 1991 found that only around 1 percent of patients felt regret following the surgery. Satisfaction with surgery depends on a number of factors including age (younger patients are typically more satisfied than older patients), family support, and social support.

Natalie Sappleton
Manchester Metropolitan University

See Also: Cisgender; Gender and Clients; Gender Issues and Roles in Developing Countries; Gender Issues and Roles in Non-Western Countries; Transgender Individuals.

Further Reading

De Cuypere, Griet, et al. "Long-Term Follow-Up: Psychosocial Outcome of Belgian Transsexuals After Sex Reassignment Surgery." Sexologies, v.15/2 (2006).

Karkazis, Katrina. Fixing Sex: Intersex, Medical Authority, and Lived Experience. Duke University Press, 2008.

Preves, Sharon. Intersex and Identity: The Contested Self. Rutgers University Press, 2003.

"The Standards of Care (SOC) for the Health of Transsexual, Transgender, and Gender Nonconforming People." Minneapolis, MN: World Professional Association for Transgender Health, 2011.

Tugnet, Nicola, Jonathan Charles Goddard, Richard M. Vickery, Deenesh Khoosal, and Tim R. Terry. "Current Management of Male-to-Female Gender Identity Disorder in the UK." Postgraduate Medical Journal, v.83/984 (2007).

Sikhism

As a growing section of American society, nearly half a million Sikhs currently live in the United States. However, despite being the fifth-largest world religion, Sikhism remains a primarily unheard of and misconceived faith. Gaining cultural sensitivity to Sikhs, though not complicated, is necessary to provide effective and respectful services. Incorporating spirituality, familial decision making, and respecting the articles of the faith are key facets for human service providers to be culturally sensitive toward Sikhs. However, even within a religiously unified group, individual variations in values and beliefs exist, and human services must be tailored to that individual's uniqueness.

Spirituality

A Sikh's faith is intricately woven into numerous aspects of his or her everyday life. From morning routines, including prayers to meal-time limitations eliminating meat, the path Sikhs choose to lead in their daily lives encompasses the guidelines outlined through the Sikh faith. The Guru Granth Sahib is the Sikh holy scripture; a communal interpretation of this scripture led to the writing of the Rehat Meryada by Sikh leaders. The Rehat Meryada provides a detailed description of the parameters within which Sikhs are expected to lead their lives.

Spirituality for Sikhs is achieved through meditation, daily prayers, and singing of hymns from the Guru Granth Sahib. Sikh meditation is performed in various forms. The most common form of meditation is a repetitious chant of a religious word or phrase with the intention of focusing on removal of external stimuli and thought. Meditation allows an individual to spiritually, emotionally, and physically center themselves. A direct benefit is that meditation can often help Sikhs in deciding on treatment options, courses of action, and other involved thought processes by allowing clarity of thought to channel beliefs and values. A human services provider must be aware and sensitive to a Sikh during meditation. By avoiding interruption, facilitating a quiet space, and avoiding external pressures, a human services provider can enhance cultural sensitivity.

Devout, practicing Sikhs pray three times a day. Though prayers are not required to be performed at specific times according to Sikh scriptures, a majority of Sikhs perform their prayers in the early morning after a cleansing bath, in the evening before their meal, and at nighttime before sleeping. However, a number of Sikh prayers can be performed at any point over the course of a day. These prayers are not necessarily part of a Sikh's regular prayer routine as delineated by the Rehat Meryada but are often performed in times of emotional, mental, or physical need such as during a crisis or a hospitalization. Because human services providers often intersect with the lives of individuals during these times of need, allowing Sikhs to pray in a comfortable, safe, and accepting way promotes cultural competency and sensitivity.

Sikh spirituality is also achieved through religious hymns, both listening to and singing hymns. These hymns are direct segments of the Guru Granth Sahib and are thus sung with respect and adoration. Musical instruments often accompany the recitation of hymns but are not required. Human services providers will more commonly come across Sikhs listening to hymns rather than singing hymns, but their purpose remains the same. As these hymns are direct recitations of segments of the Guru Granth Sahib, Sikhs take comfort in the guidance, peace, and support they provide. Similar to a human service provider's role during meditation and Sikh prayer, providing Sikhs with a safe, comfortable, and supportive environment in which they can practice their faith remains the most culturally competent and sensitive approach.

A Sikh candlelight prayer ceremony. Spirituality for Sikhs is achieved through meditation, daily prayers, and singing of hymns from the Guru Granth Sahib. Devout, practicing Sikhs pray three times a day with a majority performing their prayers in the early morning after cleansing baths, in the evening before their meals, and at nighttime before sleeping.

Familial Decision Making

Sikhs are a group of individuals primarily from the northern part of India. Such a uniform location of origin has led to not only religious similarities within Sikhs but also cultural similarities. Though familial decision making is not directly tied to the Sikh faith, as delineated in the Sikh holy scriptures, the cultural uniformity of a majority of Sikhs makes familial involvement not only preferred but at times necessary to decision making in human service situations. The familial decision-making mentality arises from the cohesiveness of a family unit in the culture of majority of Sikhs. Any decision impacting an individual within one of these familial communities is considered to directly affect the remainder of individuals in that community. Culturally, Sikhs often value extended family households with a primary matriarchal or patriarchal figure. Additionally, Sikhs place strong respect and value on the opinions of their elders. Thus, decisions are not made without resorting to the opinions of the elders. However, though respect and value for opinion often lead to more cohesive decisions, Sikhs often place themselves in decision-making situations necessitating familial decision making.

For example, medical decision making often requires familial involvement in the care of elderly Sikh patients. This decision making becomes a required familial effort due to younger generations of Sikhs at times not fully disclosing to an elderly Sikh patient the extent and prognosis of the disease. Though some health care professionals may argue the ethics involved in not fully disclosing health care information to a patient, Sikhs feel the added stress of a negative situation or poor prognosis adds undue stress to that patient, thereby worsening the illness.

Human services providers must respect familial decision making, whether that directly involves the primary individual or not, as this is a belief held firmly by Sikhs. If ethics remains an issue, human services providers should approach organizations that specialize in these situations such as a hospital ethics board or the Sikh American Legal Defense and Education Fund.

Articles of Faith

Sikhs have five major articles of faith. Each article represents a key concept in Sikh belief. The kara is a steel bracelet worn by Sikhs to act as a reminder that every action a Sikh takes should be with their faith and God in mind. This reminder should act to prevent Sikhs from performing negative and harmful actions. The kanga is a comb that Sikhs wear in their hair at all times to represent a clean mind and body. The kachera is long underwear worn to discourage lustful behavior. Human services providers should facilitate Sikhs in wearing the kara, kachera, and kanga and never removing them from a Sikh's body without permission. The kirpan is a small sword or dagger that Sikhs keep on their bodies as a symbol that they protect the defenseless.

Respecting that the kirpan will not be used in a malicious manner can be heated and complicated in today's society, but communication with an individual to wear a smaller, harmless version is possible. Finally, kesh is uncut hair that symbolizes maintaining the identity of Sikhs as not altering their bodies because Sikhs believe the body is a gift from God. Not removing a single strand of hair from a Sikh's body without permission is a very important lesson for all human services providers, especially health care providers who may feel inclined due to health care practices. Human services providers should be aware and respectful of these articles of faith and understand their symbolism to Sikhs.

Variations in Belief

Despite having a holy scripture delineating the pathway a Sikh should lead, the Sikh holy scripture is often interpreted in various and, at times, conflicting ways. For example, a number of Sikhs eat meat, don't maintain the articles of faith, or cut their hair. These individuals feel the pathway outlined in the Guru Granth Sahib does not require maintaining these aspects of the faith to count themselves as Sikhs. Additionally, individuals may vary by degree of religiosity and thus choose to maintain only those values and beliefs they believe serve them well. It then follows that a human services provider must realize that individuals within the Sikh faith can vary on their personal values and beliefs. Unfortunately, this discrepancy often creates room for confusion and lack of generalizability of understanding. As with providing services to any unique group, the lack of universality of values and beliefs requires human service providers to communicate with the individuals with whom they come in to contact so as to provide the most culturally sensitive services to that particular individual.

Conclusion

Sikhs are a unique and growing religious group in the United States. Human services providers must respect not only a Sikh's incorporation of spirituality, required familial decision making, and articles of faith when interacting with him or her but also understand that, as with any faith, vast variations exist within this group. In order to provide the highest level of cultural competency and sensitivity, human services providers must engage the Sikhs they come into contact with and discuss expectations prior to engaging in the service.

Mandeep Kaur
University of Texas at Austin
Jasmeet Kaur
Parminder Singh
University of Texas, Medical Branch

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Literacy; Diversity and Quality in Health Care.

Further Readings

Gill, B. K. "Nursing With Dignity. Part 6: Sikhism." Nursing Times, v.98/14 (2002).
Riopelle, R. J. "Issue of Hair Shaving in Sikh Patients Undergoing a Neurosurgical Procedure." The Canadian Journal of Neurological Sciences, v.36/6 (2009).
Singh, K. "The Sikh Spiritual Model of Counseling." Spirituality and Health International, v.9 (2008).

Single Parents

Services for single parents constitute a category of child and family services. These services are carried out by public and nongovernmental bodies for people who are single parents by unfortunate events or by their own choice. Individuals come to single parenthood mainly through divorce, separation, birth outside of marriage, child abuse or neglect, death of a partner or widowhood, and adoption. At the end of the 20th century in developed countries, the single-parent family continued to emerge. According to the 2013 World Family Map report, the highest levels of single parenthood are noticed in countries of South America and sub-Saharan Africa (from 16 percent in Bolivia to 43 percent in South Africa). North America, Oceania, and Europe average about one-fifth of children living in single-parent households. The highest levels were noticed in the United States (27 percent), the United Kingdom (24 percent), and New Zealand (24 percent). Lower rates were in Europe (average 15 percent), Asia (9.8 percent), and the Middle East (8.5 percent). Most of single parents are women. Adults in the Americas, Europe, and Oceania lean more toward acceptance of voluntary single motherhood than in other regions. Therefore, these services are often limited as services to pregnant single women who decide to carry the baby to full term and then keep the child.

Reasons of Distinguishing Services for Single Parents

Single parents with children need additional social, professional, educational, and legal support. The single parent is usually also the primary caregiver and breadwinner, meaning the parent with whom the children have residency the majority of the time and parent on whose income the household budget is based. The single parent must play both mother and father roles—not only providing love and nurturance but also interpreting society for the children and being a figure of authority and discipline. This situation creates considerable stress, responsibility, tasks, and emotional overload. Single-parent, mostly mother-only, families have greater likelihood of children living in poverty. Usually post-divorce or separation, a mother's earnings are significantly lower than that of a divorced man. Single parents are likely to have problems associated with combining work with child rearing. Their job mobility, earning power, freedom to work late, and job performance are negatively affected.

Children in a single-parent family might come from abusive or neglectful homes or live in very poor and dangerous communities. Such children also have above-average levels of youth suicide, mental illness, violence, drug abuse, poor school performance, lower levels of education, and higher dropout rates. They are also more likely to have health-related problems as a result of the decline in their living standards, including the lack of health insurance. As children from single-parent families become adults, they are more likely to marry early, have children early, and divorce. Girls from single-parent families are at greater risk of becoming single mothers as a result of nonmarital childbearing or divorce.

General interventions of social policy programs may include child allowances, an education benefit, national health services, access to public housing, promoting family benefits, child care provision, preventing teen pregnancy, increasing access to education, supporting entry into the labor market for low-income women, and identifying mothers early on in the process of marital disruption.

Types of Services for Single Parents

Single-parent families rely on support from immediate family members, which is the most important resiliency factor in helping them to face life challenges. Sometimes, support comes from friends, a style of positively approaching problems, and religious or spiritual support.

Social services of public agencies and nongovernmental organizations depending on the purpose of assistance may be directed to pregnant single women, those who already are single parents, and children from single-parent families.

Services aimed at pregnant single women include the following:

- Alternatives counseling for pregnant single women that aims to help in making decisions about carrying the baby to full term, having an abortion, keeping the child, terminating parental rights, deciding on foster placement, and undergoing adoption counseling.
- Physical and mental childbirth preparation including information about the effects of drug and alcohol abuse on the embryo, information on the effects of venereal diseases, and pre- and postnatal counseling.
- Legal counseling including procedures for termination of parental rights, legitimation and adoption procedures, rights to attend school, and procedures of receiving public assistance.
- Interpersonal relationships counseling focused on the pregnant single women

- and relationships with the alleged father, parents, and other relatives.
- Information and management of alternative living arrangements like a maternity home, home of parents or other relatives, and foster homes.

Services to those who are already single parents include the following:

- Programs for teenage mothers involving them to continue education (e.g., through home study programs) and to instruct them about parenting, sexuality, social services for which they may be eligible, financial and money management, as well as employment opportunities.
- Family planning counseling, including information on birth control and referral to a family planning clinic.
- •Alleged-father counseling, including informing him about his rights and responsibilities, providing birth control counseling and premarital counseling.
- Foster care and adoption—children can live in homes with families other than their birth parents until they are returned to birth parents or adopted. Foster parents should be trained and related to children and their birth parents. Foster care is sometimes used when a single parent relinquishes his or her parental rights or is unsure about whether to give up parental rights. The goal is to protect the children, rehabilitate parents, and return children to their genetic parents as soon as it is feasible.
- Psychotherapeutic interventions including help by community agencies, like guidance centers, including individual or family therapy with a social worker, psychologist, or psychiatrist. Such entities sometimes maintain reference libraries of books and movies on death and divorce for clients.
- Parent-assistance programs aimed at help for the experienced or overburdened parent with dealing with some practical problems of child and home care.
- Family crisis intervention, including services aimed at assisting during intense domestic disputes that require police intervention.
- Support groups and self-help groups like Parents Without Partners, which help individuals realize that they are not the only ones coping with a given problem. They assist members in developing new ways to cope as they learn from each other.
- Child-care programs targeted at working and nonworking parents, families with children who have severe developmental disabilities in which adults care for children during evenings or weekends so parents can have time to themselves. This includes crisis nurseries or shelters, where parents under severe stress or in a serious emergency can leave their children for a limited time.
- Homemaker services to families that are at risk or have neglected or abused their children. Homemakers offer practical suggestions and education about housekeeping, child care, nutrition and cooking, health and safety, shopping, budgeting, and access to community resources. Sometimes, they serve as surrogate parents, developing positive, trusting relationships with family members who have been isolated.
- Volunteer and outreach programs who spend time with families, prevent family disruption, assist in problem solving and gaining access to community resources, or serve as a surrogate parent or friend to parents and family members.
- Child protective services; for example, ensuring that children can be safe in their own homes; arranging for community resources; parent education and support; helping with involvement in a parent support group; and developing a contract with a parent on goals the family must accomplish to be removed from a child's protective services caseload.
- Family preservation services with an emphasis on keeping together families that would have been separated in the past. Services include maintaining and strengthening family bonds, stabilizing a crisis situation that precipitated any need for outside placement, and increasing family's coping skills, competencies, and use of appropriate and informal helping resources.

Among the services oriented on children in single-parent families are the following;

- School-established support groups for students coping with family problems such as divorce or abuse.
- Peer counseling in the form of rap groups in schools. Groups sponsored by the school or a local counseling agency help children to express feelings about home life and reduce the sense of isolation. Children in group realize that others have similar feelings in similar situations.
- Daytime care programs for young children. The aim is to foster optimal intellectual development and to help overcome some of the emotional effects of early deprivation.
- Big Brothers and Big Sisters programs aiming to fill the gap in a child's life who was left by a departed parent.
- Social and recreational programs for children at different ages offered by community centers.
- Respite care for adolescents who need time away from their parents. Emergency shelter facilities for teens that provide crisis and family counseling to help stabilize the situation so teens can return home.

Services for single parents may be coordinated through resource centers where families can receive thorough assessments, so they can be referred to appropriate agencies and databases that contain information about the services available to single parents run by social groups and networks. Services should be adapted to the cultural diversity of the single-parent family.

Andrzej Klimczuk
Warsaw School of Economics

See Also: Adoption Agencies and Services; Divorce; Family Services; Family Structure, Diversity of; Parenting Skills Training; Parenting Styles, Cultural Differences in; Poverty; Pregnancy and Parenting Services; Profile of Parenting Study.

Further Readings

Ambrosino, Rosalie, Robert Ambrosino, Joseph Heffernan, and Guy Shuttlesworth. Social Work and Social Welfare: An Introduction. Belmont, CA: Thomson Brooks/Cole, 2008.
Burger, William R. Human Services in Contemporary America. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole Cengage Learning, 2013.
Goldstein, Sam, Jack A. Naglieri, eds. Encyclopedia of Child Behavior and Development. New York: Springer, 2011.
Lippman, Laura H., W. Bradford Wilcox, and Renee Ryberg. 2013 World Family Map: Mapping Family Change and Child Well-Being Outcomes. Washington, DC: Child Trends, 2013.
Ponzetti, James J. International Encyclopedia of Marriage and Family. New York: Macmillan Reference USA, 2003.
Zastrow, Charles. Introduction to Social Work and Social Welfare: Empowering People. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 2010.

Size Discrimination

Historically, persons who are different have experienced prejudice and discrimination. Sometimes, generalizations are based on race, religion, gender, socioeconomic status, or a myriad of other characteristics. One characteristic in particular has received much attention from the media and civil rights organizations; this characteristic is size discrimination. Size discrimination is defined as unfair or different treatment based on size and weight. Unfortunately, size discrimination is much more common than one would think, and it has long-reaching consequences. It is much harder to get away with racism (no blacks allowed in this club) as opposed to sizism (no short or fat people allowed in this club). In our culture, we are a very judgmental and superficial group. Until legislation is put in place to prohibit discrimination based on height or weight, size discrimination will continue to occur, both covertly and overtly.

Research on body size has indicated that persons are more likely to get hired, promoted, be well liked, make more money, gain membership into clubs, and get better health insurance when they fit the acceptable weight and height expectations our society holds as normal. Conversely, those who are obese are more likely to be denied medical and life insurance and may pay higher premiums than “average-sized” individuals. They are less likely to be hired for a job in the first place, less likely to be given a raise, and less likely to earn as much as thinner people. Women in particular face social bias and discrimination due to their size. They (larger women) are perceived of as difficult to work with, lazy, hostile, dishonest, unfeminine, and lacking self-discipline. Even with the same qualifications as their thinner counterparts, they will experience discrimination in employment and in daily interpersonal relationships. Overweight men and women suffer socially; they are less likely to marry, have lower self-esteem, and will commonly experience name calling, which leads to poor body image and unhealthy eating habits, perpetuating weight gain.

Employment discrimination of these individuals also leads to lower household income, higher rates of poverty, less-desirable housing, and fewer opportunities overall. Some educational institutions have been known to turn down applicants due to their size. Thus, their level of education is lower on average in comparison to those within the normal weight range. Even when enrolled in school, some research shows that teachers have lower expectations of larger students.

Playing by the Rules

Although employers can require employees to dress and groom appropriately, they cannot exclude persons from employment for social reasons, and any criteria used that might exclude an entire group of people is discriminatory. If a person is physically capable of completing the tasks required for his or her job, it would be unfair to hire (or not hire) that person due to his or her body size. However, if an employee’s size will hinder the ability to perform the tasks that are required for the job, the refusal to hire would be valid. It must be proven that the height and weight requirements for employment are occupational requirements. Where might this situation occur? In policing, if someone does not have the strength to apprehend a suspect, the officer or innocent bystanders could be hurt or killed. In a fire department, if someone cannot carry a hose up a ladder, a house could burn down and people could die. These are examples where size might interfere with the ability to perform necessary tasks.

Interestingly, a recent court case ruled against 22 Borgata Babes (Atlantic City, New Jersey, casino waitresses), who claimed weight discrimination when they were told that they could be fired if they gained 7 percent of their body weight. They lost the lawsuit, as the judges determined that the women were hired with the expectation that they look a certain way and that they were expected to keep up their appearances in order to keep their jobs. Since 2002, Southwest Airlines has instituted regulations requiring larger passengers to buy two seats on their planes. According to the Council on Size and Weight Discrimination, seating on planes is a public accommodation. Yet the airline has been able to cite comfort of passengers as an explanation for its rule.

However, there are situations where size does not really matter. For example, a flight attendant was discriminated against when she was denied employment because she was too short. The 5’2” requirement really was not necessary to perform her duties. Not only is this treatment discriminatory against short women, but it discriminates against entire ethnic and racial groups who might have a tendency to be shorter than other groups.

Specific examples of size discrimination have occurred within many businesses. For example, the chief executive officer of Abercrombie and Fitch stated that their clothing is designed to target the “cool kids,” so they are no bigger than a size 10. Persons have been denied membership to gyms (or refunded their membership fee) because their “large” presence was not good for business. In another case, a nursing student was asked to lose weight or be expelled from her program, and a traveling choir applicant was denied membership because it was assumed her weight would make it difficult to travel. Further, an obese woman was denied a job due to her weight, even though the position was for a receptionist in a car dealership. Finally, a couple was denied the ability to adopt a child due to their size.

Intentional discrimination against a person who might be larger, smaller, taller, or shorter than “average” could be categorized as a violation of the law. The National Association to Advance Fat Acceptance (NAAFA) was established to end size discrimination. It is a nonprofit civil rights organization that was created in 1969. Yet, there is almost no legislation protecting against this type of discrimination. With no federal laws in place to protect individuals from sizism, equitable treatment cannot be guaranteed. In addition to the state of Michigan, Washington, D.C., has incorporated weight and height into their discrimination laws. Some jurisdictions do prohibit discrimination due to physical appearance or physical attractiveness, and there is pending legislation against height discrimination in other states (Massachusetts in particular). However, these definitions are very subjective, and the laws are few and far between. In fact, size discrimination is actually increasing as the percentage of Americans considered fat has increased. Prejudice in hiring and wage discrimination by height has been studied in depth. Not only do these factors affect job performance, but they affect perceived job performance. Some people even believe there is a correlation between height and intelligence as well as between low income and weight (i.e., the lower your income, the higher your weight is likely to be). This "taste-based" discrimination can lead to unfair prejudices that are not true. Thus, a person might not be hired if he or she is short because it is expected that he or she will not think as well as his or her taller counterparts.

An obese person rides a motorized cart through a store. Larger individuals are often denied equal opportunity and discriminated against because their size makes navigating logistically difficult.

Logistics in Regard to Fitting In Logistically, it is harder for a larger person to access turnstiles, narrow doors, hallways, and small bathrooms. Other areas of concern include seating on buses, trains, at restaurant tables, and in airplanes, which means larger individuals are denied equal opportunity, whether intentional or unintentional. Thus, they are discriminated against due to their size. In addition, their health care is not the same. Medical personnel treat them differently. They are often told to lose weight (regardless of their health), and some facilities and machines simply cannot meet their needs (e.g., magnetic resonance imaging [MRI] machines). In addition, nurses even prefer to not treat overweight patients. Further, those who are too short or too tall might not be able to fit into these machines.

Opportunities and Expectations

Men who are short are judged as less mature, less positive, less masculine, less outgoing, and more passive. Those who are smaller in stature also experience more bullying and harassment. Women who are "too tall" experience negative comments such as being called unfeminine.

Interestingly, shorter men earn less than taller men, and thinner women earn more than obese women. Taller men are seen as natural leaders and assertive. They are more likely to be involved in politics and business and have high-ranking jobs, and are more likely to be hired and make more money than shorter men. In addition, their mating opportunities are better because they appear more attractive to women.

What Does Size Discrimination Stem From?

There are a few theories as to why people are judged based on the size of their bodies. Many people believe that we are obliged to abstain from too much pleasure (gluttony) and that those who are larger are perceived as self-indulgent and unable to control themselves. Others have developed a fear of fatness because our culture is obsessed with thinness. Women in particular struggle with trying to fit the mold of a Barbie doll or a model, which leads to eating disorders and body image issues. Yet women who are "too" thin can also feel the wrath of societal judgment. Why is it acceptable to tell a woman she is too thin, that she should gain some weight, or go eat something? In one instance, models in Madrid were banned from a fashion show for being too thin (based on their body mass index [BMI]).

According to some theories, the focus on normal and acceptable weight began when ready-to-wear clothing was created. Up until the early 1900s, clothing was custom made. Once ready-to-wear clothing was developed, the differences in body sizes became more apparent, and those who were different (i.e., too large, small, short, or tall) were ostracized because they were considered outside the range of normal.

What Can Be Done to Reduce the Incidence of Sizism?

In order to combat discrimination based on size, there are steps that can be taken. For example, sports stadiums and movie theaters have created wider seats to accommodate larger individuals. Airlines could do something similar; by creating a row of seats to meet the special needs of those who are wider or taller than the average individual, they will not be precluded from participating in enjoyable activities. Clothing manufacturers can create more clothing made for plus-sized individuals as well as for those of small stature. Big and tall stores do exist, and those who need to visit these stores should not feel embarrassed to do so. Current television shows can (and some have) depicted larger individuals as the main characters. However, they should not be portrayed as lazy or disgusting.

The media can play a strong role in influencing societal opinions and perceptions of those who are larger or smaller, or shorter or taller, than what is expected. By instilling the notion that one should not be judged for his or her body size, size discrimination can be reduced. Currently, only Michigan prohibits workplace discrimination based on height or weight. Federal legislation against discrimination for age, race, and gender could be extended to encompass body size as well. Unfortunately, there are many disparities in the delivery of services experienced by those who are different. Those who experience size discrimination are no exception. Therefore, it is important to address the social, economic, and legal ramifications of the treatment of those who are too large, small, short, or tall and are judged because they do not meet society's criteria for acceptable size.

Gina M. Robertiello
Felician College

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Bias in Service Delivery; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Implicit Bias; Overweight and Obese Adults and Children.

Further Readings

Brownell, K. D., et al., eds. Weight Bias: Nature, Consequences, and Remedies. New York: Guilford Publications, 2005.

Davis-Coelho K, J. Waltz, and B. Davis-Coelho. "Awareness and Prevention of Bias Against Fat Clients in Psychotherapy." Professional Psychology, v.31 (2000).

Judge, Timothy A. and Daniel M. Cable. "When It Comes to Pay, Do the Thin Win? The Effect of Weight on Pay for Men and Women." Journal of Applied Psychology, v.96 (2008).

Puhl, R. M., T. Andreyeva, and K. D. Brownell. "Perceptions of Weight Discrimination: Prevalence and Comparison to Race and Gender Discrimination in America." Journal of Obesity, v.8 (2008).

Schwartz, M. B., H. O'Neal, K. D. Brownell, S. Blair, and C. Billington. "Weight Bias Among Health Professionals Specializing in Obesity." Obesity Research, v.11 (2003).

Teachman, B. A. and K. D. Brownell. "Implicit Anti-Fat Bias Among Health Professionals: Is Anyone Immune?" International Journal of Obesity and Related Metabolic Disorders, v.25 (2001).

Willis, Katy G. American Sizism Sucks. CreateSpace Independent Publishing Platform, 2012.

Slavery and Lasting Cultural Effects of Social Biology/Biological Determinism

One of the lasting effects of racialized slavery is a notion of biological determinism, or the belief that basic human abilities and aptitudes are determined by an individual's biology. As documented by A. Desmond and J. Moore, the word polygenism itself was coined in the 1850s as part of an effort to justify race-based slavery in the United States. Polygenism—the belief that human races are in fact separate species—was used to explain why certain races could only participate in civilization under the direction of what was believed to be a more advanced species, the whites. The valence of polygenism was that it was a modern, scientific belief in contrast to monogenism, which was linked to Christian theology and therefore was ascribed the status as myth.

An important precursor to the polygenic program was the effort to find quantifiable measures by which to distinguish the supposedly distinct species of humanity. One of the most infamous of these was Samuel George Morton, who attempted to measure the cranial capacity of human skulls. By tallying the skulls according to race, Morton was able to state that those of the European race had larger cranial capacities as compared to the African or (native) American race. Morton's craniometry, which has been analyzed by Stephen Jay Gould, was cited by many authors in the 19th century as evidence of the varying skull sizes, and thus supposedly varying mental capacities, of human races. This finding seemingly disregards the fact that human beings do not have the largest brains among the mammals, and yet they appear to have the most complex cognition. Brain size alone, therefore, does not seem to correlate directly with intelligence.

The notion that human abilities and aptitudes ranged on a continuum of values can be attributed to the Belgian statist Adolphe Quetelet, a pioneer of a sort of social physics in the mid-19th century. Quetelet made use of the error law of astronomy, which transforms the multiplicity of human error found in measurements of astronomical distances into an exact quantity. Measurements of the distance to the same star by different scientists or at different times often differed because of errors in measurement, making a statement of scientific certainty impossible. Assuming that a good-faith effort is made to measure the distance, the error law postulates that all measurements of the same body are more likely to be closer to the actual distance rather than farther away. Expressing the distribution of measurements on a chart exhibits the familiar bell-shaped curve, with the very wrong and least likely measurements on the lower portion (the horns). Progressing from the lower regions along the curve to the highest point, the accuracy of the measurement increases. At the summit, one gets closer and closer to the point of zero error—the actual distance to the star—and even though it is a practical impossibility to take a measurement with zero error, the exact distance can be surmised. The error law uses a statistical principle to make an accurate guess at an unknown, but definite, quantity.

Quetelet used the principle of the error law as a starting point for more broad analyses. In 1844, he started from a simple study of the distribution of height in a population to demonstrate that human characteristics distribute themselves like the errors in measurement of a star's distance—and from there, he took a logical leap to suggest that all human qualities are scientifically demonstrable and arrange themselves around a certain norm. This leap, however, ignores the difference between human characteristics and physical realities. Even in such a simple measurement as height, there are distinct problems. The subject's slouch, impossible to measure, causes a definite variation in height. This objection only becomes more intense when trying to measure subjective qualities of character. Quetelet's work ranged far, from observations on biological variation to analyses of crime and mortality, and it had wide impact on the burgeoning field of social science. Quetelet believed in a magical ability of numbers to conjure an ideal individual. The variation of individuals was seen not as variations on a theme but errors in the execution of a model. Identifying and correcting these biological errors, and finding the basic types around which these traits varied, became a goal of the deterministic racial scientists.

At the end of the 19th century, the idea that the African race had distinctive intellectual and social qualities intertwined with Social Darwinism to create a new justification for racial hierarchy. The neo-Lamarckian Social Darwinists would assert that individuals of a race accumulate biological traits that make them fit for certain kinds of societies. W. J. McGee's 1899 address to the Anthropological Society of Washington, "The Trend of Human Progress," suggested that each society is on its way from savagery to civilization but that there were necessary steps through which each society must pass, including abandoning matriarchal culture and accepting the scientific development of knowledge. Interestingly, McGee suggested that individuals in each society would be like their kin in their ability to form government, respect the rule of law, and contribute innovation in science. Although racial slavery might be over, these authors seem to assert, the former enslaved population has a long period of apprenticeship through which it must develop before it could become full members of society.

This racist notion persisted well into the 20th century. After the success of the modern evolutionary synthesis that brought together endocrinology, paleontology, embryology, population genetics, and other fields in the 1930s and 1940s to support Darwin's notion of natural selection, some sought to unify additional fields of the social sciences with Darwinian thought. The best known of these was E. O. Wilson's 1975 book, Sociobiology: The New Synthesis, which suggested that social traits and aptitudes were conditioned through human evolution and, therefore, were engrained within an individual's biology. The differences among members of different sexes and races, the sociobiologists proclaimed, was due to long trends in human evolution. Much like the neo-Lamarckians had at the end of the 19th century, sociobiologists held that there were genetic differences in abilities that would be difficult for an individual to overcome. Richard Lewontin and Stephen Jay Gould, two Harvard scientists with an interest in unraveling the pseudoscience of biological race, became outspoken critics of the movement.

The link between racialized biology and ability did not end with sociobiology. Gould's motivation in writing The Mismeasure of Man, he says, was to refute the 1994 book about human intelligence, The Bell Curve. This text had a surprisingly large amount of carryover from the craniometric 19th century in its assertions that racial disparities in intelligence and achievement drew from biological causes, extrapolating from the finding that scores on achievement tests fall into a typical bell curve arranged by standard deviation, the kind of argument made by Quetelet.

Christopher Leslie
Polytechnic Institute of New York University

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Race, Social Definition of; Racial Identity Development, Models of.

Further Readings

Degler, Carl N. In Search of Human Nature: The Decline and Revival of Darwinism in American Social Thought. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Desmond, Adrian and James Moore. Darwin's Sacred Cause: Race, Slavery, and the Quest for Human Origins. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2009.

Gould, Stephen Jay. The Mismeasure of Man. New York: W. W. Norton, 1981.

Porter, Theodore M. The Rise of Statistical Thinking. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1986.

Smoking and Smoking Cessation, Cultural Aspects of Smoking presents considerable health hazards including risk of heart disease and lung, mouth, and other cancers. In the United States, smoking is the leading cause of preventable death. Around the world, smoking is linked to approximately 5 million deaths annually. Numerous programs have been developed to reduce smoking and its social and economic impact. Smoking cessation aims to help smokers develop skills and strategies and utilize medications to help them quit. Prevention programs aim to deter potential smokers by increasing recognition of the negative consequences of smoking. Smokers and youth at risk for smoking vary in many ways, including their ethnic and cultural backgrounds. Recognizing that ethnic and cultural factors impact smoking and the acceptability of smoking programs, smoking cessation and prevention programs can be tailored to meet the needs of individuals across cultures.

Cultural Variation in Smoking

About 20 percent of the adult U.S. population currently smokes, with rates varying across demographic groups. For example, rates are highest for adults ages 25 to 64, with approximately double the rate for adults 65 and older. Smoking rates are also higher among males than females across most demographic strata. People who are divorced or separated have the highest rates, followed by individuals who are married, widowed, or never married. Geographically, smoking rates are lowest in the west and highest in the Midwest and south. More specifically, smoking rates are highest in West Virginia, followed by Kentucky, Ohio, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Oklahoma.

Smoking rates vary across racial and ethnic groups and are generally higher among people with a lower socioeconomic status. American Indians have the highest smoking rates, followed by non-Latino whites, African Americans, Latinos, and Asian Americans. Asian American women have a particularly low rate at 4.3 percent in comparison to 36 percent for American Indian women. In terms of socioeconomic status, smoking rates are higher for people with less education and lower incomes. For example, about 45 percent of people with general education diplomas (GEDs) report currently smoking, followed by high school graduates at 24 percent, college graduates at 10 percent, and people with graduate degrees at 6 percent. In summary, poverty, low family income, and low educational attainment are risk factors for smoking.

Smoking Cessation Programs

Efforts to help smokers quit have generally been least effective for culturally diverse groups and people of low socioeconomic status. Smoking cessation interventions include nicotine replacement therapy, self-help programs, and individual, group, and phone counseling. In general, health care providers are less likely to ask patients about smoking, advise quitting, or prescribe a smoking cessation program if patients have a lower socioeconomic status or are African American or Latino. Moreover, smoking cessation programs tend to be less effective for these groups, though estimates of the effectiveness of smoking cessation programs vary widely across studies and smoking cessation programs. Typically, gender differences in effectiveness have not been sizeable, though few studies have examined the interaction between gender and other demographic variables. Relatively few high-quality studies have evaluated smoking cessation in samples of Latino, American Indian, and Asian participants, as well as samples of older adults. More research is needed to determine which types of smoking cessation programs are most effective and for whom.

A number of possibilities exist for adapting existing smoking cessation interventions in order to make them more culturally responsive. In particular, programming should be tailored to the language, clothing, brand names, locations, music, foods, and other characteristics of the targeted population. Moreover, the cultural values of the targeted group should be embedded within the content of the intervention. In order to increase participation in smoking cessation, it may be useful to deliver smoking cessation programs through novel channels such as existing medical programs, prenatal clinics, home-based asthma services, and dental clinics or implemented through nonmedical programs such as churches and salons. Culturally tailored, Web-based interventions and mobile apps also offer opportunities for reaching out to low-income and culturally diverse groups.

Smoking Prevention

Whereas the biomedical model typically focuses on treating diseases after they have occurred, the public health model focuses on disease prevention. Most smoking prevention programs target youth before they begin smoking with media and school-based and online learning programs. Programs, such as the Minnesota Smoking Prevention Program, aim to educate youth on the risks of smoking and provide them with skills to overcome social pressures to smoke. Other prevention efforts include governmental regulations such as taxation of tobacco products, smoke-free establishments, legislation against youth tobacco sales, and enforcement of youth smoking laws—all of which aim to reduce accessibility of tobacco products at the community level.

As with smoking cessation, prevention needs vary by cultural and ethnic groups, and so prevention programs are often culturally tailored. Two aspects of cultural tailoring relevant to prevention are surface and deep structure tailoring. Surface structure tailoring often involves the adaptation of programming to better represent and fit the ethnic and cultural background of target audiences. Programming may incorporate images, language, and arts relevant to the target culture. For instance, smoking prevention videos have included hip-hop music and urban settings to better target African American youth, and the National African American Tobacco Prevention Network provides depictions of African American adults. Deep structure tailoring aims to incorporate cultural values and expectations to enhance the effects of prevention. Deep structure tailoring acknowledges that cultural processes impact how members perceive and conceptualize the causes of smoking and that cultural processes themselves impact smoking. To the extent that some cultures are more familial oriented, programs may emphasize the impact of smoking on the family and also incorporate family in the prevention process. Conversely, peer-oriented cultures may benefit from prevention programs that target the impact of smoking in the context of friend and peer groups. An important caveat is that there are considerable differences among members within the same culture. Efforts that fail to capture the diversity within cultures may backfire to the extent that they stereotype individuals.

In summary, there is substantial sociodemographic variation in smoking rates as well as the factors that cause and maintain smoking. Smoking cessation and prevention interventions should incorporate knowledge of cultural aspects of smoking, which promises to be an important area of future research.

James I. Gerhart
Rush University Medical Center
Chynna O. Allen
Tulane University
Michael Hoerger
Tulane Cancer Center and University of Rochester Medical Center

See Also: Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Social Determinants of Health.

Further Readings

Borrelli, B. "Smoking Cessation: Next Steps for Special Populations Research and Innovative Treatments." Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology, v.78/1 (2010).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "Smoking and Tobacco Use: Tables, Charts, and Graphs." http://www.cdc.gov/tobacco/data_statistics/tables/index.htm (Accessed November 2013).

Cokkinides, V. E., M. T. Halpern, E. M. Barbeau, E. Ward, and M. J. Thun. "Racial and Ethnic Disparities in Smoking-Cessation Interventions: Analysis of the 2005 National Health Interview Survey." American Journal of Preventive Medicine, v.34/5 (2008).

Resnicow, K., R. Soler, R. L. Braithwaite, J. S. Ahluwalia, and J. Butler. "Cultural Sensitivity in Substance Use Prevention." Journal of Community Psychology, v.28/3 (2000).

Social and Economic Justice

Human dignity and freedom are achievable when basic human needs are provided such as human services including housing, employment, food, health, education, and water. Social and economic rights of citizens are undeniable rights that are designed to promote equitable distribution of resources without discrimination. Discrimination based on gender, age, religion, background, sex orientation, and so on brings about inequality and injustice and deniable social and economic rights. Inequitable distribution of social and economic rights demands social and economic justice for every citizen. Social and economic rights provisions are the duty of the state or national government based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It is the duty of government to promote the provision of social and economic rights without discrimination even if it is not convenient to do. The present global economic recession has created more poverty, joblessness, homelessness, school dropouts, and other social and economic consequences. It creates constraint for government to meet its obligations to the needy in society. Social and economic justice do not only include human and civil rights but also equal opportunity such as access to education, freedom from poverty, provision of employment, and affordable housing for those with low wages; those who are unemployed, single parents, physically handicapped, or children; and the elderly.

It is very important to identify and know what constitutes social and economic rights before looking at social and economic justice. Rights are freedoms enjoyed by human beings without discrimination. They are naturally given and enshrined in the laws and regulations that govern human behavior. Denial of fundamental human rights leads to injustice. Justice therefore is the ability to provide equity in all aspects of human endeavors. Social and economic rights guarantee that all citizens be afforded conditions under which they are capable of meeting their basic needs. Social and economic rights include the following:

- The right to education: This is the guarantee of free, compulsory, and affordable education. The education must be qualitative and capable of meeting each child's needs and aspirations. The rights to equal access to education must be provided by government.

- The right to health: It is the duty of government to provide qualitative and the highest attainable and affordable physical and mental health for its citizens. The provision of standard health includes the right to healthy living conditions.
- The right to decent work: Human rights include the rights of citizen to engage in dignified work and work in a dignified environment. The rights at work also involve just and fair conditions of employment, protection against forced or compulsory labor, and freedom to form and be a member of trade unions.
- The right to housing: It is the responsibility of government to provide affordable housing for citizens. This also includes access to land, protection from forced eviction, and good living conditions that are well located, habitable, and culturally acceptable.
- The right to potable water: This is the provision of a safe water supply and improved sanitation. The water supply should be economically and generally available.
- The right to food: Food security is very essential. Food security will ensure freedom from hunger and living a healthy life. Right to food should include food that is adequate, nutritious, and very affordable.
- Cultural rights: The rights of minority and indigenous people must be recognized and protected. Cultural relativity, assimilation, diversity, and accommodation must be allowed.

Necessity for Social and Economic Justice

It is very important to understand social and economic rights before discussing social and economic justice. As discussed previously, the absence of social and economic rights, or inequality, brings about a discussion on social and economic justice. Social and economic justice are very necessary because of the inability of many governments in the world to meet their provisions. In many societies today, the neglect of the provision of social economic infrastructures has led to the collapse of social order. As population increases, urbanization creeps in, cities become megalopolises, people are out of jobs, there are cuts in social and welfare support, scholarships are scarce, and food insecurity grows. It is the responsibility of a state to meet the provisions of social and economic rights. Social and economic justice is guaranteed if human services are not discriminatory or are not based on health status, race, ethnicity, age, sex, sexuality, disability, language, religion, national origin, income, or social status.

Guarantee of Social and Economic Justice

The social and economic rights are located in Articles 16 and 22 through 27 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. These rights were further articulated in the 1966 International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR). In 1948, many nations were signatories to the nonbinding Universal Declaration of Human Rights, but some nations have not ratified the ICESCR.

In keeping with the UDHR and ICESCR, this entry treats social and economic justice as an attempt made by the countries of the world to recognize social and economic rights as inalienable human rights. These articles also put social and economic rights into global perspective and illustrated the interdependence between social and economic rights and social and economic justice.

Social and economic justice ensure that individuals irrespective of differences are able to meet their basic needs. The table shows international agreements that guarantee social and economic justice.

Priority for Social and Economic Justice

The state has to identify and prioritize groups of people that suffer social and economic injustice. State efforts must be geared toward adequately addressing such injustice by promoting social welfare and conditions for the enthronement of social and economic justice. It is the major concern of the state to make provisions for the following vulnerable populations in society: children, women, and family; the elderly and people with disabilities; indigenous people; and refugees and people affected by conflict. It is the responsibility of national governments to shoulder the responsibility for making social and economic justice a reality. Governments must recognize people's rights; they must not violate these rights; they must protect people's social and economic rights.

States hold it as a responsibility to act beyond their borders to respect, protect, and fulfill social and economic justice. These duties extend to the obligations they take by involving other organizations such as religious organizations, community groups, organized private sectors, state and local governments, United Nations bodies such as the World Bank, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the International Monetary Fund, and nongovernmental organizations including Oxfam, Rotary, Red Cross, and so on.

Ever since Roosevelt's presidency, the United States has sought to respond to economic and social needs with new policies. These have included health insurance programs, Social Security insurance, unemployment insurance, public works projects, farm support, expanded educational opportunities, and laws supporting worker rights to organize and strike. Other nations, such as Sweden and Denmark, seek to promote both clusters of rights through the establishment of social welfare states along with many of the new nations in Africa and Asia, created since the end of World War II.

However, across the globe, it is evident that we are far from achieving the goals of justice and human dignity for all. There have been social movements toward democratization in many parts of the world, with elected leaders replacing dictators. There have been advances in education, health care, and sanitation. Nevertheless, among the 4.4 billion people who live in developing countries, three-fifths still have no access to basic sanitation, almost one-third are without safe drinking water, one-quarter lack adequate housing, one-fifth live beyond the reach of modern health services, one-fifth of the children do not reach grade five in school, and one-fifth are undernourished.

Achieving Social and Economic Justice

It is most likely for a society to achieve social and economic justice if there is a redistribution of social and economic wealth. It is the constitutional responsibility of a national government to meet the basic needs of its citizens. Most of the conflict around the world today is rooted in the inability of the government to actualize the provision of social and economic needs for the people. Education is social heritage through which a sound mind is developed and a society develops over time. Inequality in education could be redressed by making education compulsory and free at all levels for a period of time until the world economy bounces back. It is also possible to achieve education justice through scholarship and loans for indigent students and women. Food security is a pressing right in the world today. It is essential that a nation's budget includes enough funding to support agriculture and subsidies for food. State programs should include immediate food assistance; many families and children have become victims to rampaging hunger, and it may demoralize them for the rest of their lives. Food insecurity diminishes an individual's ability to lead a dignified life. Social and economic justice in the area of food security are achievable if governments could come up with effective legislation that will ensure that food insecurity does not remain a threat.

Home is very essential to family's security and development. Housing injustice is a basic abuse of human rights. Many families and individuals have become homeless because of the economic downturn. Homelessness has been on the increase over the last two decades, particularly among families with children. Government and nongovernmental organizations must be able to provide alternative shelter for those who have lost their homes because of their inability to pay rent or mortgage. Assistance must be provided to keep some rental units operating, which limits the number of households becoming homeless. Low-income households continue to struggle to secure accommodations for themselves and their families. There must be a sufficient housing stock or housing vouchers. Housing should not be above people's capacity so that thousands will not be living on the streets, bedding with friends and family, or living in their cars. Low-cost (green housing) for those with the least economic power would serve as a means of providing healthy and livable housing and to preserve a healthy ecosystem. To achieve social justice, governments can partner with the National Housing Trust Fund with the support of UNHabitat to provide portable housing for people.

Social economic justice also includes reduction in poverty, income security, and safety. Welfare programs should be initiated to provide security to families through income, support, and refundable tax credits. Other facilities that promote social and economic justice are the provision of Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program Funds and the Supplementary Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP).

Also, Medicaid for the most vulnerable, including the elderly and women, must be made available.

Inequality in the distribution of employment could lead to frustration and debasement of human dignity and freedom. Social and economic justice need to be provided to eliminate job creation by proxy and discrimination based on age, sex, family background, gender, disability, and other extraneous factors. Employers of labor must be ready to pay a living wage for all workers. Wages that allow workers to provide for themselves and their families will reduce social economic imbalances. Job creation is another important aspect of social and economic creation.

Social and economic justice through provision of employment should include sick leave, unemployment insurance, and equal pay for women and men. Work sharing could also reduce job inequality. Work sharing enables employers to cut back the hours of employee rather than firing them altogether. Social and economic justice among nations is also important with respect to a nation's sovereignty and equity at the international level. Social and economic justice enthrone fair trade policies among countries. Bilateral and regional agreements form the basis of international trade. Balance of currency exchange is another phenomenon in economic injustice at the international level. Injustice, imbalance, discrimination, inequality, conflict, and economic problems make social and economic justice difficult. Social and economic justice promote progressive human services if they are based on the principle of all-inclusiveness.

Olakunle Folami
University of Ulster

See Also: Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Equal Pay Act of 1963; Homelessness; Medicaid.

Further Readings

Amnesty International. "Economic, Social and Cultural Rights." http://www.amnesty.org/en/economic-social-and-cultural-rights (Accessed June 2013).

California Community United Initiative. "Economic Justice Legislation 2013." http://www.calcomui.org/economicjusticeissues.html (Accessed June 2013).

National Economic and Social Rights Initiative. "Social and Economic Rights." http://www.nesri.org/human-rights (Accessed June 2013).

New Israel Fund. "Social Economic Justice Project." http://www.newisraelfund.org.uk/what-we-do/ (Accessed June 2013).

Polack, Robert J. "Social Justice and the Global Economy: New Challenges for Social Work in the 21st Century." Social Work, v.49/2 (2003).

Shiman, David, ed. Economic and Social Justice: A Human Rights Perspective. Minneapolis, MN: Human Rights Resource Center, 1999.

Social Capital, Role of

At the core of the concept of social capital is the notion that, like financial capital (e.g., savings and financial investments), physical capital (e.g., real estate and tools), or human capital (e.g., education and training), the exchange of resources between individuals affiliated in social networks (i.e., social capital) holds value.

Social capital facilitates accomplishment of goals. Social workers' pursuit of social and economic justice, community empowerment, and ultimately a state of social welfare make social capital a particularly useful concept. This entry focuses on three main definitions of social capital mapped onto ecological levels of meso, macro, and micro.

Meso-Level Definition

The exploration of the role of social capital really began after J. Coleman popularized the concept among social scientists, celebrating the concept's ability to bridge the level of large social structures and individual decision making, providing a mechanism too frequently missing from analysis that focuses on one or the other level. Social capital is a resource embedded in the relations between members of communities, invisible but valuable for easing pursuits. Coleman's understanding of social capital illuminates the conditions that give rise to these exchanges of resources.

Social networks are created through interactions among individuals, and social networks with closure create social capital. The concept of closure in social networks is best explained with an illustration. If a child has a link of friendship with another child, it is much easier for either of the youths to lie to their parents about engaging in forbidden activity if the respective children's parents are not themselves linked. Yet once communication is established among all the individuals (most importantly between the respective children's parents), the resulting network closure enables parents to verify their children's claims about their activity. In communities where ties among individuals are based on regular meetings in different contexts (e.g., persons are connected through work, leisure, and church), increased surveillance capability and the resulting sanctions and praise for adoption of community norms can be applied to ever-more subtle behaviors. The importance of network closure for the enforcement of social norms is often evident in remote vacation settings.

A church in Ware, Massachusetts. Institutions such as churches, clubs, and schools are important for the emergence of the types of connections that create social capital.

In communities with social network closure, it becomes more economical for the individual to share resources. With the norm of reciprocity, each favor an actor grants in times of surplus functions as credit toward favors in times of need. Information is the chief resource exchanged as, frequently, it is the easiest to give and otherwise difficult for the recipient to find. Other resources that can be shared include tangible goods and services, even emotional support.

Social capital is understood here as a community resource because it is inherent in the quality of the connections among persons, not owned by any person. When social capital exists, individuals can derive considerable benefit from the exchanges, even if they expended no effort to create these networks per se. For these reasons, institutions (e.g., schools, clubs, or churches) are important for the emergence of such connections. Individuals meeting for a different purpose will typically have conversations that lead to the exchange of resources. For instance, parents chatting while dropping off children in day care could decide to carpool and exchange sleepovers, both of which could free up the parents for other activities. As a communal commodity, social capital is difficult to create but easy to destroy. Because it inheres in social ties, the departure of a particularly active member of a parent–teacher association or the closing of a local bar can dissolve social capital for the members associated with either organization. For any one person to create links among individuals would cost more effort than potential gain from the exchanges.

It is important to note that the concept of social capital as facilitation of activity does not presume that the activities in question necessarily benefit the larger society. For instance, terrorist acts by an individual frequently depend on resources drawn from persons returning favors. It is also possible for the dynamics of social capital to negatively affect individuals. In situations of resource scarcity, community members may benefit from sharing resources to get by. Yet for any member who suddenly gains more resources, the pressure to share with those in need could frustrate attempts to escape poverty. Both examples illustrate negative social capital.

Macro

Nevertheless, the major thrust of social capital research evaluates amelioration of social problems. Perhaps the most famous of these is Robert Putnam's attempt to link social capital to regional or national economic gains. He measures social capital as levels of trust in government and civic participation. Trust in institutions reduces transaction costs; transactions are expensive if trust is not enforceable except through legalistic means. Civic participation is similarly important because participating in local organizations and clubs gives diverse individuals opportunities to interact, in turn leading to exchange of resources and information across social classes. Putnam brought the concept of social capital to popular attention with his book Bowling Alone, where he argued that historically low national stocks of social capital foreshadow serious economic problems. Putnam's research was widely cited in international community development.

Micro

Although Coleman popularized the concept of social capital in social science and Putnam to the popular imagination, the term's initial development is credited to P. Bourdieu. He used the concept to explain that resource accrual results in otherwise invisible individual advantage. Bourdieu's micro-level definition of social capital posits social capital as a fungible entity that tends to reproduce itself. This fungibility is evident when parents use money (i.e., financial capital) to purchase their children's education (i.e., human capital) in schools where other parents have access to resources (creating social capital). Elite schools also shape children's tastes and mannerisms (i.e., cultural capital), marking their belonging to a specific class. Consciously or not, gatekeepers to resources (e.g., potential employers) use this information to decide among potential candidates. Indeed, information about a job opening is likely a function of social capital. At that moment, it becomes evident how capital in its many forms tends to reproduce itself and facilitates accumulation of resources for those who already have resources.

Conclusion

The concept of social capital holds particular utility for social workers. For instance, the expense of creating social capital for individuals illuminates the importance of the community organizer's appropriation of existing networks to build a community's political power. The term can be used to explain inequity and to argue for the larger economic benefit of civic participation. Yet the theory is not without criticism. Critics complain its widespread application renders the term confusing and self-contradictory. Coleman's social capital blinds readers to the importance of socially just resource distribution because it insinuates that resources magically materialize. Bourdieu's micro-level use is seen as overly deterministic. Putnam's measures of social capital are seen as better substituted with economic inequality, which could provide a better fit with national economic health. While social workers need to be aware of the concept's limitations, the widespread development of research on the topic makes it necessary for wider dissemination than currently exists.

Joanna Doran
California State University, Los Angeles

See Also: Social and Economic Justice; Social Innovation; Socioeconomic Status.

Further Readings

Bourdieu, P. "The Forms of Capital." In J. G. Richardson, ed. Handbook of Theory and Research for the Sociology of Education. New York: Greenwood, 1986.
Coleman, J. "Social Capital in the Creation of Human Capital." American Journal of Sociology, v.94 (1988).
Portes, A. "Social Capital: Its Origins and Applications in Modern Sociology." Annual Review of Sociology, v.24 (1998).
Putnam, R. D. Bowling Alone: The Collapse and Revival of American Community. Toronto, Canada: Simon and Schuster, 2000.

Social Darwinism

The term Social Darwinism refers to the use of Darwinian evolutionary theory in combination with social and political theory to address human evolution. In other words, a theory that describes how natural selection works to explain how animals adapt to their environments was used to describe how humans adapt to the social environment. The development of Social Darwinism led to the growth of eugenics, where humans were divided into social and ethnic groups and compared for adaptive fit to the social environment. Conversely, Social Darwinism was also used to explain how people could be altruistic and caring of each other, even when that meant there was no benefit (or even harm) to themselves. Thus, Social Darwinism has been a controversial subject over the past century and into the 21st century.

In the mid-19th century, Charles Darwin discussed his theory of evolution by using the principles of natural selection and describing how animals adapt to the environment. In his view, animals would either adapt to the specific conditions of the environment in which they lived and survive long enough to have offspring or fail to adapt and not survive long enough to have progeny. His theory was based on the assumptions that either resources were scarce or that the population was too large for the available resources, creating a struggle to survive.

When there is a struggle to survive, an individual animal that develops a physical trait that is more adaptive to a specific environmental feature might survive longer and thus pass on that trait to a new generation. In time, a species could develop particular traits that are most adaptive to the environment, creating distinct traits or even a new type of animal.

Charles Darwin gave the example of finches that shared the resource of cactus plants by developing different beaks. One set of finches developed long, thin beaks to reach past the thorns to pierce the tough skin of the cactus and obtain pulp. Another set of finches developed shorter, more-robust beaks to eat insects and pulp off of the bottom of the cactus. Considering this example, principles of natural selection and the adaptation of a species depend upon environmental niches that can be exploited by animals living in that environment and are very specific to the needs of the animal and the place within the environment where the animal's needs can be met

The term survival of the fittest was coined by Spencer Herbert, an early supporter of the Theory of Evolution, to describe this struggle to adapt to the environment to survive. Charles Darwin later used this term in his own writings. Today, however, the term survival of the fittest is typically taken to mean that only the strongest, swiftest, and most intelligent survive and has been used in human populations with disastrous consequences.

As seen in the previous example, the survival of the fittest actually refers to the ability of an animal to adapt to a specific environmental situation or niche. Therefore, it is conceivable that there are animals that have adapted to survive because they are slower, weaker, or less intelligent. Instead of an active struggle to survive, animals exploit openings in the environment to survive long enough to pass their traits on to the next generation.

In the late 19th century to the mid-20th century, Social Darwinism was used to identify what traits in humans were considered to be more adaptive and desirable. This led to the development of eugenics, as proposed by Francis Galton. Eugenics supported the concept that a racial or ethnic group of people will be more likely to survive if they identify and address those within their group who are not suited for survival. Thus, those with genetic disorders, physical disabilities, or mental disorders would be seen as not suited for, at the very least, procreation and, possibly, survival at all. This led to the sterilization or death of many who were seen as "subhuman" during that time.

Conversely, Social Darwinism has also been used to explain prosocial behaviors in humans. For example, Richard Dawkins proposed that humans would do things that were dangerous to themselves to help others (altruistic behavior) because there was an evolutionary benefit to that behavior. Humans, being of the same species, would want to promote the continued survival of other humans. In a similar vein, an individual would be willing to sacrifice his or her survival for the continued survival of their species. This would explain why some people are willing to rush into a dangerous situation to save others.

In conclusion, Social Darwinism was developed on Charles Darwin's principles of adaptation and natural selection and used to explain how humans have adapted as social and political entities. When based upon a misunderstanding of Darwinian theory, Social Darwinism was used to develop the pseudoscience of eugenics (the concept of survival of the fittest being used inappropriately). However, Social Darwinism has also been used to explain human behaviors that do not seem to be survival oriented, such as altruism.

Mardi K. Fallon
University of Cincinnati

See Also: Blue Vein Society/Paper Bag Test; Coca-Colonization; Diversity in the Workplace; Hate Groups; Holocaust Survivors; Intelligence Testing; Racism, Long-Term Effects of.

Further Readings

Darwin, Charles. On the Origin of Species. London: John Murray, 1859.

Dawkins, Richard. The Selfish Gene. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Galton, Francis. "Eugenics: Its Definition, Scope, and Aims." The American Journal of Sociology, v.X/1 (1904).

Gould, Stephen J. The Mismeasurement of Man. New York: W. W. Norton and Co., 1981.
Spencer, Herbert. Principles of Biology. University Press of the Pacific, 2002.

Social Determinants of Health

Social determinants of health provide a bridge between social conditions and health disparities. They incorporate societal conditions and psychosocial factors that have proven both a direct and indirect impact on an individual's and community's health outcomes. They can be categorized in a number of different ways; however, they commonly include the following five elements: (1) biological factors, (2) individual behaviors, (3) the social environment, (4) the built environment, and (5) health services. Social determinants of health have become the keys to understanding health disparities and inequities and provided the keys to creating holistic health programs that can effectively create new vectors of health equity. Principles of social justice seek to influence the inequitable distribution of social health determinants in order to address health disparities and poor health outcomes.

Biology—Genetic Health Determinants

Biological factors include gender, race, ethnicity, and genetic predisposition. Biology by itself does not determine health outcomes but does create increased risk factors for many chronic diseases as well as influences behaviors, the social and built environments, and access to health care. There is no denying that genetic predisposition increases risk. However, the risk factors do not guarantee the presence of a disease, but in concert with the other social determinants of health disparities, are clearly identified across many of the biological strata and therefore can be utilized in creating health equity within race, ethnicity, and gender.

Individual Behaviors

A person's or community's health behaviors contribute to overall quality of life and health outcomes. Behaviors can either act as risk or protective factors, and the interplay between behaviors and the other social health determinants contribute to health disparities or health equity. Behaviors such as illicit drug use, sedentary lifestyles, and high-stress lifestyles can increase the chances of chronic disease and poor health outcomes. Conversely, health-promoting behaviors such as maintaining a low-fat diet, attaining education, and utilizing disease prevention measures can decrease the risk of poor health outcomes.

Social Environment

The social environment defines the conditions in which a person is born and lives and impacts the overall quality of life. It includes social norms, socioeconomic status (SES), employment, and exposure to social advantages and or impairments such as economic privilege, racism, sexism, and prejudice. Social and cultural norms shape a person's or community's perceptions, behaviors, and beliefs and therefore can increase or reduce risk of disease and impact health outcomes. Low SES, or poverty, has been established to be a direct correlate to a lower quality of life and poor health outcomes. The social environment impacts the ability to attain education, achieve financial stability, and have access to goods and services, as well as how a person perceives his or her personal abilities, roles within the community, and the treatment he or she receives.

The Built Environment

The built environment encompasses location, type and quality of housing, the presence of crime and violence, as well as the physical quality of the environment. The built environment influences a person's behaviors, quality of life, and level of risk. Where a person can live is often determined by SES; however, the quality and safety of the living environment has a distinct impact on health outcomes. In low-income communities, financial instability, increased exposure to violence, and reduced access to goods and services impact the quality of life and health outcomes. Furthermore, environmental toxins such as air, water, and noise pollution also contribute to the risk of disease, have negative impacts on health outcomes, and contribute to health disparities.

Health Services

Access and quality of health services are critical to achieving and maintaining health. As with all the other social determinants of health, access to good, quality health care is largely dependent of the other determinants of health. This includes cultural competency in health care, the ability to travel to where services are offered, as well as the ability to afford to receive medical treatment and attain prescribed drugs and treatments. Racism, cost, and location all prove to inhibit receiving health care and therefore can contribute to poor health outcomes and health disparities.

Marya L. Shegog
University of Nevada

See Also: Health Care, Disparities in; Health Disparities, Role of; Quality of Life, Measurement of; Social and Economic Justice; Socioeconomic Status.

Further Readings

Moskowitz, D., E. Vittinghoff, and L. Schmidt, "Reconsidering the Effects of Poverty and Social Support on Health: A 5-Year Longitudinal Test of the Stress-Buffering Hypothesis." Journal of Urban Health, 2013.

Ramirez, L. K., E. Baker, and M. Metzler. Promoting Health Equity: A Resource to Help Communities Address Social Determinants of Health. Department of Health and Human Services, Editor. 2008, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Atlanta.

World Health Organization (WHO). What are social determinants of health? http://www.who.int/social_determinants/sdh_definition/en/index.html (Accessed April 2013).

Social Epidemiology

In 2013, the World Health Organization defined epidemiology as "the study of the distribution and determinants of health-related states or events (including disease) and the application of this study to the control of diseases and other health problems."

Social epidemiology studies the various social, economic, cultural, or political factors that affect both disease and health. Modern social epidemiology goes beyond simply using social factors to understand the spread of disease to suggest that inequities in socioeconomic and political structures can and should be altered to reduce social inequalities in health care. As a professional discipline, it borrows from sociology, psychology, medicine, education, political philosophy, cultural studies, and anthropology. Those who engage in social epidemiology, whether doctors, nurses, sociologists, educators, or other professionals, are influencing policies and programs that provide human services to diverse client populations.

Even when a germ (virus or bacteria) is the principal cause of a disease, social factors may influence exposure to the pathogen, subsequent treatment access, and eventual outcomes. It addition, today we recognize many illnesses such as heart disease, obesity, diabetes, and asthma that are related to heredity, lifestyle, and environment. These exist in the absence of any pathogen, although they may make an individual more susceptible to infectious disease, accelerating disease progress and severity while impeding treatment.

Nancy Krieger suggests all epidemiology is social epidemiology because all human beings exist within a social context, thus affecting the spread, distribution, treatment, and outcomes of all illnesses. Psychosocial epidemiology adds focus to both psychological and social concepts to studying human responses to and patterns of disease. Psychological stress or the lack of psychological coping skills affects the outcomes of disease. Chronic and acute stressors can alter a person's susceptibility to or ability to cope with illness. In addition, certain dysfunctional behaviors such as substance abuse, disordered eating, and risky sexual behaviors are detrimental to health. Social capital, the connectedness of individuals to others within their social network, and the development of psychological coping mechanisms can influence health by affecting norms that support healthy behaviors and improving the social bonds of society to reduce and deal with stressors.

A Brief History

Social scientists have long been interested in the social factors associated with disease and health. Before the discovery of germs, various social and environmental factors were thought to cause disease.

Louis René Villermé (1782–1963), a French physician, used the census data of Paris to demonstrate that mortality rates were higher in poorer neighborhoods. Frederick Engels (1820–95), a German social scientist and political philosopher, in his work The Condition of the Working-Class in England (1885), described the effect of industrialization on health and the effects of childhood deprivation on later adult health. He demonstrated that, in large, industrial cities, mortality from small pox, measles, and scarlet fever was higher than in rural communities and that rates rose as communities shifted from agricultural to industrial economies. In his classic work Suicide (1897), Émile Durkheim (1858–1917), a French sociologist, studied the effects of social factors such as religion, gender, and nationality on suicide rates.

John Snow (1813–1858), an English physician, is considered one of the founders of modern epidemiology. He traced the spread of cholera in the Soho neighborhood of London in 1954. As modern epidemiologists still do today, he mapped the cases of cholera within the community and determined that the source of the illness was a contaminated water pump. It was after Louis Pasteur (1822–1895), a French chemist and microbiologist, demonstrated that microorganisms caused disease that epidemiologists began to focus on identifying the spread of organisms called germs, the newly understood cause of illnesses.

Diversity and Social Epidemiology

Social epidemiologists focus on diversity within populations and the effects these have on the frequency, progress, and treatment of disease such as socioeconomic disparities, poverty, and deprivation; gender, race, ethnicity, sexuality, and the effects of discrimination; and social justice and human rights issues. Biological expressions of social inequality reflect the effects of the economic and social disparities on peoples' health, access to care, and treatment options and outcomes.

Diversity plays a role in the establishment and maintenance of poverty throughout the world. Poverty can facilitate the progression of disease by exposing people to dangerous living conditions such as contaminated water or poor sanitation, to the pathogens that thrive in these conditions, and to animals that can host them such as rodents, birds, or insects. Once infected, access to and quality of health care are related to socioeconomic factors such as one's ability to pay, access, and discriminatory practices. The ability to pay for care may be tied to one's employment, public welfare status, or age-related entitlements.

The spread of acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) provides a good example of the intersecting bio-psycho-social factors that facilitate disease progression and impede treatment. While AIDS may have existed in remote areas in Africa during the 1960s and 1970s, it was first identified in the United States among gay men in the early 1980s; soon cases began to show up in intravenous drug users and hemophiliacs who were not gay, heterosexual women, and newborns. The situation worsened in Africa among heterosexual men and women. By 1985, an antibody test was developed to detect the virus and the first anti-human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) drugs, azidothymidine (AZT) or zidovudine, became available in 1987.

Cultural beliefs and social inequality prevented a timely response to the developing epidemic. Stigma and homophobia prevented many men who have sex with men (MSM), not all of whom self-identified as gay, from being tested; they continued to engage in high-risk sexual behaviors. Intravenous drug users (IVDUs), many of whom lived in poverty, continued to share needles and were hard to reach through traditional public health efforts. It was illegal in some municipalities to create needle exchange programs or even to provide information on needle cleaning. IVDUs who were better educated or who had economic resources may not have shared needles. Beliefs that school-age children did not engage in sexual activities prevented the implementation of school-based programs until it became apparent that teenagers were becoming infected. Heterosexual women in patriarchal cultures could not ask their husbands about their extramarital sexual exploits and became infected, as did their children. Language barriers, illiteracy, and social taboos about sex and death prevented many from learning about AIDS. Prostitutes, who are viewed as fallen women, are more at risk of being infected than infecting their customers yet were targeted as vectors, or carriers, of the disease. High-risk immigrant populations, especially those who were undocumented and feared deportation, did not get tested or have access to treatment. Institutional homophobia, sexism, racism, ethnocentrism, and ageism prevented legislation from providing full access to prevention and treatment. The various stigmas and taboos associated with HIV/AIDS impeded an adequate public health response and clearly demonstrated how social disparities facilitated the progression of disease and restricted access to health care.

Human Services and Social Epidemiology

Social epidemiologists are human services professionals working on the macro level to provide the knowledge and data necessary to understand bio-psycho-social factors affecting health and wellness in communities. This work has implications for improving service delivery, designing prevention and outreach efforts, and supporting legislative action. The focus on social disparities supports social justice initiatives to eradicate inequalities in society that affect all people's health and welfare.

Adele Weiner
Metropolitan College of New York
Kim Lorber
Ramapo College of New Jersey

See Also: Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Communicable Diseases Common in Developing Countries; Chronic Diseases Common in Developing Countries; Poverty.

Further Readings

Berkman, Lisa F. and Ichiro Kawachi, eds. Social Epidemiology. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Krieger, Nancy. "A Glossary for Social Epidemiology." The Journal of Epidemiology and Community Health, v.55 (2001).

World Health Organization. "Epidemiology." http://www.who.int/topics/epidemiology/en (Accessed January 2014).

Social Innovation

Social innovations (SI) are emerging in several fields, especially at the intersection of sectors (public, private, and nonprofit) and disciplines. Ideas and resources flow freely between sectors and disciplines to allow SI. SI in human services meet social needs in unprecedented ways, and the reasons for their growth—particularly health care, social services, and education—are varied. Increasing diversity in populations across the globe and complexity of social issues warrant innovative approaches. Practitioners in all fields require skills to think outside the box and creatively address endemic social issues in their communities.

SI focuses on new ideas—products, services, processes, and models—that address or prevent social issues in effective and sustainable ways. They create social impact through social change and add social value to a community. Concepts often associated with SI are social entrepreneurship, social enterprise, and socially minded business. Although social entrepreneurs are individuals or groups of individuals who launch a social innovation using business skills to enable social impact in a financially viable fashion, social enterprise and socially minded businesses may not always implement socially innovative initiatives.

Although the latter organizations have social missions, their mechanisms for implementing the missions may not be innovative in nature. As the topic of SI is fairly new to the field of human services, illustrations of SI, descriptions of reasons for growth in SI, an explanation of processes and skills surrounding SI, and a survey of leading institutions that teach SI can be helpful to human services professionals who are considering professional development opportunities.

Social Innovation Illustrations

Illustrations of SI are evident in education, microfinance, child welfare, and food services. Charter schools, such as the Green Dot management organization of charter schools, are attempting to transform Los Angeles's educational community by employing innovative teaching methods. Similarly, the Teach for America program is attempting to bring highly qualified teachers to inner cities to improve the quality of education. Kiva.org is the world's first person-to-person microlending Web site to connect people online and assist entrepreneurs who live below the poverty line in third world countries to access capital, launch their businesses, and rise out of poverty. Rising Star Outreach, a U.S. nonprofit organization, provides loans to individuals afflicted by leprosy in 46 leprosy colonies in south India to start their own business, and live with dignity instead of panhandling to sustain themselves. Childline is a child rights service in India designed for children living on the streets, child laborers working in the unorganized sector, and sexually abused children. A child in any distress—in a situation with abuse, assault, abandonment, acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS), jaundice, and so on—calls a toll-free number, and he or she is immediately referred to an appropriate organization for long-term care and follow-up. Finally, D.C. Central Kitchen uses food as a tool to strengthen and sustain communities. It provides food preparation training to disenfranchised populations (populations that are homeless) distributes the meals they prepare, and partners with local farmers to access organic produce, all with the goal of effectively addressing poverty, hunger, and homelessness. Several other illustrations exist in economic development, health care delivery, and human rights.

Reasons for Growth of Social Innovation

With increasing devolution of services provided by the federal government, questions about accountability and impact of social and human services, growing diversity of populations served by human services professionals, and growing competition for public and philanthropic funds, practitioners in community-based agencies are being called upon to creatively address endemic issues and create sustainable change in communities. Especially when programs don't eradicate social issues but merely provide so-called band-aids, professionals need to think outside the box to create the desired social impact in communities. Global poverty, climate change, and chronic diseases are complex problems that require interdisciplinary thinking and cross-sector collaborations—which frequently generate SI. Often, perceived failures and desperation for change are engines for innovation, and today, social media has made it easier for like-minded individuals to galvanize their innovations.

Social Innovation Process and Skills

SI is not linear or sequential but iterative and simultaneous. It involves understanding an issue in a fashion such that the root cause of the problem—not the symptoms—are tackled. Social innovators creatively design interventions, drawing insights and experiences from a wide range of sources. These ideas can be tested on an informal basis or more formally through prototypes and pilots. This process of trying the idea, then modifying to make alternations based on results, is iterative. Ensuring financial, environmental, and impact sustainability is the next step in this process. The ultimate goal of SI is system change.

SI does not occur overnight but requires thorough assessment from various angles and perspectives, careful listening, exceptional analytical abilities, frequent reflection, and collaboration. It involves inviting earnest participation of final beneficiaries for generating ideas for SI and thinking differently from the past. Resource development skills are important to tap funds for launching the innovative ideas. Finally, competencies for working across sectors—public, private, and civil—to create systems change are essential.

Educating for Social Innovation

University campuses across the globe are inspiring and training students from all fields to develop solutions to the world's most-pressing social problems. Although most education and training for SI is occurring in business school, several centers, initiatives, master's, minors, and certificate programs exist for this purpose as well. The Dell Social Innovation Challenge at The University of Texas, Center for Social Innovation at Stanford, Impact Entrepreneurs at Portland State University, Ashoka U at Brown University, Skandalaris Center for Entrepreneurial Studies at Washington University in St. Louis, and the Center for the Advancement of Social Entrepreneurs at Duke University are among some of the other institutions known for supporting and nurturing SI spirit among college students.

Monica Nandan
Kennesaw State University

See Also: Health Promotion Services; Interprofessional and Interdisciplinary Practice; Rural Communities; War on Poverty Programs.

Further Readings

Bornstein, David. How to Change the World: Social Entrepreneurs and the Power of New Ideas. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Goldsmith, Stephen. The Power of Social Innovation: How Civic Entrepreneurs Ignite Community Networks for Good. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2010.

Stanford Social Innovation Review. http://www.ssireview.org (Accessed September 2013).

Social Security, Services Funded by Services funded by the Social Security Administration include a variety of means-tested and work-based universal programs and benefits in areas such as retirement, disability and injury, public health, income security, and survivor's insurance. While these services do much to provide income support to millions of Americans, many groups have been systematically excluded from eligibility or access, such as African Americans, gays and lesbians, and people in isolated communities. Additionally, there are dimensions of Social Security that work against female caregivers in favor of a male or occupational model. Over time, amendments and legal decisions have contributed to greater inclusivity.

With a foundation in the Mother's Pensions of the 1910s, Social Security was born during the depths of the Great Depression. At that time, the Committee on Economic Security was tasked with creating a bill to ensure economic security through unemployment and old age supports. Their 1934 report was the foundation of the 1935 Social Security Act, which called for a variety of social insurance, social assistance, and public health and social services programs. In its nascent stage, Social Security was comprised of cash payments to the unemployed and elderly.

Over time, both the scope and range of Social Security grew. In 1939, benefits were extended to wives of retired male workers as well as surviving wives and surviving children of deceased male workers. The mid-1950s saw a rapid expansion of Social Security with the introduction of disability-related insurance for permanently and severely disabled workers between the ages of 50 and 64, known as Supplemental Security Disability Insurance (SSDI). This was later expanded to all disabled workers under the age of 65. Another milestone came in 1972, with the cost-of-living allowance (COLA) and the introduction of Supplemental Security Income (SSI). The 1990s and 2000s saw unsuccessful efforts to privatize Social Security.

A major debate in the history of Social Security is the extent to which African Americans were intentionally and systematically excluded during its early years. The Committee on Economic Security originally recommended a program that would cover nearly all workers, but the Social Security Act was written with an exclusion of agricultural and domestic workers, which de facto left out large numbers of African Americans. At that time, Congress was controlled by white, southern Democrats, and it is argued that President Franklin D. Roosevelt capitulated to their interests. In 1950, coverage was extended to domestic and farmworkers.

The official name of what is commonly known as Social Security is Old-Age, Survivor's, and Disability Insurance (OASDI). OASDI does not include many federal assistance programs such as welfare (Temporary Assistance for Needy Families) or food stamps (Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program). This large program covers 94 percent of Americans and comprises 37 percent of government expenditure and 7 percent of the U.S. gross domestic product. In 2013, 61.9 million people received benefits.

Unlike social assistance programs, which require a means test and target people with limited income and assets, most Social Security programs are social insurance programs compulsory for the working population. Most workers pay a Federal Insurance Contributions Act (FICA) tax, or income tax, a contribution of 7.65 percent paid by an employee (or 15.3 percent if the person is self-employed) for OASDI and Medicare.

There are five types of benefits offered through OASDI: retirement insurance, disability insurance and assistance, survivor's insurance, worker's compensation, and Medicare. Retirement benefits available through OASDI are based on a formula that considers earnings and amount of time contributing to the fund through workforce participation. Change to the age at which Social Security retirement benefits commence, such as increasing the age of eligibility, may compel people to stay in the workplace longer. Because white-collar workers are more likely to live longer overall and earn higher wages, they can contribute to private retirement programs to supplement Social Security. For African American women age 62 and older, Social Security payments are the leading source of income over assets, earnings, and other retirement programs and represent the biggest factor buffering this group from poverty. Social Security-based retirement equalizes the distribution of income among poor, elderly people on all levels except gender.

The Social Security Administration provides two types of benefits for disabled people. The first is SSDI, which covers workers in the event of a physical or mental disability expected to last at least a year or result in death. The federal government works with state government to establish eligibility and process applications, usually resulting in a waiting period of up to five months. People who receive SSDI are eligible for Medicare benefits. The other form of benefit is SSI, a program consisting of monthly cash payments for low-resourced adults who are disabled, blind, or 65 or older, and disabled or blind children. Unlike SSDI, SSI is a means-tested program for people who lack a significant work history. The two can work in tandem, as SSI supplements SSDI, establishing a greater safety net particularly for poor, elderly people.

Worker's compensation provides health services in the event a person is injured during the course of work. This entitlement is restricted to legal workers, and undocumented laborers and people working in the informal economy, who despite of being at risk for an on-the-job injury, are not legally covered by the program.

Recent technological developments in how Social Security benefits are disbursed have streamlined the process for many but have had unintended consequences. In 2013, the Social Security Administration began to require that monthly checks be automatically deposited into the checking accounts of recipients. Advertised as safe, quick, and convenient, this has created problems for people without bank accounts or without access to banks. It is estimated that 5 percent of the U.S. population is unbanked. For people who are geographically isolated from banks, such as Native Americans living on large, rural reservations, accessing benefits is difficult.

As of 2013, Latinos are the fastest-growing segment of the older adult population in the United States. Social Security is a particularly important source of income for older Latinos because it is their sole or primary sources of income in retirement. Without Social Security, more than half of older Latinos would live in poverty. Older Latinos have distinct demographic and economic characteristics that make their reliance on Social Security critical, such as high marriage rates.

Social Security retirement is designed for a male breadwinner, female, and child dependent family model. Women's employment histories tend to be interrupted by caregiving responsibilities to children, which results in fewer years paying into the Social Security system. Child rearing, as a contribution from the working-age population, is penalized while occupational attainment is rewarded. A solution to this problem would be to give direct benefits to women by supporting the cost of child rearing (family allowance, birth grants, and maternity or paternity leave).

In 2013, the Supreme Court decided that Section 3 of the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) was illegal. In response, the Social Security Administration has agreed to process retirement spouse claims for same-sex couples married in a state or tribal nation that accepts legal same-sex marriage.

Mary Caplan
University of Georgia, Athens

See Also: Social Security Administration; War on Poverty Programs; Welfare Reform, Role of.

Further Readings

Abel, S. L. "Social Security Retirement Benefits: The Last Insult of a Sexist Society." Family and Conciliation Courts Review, v.36/1 (1998).
Berkowitz, E. D. "The Historical Development of Social Security in the United States." In E. R. Kingson and J. H. Schulz, eds. Social Security in the 21st Century. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.
Constance-Huggins, M. "A Review of the Racial Biases of Social Welfare Policies." Journal of Human Behavior in the Social Environment, v.21/8 (2011).
Lieberman, R. C. Shaping Race Policy: The United States in Comparative Perspective. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2007.

Social Security Administration

The Social Security Administration pays out benefits to nearly 60 million Americans. These payouts have been credited with reducing elderly poverty since the late 1930s and early 1940s. However, current Social Security benefits may not be sustainable for much longer. In 20 years, the trust fund will be depleted if projections hold. The Social Security Administration has more than 65,000 employees located in many places: in the Baltimore, Maryland, area, where it is headquartered; throughout the United States, and in American embassies throughout the world. Social Security Administration employees process claims, determine eligibility of benefit applicants, and maintain data on those who pay into the system and those who receive benefits. The forerunner of the Social Security Administration was created during the Great Depression by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. The Social Security Administration's history, which is discussed next, has shaped the organization into what it is today.

History

The Social Security Act of 1935, which President Roosevelt signed into law on August 14, 1935, was the signature legislative achievement of the New Deal. However, the Social Security Administration itself was not established until after World War II, during President Harry S. Truman's first term.

Proposals for government-sponsored social insurance had been circulating among progressive politicians throughout the early decades of the 20th century, and some states enacted such laws. As governor of New York, Roosevelt himself was a proponent of providing income security to mitigate the economic hardships of disability, unemployment, and old age, so it is unsurprising that, very early in his presidency, he set in motion the mechanisms for creating a national social security system and an administrative apparatus to manage it.

In June 1934, Roosevelt created the Committee on Economic Security and charged it with the tasks of sifting proposals and developing a fiscally and politically viable social security plan. He chose Security of Labor Frances Perkins to chair the committee. The Social Security Act of 1935 contained a provision for the immediate establishment of a Social Security Board, a three-member independent agency appointed by the president. In December 1935, the Bureau of Old-Age Benefits was created to administer Title II of the act. In 1937, it was renamed the Bureau of Old-Age Insurance, perhaps reflecting Roosevelt's insistence that the new program was just that—insurance—and not charity or welfare. On July 1, 1939, the Social Security Board lost its independent agency status when it was subsumed by the Federal Security Agency. On July 16, 1946, as part of a broader reorganization of the government, the Social Security Board was renamed the Social Security Administration, and the board's chair, Arthur Altmeyer, became the first Social Security Administration Commissioner. But its status within the Federal Security Agency remained unchanged. On April 11, 1953, President Dwight D. Eisenhower created the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to replace the Federal Security Agency, and the Social Security Administration was housed within the new entity, where it remained until May 4, 1980, when it became a part of the newly created Department of Health and Human Services, the successor to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

The headquarters of the Social Security Administration near Baltimore, Maryland. The Social Security Administration has more than 65,000 employees in 10 regional offices and nearly 1,400 field offices.

For decades, government officials had advocated for the Social Security Administration to return to the independent agency status it had during its first decade as the Social Security Board. On August 15, 1994, President Bill Clinton signed legislation to this effect, and on March 31, 1995, the Social Security Administration again became an independent agency.

Organization

The Social Security Administration is primarily responsible for dispensing Social Security funds to 57 million American retirees, persons with disabilities, and work survivors and dependents of beneficiaries. Social Security is a pay-as-you-go program, which means that, when workers pay taxes to Social Security, the money is not held in an individual account but rather distributed to present beneficiaries. In other words, today's workers' taxes pay for today's beneficiaries, and today's workers then hope that there will be money to benefit them in the future. Social Security collects money for three general funds: Old-Age, Survivors, and Disability Insurance (OASDI); Supplemental Security Income (SSI); and Medicare. OASDI is a fund for those who have worked and paid into the fund, their survivors, and people who are disabled. SSI is means-tested program for those who need additional money due to their low-level funds, and Medicare is a health insurance program. More than 160 million workers regularly pay into the Social Security fund: 6.2 percent from each worker's paycheck for the Social Security tax plus an equal amount paid by each employee's employer. Employees must also pay a 1.45 percent tax for Medicare, which is also matched by employers. Self-employed workers must pay the entire amount (15.3 percent, which equals 6.2 percent plus 6.2 percent plus 1.45 percent plus 1.45 percent) themselves. The Social Security Administration calculates that the average monthly benefit to retirees should equal about 40 percent of the average American worker's pay. Annual payouts from Social Security exceed $700 billion for retirement and survivors. In addition, the Social Security Administration pays more than $200 billion in disability and supplemental insurance. Currently, the Social Security trust fund has nearly $2.75 trillion. According to the Social Security Board of Trustees, current actuarial projections show the trust fund being depleted by 2033; at that time, tax revenues would only be able to cover three-quarters of the promised payments.

Duties

The Social Security Administration headquarters is located in Baltimore, Maryland. With more than 65,000 employees, the Social Security Administration has 10 regional offices and nearly 1,400 field offices. Carolyn W. Colvin is acting commissioner of the Social Security Administration. The Social Security Administration also has many foreign offices located in U.S. embassies. Wherever their offices, the general duties and services provided are similar:

1. Issuing social security cards—social security cards and the unique number each contains have become a standard forms of personal identification in the United States. Also, Social Security numbers are important for tax reasons; those 2 years old and older listed as a dependent on a tax return must have a Social Security number. By the end of 2014, approximately 16 million requests for new cards and replacement cards are anticipated.
2. Processing approximately 7.5 million claims for Medicare, retirement, SSI, and survivor benefits during fiscal year 2014.
3. Processing 28 million requests to verify new employees in conjunction with Homeland Security regulations.
4. Reconsidering more than three-quarter of a million claims cases.
5. Completing 100 million actions for beneficiaries after they have already started receiving benefits.
6. Posting one-quarter of a billion earnings items to individual records.

The Future of the Social Security Administration

When considering the future of the Social Security Administration, the solvency of the Social Security trust fund is one of the most important issues. Various projections show that revenues and expenditures in the Social Security trust fund will be depleted some time in or near 2033. At that time, there will only be enough revenues from taxes to meet three-quarters of the payment obligations. Although the trust fund currently has $2.75 trillion, this amount will be depleted as payments outstrip revenue from taxes beginning in 2020. Various methods have been proposed to keep solvent the Social Security trust fund.

One of the most simple to understand is the proposal that would simply cut benefits to recipients. This would decrease expenditures and would help bring solvency to the trust fund. Another solution, similar to the first, would be to increase the age at which recipients could start receiving benefits. Under this plan, recipients would still receive the same amount of annual benefits but starting at an older age, such as 67.

The problem with these solutions (decreasing or delaying benefits) is that they would tend to increase the amount of poverty among older Americans. Since the beginning of Social Security, the payments have been given credit for helping to reduce poverty for elderly populations. From the beginning of Social Security payments in the 1940s until recently, the poverty rate in older Americans has been reduced from more than one-third to below one-tenth. Any change in Social Security payouts or increase in the retirement age would certainly be positively correlated with an increase in poverty among the elderly. These costs may be shifted to others such as family members, charities, or even other government-run programs.

Increasing tax revenues could also help to maintain the solvency of the Social Security trust fund. Some proposals recommend an increase of two percentage points for workers' wages in order to increase the total amount of money coming into the fund. While this may seem like a relatively simple solution, it could increase poverty rates among working families and raise childhood poverty rates. Still another solution is to tax more of workers' wages—in other words, place the current tax rate on workers' wages that are currently not being taxed. Currently, wages over $117,000 are not taxed.

In any event, there will either be higher taxes or lower or slower (later) payouts. It is important to remember, however, that this has come about as fewer workers support more and more people who are retired. Some of the other issues around solvency have to do with how soon we should intervene with the current Social Security trust fund tax rate and payment schedule. The Social Security Administration analyzes and reports annually on these issues. The Social Security Administration has analyzed this issue for years, and its projections remain fairly constant putting the insolvency of the trust fund in the early to mid-2030s.

Conclusion

Legislation that led to the creation of the Social Security Administration was signed in 1935. By the late 1940s, the Social Security Administration, the payroll deduction tax, and the trust fund had become an integral part of the social welfare system in America. Although Americans did not think of themselves as socialists, they now had a system in place to provide those in their mid-60s with a monthly income equal to about 40 percent of an average American paycheck. Today, the organization has more than 65,000 employees with its headquarters in Baltimore and 10 regional offices in major cities in the United States.

Nearly 1,400 field offices exist now in the United States and in embassies throughout the world; employees in the field offices help Americans obtain Social Security cards and make claims for benefits. While currently there are a few trillion dollars in funds at the Social Security Administration, those funds will likely be depleted in the next 20 years. Solutions to keep the trust fund solvent involve increasing taxes or decreasing benefits or increasing the age at which benefits are paid out. The various solutions each come with their problems, however. Should we reduce Social Security benefits, delay the age at which they are paid, increase the taxes on workers, or some other more exotic solution?

Daniel W. Phillips III
Sue Patterson
Greg Phelps
Lindsey Wilson College

See Also: Social Security, Services Funded by; Social Services, Disabled Children and; Welfare Reform, Role of.

Further Readings

Social Security Administration. "History." http://www.ssa.gov/history (Accessed January 2014).

Social Security Administration. Social Security Handbook, 2014: Overview of Social Security Programs. Lanham, MD: Bernan Press, 2014.

Social Security Administration. "Trustees Report." http://www.ssa.gov/oact/trsum (Accessed January 2014).

Social Services, Disabled Children and

Social services encompass a multifaceted system that offers programs that provide assistance for families of children with disabilities. From programs that offer resources to enhance the quality of life of individuals with disabilities to agencies that advocate for disability rights, the process of receiving social services can generate a sense of community for families and their children with disabilities. However, the initial step of recognizing the need for social services may be considered as uncustomary practice for families from diverse backgrounds. For example, the act of seeking external assistance may be negatively perceived in a culture that emphasizes a strong tradition of self-reliance. To effectively support families of children with disabilities, practitioners must recognize the cultural differences that could potentially become barriers for families or appreciate the values that are offered through social services.

Person-First Language

Working with families of children with disabilities requires practitioners to view each child and his or her family as an individual entity. Regardless of the disability category, it is imperative for practitioners to avoid profiling a child's needs or abilities based on his or her diagnosis. For example, it is imprudent to make an assumption that an individual diagnosed with an intellectual disability has an identical set of needs or abilities as another individual with the same diagnosis. Therefore, it is best practice to work within the boundaries of a person-centered approach rather than a disability-centered approach.

The discussion of disability can be a sensitive topic for parents or guardians who are in their early stages of understanding their child's diagnosis and may not have fully reached acceptance of their new reality. Due to its delicate nature, it is critical for practitioners to be cognizant with their word choices when referring to the child with a disability. The adoption of person-first language represents a respectable gesture to promote the awareness that a person's disability does not define the individual and such diagnostic labels should not be a representation of his or her identity. Person-first language acknowledges the person prior to his or her disability and allows for a shift of how individuals with disabilities are perceived in the community. For example, instead of referring to a child as an autistic child, person-first language promotes the use of child with autism; instead of he's Downs, person-first language refers to someone as a child who has Down syndrome. The switch in the language structure is a subtle but powerful approach toward the establishment of a trusting and respectable relationship with the family.

Cultural Differences

While it is necessary to acquire a thorough understanding of the characteristics associated with each disability category, the examination of factors that influence a child's everyday life is equally significant to obtain a holistic evaluation of the child and his or her family. Specifically, contributing factors such as family heritage and culture can reveal pertinent information about the family dynamics and their attitudes toward having children with disabilities. For example, a child with a physical disability (e.g., hearing or visual impairment or conditions that impair one's mobility and movement) may be viewed as a symbol of prestige bestowed upon the family's cultural ancestry. Another family's culture may perceive disability as a form of punishment from their ancestors, and a sense of shame or guilt are impressed into the family dynamics.

Furthermore, factors relating to the family's comfort level in seeking external assistance or the awareness of the beneficial implications from social services should also be considered. As mentioned previously, cultural differences can present themselves as barriers for families that may be unaccustomed with the process of requesting social support. Depending on the culture, parents or guardians may be skeptical toward the available services and the authenticity of their offers, while others may be resistant to receiving services from community agencies due to the fear of being culturally stigmatized. Specifically, the acknowledgement that external assistance is warranted may be perceived by a family's culture as a sign of weakness; consequently a sense of fear or hesitation could debilitate their pursuit of such services to avoid further damaging the family's reputation.

Moreover, the dissimilation of information with language translations and disability accommodations relating to social services may be limited among families of diverse backgrounds. Such inconsistent flow of information restricts the accessibilities of services and reinforces the lack of comprehensive understanding of the benefits that social support can provide for the family. While there is an increased effort to develop bilingual informational packets to reach families of linguistically diverse backgrounds, such momentum must be continued to address the unique needs of multilingual families of children with disabilities who may need additional accommodations (e.g., augmentative and alternative communication or Braille) for an accurate translation of resources.

Individual Differences and Collaboration

To cultivate a meaningful and collaborative partnership when working with families of children with disabilities, practitioners must demonstrate culturally responsive practices to effectively support the consumer's needs. If cultural barriers continue to exist, they should not be regarded as restrictions for practitioners from implementing proactive strategies in an effort to bridge the gap between social agencies and families that may not fully comprehend the intricacies of seeking and receiving such support.

One approach toward establishing a respectable partnership with parents or guardians of children with disabilities is to actively identify ways to study the family's culture. Reading about a particular cultural heritage reveals only a single piece of a generally complex dynamic. Qualitative review (e.g., personal interviews) of each member of the family can be useful in gathering information relating to the family's history and interactions with their culture. Notably, interviews should be conducted by a professional (e.g., practitioner or interpreter), who is fluent in the family's native language and in an environment that is convenient for the parents or guardians. Furthermore, depending on the severity of the child's disability, traveling can be cumbersome for families of children with limited mobility. Therefore, it may be a practical option for the practitioners to conduct home visits to help alleviate unnecessary stress on the families.

Another strategy to promote an effective partnership with culturally and linguistically diverse families of children with disabilities is to ensure that it is a reciprocal relationship where their voices are valued. Oftentimes, suggestions relating to their child's disability needs offered by the parents or guardians are quickly dismissed. It is important to be reminded that the parents and guardians can offer invaluable information regarding the lifelong care of their children with disabilities. As with any team effort, it is critical that all members' opinions are equally valued and considered during a decision-making process.

In summary, working with culturally and linguistically diverse families of children with disabilities requires practitioners to distinguish their individual needs in a culturally responsive manner. In addition to understanding the demands of caring for a child with disabilities, it is also crucial to develop a thorough appreciation of any cultural differences in order to meet the needs of the changing demographics in the field. While it is impractical to become an expert in all cultures, being culturally sensitive to the needs of families of children with disabilities is undeniably attainable.

Mickie Wong-Lo
Northeastern Illinois University

See Also: Help-Seeking Behavior, Cultural Differences in; Individuals With Disabilities Education Act.

Further Readings

Dupre, Marilyn. "Disability Culture and Cultural Competency in Social Work." Social Work Education, v.31 (2012).

Goodley, Dan. Disability Studies: An Interdisciplinary Introduction. London: Sage (2010).

Knifton, Lee. " Understanding and Addressing the Stigma of Mental Illness With Ethnic Minority Communities." Health Sociology Review, v.21 (2012).

Matuszny, Rose, Devender Banda, and T. Coleman. "A Progressive Plan for Building Collaborative Relationships With Parents From Diverse Backgrounds." Teaching Exceptional Children, v.39 (2007).

Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in

Cultural competence has become a salient concept of practice in social work and other human services disciplines. Historically, cultural competence was thought to refer primarily to having knowledge about people of color. It is now recognized that groups and communities in American society are diverse in other ways as well, including ethnicity, religion, language, social class, gender, sexual orientation, age, and ability. These factors are important because they provide the cultural lens through which diverse groups view their lives. In practice with diverse groups, professionals need to be aware of different points of view yet remain committed to values that affirm and respect the dignity of all. Equally important is for professionals to understand and acknowledge how beliefs and attitudes of the dominant society, including their own, have been enculturated into the institution of social welfare.

The institution of social welfare, through its social welfare policies, frames systems of service delivery to diverse groups. Consequently, some policies are delivered in culturally incongruent ways and there may be a need to effect policy or programmatic changes. This entry focuses on the intersection of cultural competence and social welfare policy as it impacts diverse individuals, families, and groups. Human services professionals, through their commitment to social justice, have an ethical responsibility to become involved in this sometimes intricate process of policy change.

The Institution of Social Welfare and Social Welfare Policy

Social welfare is one of the major institutions of a society. It assists members in meeting their basic needs for food, clothing, housing, education, health care, and employment. Such needs are usually met through good jobs in a well-functioning economy. When the economy experiences a downturn, however, resulting in losses of jobs for some individuals and reduction in pay for others, unmet needs emerge and become critical. Social welfare is also needed when individuals face loss of support from other institutions such as the family or religion. In these instances, social welfare policy is there to distribute benefits—goods and services—to individuals and families in need. Social welfare policy is defined broadly as the role of government and its actions and decisions, or not, that have an impact on the welfare of its citizens from taxation, national defense, and energy conservation to health care, housing, and public assistance. This definition is twofold in that it speaks to (1) the actions and decisions of government and (2) the inactions or decisions that government chooses not to take that may have far-reaching effects on its people. For example, in 2005 when Hurricane Katrina hit the Louisiana coast and wreaked havoc on an entire community, the government's inaction as it related to a timely response to the thousands of people who were stranded in their homes and held up in the Louisiana Superdome with no running water or food or other appropriate basic necessities resulted in loss of lives, illness, and major displacement of children and families.

Social welfare policies are administered by voluntary and nonprofit agencies as well as by units of government—federal, state, and local. They may also be formulated by these same levels of government. Policies generally reflect society's dominant values and priorities, which in turn help to frame the design and cultural ethos underpinning service delivery systems. In order to address the social problems and challenges faced by diverse groups in need, it is important that service-providing systems take into account the groups' norms, values, history, and experiences.

What Is Cultural Competence? How Is It Different From Self-Awareness?

Cultural competence refers to the ability to understand, communicate, and interact effectively with individuals and groups who differ on one or more characteristics such as race, ethnicity, language, religion, gender, sexual orientation, social class, age, and ability. An individual who seeks to be culturally competent will (1) study a group's historical as well as current sociocultural and economic experiences; 2) examine his or her own values, beliefs, and attitudes to determine if he or she has the context for assessing the values of others; and (3) become involved in changing unjust policies, programs, and service-providing systems that operate to the detriment of diverse groups.

The literature suggests that self-awareness is the process through which an individual becomes more conscious of his or her personal values, how they were developed, and how they shape the current worldviews about self and others. Self-awareness can be viewed as a first step in the consciousness-raising process that can yield insights into one's assumptions, biases, and stereotypes, and how these impact the helping process. Some writers have voiced concern, however, that self-awareness does not encourage professionals to move beyond the point of self-assessment or to examine the influences of bias on individuals, social welfare policies, or service-delivery systems. As such, human services professionals should focus not only on their own identities and cultures but also on the cultures and identities of others and how these factors impact the policy process.

Significance of Cultural Competence in Social Welfare Policy

Achieving cultural competence is not a static but a dynamic and ongoing process—one that requires the continual acquisition, integration, and sometimes modification of knowledge, especially in encounters with a new, diverse group. In some cases, we may find it necessary to unlearn what was once thought to be valid. Human services professionals who seek to engage in culturally competent practice come to understand the intersection of isms (e.g., between race, gender, and social class) and acknowledge how historical experiences with institutions of society, including social welfare, have influenced the worldviews of diverse groups and communities. Oftentimes, social policy is created in isolation from the population it most likely affects. This caveat makes it important for human services workers to be knowledgeable about the impact social welfare policy has on the delivery of services and the need for advocacy to ensure that the outcome is equitable.

Working With Diverse Groups and Communities in the Policy Process

Human services professionals have a responsibility to work with, and on behalf of, diverse communities to achieve social justice. The quest for justice often involves making needed changes—undoing unjust and culturally insensitive policies and practices and developing new ones. Policy practitioners may undertake many activities in attempting to effect policy changes: (1) the collection and analysis of data that document unmet needs and their impact on the quality of life; (2) understanding how the culture, norms, values, and historical experiences of communities inform the practitioners' conceptual framework for viewing problems or designing policies for intervention; (3) partnering and collaborating with community and agency groups in advocating for change; (4) providing education and support to diverse community groups who are advocating on their own behalves; (5) sponsoring town-hall meetings and community forums; (6) approaching key legislators and briefing them on the policy change proposal; and (7) seeking to testify at legislative committee hearings. Such activities are examples of the roles that human services professionals can attend to when working with diverse groups in formulating, implementing, and evaluating social welfare policies.

Policy implementation involves at least three major phases: (1) the writing of rules and regulations that govern how policy is to be carried out, (2) allocation of funding, and (3) the structuring of service delivery systems within agencies to deliver benefits. As such, rules and regulations provide the specific guidance and clarity needed to carry out the goals of policies. Policies generally require funding. Lack of funding or inadequate funding means that the policy is unlikely to achieve its goals. In designing service-delivery systems, several factors should be taken into account. Among them are: (1) the goodness of fit within the agency for the placement of services, (2) the availability and accessibility of the service-delivery system, (3) educational and cultural qualifications of service providers, and (4) providing information about services to potential beneficiaries.

Activities noted in the policy implementation process may affect the outcomes of policy evaluation. Policy evaluation is intended to indicate whether or not policies have met their stated goals. Therefore, policy implementation and evaluation are closely linked. An example of this point is made by examining the attempt to deliver mental health services to children in the New Orleans area following Hurricane Katrina.

Evaluation reports showed that several barriers prevented children from receiving needed mental health services: (1) lack of providers, (2) transportation, (3) inadequate funding, and (4) stigma associated with receiving mental health services in culturally diverse communities. The involvement of culturally competent human services professionals in policy or program formulation and implementation processes could have made significant differences in both service delivery and evaluation outcomes.

Barbara J. Haile
Jenny L. Jones
Florida A & M University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Services Providers and; Diversities.

Further Readings

Cummins, Linda, Katharine Byers, and Laura Pedrick. Policy Practice for Social Workers. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2011.
DiNitto, Diana. Social Welfare, Politics and Public Policy, 7th ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2011.
Government Accounting Office (GAO). Hurricane Katrina: Barriers to Mental Health Services for Children Persist in Greater New Orleans. Washington, DC: GAO, 2009.
National Association of Social Workers (NASW). Indicators for the Achievement of the NASW Standards for Cultural Competence. Washington, DC: NASW, 2007.

Social Welfare Programs, Cultural Competence in

A discussion of social welfare has historically revealed a broad range of descriptions, ideological assumptions about purpose, and political tensions that far exceed a brief, encyclopedic entry. In general and as a social institution, social welfare has functioned as a system of services and programs in industrialized society designed to mitigate or alleviate dependency through the provision of assistance in various forms such as money, goods and services, shelter, food, employment and health, education, and various protections.

Disagreements and debates about the overall purpose of social welfare abound but generally place a large emphasis on, but not exclusive to, the consequences of poverty and social disadvantage. Social welfare services cover a wide range of needs to address transitory, intermittent, and residual or persistent needs. Specific services targeting individual needs typically contribute in ways that are supportive, supplemental, and/or substitutive, depending on abilities and capabilities.

The past few centuries of social welfare challenges have accompanied a range of reforms and shifts in responsibility between local, state, and federal jurisdiction, as well as public and private sector oversight. While social problems emerge concomitant with the changing times, certain consistencies remain relevant to lack of affordable housing, under- and unemployment, aging and associated health care needs, retirement, fixed incomes and the high cost of living, and a wide and complex array of social problems that have serious consequences to overall safety and well-being such as violence (e.g., interpersonal, family, neighborhood, gang, youth, and school), drug and alcohol dependence, and child maltreatment. Important emerging concerns call attention to social welfare needs of our increasingly aging population and the high cost of medical care, including prescriptions; reintegration challenges of returning active duty soldiers; veterans in need of long-term health and mental health services; migrant, immigrant, and refugee services to accommodate the wave of newly arrived populations; and most recently, the increasing number of undocumented and unaccompanied minor children.

Relevance of Cultural Competence in Social Welfare

So how is culture and cultural competence relevant to the discussion of social welfare? It is not uncommon to associate social welfare with the poor, although this is only a subset of the recipients of social welfare services. In 2014, poverty affected nearly 13 percent of the U.S. population (or nearly 37 million people), if one considers the poverty level of U.S. citizens as a pertinent measure of the poor. It is important to note the lack of inclusion of nearly 12 million undocumented individuals residing in the United States, many of whom are educationally disadvantaged, uninsured, living well-below the median household income, and with approximately one-third of undocumented children living in poverty.

The risks and burdens of being poor in the United States falls disproportionately on non-white groups although whites constitute the largest number of poor because they constitue the majority of the U.S. population. The disproportionate number of non-whites has also been reflected in a wide range of social welfare demographic beneficiaries. Cultural explanations for why this is the case tend to locate needs as both individual and cultural, as part of the socialization experience of racial minorities (often used synonymously with cultural minorities). The culture of poverty, for example, assumes shared values, beliefs, attitudes, and behaviors aligned in ways that maintain the marginalization of individuals within minority groups, within the context of a broad range of institutional barriers and obstacles to social integration. One such value, for example, suggests that there is less incentive for work among the poor.

An Air Force staff sergeant provides glasses to a Ugandan patient during a 2009 humanitarian relief program that helped 1,300 people from five east African countries. Cultural competence is a process by which people of all backgrounds, cultures, and classes are responded to respectfully and effectively.

An alternative perspective, cultural deprivation, suggests that deficiencies in socialization practices do not promote or support larger societal values, beliefs, and opportunities that might otherwise lead to achievement in education and access to other benefits indicative of social integration. For example, in terms of the value of educational achievement, a cultural deprivation perspective might suggest that family socialization and parenting practices did not emphasize the value of education.

Stereotypes and Biases

Critics of these cultural explanations argue that while these “theories” are seemingly rational and convincing, they are fraught with stereotypes, overgeneralizations, and ethnocentric biases. It is as if there is a predetermined set of values, beliefs, and behaviors more likely than others to determine which cultural values are likely to lead to inclusive citizenship, with access to all rights and privileges offered by society.

It also suggests that all persons, regardless of their cultural differences, will achieve access to these rights and privileges fairly and justly. To not achieve these benefits, this consequence has often led to blame being placed on the victim, in which attributions of disadvantage are attributed to culturally different and marginalized individuals themselves. Cultural practices, for example, that align with collective or communal practices are considered inconsistent with values promoting independence, autonomy, and the individual's entrepreneurial spirit.

Cultural value conflicts are present in other areas as well, such as mastery over versus acceptance of one's fate and autonomy, independence versus collectivism and interdependence, and personal versus social responsibility. In attributing values orientations to cultural groups one risks committing the same faux pas suggested earlier—that of cultural overgeneralizing and stereotyping. The point is that dominant values orientations should not (but often do) lend themselves to advantages because they are consistent with larger societal values and beliefs about what leads to integration and success. Conversely, cultural differences should not but may prescribe or proscribe cultural groups to social positions that alienate, marginalize, or otherwise present barriers to social integration within dominant society.

Structural Approach

Not mutually exclusive of cultural explanations, another important contribution to this discussion relates to systemic, structural explanations. From this vantage point, one focuses on institutional processes and structures that not only support or limit access to but also maintain mechanisms that unjustly privilege or disadvantage culturally different individuals or groups.

These mechanisms have been considered to reflect ideological differences that perpetuate social arrangements that privilege or oppress individuals and groups. In this context, social welfare has been suggested to highlight mechanisms of social control that explain a group's social positions. Such mechanisms may impede student performance in school, disproportionately criminalize behaviors (as opposed to accessing treatment interventions and prevention), fail to provide adequate legal representation, sustain lower quality health care, deny essential community-based resources to support integration, fail to invest in or support economic development, and so on.

A structural approach highlights inadequate, insufficient, and otherwise ineffective systemic responses that may present a panacea of caring while at the same time do little to disrupt the social consequences that are often used as institutional justifications of social welfare.

Conclusion

To make sense of social welfare from a cultural perspective, one must accept the cultural diversity of this nation not so much as evidence of how fragmented and complex this society is becoming, but rather as a society rich in its differences and in its capacity to address complex challenges. Cultural differences are important to recognize not so much as threats to democracy but as valued contributions to a diverse society.

Diverse languages, for example, offer opportunities to engage in a global society and should be recognized as assets rather than imposition in educating the masses. It is reasonable to consider the humanitarian goal of social welfare despite the range of causal explanations. The growth of spending in social welfare from $24 billion in the 1950s to an estimated $60 billion in the early 21st century (despite efforts to control government spending) and the upsurge in private and faith-based support suggests the need for greater attention to cultural inclusion. It is a relevant fact that as the population increases, continued alienation, marginalization, and isolation are not likely to address emerging social welfare needs unless greater effort is made toward engagement to the benefit of an overall society's health, well-being, and progress.

Robert M. Ortega
University of Michigan

See Also: Adult Education Programs and Services; Adult Literacy Programs; Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Historical Role of; Cultural Capital, Role of; Educational Status and Service Delivery; Environmental Justice; Family Structure, Diversity of; Financial Literacy Programs; Food Desert; Food Insecurity; Health Disparities, Role of; Homelessness; Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act; Single Parents; Social and Economic Justice; Social Capital, Role of; Social Security, Services Funded by; Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in; Socioeconomic Status; Supplemental Security Income, Services Funded by; Temporary Aid to Needy Families; Uninsured Clients; War on Poverty Programs; Welfare Reform, Role of.

Further Reading

Anderson, Joseph and Robin Wiggins Carter, eds. Diversity Perspectives for Social Work Practice.

Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2003. Cohen, Adam B, ed. Culture Reexamined: Broadening our Understanding of Social and Evolutionary Influences. Washington, DC: American Psychological Association, 2014.

Berzoff, Joan, ed. Falling Through the Cracks: Psychodynamic Practice With Vulnerable and Oppressed Populations. New York: Columbia University Press, 2012.

Constance-Huggins, M. "A Review of the Racial Biases of Social Welfare Policies." Journal of Human Behavior in the Social Environment, v.21/8 (2011).

Constantine, Madonna G., ed. Clinical Practice With People of Color: A Guide to Becoming Culturally Competent. New York: Teachers College Press, 2007.

Cummins, Linda, Katharine Byers, and Laura Pedrick. Policy Practice for Social Workers. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2011.

Diller, Jerry V. Cultural Diversity: A Primer for the Human Services. 4th ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson Brooks/Cole, 2011.

DiNitto, Diana. Social Welfare, Politics and Public Policy, 7th ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2011. Popple, Phillip R. and Leslie Leighninger. Social Work, Social Welfare and American Society, 7th ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2008.

Fontes, Lisa Aronson. Interviewing Clients Across Cultures: A Practitioner's Guide. New York: Guilford Press, 2008.

Gibson, Mark. The Feeding of Nations: Redefining Food Security for the 21st Century. Boca Raton, FL: CRC Press, 2012.

Green, James W. Cultural Awareness in the Human Services: A Multi-Ethnic Approach. 2nd ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 1995.

Kagitcibasi, Cigdem. Family, Self, and Human Development Across Cultures: Theory and Applications, 2nd ed. Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum, 2007.

Keith, Kenneth D., ed. Cross-Cultural Psychology: Contemporary Themes and Perspectives. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell, 2011.

Lansford, Jennifer E., et al, eds. Immigrant Families in Contemporary Society. New York: Guilford Press, 2007.

Lum, Doman. Culturally Competent Practice: A Framework for Understanding Diverse Groups and Justice Issues, 4th ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole-Thomson Learning, 2011.

Lum, Doman. Social Work Practice and People of Color: A Process-Stage Approach, 5th ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole-Thomson Learning, 2004.

Mahalingam, Ramaswami, ed. Cultural Psychology of Immigrants. Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum, 2006.

Matuszny, Rose, Devender Banda, and T. Coleman. "A Progressive Plan for Building Collaborative Relationships With Parents From Diverse Backgrounds." Teaching Exceptional Children, v.39 (2007).

Passel, Jeffrey S. and D'Vera Cohn. "A Portrait of Unauthorized Immigrants in the United States." Washington, DC: PEW Research Hispanic Trends Project, 2009.

Razack, Narda and Donna Jeffery. "Critical Race Discourse and Tenets for Social Work." Canadian Social Work Review, v.19/2 (2002).

Reichert, Elisabeth. "Move From Social Justice to Human Rights Provides New Perspective." The International Journal of Continuing Social Work Education, v.4/1 (2001).

Trevithick, Pamela. S*ocial Work Skills—A Practice Handbook*. Open University Press, 2000.

Social Work, Diversity Practice in

Discussing diversity when discussing the field of social work can easily be seen as redundant; social work as a profession is defined through, motivated by, and adherent to practices and policies around diversity, cultural competence, and the intrinsic worth of all human beings. In fact, it is not possible to discuss social work as a profession or social workers as professionals without assuming diversity as part of the context.

The National Association of Social Workers and the Code of Ethics

The National Association of Social Workers (NASW) is the largest professional organization for social workers, with membership exceeding 140,000 people worldwide. Founded in 1955, NASW provides support for the growth of the profession and the professional development of social workers and advocates for social policies. NASW has published a code of ethics that delineates the profession's core values and acts as the guide for social work conduct and standards of care. The foundation of social work is comprised of six core values explained in the code of ethics. These values of service, social justice, dignity and worth of the person, importance of human relationships, integrity, and competence guide micro (practice), mezzo (groups and organizations), and macro (policy) decisions and applications.

While all six of the social work professional values emphasize social work's mission "to enhance human well-being and help meet the basic needs of all people, with particular attention to the needs of those who are vulnerable, oppressed and living in poverty," the particular values of social justice and dignity and worth of the person explicitly discuss the importance of diversity in social work practice. Stressing the need for social workers to understand ethnic and racial issues as they advocate for oppressed populations as well as being respectful of cultural and ethnic differences in working with clients, these values exemplify the fundamental nature of the importance diversity has to the field of social work.

In addition to the code of ethics, NASW has also published standards for cultural competence. Prepared by the NASW National Committee on Racial and Ethnic Diversity and adopted by the NASW Board of Directors in 2001, these standards supplement the values and ethical principles detailed in the code of ethics and provide further direction about the importance of cultural competence in social work practice. The standards for cultural competence indicate that social workers have an ethical responsibility to provide culturally competent services and maintain a culturally competent practice. In this way, cultural competence is necessary for ethical care, not just suggested or advised.

According to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, cultural competence is defined as a set of congruent practice skills, behaviors, attitudes, and policies that come together in a system, agency, or among professionals to work effectively in cross-cultural situations; this enables people to provide mental health treatment within the cultural framework of the consumer and effective services to people of a specific cultural background, including one different from that of the provider.

Diverse Populations and Practice Settings in Social Work

Because of social work's long-standing history of working with oppressed and disenfranchised populations, social workers regularly provide services to culturally, ethnically, and racially diverse populations. In working toward a more just society where everyone has the same fulfillment of basic human rights and the same access to opportunities, it is imperative that social workers come to the aid of populations who are systematically oppressed. Women, people of color, people with physical or mental disabilities, and the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ) community are populations, among others, with whom social workers provide a variety of psychosocial services and supports. Because the social work profession itself is as diverse as the people it serves, social workers provide services to diverse populations in a great variety of settings.

Social Workers in Schools

Most schools in the United States have interdisciplinary teams of professionals to meet the educational needs of their students. Teachers, teacher's aides, speech pathologists, school psychologists, nurses, educational specialists, and support staff all work as a team to provide an appropriate education to the students in their schools. Often, educational needs are compounded or intertwined with psychosocial issues. These issues are sometimes beyond the scope of other educational professionals and, as such, require the expertise of a social worker to assess and assist. Social workers may assist in testing, complete home visits, participate in child study team meetings, and advocate for children and their families. They may also locate resources for families lacking food, shelter, safety, or other basic human needs; intervene in issues of child abuse or neglect; make referrals for issues such as substance abuse or alcoholism; and provide individual or family counseling.

It is important for school social workers to be cognizant of the issues their students and families face that may be directly correlated with issues of diversity. For example, an immigrant student whose first language is Spanish and whose family speaks only Spanish at home may have social difficulties at school due to language barriers. This can lead to feelings of loneliness and isolation, which would impact the child's self-esteem and interest in school and school-related activities. A school social worker should be aware of the impact of culture and language on this student and communicate that to the rest of the team. Understanding this facet of the child's experience will allow the social worker to provide appropriate treatments and referrals.

Social Workers in Corrections

Of the 1.6 million Americans incarcerated, 65 percent are people of color. This statistic is representative of institutionalized racism, not evidence that people of color just commit more crimes than whites. Because social workers have a commitment to social justice, advocacy, and diversity, they are well suited to provide direct services to people in the correctional system as well as to stand up to issues that affect criminal justice clients such as racial profiling and discrimination. Social workers who provide services to the prison population are called to assist men and women by addressing complex issues including mental illness, substance abuse, family separation, psychological effects of incarceration, and recidivism.

Without social work intervention, many of the issues that precipitated incarceration and are present during incarceration will not be identified or resolved. If a person is arrested for prostitution or drug possession and professionals do not address issues of drug addiction and treatment, poverty, sexual abuse, or trauma history, the client may return to the behaviors that led him or her to incarceration. Advocacy is necessary for this population as well. The laws and law enforcement systems operate with discriminatory and oppressive policies, making people of color greater targets for arrest and imprisonment. Citizens who are in the racial majority may have greater access to means for legal assistance or connections to people in power, causing them to be less likely to face the same consequences of their behavior as people of color.

Social Workers in Health Care

Because social workers working in health care settings provide services to people who are ill, they see a large cross-section of the population. Illness and disease can affect all people, regardless of race, ethnicity, age, sexual orientation, or class. In this way, social workers are challenged with providing culturally competent services to a wide variety of people. Social workers should have a working knowledge and the capacity to accept and understand the full range of diverse clients.

People of all nationalities and backgrounds can come in through the hospital or health clinic's doors. Patients and their family members may not speak English, which can be frustrating for the members of the medical team; social workers can help patients access resources to assist them, including interpreters, language telephone lines, and even health care clinics or offices that offer services geared toward a particular population. Additionally, social workers can advocate for patients and families who may be misunderstood, marginalized, or even discriminated against in the medical setting. Cultural differences are not tolerated appropriately by all staff members at all times; sometimes education and open dialogue are needed to ensure proper treatment of all patients.

Racial issues are also present in health care social work, especially with regard to social justice and access to care. People of color who are often oppressed and discriminated against have barriers to health care that privileged members of society do not, including lack of health insurance or prescription coverage, unsafe living situations, and inability to afford proper nutrition. Conversely, medical staff needs to be cognizant of their own potential for racial prejudice and not assume that a person of color will automatically have these issues. Social workers are involved in creating a safe and tolerant environment and should be vigilant about issues of racism, discrimination, and oppression that occur in medical settings.

Social Workers in Mental Health

Much like the diversity of clients in health care social work, mental health issues can affect anyone, regardless of gender, race, age, or sexual orientation. Unfortunately, many people with mental health issues do not seek help or receive adequate treatment, causing the proportion of consumers of mental health services to not directly correlate with that of the population who actually have mental health diagnoses or would benefit from mental health services. Because of this, mental health diagnoses, including psychosis, schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, depression, and anxiety, are often detected secondarily to another break in psychosocial functioning the client may have. For example, the client with untreated social anxiety may be unable to hold a job, which in turn results in unemployment and issues of poverty and possibly homelessness. This client may then end up seeking mental health treatment after the diagnosis is identified in a public assistance office or a homeless shelter. A person with untreated and undiagnosed mania may seek drugs or alcohol to self-medicate severe mental illness, thus causing arrests or the inability to maintain stable relationships. Not until these issues are assessed by a mental health worker at a prison will the client be able to receive appropriate treatment.

Mental health services are provided in several ways. All mental health services can be delivered on an inpatient or outpatient basis, depending on the severity of the illness and needs of the client. Some mental health clinics offer subsidized services at low or no cost to clients on public assistance or with low income. Other mental health services are provided in the agencies where people are receiving other services, like drug treatment facilities. Many mental health services are provided in private offices, much like doctor's offices, where clients come in on an outpatient basis and receive treatment from a licensed therapist or psychiatrist. This option typically requires insurance coverage (which generally necessitates a copayment) or is a private pay, out-of-pocket expense. A 50-minute hour of therapy can range from $80 to $120 and up depending on location and the qualifications or expertise of the therapist.

Social Workers in Child Protection

Child protection agencies across the country provide services to families and communities in an effort to ensure child safety and protect vulnerable populations. (Protective services are also available for populations besides children, including aging adults and adults with developmental or mental disabilities.) Child protective services involve a variety of services. Initial investigations are provided to investigate allegations of child abuse, neglect, and abandonment. Protective services provide ongoing supervision and case management services to families in which abuse, neglect, or abandonment has been proven. Foster care services arrange and manage care for children who are unsafe in their present family situations and need temporary care until the issues surrounding the abuse or neglect are resolved. Adoption services are provided if it is unsafe for the child to ever return to his or her family, as determined by a court of law or through voluntary surrendering of parental rights.

Social workers in child protection face a very diverse client population. Cultural competence is crucial in working with clients in child protection, especially as cultural norms often dictate discipline practices. While the goal of child protection is to keep children safe from harm, it can also allow for the opportunity for judgment and the imposition of values onto families whose values differ. There are standardized ways that child protective services assess for and determine situations of abuse and neglect in order to minimize subjectivity; however, the social worker still has some power in this process. Only the social worker knows the extent of the condition of the home he or she is investigating that was reported as hazardous. If they verify that the home is, in fact, unfit for the children to remain safe, they have the power to remove the children from the home. The social worker's understanding of the client's cultural differences, socioeconomic situation, and other variables is extremely important in the legitimacy and fairness of this decision.

Social Work in Aging Services (Senior Centers, Long-Term Care Facilities, and Assisted Living Facilities)

Although diversity is often discussed in terms of racial or ethnic differences, there are other differences that can impact a person's well-being. Age is a particularly relevant area of diversity for the United States, considering the population is facing a demographic shift. According to the United States Census Bureau, in 1970, there were 20 million Americans over age 65 and 4 million American over age 85. The projected numbers for the year 2020 increase dramatically to 70 million over the age of 65 and 10 million over the age of 85. With more than 44 million Americans already age 65 and over, aging in America is a significant consideration. Resources of all types (financial, health care, familial, caregiving, and employment) are needed to continue to support the quality of life of an aging population.

The impact of an aging America is significant based on the incidence and prevalence of medical and mental health problems. The majority of Americans over the age of 65 had serious chronic health conditions in 2007 and 2008; 71 percent of men and 57 percent of women had heart disease, cancer, or stroke. In 2006, 10 percent of men and 18 percent of women over age 65 reported depressive symptoms, while 19 percent of Americans over the age of 85 reported signs of clinical depression.

As people age and become less physically and mentally able to meet the standard of productivity and power, they often become marginalized and neglected. A host of practical problems and concrete issues face the older adult population, including substandard housing, income limitations, lack of family support, isolation, and inadequate medical care or health insurance coverage. Social workers who are employed in long-term care facilities, assisted living facilities, or home-based or community senior services face the complex needs of the aging on a regular basis. Social work as a discipline has the skill set and knowledge base to address the concerns of the elderly. This can be done through individual interventions, community-level programs and assistance, or state or federal policy changes or programs.

Promoting and Enhancing Cultural Competence

As previously mentioned, social work as a profession is not only committed to providing services to diverse, oppressed, and minority populations, but it is also committed to ensuring that there are professional standards and methods in place to ensure the highest level of expertise in these areas. The Council on Social Work Education (CSWE), the accrediting body for professional social work programs in higher education in the United States, uses standardized measures when providing accreditation or reaccreditation to schools of social work. The CSWE Education Policy and Accreditation Standards (EPAS) are designed to translate social work values into guidelines for effective and appropriate professional education.

The specific EPAS policy “Educational Policy 2.1.4: Engage Diversity and Difference in Practice” is critical in ensuring that diversity and cultural competence is emphasized in social work education and thus the social work profession. In this policy, it is expected that social workers understand the dimensions of diversity, including age, class, color, culture, disability, ethnicity, gender, gender identity and expression, immigration status, political ideology, race, religion, sex, and sexual orientation. It is also expected that social workers will see these aspects of difference as potential sources of oppression, poverty, marginalization, and alienation.

In core social work curriculum, assignments are given that ask students to identify their own race, culture, ethnicity, and values. Having them complete this type of self-assessment and identify these aspects of themselves can help them as they relate and understand clients of different races, cultures, and ethnicities. Self-awareness is crucial in the process of providing culturally competent care.

Kathryn Martinelli Brzozowski
Temple University

See Also: Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of; Culturally Diverse Practice, Theories of; Medical Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and.

Further Readings

Council on Social Work Education (CSWE) Commission on Accreditation. 2008 EPAS Handbook. Council on Social Work Education, 2008.

Harper-Dorton, K. V. and J. Lantz. Cross-Cultural Practice: Social Work With Diverse Populations, 2nd ed. Chicago: Lyceum Books, 2007.

Lum, D., ed. Culturally Competent Practice: A Framework for Understanding Diverse Groups and Justice Issues, 4th ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson/Brooks Cole, 2011.

McIntosh, P. “White Privilege: Unpacking the Invisible Knapsack.” In S. Plous, ed., Understanding Prejudice and Discrimination. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2003.

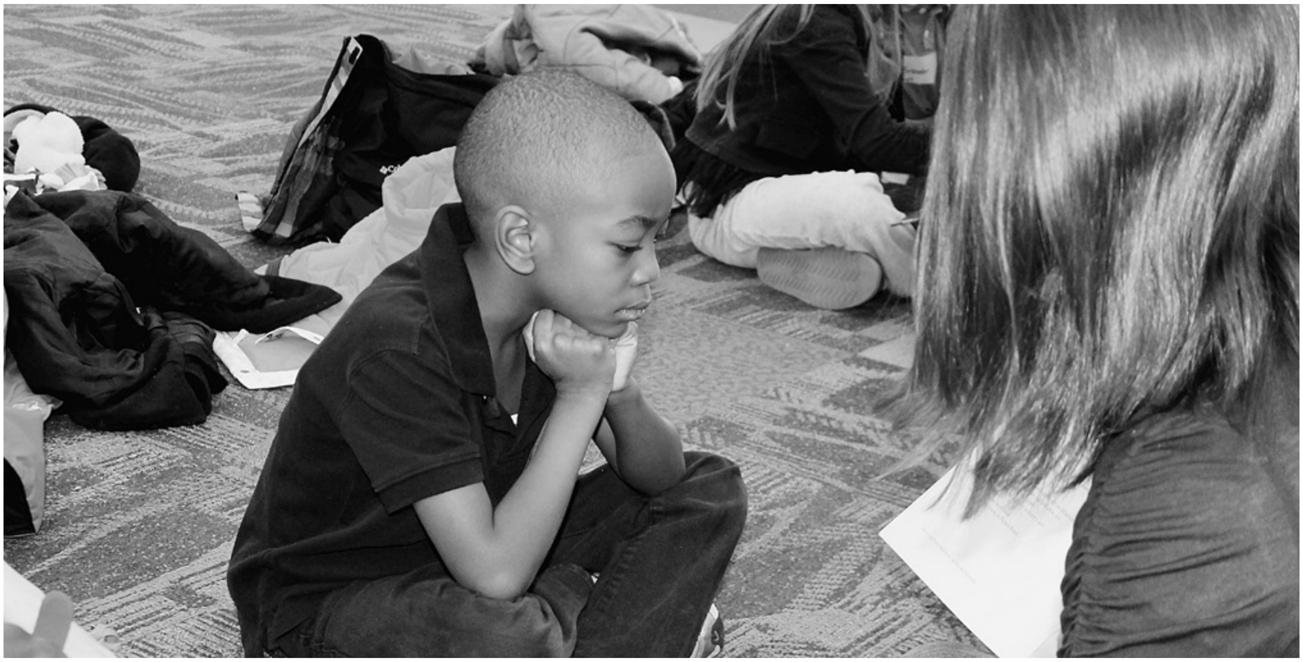
National Association of Social Workers (NASW). Cultural Competence in the Social Work Profession. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 2000.

National Association of Social Workers (NASW). NASW Code of Ethics. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 2000.

National Association of Social Workers (NASW). Social Work Speaks: National Association of Social Workers Policy Statements, 2009–2012. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 2009.

Social Work Practice and People of Color

Modern social work practice takes place in a multicultural and diverse environment, requiring social workers to demonstrate culturally responsive care in working with people of color, defined here as a



A volunteer reads to a child during an African American read-in event. People of color are the fastest-growing segment of the population in North America, presenting tremendous challenges for social work professionals faced with performing the tasks of reflecting a sensitivity to the groups' concerns while helping them meet their sociocultural needs.

heterogeneous group that is not white in race or ethnicity and whose members share a common experience of discrimination based on their non-normative group status. From a North American perspective and excluding aboriginal peoples in Canada, people of African or Caribbean, Asian, Latin, and Native American descent are the groups most commonly associated with this term. Descriptors such as nonwhite and minority have been used to refer to members of this population, suggesting a lack of consensus on the use of terms.

Debate is ongoing about appropriate terminology. The expression people of color seems superior to nonwhite or minority, given the implication that members of this group are either lacking in whiteness or are perpetually disempowered because of their minority or subordinated status. The term white itself eludes description. Importantly, included in the debate is an analysis of racialization, which examines the idea of race as a social construct that has real, material effects for people positioned outside the bounds of whiteness.

The cumulative, disadvantageous effects of whiteness and the continuing legacy of institutional and structural racism that exists in society structure unequal life opportunities for individuals whose identities are differentially marked. Considering the power differentials rooted in racial dynamics is an important factor in working for social justice. Social workers—especially those from the dominant white group—who work with people of color must have a good understanding of the challenges faced by this population. They also need to develop strong skills and particular knowledge regarding how best to tailor services to meet the unique needs of this group.

A Diverse and Growing Segment of the Population

People of color are the fastest-growing segment of the population in North America; immigration acts as an important driver of this growth in some contexts. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, people of color represented 36.2 percent of the American population in 2011. Future population projection estimates that this number will reach 49.9 percent by the year 2050. Of those who completed the most recent national census, 13.1 percent identified as black or African American; 5 percent reported Asian ancestry; 16.7 percent specified a Hispanic or Latino origin; 1.2 percent classified as American Indian and Alaska Native; and 0.2 percent indicated belonging to a Native Hawai'ian and other Pacific Islander group. The Hispanic or Latino population is the largest non-European racial and ethnic group in the country.

Canada's ethnocultural portrait mirrors that of the United States. In the 2011 voluntary National Household Survey, which replaced the mandatory long-form census, visible minorities (excluding aboriginals) accounted for 19.1 percent of the country's total population—an increase from the 16.2 percent reported in the 2006 census. This number is expected to reach 33 percent by the year 2031. Among the three largest visible minority groups, south Asians made up 25 percent; individuals of Chinese ancestry composed 21.1 percent; and blacks totaled 15.1 percent. Together, these racial and ethnic groups comprised 61.2 percent of the overall visible minority population and represented 5 percent, 4 percent, and 3 percent of the national population, respectively. As was the case five years earlier, south Asia continues to lead as the main source of immigrants to Canada.

The population growth rate of people of color is increasing at a higher rate than that of their white counterparts. This trend is likely to persist into the foreseeable future, with important implications for the delivery of social work and support services. Practitioners' awareness and understanding of appropriate theoretical and practice issues, in working with members of these populations, will help to improve culturally sensitive care and minimize inequities in care–delivery intervention.

Contemporary Issues in Social Work Practice With People of Color

The increasing numbers of people of color in Western democracies present tremendous challenges for social work professionals, who are faced with performing the difficult tasks of reflecting a sensitivity to the groups' concerns while helping them meet their myriad sociocultural needs. However, social workers are uniquely positioned to intervene and help with improving the quality of life and well-being of disenfranchised groups and communities.

Although significant strides have been made toward the inclusion of people of color (both new immigrants and native born) in countries like the United States and Canada, some hardships persist. These include but are not limited to issues of immigration and acculturation; substandard housing and inadequate access to health care; lack of a culturally sensitive educational system; disproportionate minority contact with the criminal justice system; and poverty due to limited access to or exclusion from meaningful employment. For individuals with a nonheterosexual orientation, support is also needed with regard to the complex intersection of multiple social identities of religion or spirituality, ability, race, and gender. Owing to systemic discriminatory experiences such as racism, all of these challenges can be taxing in the absence of culturally competent care and can contribute to physical and mental health difficulties.

Theory-Informed Social Work Practice With People of Color

Social work practitioners are not uniform in their views on the relationship between theory and practice. Some believe that introducing theory into practice can result in the depersonalization of care, particularly in the context of the therapeutic relationship. Others argue, however, that a theory-informed approach to practice has the benefit of ensuring that social work interventions are based on sound evidence. Important as these perspectives are, they present a contradictory and dichotomized representation of social work because they overlook the fact that theory and practice are inextricably linked. Whether a social worker recognizes it or not, the application of theory in response to social issues is ubiquitous in the field.

Awareness about the importance of theory and practice emerges in the context of social work with people of color. Social workers would be limited in their abilities to provide culturally appropriate services to individuals and groups from different racial, ethnic, and cultural backgrounds if they relied solely on practice or professional wisdom. In a white-dominant profession such as social work, discernment about the lived experiences of people who are not white may be affected by the organizational culture and the extent to which practitioners are able to appraise a service user's situation from non-Eurocentric epistemological and ontological vantage points. Incorporating evidence-based theories into social work practice may help to lessen the effect of dominant cultural perspectives and personal biases or values in relation to working with nonwhite, racially and ethnically diverse groups.

Two influential theoretical orientations in social work are systems and psychosocial theories. The former centralizes interactions between individuals and interrelated subsystems, whereas the latter emphasizes a person-in-environment relationship. Rooted in Western, science-based knowledge systems, the applicability of these theories to people of color has been critiqued with regard to their need for uptake of integrated, culturally diverse knowledge. Cultural competence theory, which seeks to promote skills, attitudes, and values conducive to effective multicultural social work practice, emerged as a response to this limitation. An important point in this regard is that becoming culturally competent is a long-term commitment, requiring continuous self- and organizational assessment. Despite cultural competence's favorable properties, debate lingers about whether it qualifies as a theory. Some have also speculated about its potential to sidestep the social realities of racism. However, compared to the two dominant theories used in social work practice, Doman Lum—an expert in culturally competent practice—has pointed out that cultural competence's emphasis on themes such as ethnicity, culture, gender, minority, and social class can help in understanding the multicultural experience of people of color. Such focus might explain the popularity and acceptance of cultural competence in the human services profession, including among social workers who may not all have sufficient understanding regarding implementing and assessing culturally competent practice.

Regardless, support of cultural competency as an institutional imperative has been strengthened since both the National Association of Social Workers and the Canadian Association of Social Workers endorsed a commitment to diversity and understanding of differences between and within cultures in their respective policy statements and codes of ethics. This expression of support reflects the changing social work landscape and the importance of the social dimensions of culture when it comes to empowering groups who, historically, have been and continue to be discriminated against and underserved by the profession.

The Process Stage Approach to Social Work Practice With People of Color

Implicit in a discussion of a process stage approach to generalist social work practice with people of color is the notion of cultural commonality. This idea, not impervious to differences among racial and ethnic groups, stresses the importance of a shared understanding and experience of oppression and the social dynamics of privilege. As well, it emphasizes group over individual functioning, reflecting tendencies and values of people in collectivistic cultures as compared to Western societies' individualistic orientation. Doman Lum's framework for cross-cultural social work acknowledges this differentiation, specifying appropriate helping process stages and culturally relevant practice interventions when working with diverse service users of non-European origin.

For example, in the contact stage, the social worker looks to establish a healthy, nurturing relationship. Among people of color, cynicism may arise from past negative institutional contact and experiences of daily racial microaggressions and discrimination, including disapproving cultural attitudes toward seeking professional help. These situations can hinder the development of a quality, mutually trusting, therapeutic alliance. Therefore, in this stage, effort must be made to assuage any service users' suspicion and mistrust surrounding their receipt of support services. Establishing accessible and integrated systems of care and support that are inclusive of multicultural communities as partners may also help with the relationship building crucial to effective service delivery to individuals.

From the trust and rapport developed, service users can overcome feelings of shame, which may facilitate the identification of problems best addressed by matching problem themes with appropriate problem levels. This approach recognizes that people of color commonly present with multiple problems, owing to the various interlocking matrices of oppression encountered in society.

Likewise, when undertaking assessment with people of color aimed at goal-oriented care planning, social workers should consider individual, cultural, and communal assets and support systems that can be leveraged to resolve problem situations. Reliance on traditional, affective diagnosis may limit identification of culturally responsive intervention strategies. As in the problem-identification stage, intervention levels must be aptly matched with intervention strategies for optimal result. Using task-centered or behaviorally oriented activities can be helpful in this regard.

Finally, akin to social work practice with people in general, termination can occur when the goals and objectives agreed upon by the social worker and service user have been met or resolved. Research suggests that, compared to their white counterparts, people of color are more likely to terminate support prematurely. When possible, these individuals should be supported by identifying alternative helping formats. Clues of when termination might be appropriate include growth of maturity, as reflected by developments achieved from point of contact to termination, followed by the service user's ability to recount affirmatory progress made in the therapeutic process. Periodic telephone follow-up conversation with the service user may help with maintaining therapeutic gains.

Sulaimon Giwa
York University

See Also: Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of; Power, Race, Ethnicity and; Racial/Ethnic Categories, U.S. Census.

Further Readings

Isaacs, M. R., et al. The Road to Evidence: The Intersection of Evidence-Based Practices and Cultural Competence in Children's Mental Health. Owings Mills, MD: National Alliance of Multi-Ethnic Behavioral Health Associations, 2005.

Lum, Doman. Culturally Competent Practice: A Framework for Understanding Diverse Groups and Justice Issues, 4th ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole-Thomson Learning, 2011.

Lum, Doman. Social Work Practice and People of Color: A Process-Stage Approach, 5th ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole-Thomson Learning, 2004.

Razack, Narda and Donna Jeffery. "Critical Race Discourse and Tenets for Social Work." Canadian Social Work Review, v.19/2 (2002).

Social Workers

A social worker is a person who supports people in overcoming their challenges and provides this in a timely and professional manner. The social workers most people have come across are the ones who work within communities (e.g., organizing campaigns, community cleaning, promoting behavior change, etc.) and at institutions such as hospitals, counseling centers, schools, food distribution places, and so on—both during emergencies (or after a disaster) as well as during nonemergency or normal times (e.g., a polio vaccination campaign). The range of social service areas where social workers operate is wide. The skill, training and operational practices for social workers depend on the contextual environment, needs, and the types of support they are providing.

This entry provides an overall description of social workers (mainly those working internationally but also covering those who work in domestic contexts) and the profession of social work, the areas they work in, how they operate, as well as some of the recent discussions and challenges or concerns around social workers and social work and how the profession may change in the future.

The National Association of Social Workers (NASW, http://www.naswdc.org) defines social workers as graduates of schools of social work who use their knowledge and skills to provide social services for clients (who may be individuals, families, groups, communities, organizations, or society in general). Social workers help people increase their capacities for problem solving and coping, and they help them obtain needed resources, facilitate interactions between individuals and between people and their environments, make organizations responsible to people, and influence social policies. Social workers may work directly with clients addressing individual, family, and community issues, or they may work at a systems level on regulations and policy development or as administrators and planners of large social service systems.

Why Does Someone Become a Social Worker, and What Defines the Social Work Sphere?

A deep-seated desire and interest to help others, alleviate their suffering, and make a difference in people's lives by empowering them is what motivates individuals to take on to the profession of social work. Helping others during times of need is a fundamental human nature that can be explained in terms of the value of humanitarianism. Humanitarianism is an ethic of kindness, benevolence, and sympathy extended universally and impartially to all human beings. Humanitarianism has been an evolving concept historically, but universality is a common element in its evolution. No distinction is to be made in the face of suffering or abuse on grounds of gender, sexual orientation, tribe, caste, age, religion, or nationality. Humanitarianism can also be described as the acceptance of every human being for plainly being another human, ignoring and abolishing biased social views, prejudice, and racism in the process if utilized individually as a practiced viewpoint or mind-set. Humanitarianism is a central tenet in the sphere of social work and drives the motivation and value system of social workers.

Some of the fundamental value systems that define the sphere of social work are as follows: supporting the vulnerable and needy in a timely manner and with assistance that they need, ensuring dignity and respect for those who are being helped, providing immediate support yet helping the person become self-reliant, and sympathy and empathy with the cause of social work.

Social work has been emerging as a distinct profession over the last several decades, and there is increasing reliance on social workers by communities and governments to provide support, especially in areas that require soft skills such as building trust and confidence, to be effective. Social workers are also valued for their ability to provide interrupted, long-term, and personalized service to individuals and beneficiary groups. Despite the apparent simplicity with which some perceive social work as a profession and social workers, this is anything but simple and requires a high degree of skills in a multitude of aspects—technical, behavioral, cognitive and perceptiveness, communication, advocacy and lobbying, presentation, forward thinking, personal organization and planning, self-awareness and management, and so on.

John Sudberry, in his paper focused on social work and the need for relationship building, mentions that a core component of social work is the ability to respond to people's emotional needs, to their impulse for emotional development, and to the difficulties they experience in forming or maintaining relationships. Many of the problems have origins in societal dynamics (e.g., of racism, gender inequality, and economics), and social workers have important roles in ensuring material and financial resources. But whatever other dimensions they may have, problems of child abuse, of mental health, of violence in intimate relationships, of bereavement in later life, all involve perturbations in emotions and relationships.

Some of the most desirable skills and behavioral competencies that an effective social worker needs to be effective are as follows. This is not a complete list by all means, and different contexts and needs will require others.

Building a core belief value system, staying true to it, and rethinking it are essential to providing larger purpose to the work that the person does. Building lasting and trusting relationships with others is a crucial necessity to enable the social worker to work effectively with community groups and beneficiaries. Awareness of diversity that exists within the community (e.g., based on gender, age, race, religion, culture, sexual preferences, socioeconomic background, geographic origin—urban or rural, etc.) is an important requirement for a social worker. An ability to interact and work with these diverse populations at ease, overcoming and challenging any stereotypes that may be associated with any group, and not letting one's own personal beliefs and systems interfere are important to ensure the clients effectively participate in the service being provided. Managing expectations between different stakeholders on what is practically feasible in terms of support outcomes is essential.

Emotional intelligence is an important need for a social worker. Emotional intelligence is defined as the capacity of a person to be aware of, control, and express one's emotions and to handle interpersonal relationships judiciously and empathetically. It is not something that can be taught in a training program but what can be acquired over time through experience and empathy toward the beneficiaries. Not being judgmental and biased is an absolute necessity that helps to build trust. Acquiring and developing professional skills necessary on the issue is crucial. There is an increasing need for specific academic courses and certifications to qualify and provide support for social workers. Training and retaining throughout the course of a professional career as a social worker is important to stay abreast of the changing contexts, practices, and professional procedures. Strong skills in communication (verbal and nonverbal) with a diverse group of stakeholders is important, including negotiation skills in order to work with various stakeholders such as beneficiaries and client groups. Skills on diplomacy are equally important. An understanding of the rights that beneficiaries have is an important aspect that social workers have to be aware of. This necessarily means that the beneficiaries have rights to quality and dignified services, and it is the responsibility of the social workers (as well as other stakeholders) to uphold these rights.

Maintaining confidentiality on issues and information related to beneficiaries is important to ensure that trust built over time is maintained. Equality in the social work practice is another important value as well as a practical element that the social worker needs to be aware of. Understanding of equality (or lack thereof) within the society is important for the social worker so that he or she can design interventions for the beneficiary that address these issues in order to be effective.

Self-management is an absolutely important need for a social worker. The social workers experience and come across many accounts of trauma, sad narrations from survivors, and hopelessness, and this can affect them mentally. Staying focused and professional despite this is important, and therefore, social workers are strongly encouraged to seek professional counseling support from time to time to relieve the stress. Cultural understanding regarding the community within which the social worker operates is an important determinant of treatment and support standards. Networking with other social workers, others within the community, and especially a professional body is also important for social workers. The professional networks can help them stay abreast of issues within the sector as well as build a support mechanism. There are several such forums throughout the world. The International Federation of Social Workers (IFSW, http://ifsw.org/what-we-do/), founded in Paris in 1928, is one such body that mentions on its Web site that is has more than 750,000 members worldwide. The Web site also has a plethora of other information and policies related to social work and workers.

Challenges for Social Workers and Social Work

Like any other profession, the arena of social work and social workers also are faced with some of the following criticisms and challenges. Case Study 1 gives a firsthand account of an experience with social work and social workers during a humanitarian crisis.

Professionalism. The performance indicators for social work and social workers remain largely subjective for most of the areas in which they work. The quality of work done is therefore guided by individual skill sets, motivation, training, and experience. While it can be noted that there are guidelines and procedures laid out for a large category of social work types, there are many categories for whom there are no clear and standardized guidelines and therefore clear performance indicators. Owing to this limitation, social workers therefore are sometimes criticized, including negative stereotyping and negative media publicity.

Cost versus benefit. In developing and underdeveloped countries, where resource allocations depend a great deal on tangible outcomes, social workers are seen as an expensive human resource to invest in. Counseling a child with learning difficulties over a long period of time by a social worker is seen as a luxury over, say, building additional classrooms and hiring teachers.

Simplification of approaches. Doubts are often expressed in many situations whether the social workers use an oversimplified approach in dealing with complex issues.

Lack of commonly understood performance benchmarks. Probably one of the most common criticisms of social work and social workers is lack of standardized benchmarks for performance measurement across different sectors and themes.

Accountability. Given the diverse range of areas social workers are involved in and equally diverse practices and standards, lack of accountability is a critical issue that is often cited as a critique of social workers.

Case Study 1

After the 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami, the author saw several examples of social work and social workers that were inappropriate and extremely concerning. Working with a large, international humanitarian organization at that time, the author traveled within days to the worst-hit parts of south India (Tamil Nadu state, Nagappatinam, Cuddalore, and Kerala state, Kollam district) to assess the damage, plan emergency response, and launch interventions to support the populations hit.

The scale of the disaster was massive, yet the ability of the government and communities to cope with them was equally robust. Even within the early days of the disaster, the government was working with the network of community institutions, and leaders had been able to clean most of the roads and provide drinking water (tankers), temporary shelters, and food to most of the families. Given the enormous scale of the disaster, the damage it had created, and the media attention it created nationally and internationally, a lot of social workers and assistance had arrived in the area. While the author was impressed with the interest and ability of people to help, respected their intentions, and also impressed with the professionalism with which many of the social workers worked, the author also had the worst of experiences. Given below are some examples.

Inappropriate aid. Truckloads of used clothes arrived in the area (including soiled and torn clothes, used undergarments, etc.) that were detested by the local communities. Though the community leaders did not want to hurt the sentiments of the aid givers and did not return them (most of these were piled on street corners for days), they were clearly offended when the trucks kept coming. One community leader told me, "We have lost our families, houses, and livelihoods to the tsunami but not our dignity and self-respect." Many other types of inappropriate materials were brought in, such as cooked food that had become bad during transportation, types of canned meat that the local population did not eat (due to religious reasons), various types of junk food, and so on.

Linking relief support with religious messages. Many so-called social workers were distributing relief assistance along with religious books and messages. Talking to one of them, the author was told, "This is the time when people need religion the most."

Disaster tourism. Hordes of do-gooders had descended into the area with the simple reason to see the impact of the tsunami. While that in itself is not an issue, it was clearly concerning that they did not respect any privacy of the affected people, taking photographs of dead bodies and even by removing the white clothes the bodies were covered in as a mark of respect.

Self-promotion. Private companies, housing societies, social clubs, and so on all had generated funds (and assorted in-kind assistance) for the tsunami-affected population. That was encouraging. What was not so appropriate was when they used it as a photo opportunity to promote the names of their affiliate organizations. In many instances, the author saw long queues of people waiting for relief assistance while first waiting for the speeches and photosessions to end (one such organization realized they had not brought a banner with their name on it and so had to organize one from a nearby village painter, delaying the relief distribution for more than five hours).

Inappropriate Contacts With Vulnerable Groups

Many social workers in these areas claimed they had come in to take care of children in the affected villages and set up tents in open grounds as child care centers. They then encouraged parents to bring in their children to these centers to receive care and support and also to get counseling through play, and so on. The author spent some time at some of these centers observing them (discretely from a distance) and was appalled to see that the social workers clearly were not trained or skilled to handle young children. Several of these centers had both female and male social workers, but many of the male social workers were freely and physically interacting with children (3- to 10-year-olds mainly). In one case, nine days after the disaster, the author saw a social worker discussing with a family the adoption of a 4-year-old boy (his parents had died in the tsunami) and encouraging them to talk to a couple who had come in to adopt a child. This was clearly not the time, nor was the family in a position to make a well-informed decision.

What Does the Future Hold for Social Workers and Social Work?

Given the scope of the social work profession and the range of issues social workers are engaged in, it is difficult to explain how it will change. Given below are some thoughts, especially for social workers in the humanitarian and development (e.g., persons working on issues such as poverty, climate change, gender equality, community empowerment, etc.) work arena. Case Study 2 also gives a sense of some of the experiences of social workers in this realm.

1. Greater and better understanding among the public regarding social work, what it constitutes, and how it is done—there is already a great deal of appreciation for the work that the social workers do, and this can increase if the public understands their work better.
2. There will be greater effort for professionalization of social workers through standardized trainings, certification, and performance review systems.
3. Improvements in working conditions, remuneration, and benefits for social workers are likely to happen with better appreciation of the important roles they play.
4. Better opportunity for governments and nongovernmental or community organizations to coordinate their actions around strengthening the social work sector will likely occur.
5. Continued work on development of standardized protocols and practices that social workers use in supporting their clients will emerge.
6. Increased use of accountability frameworks to guide the social work sphere.
7. Innovations in practices used by social workers will continue to grow, including better documentation and sharing across sectors.
8. There will also be greater emphasis on generation of a clear evidence base around various practices and protocols used by social workers for supporting beneficiaries. This will help strengthen the arguments in favor of increased allocation of resources to the sector as well as other changes within the sector to further improve quality standards.

Case Study 2: What Causes a Person to Become a Humanitarian Worker?

While working in several east African countries and with international nongovernmental and humanitarian or development organizations over the last seven years, the author discussed with several colleagues (both expatriates as well as national staff) the nature of social work and ourselves, the social and humanitarian workers—what is the motivation to do this work in difficult environments, how is it done, and what is being achieved? Problems were discussed as well. It is a very passionate issue for most humanitarian social workers, and everyone has a point of view. Given below are some of the most common observations the author has noted and summarized.

Unequivocally, most colleagues respond that humanitarian workers are needed to help the most vulnerable, and that is why they joined the profession. Many also take pride in the fact that they are professionals with certain skills, and combined with skills of other colleagues, they are able to address the issues that vulnerable people are facing (refugees, internally displaced persons, famine- and drought-affected persons, malnourished children, people living with human immunodeficiency virus [HIV], etc.).

Some of the motivation factors are said to be compassion and sympathy with the suffering, a desire to do something different and meaningful with their lives, and gaining perspectives on real issues on the ground. Given that a large part of international humanitarian work is well organized as a profession, the people who work within this system also receive salaries and other benefits comparable to any other profession, and this is also said to be a motivation. Almost all colleagues the author has met (especially the ones who have worked for three to five years or more) do not consider working in a profession other than social work.

How Are Humanitarian Workers Doing, and What Are They Achieving?

The range of views on this is broad. Many are very sure that what they are doing indeed changes lives, although other do not agree as much and feel that the work that they do provides short-term solutions to deep-rooted and broader issues. Colleagues working with short-term emergency programs tend to find more evidence that their interventions are actually saving lives and helping people get back to normal lives. People working in long-term development issues (e.g., climate change, poverty eradication, behavior change communication, etc.) are a little less sure that the interventions they do are going to have tangible results (or whether they will stay there long enough to see the change). There is a general feeling that the humanitarian work is professionalizing very fast, and the individual as well as organizational performance and accountability measures are becoming more strict (enforced and demanded by organizations, donors, governments, and communities or beneficiaries), and of course, this is welcomed by all.

What Problems Do Humanitarian Workers Have as a Sector?

Many strongly believe that the accountability values within the sector are still lax. Bureaucracy within organizations, needlessly long-drawn analyses of issues (instead of responding sooner), poor coordination, an inability to be dynamic (compared to the corporate sector, which learns and adapts) in line with changing contexts, actions driven by donor funding, and poor leadership within the sector are some of the other often-repeated self-criticisms.

What Changes Will Be Seen in a Decade?

Despite the concerns mentioned, many strongly believe that humanitarians will continue to play a vital role in the years to come. The impacts of climate change and resultant drought and deprivation, long-drawn conflicts in many parts of the world, and increasing trends of natural disasters will continue to impact large populations across the world (especially in the developing and least-developed countries). This demand on humanitarian workers will lead to greater professionalization, accountability, and quality standards, and we should rethink the way we respond to needs. The focus on building resilience in communities will be greater so that they can cope with natural disaster better.

Prafulla K. Mishra
Norwegian Refugee Council

See Also: Case Management; Case Management Services; Community-Based Services.

Further Readings

Blewett, James, et al. "The Changing Roles and Tasks of Social Work." http://www.scie.org.uk/news/files/roles.pdf (Accessed October 2013).

The National Assembly for Wales. "People Need People—Releasing the Potential of People Working in Social Services." http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20130401151715/https://www.education.gov.uk/publications/eOrderingDownload/JJR1453.pdf (Accessed October 2013).

Reichert, Elisabeth. "Move From Social Justice to Human Rights Provides New Perspective." The International Journal of Continuing Social Work Education, v.4/1 (2001).

Sudberry, John. "Key Features of Therapeutic Social Work: The Use of Relationship." http://usir.salford.ac.uk/3106/3/Key_features_-_relationship_v2.pdf (Accessed on October 2013).

Trevithick, Pamela. S*ocial Work Skills—A Practice Handbook*. Open University Press, 2000.

Socioeconomic Status

Socioeconomic status (SES) refers to individuals' socially constructed social class based on their income levels and occupational prestige. Associated are cultural characteristics and norms. Classes range from the affluent of privileged status to those in poverty and of marginalized status. Individuals who experience discrimination based on their socioeconomic status are considered victims of classism. Access to resources is typically correlated with SES. This entry describes the various classes, their characteristics, the consequences of classism, and applicable resources.

Levels of Socioeconomic Status

While much debate exists on the accurate measurement of SES, it is most commonly established based on variables including one's income, assets, education, and social class. Environmental influences, such as natural disasters, government recessions, illnesses, inheritances, and investments, can impact one's social and economic status. Likewise, SES can change from one generation to the next within families. One's socioeconomic status can play a significant role in cognitive and physical development, health and well-being, and overall functioning. SES is commonly broken down into five levels, from poorest to wealthiest: lower class, working class, lower-middle class, upper-middle class, and upper class.

Based on data from the U.S. Census Bureau, in 2012, approximately 15 percent of the American population lived below the poverty line, which was established to be $23,050 per year for a family of four. These individuals are classified as part of the lower or poverty class. Innumerable stressors are associated with this class, including inadequate access to quality health care and education, unsafe living conditions, poor nutrition, and significant discrimination. The majority of individuals living in poverty today are African American female-headed households. An examination of social and institutional variables contributing to the experience of those who identify as part of this class is necessary to adequately address their needs.

Approximately 32 percent of the American population would be considered part of the working class, in which individuals typically have lower levels of education, hold blue-collar jobs, and have less job security. Their average annual income does not typically exceed $30,000. Those of lower-middle class status make up approximately another 32 percent of the population and tend to be college graduates with semiprofessional jobs. Their income tends to average $55,000 annually. The upper-middle class accounts for approximately 15 percent of the population. These individuals commonly hold graduate degrees with professional, white-collar positions. Many make more than $100,000 per year.

Construction workers on a job site. The working class makes up about 32 percent of the American population and includes individuals who hold blue-collar jobs like working construction.

The upper class consists of those who make more than $150,000 per year (about 5 percent) and those who make more than $250,000 per year (1 percent). Individuals in this group tend to be heirs, top executives, and celebrities. They tend to wield the greatest amount of power in decision making for American society. Considering the percentages of the American population that fall into each SES level, it is clear that there is a markedly wide gap in wealth, with its distribution being greatly contained by the uppermost 20 percent of the nation. It is estimated that the top 1 percent of households account for 35 percent of the nation's wealth, while the next 19 percent account for 55 percent. Thus, the remaining 80 percent of individuals living in the United States share the residual 10 percent.

Other socioeconomic classifications include generational poverty, situational poverty, risen-from-poverty middle class, illusory middle class, and the owning rich versus ruling rich. For those experiencing generational poverty, the cycle of poverty is passed through several generations, creating a culture of impoverishment. This cycle tends to be very challenging to break and includes variables that are both individual and systemic.

Individuals of situational poverty have typically either experienced a crisis (divorce) or a major transition (returning to school) that results in temporary income decreases. While experiencing this drop in SES, individuals may struggle to accept the culture of their new status and maintain the beliefs and behaviors of the status from which they dropped. For example, one may be embarrassed to seek assistance from a free county health clinic despite having no insurance. Situational poverty is typically reversible with most returning to their former, higher SES once they have resolved the circumstances resulting in their drop in status.

The risen-from-poverty middle class have obtained resources allowing them the benefits of middle-class financial stability, yet they commonly remain closely tied to the culture of the lower class. These individuals often provide financial support to family and friends of the lower class. They may also continue to engage in many customs associated with the lower class such as shopping at thrift stores for clothing despite having the resources to shop elsewhere.

Individuals of the illusory middle class attempt to represent themselves as financially stable through the ownership of material items and participation in costly activities. Yet these individuals are often heavily burdened with debt. Multiple credit cards are commonly at their maximum. Bills may be shuffled so that the ones that must be paid every month do not go delinquent, while those with fewer consequences for skipping payments are postponed. Much stress can be associated with maintaining the illusion of middle class social status when one's income is, in reality, that of a lower economic status.

The difference between the owning rich and ruling rich is primarily based on power. The owning rich have typically inherited resources that make working unnecessary, while the ruling rich typically hold positions of influence that impact political and social decisions. The owning rich are often referred to as old money. The ruling rich may include those considered community leaders due to owning successful businesses, public servants who have gained respect by constituents through professional and political endeavors, and corporate moguls who impact the American economy through their business endeavors.

It is also important to note that SES may supercede other cultural identities. Those who are similar racially, culturally, and ethnically may hold drastically different SESs that make their experiences dissimilar. For example, an African American adolescent who is impoverished and attending a Title 1 school in an urban environment would likely have very little in common with a wealthy African American adolescent living in a well-to-do suburban neighborhood and attending private school.

Classist Myths and Their Consequences

Attitudes and beliefs about those in other classes, called classism, exist within and between each socioeconomic level. Classism exists as a means for those within a given socioeconomic status to justify their way of being. However, classism often impacts one's self-identity development as well. Four defined levels of classism include downward, upward, lateral, and internalized.

Downward classism occurs when those of a higher SES judge and discriminate against those in lower SES levels. This type of classism is by far the most common and most hurtful. Examples include the belief that the poor are poor by choice due to laziness, lack of effort in school, poor work effort, desire to live off of government subsidies, or stupidity to name a few. As a result, those engaging in downward classism are far less likely to support policies and initiatives to assist those of low SES and to fight against inequities. The consequences of these beliefs can be harmful, resulting in a lack of focus on the systemic and institutional barriers that perpetuate poverty, such as inequitable access to quality education and health care.

Upward classism can also occur. In this case, those of lower SES prejudge and make assumptions about the wealthy. Some of these assumptions may include viewing the wealthy as having easy lives with few troubles or concerns, having rewarding and posh careers, being born with a silver spoon in one's mouth where financial concerns are of no consequence, having the resources to solve all of life's problems, and being snobbish. Often overlooked is the amount of time required to maintain this lifestyle, the psychological and personal sacrifices to uphold this status, the awareness of others questioning one's motives, and the ongoing effort required to maintain this status for multiple generations. As a result, some identifying in this SES engage in efforts to disguise their wealth. They may experience physical health problems as a result of the efforts put into maintaining their wealth. Research also indicates that the wealthy abuse substances at a higher rate than those in lower SES levels. Self-medication appears to be a common coping strategy for those maintaining their wealthy, privileged status.

Lateral classism occurs between those of the same socioeconomic level. It consists of pressure exerted by individuals onto others of the same class to maintain the culture, beliefs, behaviors, and financial status associated with the class. If an individual moves out of a socioeconomic class, either to a lower one or a higher one, he or she is likely to experience a great deal of criticism and judgment from individuals associated with the class that was left. Lateral classism can result in individuals choosing to avoid opportunities that may promote one's status, such as opting not to go to college despite having the grades to get admitted or to take on additional stressors, such as a second or third job, as a means to avoid falling from one's status. The phrase "keeping up with the Joneses" captures the essence of lateral classism.

Those experiencing internalized classism castigate themselves for failing to maintain their socioeconomic culture. This classism is associated with personal feelings of anxiety, depression, anger, frustration, or inadequacy. Internalized classism is not aimed at others but rather is concerned with self-reprimand as a result of experiences with upward, downward, or lateral classism. For example, if an individual is pressured by others in his or her socioeconomic class to purchase the latest commodities owned by his or her peers and then is criticized for not having the means to make those purchases (lateral classism), the individual may experience personal frustration, disappointment, and self-recrimination for failing to conform to the social and financial demands of his or her class (internalized classism).

Human Services Resources

Human services professionals can play a vital role in assisting clients regarding factors related to SES. To be most effective, it is essential for helpers to first challenge personal misperceptions of social class. One must consider classist views inherited from experiences in one's own socioeconomic level and work to develop understanding, empathy, and acceptance of those in other classes. An effective helper will understand that a client of a different SES level may lack trust and require effort to establish rapport and understanding. Through genuine acceptance of those from different social classes, it becomes possible to empower clients to accept themselves and work toward positive growth.

Likewise, helpers must become knowledgeable of the common beliefs, behaviors, and experiences shared by those in each SES level. Helpers must consider the intersecting variables impacting clients' experiences. Challenging personal perspectives and gaining awareness of the cultures of the classes can be accomplished through reading reputable resources on the topic, immersing oneself in the cultures of other classes, consulting with cultural informants from each class, and receiving training specifically related to the topic of SES.

A self-aware and knowledgeable human services professional can be an invaluable resource for clients with concerns related to socioeconomic status and other intersecting sociodemographic factors. For example, awareness that stress can be experienced by individuals at all SES levels can be translated into physical, emotional, and behavioral coping strategies that assist clients in addressing their negative intrapsychic processes as well as their potentially unhealthy and counterproductive practices aimed at maintaining or improving upon one's SES level. Teaching stress management techniques to be implemented by individual clients, engaging in dialogue to challenge internalized classism, and serving as a life coach to assist clients in adjusting their economic practices may all contribute to decreasing SES-related stress.

Teaching information and skills are also essential for work with clients around issues related to SES. Clients can be taught information about the culture of his or her social class and classism, educational resources, healthy living, and available support services. Helpful skills to teach may include job search strategies, interviewing techniques, banking, study skills, and job maintenance practices.

While working with clients of varying SESs, it is also important to refrain from making assumptions about clients with regard to SES. For example, a human services professional would be engaging in downward classism by assuming that all clients wish to pursue a college degree as a means to climb the social ladder. Rather, it is important to assess a client's work goals and encourage that which the client desires, even if the goal is toward a less-prestigious and more blue-collar endeavor. Likewise, a helper could engage in lateral classism by assuming a working-class client is only qualified for blue-collar jobs. Again, it is important for the helper to explore with the client his or her professional goals and assist in removing barriers to accomplishing those goals.

Advocacy is another essential skill for the human services professional that cuts across all levels of SESs. It is most essential to intervene with social systems that create barriers to the marginalized lower or poverty class by promoting the removal of systemic barriers to opportunities, imparting knowledge of the impact of downward and lateral classism, and teaching the marginalized how to become empowered change agents themselves. However, advocacy by human services professionals with regard to refuting classism can occur at any level.

SES is a construct greatly constructed and maintained by the people in a given society. In the United States, the wealth distribution is greatly skewed, with 20 percent of the population holding 90 percent of the nation's wealth and 80 percent of the population holding the remaining 10 percent of wealth. Many differences exist between the various levels of SES. These cultural variations have implications for human services practice. Finally, understanding the impact of classism at each level is essential for addressing issues and concerns accurately.

Tammi F. Milliken
Old Dominion University

See Also: Economic Support and Services; Poverty; Yuppies and Buppies.

Further Readings

American Psychological Association. "Publications: Reports, Fact Sheets, and Other Publications Regarding Socioeconomic Status." http://www.apa.org/pi/ses/resources/publications (Accessed January 2013).

Liu, W. M. and S. R. Ali. "Social Class and Classism: Understanding the Psychological Impact of Poverty and Inequality." In S.D. Brown and R. W. Lent, eds., Handbook of Counseling Psychology, 4th ed. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2008.

Schmidt, J. J. "Social Class and Economic Considerations." In J. J Schmidt, ed., Social and Cultural Foundations of Counseling and Human Services. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Education, 2006.

Thompson, W. and J. Hickey. Society in Focus. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson, Allyn and Bacon, 2005.

Sociology of Disability

People with disabilities constitute the largest minority group in the United States. As a natural course of the human condition, nearly everyone will be temporarily or permanently impaired at some point in life. The sociology of disability is a focus on the study of disability to illuminate sociological issues (e.g., the role of people with disabilities in society, the relationship between medical and human services providers and those utilizing services, and disabling and enabling frameworks within societal organizations). It is an analysis of disability within the context of its connection to social structures and social interaction.

Historically, sociology has relegated disability to the margins. In recent years, medical sociology or the sociology of health and illness have gained much attention in the discipline. Yet within most standard sociology textbooks, disability has remained relegated to chapters on deviance and limited to Erving Goffman's classic work on spoiled identities; to references of the Americans With Disability Act; or less commonly, to mention of Michel Foucault's work on governing disability. However, a rapidly expanding multidisciplinary arena, disability studies, has served to inform and transform contemporary thinking on disability. As a counterbalance to the medicalization of disability, disability studies reveal the sociopolitical representations of disability, challenging foundational assumptions of normalcy, functionality, attractiveness, wellness, and perfection. Disability studies have been characterized as emerging from the lived experience of persons with disabilities as activists and academics with disabilities have produced much of its body of knowledge.

Citizenship and Ableism

Within the human species, there is a vast diversity of behavior, appearance, functioning, sensory acuity, and cognitive processing. Throughout different eras and locales, societal response to this variation has oscillated between the extermination of those perceived as defective to the provision of paternalistic charity to those viewed as subjects of pity. Eradication attempts have ranged from compulsory sterilization, abortions, and infanticide to eugenics-inspired executions and euthanasia. Segregation attempts include but are not limited to tuberculosis sanitariums, ugly laws and ordinances, the institutionalization movement, nursing homes and group living quarters, sheltered workshops, and "special" education and transit. The pity responses have spurred "affliction"-specific charitable industries, national telethons, research institutes seeking "cures," and a vast network of fragmented, state-sponsored welfare programs. All these responses and some, particularly in recent years, well intentioned have been shaped by ableist influences or the unexamined presumption that impairment or disability is inherently negative.

Ableism is a type of discrimination, like sexism or racism, which results from a fear of, or aversion to, variation in the human body. Fiona Kumari Campbell further clarifies that ableism is beyond a system of oppression where a specific enemy can be identified and extracted. She defines ableism as a network that produces an exclusionary matrix whereby authorities in the governance of disability may change, but other formations such as the use of regimes of law and medicine remain. It is these regimes of laws and policies that effectively build a disabling socially, economically, and physically constructed environment around people with disabilities.

The disability rights movement brought attention to and sought to combat ableist social structures with the demand for the basic rights of all citizens. These demands strove for integration instead of segregation, education and employment opportunities rather than charity, and opportunities for independence rather than dependence. However, the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964 that afforded civil rights protections to racial and ethnic minorities and women intentionally excluded people with disabilities. Subsequent efforts to gain the inclusion of people with disabilities into the Civil Rights Act were rejected. It was not until nearly a decade later that the disability right movement would begin achieving civil rights at the national level under a series of separate pieces of legislation that culminated in the 1990 American With Disabilities Act.

Disabled Population

Most disabilities are acquired during the human life course and in old age, with a relatively smaller number being present at birth. Advances in modern medicine have increased rather than decreased the number of people with disabilities by extending life expectancies.

There is no single definition of disability. There are innumerable laws, policies, programs, and surveys designed to protect, serve, and count people with disabilities. All of these utilize different, and sometimes multiple, definitions, interpretations, and categorizations to determine disability status. Nevertheless, the U.S. Census estimates the number of people with disabilities to be more than 57 million, or 19 percent of the civilian, noninstitutionalized population. This would increase with the inclusion of people residing in institutional settings such as prisons, nursing homes, and psychiatric institutions. People with disabilities are generally considered the largest minority group in the United States.

The most common cause of disability in the United States is categorized within the physical domains (80.6 percent), which is predominately ambulatory difficulties and is followed by the mental domains (32.6 percent), which includes cognitive and emotional difficulties. The communicative domain constitutes 30.5 percent of all disabilities and includes seeing, hearing, and speech limitations. More than one-third (38.5 percent) of people with disabilities affiliate with more than one domain. According to the Centers for Disease Control, the most common single cause for disability is musculosketal disorders—for example, arthritis and back or spine problems—which are followed by heart disease.

Disability is a primary cause and consequence of income poverty. Working-age people with disabilities have lower levels of education attainment and employment than do people without disabilities. The Center for Economic and Policy Research reports that approximately 50 percent of working-age adults experiencing income poverty have a disability, and two-thirds of those experiencing long-term income poverty report having a disability. Individuals with disabilities represent the largest group of those experiencing income poverty, larger than that of any single minority or ethnic group or all minority ethnic and racial groups in combination.

Conclusion

To be disabled is to have experiences of being excluded and of being confronted on a daily basis by physical, environmental, legal, cultural, and attitudinal barriers that limit opportunities for human experience. Disability status is dependent not only upon the construction of buildings and transit in any given community but also on the standards and methods utilized to assess and (de)value human bodies. In an era of greater acceptance of differences in race, gender ethnicity, and sexual orientation, new reproductive technologies, the human genome project, and selective abortions provide an indication that this tolerance does not extend to disabled bodies.

Sara Lichtenwalter
Gannon University

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990; Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, United Nations; Disabilities, International Variation in Attitudes Toward; Disability Services; Disability Studies; Disabled Clients.

Further Readings

Campbell, F. A. K. The Great Divide: Ableism and Technologies of Disability Production. Center for Social Change Research, School of Humanities and Human Services, Queensland University of Technology. http://eprints.qut.edu.au/15889 (Accessed December 2013).

Davis, L. The Disability Studies Reader, 4th ed. New York: Routledge, 2013.

Fermstad, S. Half in Ten: Why Taking Disability Into Account Is Essential to Reducing Income Poverty and Expanding Economic Inclusion. Washington, DC: Center for Economic and Policy Research, 2009.

Fleischer, D. Z. and F. Zames. The Disability Rights Movement: From Charity to Confrontation, 2nd ed. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2011.

Longmore, P. K. and L. Umansky, eds. The New Disability History. New York: New York University Press, 2001.

Pothier, D. and R. Devlin, eds. Critical Disability Theory: Essays in Philosophy, Politics, Policy, and Law. Vancouver, Canada: University of British Columbia Press, 2006.

Tremain, S., ed. Foucalt and the Government of Disability. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2005.

South American Immigrants

Hispanics comprise the largest ethnic minority in the United States, with 53 million or 17 percent of the total population according to the 2010 U.S. Census. Projections of the U.S. Census Bureau indicate that, by the year 2060, approximately 128 million Hispanics will reside in the United States and will make up 31 percent of the population. The National Institutes of Health defines Hispanics as individuals from Mexico, Puerto Rico, Cuba, South or Central America, and members of a Spanish culture or origin, regardless of race. Hispanics in the United States, nonetheless, are usually perceived as a monolithic group and considered to have homogenous characteristics. In addition, when speaking of Hispanics in the United States, a great deal of attention is placed mostly on individuals of Puerto Rican, Cuban, or Mexican ancestry. Human services professionals are recognizing that an increasing number of Latin American immigrants are coming from South American countries including Colombia, Peru, and Ecuador. Identifying and understanding the needs of South Americans in the United States may help human services professionals develop policies and offer programs that can meaningfully impact that population.

South America

South America is the world's fourth-largest continent in terms of area and fifth in terms of population, which has been estimated to be in excess of 371 million. It is comprised of 12 independent countries. Of those, nine countries showed increased representation in the United States as reported by the 2010 U.S. Census Bureau: Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela. The three largest groups of South Americans in the United States include Columbians, with 1,039,923 people living in the United States, followed by Ecuadorians (662,663) and Peruvians (594,418). Although considered a fast-growing group of immigrants, South Americans encompass less than 7 percent of the total immigrant population in the United States.

South Americans come from a multifarious cultural, ethnic, racial, and linguistic background. European colonization and immigration, combined with indigenous people of the continent and the influx of Africans and Asians who immigrated or were brought to South America for economic purposes, contribute to the group's vast racial and ethnic diversity. South Americans who immigrate to the United States can be of African, Chinese, English, German, Italian, Japanese, or Jewish cultural backgrounds to name a few. This blending of cultures in the South American continent has generated a unique ethos that highlights the complexity of its cultural composition. In addition to cultural diversity, South Americans have diverse political ideologies that influence the regions' political and economic programs. South Americans who emigrate from Bolivia, Ecuador, Nicaragua, or Venezuela, countries heavily influenced by socialism, may have different understandings and expectations of governmental and social services agencies.

The literature indicates that, when arriving in the United States, South Americans have a variety of human services needs, especially health coverage, employment and education, transportation, and immigration and legal counsel.

Health Coverage

Many South American immigrants in the United States face challenges related to health care coverage. Although private health insurance coverage has increased significantly in South America—more than half of the population in Uruguay and Colombia and more than 25 percent of the population in Chile and Brazil, for example, are covered through private health insurance—in many of the countries, the public sector still finances health insurance for the poor, elderly, and unemployed. Upon arrival, South American immigrants of low-income backgrounds may lack appropriate health coverage and may find it difficult to navigate the health insurance complexities in the United States. Another concern for this population is absent or insufficient health insurance coverage for their children. In South America, health disparities abound in terms of health coverage for children and adolescents, a trend that may continue as immigrants relocate. This may have implications for public health as children may lack immunizations, may be more prone to contract or carry communicable diseases, and may face more hospitalizations due to poor medical care or disease management.

Employment and Education

Educational level usually determines the types of employment that people seek. In the United States, South American immigrants are found at different levels in the job market. Argentinians and Venezuelans have been identified as having a high percentage of employees in high analytical positions such as those in the science, technology, engineering, and math fields. However, a great number of South American immigrants in the United States are employed in manual labor or routine jobs due to low educational attainment. Employment status influences immigrants' ability to change their economic status in the future. The progression of upward mobility within this group is enhanced through opportunities that increase literacy skills and educational attainment for immigrant workers and their children. Concerted cultivation efforts for the children, as well as an increased number of programs that promote intergenerational mobility, may be necessary to ensure that immigrants have the opportunity to advance from manual or routine jobs to higher-paying positions requiring more complex thinking and decision making.

Transportation

South American immigrants and other ethnic minorities of low economic background heavily depend on public transportation for mobility. In the suburbs and rural areas, where public transportation is lacking due to a greater dependence on automobiles, it is more difficult for immigrants to get around. Low-income South Americans with limited access to transportation services also have limited housing and employment opportunities. In addition, undocumented immigrants are limited by immigration laws that preclude them from obtaining a driver's license. Limited transportation options in many U.S. cities restrict the ability of South American immigrants to find and retain a job, access healthy foods, seek medical care and treatment, or participate in social and community events.

Immigration Services

Improving the economic outlook of their nuclear or extended families continues to be one of the main reasons South Americans immigrate to the United States. Occasionally, political instabilities or wars, as well as drug wars stemming from coca production in Bolivia, Colombia, and Peru, are additional reasons for pursuing immigration. The majority of immigrants from South America arrive in the United States legally holding immigrant visas. However, nonimmigrant visas are also granted to students or travelers planning to return to South America once they have completed their courses or travel. Those with immigrant visas expecting to stay in the United States, however, may require assistance navigating the U.S. immigration and naturalization process. Both legal and unauthorized immigrants may seek advice on how to become temporary legal residents, permanent legal residents, or naturalized citizens. Complex factors, involving family-sponsored and employment-based preferences, as well as the region and country of birth, may influence the outcome.

Legal Counsel

English-language proficiency for South American immigrants varies by country. Although, in general, South Americans in the United States claim good or adequate levels of English-language proficiency, language barriers may be an issue for immigrants arriving from Bolivia, Ecuador, and Paraguay, where the poverty level is high and education level is low. Limited English proficiency becomes an issue for low-income immigrants from South America experiencing discrimination, sexual harassment, or civil rights violations, for example. For these individuals, the need for advocates as well as legal counseling and legal representation is critical.

South Americans represent a small percentage of the total Hispanic immigrant population in the United States; however, the number of immigrants from South America has increased significantly within the past decade. Their varied cultural, ethnic, linguistic, political, and economic backgrounds greatly influence their immigrant experience. When considering their human services needs, South Americans should not be considered as a monolithic group. Instead, careful consideration must be given to the populations' heterogeneity and unique profile.

Johanne I. Laboy
North Carolina State University

See Also: Behavior Support and Management; Caribbean Immigrants; Hispanic Americans; Uninsured Clients; U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Further Readings

North Carolina Department of Health and Human Services. Demographic Trends of Hispanics/Latinos in North Carolina. http://www.ncdhhs.gov/aging/cprofile/Hispanic_Latino2010.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

Stoney, S., J. Batalova, and J. Russell. South American Immigrants in the United States. South Migration Information Source. http://www.migrationinformation.org/USfocus/display.cfm?id=949 (Accessed December 2013).

U.S. Census Bureau News. Profile America Facts for Features. Hispanic Heritage Month. http://www.census.gov/newsroom/releases/pdf/cb13ff-19_hispanicheritage.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

U.S. Census Bureau. "Fact Finder: Hispanic or Latino Origin by Specific Region." http://factfinder2.census.gov/faces/tableservices/jsf/pages/productview.xhtml?pid=ACS_12_1YR_B03001&prodType=table (Accessed January 2014).

Southern Communities and Cultural Competence

What is cultural competence? Being competent regarding culture would seem the natural response. Suffice it to say that there are too few hours in a day for a person to become competent in every culture and every aspect of culture in the United States. Ethnicity is probably what most people think of when they think about culture. Then there is the culture of gender, age, orientation, religion, and so on. There is also the culture of geography. The culture for a white, straight, 30-year-old Methodist female living in Oklahoma (a southern state in the United States) is quite different from a white, straight, 30-year-old Methodist female living in Iran. It is simply the nature of culture and the culture of geography. Humans are puzzles made up uniquely of their cultural puzzle pieces.

The U.S. Census Bureau defines the southern states as Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware. Close to 117 million people live in these states. Five of these states are a part of the original 13 colonies.

Oneself

When speaking of southern cultural competency, professionals must factor in their own cultures, subcultures, frames of reference, and geography. This includes being aware of one's own values, beliefs, and cultural biases. Our human services provider puzzle is made up of the cultural pieces that, if not understood, evaluated, reevaluated, and honed, keep us from providing unbiased, well-informed help.

Demographics

The demographics of the United States are going through a constant transformation. There are more than 1 million people added to the U.S. population every year. This constant change necessitates the understanding of diversity as a fluctuating part of human interaction. Cultural competence is all the more important in the human services industry. It is predicted that, by 2050, one-fourth of the country will be Hispanic and one-tenth Asian. There is no exception for southern communities. Trinity High School in the southern town of Euless, Texas, with a student population of less than 2,500, flies the flags of the 52 nations represented by the student population.

Southern United States culture may be thought of as a place where life happens at a little slower, more-relaxed pace, and loyalty runs deep. Many picture it as the conservative antebellum south full of southern cooking, music, and southern hospitality. Culture competency in the south varies like cultural competency elsewhere in the United States. Just as planet Earth is becoming a global village, so are southern communities.

Divorce rates are somewhat high for the southern states. The national divorce rate is around 9.2 per 1,000 for men and 9.7 per 1,000 for women in the United States, with the south having 10.2 per 1,000 for men and 11.1 per 1,000 for women.

Southern states continue to fall behind in educational advancement as well. Cultural competence is affected by poverty. The southern states have some of the uppermost levels of poverty in the United States. Of the states with the lowest median income, nine out of 10 of them are southern states, with Mississippi having the greatest level of poverty in the United States. With a lack of education and being impoverished generally comes poor health and health care. Accordingly, cases of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) are higher in the southern United Sates. One-half of newly reported cases of HIV are in the south and nearly half of newly reported acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) diagnoses are in the southern states. This is surprising because the southern states only make up about 37 percent of the U.S. population.

A woman dressed as a traditional southern belle. A common view of the southern United States is the conservative antebellum south full of southern cooking, music, and hospitality.

Becoming Culturally Sensitive

In order to be culturally sensitive, services need to be attuned and responsive to each person's background and culture. Beyond English and Spanish, the south now includes Farsi, Tongan, Arabic, and so forth. Culture, as with language, comes with many dialects and variations. A person's ethnicity is the part of the iceberg you can see—the minutia that truly makes a person is below the waterline and includes experiences that are unique to him or her, traditions, customs, values, beliefs, and so on. Cultural competence in face-to-face interactions, especially in the human services industries, provides understanding, thereby allowing cultures to meet and work together respectfully while learning and understating their cultural differences and norms. The Internet has extended our boundaries to include every continent being able to communicate instantly with each other. Intercultural communication skills are no longer simply criteria for those doing business in the international market. It is a criterion for life and business in our global community today. We are truly helpers without borders.

Upward and Downward Social and Cultural Comparisons

Within the groups of culture come the subgroups of upward and downward social and cultural comparisons. These are cultures of self-evaluation. Is the south considered a downward social and cultural comparison for those living in the north? Is the south used as a comparison group, so others can feel they are more competent culturally? Cultures have a tendency to do this within themselves. Movie stars compare themselves to television stars, and they feel better about themselves. Television stars compare themselves to theater stars for much the same reason. Social workers, counselors, and psychologists fall into the category as well. Upward social comparison works just the opposite. Television stars, while successful, compare themselves to movie stars and feel worse about their success. Therefore, it appears that some cultural competence falls within the self and one's self-evaluation.

Has Anyone Ever Heard the Term Northern Cultural Competence?

To impact a global community and marketplace, it is important to be cross-culturally competent. Knowing the market and the culture of the market is much like knowing the culture of the people being helped by human services. Without a rudimentary understanding of the culture, subculture, and frame of reference of those being helped, the help may not be helpful at all.

Age

Of the 117 million people in the southern states, more than 22 million are age 60 and older. More than 44 percent of these are male, and more than 55 percent are female. There is the culture of age, which is not the most talked about in cultural circles. People are living longer, and the retirement age is increasing. In America, critical events determine what that generation will be called. The older population, those that grew up after World War II and Vietnam, are the baby boomers. The rise of technology brought us Generation X and 9/11 the Millennials. Time defines a person's culture almost as much as any other factor. For some cultures, age is to be revered. For others, there is prejudice against the aging process itself. America is only 237 years old itself.

Ethics

Ethics are rules for governing behavior based on individual ideas about what is morally right and wrong. Ethics and religion play a part in one's ethical culture. Southern states show to be statistically more conservative. The southern states are often referred to as the Bible Belt. Some reports have indicated that even as much as 80 percent of the population of the southern states identify themselves as Christian. As mental health professionals, regardless of affiliation, it is important to seek to embrace cultural diversity and the dynamics of differences.

Understanding that the giving of gifts to those providing services is an act of respect for some cultures but flies in the face of some codes of ethics. Realizing that not accepting the token would be very disrespectful and harmful to the relationship has the helping industry conceding that small concessions can be made. Strict rules of confidentiality for providers are normally individualistic in nature, but understanding collectivistic cultures helps providers realize boundaries are different depending upon the culture.

Technology

Southern providers of human services are now able via technology—FaceTime, live Webinars, video conferencing, and so on—to interact and engage globally in the exchange of knowledge and assistance. Being able to bridge the cultural divide and reach out with expertise and lend a global presence takes the boundaries off of humanitarian work. Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia are all part of the Southern Regional Education Board. Standards for establishing competency in technology have been instituted by all. This includes providing instructors available means to be technologically competent and ensuring that technological progress is made to ensure competency for students. This competency is important for education.

Immersion

As the genre of human services has to reach out to communities of cultural newness, they grow as the immersion becomes a practiced and everyday habit. Immersion is one of the best ways to learn and understand the culture of those being treated or offered services. Taking the time to interact and read culturally diverse literature allows one to absorb and understand the needs and effective interaction necessary to be culturally competent. But nothing quite compares with immersion.

Cultural Competence

Understanding and experiencing different worldviews in the spirit of status equality and cooperation allows growth and understanding for working together and assisting one another. This kind of collaboration allows stereotypes to be dispelled. Each culture has the knowledge of its own needs. By allowing their honest input regarding beliefs, we can gain firsthand knowledge of other cultures beyond what textbooks and research journals can provide. Immigrants who come from war-torn countries bring with them a culture of their own. The culture of being constantly influenced by fighting and death bring with it posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) or having lost a healthy sense of fear. Some fear everything, and some fear nothing from having grown accustomed to danger.

We must remember our history, or we are destined to repeat it. However, we do not have to be handcuffed to it. One must bear in mind that, if the discriminated against become the discriminators, no progress is being made—it is just merely a changing of geography.

Mary Burkhead Spencer
Walden University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Models of; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Regional Cultural Competence.

Further Readings

Chun, Maria B. J. "Pitfalls to Avoid When Introducing a Cultural Competency Training Initiative." Medical Education, v.44/6 (2010).

Lee, Eunjung. "Clinical Significance of Cross-Cultural Competencies (CCC) in Social Work Practice." Journal of Social Work Practice, v.25/2 (2011).

Mattar, Sandra. "Educating and Training the Next Generations of Traumatologists: Development of Cultural Competencies." Psychological Trauma: Theory, Research, Practice, and Policy, v.3/3 (2011).

Special Education

Special education is a field within education dedicated to the treatment and educational progress of students with disabilities. Prior to the mid-1970s, there was no federal mandate in the United States that required students with disabilities to attend school or even requiring schools to teach students with disabilities. Children with disabilities did not have the same access to public education as their nonhandicapped peers. Beginning in 1975 with the Education for All Handicapped Children Act (Public Law 94-142), each state within the United States was mandated to provide children with disabilities with a free, appropriate public education beginning at the age of 5. In 1986, this law was amended by Public Law 99-457 and extended the age of children who were eligible for special education services in public education down to 3 years old. Public Law 101-476 amended this law again in 1990 that renamed it as the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA). Reauthorization of this act occurred in Congress through Public Law 105-17 in 1997. Finally, the most recent reauthorization of IDEA, now known as the Individuals with Disabilities Education Improvement Act, occurred in 2004, and recent amendments extended the ages of children with disabilities served through public education down to birth. Although the field of special education is guided by specific laws and regulations regarding its implementation, several other federal laws and court cases also guide services provided for students with disabilities. Examples of such laws include the Americans with Disabilities Act (Public Law 101-336) and Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.

Eligibility for Special Education

If a child is too young for school yet demonstrates major delays in attainment of developmental milestones necessary for educational success, the child can undergo an evaluation for special education services before formally entering school. Because early identification and treatment for disabilities can lessen the severity of the disability, IDEA requires that states have specific procedures to locate, evaluate, and identify young children who may be in need of special education services. Typically, the school district in which the child resides must ensure that steps are taken to find and treat these children prior to them entering kindergarten.

Beginning with the reauthorization of IDEA in 1990, and mandated in the current revision, schools are now required to demonstrate that a student is unable to make successful gains in the curriculum with extra interventions in the regular education classroom before referring for a special education evaluation. Typically, the regular education teacher identifies a student who is struggling in the classroom and refers this student to a teacher assistance team. This pre-referral team is made up of other classroom teachers, special education teachers, school counselors, and others who consult with the regular education teacher and parents to provide strategies and interventions to assist the targeted student to improve his or her functioning in the regular classroom. The referring teacher maintains data on the progress of this student for a period of time and returns to the teacher assistance team to determine whether or not a referral for a special education evaluation is necessary.

The question of eligibility for special education services is determined by ascertaining if the student should be diagnosed with a disability and assessing its impact on the educational process in the curriculum. In other words, the student must have a disability that impedes his or her growth in the educational process. If a student does have a disability, but it does not adversely affect the education attainment in the school, then the student does not qualify for special education or any related services. However, this particular student may qualify for other services under Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. Also, a student who does not have a disability but needs special education services does not qualify for special education or related services.

Evaluation and Identification for Special Education

To qualify for special education, a student must have a disability and must have educational needs that cannot be met in the regular education classroom. The types of disabilities identified in IDEA that could qualify a student for special education include developmental delay, autism, intellectual disability (formerly known as mental retardation), specific learning disability, emotional disturbance, traumatic brain injury, speech or language impairment, visual impairment, deafness and hearing impairment, orthopedic impairments, other health impairments, deaf-blindness, and multiple disabilities. To ensure the child is correctly identified for special education, a team of educators and specialists as well as the child's parents or guardians meet to assess the challenges and needs the student has in the school setting. This team is known as the multidisciplinary team. This team determines whether or not the child meets the criteria identified in IDEA as a student with a disability in need of special education. To make such decisions, the team must utilize information from many different assessment procedures including but not limited to functional and developmental evidence; input from the parents or guardians; input from teachers; achievement, intelligence, or personality testing; social and cultural background; adaptive behavior; and visual and hearing conditions. In addition, the team must rule out conditions that may exclude a student from having a disability and needing special education services such as limited exposure to the curriculum, lack of English proficiency, and any other evidence that demonstrates that the child does not meet the disability criteria.

Placement in Special Education

Once students have been determined to have a disability that affects their educational progress in the curriculum, they are placed in special education and are entitled to various procedural safeguards, special services, as well as altered expectations for educational attainment. As part of the identification process, each child with a disability who is identified as needing special education must obtain an individualized education plan (IEP). This plan is developed by the child's parents or guardians and the team of educators and specialists who provide the services necessary for the child's educational success. Each IEP contains goals and objectives specific to the child as well as the programs, services, and interventions required to meet his or her unique educational needs. IDEA also requires that students in special education be educated as much as possible with their nondisabled peers; in other words, the student in special education must be educated in the least-restrictive environment to still maintain progress toward their IEP goals and objectives. Therefore, many students with disabilities and receiving special education must be placed in settings that allow them as much interaction as possible with their nondisabled peers.

Diversity in Special Education

Diversity in education is a subject that has been discussed and researched in great detail. Children from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds comprise a large percentage of public school students. Diversity is increasing, and one of the most troublesome issues associated with its growth is the overrepresentation of minority children in special education; that is, more minority children are served in special education than would be expected based on their percentage in the general school population. In the 1960s, during the peak of the civil rights movement, the problem of disproportionality of minority students in special education first received national attention. Since that time, researchers have studied the issue in a way to understand and explain how the processes used to identify, assess, and place students in special education programs may contribute to the overrepresentation of minority students. Researchers continue to look at family involvement in the school and its operation as a major factor in improving student achievement. However, researchers also show that, for successful collaborations to occur, school personnel must respect the cultural background of the families they serve.

Many classrooms across the United States have witnessed an increase in racial, ethnic, and cultural diversity. These classrooms also are receiving increased numbers of children with disabilities or developmental delays. This diversity of children in classrooms provides many challenges as well as many opportunities to educators. With knowledge of effective practices, and with the support of administrators, teachers, families, and local communities, teachers can create classrooms that are adaptable to the diverse needs of all children. Diversity in special education has shown that there is great disparity in the representation of minorities.

Much discrepancy exists concerning the topic of race and ethnicity in special education. Research has shown that more than five times of the Caucasian students receiving special education services have graduated with a high school diploma compared to their African American peers. Studies have shown that African American students are four times more likely than Caucasian students to be in special education. The overrepresentation of African American students has often been explained as a symptom of poverty. Studies have even shown that, among African American and Caucasian students whose parents have a high income and education level, the African American students were more likely to be in special education classes. Studies have found that grossly disproportionate numbers of minority students are identified as eligible for special education services. Moreover, when compared to their white counterparts, African American children were almost three times more likely to be labeled intellectually disabled. The disproportionate number of African Americans in special education derives not only from a problem in special education but a problem with culturally competent educational and evaluation procedures.

The existence of inequality within special education has been widely acknowledged and continues to be an issue in special education. Gender disparity refers to statistical differences in the statuses and opportunities between male and female students in the special education classroom. Research has indicated that a teacher is less likely to refer a female child in need of special education for fear that she will suffer emotionally due to isolation from her peers. As a result, the average ratio of male-to-female students receiving special education services across the United States is two to one.

Human Services in Special Education

A wide variety of services are available to individuals served through the special education process. Depending on the type of disability and the educational needs of the individual, many different specialties may be included in the education of the individual with special education needs.

In addition to teachers with specialties in special education, various professionals also work with these individuals including, but not limited to, physical therapists, occupational therapists, speech and language therapists, and various mental health providers. Physical therapists may be necessary for gross motor needs and evaluation such as walking, sitting, standing, and running. Occupational therapists are necessary for helping the individual with skills associated with daily living and fine motor functioning such as brushing teeth, buttoning a shirt, or handwriting. Speech and language therapists work with students' abilities to articulate their words and understand what is being said to them as well as a wide variety of verbal and written language skills. Mental health providers, such as counselors, social workers, and psychologists, work with individuals in special education concerning social and emotional skills, relationship building, vocational placement, and family functioning. Although all these various therapeutic services are found within the school system, many families and individuals choose to seek out these services in the private sector to augment what is being learned in school. The goal for each of these human service providers is to help the individual with special education needs function as independently as possible and provide support when necessary to help this individual succeed in his or her educational environment.

Summary

The passing of federal laws has necessitated the need for public schools to provide educational services for children with special education needs. These laws have continually been amended and updated to provide for more services for all children served in the United States. Investments in early childhood education in the past years have grown in appreciation of the importance for preparing all children, including those with special education needs, for the school environment.

Young children with developmental delays and other types of disabilities compose a subpopulation for which early interventions are especially important. Although the schools have the primary responsibility for identification, evaluation, and placement in special education programs, other providers in the field of human services are also responsible for helping the individual with special education needs reach his or her fullest potential. As such, all human services providers in all settings must have a broad knowledge of how the variety of diversity, such as age, gender, and socioeconomic status, impacts the outcomes for those individuals with special education needs.

Kurt T. Choate
Justin Streater
Ashley Whittenton
Northeastern State University

See Also: ADHD, Services for Individual With; Children With Special Needs; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Educational Services; Learning Disabilities, Services for Individuals With; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment; School Psychologists.

Further Readings

Artilles, A. J. and A. Bal. “The Next Generation of Disproportionality Research: Toward a Comparative Model in the Study of Equity in Ability Differences.” Journal of Special Education, v.42/1 (2008).

Blanchett, W. “Disproportionate Representation of African American Students in Special Education: Acknowledging the Role of White Privilege and Racism. Educational Research, v.35/6 (2006).

Fletcher-Janzen, Elaine and Cecil R. Reynolds, eds. The Special Education Almanac. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2006.

Harry, Beth and Janette K. Klingner. Why Are So Many Minority Students in Special Education? Understanding Race and Disability in Schools. New York: Teacher’s College Press, 2006.

Spirituality/Religion and Diversity

Spirituality is indicated by an expanded sense of self-awareness that emerges through a connection with someone or something that gives life purpose. Some people consider themselves to be more spiritual than religious, while others do not operate from a spiritual worldview. Spiritual competence involves providing human services that are sensitive to a client’s spiritual worldview. Human services workers may also need to work to ensure larger social systems are spiritually supportive of minority group members. Ethical practice sometimes requires a referral to clergy or more-experienced professional.

Defining Spirituality and Religion

Spirituality can be described as the experience of enhanced life meaning, sense of purpose, and transpersonal connection. The experience of spirituality is linked to a heightened awareness of being an essential part of the world. In particular, a transpersonal connection stretches individuals to broaden their understanding of who they are or what they think about one’s place in the world. A transpersonal connection may also enable individuals to have the experience of transcending the self, which can evoke a feeling of being at one with another person or one’s surroundings.

The experience of spirituality has been associated with religion. Religion is defined as being distinct from spirituality in that religion represents a system of beliefs and practices that reflect the worship of a deity (or deities). Religious practices may be individual or communal in nature. Such practices reflect religious adherence and depth of personal religious affiliation that informs life meaning. Likewise, religious practices may provide a vehicle for a deep connection with someone or something outside of oneself, suggesting religious practices can be a vehicle for a spiritual experience. For example, hiking may add value to one's life by enabling that person to feel completely absorbed in the experience of being one with nature. This expanded sense of consciousness or spiritual awareness defines a spiritual experience. There are many other practices, both religious and nonreligious, that can enable a person to have a spiritual experience. It could be that the spiritual practice of meditating at sunrise allows a person to sustain hope in one's ability to cope with loss, while for another, such hope is sustained through the religious practice of attending a church service and praying.

Spiritual and Religious Diversity

People may have different ideas about what leads to and reflects the experience of spirituality. Religion is expected to inform life choices that can help one grow spiritually and lead to joy in an afterlife; however, religion is just one way individuals may use to experience spirituality. Some people may not identify with a religious tradition but feel spiritually connected to someone or something that makes life more meaningful. Spiritual practices may also be considered religious practices, but engagement in these practices does not necessarily mean that person is a member of a particular religious group.

Although there is significant variation, there are also trends in religious affiliation based on race and ethnicity. This can be attributed to sociopolitical influences associated with history of enslavement, migration, and colonization. Women, people with disabilities, and sexual minorities have been at further risk for marginalization in religious institutions. However, for some individuals, religious affiliation has been a significant source of spiritual strength that has enabled personal and community empowerment, and religious affiliation can have significant implications for client identity and experience of spirituality.

Generally speaking, individuals who are not affiliated with a particular religious group, including agnostics and atheists, are considered to be nonreligious. Agnostics believe a god or gods may or may not exist but require scientific proof. Atheists do not believe in the existence of a god or gods. Hence, agnostics and atheists are not likely to identify with having a spiritual worldview. To engage in spiritually sensitive practice, human services professionals must respect client beliefs and experiences of institutionalized religion. This starts with developing spiritual competence.

Spiritual Competence

Spiritual competence is indicated by a provision of human services that are sensitive to a client's spiritual worldview. This requires having a basic understanding of how religion or spirituality influence a client's development and functioning as well as self-awareness and empathy to ensure that services are supportive of what a client believes is essential for the experience of spiritual well-being. For clients who do not operate from a spiritual worldview, it may be more appropriate to address a client's experience of existential meaning that informs biopsychosocial well-being. At a root level, however, human services workers must be able to communicate an appreciation for the innate worth of their clients and help them cultivate what they think makes life meaningful.

Spiritual Needs

Based on a spiritual worldview, individuals have spiritual needs just like biological, psychological, and social needs. There may be overlap in how these needs manifest and how they influence each other. The means of getting spiritual needs met is further relative to individual circumstances and preferences. For example, clients receiving hospice care may have the spiritual need to process thoughts and emotions about pending death. Other examples of spiritual needs include the experience of God's forgiveness, hope in an afterlife, connection with others, and the experience of inner peace.

Unmet spiritual needs can lead to the experience of spiritual pain, also known as spiritual distress, crisis, or emergency. Spiritual pain involves difficulty in processing life experiences in a way that is consistent with the achievement of personal values and goals integral to life satisfaction. Similar to spiritual needs, the experience of spiritual pain can depend on the individual's circumstances and type of spiritual needs that have gone unmet. For example, a physical disability may reduce a person's spiritual need to feel valued as an able-bodied person. This can lead to spiritual pain indicated by feelings of worthlessness.

Spiritual pain may thus manifest through a change in psychosocial functioning. Spiritual pain may include feelings of meaninglessness, anguish, isolation, alienation, and emptiness. People in spiritual pain may detach from others and express confusion or hopelessness. These individuals may ask questions like these: Why is this happening to me? What is the meaning of my life? Do others value me and see me as a person of worth? Those who are religious may believe God abandoned them, begin questioning their religious beliefs, and refuse to engage in religious practices.

Spiritual Well-Being

Spiritual well-being is the product of a relationship with a higher power, deity, or other source that enhances a person's sense of wholeness. Indicators of spiritual well-being are consistent with the fulfillment of a person's spiritual needs. Spiritual well-being may include inner peace and harmony; having hope, goals, and ambitions; social life and place in community retained; feelings of uniqueness, individuality, and dignity; feeling valued; coping with and sharing emotions; ability to communicate with truth and honesty; being able to practice religion; and finding meaning in life.

All human services workers have the capacity to engage in spiritually sensitive care to promote client spiritual well-being. This can be done either directly or indirectly, depending on client needs and worker expertise. Spiritual support may be provided indirectly through the expression of unconditional positive regard, engagement in active listening, and an empathic, compassionate connection with the client. Human service workers with specialized expertise may engage in direct interventions such as spiritual assessment, spiritually oriented psychotherapy, or referral to an appropriate resource for follow-up.

Human services workers also need to be particularly sensitive to the spiritual needs of minority group members given their potential for discrimination that can threaten one's sense of dignity and personal worth. As part of being spiritually competent, human services workers must avoid operating from stereotypes that undermine client spiritual well-being and work to promote a more spiritually sensitive environment. Families, groups, organizations, and communities can all operate in a manner that promotes an individual's experience of spiritual well-being based on cultural norms that affirm mutual respect.

For example, human services workers may need to assist older adults in achieving gerotranscendence. Gerotranscendence enables one to transcend the experience of loss and devaluation in a world that favors youth. This is accomplished by finding new meaning in the process of aging that sustains or enhances one's sense of value. Older adults may transcend the aging process in different ways. One may find new meaning by cultivating deeper emotional contacts with loved ones, discovering new cognitively stimulating pursuits, and gaining self-efficacy by working through perceived limits.

Clients may engage in spiritual or religious practices to promote spiritual well-being. Examples of these practices include visiting with religious clergy, church, or community members; reading inspirational literature; prayer or meditation; listening to music; and participation in worship services or religious sacraments. If a client seeks information about spiritual or religious coping practices, the human service worker must be sensitive to the client's spiritual worldview. The need for this type of assistance, however, would likely involve a referral to clergy or experienced professional.

Ethical Guidelines

In addressing client religion and spirituality, it is important for human services workers to make accommodations to prevent boundary violations and ensure practices respect client rights. Some of these ethical issues involve respect for client confidentiality, informed consent for treatment, conflict of interest, and professional competency. These issues are largely straightforward as they are the custom in working with clients. However, it can be more difficult to identify when there is a conflict of interest relative to spiritual or religious issues. The use of prayer with clients is one such example.

In general, human services workers are not to encourage clients to adopt the human services worker's spiritual or religious beliefs or practices. Clients who solicit human services workers to engage in prayer with them should tell the client in the most respectful way that the human services worker must defer to the client to either lead the prayer or take a moment for the client to engage in a personal silent prayer. Client referral to a professional with appropriate expertise should be considered if client spiritual or religious issues demand further intervention.

Ann M. Callahan
Middle Tennessee State University

See Also: Fundamentalist Christian Americans; Office for Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships, White House; Religion and Clients.

Further Readings

Canda, Edward and Leola Furman. Spiritual Diversity in Social Work Practice: The Heart of Helping. New York: Oxford Press, 2009.
Chua, Elaine. "A Return to Spirituality. When Eastern Philosophy Meets Western Practice." Journal of Family Psychotherapy, v.14/1 (2003).
Families in Society. "Transcendent Worldview: Understanding Spirituality in Practice." http://www.familiesinsociety.org/new/Newsletter/issue01_12.pdf (Accessed May 2013).
Hoyt, C. "What if the Spirit Does Not Move Me? A Personal Reconnaissance and Reconciliation." Social Work, v.53/3 (2008).
Krieglstein, Maryann. "Spirituality and Social Work." Dialogue and Universalism, v.5–6 (2006).
Pargament, Kenneth, et al. "Patterns of Positive and Negative Religious Coping With Major Life Stressors." Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion, v. 37/4 (1998).
Smith, Christian. "Why Christianity Works: An Emotions-Focused Phenomenological Account." Sociology of Religion, v.68/2 (2007).

State Children's Health Insurance Program

The State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP) was codified as Title XXI of the Social Security Act as part of the Balanced Budget Act of 1997. This program is part of President Bill Clinton's legacy from his terms as president of the United States. SCHIP was designed to provide insurance for children whose parents or caregivers might not be able to afford health care for children in the family. These families were low income, but their income levels were above the range for the children to receive insurance through Medicaid. Consider very hardworking parents whose insurance did not cover prescription costs for children's medications. These parents might have to split a dose of medication, such as penicillin, if their children became ill and were, for example, catching colds that subsequently turned into sinus infections. The inability to afford adequate care was adversely impacting the health of many children residing in low-income families. Thus, SCHIP was designed as a joint insurance program between the federal government and the states, which provided health insurance for low-income children who might not qualify for medical assistance but whose parents might not be able to afford prescription medication or adequate medical care based on their family income level.

In the early stages of SCHIP administration, states wrote plans to enroll children, deliver health services, and provide reimbursement for children's medical care, and these plans were approved by the Health Care Financing Administration. State plans for disbursing SCHIP funding often utilized existing medical assistance funding structures. However, some states developed unique funding structures to disburse SCHIP funding through health care plans or managed care organizations. Initially, SCHIP had the potential to provide services to approximately 30 percent more children in the United States. Although initial operation of the program did not enroll the expected 30 percent, many children benefitted from the plan, which was updated in 2007. SCHIP consequently allowed for expanded medical coverage for the provision of children's health and mental health services as well as dental services and hospital care. There also was a positive impact for children from diverse ethnic groups as more children, often minorities, from low-income families began receiving needed health care.

President George Bush signed a two-year reauthorization bill into law in December 2007 that would extend existing SCHIP services without expansion of the program. Upon election in 2008, President Barack Obama signed the Children's Health Insurance Program Reauthorization Act (CHIRPA) into law through fiscal year 2013.

A pediatrician examines a child's ears. SCHIP was designed to provide insurance for children whose parents or caregivers might not be able to afford health care for children in the family.

CHIRPA reauthorized SCHIP and supplied further funding, and substantially enhanced both Medicaid and SCHIP funding for children's medical services. For example, more funding was dedicated to a national outreach campaign that involved all levels of government and the private sector. Moreover, this national outreach ensured enrollment of eligible children and used technology to simplify enrollment. Funds were available to connect schools to outreach efforts in order to ensure that eligible children were enrolled. In addition, CHIRPA provided new federal funding for outreach to children who were eligible for Medicaid or SCHIP but were not enrolled, which included $100 million in funding.

The Affordable Care Act of 2010 continues the SCHIP eligibility standards through 2019 and provides additional pathways for coverage for millions of uninsured children and their families. Moreover, the Affordable Care Act provides an additional $40 million in federal funding to continue efforts in promoting enrollment and broadening the reach of health care to uninsured children through programs like Medicaid and SCHIP. Evidence gathered on low-income children enrolled in Medicaid and SCHIP suggested that the benefits of these programs include increased access to needed care and insurance coverage to provide health care to children irrespective of family income level. This expanded coverage is related to better health outcomes for children of color and from low-income families. Medicaid and SCHIP offer the possibility to increase the number of children with health insurance and to expand care for millions of low-income children.

SCHIP has had a substantial impact on children's health care coverage. It has elevated policy interest in the effectiveness of coverage for children and the quality of pediatric care and redrawn the political landscape in terms of the government's role in directly subsidizing coverage for children. SCHIP has had a major impact on health coverage due to its ability to identify and enroll children eligible for a state's underlying Medicaid program, reports S. Rosenbaum. SCHIP currently provides health care insurance to approximately 7 million children, enrolled in either a Medicaid expansion or other programs, who otherwise would not receive health care benefits. There are an additional 6 million children who are eligible but not enrolled in either SCHIP or Medicaid. Because SCHIP is not a federally entitled program like Medicaid, families need to enroll in the program to benefit. As more families face job loss and the associated loss of health insurance, SCHIP is even more important for the health and development of infants and children in low-income families, states G. C. McCain.

Kenneth Woodson
Health Promotion and Education Program
Rebecca Elkins
University of Cincinnati
Laura Nabors
Health Promotion and Education Program

See Also: Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Historical Role of; Medicaid; Mental Health Services, Children; State Children's Health Insurance Program.

Further Readings

Balanced Budget Act of 1997. Public Law 105-33, Stat. 4901 (October 1, 1997).

Dick, A. W., J. D. Klein, L. P. Shone, J. Zwanziger, H. Yu and P. G. Szilagyi. "The Evaluation of the State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP) in New York: Changing Program Features and Enrollee Characteristics." Pediatrics, v.112/6 (2003).

McCain, G. C. "SCHIP Renewal." Neonatal Network, v.28/3 (2009).
Rosenbaum, S. "SCHIP Reconsidered." Health Affairs, v.26/5 (2007).
Selden, T. M., J. S. Banthin, and J. W. Cohen. "Waiting in the Wings: Eligibility and Enrollment in the State Children's Health Insurance Program." Health Affairs, v.18/2 (1999).
United States Department of Health and Human Services. "Children's Health Insurance Program." http://www.medicaid.gov/Medicaid-CHIP-Program-Information/By-Topics/Childrens-Health-Insurance-Program-CHIP/Childrens-Health-Insurance-Program-CHIP.html (Accessed June 2013).

Status Offense

Status offenses involve otherwise lawful conduct that is transformed statutorily into a public offense when performed by a minor (United States v. Ward, 71 F. 3d 262, 263 [Seventh Circuit 1995]). Typically, states maintain some form of status offense jurisdiction over runaways, truants, curfew violators, underage alcohol consumers, and minors failing to obey a lawful court order. Based on the notion that the state has a legitimate interest in protecting the welfare of children, most states also include broad and generally vague catch-all offenses including unruly behavior, incorrigibility, disobedience, and habitually behaving in manner injurious or dangerous to the health or morals of the minor or others. Public policy, however, is unsettled with regard to juvenile status offenders given the diverse and complex nature of both the risks to the young and the irregular outcomes of current efforts in the areas of human services, treatment, and punishment. These problems are intensified by the diversity of the youths themselves and the desire to provide human services to at-risk youth in the face of public pressure to respond to all forms of youth misbehavior with strong disciplinary sanctions.

Prior to 1899, minors brought before the courts for the commission of a crime were tried as adults. In that year, Illinois established the first independent court system for adjudicating offenses committed by minors, and by the 1940s, all states had followed suit. In the early 1960s, the category of status offender was invented in most states to separate juveniles who had committed crimes (delinquents) from those who had broken rules that constituted offenses only because of their age at the time of the activity. The creation of a special category of offenders discriminated on the basis of age was premised upon a state's interests in protecting the young from harmful behaviors, preventing future criminal behavior, and supporting or substituting for parental authority where it was perceived that a failure to intervene may initiate an escalation of the minor's misbehavior. Toward these ends, status offenders currently receive considerably different treatment than do minors who violate criminal statutes (juvenile delinquents). While delinquents and status offenders alike enjoy procedural due process rights (In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 [1967]), status offenders enjoy more flexible and informal procedures intended to guide and reform. These may include diversion from the court system and deferred adjudication with no formal probationary oversight and no formal ruling that the juvenile committed a status offense as long as he or she does not commit another offense for a specified period of time.

Although all state procedures focus on the needs of the child rather than the behavior triggering court intervention, states handle status offenses quite differently because of disagreement over the proper role of the juvenile courts in these cases. Some are advocates of diverting status offenders into public agencies and private organizations that provide counseling, therapy, and other forms of treatment for personal and family problems. Others, including parents seeking aid in disciplining defiant children, law enforcement officials seeking to detain runaways, and juvenile court judges favoring incarceration as a sanction to enforce court orders, are advocates of criminal justice sanctions, particularly incarceration.

In response to an increasing use of the discretion to incarcerate in the 1970s, Congress enacted the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (JJDP) Act, conditioning eligibility for federally funded intervention and prevention programs on a move away from custodial facilities to appropriate community-based alternatives, the insulation of juvenile offenders from adult offenders, and efforts by each state to address the overrepresentation of youth of color in the justice system. In response to objections that the JJDPA limited the court's ability to handle status offenders who did not comply with court-recommended treatments, the JJDPA was amended in 1980 to authorize the secure detention of status offenders who violated a valid court order. Courts employed the amendment to circumvent deinstitutionalization, holding status offenders for longer periods of time than if they had committed a crime and were adjudicated delinquent. This was accomplished, for example, by transforming violations of probation conditions that were merely status offenses into crimes under the court's contempt power and thus converting status offenders into delinquents (bootstrapping). In 2012, the JJDPA was amended again to require that detained juveniles be brought before the court and receive full due process rights. If detained, the juvenile must be separated from juveniles charged or held for acts of delinquency, and the detention must not occur in any facility utilized for the incarceration of adults.

The system as it operates currently is subject to substantial criticism. Many argue that it is a mistake to transform the behaviors characterized as status offenses into public offenses as the process stigmatizes youths for behaviors that are not harmful to others and that are often symptomatic of the minor's environment. The adversarial nature of the court system is thought by some to exacerbate this problem, and many status offenses, such as incorrigibility and running away, place the minor in an adversarial position with the parents as it is they who report the behavior most often. Additionally, there is a conflict inherent between service agencies typically employing therapeutic and voluntary methods and courts often seeking to use their authority to engender quick behavior modifications. Similarly, there is a conflict inherent to state intervention in the family in cases of maltreatment leading to status offenses. Courts are criticized both for overreaching in the family lives and for failure to adequately protect children. There is concern as well over the unbridled discretion of the court, the difficulty of effecting positive changes in the conduct or welfare of minors, the demonstrable fact that time spent in juvenile correctional facilities often worsens prospects for adaptive functioning after release, and the failure of the system to tailor intervention sufficiently to the needs of diverse categories of offenders.

Studies indicate, for example, that there is little practical justification for mandating treatment for detained juvenile offenders who have merely experimented with alcohol but show no indication of a current substance abuse problem. Likewise, the difference between the use and abuse of alcohol by girls and boys indicates the need for discriminating approaches. Girls who use or abuse alcohol are more likely to have considered or attempted suicide, and girls who engage in risky dieting behaviors consume significantly more alcohol than boys and nondieters. Among teens who move frequently from one home or neighborhood to another, girls are at greater risk than boys of drinking, and girls transition from substance use to substance abuse more quickly than do boys. These differences point to the need in juvenile justice systems to tailor rehabilitative approaches to the varied experiences of the youth in their care. While the JJDPA as amended requires the juvenile justice system to plan for gender-specific services, program evaluations find that some gender-specific programs, though increasing self-esteem and educational performance, do not show evidence of reduced recidivism.

Outcomes often vary by race and ethnicity as well as gender, suggesting that interventions honed to the differences among races, ethnicities, sexual orientations, and immigration status are essential for more positive results. Similarly, studies estimate that the prevalence of youth with undiagnosed or unmet special education needs is higher significantly among status offenders than in the general population. The most comprehensive interventions encompass coordinated school, family, and community programs.

Charles Frederick Abel
Stephen F. Austin State University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Disposition of Juvenile Records; Interstate Compact for Juveniles; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Detention Centers; Juvenile Justice System; Runaway Youth/Human Trafficking; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Casey P. and I. Keilitz. "Estimating the Prevalence of Learning Disabled and Mentally Retarded

Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act (42 U.S.C. 5601).

Juvenile Offenders: A Meta-Analysis. In E. Leone, ed., Understanding Troubled and Troubling Youth, 1990.

National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University. "The Formative Years: Pathways to Substance Abuse Among Girls and Young Women Ages 8–22." http://www.casacolumbia.org/articlefiles/380-formative_years_pathways_to_substance_abuse.pdf (Accessed February 2003).

Simmons, T. "Mandatory Mediation: A Better Way to Address Status Offenses." Ohio State Journal on Dispute Resolution, v. 21 (2006).

Yeide, Martha. Underage Drinking Literature Review. U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. http://www2.dsgonline.com/dso2/Underage%20Drinking%20Literature%20Review.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

Stolen Generation

In 2008, the then prime minister of Australia, Kevin Rudd, reflected upon "the mistreatment of those who were Stolen Generations—this blemished chapter in our nation's history." The term stolen generation is utilized within Australia to describe those children who were forcibly removed from their families under a policy ostensibly concerned with assimilation. The central tenet of that policy was that, by removing Aboriginal children from their families, the government could sever the children's connections with their families and by extension their culture and traditional land and ultimately lead to them being absorbed into the white community. The Aborigines Welfare Board report for 1921 stated that "the continuation of this policy of dissociating the children from camp life must eventually solve the Aboriginal problem." The "problem," according to P. Read, referred to those Aborigines who could not, or elected not to, live as white people wished them to.

For the governments in Australia (at a time prior to the creation of the current federal or commonwealth government), the key focus was on Aboriginal children of mixed parentage (referred to as half-caste, quadroons, or octoroons, according to the perceived mixture of Aboriginal and European blood, which was crudely determined on the children's complexion), describes K. Healey. Despite the prevalence of the policy in Australia, it was not publicly debated until the issuance of the findings of the Royal Commission into Aboriginal Deaths in Custody in 1989, report P. Nagle and R. Summerrell. The commission noted that, in relation to the 99 deaths investigated, 43 of those who had died had, as children, been separated from their families and, by definition, their communities and culture. The process of forcible removal fully entered the public domain, however, with the publication of the report "Bringing Them Home," commissioned by the Australian Human Rights and Equality Opportunity Commission (HREOC) to study the removal of children in New South Wales between 1883 and 1969. The HREOC noted that, in 1814, the first school for Aboriginal children was created in New South Wales. It was noted by HREOC that the local aboriginal people, the Darug, were aware that the purpose of the school was separation from rather than education of their children and consequently removed them.

In western Australia in 1840, a similar school was opened with the expressed purpose of "Christianizing and civilizing" Aboriginal children. Thereafter, respective state governments created legislation that tacitly authorized the removal of Aboriginal children from their families. Thus, under the Aboriginal Protection Act (1869) in the state of Victoria, the Board for the Protection of Aborigines could authorize removal of children for placement in reformatory or industrial schools if it felt that the children were neglected or unprotected. Under the Aborigines Protection Act (1909), the requirement of neglect continued to be promulgated, with any attempt to remove children without their parents' consent requiring a magistrate to find that the children in question were neglected.

However, there were occasions where the magistrate, having found them to be well fed and well dressed, released them. The Aborigines Protection Board became discontented at what it regarded as an undermining of its powers under the act as a result of the magistrate's actions. The act was subsequently amended in 1915 such that any Aboriginal child could be removed without parental consent if the board considered that it was in the interests of the child's moral or physical welfare to do so. The parents were required to demonstrate that the child had a right to remain with them. Read notes that, on the part of the relevant document sanctioning the removal, the reasons for the board taking control of the child would invariably be simply that the child was Aboriginal. In 1911, the federal parliament introduced the Aboriginals Ordinance (1911) under which the ironically named chief protector could remove any "Aboriginal or half-caste child" if deemed to be in the best interests of that child. In 1939, the Child Welfare Act brought Aboriginal children under the auspices of generic child welfare provisions. However, a new category within the act of an "uncontrollable" child brought a number of Aboriginal children within its ambit with those children who refused to attend school; for example, being deemed uncontrollable and therefore able to be removed from their families.

During the 1950s and 1960s, state legislation was enacted that removed the specific power to remove Aboriginal children, relying instead upon such children being covered by generic child welfare legislation. This did not, however, prevent removal of Aboriginal children from their homes albeit under the premise that such removal was for reasons of welfare rather than a continued attempt at assimilation. The HREOC report concluded that between one in three and one in 10 Aboriginal children were forcibly removed from their families between 1910 and 1970. Healey has further argued that, during the 1900s, some 40,000 Aboriginal children were removed, but there are inadequate historical records to more accurately reflect the number removed. Conditions in the missions and institutions in which the children were placed were said to be poor with insufficient resources in place to effectively house, feed, and clothe the children. The level of education offered was thought to be extremely basic, with the key driver of that education seemingly being to facilitate the children working as menial laborers.

There were allegations of severe physical punishment being meted out to the children and in many cases sexual abuse. Children were forbidden from speaking in their Aboriginal languages and were punished if they elected to do so. Read recounts a private letter sent to the manager of Kinchela Boys' Home in 1935 in which he was warned not to be drunk on duty, to no longer horsewhip the boys in his charge, to not use dietary punishments, and to refrain from sending the boys out as labor on local farms. Since the prime minister's apology in 2008, the Australian government has created its Stolen Generations Working Partnership through which it hopes to engage with stolen generations in order to address their immediate and practical needs. A number of key priorities have been recognized and funding provided. Such priorities include access to services, healing (e.g., through the recording of oral histories), the justice system (e.g., in terms of providing support for those in prison both pre-and post-release), and education (in terms of ensuring that the lives of the stolen generations are captured in delivery).

Rob McCusker
Teesside University Business School

See Also: Child Labor, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Indian Boarding Schools; Tribal Social Services; United Nations Convention on the Rights of Child.

Further Readings

Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade. "Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Program: Text of the Apology to the Stolen Generations." http://www.dfat.gov.au/indigenous/apology-to-stolen-generations/national_apology.html (Accessed January 2014).

Healey, K. "The Stolen Generation." Issues in Society, v.91 (1998).

Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC). "Bringing Them Home: Report of the National Inquiry Into the Separation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Children From Their Families." Canberra: Commonwealth of Australia, 1997.

Nagle, P. and R. Summerrell. Aboriginal Deaths in Custody: The Royal Commission and Its Records, 1987–97. Canberra: National Archives of Australia, 1996.

Read, P. The Stolen Generations: The Removal of Aboriginal Children in New South Wales 1883 to 1969. Surry Hills: New South Wales Department of Aboriginal Affairs, 1981.

Student Visas

The United Sates Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) identifies a visa as a document that allows a foreign citizen to enter a port of entry into the United States. Ports of entry include airports, harbors, and border crossings. Approximately 4 percent of foreigners entering the United States each year travel on student visas.

Before coming to the United States to engage in vocational, undergraduate, or graduate studies at American colleges and universities, all citizens of foreign countries must first obtain student visas. Those visas allow them and their spouses and children to remain in the United States for a specified time. Students below the university level do not usually need student visas if they have been allowed in the United States on their parents' visas. Administering agencies for student visas are the Student and Exchange Visa Program (SEVP) and Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), both of which are housed within the Department of Homeland Security. Any student who fails to attend classes for more than five months may be required to apply for a new visa.

The student visa program has been threatened by outside influences that include 9/11, the Boston Marathon bombing, and scandals involving unscrupulous school officials. Because foreign students who come to the United States have already been admitted to a specific college or university, any need for financial, social, and psychological assistance is generally met by school programs already in place at the school he or she is attending. In addition to international student programs designed to help foreign students adjust to life in the United States, individual schools also help students to find jobs when necessary, and they offer access to physical health care and mental health counseling.

Student visas are available in three categories: J-1 qualifies the foreign student to participate in a cultural exchange program; M-1 means that the student is pursuing vocational studies; and F-1 is the category assigned to all students engaged in academic studies. There are also subcategories within each category. F-2 signifies a spouse or child of a student with an F-1 visa. F-3 is assigned to students from Canada and Mexico who commute to the United States for academic study. M-2 identifies the spouse or child of students with M-1 visas, and M-3 categorizes Canadian and Mexican students commuting to the United States for vocational studies. J-2 is the classification given to spouses and children of J-1 students. All minor children who enter the United States on a parent's student visa are eligible to receive a free public education. In 2013, for the first time in history, same-sex spouses were considered in the same way as opposite-sex spouses when obtaining student visas.

Background

Students who entered the United States to pursue higher education were classified as immigrants until 1921. Like other immigrants, they were subject to being detained for questioning on Ellis Island upon entry into the United States. The number of students was limited by immigration quotas imposed on particular regions. The motivating force behind opening the doors of educational opportunity was the Institute for International Education, which devised an application and a process that became standard for obtaining student visas. In 1946, the Fulbright Scholarship program was launched, providing a means of sending the brightest American students to other countries and promoting the benefits of international education. Two years later, the United States Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy became involved in the promotion of international and cultural studies. In 1961, Congress passed the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act, which provided continued federal funding for the Fulbright Scholarship. Bowing to pressure from President Lyndon Johnson in 1966, Congress passed the International Education Act and increased the scope of programs for international students. The atmosphere had changed by 1969, and funding was abolished. It was not until the 1990s when the issue of international education returned to the national consciousness after Senators David Boren (D–OK) and Claiborne Pell (D–RI) introduced the Education Enhancement Act of 1990 as a means of fostering student exchange programs.

Throughout modern history, foreign students have been interested in pursuing educational opportunities in the United States because of the high quality of institutions of higher learning, the variety of choices in considering programs of study, and the prestige that an American degree carries in many other countries. In 2012, 42 percent of international students were pursuing science, technology, engineering, and math (STEM) studies, with 19 percent in engineering, 10 percent in math and computer science, 8 percent in the physical and life sciences, 4 percent in the health professions, and 1 percent in agriculture. Other fields of study included business and management (22 percent), social sciences (9 percent), and fine and applied arts (6 percent).

In 2009, there were 671,000 students in the United States on student visas. Together, those students spent $15 billion each year. During the 2012 to 2013 academic year, the number of students grew to 819,644, with most coming from China (29 percent), India (12 percent), and South Korea (9 percent). Those students swelled the American economy by $21.7 billion in 2012. Most international students contribute to local economies by paying out-of-state tuition that may be up to three times that paid by in-state students. They also spend large amounts on groceries, clothing, housing, transportation, and entertainment.

The Visa Process

For most individuals, the process of obtaining an American visa begins in their own countries. Many would-be students visit the Web sites of the State Department or United States Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to discover how to apply for a student visa. Form DS-160 (nonimmigrant visa application) can now be filed online, the required photo can be uploaded, and the fee can be paid electronically. Interviews are still required for all individuals between the ages of 14 and 79, and digital fingerprints may be taken at that time. Traditionally, the first step in obtaining a student visa has been to be accepted at the college or university at which a student intends to study. School officials are generally familiar with the process by which visas are obtained, and many offer assistance in completing the process. Additionally, school Web sites are valuable sources for information.

In order to obtain a student visa, all individuals must be able to prove that there is no reason for them to be denied legal entry. The next step is to obtain the necessary paperwork from a USCIS facility. All applicants are required to pay a fee at this time. Documentation that accompanies the application includes acceptance letters from colleges or universities and proof that the student will be able to support him- or herself while in the United States.

Once the visa is obtained, 90 percent of all individuals seeking admission to the United States on student visas visit a designated port of entry and request a I-94 form, which details the stipulations of the student's stay in America. Any student who fails to adhere to those stipulations may be considered out of status and ineligible for benefits available to legal immigrants. Initially, individuals with valid student visas may enter the United States up to 30 days before the designated study period begins. No such restrictions apply to students returning to the United States after visits abroad. Upon entry, those carrying student visas are required to present valid passports, Form DS-160, a receipt for the required payment, a photo, and either a Certificate of Eligibility for Nonimmigrant Student Status for Academic and Language Students (FORM 120 A-B) or a Certificate of Eligibility for Nonimmigrant Student Status for Vocational Studies (Form 120 M-N). Students may also be asked for proof of their academic preparation, a statement outlining their intent to leave the United States at the end of the study period, and proof of being able to support themselves while studying in the United States.

Outside Impacts on Student Visas

On September 11, 2011, al Qaeda terrorists hijacked four jetliners. Two planes launched attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City, and a third rammed the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. A fourth plane was forced to the ground in Shanksville, Pennsylvania, by its passengers before it could launch an additional attack. The sense of vulnerability of Americans experienced by those attacks led to a major change in the ways that foreign citizens are allowed into the United States, including those who travel on student visas. Rumors suggested that several of the terrorists were in the United States on student visas, but the rumors were proved false.

The major changes that affected international students were changes in procedures, the implementation of the National Security Entry–Exit Registration System (NSEERS), and the launching of the Student and Exchange Visitor Information System (SEVIS). In 1996, the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act had stipulated that a computerized system of monitoring international students be instituted; however, it was not generally considered a high priority. After 9/11, the war on terrorism set the stage for students from countries such as Afghanistan, Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Libya, and Syria, which have been associated with terrorism, to be assumed to have links to terrorists, placing them under suspicion. SEVIS is specifically designed to keep up with international students living in the United States. Data that is available to all schools via the Internet include home addresses, educational backgrounds, fingerprints, and the designated dates of entry and exit. Schools are required to update the information regularly and report students who fail to remain in good standing.

In the aftermath of 9/11, the number of applications for student visas declined but increased steadily after 2005. The distrust of foreigners associated with 9/11 also began to decline, but on April 15, 2013, two brothers, Dzhokhar and Tamerlan Tsarnaev, set off bombs at the Boston Marathon, killing three and injuring 264, many of them seriously. The fact that Azamat Tazhayakov, who had obtained a student visa to study at the University of Massachusetts–Dartmouth, was linked to one of the perpetrators led to renewed cries for greater vigilance when admitting foreign students to the United States. The situation was made worse by the fact that Tazhayakov's visa had been revoked because he was no longer enrolled in school, but border agents at the airport had no access to that information and allowed him back into the United States. Tighter restrictions enacted after the bombing included banning students from regular academic study who have not already achieved proficiency in the English language and requiring them to enroll in language study instead.

The move toward digitalizing student visa information that followed these crises has resulted in student visas no longer being stamped by customs officials. Without physical proof of legal entry, some students have been unable to obtain driver's licenses, Social Security cards, and state identification cards. Without a Social Security card, graduate students who have teaching and research assistantships cannot get paid.

Both the student visa program and international students were damaged by revelations in 2011 that some colleges were exploiting the system. Suspicion was aroused when California's Tri-Valley University gave the address of the same two-bedroom apartment for 553 students. After a lengthy investigation, federal agents raided the school and shut it down. The investigation had revealed that, rather than attending classes on campus, students enrolled at the university and then spread out over the country, taking low-end jobs for minimum pay. Similar situations were discovered at a number of unaccredited schools, mostly in California and Virginia, where students were paying schools more than $3,000 a term to live and work in the United States.

Many international students choose to remain in the United States after graduation by becoming either citizens or permanent residents. Such actions are encouraged by most Americans who recognize the contribution of immigrants to American society. In 2011, Partnership for a New America reported that 40 percent of Fortune 500 companies had been established by immigrants and their children. In 2011, three-fourths of all patents filed by the top 10 schools in the United States had at least one foreign-born contributor. In addition to expanding diversity and improving the quality of life in a variety of fields, those companies generated a total of $4.2 trillion in 2011.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Immigration Law, History of U.S.: Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of; U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Further Readings

Bartlett, Tom. "Little Known Colleges Exploit Visa Loopholes to Make Millions Off Foreign Students." Chronicle of Higher Education, v. 57/29 (March 25, 2011).

Fischer, Karin. "After Bombings, Student Visas Come Under New Security." Chronicle of Higher Education, v.59/36 (May 17, 2013).

"Foreign High-Tech Graduates." Congressional Digest, v.90/9 (November 2011).

Gokhan, Alkanat. "A Study of the Impact of Changes to International Visa Policy and Procedures Since the 9/11 Attacks." Unpublished dissertation. Auburn University, Alabama, 2011.

Immigration and Naturalization Service. "Student Visas to the United States." http://www.uscitizenship.info/getting-student-visa/?r=bing-organic-search-student visas%27 (Accessed November 2013).

Open Doors–Institute of International Education. http://www.iie.org/en/Research-and-Publications/Open-Doors (Accessed December 2013).

U.S. Department of State. "Student Visas." http://travel.state.gov/visa/temp/types/types_1268.html (Accessed November 2013).

Subcultures

Subculture, or coculture, refers to the undercurrent in a culture and stands as a commonly used term in sociology, anthropology, and cultural studies. David

Riesman used the term subculture for the first time in 1950 to distinguish the ways and manners of the majority group and the minority group in any culture. He finds that the majority passively accepts commercially provided styles and meanings, and the subculture always tends actively toward seeking a minority style. He finds the subculture's orientation toward a new set of values. So, subculture may be taken as a group of people inside the rim of a culture. There can be any number of subcultures plying at global or regional level.

Drug subculture, sexual subculture, music subculture, the beat generation, body building, bohemianism, casuals, cybergoth, demoscene, emo, fandom, fetish, freak scene, glam rock, gopnik, goth, hip-hop, B-boy, graffiti, junglist, LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer), bears, new romanticism, nudism, naturism, vampire lifestyle, punk rocker, role-playing gamers, and so on are the major subcultures across the globe. The practitioners of the subculture differentiate themselves from the larger culture to which they belong and in which they operate. Some practitioners of subculture lock their horns with the use of the term subculture, finding the association of inferiority with the prefix sub. They find the use of coculture as the more authentic term. The Oxford English Dictionary defines the term subculture as "a cultural group within a larger culture, often having beliefs or interests at variance with those of the larger culture."

Dick Hebdige finds subculture is a subversion to normalcy and has argued for taking it as a negative paradigm because of its being critical to the dominant societal standard. On the connotations of subculture, M. P. Orbe has a point when he says, "Whereas some define subculture as meaning 'a part of the whole,' in the same sense that a subdivision is part of—but no less important than—the whole-city, other scholars reject the use of the prefix sub as applied to the term culture because it seems to imply being under or beneath and being inferior of secondary. As an alternative, the word coculture is suggested to convey the idea that no one culture is inherently superior to other existing cultures." Subcultures, therefore, exist under the wider umbrella of an elite or national culture, which is marked by certain specific indicators and icons. We can find the markers of subculture as the opposition of mass against the elite culture, the ideological opposition of ideological and moral colonization, postcolonial reply to the oppressing life style, free mode lifestyle among youths, generation gap and its manifestation, differences among the elite and intellectual culture, and finding a new way different from the boring set of societal norms.

In the present-day world when our conventions are propelled by the markers and traces of technology, we find orientations toward many subcultures every day. Even contemporary fantasy is expelled by technology. The future remains influenced under the charm of technology, and our psyche cannot travel too far to relax, as in previous times, and to let emotions swell. Here, the by-routes emerge as the last resort. Contemporary fantasy finds its way to a unique pedestal, which leads us to the postmodern mirage, where there is the end of all great traditions, there is a free and frank discussion of sex, personal always becomes political, and local histories rattle with the national and civilizational histories for securing prime places for themselves. It also scales many a common paradigm between two divergent cultural canvases.

Media play a big role in airing subcultures, which has emerged today with the cohesion of classic with the base context of the other. Here, metadiscourses are recognized and make subculture. Subcultures of drugs, sex, and music subculture are well supported by the media. These subcultures are antielitist and born out of mini-narratives. In itself, it becomes so strong that the preexisting meta-discourse no longer keep themselves capable to digest them, and they emerge as crystals, which later make diamonds out of themselves and overshine as grand narratives. If we look at the different manifestations of these subcultures—be it cinema, music, institutions, workplaces, or anything else, the subcultures have stood shoulder to shoulder with tradition. The subcultural periphery is swallowing the center. There is a visible desire among the subcultures of drugs, sex, and music to politicize the conventional establishment. The trend may be cited as something detoxifying the forces of elitist cultures.

As far as the inclination toward drugs and sex in the popular paradigm of human life is concerned, the subcultures no longer find these as negative things in the present time, but these emerge as the vehicle of modernity. The spectacle of modern life makes the metamorphoses of stock identities all across the globe. The subculture of music too has stamped a universal symphony, drifting far away from the barriers of cultural and regional identities. Subculture is giving such a big stroke to the mainstream culture that, in the postmodernist milieu, there is no longer much difference in the perception of these two on the issues of music and sex. A craving for new hegemony puts a question mark after all the discussions, ideologies, and desires that have ruled over the criteria of entertainment and success in the academic discourses of culture. As far as the subcultures of drugs, sex, and music are concerned, these touch upon the youth at large, and they in all respects search for entertainment alone. Globalization and liberalization are equally motivating catalysts for promoting the mighty youth subculture, whose emotions demand an encyclopedic range of amusement. The social media, cyberculture, and free markets have brought divergent things together in a salad bowl.

Subculture happens to be very fascinating and charming, which attracts the like-minded individuals who are deprived of the realization of their aspirations under the mainstream culture and remain neglected. It allows them to make their own norms and rules and subsequently allows them to develop a sense of identity.

The practitioners of subculture differentiate them from the main culture through a number of ways and by the level of immersion in society. Ken Gelder has found six indicators for identifying subcultures. They can be identified by "often negative relations to work (as idle, parasitic, at play or at leisure, etc.); negative or ambivalent relation to class (since subcultures are not class-conscious and don't conform to traditional class definitions); association with territory (the street, the hood, the club, etc.) rather than property; movement out of the home and into nondomestic forms of belonging (i.e., social groups other than the family);

An electronic dance music (EDM) concert, part of the rave subculture. Others subcultures include drug subculture, sexual subculture, music subculture, the beat generation, body building, bohemianism, casuals, cybergoth, demoscene, emo, fandom, fetish, freak scene, glam rock, gopnik, hip-hop, B-boy, graffiti, junglist, LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender), bears, new romanticism, nudism, naturism, vampire lifestyle, punk rocker, and role-playing gamers.

stylistic ties to excess and exaggeration (with some exceptions); and refusal of the banalities of ordinary life and massification."

Drug Subculture

Drug subculture is a negative subculture that starts in pleasure and ends up in pain. It is destructive and antisocial and works as a sweet poison to its members. Drug subcultures are the groups of people, especially the young, who come together with a common habit of taking drugs. They work as friends and operate at different levels—those taking drugs together, those managing the drugs illegally, drug traders, and those helping the group to thwart antidrug laws and avoid arrest.

The use of drug also becomes seminal in other subcultures, like reggae and hip-hop music, Rastafarianism, hippie movements, rave subculture (club scene), hipster subculture, rock subculture, and to some extent heavy metal subculture and stoner metal subculture. The drug subculture is often seen so deeply engrossed in their practice that all other chores of daily life look simply farce to them, and they make their own world. Sometimes, they start believing that the only way to get what they want is through their typical behavior, which sometimes proves dangerous to the common society.

The most common understanding in drug subculture is seen in their deliberations on how to obtain drugs, how to obtain money to buy drugs, how to avoid arrest, and how to avoid potential health risks. The subculture, most of the time, joins together to solve the common problems they encounter. Once caught in the labyrinth of drug subculture, it becomes very difficult for a person to come out. Procuring the drugs, maintaining their security, and evading the laws is how those in the drug subculture spend most of their time. The most disastrous effect of the drug subculture is seen on the teenagers who, once entering this, find no way other than involving themselves in many antisocial practices like theft, robbery, fraud, and so on until they become incapable both physically and mentally under the effects of the drugs.

Sexual Subculture

The sexual subculture is a group of people who believe in rejecting the established patterns of sexual norms and making and adopting their own. The postmodernist phase has ratified many sexual practices that used to be suppressed from time immemorial as taboos. The 1960s sexual revolution aired the countercultural rejection of the traditional sexual norms and gender constructs, starting especially from the urban life and entering to rural society as well in Europe, America, Australia, some parts of Asia, and in South Africa. LGBTQ groups have been formed, and sexual subculture has shown strong solidarity among followers and supporters.

The sexual subculture many times adopts their own codes, vocabulary, behaviors, and social etiquettes, which become visible in dressing patterns as well. In the sexual subculture itself, there are many subcultures—like those of gays, lesbians, transvestites, nonmonogamys, eunuchs, bisexuals, girlfag, guydyke, cisgender, faghag, cross-dressing, and so on, and they too are sub-branched. For example, the gay subculture has many subgroups like leathermen, bears, feeders, and the bareback, and the lesbians have butch and femme in the same pattern. Gay homosexuals have emerged as the largest sexual subculture in contemporary times. The sexual subculture asserts them through typical behavior as expressed in speaking, actions, clothing, and beliefs. Goth sexual subcultures, women's bathhouse subculture, hook-up subcultures, sexual citizenship, polymory, followers of vogueing, the Daughters of Bilitis, and so on, also lodge their significant presence in sexual subcultures. With the popularity of social networking sites, the sexual subculture is widely spreading across the globe.

Music Subculture

Music subculture is a positive subculture that starts in innovation and travels into finding new ways of entertainment. The music subculture mostly finds young members of society who have a flair for change. Here, we find many online music-sharing communities and bands. They believe in fusion and collage rather than the pure base. Revival of popular and folk music is a visible trait in music subculture. The music subculture strives to create a youth lore by adapting old music into the new patterns through the use of technology and reveals the trend of cyber-ethnography. The examples of music subculture are mainly mods, rockers, punks, hippies, hip-hop, urban, rappers, emo, indie, hardcore, glam rockers, and goths. They differentiate themselves from others with their musical tastes and prefer dressing to affiliate themselves with similar members. The Internet has helped the music subculture to organize online, allowing the members to exchange their ideas, views, and works freely. The 10 main musical subcultures, in chronological order, are flappers, original hipsters, deadheads, B-boys, Goths, gangstas, straight edge, emo kids, juggalos, and derivative hipsters.

Ravindra Pratap Singh
University of Lucknow

See Also: Drug and Alcohol Screening; Racial Identity Development, Models of; Same-Sex Couples/Marriage.

Further Readings

Gelder, Ken. Subcultures: Cultural Histories and Social Practice. Routledge, 2007.
Hebdige, Dick. Subculture: The Meaning of Style. Routledge, 1979.
Orbe, M. P. Constructing Co-Cultural Theory: An Explication of Culture, Power, and Communication. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 1998.
Thornton, Sarah. Club Cultures: Music, Media, and Subcultural Capital. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press, 1995.

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Association

Crime, homelessness, and medical problems associated with substance abuse and mental illness place substantial social and financial burdens on most communities. Despite their high consumption of community resources, approximately 20 million substance abusers and 10 million people with mental illness go without treatment annually. In 1992, United States Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS) established the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA) to reduce the impact of substance abuse and mental illness. SAMHSA identified strategic initiatives to help people with mental and substance use disorders, support the families of people with mental and substance use disorders, build strong and supportive communities, prevent costly behavioral health problems, and promote better health for all Americans.

SAMHSA operates under the premises that prevention works, treatment is effective, and people do recover from mental illness and substance abuse. SAMHSA invests in prevention, treatment, and recovery by making information, funding, and research more available.

Prevention

Each year, based on assessed needs, SAMHSA mobilizes individuals, families, schools, faith-based organizations, and workplaces to assist in efforts to help populations at-risk for substance abuse, mental illness, and suicide. Youth, Native Americans, and persons in the military are some of the target groups for prevention services. National Prevention Week raises public awareness of substance abuse and mental illness through health fairs, town meetings, and other local events. SAMHSA also retains a searchable database of interventions that promote mental health and substance abuse prevention.

Substance abuse prevention efforts extend to schools, workplaces, and health care providers. Grants provide resources for schools to conduct programs for the prevention of substance abuse and violence. Employers receive assistance in the development of drug-free workplace programs. Personnel in primary care facilities, trauma centers, and hospital emergency rooms are often the first point of contact for at-risk for substance abuse. The Screening, Brief Intervention, and Referral to Treatment (SBIRT) program informs health care providers about the best methods of intervention. The Center for Substance Abuse Prevention aids in the development of prevention policies that fortify the efforts of workplaces, schools, and communities and promotes drug-free neighborhoods. October is the National Substance Abuse Prevention Month, during which SAMHSA distributes materials to individuals and prevention professionals.

Efforts to promote mental health include programs that disseminate accurate information about mental illness. What a Difference a Friend Makes is a program that teaches people between the ages of 18 and 25 how to support peers who are experiencing mental and emotional problems. Because psychosocial stressors often trigger mental illness, SAMHSA also provides information on coping with traumatic events and financial difficulties. SAMHSA's suicide prevention programs include a hotline that is available to take crisis calls around the clock every day of the year. A suicide prevention tool kit is available for senior living communities, where substance abuse and suicide rates are increasing as the population ages.

Treatment

To improve access to mental health services, SAMHSA provides the 24/7 Treatment Referral Line. A Mental Health Services Locator and the Substance Abuse Treatment Facility Locator are among SAMHSA's efforts to assist substance abusers and mentally ill persons to find appropriate treatment. SAMHSA maintains a significant store of publications and materials about prevention and treatment. The Center for Substance Abuse Treatment (CSAT) integrates research results with clinical and administrative expertise to create treatment improvement protocols (TIPs). More than 50 TIPs booklets provide best practice guidelines to substance abuse treatment providers.

SAMHSA's Center for Mental Health Services helps states improve their mental health care systems by promoting evidence-based practices, supporting outreach and case management programs for the homeless, and improving access to mental health services. SAMHSA makes information about treatment programs available to the public and provides a treatment facility locator on its Web site in addition to a treatment referral hotline. The Center for Substance Abuse Treatment promotes evidence-based practices and supports community-based treatment efforts. Office of Behavioral Health Equity (OBHE) addresses disparities in resources for underserved groups that include racial populations, ethnic populations, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) populations.

Recovery

SAMHSA defines recovery as a process of change through which individuals improve their health and wellness, live self-directed lives, and strive to reach their full potential. To sustain positive recovery outcomes, SAMHSA promotes health and resilience by addressing issues of housing, employment, education, and social exclusion. The homeless and persons with co-occurring substance abuse and mental illness are vulnerable to relapse. SAMHSA provides resources to guide individuals, professionals, and communities in supporting vulnerable populations and assisting in their receipt of any Social Security Disability Insurance or Supplemental Security Income to which they are entitled.

Research

SAMHSA's Office of Policy, Planning, and Innovation (OPPI) maintains a presence in health research and collaborates with the National Institutes of Health (NIH) and the Centers for Disease Control (CDC). The Center for Behavioral Health Statistics is the government's lead agency in behavioral health statistics and epidemiology. The SAMHSA Web site provides a constantly updated compilation of research results on the data, outcomes, and quality (DOQ) page. DOQ addresses SAMHSA's strategic initiative to provide data that informs policy, measures program impact, and leads to improved quality of services and outcomes for individuals, families, and communities. Research results are available on a searchable database on the SAMHSA Web site. Results of research that describe trends in substance abuse and mental illness inform prevention programs. Research on treatment outcomes help to provide a basis for evidence-based practice.

SAMHSA awards millions of dollars in grants each year. Grants for substance abuse provide for things such as prevention programs, human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) screening programs, and drug-free community programs. Grants for mental health provide for the types of programs that support education, law enforcement, and families. SAMHSA's grants for substance abuse treatment expand existing programs and target at-risk populations. Grant-funded programs that demonstrate effectiveness may apply for renewal. The management of funding is transparent in that SAMHSA reports its funding distributions by state and program.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Beacon College

See Also: Substance Abuse Treatment for Children and Adolescents; Suicide Prevention Services; Twelve-Step Programs.

Further Readings

National Recovery Month. http://www.recoverymonth.gov (Accessed December 2013).

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. http://www.samhsa.gov (Accessed August 2013).

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. SAMHSA/CSAT Treatment Improvement Protocols. http://www.treatment.org/externals/tips.html (Accessed August 2013).

Substance Abuse Treatment for Children and Adolescents

Adolescent substance use is a widespread public health problem that impacts the health, safety, and future success of youth. Substance use disorders refer to problems resulting from use of a substance (e.g., alcohol, marijuana, or cocaine), which the individual continues to take despite experiencing problems as a result. Several treatment approaches have been developed to treat children and youth for problems related to substance use. Regardless of the specific focus or treatment strategies that are used to address substance-use problems, it is essential that treatment considers the youths' unique needs based on age and developmental status, motivation for treatment, as well as other cultural and demographic characteristics. These factors can have a substantial influence on the outcomes of treatment.

Substance use disorders are viewed on a continuum from mild to severe and are defined by the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5) as having experienced two or more problems arising from substance use in the past year. These problems include not accomplishing what one should at home or school because of substance use, taking the substance in larger amounts or for longer than one meant to, and wanting to cut down or stop using the substance but unable to do so. Substance use disorders are often first diagnosed in adolescence. Substance use disorders in childhood and adolescence have been associated with several serious psychosocial problems. These problems include behavioral problems, neurological problems, skills deficits, academic difficulties, and family problems. Youth dependent on drugs or alcohol also report increased rates of co-occurring mental health disorders (e.g., conduct, mood, and anxiety disorders).

According to estimates from the National Survey on Drug Use and Health, each year 1.7 million youth between the ages of 12 and 17 need treatment for illicit drug or alcohol use problems. However, only approximately 10 percent of these youth exhibiting severe drug or alcohol problems receive treatment. The discrepancy between adolescents who enter treatment and those who do not is a profound gap in services, leaving a significant number of youths still vulnerable to problems in young adulthood. Moreover, the potential positive impact of empirically supported substance abuse treatments is severely diminished. In reaction to these serious consequences that are associated with adolescent substance use, several treatments have been developed to reduce youths' drug and alcohol use and related behavioral problems. Most American youth who are treated, in either a publicly or privately funded facility, are receiving outpatient services, with only an even smaller minority treated in inpatient hospital or residential settings. The complexity of the problems young people typically bring to drug abuse treatment underscores their need for multimodal approaches that address a broad range of mental health and psychosocial problems in addition to substance use. Interventions to address drug and alcohol problems among youth use two primary approaches: directly treating the adolescent or focusing on the adolescent in the context of the family.

Individual treatments that focus on the adolescent commonly use behavioral interventions to identify internal and external stimuli that trigger substance use. These treatments then train youth on refusal skills, emotional regulation, and behavioral management techniques. Often, cognitively oriented therapies will also focus on distorted thoughts and maladaptive perceptions that lead to substance use and other problematic behaviors. Motivational interviewing is another individual treatment approach that is often used with this population. This treatment is designed to help clients recognize their substance use as a problem and build internal motivation toward changing their substance use behaviors. Some researchers conclude that motivational interviewing may be especially effective for adolescents because they are often coerced into treatment and, consequently, often do not view their behaviors as problematic.

Although some family members may deny the existence of problems or provide negative role models (e.g., parents use drugs), support from immediate and extended family members can be a key resource for young people in drug and alcohol treatment. Family dynamics are an integral component in the lives of children and adolescents. For clients who are under age 18 and not legally mandated to attend treatment, parents or guardians must agree that treatment is required and provide consent before any services can begin. Involving families has been identified as key for achieving positive treatment outcomes among those whose ethnic and cultural backgrounds place a high value on the family. Among Asian American adolescents, for example, weak family ties have been shown to be a risk factor associated with higher levels of substance use. Similar results have been seen in studies focusing on Latino youth. Ambivalent family attitudes toward treatment may also contribute to a reluctance to support ongoing monitoring of behaviors. The most common family-based treatment programs are multisystemic therapy, integrated family and cognitive behavioral therapy, multidimensional family therapy, and brief, strategic family therapy. Each of these treatments approaches focuses not only on changing a youth's behavior but also on reducing risk factors for substance use present in the youth's family or other social environments (e.g., school, peers, or community).

Regardless of the specific treatment model that is used in treating young people, there are several important considerations for those who treat children and adolescents. Professionals should take into account the different developmental needs, depending on the age of the child or adolescent. Younger children have different needs than older adolescents, who may be dealing with issues such as developing autonomy and resisting or reacting to authority. Although the DSM-5 does not have developmentally specific criteria for identifying substance use disorders among youth, it is important to recognize that symptoms of substance use disorders may present differently in youth compared to adults. Most adolescents, for example, have shorter histories of alcohol use than adults and do not typically show withdrawal symptoms for alcohol. Truancy is one of the most frequently occurring signs of substance use problems among adolescents, and it is not included in the current diagnostic criteria.

Similarly, children and adolescents must be approached differently than adults because of their unique developmental issues, differences in their values and belief systems, and unique environmental considerations. Peer influences are particularly salient during adolescence and can have a strong impact on adolescents' decisions to use drugs or alcohol. It is also important to recognize that many adolescents have been coerced explicitly or implicitly into attending treatment. The majority of youth receiving treatment in publicly funded facilities are referred by the criminal justice system. Studies have suggested that African American youth are even more likely than other youth to be referred to treatment this way. Treatment providers must be sensitive to the potential for motivational barriers to change, particularly at the onset of treatment.

In addition to age and treatment referral source, substance abuse treatment for children and adolescents must also take into account the ethnicity and cultural background of youth. Survey research has documented heterogeneity in the prevalence rates and patterns of substance use among adolescents among different racial and ethnic groups including Hispanics or Latinos, African Americans, Asian Americans, Native Americans, and whites. There is continued concern about whether or not interventions are equally effective for individuals from various racial or ethnic backgrounds. African American youth, for example, generally have lower rates of substance use than do Caucasian and Hispanic or Latino youth. Despite their lower rates of substance use, African American youth experience greater social, economic, and health consequences and have higher rates of attrition in substance use treatment. In order to ensure that youth from different ethnic groups respond to interventions, it is important to understand and address the cultural needs of these youth.

Similarly, it is important to recognize how gender and sexuality can impact the treatment needs of this population. Rates of substance use and disorders among female adolescents have increased dramatically in recent decades, and there are now fewer differences between males and females. Despite the similar rates of substance use, adolescent females typically present a distinctive clinical portrait compared to their male counterparts. Adolescent females more frequently present with depression and difficulties attributed to family problems in addition to the externalizing symptoms also found among males. Studies have consistently shown that lesbian, gay, and bisexual (LGB) youth report significantly higher rates of substance use and disorder compared with heterosexual youth. Even higher rates have been found among some subpopulations of LGB youth, such as bisexual youth and females. Although few interventions have been tailored to specifically address the needs of LGB youth, efforts are increasing to better understand the unique factors associated with substance use disorders among LGB youth to better tailor interventions to their needs.

Stella M. Resko
Wayne State University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; At-Risk Youth Services; Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths; Monitoring the Future; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Goldbach, J. T., and L. K. Holleran Steiker. "An Examination of Cultural Adaptations Performed by LGBT-Identified Youths to a Culturally Grounded, Evidence-Based Substance Abuse Intervention." Journal of Gay and Lesbian Social Services, v.23/2 (2011).

Strada, M. J., and B. Donohue. "Substance Use in Ethnic Minority Youth." Journal of Ethnicity in Substance Abuse, v.5/1 (2006).

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. The CBHSQ Report: A Day in the Life of American Adolescents: Substance Use Facts Update. Rockville, MD: Center for Behavioral Health Statistics and Quality, 2013.

Suicide, Cultural Aspects of

Suicide is a type of intentional self-destructive behavior generally resulting with the loss of life. Émile Durkheim defines suicide as the death of an individual as a consequence of direct or indirect and positive or negative acts of him- or herself. Being a worldwide social problem, suicide is accepted as one of the most important causes of death. Sociological and psychological standpoints offer different explanations on the causes of suicide. The first approach highly focuses on the impact of social structure, demographics, and culture, while the latter relates suicide to the mental state of the individuals.

Suicide is a continuum involving three significant steps: ideation, attempt, and completion. However, many studies point out that suicidal ideation is more common than attempt and completion of suicide. Individuals may only have suicidal ideation but not a tendency for suicidal attempt. Completion of a suicide case is totally related to how lethal the method used is. The patterns of suicide also vary among age and gender groups and different geographical locations in the world. Current studies show that males are more likely to complete suicide than females, while women are more prone to suicidal attempt. In that, males use more lethal methods for committing suicide, and women adopt less-violent acts to take their lives. Yet suicide rates for females may also be higher in different cultural settings.

The scientific community agrees that suicide is a result of a combination of a number of psychological, social, economic, and cultural factors. Among all other factors explaining suicide, culture has become a strong determinant of suicidal behavior. Culture involves social norms and rules shared by the individuals in a society. Behavioral patterns are also influenced by these cultural traits of a society. Cultural codes in a society are strong determinants of human behaviors and cultural influence and, therefore, cannot be undermined in the understanding of suicide in one cultural setting. Cultural factors either precipitate or initiate the processes leading to suicidality. In many cases, culture has a certain effect on individual choices in crisis situations such as failure in life.

Studies explaining the causal relationship between suicide and culture date back to Durkheim. Durkheim categorizes four types of suicide: egoistic, anomic, altruistic, fatalistic. Egoistic suicide is a result of too little social integration. Individuals who are not sufficiently bound to social groups lack social support and guidance of the community and, as a result, are more likely to commit suicide. Altruistic suicide is a result of too much integration. As altruistic people are more integrated into social groups, their individuality lost its importance in their minds, and they are willing to sacrifice themselves to the benefit of a group. In this case, suicide gains a form of self-sacrifice. On the other hand, disengagement of individuals from social ties is the main factor leading to anomic suicide. Durkheim indicates that societal changes break social ties between the individuals and the society. Lack of social ties, the idea of belongingness, and loss of societal influence on individuals contribute to the occurrence of anomic suicide. Fatalistic suicide is a rarely observed type in the real world (e.g., suicide among slaves).

All types of suicide in Durkheim's categorization are related to the instability of cultural dynamics such as social integration and regulation. The level of social integration and moral regulation in a community is a concomitant factor leading to suicidal behaviors. Similarly, in heterogeneous societies, clash of cultural values may create a sense of cultural shock and adaptation problems. In return, acculturation may create a social anomie, which may lead to increases in suicide rates.

Meaning of Suicide in Culture

Cultural approach and social perception of suicide are also influential in understanding the action. Suicide has various meanings for both the one committing suicide and the society. In developed countries, mainstream culture decriminalizes the action, while in more traditional societies, suicide is unacceptable yet instrumental in meeting cultural expectations. However, the act of killing oneself is not perceived positively in cultures intertwined with religious values. Hence, it would be quite difficult to explain suicide with only one universal definition.

In general, suicide is perceived as a way of escaping from negative stimuli in one's life as well as a response to the social environment. In developed countries where economic prosperity is the main determinant of cultural codes, loss of wealth or increasing debts may lead individuals to commit suicide as they have difficulties adopting new conditions. In Scandinavian countries, especially in Denmark, domestic anomy is a root cause of suicide. Loss of spouse or divorce increases the likelihood of dependency of elderly parents on their children, and suicidal ideation accompanying reunion thoughts with the beloved one results in suicide. Similar suicidal motives are seen among women as a ritual of grief for husbands in India and Japan. On the other hand, in countries where divorce is culturally prohibited, wives are prone to commit suicide. Suicide for loss of honor and failure in daily life is also reported in many traditional (China and Japan) and developed (Sweden) countries. In Chinese culture, suicide is stigmatized and seen as a shameful act, which collapses esteem of the family. In Japan, in many cases, suicide is a way of restoration or preservation of the honor of the self and the family honor. Japanese women's suicide (Jigai) had also become a form of culturally imposed ritual up to the 19th century.

Methods of Suicide and Culture

Previous studies lay out that various methods were chosen for suicide in different cultural settings. Jumping from a high place, drowning, strangulation, stabbing, self-poisoning, suffocation, hanging, and firearm use are the most common methods adopted for suicidal actions, while burning oneself and use of domestic gas are observed in some specific locations as way of taking one's life. These methods are observed in both developing or underdeveloped countries. Use of domestic gas has been reported as a popular method of suicide for a long time in the United Kingdom. In Trinidad and Tobago, use of an agricultural poison is quite common among the farmers in rural areas. This pattern of suicide is observed in most cases in rural areas of the United States. Burning of a wife on a husband's funeral pyre is a common pattern of suicide in India, which may not be deemed as a suicide in other cultures.

Considering Cultural Differences in Suicide Prevention

Understanding cultural aspects of suicidal behavior is also of importance in suicide prevention in different cultures. Suicide theories and definitions are not that comprehensive to explain all suicidal behaviors around the world. By the same token, strategies aimed at intervening with the risk groups in one society may be adapted to the other one, taking into account the culture-specific issues. Extant research shows that there is a large spectrum of suicidal patterns among racial and ethnic groups in countries such as the United States, India, and China. Therefore, cultural and even subcultural characteristics need to be understood well.

Fatih Irmak
Independent Scholar

See Also: Self-Harm, Cultural Aspects of; Suicide Prevention Services.

Further Readings

Colucci, E. "The Cultural Facet of Suicidal Behaviour: Its Importance and Neglect." Advances in Mental Health, v.5/3 (2006).

Durkheim, E. Suicide: A Study in Sociology. Glencoe, IL: The Free Press, 1951.

Joiner, T. E. Why People Die by Suicide. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2005.

Värnik, P. "Suicide in the World." International Journal of Environmental Research and Public Health, v.9/3 (2012).

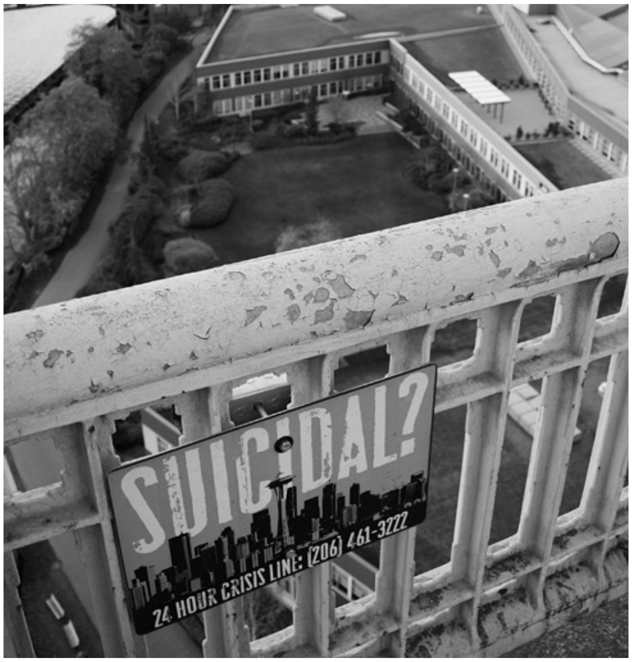
Suicide Prevention Services

Suicide is the 11th-leading cause of death in the United States, and international rates of suicide vary widely from country to country. Rates of death by suicide also vary greatly depending upon individual characteristics. Suicide rates and an individual's age, sex, religion, race, and ethnicity have been widely studied, while there is less evidence linking sexual orientation, gender identity, employment status, occupation, and social status to suicide. In 2010 (the most recent rates available), adults 45 to 64 years old and 85 years and older had the highest rates of suicide. Males died by suicide at a rate that was four times higher than that of females, while females attempted suicide three times more frequently than males.

In the United States, the highest rate of suicide was found among those living in the western states with the south, midwest, and the northeast following. In 2010, Caucasian and American Indian or Alaskaß Native people had the highest rates of suicide in the United States, while African American, Hispanic (with the exception of Hispanic adolescent females), and Asian or Pacific Islanders had substantially lower rates. Most experts in suicide believe that suicide rates are lower in communities where cultural or religious prohibitions against suicide are strong, social supports are plentiful, and the use of alcohol and other drugs to cope is less prevalent.



A sign for suicide prevention services on the George Washington Memorial Bridge in Freemont, Washington. Jumping from a high place is one of the most common methods of suicide.

Attention to suicide and efforts to decrease its incidence have expanded in recent years. There are two main approaches to suicide prevention: community- and individual-based services. Community-based approaches use a variety of strategies to attempt to lower the suicide rate within communities as a whole. Individual approaches seek to identify and treat individuals at risk for suicide. This entry reviews the most prevalent community- and individual-based approaches.

Suicide Prevention Initiatives and Programs

Community-based approaches seek to reduce the incidence of suicide by enhancing connectedness, increasing peoples' knowledge of suicide statistics, risk factors, protective factors, warning signs, and resources. Community-based approaches also focus on increasing community members' responsiveness to persons who are at risk for suicide and reducing social stigma associated with seeking help for mental health concerns.

The National Strategy for Suicide Prevention serves as a guide for effective suicide prevention services utilizing a public health approach to collect information, plan programs, and evaluate their effectiveness. Suicide prevention in local communities, such as cities, schools, universities, and Native American tribes should take into account the unique vulnerability of members in terms of ethnicity, sexual orientation, age, and other characteristics. As a part of the public health approach, educating people about suicide is an important service as misinformation about suicide stands in the way of people providing and accessing needed help. Educational efforts include informing people about suicide risk factors and warning signs, dispelling myths about suicide, and providing people with information about helpful services.

Social norms marketing strategies are similar to advertising campaigns and seek to change socially held beliefs about suicide, mental health problems, and receiving treatment. Social stigma (social discomfort or disapproval) about having mental health problems is thought to block people from getting and providing social support and seeking treatment. Social messages that let people know that it is not crazy, weak, or uncommon to have mental health struggles may help change the social climate and allow people to get needed assistance.

Many communities use gatekeeper trainings to teach basic suicide prevention and intervention skills to those in positions to intervene with someone who is suicidal. Some trainings are intended for everyone in a community, while others are meant for people in certain roles such as teachers or peer counselors. Trainings most often include facts about suicide, warning signs, and direct instruction and practice in intervening with people at risk. Research on gatekeeper trainings indicates that the trainings are often effective in educating people about suicide and increasing their skill and the likelihood of approaching and assisting someone at risk.

Survivor Support

People who loved someone who died by suicide are known as suicide survivors. Because suicide carries such social stigma, suicide survivors often benefit from specialized support services. Individual counseling, support groups, and participation in online forums are some of the main ways survivors find support. Common issues survivors confront are a lack of understanding of their experience and feelings of guilt, blame, anger, bewilderment, and shame. Postvention services are sometimes offered to groups of people who have lost someone to suicide. These most often include a single group meeting led by a mental health professional and aimed at helping participants process and begin to deal with the death. Survivor support services are especially important because some survivors think about suicide themselves as they experience the extreme pain of their loss.

Hotlines

One important service for people at risk for suicide is telephone support and referral services, also known as hotlines. Nationwide, toll-free hotlines can be reached by anyone with telephone access. Hotlines are staffed mostly by highly trained volunteers who try to evaluate what may be most helpful. When a caller is considering suicide, the staffer provides support and can encourage the caller to access mental health services. If the caller seems intent on making a suicide attempt, hotline staffers may contact law enforcement. Research has shown that hotlines are helpful in reducing suicidal thoughts during the telephone conversation, and callers continue to experience a decrease in distress and hopelessness in the weeks after the call. Some hotlines follow up on calls to provide support and encourage the caller to access recommended services.

Medical and Mental Health Evaluation and Treatment

Studies have shown that many Caucasian suicidal people seek out medical care in the months before they end their lives; many do not let their care provider know they are suicidal. Those coming from minority or underrepresented groups are thought to access family and community supports more often and do not tend to access medical services. Primary care medical professionals provide suicide prevention services if they routinely ask about suicidal thoughts, screen and treat co-occurring mental health conditions, and refer for mental health treatment. Emergency medical personnel encounter people who have threatened suicide or made suicide attempts. Careful evaluation is necessary to determine their level of risk and appropriate interventions. Inpatient medical care may be warranted to protect patients from making a suicide attempt and to initiate medication or counseling.

Psychiatrists often evaluate and treat people at risk for suicide with medications in inpatient and outpatient settings. Mental health evaluations are also conducted by other mental health professionals (psychologists, social workers, counselors, or psychiatric nurses) when there are concerns related to a client's or patient's thoughts, behaviors, or emotions. During evaluation, a mental health professional most often talks with the person directly to understand his or her problems and assess his or her functioning, thoughts about suicide, and level of risk.

In addition, the mental health professional may talk with significant others, such as partners or family members; administer screening measures to assess symptoms such as anxiety, depression, and suicidal thoughts or behaviors; and explore suicide history, planning, intent, and access to available means to complete suicide such as pills or firearms.

After evaluation, most individuals are referred to mental health counseling or psychotherapy. The goal of treatment is to improve a person's mental health and overall functioning, thereby reducing the pull of suicide as an option. When working with a suicidal client, a mental health professional must address both the suicidal behavior and underlying concerns or psychiatric conditions (e.g., depression, substance use, or recent losses) that have contributed to his or her pain and desire to die. During the course of treatment, many individuals benefit from medication to alleviate symptoms. If a person appears to be at immediate risk for suicide, inpatient hospitalization may be warranted. Research has led to the identification of a number of evidenced-based prevention programs and practices. For many people at risk for suicide, effective mental health services are lifesaving.

Karen M. VanDeusen
Kathryn Lewis Ginebaugh
Western Michigan University

See Also: Mental Health Services, Adult; Mental Health Services, Child; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment; Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration; Suicide, Cultural Aspects of.

Further Readings

Hawton, Keith and Kees van Heeringen, eds. The International Handbook of Suicide and Attempted Suicide. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2000.
Lester, David. Suicide Prevention: Resources for the Millennium. Philadelphia: Brunner Routledge, 2001.
Simon, Robert I. and Robert E. Hales, eds. Textbook of Suicide Assessment and Management. Arlington, VA: American Psychiatric Publishing, 2012.
Substance Abuse Mental Health Services Administration. "National Registry of Evidence-Based Programs and Practices." http://www.nrepp.samhsa.gov/ (Accessed May 2013).
United States Department of Health and Human Services. "National Strategy for Suicide Prevention." http://www.surgeongeneral.gov/library/reports/national-strategy-suicide-prevention/full-report.pdf (Accessed May 2013).

Supplemental Security Income, Services Funded by

Supplemental Security Income (SSI) consists of monthly cash payments for low-resourced adults who are disabled, blind, 65 or older and disabled, or blind children. Unlike other Social Security insurance and retirement programs that are based on contributions, SSI is a means-tested program for people who lack a significant work history. SSI is of unique concern to the diverse field of human services because it serves as a safety net for the most economically vulnerable people in the United States.

SSI was established in 1974 by the Nixon administration to restructure federally funded but state-run disability assistance programs for the purpose of ensuring standardized eligibility and other program components. Financed through U.S. Treasury general funds, SSI is run by the Social Security Administration. It provides monthly cash benefits to low-income elders as well as adults and children who are both poor and severely disabled or blind. A medical verification of the disability is required, and the disability must severely limit functioning. In situations where the person is disabled to the extent to which he or she cannot manage his or her money, a representative payee, such as a relative, friend, or case manager, is assigned.

As of 2013, the maximum payment for a single person is $710 per month and $1,066 for a couple. This benefit increases annually based on the consumer price index. Most states supplement SSI payments except for Arizona, North Dakota, Mississippi, and West Virginia. SSI recipients are automatically enrolled in Medicaid in most states and qualify for food assistance in all states except California. Additionally, recipients are eligible for Section 8 housing assistance vouchers, and all Social Security offices offer work incentives and other employment supports. SSI considerably adds to income security of the elderly poor, and true to its name, supplements often-meager Social Security retirement benefits.

Because the program is targeted at the most economically disadvantaged people, there is an asset and savings ceiling of $2,000 for a single person and $3,000 for a married couple. In other words, to qualify for SSI, there must be income and asset scarcity. This poses problems for anyone who has assets in excess of the cap but who nonetheless are impoverished. Consider the elders who are on fixed incomes through modest Social Security retirement payment, and own their own small home, despite having an income that may hover around the poverty line, they would not qualify for SSI. Policy analysts point to the relaxation of asset caps to enable more elderly income poor (especially women) to avoid severe poverty. People with disabilities who seek work experience another consequence of the resource cap. The program does not count the first $65 earned, but after that, benefits are reduced $1 for every $2 earned. SSI's restrictions on earnings hamper people from seeking gainful employment. This is pronounced among people who would benefit greatly from working and does not contribute to meaningful engagement.

The passage of the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act (PRWORA) of 1996 restricted eligibility for low-income immigrants and low-income substance abusers. Only legally recognized immigrants can now qualify for benefits. PRWORA eliminated drug addiction and alcoholism from the list of qualifying disabilities. The law loosened eligibility requirements among children, however, most notably with the addition of Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD).

With the 2013 repeal of the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA), the Social Security Administration accepts SSI applications from same-sex couples whose marriages are legally recognized in their home states.

Mary Caplan
University of Georgia, Athens

See Also: Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Social Security, Services Funded by; Social Security Administration.

Further Readings

Hogan, S. R., G. J. Unick, R. Speiglman, and J. C. Norris. "Gender-Specific Barriers to Self-Sufficiency Among Former Supplemental Security Income Drug Addiction and Alcoholism Beneficiaries: Implications for Welfare-to-Work Programs and Services." Journal of Social Service Research, v.37/3 (2011).

Wiseman, M. "Supplemental Security Income for the Second Decade." Poverty and Public Policy, v.3/1 (2011).

Yoo, G. J. "Immigrants and Welfare Policy Constructions of Deservingness." Journal of Immigrant and Refugee Studies, v.6/4 (2008).

Supported Housing

Supported housing is a model that merges both housing and services to sustain such housing. While this model can be used for a variety of circumstances, this entry will focus on supported housing for those with mental illness, developmental and intellectual disabilities, and addictions, and as a solution aiding those who were formerly homeless.

Supported Housing for Those With Mental Illness

Supported housing for those with serious mental illness generally consists of an independent apartment structure that is considered to be a permanent home. This differs from supportive housing, which may include group homes or clustered apartments, and custodial housing, which may include foster families or another caregiving model. Typically, the consumer is looked upon as a tenant and the staff act as facilitators, allowing the consumer to maintain the locus of control. Interventions are individuals. This approach is commonly known as the Housing First approach, which was first introduced in 1995. Rental supplements, often known as Section 8, distributed by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, provide financial assistance in many cases. Housing is offered first, and other mental health services may follow. This reflects the idea that housing is a basic human right and an essential need. Choice and control are emphasized in this model so that the consumer is able to choose where, and with whom, he or she would like to live. Once housing has been secured, ancillary services are then offered based upon individual need. These services may include individual, family, or group counseling for mental health issues with a goal of increasing housing stability and minimizing hospitalizations. Services may also include community activities, part-time or full-time employment and vocational supports, and other efforts to promote community integration.

Supported Housing for Those With Developmental and Intellectual Disabilities

Many supported housing programs for those with developmental and intellectual disabilities were born out of parents for their children to live in the community and not in an institution. Their ideals coincided with the deinstitutionalization movement of the 1960s and 1970s, which sought to close large institutions, thought to be at the least ineffective, and at worst inhumane, and move those residents to small, community-based homes, with an increase in individual involvement in decision making and the development of innovative agencies to provide such services. The initial move, in most jurisdictions, was to group homes, and this continues in many areas to this day. The move to group homes certainly improved quality of life as well as community presence, given their scattered presence within towns and cities.

At the same time, the group home was still thought to signal a difference, and staffing relationships were often temporary and shift based. Community participation was within a group of other people with disabilities and on a schedule, as opposed to when one naturally might want to go out. In the early 1990s, some agencies running group homes began shifting to a shared living model. Shared living is when a relative, nonrelative family, or roommate may share his or her home or the home of the person served. These programs are funded through state agencies such as the Department of Developmental Services or state and federal Medicaid programs. The ultimate goal is a concept called life-sharing based on the ideals of the L'Arche communities, in which case the relationship is nonpaid. The provider in shared living does receive a stipend, but the relationship is based on the values of mutuality, love, and unconditional respect. In addition to the companionship derived from living with a roommate or family, caregivers provide support or hands-on care for those adult daily living skills that the person served requires. This may include bathing, toileting, dressing, as well as travel and accompaniment to appointments and community activities. Both having a voice and choice in day-to-day life and living arrangements has resulted in adaptive, behavioral, and community membership gains. Numerous studies have shown that moving from segregated settings to homes of their own choosing results in an increase in community membership and inclusion.

Supported Housing in Substance Abuse Recovery

There are a variety of supported residential options available to people in regard to treatment and recovery from substance abuse. In the typical model, a series of step-down approaches are made available. The majority of these models follows a prescribed treatment approach and also links the recovering substance abuser to community support options.

A first step for substance abusers of alcohol or opiate addiction is often detoxification. Most treatment facilities require that an individual be substance free prior to enrollment. It is not necessary to enroll in a program from a detoxification center, though that method is desired so as not to expose the substance abuser to opportunities to reuse. A first residential option and step down from a detoxification center is a post-detox stabilization program. These programs usually last up to 30 days. A primary focus is to provide health monitoring, biopsychological assessment, individual and group counseling, individual treatment planning, aftercare planning, as well as referral and follow-up. The successful candidate may move directly to a structured recovery home, frequently referred to as a halfway house or step-down to a transitional support program. Frequently, the individual does not have visitation with his or her family or only limited and controlled visitation.

Transitional support services are designed to provide a secure environment to assist the individual in maintaining sobriety and learning skills to sustain recovery. Typically, these centers provide highly structured schedules. Treatment services include providing self-help groups, psychoeducational groups, and counseling. An emphasis is placed on allowing the individual to understand and learn techniques to deal with his or her illness. Usually, these programs provide case management services. This service includes creating an individual treatment protocol and assisting the individual to transition to the next step in treatment. A typical length of stay in this type of programming is up to 30 days.

Another option is a structured recovery home (or halfway house). These stays last from six months to a year. The emphasis is transitioning the individual back to the community. These services provide 24-hour residential services including counseling and case management. Ongoing treatment in the form of group counseling and educational services is emphasized in addition to learning independent living skills, vocational or employment supports, returning to community medical and mental health services, and assisting in family reunification. Planning for aftercare is stressed.

A final option is often referred to as a sober home or a three-quarter house, which tends to be less regimented but requires proof of sobriety. This is an option for individuals who do not feel ready to return to their home communities. There is some structure through house meetings and group counseling. Individuals are usually required to work and pay for their room and board. An individual may be required to be employed at the time or shortly after his or her enrollment. These services provide the recovering individual with treatment protocols, skills training, and a support network to return to in the community. A comprehensive treatment plan lasts from six months to more than a year and follows a step-down model from detoxification and individual and group training to skill development, employment emphasis, and family and community reunification.

Supported Housing for the Homeless

Often, the connection between homelessness and supported housing begins with an effort to reach out for help. Given that communities design their own services, the quality and quantity of options vary. One option may be a shelter. Most communities and many not-for-profit or religious organizations provide shelters. Shelters are space limited and usually are made available on a first-come basis. Shelter access also depends on the nature of the condition and the agencies assisting in finding shelter. In ideal circumstances, a shelter, or short-term stabilization, is accompanied by case management services that facilitate more-stable housing options. One such option is transitional housing.

Transitional housing is usually temporary but in some cases can last up to two years while a family or individual is stabilized. Housing supports are accompanied by skill training, ongoing case management (resource and referral service), and creation of a plan to move into permanent housing, which may include continued subsidized low-income housing for the qualified individual or may entail a more typical residential experience.

Shanna L. Burke
John Struth
Nonotuck Resource Associates, Inc.

See Also: Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Deinstitutionalization; Group Homes for Adults; Long-Term Residential Care; Mental Health Services, Adult.

Further Readings

Davis, P. and G. Faw. "Residential Preferences in Person-Centered Planning." In Person-Centered Planning: Research, Practice and Future Directions, S. Holburn and P. M. Vietze, eds. Baltimore, MD: Paul H. Brookes, 2002.

Jason, Leonard, Bradly Olson, Joseph Ferrari, and Anthony Lo Sasso. "Communal Housing Settings Enhance Substance Abuse Recovery." American Journal of Public Health, v.96/10 (2006).

Lakin, C., S. Larson, and S. Kim. "The Effect of Community vs. Institutional Living on the Daily Living Skills of Persons With Developmental Disabilities." In National Association of State Directors of Developmental Disability Services, Evidence-Based Policy Brief, 2011.

Nelson, Geoffrey. "Housing for People With Serious Mental Illness: Approaches, Evidence, and Transformative Change." Journal of Sociology and Social Welfare, v.37/4 (2010).

Sweatshop Laborers

Labor trafficking is a form of modern-day slavery that affects millions of people including sweatshop laborers. Sweatshops are shops or factories that violate labor laws by disobeying the minimum labor standards while undermining minimum living standards. Most sweatshop workers are girls and women. These individuals endure extremely harsh working and living conditions as they labor in garment sweatshops and other factories that produce a wide range of goods. Some of the major products produced and processed in sweatshops and factories include clothing, shoes, rugs, coffee, flowers, vegetables, and fruit. Sweatshop conditions are deplorable and gross violations of human rights. Sweatshop perpetrators pay workers little to no wages; ignore minimum wage requirements; require and demand excessive overtime with little or no overtime pay (e.g., 10- to 16-hour days six to seven days a week); deny meal breaks; impose high fees for frivolous infractions; wrongfully fire workers who refuse or complain about work requirements and conditions; hire child laborers; prohibit unions development among workers; or operate under unsafe, unsanitary, and crowded work conditions.

Given the diversity of trafficking experiences of women, men, and children in the sweatshop industry, human services providers must innovatively seek to address the plethora of challenges facing these individuals. Identified problem areas include advocacy and case management services related to: safe housing, accessing health care, income to cover basic necessities, legal representation (oftentimes), job training or skill development, education, and adjustment of status, for some, along with a host of other pressing needs. Federal legislation in the United States is attempting to address these issues on a larger scale by first identifying what labor trafficking is.

Labor trafficking was first recognized and adopted as a federal crime in the United States with the enactment of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) of 2000, which has since been reauthorized four times (i.e., 2003, 2005, 2008, and 2013). This legislation, arguably the most influential of its kind in the world, in its original scope asserted that severe human trafficking involved sex and labor trafficking. Both forms of trafficking involve recruiting, harboring, transporting, providing a person to someone else for a specific purpose, and obtaining a person for a specific purpose. In the case of labor trafficking, the purpose relates to involuntary servitude, peonage, debt bondage, or slavery. Involuntary servitude involves a person coercively laboring against his or her free will to the benefit of others. Peonage involves holding a person (and possibly his or her family members) against his or her will in lieu of a debt or a penal sentence. Debt bondage involves a person's pledge of his or her labor or services as repayment for a loan or other debt only to be held in a situation whereby the debt never liquidates despite the work performed. Slavery, which can include elements of all the previously mentioned forms of labor trafficking, offers no provisions of human rights to its victims.

The Act Versus the Means and Labor Trafficking

Severe human trafficking legally takes place through five recognized acts and three recognized means according to the TVPA. The acts include recruiting, harboring, transporting, providing the person for labor or service-related purposes, and obtaining a person for labor or service-related purposes. The means involve force, fraud, and coercion. Specific to sweatshop laborers, force involves making someone participate in forced labor situations through acts of aggression, violent beatings, confinement, deprivation of food, confiscation of legal or travel documents, or other extreme means of submission.

Fraud involves deceiving, luring, or tricking a victim into work situations. It may manifest itself in the form of false advertisements of good-paying jobs or a specific type of work that would afford the individual enough income to care for oneself and his or her family members. Instead, once employed, the individual is subjected to sweatshop conditions and little to no pay. Coercion involves intimidation, threats, or perceptions of real danger related to acts of violence toward the victim or his or her loved ones. Depending on the victim, threats may also include informing law enforcement or immigration of that person's undocumented or expired legal status, for example. Combined, acts and means work in tandem to both entrap and enslave victims in sweatshops.

Sweatshops and Companies

Sweatshops are known for employing children and women to produce their products despite the horrific abuses (verbal, physical, and sexual), morbidity, and mortality associated with such practices. It is estimated that more than 250 million children work in sweatshops abroad. Children ranging in age from as young as 5 to 14 are commonly subjected to sweatshop work in many developing countries. It is reported, however, that 85 percent of sweatshop workers are young women between the ages of 15 and 25. As is the case abroad, most sweatshop workers in the United States are young women as well. In 2011, however, more than $2 million were assessed for civil money penalties due to U.S. companies' Fair Labor Standards Act child labor violations. In 2012, the Department of Labor reported that 134 products made in 74 countries were produced by child labor or forced labor persons.

A wide range of companies in the United States are guilty of involvement with sweatshop entities. Many are able to plead innocent, nonetheless, amid (1) persistent allegations of abuse and unethical practices among its contracted manufacturers, (2) millions paid in fines, and (3) gross violations of labor standards. Weak internal monitoring systems are often blamed for the offenses versus admission of direct participation and knowledge of such practices by the parent retailer.

The TVPA forbids contracting with organizations abroad that engage in labor trafficking activities. As a loophole to such requirements, however, many companies allow for internal monitoring systems abroad to operate as the conscience of those companies' operations. This includes allowing for the prevalence of inspectors who are bribed to fail to properly review documents, inspect sites, and interview managers, supervisors, and workers during their required and unannounced visits. Retailers, buyers (stores and brands that lure the consumer in), and unethical contracted manufacturers (the producers of goods) lure in unsuspecting and vulnerable contractors (sweatshop workers) who are then subjected to violent and aggressive overseers. As a result of this infrastructure, this inherently oppressive system lends itself to sweatshop practices. Sweatshop abuses involving American companies have been reported in a number of countries including India, China, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Mexico, Ecuador, Columbia, Brazil, and Indonesia, to name just a few. In the United States, sweatshops are also well documented in California and New York.

Sweatshops are a widespread problem in many parts of world, including the United States. The United States has identified sweatshops as a major social ill both domestically as well as abroad. With goods being imported into the United States from more than 100 countries across the world, sweatshop victims continue to grow in number. These victims include persons subjected to sweatshop work in the United States. Comprehensive measures that include worldwide cooperation in the manufacturing of consumer goods, close monitoring of contracted manufacturers abroad and domestically, conscientious and responsible business practices, and an acknowledgment of the severity of the matter have marked the beginning of an extensive fight to end sweatshops worldwide.

Jacquelyn C. A. Meshelemiah
Ohio State University

See Also: Child Labor, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Children, Youth, and Human Trafficking; Fair Labor Standards Act; Human Trafficking.

Further Readings

Dosomething.org. "11 Facts About Sweatshops." http://www.dosomething.org/tipsandtools//11-facts-about-sweatshops (Accessed December 2013).

Polaris Project. "Factories/Manufacturing." http://www.polarisproject.org/human-trafficking/labor-trafficking-in-the-us/factories# (Accessed December 2013).

Stop Sweatshops Act H. R. 90 (106th): Stop Sweatshops Act, 106th Congress, 1999–2000.

Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, H. R. 3244, 106th Congress, Second Session (2000).

Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, H. R. 2620, 108th Congress, First Session (2003).

Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005, H. R. 972, 109th Congress, First Session (2005).

Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008, H. R. 7311, 110th Congress, Second Session (2008).

Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2013, H. R. 898, 113th Congress, First Session (2013).

U.S. Department of Labor's Bureau of International Labor Affairs Office of Child Labor, Forced Labor, and Human Trafficking. U.S. Department of Labor's List of Goods Produced by Child Labor or Forced Labor. Washington, DC: Author, 2012.

T

Targeted Case Management

Provision of effective human services are often compromised owing to a standardized, cookie-cutter approach to service delivery. While services that target general populations need to be standardized in order to maintain quality, consistency, and cost-effectiveness, it is important that specific individuals or population groups (owing to the uniqueness of their situations) are provided with focused services that meet their needs. Examples of such groups include people with disabilities, people living with human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) and acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS), children with learning difficulties, and so on. Though all of them require human empathy and support as does anyone else, the specificities of their conditions require a different (and sometimes more intensive) service approach to be effective.

Targeted case management (TCM) is an approach and support system that ensures that an integrated range of support and service coupled with social support systems are available to the beneficiary or group. The integrated and comprehensive nature of the TCM is well defined by the case management work group set up by the commissioner of the Department of Behavioral Health and Development Services (DBHDS), Virginia, United States. According to the work group, "Targeted case management, as it has developed and is provided in the public behavioral health and developmental services system, includes the elements of basic case management and a full range of care and support that individuals with more severe disabilities require in order to live successfully in the community. These services include but are not limited to: supportive counseling; crisis intervention; direct assistance with limited activities of daily living; coaching; intake and discharge planning; relationship building; teaching decision making; self-advocacy and wellness planning; education regarding the need for medications, primary care, and therapy; promoting continuity of care among various health systems and providers; providing family education and support; and generally overcoming barriers for accessing appropriate care."

The entry provides an overview of the various support services used in TCM. The entry also covers the duties and responsibilities of the persons providing TCM (case workers and case managers). An effective TCM will include the following approaches.

Outcome Oriented

This is making sure the various service providers involved, the family, and other social networks all work toward a common goal for the client and his or her family. Outcome orientation also means the milestones toward the common goal are clearly identified, and should any deviation take place (such as when the desired progress is not achieved), the treatment or support plan is reviewed, and a new set of targets or goals are set.

TCM also focusses on the final outcome of positive change for the beneficiary, ensuring that there is improvement manifested through, for example, quality of life, medical condition, physical and mental ability, social acceptance, and so on.

In a TCM approach, continuity of care will make sure the client receives uninterrupted services and that support and suitable social, financial, medical, and any other needs are continuously available.

Coordinated support will include networking with a wide range of support providers such as hospitals, family members, counselors, insurance providers, state institutions including legal assistance (if necessary), and case workers to make sure the beneficiary receives assistance from all relevant stakeholders.

Treatment and Support Plan Based on Strengths and Opportunities

This is a fundamental cornerstone for a quality TCM approach. This makes sure that all service providers and family members involved in the process build on something positive and work toward an incremental improvement in the client's condition. Professional counselors commonly use this approach through positive reinforcement, creating a sense of optimism for individuals.

Provision of Intensive Support

This is one of the key necessities for persons requiring TCM, and the institution or case manager focusing on this approach needs to have the means and systems in order to ensure it. The value base and humane principles in TCM are critical to bringing about successful outcomes for the clients. The Johnson country TCM policies and procedures manual outline their operating principles and value statements for TCM as follows:

1. The TCM process focuses on the individual using the service's strengths, interests, abilities, and competencies.
2. The TCM process takes place in the community. The client is viewed as the director of the TCM process.
3. The relationship between the client and case manager is primary and essential.
4. TCM is based upon effective communication in providing information to the individual, his or her family, and those providing services.
5. TCM provides for the individual's maximum participation in the decision-making process.
6. TCM involves the individual, families, guardians, and other professionals or agencies in identifying, developing, implementing, and monitoring comprehensive plans.
7. The community is viewed as a resource, not as an obstacle.
8. TCM facilitates access to available public and private resources.
9. TCM advocates for resources to meet the current and future needs of individuals.
10. TCM strives to attain a greater level of integration of the individual into the community.
11. TCM is confidential and professional.

On a practical level, the following factors are linked to the achievement of successful outcomes as outlined by Shilpa Ross and colleagues.

1. Assigned accountability of an individual or team to the patients being case-managed
2. Clarity about the role of the case managers and support to ensure they have the right clinical and managerial competencies
3. Accurate case finding to ensure interventions target patients with defined care needs
4. Appropriate caseloads to ensure that patients are receiving optimum care
5. A single point of access for assessment and a joint care plan
6. Continuity of care to reduce the risk of an unplanned admission to hospital
7. Self-care to empower patients to manage their own conditions
8. Joined-up health and social care services with professionals working to aligned financial incentives and in multidisciplinary teams
9. Information systems that support communication and data that is used proactively to drive quality improvements.

Research and practitioner's literature on TCM provides a wide variety of approaches and phases to set up a TCM system for an individual. The most commonly used process involve the following steps.

Identification of Clients

Two approaches could be used in TCM—first in which the caregivers or institutions respond to someone (or family or social system such as a school) who reports to them and seeks assistance specifically. The second approach could be when the institution proactively engages with community (through social workers) and institutions (hospitals or schools) to identify individuals who already need specialized care or who are in high risk or susceptible to such conditions and brings them in the fold of TCM (with consent of the family or individual). The second approach is particularly useful when the condition could be associated with certain stigma leading to nonreporting voluntarily.

Review and Assessment

The first and most important aspect in a TCM process is the need for a comprehensive assessment of the client, which will determine the information base for various providers and decide the treatment course necessary. This stage includes looking at both the immediate symptoms and concerns that are visibly manifested in the person, while the review is being done. Careful assessment needs to be done to separate these symptoms into clinical, social, cognitive, behavioral, and other categories. Going beyond the immediate, there is also a vital need for looking beyond into a range of other issues. These could include, for example, the person's social background, social network and support system, occupation and any risks therein, skills and training, financial status, disease history including diagnosis and treatment, behavior, cognitive skills and habits, and so on. In line with the approaches mentioned (focus on strength), there is also a need for identifying any positive strengths, which can serve as a foundation on which the treatment system can build on.

Depending on the individual, and the severity of symptoms and the nature of the treatment necessary, the assessment process if necessary can be phased over a period of time as well as involving multiple actors or specialists to generate a well-informed case history. Assessment, if interrupted for a long period for some reason, needs to be initiated once again. Given the detailed, in some instances intrusive, and subjective nature of the factors that need to be assessed, it is vitally important that the case worker and the client have a level of trust that can generate quality discussions and observations. Skills of the social worker to elicit information as well as to analyze it (including linking to get a wider picture) are also key. Having a dedicated case manager who deals with a particular case file is critically important to enable him or her to know of the client's history as well as establish a level of trust.

Individualized Support Plan Development

The assessment information will become the basis for generating a case file as well as development of a comprehensive support and treatment plan for the client. Development of the plan must involve the client and his or her family as much as possible as well as various other stakeholders. This will ensure collective ownership of the plan and avoid any confusion at a later stage. Participation of the client and his or her family also ensures individual accountability and need for discipline. The element of self-care within the treatment plan is important as the client (and his or her family) is foremost responsible for his or her own conditions and plays a crucial role in achieving the desired outcome.

The plan will outline the outcome, periodic milestones in achievement of the outcomes, and specific treatment plans and support needs. All these need to be outlined in clear terms and in a standardized model. In other words, the plan must answer the five Ws: what will be done (specific action necessary to support the client and in the areas of clinical, institutional, and social aspects); who will do it (responsibilities of different actors); when it will be done (time frame and at which stage); where it will be done (physical location, home, clinic, or elsewhere); and how it will be done (specifics of the treatment protocol as well as any financial aspects).

Changes to the plan could be affected during the course of treatment and include similar inclusive processes wherein all the stakeholders join together.

Referral, Networking, and Coordination

Coordinated action between the various service providers is necessary to ensure concerted action in addressing the multiple support needs the client may have. Some of the activities include setting up joint review meetings between providers to agree on a common plan of action, scheduling treatment and meetings with the client, sharing relevant progress information with each other, adding or taking away other specialized providers during the treatment process if necessary, and so on. This is vital to making sure that the services are continued uninterrupted as planned and that any deviations are noted and acted up on or corrective action is taken.

Monitoring and Review

Monitoring is an ongoing process throughout the treatment pathway and provides critical information to all concerned on the progress (or lack thereof, triggering alternates). This requires close interaction between the case manager and the client and a strong element of trust and, therefore, is absolutely vital between the two to enable this. Intensive engagement also means that the case worker can only handle a few cases at a time to do a quality job. The progress and monitoring report needs to provide standardized information in line with the original support plan and progress toward the final outcome.

Ending the TCM for the Client

M. Roland has outlined four different situations where a TCM program could be terminated for the client. They are: the death of the client, self-discharge, decision by the case manager or the multidisciplinary team that care has been optimized (i.e., that the person is well enough to live independently or that he or she requires more or less intensive and ongoing support, such as a nursing home, or specialist care, such as end-of-life care), or the patient's risk of hospital admission, identified by a risk prediction tool, falls below a certain level as determined by the case management program.

As mentioned, success of an effective TCM system depends on the quality of the case management, and case managers play a pivotal role in this. Some of the key roles of the case managers are as follows: coordination between different stakeholders and the client, managing the referral system among providers, information gathering and sharing, decision making based on information and advice from the service providers, identifying support needs and ensuring these are available, and advocating for the quality support needed with the providers and government institutions.

In order to perform these roles efficiently, the case managers need to have specialized competencies and skills. The following section outlines some of these while recognizing the fact that individual client needs may require other specialized skills.

Personality, Behavior, and Attitude-Related Competencies

- Empathy with the client and the condition she or he is suffering from as well as willingness to engage with the case and advocating for quality care and support for the person
- Patience to deal with individual's needs and demands as well that of the service providers
- Organization skills and self-discipline
- Analysis and observation skills
- Sensitivity to the individual's cultural, social, and religious affiliations and the ability to avoid being biased or judgmental
- Language skills
- Ability to maintain confidentiality with information
- Objectivity and not allowing personal relations to cloud observations

Specific Technical Skills Regarding the Case

- Understanding of the condition of the client, including social, medical, behavioral, and other aspects—this will help the person understand the symptoms and conditions well
- Awareness regarding personal and the client's safety and security needs
- Technical understanding regarding the TCM approaches and models, various good practices in addition to relevant educational and experiential knowledge as well as professional certification
- Awareness regarding the service providers, their ways of working, and technical and procedural aspects of their work
- Coordination skills with a wide range of stakeholders and interpersonal skills
- Conflict management skills
- Organizational skills—the ability to independently manage an often large caseload and prioritize both direct service and accountability for recipient records and other related tasks and activities.

- Knowledge and awareness on use of various standards and technologies including case record documentation and management
- Research and analysis skills to stay relevant on the issues

Prafulla K. Mishra
HelpAge International

See Also: Case Management; Case Management Services.

Further Readings

Commissioner of the Department of Behavioral Health and Development Services (DBHDS). "Creating Opportunities—Case Management Workgroup Report." http://www.dbhds.virginia.gov/CreatingOpportunities/CMReport.pdf (Accessed October 2013).

Roland, M., et al. "Follow Up of People Aged 65 and Over With a History of Emergency Admissions: Analysis of Routine Admission Data." British Medical Journal, v.330/7486 (2005).

Ross, Shilpa, et al. "Case Management—What It Is and How It Can Best Be Implemented." The Kings Fund. http://www.kingsfund.org.uk/sites/files/kf/Case-Management-paper-The-Kings-Fund-Paper-November-2011.pdf (Accessed October 2013).

Telecommunications Devices for the Deaf

Telecommunication services are vital for functioning in the modern world, a truth which has been recognized since the middle of the 20th century, when the Rural Electrification Agency in the Department of Agriculture began providing loans and resources to ensure the installation of telephone lines throughout the country. Over the course of the 20th century, the telephone evolved from a luxury to a necessity, with many of everyday life's challenges becoming difficult to address without such access. For deaf people and the hard of hearing, ensuring these services was a more complicated matter, especially in the decades before the Internet.

A telecommunication device for the deaf (TDD) is a type of teletypewriter (TTY) that has become the standard generic term because such devices are not exclusively used by the deaf community. The basic form of the TTY is a printer and typewriter that transmits text over telephone lines. Modern TTYs usually have both a screen and a printer; older models had only the printer as an output device. While the basic function of a TTY is to transmit text back and forth to another TTY, additional services are sometimes available, such as relaying the text to a relay operator: a hearing person who acts as the intermediary between a TTY user and a hearing voice phone user, reading the TTY's output aloud to the hearing user, and typing the hearing user's responses to the TTY. Similarly, hearing carryover and voice carryover services assist users who can hear but not speak or can speak but not hear.

Abuse of Telecommunication Services

Today, telecommunication relay services have considerably expanded and do not always require the use of a TTY but accept input from computers over the Internet, cell phones, tablets, and other devices. In the United States, such services are provided by phone companies and subsidized by the federal government, which reimburses phone companies for certain expenses incurred by operating relay services. In 2012, the federal government sued AT&T for not properly making sure that users of the system were located in the United States, thus receiving reimbursement for calls that the government did not owe payment for. The original national telecommunications relay service is available by dialing 711 on any phone in the United States.

There are numerous variations of such services, all of which involve providing an intermediary who can make a voice call on behalf of the deaf or speech- or hearing-impaired user. Some stories in the news, notably an NBC news story in 2006, have claimed that these services are widely abused for the placement of prank calls because relay operators are required to relay the communications that they handle without question. While pranks—and more dangerously, fraudulent scams—are a serious problem in the industry, it is not clear how common they are relative to the volume of legitimate

A Miniprint 425 tellecommunication device for the deaf. The acoustic coupler on the top is for use with telephone handsets, and a printer records the conversation. The specific GA and SK keys allow for speedier use of common abbreviations. It has become a wideheld belief that access for the deaf to telecommunications and information is as vital as any other civil right.

calls. There are also cases in which such services are used for legitimate purposes by those who have no hearing or speech disability, but who have some other motivation for wanting to use an intermediary or avoiding speech communication, such as an anxiety disorder.

History of Teletypewriters

Teletypewriters or teleprinters were not originally designed for use by the deaf but were rather an augmentation of 19th-century telegraph technology. Only when telephony became common did TTY devices become mainly associated with the deaf and hearing-impaired community. Rather than use devoted lines as telegraphs had done, TTY devices for the deaf used modems to transmit their data over normal phone lines. Many of the first modern TTY devices were distributed to the St. Louis deaf community in the 1960s by deaf engineer Paul Taylor. Taylor's device repurposed teletypewriters from Western Union, and he soon instituted the first telephone relay system for the deaf, followed by statewide relay services in New York, a project that was funded by the telephone service providers. After the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 required statewide telephone relay systems throughout the country, Taylor assisted with writing the FCC's regulations for them.

More TTY devices followed after Taylor's innovation, notably deaf news anchor Kit Patrick Corson's Manual Communications Module (1973), the first battery-powered TTY, which simplified installation and allowed the device to be brought on the road by deaf travelers. The MCM was marketed by Pac Bell, which coined the term Telecommunications Device for the Deaf (TDD), and rented the device to subscribers for $30 a month (versus its $600 retail cost). Today, the TDD term is primarily used outside the deaf community.

TTY devices present a form of communication similar to early Internet chat programs like TALK. For instance, because traditional TTY devices do not have separate output displays (whether printer or monitor) for Party 1 and Party 2, if both parties type at the same time, the result will be garbled—much as happens when two speaking people talk over each other, but it is confusing for people who expect the interface to work like a 21st-century Internet chat program with dedicated output display zones that permit synchronous input from both parties. This presents a problem similar to that encountered in using walkie-talkies or CB radios, in which each party must alternate between speaking and listening modes, and so a similar convention has arisen: North American TTY users commonly use “GA,” meaning “go ahead,” to indicate that they have finished typing and the other person may respond, while “SK,” or “stop keying,” means that the party has nothing more to say and is only awaiting a goodbye.

Modern Devices

Modern TTY devices use a number of different protocols for transmitting data over phone lines, the oldest of which is the Baudot code, an old character set predating ASCII and inherited from the repurposed teletypewriter technology. The best-known child protocol based on Baudot is Turbo Code, a proprietary implementation of Baudot used and licensed by the UltraTec company. Baudot remains standard in the United States, but other protocols have been implemented in Europe, where the history of telephony took different turns.

Today, traditional TTYs are an increasingly antiquated technology as Internet-based communication, whether through standard Internet technologies like email and instant messaging, or Internet-enabled gateways for text-over-IP, become the preferred mode. However, even in the 21st century, analog phone line access is more widespread than IP connections and is cheaper in most cases. Modern TTYs can often be used over modems, while Internet-based services in most cases facilitate communication only with other Internet users. The rise of mobile cell phones and smart phones, and the growing interest of charitable organizations in providing such phones to people in need, may prove to change this, as Internet access becomes decoupled from computer ownership and Internet service accounts.

A newer variation on the TTY is the captioned telephone or captioned relay, which displays captions of spoken conversation on a screen in the base of a telephone attached to a ground line, or on a computer using the WebCapTel service launched in 2008. Because captioned telephone service is not mandated by the FCC’s Americans With Disabilities Act regulations, it is not universally available in the United States, though coverage is wide.

Bill Kte’pi
Independent Scholar

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990; Deaf/Hard of Hearing; Disability Services; Disability Studies; Disabled Clients.

Further Readings

Andrews, Jean, Irene W. Leigh, and Mary T. Weiner. Deaf People: Evolving Perspectives From Psychology, Education, and Sociology. New York: Pearson, 2003.

Nomeland, Melvia M. and Ronald E. Nomeland. The Deaf Community in America: History in the Making. New York: McFarland, 2011.

Schein, Jerome D. At Home Among Strangers: Exploring the Deaf Community in the United States. Washington, DC: Gallaudet University Press, 2003.

Strauss, Karen Peltz. A New Civil Right: Telecommunications Equality for Deaf and Hard of Hearing Americans. Washington, DC: Gallaudet University Press, 2006.

Temporary Assistance to Needy Families

Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF) was created with passage of the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996 (PRWORA, P.L. 104-193). TANF replaced the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program, an original component of the Social Security Act of 1935, which had made available federal cash assistance to low-income mothers and their dependent children based on state-determined eligibility of financial need independent of their attachment to the labor force.

Unlike AFDC or Title I, TANF provisions in PRWORA capped federal welfare spending to the states, limited federal cash assistance for welfare recipients to five years maximum while permitting states to end it sooner (which 17 did), set labor force participation targets for recipients of cash and other public benefits, such as vouchers for food, and restricted welfare and other public benefits for illegal immigrants. Scheduled for reauthorization in 2010, Congress has since extended TANF several times, most recently through the end of September 2013.

A Texas family applies for assistance after a fire destroyed their apartment. Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF) replaced the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program, which was part of the Social Security Act of 1935.

TANF Provisions in PRWORA

Under Title I of PRWORA, AFDC, Emergency Assistance (EA), and Job Opportunities and Basic Skills (JOBS) were combined into a single, capped entitlement to states. The total cash assistance block grant was estimated at $16.4 billion for each year from fiscal year (FY) 1996 to FY 2003, with states receiving a fixed amount based on a formula that took into account prior AFDC, EA, and JOBS expenditures. States were permitted to carry over unused grant funds to subsequent fiscal years, and they were mandated to maintain 80 percent of FY 1994 state funding on AFDC and related programs. This maintenance of effort (MOE) spending requirement replaced the state match that AFDC had required. TANF programs had to be operational by July 1, 1996. PRWORA deemed ineligible for federally funded cash assistance families who had received such assistance for 5 cumulative years or less at state option.

States had to demonstrate that they would require families to work after two years on assistance and set work participation rates for single-parent families at 25 percent in FY 1997, increasing to 50 percent by FY 2000 and for two-parent families from 75 percent to 90 percent by FY 1999. Work hours were also specified for single-parent and two-parent families, 20 and 35 hours per week respectively, with some exemptions for single parents with children under 6 years old who could not find child care. Work activities included unsubsidized or subsidized employment, on-the-job training (OJT), work experience, community service, up to 12 months of vocational training, or providing child care services to individuals who were participating in community service.

Up to six weeks of job search were also permitted, although states with unemployment rates 50 percent above the national average could count up to 12 weeks. No more than 20 percent of the caseload was permitted to count vocational training toward meeting the work requirement. Those convicted of drug-related crimes after the date of enactment were prohibited for life from receiving benefits under the TANF and food stamp programs. States were penalized with a percentage reduction of their block grants for, among other things, failure to meet work participation rates. Unmarried minor parents were required to live with an adult or in an adult-supervised setting and participate in educational and training activities. Based on total TANF and MOE funds totaling $33.3 billion in 2011, approximately 29 percent of expenditures go to cash assistance, 38 percent to other services, 17 percent to child care, 9 percent to other work support and employment programs, and the remainder to administration.

The Impact of TANF on Welfare Caseloads

Reductions in welfare caseloads were immediate and steep. At the end of FY 2001, the average monthly number of TANF recipients was 5.5 million, or 56 percent lower than the AFDC caseload in 1996. By 2006, the average monthly number of TANF recipients had dropped to 4.2 million. From its peak of 14.4 million in March 1994, the number dropped by 63.2 percent to 5.3 million in September 2001. As a percentage of the U.S. population, the caseload had reached its lowest point, about 2 percent, since the 1960s. Caseloads dropped by more than 70 percent between FY 1996 and FY 2001 in eight states (Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Louisiana, Mississippi, Wisconsin, and Wyoming) and between 40 and 70 percent in 35 states. A robust economy with relatively low unemployment rates, ranging from 5.6 percent in 1996 to 4.0 percent in 2000 before increasing to 4.7 percent in 2001, and expansion of the Earned Income Tax Credit (EITC) program contributed to the decline in TANF caseloads, with 7.2 million persons having left the welfare rolls between FY 1996 and FY 2001.

Caseload reduction was initially accompanied by a decline in child poverty and an increase in single-mother employment. The child poverty rate dropped from 22.2 percent in 1995 to 15.6 percent in 2000, with the related number of children decreasing from 14 million to 11 million, respectively. The percentage of single-mother employment increased from 64.0 percent in 1995 to 75.5 percent in 2000. Caseloads continued to decline until reported notable increases in 2008, with unemployment rates ranging from a low of 4.6 percent in 2006 and 2007 to highs of 6.0 percent in 2003 and 5.8 percent in 2003 and 2008.

Early gains, however, masked the decline in the number of families receiving AFDC/TANF benefits for every 100 families with children in poverty from 68 in 1996 to 27 in 2011. Further, the role of TANF in providing income support to poor families declined dramatically during the Great Recession of 2008 and 2009 through 2011 as the uptick in caseloads from about 1.8 million to 2 million was less than increases in families with children in poverty, which jumped from about 6 million to 7 million, and in families with children in deep poverty (income below half the poverty line), from about 2.8 million to 3.2 million. Finally, the value of TANF benefits has declined in most states since 1996: Benefits did not keep pace with inflation, such that in 2011, they were below the poverty line in half the states; in addition, seven states had value declines of 10 to 20 percent, 28 states of 20 to 30 percent, and six states above 30 percent.

Richard K. Caputo
Yeshiva University

See Also: Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Historical Role of; Child Support Agencies and Services; Food Support; Medicaid; Poverty; Social and Economic Justice; War on Poverty Programs; Welfare Reform, Role of.

Further Readings

Blank, Rebecca M., and David T. Ellwood. The Clinton Legacy for America's Poor (NBER Working Paper No. 8437). Cambridge, MA: National Bureau of Economic Research, 2001.

Caputo, Richard K. U.S. Social Welfare Reform: Policy Transitions From 1980 to the Present. New York: Springer, 2011.

Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. "Chart Book: TANF at 16." http://www.cbpp.org/files/8-22-12tanf.pdf (Accessed March 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services Administration for Children and Families. "Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) Program: Eighth Annual Report to Congress." http://archive.acf.hhs.gov/programs/ofa/data-reports/annualreport8/TANF_8th_Report_111908.pdf (Accessed March 2013).

Weaver, R. Kent. Ending Welfare as We Know It. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press, 2000.

Tobacco Use, International Variations in Attitudes Toward

Smoking kills—this is a fact. But, even if people know about that, there are variations in international attitudes toward tobacco use, which are a consequence of human diversity and the several differences of societies around the globe. There are nearly 1 billion males and 250 million females who smoke daily. Almost every day, more than 80,000 people begin to use tobacco, and many of them are children who, if they become addicted, will be in need of a special human service. The diversities of the attitudes toward smoking are mainly influenced by the situations of the people in each country. There are countries—mainly industrialized nations in North America and Europe—where smoking is seen as an evil, but there are also mainly poor countries, where people do smoke a lot because the health threat of tobacco use is not seen as a high priority.

Decision for Tobacco Use

In general, the tobacco industry aims to market their products to children, replacing the customers, who are dying day by day. For this, cool packages that symbolize a modern and nonconformist living style are used to attract the buyers of the next generation. Because of this strategy, many young boys and girls start smoking between the ages of 11 and 14. In many European countries, like Sweden, many children smoke cigarettes regularly. Despite the national background, there are factors that are responsible for the decision to smoke. Factors relating to one's social environment include the attitudes of family members or friends. When parents or friends are active smokers, there is a high chance that the children will start smoking as well because children adopt habits that they see every day at home. There are other reasons as well. Rebelliousness, the testing of a risk, or the lack of self-esteem could be responsible for the first cigarette of a young smoker trying to be seen as cool or strong by their peers.

International Attitudes

There might be similar reasons for young smokers around the globe to start smoking, but one decisive factor is the country where the person is living. Whereas it is forbidden in many Western countries to sell tobacco to young persons, there are countries where any laws against the smoking habits of children are not enforced. Especially in poor countries, youth are less protected by law. Even if there were restrictions in the usage of tobacco in poorer countries, the police would not be interested in enforcing tobacco restrictions while dealing with high crime rates. The higher the level of safety in a society, the greater the need for medical care and preventive measures to protect the masses from bad health.

The so-called sin taxes are one possible measure against the smoking habits of U.S. smokers, forcing smokers to pay higher fees for their health insurance. This is a consequence of the fact that these patients would possibly need special treatment for their smoking-related illnesses. In many countries in western Europe, smoking has been banned from public life step by step. While smoking was an elemental part of daily life during the postwar period from the late 1940s onward, it was gradually restricted to protect the health of the whole society, especially as it became known that tobacco use is damaging to passive smokers as well.

The European Union is actually planning to ban special products that are particularly harmful, including menthol cigarettes, while many countries have already started campaigns that show the consequences of heavy smoking by depicting the diseases on the boxes. In the future, and as an addition to the ban of tobacco commercials from the public media, there are few smoking scenes in modern movies, which is a visible contrast to classic movies, where stars like Humphrey Bogart smoked cigarettes on-screen. Smoking should not be individualized, giving all brands the same box design to make neuro-marketing ineffective.

In contrast to this, poorer countries do not possess the financial abilities to provide a broader education on health issues. As smoking is one of the few pleasures available after onerous work in inhuman conditions, people are not willing or are unable to quit tobacco use. That's why, in Africa especially, the number of people who smoke is increasing.

Ratio Between Wealth and Health

It could be concluded that there is a traceable ratio between the wealth and the health of a nation. This ratio signifies how a rich nation is more willing and able to protect its people from health-destroying habits. To achieve this aim, there could be pressure on the tobacco lobby and on smokers in every single case. The industrialized nations of Europe and North America are trying to ban smoking in society by introducing education about the consequences of this harmful habit. In contrast, the number of young smokers is increasing in poorer countries, where smoking is not the most imperiling factor in daily life and a very important part of the national tax income. Just an improvement of the general situation in these countries would make discussion about the attitude toward tobacco use possible. A stronger economy could provide the basis for a checkup of the tobacco lobby in poorer countries, where smoking cigarettes remains the last affordable pleasure and a prevalent part of society.

Frank Jacob
City University of New York

See Also: Health Care, Disparities in; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Health Insurance; Health Promotion Services; Medical Necessity; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

De Breyer, Joy and Linda Waverley Bridgen. Tobacco Control Policy. Strategies, Successes and Setbacks. Washington, DC.: Research for International Tobacco Control, 2003.

Hedman, Eva. "Adolescents' Attitudes Towards Tobacco Use and Oral Health: Four 'Portraits.'" International Journal of Qualitative Studies on Health and Well-Being, v.3 (2008).

Lando, Harry A., et al. "Tobacco Is a Global Paediatric Concern." Bulletin of the World Health Organization, v.88 (2010).

Torture, Survivors of

Despite international recognition of torture as a human rights violation, torture remains a widespread blight with horrendous consequences for individuals, families, and communities. This entry will define torture, identify methods of torture, describe its physical and psychological effects, describe the network of service providers for survivors, provide a brief overview for identifying and working with survivors, and address the importance of self-care for clients and workers.

For the purposes of this entry, torture is defined as government-instigated or government-sanctioned infliction of severe physical or mental pain or suffering for the purpose of obtaining information, punishment, or intimidation or for any reason based on discrimination. Physical forms of torture include beatings, food and sleep deprivation, simulated drowning, sexual assault, burning, suspension by the arms or legs, electrical shock, forced ingestion of psychoactive drugs, and exposure to extreme heat or cold. Mental forms of torture include threats to the victim or his or her family or associates, forced witnessing of the physical torture or killing of others, mock executions, exposure to vicious animals, isolation, and humiliation. The specific form of torture is probably less important than its effects.

Effects of Torture

Victims of physical torture may suffer temporary or permanent physical disabilities. Regardless of whether the torture was physical or mental, victims are almost certain to suffer symptoms of psychological trauma. These psychological effects may last for decades. Symptoms of trauma include nightmares, recurrent and obtrusive memories of the torture, hypervigilance, an exaggerated startle response, a low tolerance for stress, and a general mistrust of people and institutions. These symptoms in turn may lead to secondary psychosocial difficulties such as depression, substance abuse, agoraphobia, family conflict, employment difficulties, and so on.

Services for Torture Survivors

Unless the governmental regime of a country that practices torture changes, victims will not be able to get help in that country. Thus, most services to survivors of torture are provided in other countries that have granted the victims political asylum, that is, refugee status. It is estimated that 5 to 35 percent of refugees in the United States are torture survivors. Survivors are served by a network of more than 200 centers and programs around the world, including more than 30 in the United States, that provide intensive support to torture victims through comprehensive medical, psychological, psychiatric, legal, and social services.

Identifying Torture Survivors

Most human service providers do not work in centers for torture survivors, but they may well encounter survivors in diverse practice settings. Thus, practitioners should be prepared to recognize torture survivors so that they may refer them to appropriate services. Most survivors of torture will not readily self-identify as such. Typically, survivors are reluctant to discuss their painful memories. Thus, human service providers must be alert to the symptoms of trauma already described. Once service providers have established a relationship with a client (which may take some time), providers can gently ask questions about the client's past in his or her country of origin, such as whether he or she experienced persecution, detention, arrest, violence, threats, and so on, and whether such experiences were perpetrated by government officials such as police or military. It would be wise for providers to first find background information on the political situation in a client's country of origin in order to approach the client in an informed manner. A good way to open up such discussion is by stating, "I read that in your country . . . Did something like that ever happen to you?"

Working With Torture Survivors

The critical foundation for services to torture survivors is case management that is comprehensive, coordinated, compassionate, and culturally competent. Survivors are dealing not only with the trauma of the torture experience but also the loss of their homeland and adjustment to life in a foreign culture. Thus, most need services in multiple arenas, including health, legal status, education, employment, life skills training, cultural orientation, language training, housing, mental health, and spirituality. The case manager must be skilled in developing and nurturing an interagency network to serve these multiple needs in order to help the client navigate that network and to advocate for the client and help the client learn to advocate for him- or herself.

Trust is central to any helping relationship. Human service providers working with torture survivors must recognize that building trust is likely to be a slow process. Workers must exhibit patience, transparency, reliability, and judicious self-disclosure. They must also be familiar with and respect the client's cultural norms (as long as those norms are not harmful to anyone). Workers must also identify a client's strengths, help the client recognize them, and thus foster the client's empowerment. Finally, workers must use evidence-based practices. For example, decades of research with persons with posttraumatic stress disorder due to war and torture experiences have yielded effective treatment approaches, most of which involve some form of imagined exposure.

Torture survivors should be taught skills to soothe themselves, including health behaviors such as nutrition and exercise, relaxation behaviors such as meditation and deep breathing, and engagement in social and community activities. For many survivors, the idea of self-care will be a foreign concept as, by definition, these are individuals who have essentially sacrificed themselves for a cause. Thus, workers would do well to model these behaviors. Finally, workers need to engage in the same behaviors for their own sake because those working with torture survivors are vulnerable to vicarious traumatization.

Conclusion

Work with torture survivors exposes us to the worst aspects of humanity, yet it can be highly rewarding in helping survivors build and thrive in their new lives.

Miriam Potocky
Florida International University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Office of Refugee Resettlement; Refugee Assistance; Trauma-Focused Services; War and Terrorism, Survivors of.

Further Readings

National Partnership for Community Training, Gulf Coast Jewish Family and Community Services. http://gulfcoastjewishfamilyandcommunityservices.org/refugee/refugee-programs/national-partnership-for-community-training/ (Accessed January 2014).

Potocky, Miriam. Best Practices for Social Work With Refugees and Immigrants. New York: Columbia University Press, 2002.

"Special Issue: Best, Promising, and Emerging Practices." Torture Journal, v.21/1 (2011).

Traditional Medicine

Traditional medicine is a term generally used interchangeably with indigenous or folk medicine. It is commonly thought of as health practices that were developed and have been passed on by generations prior to the modern medicine era. Examples of such practices include ayurveda, traditional Indian Medicine, acupuncture, traditional Chinese medicine, traditional African medicine, traditional medicines developed by Incas and Mayas of Central America, and U.S. Native American traditional medicine, and so on.

The World Health Organization (WHO) characterizes traditional medicine as the sum total of the knowledge, skills, and practices based on the theories, beliefs, and experiences indigenous to different cultures, whether explicable or not, used in the maintenance of health as well as in the prevention, diagnosis, improvement, or treatment of physical and mental illness. Global health and wellness is greatly facilitated by traditional healing. According to WHO, more than 80 percent of the world's population relies on traditional healing for primary health care, and greater than 25 percent of modern medical drugs stem from traditional healing knowledge.

Though traditional medicine is the main recourse for the majority of the population in developing countries, surveys show that more and more people in developed nations, such as the United States, are leaning toward traditional medicine. The main belief in traditional medicine centers on self-healing: restoring the harmonious workings of the body, mind, sprit, and the environment.

History of Traditional Medicine

The earliest known records of the medicinal use of herbs date back to approximately 5000 B.C.E. in the Sumerian society. Many different cultures have reported the medicinal use of herbs in the 1st millennium B.C.E. For example, traditional Chinese and Indian medicines date back to this time frame. The first known physicians were also noted about 5000 years ago in Egyptian society. Further records also indicate designated physicians in ancient Babylonian, Greek, Roman, Indian, and Chinese cultures.

Traditionally, indigenous medicine has been orally passed on. In many cultures, this knowledge may culminate in a figure designated as a healer. These healers, in many situations, are revered and respected as spiritual leaders, such as priests, shamans, or medicine men. This reflects the fact that much of traditional medicine is intertwined within culture, representing a way of life. The practices may be based on the philosophy of cultural traditions, such as the central principle of balance in many practices, which includes Chinese and ayurvedic medicine.

Hippocrates is considered the father of modern Western medicine. He is renowned as the founder of the Hippocratic School of Medicine, which revolutionized medicine in ancient Greece and laid the foundation for modern medicine. Tradition in Medicine is a treatise in the Hippocratic Corpus, a collection of ancient Greek medical texts attributed to Hippocrates and written around late 5th century B.C.E. It established medicine as a distinct branch of science and as a profession. The Hippocratic Oath, still taken by most medical students upon graduation today, signifies ethical practices by physicians.

Evidence of ancient civilization and its views on the nature of health and wellness is prevalent in contemporary society. Unlike modern medical intervention, traditional approaches to healing do not involve long-term side effects and incorporate elements of nature as well. Indigenous people around the world believe that plants, insects, birds, animals, and human beings possess an innate ability to heal themselves without external stimuli. Unfortunately in modern society, there is an ever-growing disconnection from the natural world.

Since time immemorial, people have enhanced their own health by immersing themselves in nature, engaging in physical and mental exercise and by eating well. Traditional healers of the world have, for millennia, sensitized millions to humankind's inevitable connection to nature and to nature's timeless nurturance of humankind. This form of thinking has been in place over the course of history as a solid foundation for the interaction between humans and nature. Respecting the environment was one way ancient civilizations thrived while maintaining good health.

History of Medication

Most early medications were initially based on naturally occurring substances. For example, penicillin, aspirin, morphine, digitalis, and quinine were all derived from natural sources. Many medications used today are still based on naturally occurring compounds. It has been suggested that approximately 50 percent of new chemical entities launched onto the market may be based on naturally occurring compounds.

In addition to standard medical therapy, about 38 percent of people use some form of complementary and alternative medicine regularly. In some Asian and African countries, 80 percent of the population depends on traditional medicine as a primary source of health care. Herbal treatments are the most popular form of traditional medicine.

Traditional Medicine

Traditional medicine helps facilitate patients during the critical phase of their struggles within the process of self-realization. Traditional systems of medicine were developed in different ancient civilizations and cultures. It seems the science of life has always been in existence, and there have always been people who understand it in their own way. Some of the traditional systems are based on rational and sound fundamental principles, while others are only empirically based. Some of these traditional systems did not survive and have become subjects of history of medicine. Some others, such as traditional systems of medicine of India and China, are not only surviving but also steadily progressing.

Several types of folk medicine are prevalent in different tribal areas of the world. They have a rich tradition in the use of plants, minerals, and nature.

In modern medicine, more attention is paid to correct the afflicted part of the body. But in traditional medicine, while treating a particular disease, the individual is taken into consideration as a whole. This includes taking into consideration the condition of his or her mind and environment, in addition to the physical self, while treating the patient. Along with traditional medicine, certain diets and regimens are often prescribed to the patient in line with the local customs of the people. The essence of food intake is central to many cultures. All religions enjoin fasting as a duty. The desire for food and timely hunger are related to lifestyles habits, while some tribes only eat one meal per day.

One of many types of the traditional medicine is naturopathy. This can be considered as a type of lifestyle, and within it, the patient lives in harmony with nature. Water, clay, sunlight, fruits, and raw vegetables are the ingredients to tackle ailments.

Healing Practices and Beliefs Across Cultures

Healing traditions are as age-old and diverse as humanity itself. Learning from long-standing cultures is significant to many areas in our lives. The diversity of these healing traditions is in part attributable to compartmentalized and largely isolated cultural evolutionary processes in the context of a need for health and wellness. In spite of this relative isolation, however, there is a remarkable degree of similarity in healing practices, beliefs, and founding principles when comparing rich and varied cultures throughout the global community.

The Maya communities of Central America lead a traditional lifestyle in the rainforest, and they maintain intact traditional medical systems as part of their culture today. The Mayan culture has successfully used nature to treat primary and complex ailments for more than 4,000 years. Within the past decade, Todd Pasek has been leading a group of scientists in working with gatherings of traditional Maya healers in Belize and Guatemala, who are working together to employ their traditional healing knowledge toward the conservation of their healing heritage and rainforest surroundings.

Other examples of populations living close to the land and struggling to protect the natural environment can be found among the people living along the Appalachian mountain chain in the United States, an area extending from western New York to northeastern Mississippi. The Appalachian people have resided in this region for hundreds of years, but Native Americans had inhabited parts of the region for centuries before European settlers arrived. Appalachian people hold firm beliefs about their ability to maintain their health and prevent or cure illness. They tend to take a holistic approach to health care, using combinations of traditional healing approaches to health and wellness as derived from their Native American cohabitants generations ago. They are inclined to use mainstream medical care only when necessitated by acute symptom management.

In ancient times, people always learned from and worshipped nature: our Earth and the cosmos. Spirituality and healing have always been a combined tradition. Even today in Hindu and Indic lifestyles, Buddhist and other Eastern philosophies, Native American and Appalachian cultures, and traditionally living indigenous peoples the world over, nature worship is uniformly present. Oral traditions of healing oftentimes have thousands of years of history and, over the years, have brought to the forefront some of the prominent healing techniques of today. These belief systems and practices are passed on from one generation to another. It is unfortunate in Western society that many in the scientific community discount the oral traditions and ask for proof. Only very recently, in the United States, writings of Deepak Chopra and Dali Lama brought to the attention of the mass media the importance of ancient healing traditions.

Across the world, traditional healing is still prevalent in India. Thousands of years ago, Indian scholars identified the art of healing. In many of their ancient writings, auyervedic (or traditional Indian) healers communicated thousands of ways for healing a person's body, mind, and spirit. For example, the Charaka Samhita is believed to have arisen around 400 to 200 B.C.E. It is thought to be one of the oldest and most important ancient authoritative writings on ayurveda (a healing practice that reveres nature in healing, originated thousands of years ago, and is concerned with the integrated healing of mind, body, and spirit). Unlike modern medicine, elements in nature are integrally incorporated into their approaches.

The Indian healing practices of ayurveda and astrological methods date back more than 10,000 years. The ayurvedic form of healing enriches the quality of life of a person through the different sensations of intuitive feeling, sound, touch, vision, taste, and smell. Much like the Appalachian mountain people, Native Americans, Mayans, and others who embrace stewardship worldviews, elements of nature are very much incorporated into the healing practices of the people of India.

Cross-culturally, there are several themes that are consistent within traditional healing systems. For example, we all possess innate healing capacities in which healing occurs from within in the context of healthy lifestyles and ecosystems. We can learn from nature by careful observation of (i.e., listening to) the plants themselves (e.g., morphologic and physical features, energetics, and habitat associations).

Cultures around the world have practiced the holistic form of health and wellness. There are so many strengths in the understanding of healing harmony with nature. Natural and herbal practices have been developed through careful observations and consistently refined with trial and error. These practices have been used successfully as evidenced by cultural vibrancy and stories of health and wellness passed down from one generation to another.

A group of yoga practitioners stretching. Traditional medicine uses nature as an example; for example, felines instinctively stretch in different poses as part of their daily routine.

For decades, modern medicine has been not only skeptical about but often closed off to hearing the stories of individuals who proclaim the healing powers of various forms of alternative medicine, such as shamanism and prayer, acupuncture, ayurveda, healing with whole foods, and herbalism. A range of health traditions from the natives of North America, the rainforests of Central America and South America, the Appalachian Mountains, the Far East, and other locations around the world continue to be used by those who embrace their preventive and curative benefits.

Spirituality of Nature

Through mindful study, nature also teaches us how to keep fit. For example, from housecats to lions on the Serengeti, felines always stretch in different poses as part of their daily routine. We now know that, by doing so, our mobility and flexibility can be improved—something essential to us all.

In ancient times, people always learned from and worshipped nature, our Earth: the sunlight, the water, the fire, and the wind. Spirituality and healing have always been a combined tradition. Even today in Hindu, Native American, and Appalachian cultures, nature worship is uniformly present. Oral traditions of healing oftentimes have thousands of years of history and, over time, have brought to the forefront some of the prominent healing techniques of today. Some Far Eastern traditions can appreciate noble lineages in different forms of healing reaching as far back as more than 10,000 years. While learned medical systems are generally practiced in towns and cities, oral traditions are still quite common in villages. These belief systems and practices are passed on from one generation to another.

Conclusion

Cultures around the world have practiced the healing arts for thousands of years, and they still practice these holistic forms of health and wellness. There are so many strengths in the understanding of healing approaches across cultures as well as lessons for how we as a society can survive in harmony with nature. Natural and herbal health practices have been used successfully as evidenced by cross-cultural congruency, with stories of health and wellness passed down from one generation to another. Younger generations must be encouraged to take a vested interest in learning the healing traditions and practices of those aging family members still alive and be able to share their wisdom. This intergenerational interaction can further inspire many younger and middle-aged individuals today who, in ever-increasing numbers, believe in the extensive benefits of complementary and alternative medicine.

The authors propose a holistic collaboration in developing mutually beneficial, cross-cultural educational opportunities, combining modern medical knowledge and practice with the methods and wisdom of traditional healers around the world. This will ensure economic viability of their ideals and propagation of traditional healing knowledge to both younger generations and an interested global audience, while it promotes cultural relativity and develops fresh revenue for the preservation of our world's natural places and the deep cultural traditions therein.

By developing the knowledge of traditional healers in a mutually beneficial exchange of wisdom and practice, all global communities can reap rewards through not only the development of holistic collaboration and innovation in healing but also the generation of economically viable outlets for cultural self-empowerment and ecological integrity.

This approach to global health and wellness will provide not only ways of healing ourselves as nature had intended but also a reawakening to the benefits and health-giving resources of nature's bounty. Along with this newfound awareness will emerge an inevitable respect for maintaining the environment that nurtures the world—people, animals, and plants. The growing realization of the intricate connections among mind, body, and spirit in the context of our natural world is long overdue within modern society. Our understanding of healing across cultures sets us on a path that can lead only to a better sense of self within the context of the universe—a more appropriate idea as we increasingly discover ourselves as a global community.

We can learn from the traditions and folk healing practices and apply them to modern-day methods for health and wellness, inclusive of modalities for sustainability and harmonious coexistence with our natural world. Through their wisdom, we could potentiate the growing global consciousness necessary for our existence in a sustainable and healthful fashion into the next millennium.

Murali D. Nair
University of Southern California
Nimit Sudan
City of Hope

See Also: Alternative Medical Systems; Medical Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for; Meditation/Yoga.

Further Readings

Ferngren, G. B. Medicine and Health Care in Early Christianity. Baltimore, MD: John Hopkins University Press, 2009.

Friedenwald, H. "The Bibliography of Ancient Hebrew Medicine." http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov (Accessed January 2014).

National Center for Complementary and Alternative Medicine (NCCAM). "What Is Complementary and Alternative Medicine." http:www.nccam.nih.gov/health/whatiscam/#sup1 (Accessed July 2005).

Neuwinger, D. African Traditional Medicine. Stuttgart, Germany: Medpharm Scientific Publishers, 2010.

Pesek, T., L. Helton and M. Nair. "Healing Across Cultures: Learning From Traditions." EcoHealth, v.3/2 (2006).

Pesek, T., L. Helton, R. Reminick, and M. Nair. Healing Traditions of India. Kerala, India: Olive Publications, 2007.

Pesek, T., R. Reminick, and M. Nair. Healing Across Cultures and Good Life. Mason, OH: Cengage Learning, 2010.

Treyvaud-Amiguet, V., J. Arnason, P. Maquin, V. Cal, P. Sanchez-Vindaz, and L. Poveda. "A Consensus Ethnobotany of the Q'eqchi' Maya of Southern Belize." Economic Botany, v.59/1 (2005).

Valiathan, M. The Legacy of Caraka. Chennai, India: Longman, 2003.

World Health Organization (WHO). Traditional Medicine Strategy 2002–2005. Geneva, Switzerland: Author, 2002.

Transgender Individuals

Transgendered individuals identify with the gender roles of the opposite sex. The transgender spectrum includes individuals diagnosed with gender dysphoria, cross-dressers, and transsexuals. Throughout their growth and development, transgendered individuals struggle to feel comfortable in their own bodies and in their social contexts. Ultimately, some transgender individuals defer to societal gender roles, withholding expression of their preferred gender. Some marry and have children. Those who choose to commit fully to the gender with which they identify seek sexual reassignment.

Gender Dysphoria

Gender dysphoria, discontent with one's biological sex, often emerges long before adolescence. A child may feel uncomfortable in play activities with children of the same sex. Some desire to wear only clothing worn by the opposite sex. Gender dysphoria is often accompanied by anxiety and depression, the treatment of which may lead to the initial diagnosis of gender dysphoria. Most cases of childhood gender dysphoria subside, but for the remaining transgender individuals, family education and family therapy can be useful in assisting the child and his or her family with feelings of denial, anger, and fear.

In adolescence, transgender students present challenges to high schools that have no policies and procedures to govern accommodation of transgendered students. The high rate of suicide among transgendered youth indicates that access to the appropriate services for transgender adolescents is critical. Parents, teachers, and administrators face difficult decisions about which restrooms the student will to use, how the student will dress, and which activities and sports are right for the student. School guidance counseling for the transgender student may be so involved with gender issues that important education and career issues are not adequately addressed.

Gender dysphoria in young adults interferes with the normal transition to partnership. Determining a life path is particularly difficult for someone who has not yet determined his or her identity. An essential part of providing services to young transgender individuals is facilitating their involvement in peer services. Online resources include information, support, blogs, social networking, and advocacy Web sites. Many communities have lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ) support groups as well as support groups for families and friends.

Adult males who have lived in traditional gender roles often decide to transition after they have been married for many years and have had children. Because transitioning produces visible changes, social and work relationships also change. The parents, spouses, and children of those who transition later in life have a significant adjustment to make. Spouses go through a significant grieving process, having lost the partner they married. Some couples remain married. Some become friends and may provide support through sexual reassignment therapy. The children of a transgendered individual may experience confusion about their relationship with their parent. Group, family, and individual therapy, as well as attendance at a support group, can aid the patient and family in making the transition and managing the associated stress.

Care and Services for Transgendered Individuals

Effective services for transgendered individuals are comprehensive and include mental health services, medical services, social services, and social advocacy. Since 1979, the World Professional Association for Transgender Health (WPATH) has published standards of care for working with transgendered individuals. Fenway Health maintains an informational Web site that links to materials for training clinicians in all disciplines.

Mental health professionals serving transgender individuals should have adequate knowledge in growth and development and sexual issues and should be certified by the American Association of Sexuality Educators, Counselors, and Therapists (AASECT). Individuals seeking sexual reassignment are required to provide referrals from qualified mental health professionals documenting the patient's emotional preparedness to undergo medical procedures. Providers should be familiar with resources for education, medical intervention, family therapy, career services, and gender reassignment, so they can make timely and appropriate referrals. Sound collegial relationships with all types of providers promote an effective, community-based, interdisciplinary approach.

Sexual Reassignment Services

Transgender individuals who seek sexual reassignment also require a spectrum of ancillary services. Testosterone therapy for masculinization redistributes fat and muscle, deepens the voice, increases libido, stimulates hair growth on the face and body, and promotes clitoral enlargement and vaginal atrophy. Estrogen therapy for feminization initiates breast development, redistribution of fat and muscle, and decreases growth of facial hair. Estrogen therapy continues through life, which increases the risk of strokes, heart attacks, and cancer. Sexual reassignment surgery reconstructs the genitals. Male-to-female transsexuals may also have breast augmentation, facial surgery, and reduction of the Adam's apple.

Voice therapy assists people in transition with achieving an appropriate tone. Communication therapy addresses both verbal and nonverbal behaviors, including walking and gesturing. Body shaping may include breast binding, genital tucking, or hip padding. Changing from male to female also entails hair removal. Legal documents must be changed to reflect the new gender, and many transgender adults legally change their names. Education, support, and couples or family therapy assist significant others in making the transition to having a loved one whose gender has changed.

Social Advocacy

Transgendered individuals have a higher rate of job loss and a lower rate of health insurance than the general population. Some health coverage excludes transgender-specific health services, and transgender individuals can enlist the help of peer advocates to accompany them to medical appointments and assure that practices are nondiscriminatory. Research that informs evidence-based practice is scarce. Research that provides a basis for funding programs to meet the medical and social needs of transgender individuals is also lacking. It is incumbent upon human service providers to promote social advocacy by educating the public, training professionals, and collaborating with colleagues.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Beacon College

See Also: LGBT Clients; Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in.

Further Readings

Brill, Stephanie and Rachel Pepper. The Transgender Child: A Handbook for Families and Professionals. San Francisco: Clies Press, 2008.

Fenway Health. "Glossary of Gender and Transgender Terms." (2010).

Stryker, Susan and Stephen Whittle. The Transgender Studies Reader. New York: Rutledge, 2006.

World Professional Association for Transgender Health. "Standards of Care for the Health of Transsexual, Transgender, and Gender Nonconforming People." (2001).

Transportation Services

In much of the United States, personal automobiles are the most common means of transportation for individuals and families, particularly when the distance to be traveled is too great for walking to be a feasible alternative. However, relying exclusively on automobiles has many disadvantages, including harm to the environment, time expended in lengthy commutes and in congested traffic, and discrimination against individuals who do not own a car or cannot drive for a multitude of reason including age (both those too young to hold a driver's license, and those too elderly to drive safely), disability, and poverty. A variety of transportation services are available in many areas that provide an alternative to automobile travel and improve the quality of life in a region while also enabling each resident to fully participate in life.

Transportation services are particularly critical in areas of poverty, high concentrations of minority populations, and for the elderly and disabled. For instance, in the United States, members of minority groups are less likely than white Americans to own automobiles, women are less likely than men to have a car registered in their name, and members of poor households generally pay a higher percentage of their income on transportation than do middle-class households.

In the United States, Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 forbids discrimination in public accommodations, including public transportation, and this has been interpreted broadly by the courts to include the adequate provision of services and consideration of the needs of all residents. Following this interpretation, when service changes or fare increases are scheduled, they must be examined to see that minority or disadvantaged residents are being treated fairly; particularly in large cities, public hearings are often scheduled to allow residents to provide input into proposed changes.

Because of the key role that adequate transportation can play in an individual's daily life, some organizations, such as the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and Human Rights, believe that adequate transportation should be considered a civil right. They define transportation equity as a key value in local and regional planning because affordable, reliable transportation provides individuals and families with access to social benefits such as health care, education, and employment. However, in the United States, transportation services often fall short of this goal, and sometimes, transportation services are arranged to favor the needs of the more-prosperous residents of a region, while those in greatest need may receive fewer services, although their need is greater.

Even the basic design of transportation services in a region may favor some individuals over others. For instance, city transit systems laid out on a rectangular grid system are often the most useful for individuals who do not own an automobile because no point in a region is too far from a transit line, and making connections between different lines in a rectangular grid system is generally relatively intuitive and quick. In addition, grid systems do not need to favor one part of a city over another and provide relatively equitable coverage to all areas of the grid. In contrast, a radial grid system designates one area as central, with transit lines radiating out from this area.

This type of design is often used when the focus of the transit system is bringing suburban residents into a central city during the workday and taking them home again in the evening. Such a system may operate only during limited hours, and the transit lines may become widely separated, without connecting services, as they become more distant from the central area. While a radial grid can provide regional benefits in terms of reducing traffic congestion and air pollution, it favors suburban commuters, who tend to be more prosperous and probably own automobiles to use for their personal transportation in the evenings and for trips where the transit lines do not reach over urban residents who may have lower incomes and lower rates of car ownership and hence depend on the transit system for most or all of their transportation.

Although transportation services are often associated with urban areas, they play a vital role in rural areas as well. Rural residents have the same need to access education, health care, employment, and other services as well as the ability to travel longer distance (e.g., between cities), and it cannot be assumed that all individuals in rural areas have access to automobile transportation. In addition, rural residents need to access long-distance transportation services such as bus, rail, and air travel.

In the United States, according to the Bureau of Transportation Services, intercity rural transportation services have declined in recent years. As of September 2010, 11 percent of rural residents had access to intercity transportation (by air, bus, ferry, or rail transportation), although 3.5 million rural residents lost access to intercity transportation between 2005 and 2010. The primary decline was in bus transportation, followed by rail transportation, and access was lowest among residents of North Dakota, where fewer than 60 percent of rural residents had access to intercity transportation.

Transportation for elderly and disabled residents who require special services is typically organized at the local level. Many handicapped and elderly residents can be accommodated on regularly scheduled services—for instance, through buses with accommodations for wheelchairs and that have kneeling entry platforms that can be lowered to street level and then raised to the level of the bus aisle. Often, handicapped and elderly residents are eligible for free or reduced-price transportation on regularly scheduled transit service. In addition, special on-call transportation services are provided in many areas for rural and handicapped residents by specially equipped vans that can accommodate riders with special needs and provide point-to-point transportation similar to a taxicab service but at a much-reduced fare.

Sarah E. Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University

See Also: Age and Clients; Medical Transportation; Poverty; Rural Communities; Urban Communities and Human Services.

Further Readings

American Public Transportation Association. http://www.apta.com/Pages/default.aspx (Accessed December 2013).

Bullard, Robert D., ed. Growing Smarter: Achieving Livable Communities, Environmental Justice, and Regional Equity. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2007.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and Human Rights. "Transportation Equity" http://www.civilrights.org/transportation (Accessed December 2013).

Rodrigue, Jean-Paul. The Geography of Transport Systems. New York: Routledge, 2013.

Thompson, G., and T. Matoff. "Keeping Up With the Joneses: Radial vs. Multidestinational Transit in Decentralizing Regions." Journal of the American Planning Association, v.69 (2003).

U.S. Department of Transportation, Federal Transit Administration. "Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964" http://www.fta.dot.gov/civilrights/12328.html (Accessed December 2013).

U.S. Department of Transportation, Research, and Innovative Technology Administration. "The U.S. Rural Population and Scheduled Intercity Transportation in 2010: A Five-Year Decline in Transportation Access." http://www.rita.dot.gov/bts/sites/rita.dot.gov.bts/files/publications/scheduled_intercity_transportation_and_the_us_rural_population/index.html (Accessed December 2013).

Victoria Transport Policy Institute. Transportation Cost and Benefit Analysis: Techniques, Estimates and Implications, 2nd ed. Victoria, Canada: Author, 2009.

Trauma-Focused Services

Trauma refers to the negative physical and/or emotional results of a distressing event, situation, or condition that exceeds an individual's ability to cope. Those who experience trauma are often referred to as "victims." The impact of trauma can be short- or long-term and includes unintended and often unhealthy physical, psychological, and behavioral conditions. Physical repercussions of trauma may include hormonal damage as well as impairments in neurological structure. Specifically, stress resulting from trauma increases the release of "fight or flight" hormones, including cortisol and norepinephrine. Long-term activation of these stress systems may harm one's sympathetic nervous system and hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal pathways by impairing the body's ability to deactivate its stress response when appropriate. These stress hormones, although useful in true moments of endangerment, are toxic in excess and may result in long-term structural and developmental damage.

Three areas of the brain are particularly affected by stress and trauma: the amygdala (associated with emotional regulation), the hippocampus (associated with memory), and the prefrontal cortex (associated with behavioral control). Psychological and behavioral repercussions of trauma may include some or all symptoms associated with PTSD as defined by the American Psychiatric Association, including re-experiencing of the traumatic event, avoidance of triggering stimuli or thoughts, negative mood and/or impaired memory surrounding the traumatic event, and arousal or hypervigilance.

Primary Trauma, Secondary Traumatic Stress, and Vicarious Trauma

Trauma occurs as a result of adverse experiences that compromise an individual's physical or emotional safety. The severity of a traumatic experience depends on the degree to which the triggering episode exceeds one's capacity to face its associated stress. Trauma can be classified as primary, secondary, or vicarious, depending upon its source. Primary trauma results from an individual's unique experience of powerlessness in the face of a distressing or threatening event. Primary trauma can occur at any age and is a consequence of personal victimization (e.g., emotional or physical abuse/neglect, or sexual assault). Primary trauma can also result from exposure to community environments that challenge one's feelings of safety (e.g., neighborhoods with markedly high levels of crime and violence), institutional and systemic injustice (e.g., institutional abuse and institutionalized discrimination), or victimization associated with an unanticipated natural or manmade disaster.

Secondary traumatic stress, also known as "compassion fatigue," refers to the stress that emerges in those providing assistance or support to direct victims. Resulting from repeated exposure to another's traumatic experiences and stories, secondary trauma is common in many professions specializing in victim support (e.g., psychotherapists, social workers, medical personnel, public safety officers, and law enforcement) as well as among members of the victim's personal support system (e.g., family members and friends). Symptoms of secondary trauma often resemble the same physical, psychological, and behavioral outcomes expressed by direct victims including chronic fatigue, detachment, avoidance, and absenteeism. Recently, secondary trauma has become associated with the high burnout rate of helping professionals.

Vicarious trauma, similar to secondary trauma, results from long-term exposure to others' traumatic narratives or experiences. In contrast to secondary trauma, however, vicarious trauma refers to overarching cognitive shifts that may occur as a result of another's traumatic experience. Specifically, vicarious trauma disrupts the belief systems and cognitive schemas of a second party, leading to long-term shifts in identity and engagement. Trauma services include interventions with the goal to address the unique effects of trauma. Trauma services can be categorized three ways: long-term versus short-term, intensive versus nonintensive, and medical versus mental, behavioral health/addictions.

Long- and Short-Term Trauma-Focused Services

Trauma-focused services may be provided long- or short-term. Short-term services seek to stabilize the physical and mental/behavioral health of the patient or client through immediate action. Short-term interventions promoting physical health and safety may include emergency medicine, such as care provided in an emergency department, intensive care unit, or via outpatient, ambulatory services. Short-term interventions promoting mental or behavioral health include crisis services such as crisis counseling, lethality and safety assessment, and protective services.

Long-term services seek to reduce the impact of the initial trauma on long-term medical or mental health and to support the prevention of reinjury or retraumatization. Long-term interventions promoting physical health and safety may include extended follow-up medical care for any physical injuries or resulting conditions related to the initial trauma, as well as potential relocation or physical protection services. Long-term interventions promoting mental or behavioral health include extended mental health counseling and support services (in particular, mental health treatment for acute stress and PTSDs), as well as integrated behavioral health care.

Intensive and Nonintensive Trauma-Focused Services

Depending on the acuity and duration of a patient's trauma-related symptoms, health and mental health professionals are charged with determining whether a patient is in need of intensive or nonintensive care. For patients deemed to need intensive care, the goal of practitioners is to deescalate the severity of physiological and emotional stress symptoms, to address the immediate safety needs of the patient, and to support the patient's return to homeostasis.

Intensive trauma-focused services are often provided within the context of emergency medical or mental health facilities, including emergency departments, intensive care units, mental health respite centers, or within a patient's home. For patients deemed in need of nonintensive care, the goal of trauma-focused services is to promote ongoing, enhanced, functionality through activities and interventions that increase the patient's resiliency and access to resources. Nonintensive services tend to be provided for shorter durations of time than for intensive services and often include referrals to community resources.

Medical Versus Mental/Behavioral Health Interventions

Medical trauma-focused services may serve three primary purposes: to sustain life, reduce long-term damage associated with a traumatic event or injury, and/or to obtain evidence for potential legal action. Life-sustaining trauma-focused services are typically delivered in hospital emergency departments, intensive care units, or via outpatient ambulatory services. In addition to emergency medicine, medical trauma-focused services can include interventions such as physical therapy, rehabilitation, and occupational therapy, which aim to improve a patient's medical condition post-injury and to reduce the potential for long-term physical damage.

Mental/behavioral health trauma-focused services may include either crisis response or ongoing mental health treatment. Mental health crisis response interventions aim first to assess and reduce potential for physical or psychological harm to oneself or others. Ongoing mental health trauma-focused treatments seek to protect patients from the residual effects of trauma, including PTSD and acute stress disorder. Common mental health interventions for trauma include cognitive behavioral therapy, motivational interviewing, eye movement desensitization and reprocessing (EMDR), and the prescription of antidepressant medications.

Services for Secondary and Vicarious Trauma

Prevention and treatment of secondary and vicarious trauma entails intervention at the individual, supervisory/peer and organizational levels. At the individual level, it is often recommended that those at high risk for secondary and vicarious trauma diligently engage in self-care practices. One common self-care practice in trauma-care fields is safety planning. Having a safety plan in place assists individuals in coping with vicarious and secondary trauma by identifying emotional or environmental triggers of distress, emotional or physical cues of stress, potential behaviors or techniques for de-escalation, and people who may be capable of providing external support.

At the supervisory/peer level, it is often recommended that supervisors openly discuss the high incidence of secondary and vicarious trauma within the helping fields, and work with their subordinates/peers to identify external cues of vicarious/secondary trauma, as well as preferred interventions or forms of support. It is recommended that that this information be shared among helping team members and recorded for occasional review.

At the organizational level, vicarious and secondary trauma can be minimized through the adoption of trauma-informed policies and employee wellness programs. For example, policies that reduce exposure to trauma (e.g., share graphic or traumatizing case information on a "need to know" basis) and that enforce self-care practices (e.g., mandatory self-care, training, and time off) can help to reduce burnout and staff traumatization. In addition, employee assistance programs that provide free or reduced-cost mental health care, fitness, or other wellness programs may also serve as a protective factor for secondary and vicarious trauma among helping professionals.

Diversity Considerations for Trauma-Focused Services

As is true of interventions in other areas of health and human services, effective trauma-focused services will apply cultural competence, both for the patient and for his or her support system (e.g., family, friends, and caretakers). When delivering services to a traumatized patient or collaborating with a patient's support system, providers must be sensitive to the unique contributions of multiculturalism (which per the American Psychological Association "recognizes the broad scope of dimensions of race, ethnicity, language, sexual orientation, gender, age, disability, class status, education, religious/spiritual orientation, and other cultural dimensions") and its implications for a chosen intervention, as well as to any barriers to receiving effective care, including limited literacy, access to transportation, medical vocabulary, previous experience with discrimination or institutional discrimination, cultural values surrounding trauma or mental health, and barriers to informed consent. Guidelines on multicultural practice are provided by numerous health and mental health governing bodies, including the National Committee for Quality Assurance and the American Psychological Association.

Melissa Bayne
California State University Sacramento

See Also: Childhood Trauma; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Emergency Medical Care; Victim Services.

Further Readings

American Psychological Association. “Guidelines on Multicultural Education, Training Research, Practice and Organizational Change for Psychologists.” http://www.apa.org/pi/oema/resources/policy/multicultural-guidelines.aspx?item=1 (Accessed May 2014).

Center for Nonviolence & Social Justice. http://www.nonviolenceandsocialjustice.org (Accessed April 2014).

National Center for Trauma-Informed Care. Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. http://www.samhsa.gov/nctic (Accessed April 2014).

Tribal Social Services

In the 1800s, health services for Indians were provided by the Department of War and focused mostly on containment of contagious disease. These services were probably aimed more at protecting U.S. soldiers than benefitting the native peoples. Control of services by the military ended in 1849, when they transferred to the Department of the Interior.

In 1955, Indian Health Services (IHS) was established as responsible agent within the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) for Tribal Health Services. Today, IHS provides both medical and mental health care to tribal groups in 35 states. Services are provided directly by the IHS through tribal-operated health programs and privately purchased services. IHS service delivery is available to approximately 2.1 million of the nation’s estimated 3.4 million American Indians and Alaska Natives. IHS employs 2640 nurses, 820 physicians, 670 pharmacists, 640 engineers and sanitarians, 340 physician assistants and nurse practitioners, and 310 dentists as well as nutritionists, health administrators, and medical records administrators. American Indians and Alaska Natives, as U.S. citizens, are also eligible to participate in all public, private, and state health programs available to the general population.

In addition to sites established through the IHS, self-governing reservation tribes, as authorized by the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act of 1975, run 16 hospitals, 235 health centers, 75 health stations, and 164 Alaska village clinics through self-determination contracts. Any progress in the quality and availability of services in Native American Indian communities is largely due to the tribes’ taking charge through this act.

Successes

Substantial health improvements can be observed in recent decades among tribal people. Life expectancy has increased by about 10 years since 1973, and mortality rates have decreased for maternal deaths, tuberculosis, gastrointestinal disease, infant deaths, unintentional injuries and accidents, pneumonia and influenza, homicide, alcoholism, and suicide.

The Indian Health Services recognizes self-governance as a successful initiative, indicated by the increasing number of tribes participating. The program constitutes almost 35 percent of the IHS budget. Other benefits of self-governance include increased communication among tribal programs, partnerships with state and local governments, innovative health programs, and increased technical assistance to tribes through the Office of Tribal Self-Governance Advisory Committee, a federal liaison.

Challenges: Recruiting Staff

Though steadily improving, recruiting qualified health and social service professionals has been a challenge. Barriers to enlisting physicians and mental health care providers to work in tribal health establishments include low pay, remote locations, and few resources. A strong emphasis on employing Native American Indian professionals from the local community and an increasing number of Native Americans obtaining professional training bring IHS and tribal governments closer to meeting their goal.

Intertribal Relations

In the midst of an external sociopolitical victory for federal recognition of rights, internal discord and discrimination have occurred. The Nooksack Tribe in northwest Washington state has elevated disparity issues by disenrolling 15 percent of tribal members. This is the largest such cultural–political crisis within a tribe and has had a serious impact on individual rights to legal, medical, and other human services.

A crucial landmark in the long fight for tribal sovereignty places any effort toward recourse under tribal courts as opposed to federal courts. Consequently, it is imperative for self-directed groups, based on various forms of self- and group-identified diversity, to assure attunement to the most basic of nondiscrimination beliefs and behaviors within themselves.

Barriers to access may be heightened as a result of intergroup dynamics. While there is a strong history of intertribal marriage and support for those not living on the reservations, the risk of jeopardizing tribal membership and losing access to services must be considered. Moreover, for those who were historically accepted as "two-spirited" in regard to gender, modern fears and religious beliefs have created exclusion issues. Elders were once revered, but today elder abuse rates are rising to an alarming degree. The issue is not whether humans will continue to fight for their personal preferences but whether the provision of overall human rights and human services will meet their basic needs.

Funding

The Snyder Act of 1921 authorized federal funds to reduce distress, conserve health, and employ staff for the health benefit of Indian tribes throughout the United States. Funds for the IHS have increased over the past few decades, reaching 4.1 billion for 2013, but are still insufficient for the needs of the population. Funds allocated by Congress covered an estimated 60 percent of health care needs of American Indian and Alaska Native people eligible for services in 2013. Due to limited resources, services that IHS is unable to provide at its own facilities, and therefore contracts to other providers, are limited. For these cases, life-threatening illnesses or injuries are given highest priority.

Cultural Competence

While Native American Indians are eligible for state and local programs, many do not use them because of cultural insensitivity in the staff. In the Native American Indians for Community Action Family Health Center in northern Arizona, for example, only 48 percent of Native American Indian clients found the mental health services useful. Of Native American Indians who stopped using the services, 16 percent did so because they felt judged by the mental health professionals. Barriers to utilization of mental health services cited throughout the past 40 years include mistrust of services, beliefs that the services are unresponsive to their needs, and differing cultural views, particularly of the healing process.

Health Disparities

Despite recent successes, American Indians and Alaska Natives still have a life expectancy 5.2 years less than the general U.S. population. Rates of mental and physical health disablement, mortality, substance abuse, and other health indicators, though slowly improving, are higher within the tribal nations than among white Americans, but tribal groups also fall far behind in access to care due to causes such as the remote location of services or lack of funds.

Future Directions

The first White House Tribal Nations Conference was held in 2009; leaders from 300 tribes were invited for personal discussions with government officials, including President Barack Obama. Breakout sessions included Strengthening Tribal Communities: Economic Development, Housing, Energy and Infrastructure; Protecting Our Communities: Law Enforcement and Disaster Relief; Securing Our Future: Cultural Protection, Natural Resources and Environmental Protection; and Strengthening and Advancing the Government-to-Government Relationship.

Minority and protected classes traditionally have moved from dialogue to legal remedy and have enjoyed parallel sociocultural awareness and inclusion. The tribal nations are taking steps to overcome a painful past with the government and integrate changing social and cultural mores while maintaining tradition and heritage, both within their own affiliations and on an intertribal basis.

Doe West
Wayne State University
Ellen Gutowski
Kathleen Malley-Morrison
Boston University

See Also: Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; Indian Health Service; Tribal Sovereignty; Two-Spirits.

Further Readings

Bergman, Abraham B., et al. "A Political History of the Indian Health Service." Milbank Quarterly, v.77/4 (1999).

Chester, Barbara, Patricia Mahalish, and James Davis. "Mental Health Needs Assessment of Off-Reservation American Indian People in Northern Arizona." American Indian and Alaska Native Mental Health Research, v.8/2 (1999).

Hyde, Justeen K. and Stephen M. Shortell. "The Structure and Organization of Local and State Public Health Agencies in the U.S." American Journal of Preventive Medicine, v.42/5 (2012).

Indian Health Service. http://www.ihs.gov (Accessed December 2013).

Tribal Sovereignty

Starting in 1778, the United States has been negotiating treaties, ruling on court cases, establishing laws, and issuing presidential resolutions to create, change, and alter Native American tribal sovereignty. After years of negotiations, Native American tribes are a quasiautonomous nation within a nation and governed by the U.S. government. Presently, the tribal sovereignty rests upon three principles, which are local sovereignty; Congressional authority over (e.g., Plenary Power Doctrine) Native American tribes; and the U.S. government being obligated to protect Native American rights, lands, resources, and survival.

Many Native American tribes are recognized as tribal nations within the United States. Today, there are approximately 550 federally recognized tribal nations in the contiguous 48 states. Under the U.S. Constitution and subsequent federal laws, tribes are dependent nations that have been granted local sovereignty. Local sovereignty allows tribes to determine membership in the nation, form their own tribal governments, create and enforce criminal and civil laws, as well as manage, regulate, and govern tribal property and commerce. A designation of a dependent nation results in the U.S. government having authority over the tribes in regard to the laws they are governed under and the tribal government's role and relationship to the federal and state governments and determines the self-governing abilities of the tribes.

Prior to the formation of the United States as a country, tribes were sovereign nations with significant self-government powers. Under Article I (Section 8) of the U.S. Constitution, Congress has the authority to regulate commerce between foreign nations and Native American tribes. Additional court cases that have heard congressional authority issues include: Ex parte Joins (191 U.S. 93) of 1903; Antoine v. Washington (420 U.S. 194) of 1975; United States v. Sioux Nation of Indians (448 U.S. 371) of 1980; and United States v. Lara (541 U.S. 193) of 2004. In 1789, Congress created the Department of War, among whose assigned duties was negotiating treaties with various tribes. In 1790, Congress enacted the Nonintercourse Act, which explicitly forbids individuals and states from negotiating with tribes or purchasing tribal lands.

Treaties (1778–1871)

The first treaty between the United States and a tribe was the treaty with the Delaware in 1778. From 1778 to 1871, there were almost 400 treaties that were voluntarily or forcibly negotiated among individual tribes, tribal groups, and the U.S. government. These treaties were negotiated as two sovereign nations, with the executive branch representing the United States and the tribal leadership representing the tribes. The negotiated treaties were ratified by the U.S. Senate. The volume of negotiated treaties indicates the increased importance the U.S. government placed on maintaining relations with the tribes. Although the details of the treaties varied, many were based on tribes' relinquishing rights to hunting and traditional lands in exchange for trade goods and monetary compensation. In many of these treaties, tribes agreed to place themselves under U.S. protection and live on reservations in order to maintain limited self-governance. A number of these early treaties are still binding today.

Marshall Trilogy

In the early 1800s, there were three U.S. Supreme Court decisions that affirmed the legal status of tribes and defined the limits of tribal sovereignty. These are called the Marshall Trilogy (1823–32) and were named after Chief Justice John Marshall (1755–1835). The first case was the Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (30 U.S. [5 Pet.] 1) of 1831. In this case, the Cherokee Nation wanted the Supreme Court to force an injunction on the state of Georgia from establishing certain laws on the Cherokee reservation. The Court refused to grant the injunction because the Cherokee Nation was viewed as neither a foreign nation nor a state and was a domestic dependent nation under the U.S. government. The domestic dependent nation status meant tribes were only allowed to make agreements with the U.S. government, and Congress had the authority to manage and regulate the tribe's transactions with nonnatives.

The next case of the Marshall Trilogy was Johnson v. M'Intosh (21 U.S [8 Wheat] 543) of 1832. This case was over a disputed land title. In 1773 and 1775, Thomas Johnson purchased land from the Piankashaw tribe. These properties were willed to his descendants (plaintiffs), who were lease holders. William M'Intosh (defendant) was given an exclusive land grant to allegedly the same land from the U.S. government. Justice Marshall ruled that the Piankashaw tribe had only occupancy rights to the land, not title to it, and thus the land sold to Johnson was invalid. This ruling restricted the tribal sovereign powers and clarified that tribes were only provided with the right to occupy and use their designated lands. Further, the U.S. government was the only entity to purchase tribal lands under the doctrine of discovery.

Another case of the Marshall Trilogy was Worcester v. Georgia (31 U.S. 515, 8 L.Ed. 483) of 1832. Missionary Samuel Worcester refused to follow the state of Georgia's law that required white people living on the reservation to obtain a residency permit. The law was enacted to hinder Worcester and other missionaries who were working with the Cherokee liberation movement. Worcester and others refused to comply with the new law and were brought up on criminal charges. The Supreme Court struck down the state of Georgia's law, noting that the state had no criminal jurisdiction on Native American land. Worcester and others charges were dismissed.

From Sovereign Nations to Congressional Wards

In 1851, the Indian Appropriations Act made funds available to place western tribes onto reservations in order to "protect" them from the mostly European migrants. A rider on the Indian Appropriations Act of 1871 forbade the recognition of additional tribes and prohibited new treaties because the tribes were no longer recognized as an independent nation. The passage of this act made Native Americans wards of the nation. After 1871, the relationship between tribes and the U.S. government was conducted by acts of Congress, executive orders, and amendments.

Congressional authority over tribes, tribal law, and decision-making abilities date back to 1883 in the court case Ex parte Crow Dog (109 US 556). Crow Dog was alleged to have killed Spotted Tail, a government-installed Lakota chief, and was tried in tribal court. He was found guilty and under traditional Sioux tribal punishment was required to pay restitution. The U.S. government, however, tried Crow Dog for murder, found him guilty, and sentenced him to death by hanging. Crow Dog appealed his case to the Supreme Court, which held that, unless authorized by Congress, the U.S. government had no jurisdiction in the case. Following this, in 1885, Congress passed the Major Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1153, which mandated that seven major crimes (e.g., murder, manslaughter, rape, assault with intent to committee murder, arson, burglary, and larceny) committed in Indian country be adjudicated in the federal judicial system. This act placed the responsibility for investigating and prosecuting major crimes under the domain of the federal government and deterred tribes from prosecuting and punishing tribal members for major crimes. The 1885 act was affirmed in 1886 in United States v. Kagama (118 U.S. 375) by the Supreme Court. This court case limited tribal sovereignty by establishing Congress's plenary authority over Native American tribes.

Land Owning, Assimilation, and Jurisdiction

In the 1800s, Native Americans were not considered U.S. citizens. They were tribal members with few exceptions. One exception was serving in World War I, and another was becoming a farmer under the General Allotment Act of 1887 (called the Dawes Act). The Dawes Act sought to eliminate reservations. The act allotted a number of acres, ranging from 160 to 40 acres, to Native Americans based on household size. The Native Americans who accepted the allotment could become American citizens. Few tribal members benefited from the Dawes Act. Ultimately, 90 million acres or two-thirds of the reservation land was taken from tribes and given to white settlers. Citizenship was made available when Congress passed the Indian Citizenship Act of 1924 (also called the Snyder Act), which allowed Native Americans to become U.S. citizens while retaining their tribal affiliation.

The Dawes Act's native lands privatization was ended with the passage of the Indian Reorganization Act (IRA) of 1934. This act allowed for tribes to rebuild their governments by creating constitutions and economies and renewing local tribal sovereignty. However, tribal actions were still under U.S. governmental authority, and all tribal actions could be reviewed by the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA). Thus, the IRA provided a space for tribal self-governance but limited tribes to operating under Western governmental models, which were not always compatible with tribal culture, values, and ways of life.

During the 1940s and 1950s, the United States enacted laws that would "assimilate" tribal members into mainstream American society because it was seen as being in the best interest of the Native American groups. The Native American tribes were under bureaucratic management that was notorious for being rigid and mismanaged. This policy was called Indian termination, where the U.S. government no longer recognized tribal sovereignty, ended tribes' exclusion from state laws, and turned Native Americans from reservation trustees to U.S. citizens who were subject to state and federal laws and taxes. Examples of these policies include the Klamath Termination Act of 1954 (Public Law 587); the Western Oregon Indian Termination Act of 1954 (Public Law 588); and the California Rancheria Termination Act of 1958 (Public Law 85-671 [72 Stat. 619]).

In 1953, Congress enacted Public Law 83-280. This law transferred jurisdiction from the federal to state governments (e.g., California, Minnesota, Nebraska, Oregon, Wisconsin, and Alaska) in Indian country. Congress allowed all states to assume jurisdictional control over Native American lands with the passage of either a statute or a state constitutional amendment. This act, in essence, overturned Worcester v. Georgia (1832). The states listed in the act were mandatory, and the Native American nations had limited recourse for gaining control over creating their own judicial systems. There were several exceptions when the nations successfully demonstrated that they already had reasonable law enforcement capabilities. Public Law 83-280 was an unfunded mandate.

Another jurisdictional barrier was handed down by the Supreme Court in 1978, with the Oliphant v. Suquamish Indian Tribe (435 U.S. 191, 98 S. Ct. 1011, 55 L.Ed.2d 209) case. Mark Oliphant, a nonnative who was living on the Port Madison Indian Reservation of the Suquamish Tribe, was arrested for allegedly assaulting a tribal officer and resisting arrest. Mark's lawyers claimed he was not under tribal jurisdiction because he was not Native American. In a 6–2 decision, the Supreme Court ruled in his favor, and this court case limited tribal jurisdiction to only native members who have allegedly committed a crime on a reservation. Even though the court decision resulted in tribes having no jurisdiction over nonnatives, it did affirm local sovereignty over tribal members. A later case confirmed local sovereignty over activities on tribal land. The Supreme Court case was Montana v. United States (450 U.S. 544) in 1981. In this case, the Crow Nation claimed it could regulate nontribal members' hunting and fishing activities on the Crow Indian Reservation based on treaty rights and sovereign governing authority. The Supreme Court ruling resulted in tribes having the ability to regulate significant nonnative American operations that were on tribal lands, providing there is a consensual agreement with the tribe. This ruling gave tribes the capacity to regulate any activity that was related to tribal security or safety interests over state authority.

ICRA and ISDEAA

In 1968, the Indian Civil Rights Act (ICRA, 25 U.S.C.§§ 1301-1304) was passed. The goal of this legislation was to have the Bill of Rights integrated into tribal governments. Congress passed the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act of 1975 (ISDEAA, Public Law 93-638) and authorized the U.S. government to contract with and provide grants to tribal governments. The tribes were authorized to administer the funds as well as operate their own schools. The ISDEAA marked a change from the Indian termination policies of the 1940s and 1950s. This act authorized tribes to operate their own schools. The ICRA and ISDEAA were the product of Native American activism.

After years of negotiations, Native American tribes are a self-autonomous nation within a nation and governed by the U.S. government. Through various negotiated treaties, court rulings, establishment of laws, and presidential resolutions, Native American tribal sovereignty has changed over time. The current trajectory indicates a loosening of U.S. governmental control over tribes to one of increased tribal sovereignty and self-government powers. The issue of tribal sovereignty is important because it is a subtext that human service providers and agencies need to be aware of when operating in Native American areas, especially Native American reservations. Many people and agencies have come to tribal areas with the best of intentions, only to make programs and policies that exacerbate negative situations and frequently make situations significantly worse. It is important that human service providers and agencies partner with tribes in order to address the social structural issues and problems affecting tribal areas.

Andrew Hund
United Arab Emirates University

See Also: American Indian Movement; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; National Congress of American Indians.

Further Readings

Canby, W. American Indian Law in a Nutshell (5th ed.). St. Paul, MN: West Thomson Reuters, 2009.

Cohen, F. Handbook of Federal Indian Law With Reference Tables and Index. Buffalo, NY: Hein Publishing, 1941 (1992).

Pever, S. The Rights of Indians and Tribes: The Basic ACLU Guide to Indian Tribal Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Purcha, F. Documents of the United States Indian Policy, 2nd ed. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1990.

TRIO Programs

The federal TRIO programs are outreach and student services designed to provide services for individuals from disadvantaged backgrounds. TRIO includes seven student-centered programs to help low-income individuals, first-generation college students, and individuals with disabilities to progress academically from middle school to postbaccalaureate programs. These seven programs include (1) Educational Opportunity Centers (EOC), (2) Talent Search (TS), (3) Upward Bound (UB), (4) Upward Bound Math/Science, (5) Veterans Upward Bound (VUB), (6) Student Support Services (SSS), and (7) Ronald E. McNair Post-Baccalaureate Achievement. Aside from these student programs, TRIO also offers staff training program designed to help personnel improve the operation and success of TRIO projects. TRIO is not an acronym; rather, it was given its name because it started as a group of only three programs. In fiscal year 2012, TRIO programs allocated a total of $838,629,436 to fund 2,815 projects serving 789,676 participants. Federal TRIO program legislative requirements can be found in the Higher Education Act of 1965, Title IV, Part A, Subpart 2.

TRIO has a progressive history. Over the years, TRIO programs have been expanded and improved to provide a wider range of services to reach more students in need. TRIO started with the UB program, which emerged out of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 in response to the administration's war on poverty. UB provides college entrance preparation support to high school students from either low-income families or families in which neither parent holds a bachelor's degree. All UB projects must provide instruction in math, laboratory science, composition, literature, and foreign language. UB seeks to increase rates of secondary education completion, postsecondary education enrollment, and postsecondary graduation.

In 1965 the second TRIO outreach program, TS, was created as part of the Higher Education Act. TS identifies and assists individuals from disadvantaged backgrounds who have the potential to succeed in higher education. It provides academic, career, and financial counseling and encourages participants to graduate from high school and continue with postsecondary education. TS publicizes the availability of financial aid and helps individuals with the postsecondary application process. TS also encourages persons who have not completed secondary or postsecondary education programs to enter (or reenter) and complete postsecondary education. TS seeks to increase the number of youth from disadvantaged backgrounds who complete high school and enroll in and complete postsecondary education.

In 1968, SSS, which was originally known as Special Services for Disadvantaged Students, was authorized by the Higher Education Amendments and became the third in a series of educational opportunity programs. By the late 1960s, the term TRIO was coined to describe this group of federal programs. Through a competitive grant process, SSS funds are awarded to institutions of higher education to provide opportunities for academic development, assist students with basic college requirements, and motivate students to complete postsecondary education. The Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act of 2001 amended the SSS program to permit the use of program funds for grant aid to current SSS participants who are receiving federal Pell Grants. SSS seeks to increase college retention and graduation rates. Requirements for SSS grant aid can be found in Public Law 106-554.

The Higher Education Amendments of 1972 added the fourth TRIO program by authorizing the EOC to provide college admissions counseling and information to qualified adults who want to enter or continue postsecondary education. EOC also provides financial and economic literacy services. An important objective of the program is to counsel participants on financial aid options and to assist in the application process. EOC seeks to increase the number of adults who enroll in postsecondary education.

The 1976 Education Amendments authorized the Training Program for Federal TRIO Programs, initially known as the Training Program for Special Programs Staff and Leadership Personnel. These programs are designed to help personnel improve the operation and success of TRIO projects. Training priorities are legislated by Congress and determined by the Department of Education to be the most appropriate in meeting TRIO personnel needs.

Amendments in 1986 added the sixth program, the Ronald E. McNair Postbaccalaureate Achievement Program. McNair funds are awarded to institutions of higher education through a competitive grant process to prepare individuals from disadvantaged backgrounds for doctoral studies involving research and other scholarly activities. Institutions work closely with participants throughout their undergraduate studies, and they encourage participants to enroll in graduate programs. The McNair program seeks to increase the attainment of Ph.D. degrees by students from underrepresented segments of society.

In 1990, the department created the Upward Bound Math/Science program to address math and science instructional needs. The program seeks to help students recognize and develop math and science skills, and it encourages participants to pursue postsecondary math and science degrees.

The VUB began in 1972 during the Vietnam War to provide educational and support services enabling veterans to transition to postsecondary education. It is designed to motivate and assist veterans in the development of academic and other requisite skills necessary to succeed in a postsecondary education program. VUB provides assessment and enhancement of basic skills through counseling, mentoring, tutoring, and academic instruction. VUB projects must provide instruction in mathematics through precalculus, laboratory science, foreign language, composition, and literature. VUB projects are also expected to help veterans secure local support services. VUB seeks to increase veteran postsecondary education enrollment and completion rates.

Depending on the specific program, TRIO grant recipients are typically institutions of higher education, secondary schools, public and private agencies, and community-based organizations with experience in serving disadvantaged youth. Collaborative applications from multiple institutions, agencies, or organizations are also accepted so long as they plan, develop, and carry out the proposed student services.

M. Scott Young
Paul G. Stiles
University of South Florida

See Also: Adult Education Programs and Services; Adult Literacy Programs; Department of Education, U.S.; Education Support Services; Educational Services.

Further Readings

TRiO. http://trio.utsa.edu (Accessed August 2013).

U.S. Department of Education, Office of Postsecondary Education. http://www2.ed.gov/about/offices/list/ope/trio/index.html (Accessed August 2013).

U.S. Department of Education, Office of Postsecondary Education. "A Profile of the Federal TRIO Programs and Child Care Access Means Parents in School Program." http://www2.ed.gov/about/offices/list/ope/trio/trioprofile2008.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Truancy

Truancy is generally defined as unexcused absence from school. As such, it is a violation of school rules and of state law. Students who have excessive absences, as defined by a statute in a specific jurisdiction, are subject to sanctions by the state through the juvenile court. Usually, however, the front line of dealing with this is through the affected school or school district. In addition, parents who are ineffectual, uncooperative, or hostile to the school's or court's efforts may be held criminally liable for their child's truancy and subject to fines, or rarely, incarceration.

In the past playing hooky, or being truant, was seen as a minor transgression—even a springtime rite of passage when boys would head to the old fishing hole rather than spend a stultifying day in the prototypical one-room schoolhouse pondering Latin grammar or solving mathematical problems. But, modern social science and criminological research paints a much grimmer reality for truancy and dropping out. One critical issue is that children who are out of school miss out on learning and fall behind, sometimes far behind, their cohorts. They then become discouraged and are much more likely to drop out than those who are not habitually truant. As such, they are more likely to become delinquent, make less money throughout their lives, have a series of dead-end jobs, and are unlikely to advance in economic terms. They are more likely to become delinquent simply because they are outside of adult supervision while truant, are in the company of other similarly antisocial young people at that juncture, and are additionally socializing with underemployed and unemployed young adults who have discretionary money, freedom, and time. This increases their discontent with the structure of their status as minors and with school and leads them into situations where precocious sex and experimentation with alcohol and illicit drugs is likely. With parents working or absent truants are prone to use the family home as a locale for deviant and delinquent activity. It is no accident that most unintentional teenage pregnancies are conceived in that very context.

National statistics on truancy are notably lacking. Informed sources estimate that truancy varies from 10 to 30 percent. Some schools, generally in the urban districts, have truancy rates as high as 40 percent. Such high rates negatively impact school funding as state support is based on school attendance. However, some have suggested that some school administrators, realizing that truants are not the best students, do not actively discourage truants or dropouts in order to achieve higher scores on standardized tests. These students, many of whom will drop out eventually, are called push outs. Additionally, administrators and teachers see many truants as potential troublemakers and are not unhappy to see them no longer in attendance. Also, some educators and sociologists in the past opined that truant dropouts would be happier and productive once free of the oppressive environs of school. While that may have been true when factory jobs and manual labor occupations were plentiful, that belief no longer holds sway in academe or in educational circles. The notion that truants are bright diamonds in the rough who are simply turned off by the routine of modern educational methods and institutions is not borne out by research. It is clear that no one benefits from truancy or dropping out, most especially the truants themselves.

Reasons and Background for Truancy

Children with learning disabilities or who are the victims of bullying frequently are truants. They simply want to avoid a traumatic or dangerous situation. Children whose parents are drug dependent or mentally ill frequently are called upon to be a family hero and take care of younger siblings, pets, or the parents themselves and thus miss school. Sometimes, children are forced to work in family businesses rather than go to school. It is clear that some parents, usually operating from a subcultural context, simply don't see school as particularly useful. That notwithstanding, many times, truants report that school itself is impersonal or uninspiring or that individual teachers are hostile. It is worth noting that truancy is especially high at large, impersonal urban schools.

Another school-related factor that discourages below-average (and average) students is that, in such large schools, inordinate amounts of scarce resources are poured into athletics and to reward a few exceptional students, leaving almost nothing in the way of activities or positive reinforcement for those who are marginal and disaffected. Moreover, truants are likely to come from a disadvantaged minority background and have unemployed or criminal parents and delinquent siblings. Their parents are likely divorced or have serious marital conflict. Parents may be recent immigrants who do not understand the law or speak English and are somewhat at the mercy of the child to be their translator and intermediary with the larger American national culture. The children of lower-class rural whites and poor urban African Americans are more likely to be truant than upper-middle class or upper-class people of the same respective races. Rural, white disadvantaged parents sometimes hold children back, saying, "Don't get above your raisin," meaning, "Don't transcend and rise above the circumstances of your culture and your parents." Another way of looking at this is "Don't get too big for your britches." This is a particularly defeatist and challenging lower-class cultural norm with which young people may have to deal. It reflects a lack of support children of this background can expect from their parents and extended family. Hispanic youth are also at risk and often get ambiguous and nonsupportive message from poorly assimilated elders. Social service personnel have their work cut out for them dealing with such negative overt messages and cultural subtexts.

Children of divorce are also at risk for truancy and dropping out. Girls, even those who do not have to drop out after becoming pregnant, will sometimes fall by the wayside due to expectations that girls need to start childbearing early. Being truant is an ideal setting for promiscuous and precocious sexual activity and for becoming pregnant. For whatever reason, the truant is often under-supervised at home and in many cases basically outside of parental control. In juvenile court terms, they are technically ungovernable. This is because the parents themselves are not really in control of their own lives and may be consumed by fiscal trauma and excessive personal drama. Court sanctions on such parents are usually ineffective and amount to adding financial deprivation and legal harassment to already chaotic lives. In such settings, a motivated school social worker, guidance counselor, juvenile officer, or sympathetic teacher will struggle mightily to make a difference.

Dealing With Truancy

Today, parents may be informed of a truancy event by means of an automated phone message. Understandably, truant children, if so empowered and available, try to delete such messages from voice mail and answering machines. It sometimes happens that children may accumulate many days' worth of unexcused absences without the parents being any the wiser. When notified in writing, or by a summons, the parent may be called upon to visit the school, the school board office, or even appear in juvenile court or in a specialized truancy court. A truant officer may be assigned to the case to follow up and insure that the juvenile subsequently attends school. If the child or parents resist or ignore the school's action or court's ruling, they may be assigned to a therapeutic context where counseling, mentoring, and testing might occur—a truancy resource center. At that point, it may be helpful to have the child removed from the problematic school situation and be reassigned to an alternative school. In some cases, students have been allowed to take courses online in order to avoid repeated interactions with a teacher with whom they have an unfortunate history of conflict. A sympathetic and resourceful school social worker or juvenile officer, given enough imagination and funding, can often find a way to get a resistant young person back into school and motivate him or her to graduate. But, failing that significant presence, the outlook is not positive. Children who continue to be truant despite the efforts of social agencies will find themselves referred to juvenile court as children in need of supervision (CHINS). They may be removed from parental custody and placed in foster care, in the care of relatives, or in a few severe cases, in group homes or juvenile custodial institutions.

There is no question that, while parental fecklessness or active neglect is usually involved in truancy, our schools definitely promote truancy and dropping out in a number of ways. In general, they are too big and impersonal to attend to the needs of those on the margins of school attendance, participation, and student culture. It is a major task to simply monitor attendance and inform parents. Guidance counselors and teachers are overloaded with large classes and caseloads and performing non-education related tasks (such as monitoring lunchrooms and school bus loading) to focus on problematic individuals. Activities that might engage all students, such as intramural athletics, art, drama, and literary efforts, are not adequately funded or encouraged by administrators. All school activities become subordinate to having students perform well on tests. Such an atmosphere is dispiriting to all students and only encourages marginal students to be truant and to drop out entirely.

Francis Frederick Hawley
Western Carolina University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; At-Risk Youth Services; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Bye, L., et al. Truancy Prevention and Intervention: A Practical Guide. New York: Oxford, 2010.

Departments of Education and Justice. Manual to Combat Truancy. http://www.ed.gov/pubs/Truancy (Accessed August 2013).

Garry, E. M. Truancy: First Step to a Lifetime of Problems. Washington, DC: Department of Justice. 1996.

Harlow, C. W. Comparing Federal and State Prison Inmates, 1991. Washington, DC: Department of Justice, 1994.

Ingersoll, S. and D. LeBoeuf. Reaching Out to Youth Out of the Education Mainstream. Washington, DC: Department of Justice, 1997.

Lawrence, R. School Crime and Juvenile Justice. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

San Diego Association of Governments. Drug Use Among San Diego Arrestees. San Diego, CA: Author, 1996.

Spaethe, R. "Survey of School Truancy Intervention and Prevention Strategies." Kansas Journal of Law and Public Policy, v.9 (2000).

Stroman, J. "Holding Parents Liable for Their Children's Truancy." UC Davis Journal of Juvenile Law and Policy, v.5 (2000).

Trujillo, L. A. "School Truancy: A Case Study of a Successful Truancy Reduction Model in Public School." UC Davis Journal of Juvenile Law and Policy, v.10 (2006).

TuDiabetes

Diabetes mellitus is a chronic disease that affects 347 million people worldwide. The World Health Organization estimates that diabetes will be the world's seventh-leading cause of death by 2030. In addition, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimate that nearly 26 million people in the United States, or 8.3 percent of the population, have diabetes.

Diabetes threatens the quality of life of millions of individuals in the United States, especially ethnic minorities who are at a higher risk of developing the disease. TuDiabetes.org is a social support Web site dedicated to increasing public awareness of diabetes prevention, diagnosis, and treatment. Because TuDiabetes is committed to improving the quality of life of individuals of diverse ethnic and socioeconomic backgrounds, the site is of interest to human services professionals in the United States and abroad.

Diabetes

Diabetes is characterized by high levels of glucose in the blood as a consequence of poor insulin production, an inappropriate response of the body's cells to insulin, or both. Diabetes is grouped into three main types: type 1, type 2, and gestational diabetes. Type 1 diabetes is often diagnosed in young children, adolescents, and young adults. Type 2 diabetes occurs over time and mostly affects people over 40. Gestational diabetes develops during pregnancy in women not previously diagnosed with the disease. If not managed properly, diabetes can cause serious complications, including heart disease and stroke, blindness, gangrene, and kidney failure.

Diabetes disproportionately affects ethnic minorities in the United States. African Americans, Native Americans, and Hispanics are almost twice as likely to develop the disease as non-Hispanic whites, which places diabetes among the top health disparities in the nation. Type 1 diabetes is not preventable; however, type 2 diabetes can be avoided through lifestyle changes, such as dieting and exercising. Research suggests that social support is crucial for individuals who are trying to make and maintain these lifestyle changes and manage their illness.

TuDiabetes Inception

TuDiabetes is an online community and social support network serving people with diabetes, their families, and friends. The Web site is part of the Diabetes Hands Foundation, a nonprofit organization dedicated to developing awareness for diabetes-related causes. The nonprofit was founded in 2007 by Manny Hernandez, a Venezuelan-born electrical engineer and social media author, and his wife, Andreina Dávila, an architect and designer also from Venezuela. Hernandez, who graduated with a master's degree from Cornell University, was diagnosed with latent autoimmune diabetes in adults (LADA).

As described by the National Institutes of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases, LADA is characterized by signs of both diabetes type 1 and diabetes type 2 and is generally diagnosed after age 30. LADA is not officially recognized as a type of diabetes, but it is considered a subset of type 1 diabetes. Following his LADA diagnosis, Hernandez became aware of the importance of having a strong support network for diabetes management and control. He and Dávila created TuDiabetes in particular for individuals who lack that support.

TuDiabetes.org

TuDiabetes claims more than 31,000 members. In addition, it reaches an excess of 24,000 members via EsTuDiabetes, the Spanish-language version of the site. Both versions of the Web site share the same platform, which includes 11 tabs and five main page sections. The tabs include home, my page, members, forum, blogs, groups, events, media, other programs, donate, and chat. The my page section allows members to create a personalized space where they can maintain a blog, initiate discussions, post milestones and photos, create groups, and answer questions about their particular situation. The members section highlights participants from all ages and nationalities who are selected by the organization for their high level of activity in offering helpful and friendly advice to other members on the Web site. Approximately 13 members are featured on any given day. Participants can engage in conversations with other members through the forum section. Forums are divided by themes that might appeal to the different interests of participants. Some topics or themes include type 1 and type 2 diabetes, new to diabetes, diabetes treatment, diabetes sports and fitness, and continuous glucose monitoring.

In addition to forums, participants express their opinions and concerns through blogs. More than 13,500 blog posts have been featured on the site. Members can search the Web site for blogs in several main categories, including featured, latest, and most popular. The blogs center on a variety of topics tagged under descriptors such as type, insulin, pump, blood, and diabetes. Blog posts are archived by month from 2007. Besides forums and blogs, TuDiabetes members are active in more than 400 group discussions. The group setting allows members to connect with other individuals who share their concerns, interests, or geographical region. The United Kingdom Diabetics group, for example, has 367 members. Other groups include the Diabetics in Southeast Asia and India, Dexcom Users, Diabetic Food and Cooking, and even Inked Diabetics, a group for diabetics with tattoos.

Events, Programs, and Advocacy

Whereas forums, blogs, and groups provide members with venues to express their ideas, opinions, and thoughts, the events tool offers outside community experts the opportunity to advise members on a wide range of diabetes-related subjects. Online talks featuring diabetes educators, ophthalmologists, nutritionists, and other experts specializing in diabetes care are conducted live, recorded, and posted under the events tab. Members can join and remotely participate in the online events as they are taking place, or they can view the recordings later at their convenience.

Diabetes programs and advocacy efforts that go beyond the membership community are also incorporated into the Web site. Diabetes Advocates is a program of the Diabetes Hands Foundation prominently featured on TuDiabetes.org. The program aims to educate the public and the media about all matters related to diabetes. The advocates' main objective consists of disseminating information about the proper reporting of diabetes-related information and to emphasize that diabetes is a conglomerate of metabolic diseases, all with different characteristics that the media should not lump into one single category.

The Big Blue Test is another of the organization's central programs. It strives to demonstrate that exercise decreases blood glucose levels by as much as 20 percent. The program encourages members with or without diabetes to record their blood glucose, get active for 14 to 20 minutes, test their glucose again, and share the results online. For every entry that is logged, the Diabetes Hand Foundation, with help from corporate donors, makes a donation to nonprofit organizations serving people with diabetes around the world. Fund-raising results are revealed every year on November 14 during World Diabetes Day. In 2013, Big Blue Test beneficiaries included projects in Haiti and the Dominican Republic. Selecting nonprofits in the Caribbean as beneficiaries of the Diabetes Hands Foundation's grants contributes to diabetes awareness efforts in that region and promotes the efforts of EsTuDiabetes.org.

EsTuDiabetes

Although EsTudiabetes.org follows an identical design and navigation as TuDiabetes.org, EsTuDiabetes is entirely Spanish-language based, and it tailors its forums, blogs, and groups to its

Spanish-speaking members. This is most apparent in the events section, where diabetes-related events taking place in Spanish-speaking countries are highlighted, including La Marea Azul se Mueve in Spain, the Desafío Urbano en Tiempo Real in Argentina, and the 2do Encuentro Multidisciplinario en el Día Mundial de la Diabetes in Mexico. EsTuDiabetes features more than 2,600 blogs, almost 150 groups, and more than 6,047 forum discussions. Video chats featuring experts on diabetes issues are also available on the events tab. Unlike TuDiabetes, the live interviews and informative segments are not as prominent. EsTudiabetes also lacks the advocacy tab featured in TuDiabetes.

Diabetes has been labeled a global epidemic. The Web sites TuDiabetes and EsTuDiabetes have developed a diverse network for diabetes patients and their families, and are inclusive of individuals from various ages, nationalities, and diabetes types. Through these Web sites, the Diabetes Hands Foundation is developing awareness about the disease and providing emotional support to a diversity of people in the United States and around the world.

Johanne I. Laboy
North Carolina State University

See Also: Caribbean Immigrants; Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey; Hispanics Immigrants; National Alliance for Hispanic Health; Native Americans; Pregnancy and Parenting Services.

Further Readings

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "National Diabetes Fact Sheet: National Estimates and General Information on Diabetes and Prediabetes in the United States, 2011." U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. http://www.cdc.gov/diabetes/pubs/pdf/ndfs_2011.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

Fernandez-Luque, L., R. Karlsen, and G. B. Melton. "HealthTrust: A Social Network Approach for Retrieving Online Health Videos. Journal of Medical Internet Research, v.14/1 (2012).

National Diabetes Education Program. "Snapshot of Diabetes: The Facts About Diabetes the Leading Cause of Death in the United States. http://ndep.nih.gov/media/fs_gensnapshot.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

National Institutes of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases. "Strategic Plan on Minority Health Disparities: Area Focus #1 Diabetes Mellitus, Type 2.." http://www2.niddk.nih.gov/AboutNIDDK/ReportsAndStrategicPlanning/Strategic_Plan_Minority_Health_Disparities.htm (Accessed January 2014).

World Health Organization. "Fact Sheets: Diabetes." http://www.who.int/mediacentre/factsheets/fs312/en/ (Accessed January 2014).

Twelve-Step Programs

Since 1935, 12-step recovery programs have been a staple in the treatment of alcoholism. Bill Wilson and Dr. Robert Smith founded Alcoholics Anonymous (AA), resting on the belief that people who shared the same problem could assist each other in overcoming that problem. In 1948, Al-Anon was established to support the spouses of alcoholics. In 1953, Narcotics Anonymous (NA) was founded upon the AA principles. Subsequently, Cocaine Anonymous, Pills Anonymous, and Marijuana Anonymous have emerged. The 12-step program model has been adopted by compulsive gamblers, overeaters, sex and love addicts, debtors, and codependents. Twelve-step groups maintain the AA format with minimal adaptations to address their specific issues. Overeaters, for instance, abstain from specific foods.

The original tenets of AA remain in practice as the 12 traditions. These traditions address how all 12-step programs operate.

1. Our common welfare should come first; personal recovery depends upon AA unity.
2. For our group purpose, there is but one ultimate authority—a loving God as He may express Himself in our group conscience. Our leaders are but trusted servants; they do not govern.
3. The only requirement for AA membership is a desire to stop drinking.
4. Each group should be autonomous except in matters affecting other groups or AA as a whole.

5. Each group has but one primary purpose—to carry its message to the alcoholic who still suffers.
6. An AA group ought never endorse, finance, or lend the AA name to any related facility or outside enterprise, lest problems of money, property and prestige divert us from our primary purpose.
7. Every AA group ought to be fully self-supporting, declining outside contributions.
8. AA should remain forever nonprofessional, but our service centers may employ special workers.
9. AA, as such, ought never be organized, but we may create service boards or committees directly responsible to those they serve.
10. AA has no opinion on outside issues; hence, the AA name ought never be drawn into public controversy.
11. Our public relations policy is based on attraction rather than promotion; we need always maintain personal anonymity at the level of press, radio, and films.
12. Anonymity is the spiritual foundation of all our traditions, ever reminding us to place principles before personalities.

Resources

Twelve-step programs provide written materials for their membership free of charge. The Big Book, written by the founders, includes general information about alcoholism and includes chapters written to wives and to employers. Stories of recovery are the core of the Big Book. Indexed topics covered in the personal stories include spirituality, anger, jealousy, and guilt. The fourth edition of the Big Book is available on the Internet in an interactive format.

The book titled One Day at a Time has a thought for each day of the year, written to be read each day and used as a basis for prayer and meditation. Some 12-step programs have their own guides. Codependents Anonymous, for instance, has a big book titled Codependency and a book of daily meditations titled The Language of Letting Go.

The serenity prayer is a staple of recovery, recited at the end of each meeting and displayed in the homes, vehicles, and workspaces of recovering and nonrecovering people. It simply asks, "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change; courage to change the things I can; and wisdom to know the difference." The sentiment of the serenity prayer is congruent with the 12-step philosophy, and the first line of its next verse, "Living life one day at a time," is a mantra in the recovering community.

Recovery

The original philosophy of AA asserted that alcoholism is a chronic condition from which one can never fully recover. In a struggle with alcohol, drinking will always prevail. The road to recovery begins when one ceases the futile struggle and admits that he or she is powerless over alcohol. Alcoholics maintain abstinence one day at a time but will refer to themselves as recovering, not recovered, no matter how long they are abstinent. Programs for other addictions retain the philosophy that people are powerless over their respective addictions and that one must practice the principles of the program in every area of his or her life to remain in recovery. Twelve-step programs have a jargon, hereafter shown in quotations, that asserts the philosophy in a down-to-earth, often metaphoric, manner.

The Twelve Steps

Each of the 12 steps asserts a principle of recovery. The newly recovering member is assisted by others in "working the steps" in order. The first three steps address powerlessness. The first step is "We admitted we were powerless over alcohol—that our lives had become unmanageable." The first step is acceptance of "hitting a bottom" due to addiction and generally entails loss of a relationship, loss of a job, or legal problems. The second step is "Came to believe that a power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity." After many solitary attempts to overcome addiction, the addict hereby admits that he or she needs help to achieve recovery. The third step is "Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him." The third step introduces spirituality. Those who do not believe in a supreme being are often encouraged to consider God as an acronym for good orderly direction. In the third step of Gamblers Anonymous, "a power of our understanding" is substituted for the word God. Adolescents in recovery often find the 12 steps difficult to comprehend. An adaptation of the beginning steps for adolescence is "Step 1: I have a problem. Step 2: Someone can help. Step 3: Let them."

The next four steps define the process for personal healing. The fourth step requires that the recovering person has "made a searching and fearless moral inventory." The fourth step is often guided by worksheets that define character flaws such as selfishness and resentment and ask the addict to give an example of a time he or she demonstrated this flaw. The fifth step, "admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs," requires the addict to disclose the findings from the fourth step aloud to another person. The fourth step is generally spoken to another member of the program, but it is acceptable to seek a member of the clergy outside of the program for this confession. The sixth step, "were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character" more directly requires belief in God as a higher power. The seventh step, "humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings," is one of prayer.

Reparation of damaged relationships and self-forgiveness are addressed in the eighth step, "made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all." The addict begins the process of making amends in the ninth step: "Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others." Some addicts, at this point, must accept that some relationships are forever lost. To maintain this level of moral clarity, the 10th step is "continued to take personal inventory, and when we were wrong, promptly admitted it."

The last two steps address giving back to the program that has restored them. The 11th step is "sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out." Throughout the program, members are often encouraged to "let go and let God." The 12th step is "having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics and to practice these principles in all our affairs." Twelfth-step work often entails taking new people to meetings and supporting them in their recovery.

Twelve-Step Meetings

AA is the largest 12-step program, reporting more than 2 million members and 100,000 meetings worldwide. Most newspapers publish the times and locations of local 12-step meetings. Attendance at all 12-step meetings is anonymous; therefore, only first names are used, and members do not disclose each other's identities outside of the meetings. Twelve-step programs have no affiliations and no leaders. Members pay rent wherever they hold their weekly meetings, and the role of chairperson rotates among the membership. Meetings usually start and end with a prayer. It is customary for all in attendance to introduce themselves and identify their addiction if they have one. The chairperson then awards a coin to those celebrating milestones in abstinence. Coins are given for the first months in recovery and for each year of recovery.

Meetings can be open or closed. An open meeting permits people who are not seeking recovery to attend. A friend or family member can attend as a support to someone in early recovery. Counselors in training can observe an open meeting. Most open meetings are lead meetings in which a member takes the podium to tell his or her story of addiction and recovery. Questions and comments are entertained after the lead has told his or her story. Closed meetings are usually discussion groups. Discussion meetings often address a specific topic, such as resentment, forgiveness, or relationships. Some discussion meetings forbid cross talk, which means each member in the discussion takes a turn in reading or making a statement about the topic without receiving feedback from other members. If a member does not wish to make a comment on the given topic, it is acceptable to withhold from making a statement by saying, "Pass."

Some meetings are for the discussion of a specific step. For example, an 11th-step meeting may meet every Sunday morning for discussion of spiritual matters. Women; atheists; nurses; lesbian, gay, bisexual, transsexual, and queer (LGBTQ); the hearing impaired; and addicts with co-occurring mental and emotional disorders are among groups that hold exclusive meetings. Most recovering people establish a home group in which they are most comfortable. Even though members can and do attend other meetings, they generally celebrate their milestones and receive coins at their home group. At their home group, members may enlist the help of a sponsor. A newly recovering addict can call upon a sponsor for support through cravings, information about working the steps, and guidance through social or emotional issues associated with recovery.

Listening to the stories of others who have had similar experiences helps to lift the shame of addiction. Confrontation by peers helps to break through denial. Meetings provide fellowship, nurturance, guidance, and opportunities for mastery.

Criticisms

Twelve-step recovery programs have been effective for people from all walks of life, but white, middle-aged males have dominated the programs since their inception. Women's meetings have emerged to address the special needs of women who have social phobias and who have been victimized by men. Hispanics generally do not attend 12-step recovery meetings owing to cultural constraints. Blacks sometimes have difficulties related to cultural trauma, and literature to assist them in assimilating to the program is available at many meetings.

Critics of 12-step recovery programs object to the suggestion of a Christian dogma, but 12-step supporters hold that the serenity prayer is applicable to any religion and that the term God refers only to a power greater than the individual. Responsible-use messages are not permitted by agencies licensing substance abuse treatment providers, but the goal of total abstinence has been challenged as an all-or-nothing approach that prevents some addicts from seeking treatment.

Anonymity and fluid membership make research of 12-step programs difficult, but recently, research has been conducted, and the results suggest that cost-free 12-step programs are as effective as cognitive behavioral and motivational approaches.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Beacon College

See Also: Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration; Substance Abuse Treatment for Children and Adolescents.

Further Readings

Alcoholics Anonymous. Alcoholics Anonymous. New York: A. A. World Services, 2001.
Miller, Geri. Learning the Language of Addiction Counseling. Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley and Sons, 2010.
The 12 Steps for Freedom From Addictive Behaviors. http://12step.org (Accessed December 2013).

Two-Spirits

"Two-spirit" is a term that Native Americans use to self-identify as gay or lesbian, transgender, or as an alternate to binary gender roles (male and female). It is a contemporary term but has roots in Native American precolonial history. Identity development is suggested to evolve over a relatively linear cycle of stages; however, some argue for an indigenous way of understanding identity that does not conform to the linear and standardized approaches to knowledge that are embraced by the dominant Western culture in the Americas. Human service workers should be aware of the many health disparities faced by this population and should approach working with these individuals in a culturally competent manner.

Definition, Background, and History

Two-spirit is a term that Native Americans coined in 1990 during a Native American and First Nations gay and lesbian conference in Winnipeg, Canada. The meaning depends on what identity the Native American person associates it with, thus it is relative and not easily defined. It often carries components of gender, sexuality, and spirituality. Prior to the colonization of the Americas, native tribes embraced an alternative gender and sexuality outside of the binary male-and-female and heterosexual European norm. The term varied among tribal languages, with as many variations as there were tribal languages. The meaning associated with the term would vary widely among tribes; some anthropologists speculate that it referred to a person who had a special spirit or held a valued position within the tribe because of his or her ability to serve roles for both genders, while others say that they were androgynous. Most anthropologists agree that two-spirit ultimately represented the fluid understanding that Native American people had of sexuality and gender, and when Native Americans were colonialized, they lost this sense of fluidity due to the influential European norm of only two genders (male and female) and only one sexuality (heterosexual). A common term used by European colonizers to identify Native American people who did not comply with gender and sexual norms was berdache, a word derived from the Arabic word bardaj, meaning a boy slave kept for sexual purposes.

In contemporary times, two-spirit Native Americans sometimes identify within the lesbian, gay, and bisexual (LGB) community. However, many two-spirit people refute that association and insist that being two-spirit is not an issue of sexual orientation. Modern critique of the term comes from indigenous and queer scholars who take issue with the way that Native Americans are understood through a Western or Eurocentric lens. They argue instead for an indigenous way of knowing, which begins with indigenous-identified people and is applied back to them without outsider interference. In this indigenous knowledge, gender and sexuality are not separate identities, and a binary understanding of male and female or heterosexual and homosexual is rejected. In this view, the outsider should step back from his or her preconceived understanding of indigenous people and start from the beginning at the individual's indigenous knowledge instead. Those in the human services field may find this difficult because it is not a prescribed way of approaching serving an individual and does not align with Western ways of delivering human services. However, an acceptable way of going about the understanding of two-spirit people involves first acknowledging outsider status and giving respect to the indigenous culture that the client holds.

Identity Development

Because the two-spirit identity is sometimes associated with a lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender (LGBT) identity, it can develop over time in a similar fashion to sexual orientation or gender identity. In 1979, Vivienne Cass created and validated a theoretical model of homosexual identity development that explains how such an identity would develop. It involves a series of six steps in which a person comes to understand and accept his or her homosexual identity: identity confusion, identity comparison, identity tolerance, identity acceptance, identity pride, and identity synthesis. For some two-spirit people, Cass's model fits quite well because of the struggle that they faced while coming to terms with a nonnormative identity. Other two-spirit people do not fit the model at all because there was never a struggle to accept their two-spirit identity; they were always embraced for who their spirit was no matter how it was expressed, and their community encouraged the development of their two-spirit identity.

Homophobia and Racism

Some tribes openly accept and teach their children about two-spirit people and about fluid concepts of gender and sexuality. Some embrace it as part of their religious and spiritual heritage, and it is integrated with their identity as Native American. Other tribes do not accept nonbinary genders or nonheterosexual identities, thus creating an environment of homophobia and heterosexism. Homophobia is the fear of homosexuals or of being associated with them. Heterosexism is the assumption, whether overt or covert, that heterosexuality is the only normal and acceptable sexual identity. Heterosexism is expressed both psychologically and culturally. This environment usually becomes hostile to the two-spirited person, who often leaves his or her tribal community either by force or by choice, thus leaving him or her without an important source of support. There is not a set of knowledge as to which tribes take which approach to sexuality and gender, thus the human services worker should assess this with each individual client. Some two-spirit individuals attempt to socialize and gain support within the LGBT community but face racism that exists in that community. Therefore, they can be ostracized from both their tribal community and their LGBT community, leaving them with even fewer sources of support.

Health Disparities

Native Americans have documented health risks that exceed those that nonindigenous people face, such as the highest teen suicide rate among Americans; higher incidence of alcohol and drug abuse and dependency problems; the highest rates of chronic diseases such as diabetes, tuberculosis, liver disease, and pneumonia; and an average 10-year shorter life span than nonindigenous people. Two-spirit people add the additional risk factors associated with that of nonheterosexual or nongender-conforming people, such as increased risk of mental health issues, substance abuse problems, and human immunodeficiency virus and acquired immune deficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS). These disparities are believed to be a result of cultural and psychological oppression faced by nonwhite, nonheterosexual persons encapsulated in what is commonly known as racism and heterosexism.

Historical Trauma

Historical trauma is a concept that applies to all Native American people but has special meaning for two-spirit people. It refers to the culmination of the negative impacts of the systematic genocide and whitewashing of Native American people during and beyond the European colonization of the Americas. After the colonization of the Americas, indigenous people were forced to relinquish their native religions, thus giving up the berdache identity. Many who still held such an identity at that time were intimidated, harassed, and sometimes incarcerated for upholding their native religious beliefs toward a two-spirit identity. Therefore, the history that many two-spirit people hold is that they were abandoned by their own people. That history is pertinent because of how Native Americans view their past, present, and future to be spiritually interconnected. Thus, the context of historical trauma is important to consider when working with a two-spirit individual.

A contingent of Native American Two Spirits representing the Bay Area in the San Francisco Pride parade in 2013. In many Native American cultures, a Two Spirit is a person who has both masculine and feminine qualities and is often considered to have extraordinary powers and abilities. The Two Spirits are often mentioned as part of the narrative of the American transgender experience as a whole.

Culturally Competent Practice

Culturally competent practice with two-spirit people requires a human service worker to have competency in the areas of attitudes, knowledge, and skill. The area of attitude involves self-reflection and awareness of the biases and beliefs that one holds. When practicing with two-spirit people, this involves attitudes about both Native American people and LGBT people. The area of knowledge involves education about cultures and values of various groups. Practice with two-spirit people requires the human services worker to respect the spiritual values and tribal beliefs held by each individual encountered in practice as they will differ across tribes and communities. The area of skill involves the ability to recognize and use Native American-specific treatment strategies that sometimes involve indigenous knowledge for healing practices.

Finally, culturally competent practice with two-spirit people requires respect for and attention to the indigenous ways of knowing that are important to the individual. Such practice embraces multiple ways of knowing (relativism), values historical and spiritual perspectives, and is person centered—that is, centered on the person's self-defined goals and outcomes in care.

Megan E. Gandy
Virginia Commonwealth University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Model of; Heterosexual Privilege; Isolated Communities and Cultural Competence; LGBTQ Clients; Native Americans.

Further Readings

Blackwood, Evelyn. "Sexuality and Gender in Certain Native American Tribes: The Case of Cross-Gender Females." Signs, v.10/1 (1984).

Cass, Vivienne. "Homosexual Identity Formation: A Theoretical Model." Journal of Homosexuality, v.4/3 (1979).

Driskill, Qwo-Li. "Doubleweaving Two-Spirit Critiques: Building Alliances Between Native and Queer Studies." GLQ: A Journal of Lesbian and Gay Studies, v.16/1–2 (2009).

Jacobs, Sue-Ellen, Wesley Thomas, and Sabine Lang. Two-Spirit People: Native American Gender Identity, Sexuality, and Spirituality. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1997.

The Native American Center for Excellence. "NACE Two-Spirit Material." http://nace.samhsa.gov/TTA/TrainingDocsTwoSpirit.aspx (Accessed September 2013).

Sue, Derald Wing, Allen E. Ivey and Paul B. Pedersen. A Theory of Multicultural Counseling and Therapy. Pacific Grove, CA: Brooks/Cole Publishing, 1996.

Wilson, Alex. "How We Find Ourselves: Identity Development and Two-Spirit People." Harvard Educational Review, v.66/2 (1996).

U

Undocumented Immigrants

Undocumented immigrants, in accordance with the definition of the International Organization for Migration, are described as persons who enter or stay in a country without necessary documents. This includes the ones who have no legitimate documents to enter a country but manage to enter illegally, who enter using counterfeit documents, and who, after entering using appropriate documents, have overstayed or violated the conditions of entry and remain without authorization. In current literature, they are also named as clandestine, illegal, or irregular immigrants.

Undocumented Immigrants: Threat or Not?

Migration-related issues have been progressively reconceptualized since the early 1990s as posing a security threat to immigrant-receiving countries, being linked to organized crime, terrorism, or extremism. Some scholars, including Ayse Ceyhan, Ankica Kosic, Karen Phalet, and Jef Huysmans, argue that undocumented immigrants are being perceived as a potential threat against national identity and security.

Therefore, undocumented immigrants tend to be projected in terms of either a security-based or rights-based approach. The security-based approach concentrates on the need to control illegal immigration in view of its perceived potential threat to internal or external stability and welfare of a country. However, the rights-based approach, which constitutes the basis of human needs of undocumented immigrants, concentrates on human rights obligations (Geneva Convention and European Convention on Human Rights) and the presence of civil society organization as well as adheres to basic principles, such as accountability, transparency, and ethical values, while performing duties regarding undocumented immigrants.

There is an emerging concern that these legal measures and institutional actions regarding undocumented immigrants do not consider human service needs and rights of undocumented immigrants. Thus, human service needs are based on key principles, such as ensuring the voluntary return of undocumented immigrants as well as adhering to accountability, transparency, and democratic principles, which are illustrated next.

Human Service Needs of Undocumented Immigrants

Readmission agreements, which specify the conditions of readmitting citizens of third countries who have passed through their territory, are considered to be one of the effective measures in dealing with undocumented immigrants because they urge immigrant-sending countries to take serious actions against those involved in illegal immigration. Furthermore, ensuring the voluntary return of the undocumented immigrants is crucial in terms of efficiently managing migration and considering human service needs of undocumented immigrants. Thus, the 2003 Thessaloniki European Council emphasizes the importance of the voluntary return of undocumented immigrants and cooperation with third countries.

Legitimacy of Duties Regarding Undocumented Immigrants

Many legal issues are contested among countries being exposed to undocumented immigrants, especially when it comes to migration control. Accordingly, there may be some serious concerns about the breach of international human rights law, specifically the nonrefoulement principle, which is guaranteed by 1951 Geneva Convention on the Status of Refugees. For example, if a vessel of a state intercepts persons in the territorial waters of a third state and returns them to the shore of this state without providing the possibility to ask for asylum, the state would violate international agreements on protecting refugees. Another shortcoming is the lack of access of civil society organizations to the actions of law enforcement agencies engaging with undocumented immigrants. In this sense, governmental authorities should create an environment for the access of civil society organizations and democratic oversight of duties regarding undocumented immigrants.

Moreover, the emergence of data gathering systems with regard to undocumented immigrants may raise crucial issues in terms of individual rights, particularly in the field of data control. For example, there are lots of data systems in the European Union, such as SIS-I, SIS-II, VIS, and Eurodac, where the data of undocumented immigrants are processed. Therefore, efficient protective measures should be ensured for undocumented immigrants, whose data should be protected against any human rights violations or violations of the right to privacy.

Ensuring Accountability and Transparency

By definition, accountability is the ability to call public officials, requiring that they be answerable for their policies, actions, and use of funds. Transparency can be described as the opening of public institutions to other institutions and organizations, where they are required to reveal the costs and the state of services. Henceforth, contemporary security measures regarding undocumented immigrants should prioritize retaining proficiency and being loyal to civilian principles such as transparency and accountability.

However, there is some concern that law enforcement agencies may continue the culture of secrecy, thus lacking transparency regarding border security practices toward undocumented immigrants. In this respect, the promotion of professional structures relies on being transparent to citizens and accountable to authorities as well as being loyal to ethical values. Human dignity is also important when performing duties related to undocumented immigrants.

The increasing number of undocumented immigrants, overstay visa holders, refugees, and unchecked population growth indicate that human service needs of undocumented immigrants are of utmost importance and necessitate further measures. Therefore, defining human service needs of undocumented immigrants is of the highest importance in dealing with undocumented immigrants.

In this respect, practitioners should consider ensuring the voluntary return of undocumented immigrants and prioritizing their human service needs by being loyal to ethical values as well as employing transparency and accountability. Thus, a better and efficient policy approach toward undocumented immigrants depends on ensuring the balance between security and freedoms and defining human service needs. In metaphorical terms, apart from the sword function (security), the shield function (freedoms or human service needs) should also be highlighted while performing duties regarding undocumented immigrants.

Ahmet Kaya
Independent Scholar

See Also: Refugee Assistance; United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees; U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Further Readings

Aditya, Batara G. and Beni Sukadis. Border Management Reform in Transition Democracies. Geneva: Geneva Centre for the Democratic Control of Armed Forces (DCAF)and Lesperssi, 2007. http://www.dcaf.ch/

Publications/Border-Management-Reform-in-Transition-Democracies (Accessed March 2013).

Boswell, Christina. "The 'External Dimension' of EU Immigration and Asylum Policy." International Affairs, v.79/3 (2003).

Cerrah, Ibrahim. "Police." In Almanac Turkey 2005 Security Sector and Democratic Oversight. Tesev Publications, 2006.

Ceyhan, Ayse. "Migrants as a Threat: A Comparative Analysis of Securitarian Discourse—France and the United States." In V. Gray, ed., A European Dilemma: Immigration, Citizenship and Identity in Western Europe. Oxford, UK: Bergham Books, 1999.

Huysmans, Jef. "The EU and the Securitization of Migration." Journal of Common Market Studies, v.38/5 (2000).

Kosic, Ankica and Karen Phalet. "Ethnic Categorization of Immigrants: The Role of Prejudice, Perceived Acculturation Strategies and Group Size." International Journal of Intercultural Relations (2006).

Sasse, Gwendolyn. "Securitization or Securing Rights? Exploring the Conceptual Foundations of Policies Towards Minorities and Migrants in Europe." Journal of Common Market Studies, v.43/4 (2005).

Uninsured Clients

The term uninsured can be defined as not having the financial resources to cover expenses in the event of medical emergencies, illnesses, death expenses, and damaged motor vehicles and property. Hence, the uninsured are unable to meet the demands of life, including preventative care. The phenomenon of the uninsured can affect undocumented clients, immigrants, uninsured drivers, victims of uninsured drivers, temporary workers, low-income earners from different ethnic groups or cultures, and others. Over the last decade, there has been a steady increase in the number of the uninsured population. In 2005, approximately 45 million Americans did not have health insurance. Six years later, the number has increased to more than 48 million. This steady increase of the uninsured population can ultimately impact the society negatively, particularly the health care system. Consequently, the individuals at the micro and macro system level or both can experience these negative outcomes. At the micro level, individuals can experience social impacts such as severe stress, poor health, and shorter life spans. Thus, these incidences over time influence the macro systems. For example, health care providers and government services will have an increase in financial burdens that require immediate action. Current literature demonstrates that uninsured clients can be extremely costly to hospitals and other health care facilities. The average uninsured patient cost is approximately $10,000 per day depending on the type of care. Stakeholders at the governmental level intervene by setting policies to ensure services are delivered for free or at a low rate.

Causes of the Uninsured Population

Several factors have contributed to the growth of the uninsured population. These determinants include poverty, loss of employment, high insurance premiums, divorce, chronic illness, or death within the family structure. Undoubtedly, poverty is the common denominator among the list. It is defined as the lack of resources such as health care, assets, and the ability to direct or manage one's own future. Among the U.S. population today, more than 16 percent of individuals are living below the standard poverty line. These include children, adults, and the elderly. Loss of employment is correlated with high insurance premiums. Individuals with full insurance benefits are more likely to work a full-time job. Another factor impeding access to insurance is sudden family crisis (divorce, death, or chronic illness). If a family has five children with one working parent who encounters any of the issues listed previously, then one of the outcomes could be lack of insurance.

The New Shift Toward the Uninsured

Traditionally, the uninsured population receives less preventive and primary care treatment. For example, an uninsured woman may be less likely to receive annual breast examinations than the insured woman. The uninsured child may be provided with less opportunity to receive care for sore throats and ear infections than a child who has health insurance. Over the years, numerous efforts have been made to improve the quality of life of the uninsured population. Some designated health care providers receive federal support to care for the uninsured. More programs have been opened in underserved communities, and awareness campaigns have resulted in more individuals being willing to access the services available. Recently, the Affordable Care Act was passed to assist the uninsured population with health care services. This act has the potential to increase coverage to the uninsured across America and to help people maintain coverage and access affordable insurance.

Services Delivered to the Uninsured

There are many services available to the uninsured population. The federal government established various services with eligibility criteria for the uninsured. Also, the government implemented policies that protect the uninsured population, such as prohibiting the health care service providers from denying services. The majority of the uninsured population receives services from local, federal or state agencies. Some agencies specialize in services for different age groups.

For example, WIC provides nutrition services for children below the age of 5 years old as well as pregnant and breast-feeding mothers. On the other hand, community health centers, neighborhood centers, churches, and schools provide preventative health care services such as dental and vision care. Sometimes, these services are available free or at a reduced price. In addition, prescription assistance programs are available at some of these facilities. Generic drugs are available to the uninsured at a reduced cost or free. Today, these services can be found in all geographical areas of the United States. Studies show that residents referred daily to community emergency health care are admitted for sudden injury or illness, such as sprains, mild asthma attacks, minor infections, small cuts, sore throats, rashes, urinary tract infections, respiratory infections, and family planning services.

Barriers Among the Uninsured

Despite the various services available to the uninsured, they are faced with challenges daily. Some of these barriers include lack of knowledge and awareness about the services available to them. On the other hand, those who are aware of the services may feel embarrassed to access service. Also, hopelessness may impact the unemployed due to not having enough money to cover living expenses and medical bills. In certain geographical areas, some service facilities are available for a limited amount of time during the month or day. For example, a rural underserved community may have only one health center that opens three times per month for four hours. In these circumstances, specialty health care services, such as mammograms and Pap smear testing for the uninsured, may be delayed. Another challenge facing the uninsured is availability of physicians, nurses, and other health care providers. For example, these providers may only visit the health center once per month due to obligations at other facilities. These barriers may affect the uninsured population and sometimes place a serious constraint on the economic and the health care system.

Andrea E. McDonald
Texas A&M University
Jennifer Thompson
Prairie View A&M University

See Also: Educational Status and Service Delivery; Employment/Career Assistance Services; Medical Necessity; Migrant Workers; National Assessment Governing Board; Primacy of Place.

Future Readings

The Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation. "Uninsured." http://kff.org/uninsured (Accessed November 2013).

Johnson, Nancy J. and Lane P. Johnson. The Care of the Uninsured in America. New York: Springer Press, 2010.

U.S. Census Bureau. "2011 Population." http://aspe.hhs.gov/health/reports/2011/cpshealthins2011/ib.shtml (Accessed November 2013).

United Farm Workers of America

During the violent 1930s strikes in California's Central Valley, migrant workers were herded like cattle at gunpoint, and farmers dehumanized workers for fear that labor organizing would raise production costs. Mexican and African American farmworkers were segregated from white farmworkers and more likely to live in polluted areas. In the absence of any formal assistance from federal or state agencies, the United Farm Workers of America (UFWA) was established during the 1960s as a workers' rights organization with the merging of the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee (AWOC) and the National Farm Workers Association (NFWA). The UFWA recruited members one at a time with grassroots organizing, often providing basic needs or strategically connecting needy migrant workers with federal and state agencies. The rise of the UFWA coincided with the civil rights movement in America. The UFWA built itself in the fields and used boycotts to pressure agribusinesses to create awareness using the media. The civil rights movement brought attention to racism for migrant workers related to housing, employment, education, and voting. The issues were basic: a living wage, decent housing, an end to spraying pesticides while workers were in the fields, and collective bargaining.

The struggle for migrant farmworkers dates to the early 20th century. California agribusinesses began to import Filipino farmworkers during the 1920s. The National Labor Relations Act of 1936 provided most American workers with the right to collective bargaining but did not extend it to agricultural workers because many were African American. The U.S. government and the Mexican government enacted the Bracero Program (Public Law 78) between 1941 and 1964 so that Mexican workers could come as guest workers to temporarily replace domestic workers during crop harvests to alleviate labor shortages during World War II. American growers quickly undercut the competition by utilizing braceros because they were not required to pay foreign workers domestic wages.

Braceros had restricted rights and were often sent back to Mexico if they challenged employers. Distress in the bracero camps grew when managers ignored complaints: Letters to consuls, work stoppages, and attempts to get local governments to listen to their needs went unheeded. Basic safety standards such as portable toilets in the fields were neglected. Migrant families eked out livings following the harvesting of produce in the United States, and families exploited the labor of their own children to subsist. In the equivalent to company towns, braceros rented substandard housing with no indoor plumbing or heating in employer-owned labor camps and purchased food from farmer-owned stores in company towns. Farmworkers were vulnerable to preventable fatal accidents, and their life expectancy was about 49 years.

Grassroots Organizing

Community organizer Fred Ross worked as a social worker during the Great Depression, established the Community Service Organization (CSO) in 1948, and increased voter registration in segregated areas. Ross created a dynamic organization with grassroots organizing by mentoring Cesar Chavez and Dolores Huerta, who became the cofounders of United Farm Workers. Chavez brought a charismatic, nonviolent sensibility to organizing. Huerta earned a provisional teaching credential in elementary education from the University of the Pacific and later witnessed the plight of migrant families when she taught children who regularly attended school hungry and without basic necessities like shoes. Working with the CSO, Ross led the effort to get Mexican Americans to register to vote, while Huerta built coalitions and lobbied the state legislature to address issues of social justice and equity for migrant workers.

Chavez employed specific strategies in building the UFWA. He made a point to create case files on farmworkers. In Ventura County, where a Farm Placement Service (FPS) issued referral cards needed to get the best jobs to braceros and worked in collusion with growers to eliminate the local workers who had protections and expected better pay as U.S. citizens, Chavez filed complaints against the FPS for job preference violations. He then used the paperwork to collect data on the filers' experience and capabilities along with their worker ID numbers and referral card numbers. This informal registration of farmworkers eventually created a demographic portrait of poverty, family struggles, and systematic discrimination that Chavez used to pit different agencies against each other. Chavez would first put pressure on the Welfare Department to provided groceries, and then California state agencies acted so that farmworkers could get grocery orders.

Huerta cofounded the Stockton chapter of the CSO in 1955 to address segregation, police brutality, and voter registration. McCarthy-era politics in the United States meant the term un-American was used to challenge prounion, antisegregation individuals and those who encouraged minority groups to vote by making them targets for harassment if they protested the status quo. Huerta cofounded the Agricultural Workers Association (AWA) in 1960. She successfully lobbied for initiating Spanish-language election ballots and California Department of Motor Vehicle exams; the end of California's prerequisite of citizenship to access public assistance, pension programs, and disability insurance; and the repeal of the Bracero Program in California in 1962, which authorized deportation of undocumented immigrants.

Huerta and Chavez established the NFWA in 1962. Despite challenging personality conflicts, Huerta and Chavez lobbied the legislature to extend Aid to Families With Dependent Children to California farmworkers in 1963. They led the UFW boycott of San Joaquin grape growers in 1965 that included sit-ins, blocking Schenley Industries trucks, and picketers on the Schenley ranch getting sprayed with insecticides; Huerta subsequently negotiated a contract between UFW organizing committee and Schenley.

Filipino farmworkers affiliated with the AWOC, holding charters with the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, initiated the Delano grape strike in 1965, when children were used as strikebreakers. Chavez motivated Mexican and Chicano workers to join the strike. Chavez understood the power of the media and used newspapers, radio, and television to get the message out. Luis Valdez (1940–) established Theatro Campesino (the Farmworkers Theater) in Delano to energize the strikers.

Boycotts as Nonviolent Pressure for Change

The First Amendment guarantees the freedom to boycott, so the UFW launched the most ambitious boycott in American history in July 1966. The FBI started extensive files on Chavez during the boycott of table grapes grown in the Delano fields that culminated with the creation of the UFWA. At the time, few labor laws existed to protect migrant farmworkers, and no agencies addressed this. The UFWA's strategies exposed unconstitutional injunctions by violating them in order to bring awareness. With the UFWA, Huerta lobbied for passage of the California Labor Relations Act (1975) and created awareness of the effects of toxic pesticides on farmworkers. The work of the UFWA continues as the U.S. Congress introduces more variations of bracero programs.

Meredith Eliassen
San Francisco State University

See Also: Child Labor, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Grassroots Leadership; Immigration: Human Services Issues; Mexican Americans.

Further Readings

Bardacke, Frank. Trampling out the Vintage: Cesar Chavez and the Two Souls of the United Farm Workers. London: Verso, 2011.

Ferriss, Susan, Ricardo Sandoval, and Diana Hembree. Fight in the Fields: Cesar Chavez and the Farmworkers Movement. New York: Houghton Mifflin Harcourt, 1998.

Nelson, Eugene. Huelga? The First One Hundred Days of the Delano Grape Strike. Delano, CA: Farm Worker Press, 1966.

Ross, Fred. Conquering Goliath: Cesar Chavez at the Beginning. Keene, CA: El Taller Graphico Press, 1989.

United Nations Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide

There has always been a controversy in global politics with respect to the contextualization of the crime of genocide over the course of the last century. In his book Axis Rule in Occupied Europe, published in late 1944, Raphael Lemkin was the first who used the term genocide. The roots of the word genocide come from the word geno, used to describe race or tribe in Greek, and the word cide, used for killing in Latin. In his book, he attempted to bring an explanation to Nazi policies that resulted in the systematic killings of European Jews.

While keeping in mind that the accusation of genocide has always been controversial in terms of world politics, the United Nations (UN) Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide has been the primary document that provides to the states a context to reach consensus with regard to the definition of genocide; hence, it is the foremost formal consensus that designates genocide in legal terms in international law. More to the point, the convention is substantial in global politics in terms of emphasizing the protection of human rights and the right to life of communities and human beings. In this context, preventing the crime of genocide in a community is an essential responsibility of a state to protect human rights and right to life of individuals.

Grave markers at the Srebrenica Genocide Memorial, where the victims were mostly male Bosnian Muslims and Croats. The convention defines genocide as acts that are implemented against a national, ethnical, racial, or religious group and committed with the purpose of destroying all or part of the group members.

Background

Although the UN General Assembly accepted the convention on December 9, 1948, it was not put into force until after the ratifications of 20 member states in the UN on January 12, 1951. As of November 2013, not only has the international community adopted the principles of the convention more than ever before but also three-quarters of all countries (143) have ratified the convention. The adoption of the convention gives the responsibility to the states to prevent and punish the crime of genocide in times of peace and war. The convention has become one of the milestones in international affairs history, emerging as a result of agreement of the states to condemn the crime of genocide and, by doing so, to protect human lives and rights.

Framework of Genocide in the Convention

The convention defines genocide as acts that are implemented against a national, ethnical, racial, or religious group and committed with the purpose of destroying all or part of the group members. In essence, those acts against the groups that are under threat include killing, causing serious bodily or mental damage, destroying the life conditions with the intent of deliberate extermination, enforcing precautions to prevent childbirth, and compulsorily moving children of the group to another group.

The convention stipulates the penalization of individuals, including rulers, public officials, and private citizens, who commit genocide crimes or any other act that leads to the crime. The convention requires the contracting states to put into force necessary regulations and rules complying with their respective constitutions in order to punish those persons who commit the crimes designated by the convention.

Implementation of the Convention in Global Politics

There are two tenets in the structure of the convention that the international community endorses to implement against the crime of genocide. Those tenets are to prevent the crime and to punish the crime. In terms of punishment, the responsibility of jurisdiction is given to state tribunals or to the international courts that are recognized by the contracting parties of the convention. Pursuant to this, the international criminal court (ICC), which is not under the UN system, is the primary responsible international court in judging those who commit the crime of genocide. However, only in 1998, by the Rome Statute, which allowed establishment of a stable international court, could it be possible to judge those kinds of international crimes. This decision came as a result of the experiences of international community in the conflicts of Bosnia and Rwanda.

On the other hand, in terms of prevention, the convention works to establish an international cooperation to protect humanity against the crime of genocide or acts that might lead to such a crime. Therefore, any contracting parties, or the states, may ask the UN to take necessary steps against the crime of genocide or acts that could possibly lead to the crime. By doing so, the convention recognizes an international organization, the UN, as the primary responsible entity in protecting individuals under the threat of genocide or those whose were exposed to it. The competent organs of the UN focus on the crime of genocide or crimes against human rights and lives through their offices located throughout the world.

Onur M. Koprulu
John Handal
Rutgers University

See Also: Colonialism, Lingering Effects of; Conflict Resolution and Diversity; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Holocaust Survivors; Power, Race, Ethnicity and; Universal Declaration of Human Rights; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and.

Further Readings

Lemkin, Raphael. Axis Rule in Occupied Europe. Laws of Occupation—Analysis of Government—Proposal for Redress. New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1944.

UN General Assembly, Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. UN Resolution 260 A (III), UN Treaty Series, No.1021, vol. 78 (1951).

United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. “What Is Genocide? The Term Genocide.” http://www.ushmm.org/wlc/en/article.php?ModuleId=10007043 (Accessed October 2013).

United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child

The United Nations (UN) Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) is an internationally recognized agreement between nations that outlines entitlements and freedoms that children everywhere should hold and that all governments should respect. It is the highest authority in international law on children. Unanimously adopted by the UN General Assembly in 1989, the CRC is the most widely ratified human rights treaty in history, with 193 countries party to it. The United States stands with only two other nations (Somalia and South Sudan) in not yet ratifying the CRC. Articulating the entitlements and freedoms of children in universal terms has roots in the UN’s Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), adopted in the wake of World War II. Conceptions of children’s rights are linked to universal human rights, though they differ from ideas of adult rights in important ways. The UN’s Declaration of the Rights of the Child (1959) preceded the CRC of 1989. While the earlier documents emphasized children’s needs for protection, the CRC strives to balance standards outlining the needs of children that governments and parents are obliged to meet with those describing children’s rights to specific freedoms, such as the rights of participation and self-expression, offered in accordance with age and maturity.

The CRC has 54 articles and two optional Protocols. The first two articles define a child as every human being under the age 18 and prohibit discrimination of any sort against any child. Articles 3, 4 and 5 assert the standard of the best interests of the child in all actions concerning children, assign primary responsibility to families or legal guardians, and outline the roles of the states. Articles 4 through 41 describe the economic, social, political, cultural, and civil rights assigned to children. These articles include entitlements (to survival and development, name and nationality, health care, education, an adequate standard of living, parental care, rehabilitative care, and juvenile justice, among others); protections (from abuse, trafficking, sexual exploitation, economic exploitation, drug use, torture, capital punishment, and participation in armed conflict, among others); and freedoms (to express opinions, to acquire information, of association, of privacy, of conscience and religion, to play, and to participate in cultural life, among others). Specific articles address the rights of minority children, refugee children, adopted children, and children without families. Articles 42 through 54 address how the CRC is to be administered. These articles assign responsibility for carrying out the treaty to the states party to it. State parties report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child regarding their plans and progress toward full implementation. These articles also outline the ways that states can ratify with reservations, understandings, and declarations (RUD) that modify the agreement.

Though many of the provisions of the CRC are implemented in the law and practice of the United States, ratification of the CRC remains controversial in the United States. Under the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush, representatives of the United States played an active role in drafting the CRC. In 1995, the U.S. delegate to the UN signed the CRC on behalf of President Clinton and the United States, indicating the nation's intent to ratify. However, the convention has not been forwarded to the Senate for consideration due to a variety of political and procedural obstacles. Organizations including the Christian Coalition, the Family Research Council, the John Birch Society, and the Eagle Forum have led the opposition to ratification. In general, objections are based on beliefs that the CRC undermines the authority of parents in raising their children and concerns that ratifying the treaty will undermine U.S. sovereignty. In addition, the CRC defines positive economic rights for children, which many conservatives oppose.

On the other hand, a large number of human service organizations have united in support of the campaign for U.S. ratification of the CRC. Leaders of the National Association of Social Workers, the Child Welfare League of America, the Children's Defense Fund, the Council on Social Work Education, the American Red Cross, the National Education Association, and other nonprofits have urged that the CRC be placed before the U.S. Senate for ratification. Supporters argue that the United States should ratify the CRC in order to provide a national framework of goals and standards in relationship to the care of children; to draw attention to the persistence of poverty and hunger among young people; and to enhance U.S. standing as a global leader in human rights. Supporters also note that the United States has regarded treaties such as the CRC to be non-self-executing, meaning that these treaties are only executed through the legislative process. Therefore, supporters argue, the CRC does not represent a threat to national sovereignty.

Even without ratification, the CRC has impacted U.S. law and policy. In 2005, the Supreme Court abolished capital punishment for juveniles, influenced in part by a desire to end the nation's international isolation on the issue. (The CRC expressly prohibits capital punishment and life imprisonment without possibility of release for offences committed by persons below age 18.) In 2002, the United States ratified two optional protocols—on the sale of children, on child pornography and child prostitution, and on the involvement of children in armed conflict.

Lynn M. Nybell
Eastern Michigan University

See Also: Convention on the Rights of Persons With Disabilities; International Adoptions and Families; International Federation of Social Workers; Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Further Readings

Fass, P. "A Historical Context for the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child." Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, v.633 (2011).

Gardinier, M. and L. Spears, eds. "Convention on the Rights of the Child." Child Welfare, v.89/5.

Smolin, D. "Overcoming Religious Objections to the Convention on the Rights of the Child." Emory International Law Review, v.20 (2006).

United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF). Convention on the Rights of the Child. http://www.unicef.org/crc (Accessed December 2013).

United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples

The declaration on the rights of indigenous people refers to a nonbinding declaration that was adopted on September 13, 2007, in the United Nations (UN) Grand Assembly after 20 years of negotiation with indigenous peoples and national governments from all around the world. The UN declaration, which was adopted by a vote of 144 in favor, four votes against (Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the United States, in which indigenous people intensively inhabited), and 11 abstentions, mainly recognizes the distinct cultural rights of indigenous peoples. The specific purpose of the declaration was to strength the international collaboration on the remedy of problems that indigenous people were exposed to in the areas of human rights: education; health; housing; environment; law; territorial issues; economic, social, cultural, and religious rights; political rights; and self-determination.

Therefore, it can be argued that the declaration is the first UN treaty that has been negotiated with indigenous people whose human rights have been exploited for years as well as with nation-states, thus bringing the rights of indigenous people onto the agenda of the international community. During the last century, the rights of indigenous people have been disregarded. It is believed that the declaration is of importance for the benefit of more than 300 million indigenous people from 70 countries throughout the world.

The Historical Development of the Declaration

Until the 1970s, there was no specific attribution to international law regarding indigenous peoples' rights other than the International Labor Organization Convention. In order to ensure the coherence of international law about indigenous peoples' rights, some important matters, such as land rights, self-determination, and collective right, needed to be handled with a particular view. Thus, the emergence of the universal declaration could be seen as an important attempt to address the concerns of indigenous people. In this context, in 1971, a special reporter, Jose Martinez Cobo from Ecuador, was appointed by the UN Economic and Social Council to search patterns of discrimination against indigenous people around the globe.

Having considered Cobo's report containing issues related to human rights, the UN Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities created a Working Group on Indigenous Population (WGIP) in 1982, which can be considered as the first human rights mechanism focusing on indigenous people and a supplementary organ of the subcommission with dual responsibilities: (1) to review developments pertaining to the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous peoples and (2) to give special attention to the evolution of international standards concerning the rights of indigenous populations.

In 1985, with the leadership of Chairperson Erica Irene A. Daes, the working group started to develop a draft, taking into consideration the comments and suggestions of representatives of indigenous peoples and governments. The draft declaration, consisting of 19 preamble paragraphs and 45 articles, was extensive and overelaborate in comparison to ordinary international human rights documents. Each article in the draft declaration reflected historical and cultural demands of indigenous peoples, thereby pleasing them.

In 1993, the final text of the draft declaration was produced by the working group at its 11th session and sent to the subcommission. Then, the subcommission adopted the text in 1994 and submitted it to the commission on human rights for consideration. In order to examine and review the text, and provide a consensus on the draft declaration, the commission established an open-ended and intersessional working group, the Working Group on the Draft Declaration (WGDD). Even though government participation predominated in this new working group, special arrangements were made in order to ensure broader indigenous participation as observers. Over the years, the WGDD arranged several formal and informal meetings aiming to call for the adoption of the draft declaration. It was initially supposed that the draft declaration would be adopted by the UN General Assembly in the first period of 1994 to 2004. However, participants of the WGDD could not reconcile on several articles of the draft text. Though 12 years passed from its adoption by the subcommission, the working group agreed on only two out of 45 articles of the draft text. It was a clear signal that the text was still far from being ready to be fully adopted. One of the main reasons was that indigenous observers adopted a no-change strategy on the draft text until 2005 that slowed the progress of the WGDD. Because notable progress could not be made on the text, they eventually abandoned the no-change position. Thus, the negotiating process started to gain impetus.

After several changes by participants of the WGDD on the draft declaration during the period between 2004 and 2007, the final version of the declaration was eventually adopted on September 13, 2007, in the General Assembly. As mentioned, unlike four countries—the United States, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand—who voted against it, 144 states in the General Assembly voted in favor, and 11—Azerbaijan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Burundi, Colombia, Georgia, Kenya, Nigeria, Russia, Samoa, and Ukraine—were absent when it was on the agenda of the assembly.

During the negotiation process on the UN declaration recognizing the rights of indigenous peoples, there were three controversial issues—self-determination, collective rights, and territories and resources—that caused the suspension of this process in several ways.

The Right to Self-Determination

One of the most difficult issues concerning the development of the rights of indigenous peoples within the framework of international law has been related to the right to self-determination. During the negotiations, several states made objections and held serious reservations regarding the recognition of indigenous peoples' right to self-determination owing to the fact that indigenous participants stated that the right of self-determination was the heart and soul of the declaration. Finally, after a long-lasting debate, the Human Rights Council adopted Article 3 of the declaration and recognized that indigenous peoples should have the right to self-determination, which is also a recognized right for other peoples. Article 3 also recognizes and determines a political status for indigenous people and highlights economic, social, and cultural development of indigenous peoples. From the point of the declaration, self-determination means that indigenous peoples have the right to determine their relationship with the state and to be involved in setting up state structure and governance. In addition to that, indigenous people are entitled to maintain their own institutions, such as political, legal, economic, social, and cultural aspects. The UN declaration also addresses the right of remedy for indigenous peoples when they face violations of the right to self-determination.

Collective Rights

Another most contentious area during the negotiations of the declaration was restricted to collective rights. The collective rights of indigenous peoples are recognized in the UN declaration, which caused tension between the individual nature of Western human rights discourse and the rights of indigenous peoples. When relations between individual and collective rights were compared, collective rights, for some states, were evaluated as a part of the domestic legal system. The UN Human Right Council recognized the right of indigenous peoples to self-determination as collective rights. Indigenous populations supporting the idea that collective rights were already accepted in international law have referred to a number of international instruments. During discussions in the WGDD, the use of the term peoples has caused a lot of debate in negotiations. Finally, the secretariat solved the problem in the UN report by claiming that terms should be used tentatively in order to prevent misunderstandings.

Territories and Resources

The right to ownership of lands, territories, and resources has been a controversial issue during negotiations concerning Articles 25 through 30. The declaration emphasizes the importance of land, resources, and environment that have traditionally have owned by indigenous people. The land and resources in the declaration are related to the militarization of the lands; free, prior, and informed consent; and the principles of preservation of territories, protection, and restoration of the environment. The most controversial article in the WGDD related to Article 28, which recognizes the restitution right of the territories and resources that indigenous people have traditionally owned or occupied or used and that have been confiscated, taken, occupied, used, or damaged without free and fair compensation or prior and informed consent.

Within the framework of these articles, states, with the cooperation of the indigenous peoples affected, are obligated to establish a system that seeks legal recognition and protection of indigenous populations' right to own their land, territories, and resources, where the environment should be protected and hazardous materials should not be stored. In addition, Article 30 foresees an obligation of the states that military activities should not take place on indigenous peoples' lands or territories unless they freely agree.

To conclude, having considered the aforementioned discussions, it can be argued that some states expressed their concerns about the most controversial articles, and the WGDD finally compromised on these issues after long-lasting discussions and negotiations. However, it is important to identify whether these efforts were beneficial, after more than 20 years of negotiations, for a nonbinding instrument. As discussed in this entry, the declaration is worthy because it provides indigenous people with considerable status within the international human rights framework and international law and draws the attention of the international community to indigenous peoples' rights. The declaration is also noteworthy for its potential to stimulate the development of future instruments concerning the rights of indigenous peoples. In addition, one can argue that the declaration is the principal formal universal document regarding indigenous peoples' rights within international law. Finally, the UN declaration also demonstrates the need to establish more dialogue highlighting partnerships and mutual respect between the international community and indigenous peoples.

Irfan Çiftçi
Rutgers University
Ahmet Kaya
Independent Scholar

See Also: American Indian Movement; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; Rural Communities.

Further Readings

Davis, Megan. "Indigenous Struggles in Standard-Setting: The United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples." Melbourne Journal of International Law, v.9/2 (2008).

Gilbert, Jérémie. "Indigenous Rights in the Making: The United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples." International Journal on Minority and Group Rights, v.14 (2007).

United Nations General Assembly. "The UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples." http://www.un.org/esa/socdev/unpfii/documents/DRIPS_en.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

Wiessner, Siegfried. "Indigenous Sovereignty: A Reassessment in Light of the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples." Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law, v.41 (2008).

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), which was established in 1950, initially emerged as a response to the needs of displaced Europeans who suffered from the devastating effects of World War II. The scope of duties of the UNHCR and its competency have extended over the course of time with the emergence of the Hungarian Revolution in 1956, the decolonization of Africa in 1960, and intrastate conflicts in some African countries in subsequent years. The agency, being engaged with 33.9 million people, is currently active in 126 countries in 135 main locations, such as regional and branch offices as well as with 279 suboffices and field offices. The budget of the agency has increased from $300,000 in its first year to more than $3.59 billion in 2012.

Having considered the extensive responsibilities concentrating on diverse and fragile groups all around the world, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees is the main global organization that aims to meet human service needs of disadvantaged and vulnerable groups such as internally displaced people, refugees, returnees, stateless people, and asylum seekers whose rights are safeguarded by means of returning home voluntarily, integrating locally, or resettling in a safe third country.

As emphasized by the 1994 UN Human Development Report, human security should be prioritized, and it is a vital human need for all individuals. Freedom from want, freedom from fear, and rule of law principles have all contributed to the creation of a human security paradigm. According to this paradigm, no one is secure as long as someone is insecure anywhere. The interests of humanity have become the focus, and human security becomes a comprehensive condition in which individual citizens live in freedom, peace, and safety.

There are currently 60 fragile countries (failed states) where the number of refugees, economic structure, and demographic and public service conditions are below standard. For example, at the time of the conflict in 1994, 50,000 people fled from Rwanda into eastern Zaire. Bangladesh and Cameron saw also some of the biggest relative downturns because of the need to import high-priced food and other commodities. Countries suffering from a rapid rate of population growth coupled with a lack of developmental opportunities as well as adverse conditions pose a threat, thus forcing the movement of refugees, asylum seekers, and economic migrants to the countries where life standards are at higher levels.

Global Refugee Flows and Limitations of Nation-States

The political instability and economic deficiencies of nation-states lead to the emergence of refugee crises and influxes of asylum seekers. For example, there are more refugees from fragile countries than stable states due to poor political and economic environments. The reason lies in the fact that people from fragile countries migrate to anywhere in order to gain refugee status to survive. In this sense, it can be argued that refugees or asylum seekers are considered as a forced migration, and there are more refugees from failed states than stable states. According to UN figures of 2008, there are currently 15.2 million refugees worldwide. Of all the states, Afghanistan, Somalia, and Iraq are the main countries of origin of refugees, while the United States, France, and Canada are hosting most refugees in the world.

One of the distinguishing features of refugee problems is that they do not respect national boundaries. Therefore, they cannot be solved by individual efforts of nation-states, thereby necessitating international solutions. The states are no longer the only actors that deal with asylum, there are also several international institutions acting on the problems of refugees and asylum seekers.

Good governance of refugee flows lies in understanding the root causes of immigration. Therefore, nation-states, while dealing with refugee crises, should cooperate with international institutions on issues related to managing and controlling forced migrations.

Global refugee crises have gone through a very rapid process where states, governmental, and nongovernmental organizations, as well as international organizations, have engaged in greater interactions with each other. Not only states and civic advocacy groups but also intergovernmental organizations like the UN are trying to shape the system to manage global human movements and global refugee crises.

The UN's Role on the Development of Global Asylum Policy

International institutions are considered to be major actors that play important roles in the creation, development, and operation of international regimes. They act not only in the global arena but also regionally. The main purpose of this type of institution is to address problems of policy areas such as immigration, asylum, rapid population growth, and global warming and climate change and to find solutions to these problems all around the world.

The UN and its family organizations, the UNHCR, High-Level Dialogue for Migration, Global Commission on Migration, International Labor Organization, and International Organization for Migration, are among the international institutions acting on issues related to asylum and migration. Nation-states must inevitably get used to global governance and its requirements if they seek to manage refugee flows efficiently.

As one of the prominent global governance institutions, the emergence of the UNHCR will contribute to bringing asylum issues to international policy agendas. The UNHCR is virtually the sole authority capable of carrying out and managing asylum procedures, acting on the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and its supplementary protocol dated 1967.

International asylum regime cannot be implemented on a global scale solely by efforts of nation-states. This makes the UNHCR still important due to its endeavors in setting rules and standards with regard to the status of refugees. There is no other international organization that could replace the UNHCR and take on its vital role. Despite all criticism regarding the UNHCR and its role in global asylum policy, there is no alternative to deal with these issues on a global scale.

Conclusion

In order to develop a global approach toward refugees and asylum seekers, the UN established a specific dedicated unit, the UNHCR, focusing on problems of refugees and asylum seekers. The UNCHR's efforts in order to form an international regime regarding refugees and asylum seekers have produced concrete results. If the UNHCR wants to stop the influx of refugees, there is a need to develop measures to maintain sustainability in the countries (failed states) that produce refugees. In this respect, the sustainable development of those countries dealing with refugee crises will also establish basic standards for them, such as gross domestic product (GDP) and literacy and health standards, which contribute to the emergence of Human Development Index (HDI) rates. In order to meet the basic human needs of asylum seekers and refugees, the main focus of the UNHCR should concentrate on increasing the HDI and GDP rates in those countries suffering from unstable political and economic environments and infrastructures. The global community needs to work together to find solutions with regard to the human service needs of refugees and asylum seekers. In this respect, existing global structures like the UNHCR should be efficient and effective to set the international asylum agenda in accordance with global requirements and international norms, highlighting the importance of meeting human service needs of refugees and asylum seekers.

Ahmet Kaya
Independent Scholar
Irfan Çiftçi
Rutgers University

See Also: Office of Refugee Resettlement; Refugee Assistance; United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.

Further Readings

Fell, Mike. "Is Human Security Our Main Concern in the 21st Century?" Journal of Security Sector Management, v.4/3 (2006).

Keeley, Brian. International Migration the Human Face of Globalization. Geneva, Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, 2009.

Osler Hampson, Fen, et al. Madness in the Multitude: Human Security and World Disorder. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2002.

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. http://www.unhcr.org/pages/49c3646c80.html (Accessed January 2014).

United States, Demographics of

Demographics refers to a set of statistical data that describes the population of any country. In particular, the United States Census Bureau, since its creation in 1790 until 2010, has registered its population every 10 years. The bureau surveys changes and trends of that population based on age, race, gender, ethnicity, disability status, employment, educational level, and other demographic categories or identifiers. It is critical to note that the United States' population has increased dramatically over the past two centuries and continues to grow. According to the 2010 U.S. Census, the total population of the United States is 308.7 million. They live, by and large, in urban areas, but, in smaller numbers, others reside in rural areas as well. The national population also has been studied systematically by diverse scholars such as demographers, political scientists, sociologists, and educators, among others. The makeup of the United States population is diverse, encompassing various ethnicities, racial groups, cultures, and linguistic groups.

Population Change and Growth

The first census was conducted in 1790. In that year, the total population of the United States was 3,929,625. In the early years of the republic, the population growth rates were higher, as noted from 1790 to 1810, a period during which the population increased by more than 3 percent per annum. The same phenomenon was also documented between the 1840s and 1850s. That rapid population growth, from 1840 to 1850, was a result of the influx of immigrants, primarily from western Europe. Among them were Germans, Irish, and other ethnicities who sought opportunities then available in North America. For them, the Western Hemisphere offered opportunities in business, access to cheap land, farming, and better employment. Additionally, others came to this country to escape religious prejudice and intolerance in Europe. They sought the religious freedom available in America. Still others, the Irish in particular, fled their homeland to avoid the great potato famine and the political upheaval caused by the conflicts between Ireland's Protestants and Catholics.

It is important to understand other factors contributing to this surge in migration after 1840. For example, in 1850, the population increase in the United States was documented to have resulted from an expanded number of foreign born by nearly 10 percent (of which more than 90 percent were from Europe). This knowledge emerged from the census of 1850, which for the first time, asked all persons about their respective places of birth. Between 1890 and 1910, during an immigration boom, the population increased again with up to 15 percent of men, women, and children residing in the United States foreign-born. The share of the white population in these numbers increased steadily between 1790 and 1930 (from 80.7 percent to 89.8 percent) largely as a result of the substantial net immigration of white Europeans through 1920.

After World War I, and because of the restrictions placed on immigration (e.g., quotas on national origin and other excluding selection criteria), there was a severe reduction in immigration. Furthermore, the Great Depression of the 1930s and related economic challenges in the United States contributed significantly to the further decline in migration from abroad and to the nation's overall fertility rate. However, the situation changed in the aftermath of the World War II. A rising rate in population growth and new immigrants were seen particularly in the 1940s and 1950s. Later, due to changes in immigration policies, regulations, and laws, there was a surge in net immigration, with 37 to 47 percent population growth by the 1970s on through the 1990s.

Immigrants from Latin America, Asia, the Caribbean, and Africa to America contributed again to the rise of foreign-born Americans by more than 10 percent in 2000 census. Until the 1970s, the foreign-born population declined and was only 4.7 percent of the nation's total population. Profoundly dramatic, however, was the rising share of other ethnic groups in the population in the late 20th century. Specifically, from less than 1 percent of the population in 1960, this share rose to 12.6 percent in the 2000 census. This increase had its origins mostly in the heavy immigration of east and south Asians as well as expanding American Indian populations.

The 2010 census revealed compelling evidence that deals with dramatic changes both racially and ethnically in the United States from 2000 to 2010. During that 10 years, the Asian American population expanded by more than 43 percent, African Americans grew by more than 12 percent, and like Asian Americans, Hispanics expanded by 43 percent. Hispanics alone provided more than half of the country's growth during those 10 years. The white, non-Hispanic population in the United States, as a majority, grew by less than 2 percent, indicating that this white population is in decline. On the other hand, the composition of multiethnic groups throughout society is not only expanding but is also undergoing profound social, cultural, economic, and political changes.

It is likely that, based on demographic projections in the years to come, by 2050, according to the Pew Research Center, there will be even greater demographic change in the United States. Based on projections and demographic trends, non-Hispanic whites will cease to be the majority of this nation's population, thereby confirming the transformation of the United States into a demographically pluralistic nation with a new majority.

The Black Population of the United States

When the first census was conducted in 1790, more than 90 percent of all blacks lived in the South, with only 40 percent of whites residing there. It is critical to note that slavery's end did not immediately end racial and other divisions. In addition, at the beginning of the republic, about four-fifths of the population was white and one-fifth was black. People of African descent, usually identified as blacks, were enslaved and lived in the south. In the 1820 census, the first to distinguish slaves from free blacks, the free black population was 13 percent of the total black population. Later, due to social movements, political developments, and other factors, blacks moved to states across the United States, thus there were no longer any black majority states as compared to 1900s America. In the aftermath of the World War II, particularly in the 1960s, blacks returned to the south from the north and west.

In 2010, the U.S. Census offered the option for respondents to answer the question of race based on self-identification. They also had the opportunity to self-identify with one, or more than one, race. This means they could describe as black alone or in combination with another race. The 2010 census provided a portrait of the black population in the United States that advanced our understanding of the nation's transforming and expanding ethnic and racial diversity. It is known that both the black-alone population and the black-alone or in combination population grew from 12 percent in 2000 to 15 percent in 2010, and the black-in-combination population experienced growth by 17 percent, the highest.

The 2010 U.S. Census showed the geographic distribution of the black population across the United States. Here, the black population is mainly concentrated in the south, and the number has increased from 2000 to 2010. The data suggest that the black population that resided in the north and west tended to be more concentrated in metro areas. Based on the data, blacks are more likely to live in a larger city in contrast to the non-Hispanic and white populations.

Hispanic Population of the United States

According to the 2010 U.S. Census, the total population of Hispanics, Latinos and Latinas is 50.5 million, which accounts for 16 percent of the total 308.7 million people residing in the United States. It is important to understand that those who are identified as Hispanic, Latino, or Latina refers to a person of South and Central American, Mexican, Puerto Rican, Cuban, and Spanish origin or culture regardless of race. Indeed, they are placed in the ethnicity category, not race, on the U.S. census. Based on 2010 U.S. Census data, people of Mexican origin are the largest group, comprising 63 percent of the total Hispanic population in the United States. This is an increase from the 2000 census, up to 58 percent. The second-largest group, Puerto Ricans, declined from 10 percent in 2000 to 9 percent in the 2010 census. The Cuban population was approximately 4 percent in both the 2000 and 2010 census.

A sign in Miami welcomes visitors to Little Havana. Hispanics, Latinos, and Latinas make up 16 percent of the U.S. population, most live in California, Texas, and Florida.

The states with the most Hispanics are California, Texas, and Florida; they account for more than half of the total population of the nation's Hispanics. For instance, 28 percent (14.0 million) reside in California and 19 percent (9.5 million) reside in Texas. In addition, more than three-quarters of the Cuban population (77 percent) reside in the South, mainly in Florida. Based on the 2010 census, 41 percent of Hispanics live in the west and 36 percent live in the south. The northeast and Midwest accounted for 14 percent and 9 percent, respectively, of the Hispanic population. The Hispanic population grew in every region between 2000 and 2010, and most significantly in the south and Midwest.

Demographics and Education, Communities, Organizations, and Government

The census in the United States is taken every 10 years as mandated by the U.S. Constitution. The collected data is critical for policy makers, educators, and state and federal officials to address educational challenges regarding the student academic achievement gap and other success measures. Because the national statistics on proficiency levels in various subjects became available by race and age, it became clear that there were differences in children's academic achievement by ethnicity and race. These differences exist across all age groups. In order to create educational opportunities for all students and improve their academic success, various initiatives and programs have been implemented at federal and state level. Yet, school reform, the academic achievement gap, and other academic performance issues remain a challenge for educators, policy makers, and federal officials alike.

Demographics are also critical for communities and organizations. Both public and private organization use various demographic identifiers to find areas where groups may need special services and to plan and implement education, housing, health, and other programs that address these needs. For example, a school system might use this information to design cultural activities that reflect the diversity in their community. In addition, census information helps identify areas where residents might need services of particular importance to certain racial groups, such as screening for hypertension or diabetes, and other community medical and business needs.

Finally, U.S. data are usually used to determine the congressional seats for each state. They are essential in allocating electoral votes and redistricting and have proven to be valuable for other legislative and judicial purposes. In addition, different federal and state programs, initiatives that are aimed at helping particular segments of population, use U.S. Census data.

Blerim Shala
Nova Southeastern University

See Also: Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of; Naturalized Citizens; Racial and Ethnic Categories, U.S. Census; U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services; U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Further Readings

Cater, Susan B., Scott. S. Gardner, Michael R. Haines, Alan L. Olmstead, Richard Sutch, Gavin Wright, eds. Historical Statistics of the United States: Earliest Times to the Present, Vol. 1. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

Cortes, Carlos E. "Introduction." In Multicultural America: A Multimedia Encyclopedia. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2013.

Ennis, Sharon R., Merarys-Rios Vargas, and Nora G. Albert. "The Hispanic Population: 2010 Census Briefs." U.S. Census Bureau. http://www.census.gov/briefs/2010 (Accessed November 2013).

Klein, Herbert. S. A Population History of the United States. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2012.

Rastogi, Sonya, Tallese Johnson, D. Hoeffel, M. Elizabeth and Malchom P. Drewery. "The Black Population: 2010 Census Briefs." http://www.census.gov/briefs/2010 (Accessed November 2013).

Shi, Leiyu and Gregory D. Stevens. Vulnerable Populations in the United States. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2010.

U.S. Census Bureau. "2010 Population." http://www.census.gov/2010 pop/index (Accessed October 2013).

Universal Access/ Universal Design

Universal access or universal design (UD) is a process for creating products and environments so that people with widely varying abilities can use them. Formerly known as Design for All or Accessible Design, UD recognizes that all people have changing abilities throughout their lives. For example, people might injure themselves or lose mental or physical function through disease or aging. When designing buildings, products, and software, for instance, UD guides the designer to create accessibility for as many people of as many abilities as possible. UD principles also are used for the design and delivery of programs and services.

Origins of Universal Design

The concept of UD developed in part because of a growing population of senior citizens and the mainstreaming of people with disabilities. As a result of the civil rights movement, legislation like the Architectural Barriers Act of 1968 mandated that builders had to remove barriers in order to allow all people access to public buildings. During the 1970s, as architects started building ramps and installing other accessible features (e.g., lever handle doorknobs, wider doors and hallways, and larger bathroom stalls), they realized that these modifications helped people with and without disabilities and that, economically, it was more beneficial to include them in new designs rather than add them later.

Ron Mace at North Carolina State University coined the term universal design. At age 9, Mace contracted polio and used a wheelchair. After getting a degree in architecture, Mace decided to focus on building homes that everyone could get into, regardless of their ability. Eventually, others adopted Mace's view, and architects, engineers, product designers, and various other researchers developed a set of principles in order to ensure buildings and products were made in such a way to ensure a wide variety of people could use them.

Seven Principles of Universal Design

Equitable use. The design must be able to be used by a diverse population. For example, automatic doors allow people who use wheelchairs easy access to buildings and rooms, but they are also helpful to parents pushing strollers, people with their hands full and anyone else who goes through them.

Flexibility in use. The design accommodates varying abilities and preferences. Many elevator buttons are low so people in wheelchairs can use them, and they are marked with Braille, so people with visual impairments can read the labels next to the buttons. Some elevators announce the floors when the doors open. These options allow people with a range of abilities to ride on elevators.

Simple and intuitive use. The product or design must be easy to understand, regardless of the user's language level or ability to concentrate, and it should be intuitive to use. A Web site designed with clear text headings or universally recognized symbols, the ability to change text size, and content written on a lower reading level are good examples. Adjustable text size allows people with low vision to read more easily and people with fine motor impairments to click on links more easily.

Perceptible information. Information is conveyed so that users of all abilities can access and understand it. For instance, cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) directions in public settings are written in language that is easy to understand and have clear pictures to enhance understanding. Trains and buses announce stops audibly as well as visually.

Tolerance for error. The design must minimize the chance for a hazard to occur. Computer software is a good example. Most programs have an undo option to correct mistakes, and many have autocorrect built in for commonly misspelled words and formatting options. Others have an auto-save function, so users don't lose their work if the program closes unexpectedly.

Low physical effort. It must be easy to use without much physical effort in any position (e.g., standing or sitting) and should not require repetitive actions. Lever doorknobs and faucets fit this principal, as do moving walkways and escalators.

Size and space for approach and use. The design must accommodate differing body size, posture, and mobility. It must provide sufficient space for users with adaptive equipment or a personal assistant, display instructions that are visible to people sitting and standing, and be easy to approach. A front-loading washing machine and wide entrance gates in sports arenas are good examples.

UD practices have been adopted for a wide variety of design purposes, including smart homes, workplace efficiency, training practices and materials, monetary currency, and communication systems

Universal Design in Homes

By law, most buildings in the public and private sector need to be accessible, but this is not true of private residences. Developed by Eleanor Smith, visitability is a collaborative effort by the Center for Inclusive Design and Environmental Access and Concrete Change, which uses UD to make all new homes they build accessible. The philosophy of visitability is that people of all abilities should be able to get in and out of every home and have access to everything in the home. To accomplish this goal, houses are visitable if they have three qualities: at least one accessible entrance, doors that are 32 inches wide, and a wheelchair-accessible bathroom on the main floor. Visitability perceives that aesthetics are as important as accessibility, so houses are appealing as well as accessible, making them more marketable.

Universal Design in Education

Although UD is applied to the design of products and places, it also is applicable to the design and delivery of programs and services. As a means to differentiate curriculum in better serving children with disabilities, the Center for Applied Special Technology created Universal Design for Learning (UDL) in 1984. UDL recognizes that all children learn in different ways and learn better if lessons are designed to suite their learning strengths.

The old paradigm of learning stated that each student learned the same way using the same materials. If students were unable to learn the same way as their peers, they were considered less capable or intelligent or labeled as having a disability. Research has shown that all individuals have learning differences, strengths, and weaknesses. With UDL, lessons are adapted to the student rather than students having to adapt to a single form of instruction to become unsuccessful. There are three principles of UDL: representation, actions and expression, and engagement.

Representation

Representation is about what and how students are presented with information. Students come from different backgrounds. Some students may have disabilities, while others have cultural differences, and still others may be learning the language while learning the subject matter. Educators need to take these and other differences into account and plan lessons that use multiple forms of representation, such as written words, images and symbols, and audio presentations. For example, a teacher doing an addition lesson might use colored sticks as well as symbols to represent adding.

Action and Expression

The second principle is aimed at helping students express themselves. Educators often expect students to effectively express themselves or demonstrate skill competence through writing or speech. These may not be the most successful ways, for instance, for students with learning disabilities or language barriers. Rather, a student with a disability may more effectively demonstrate understanding or achievement through art, music, videos, PowerPoint, or Web 2.0 applications. Educators should provide options for physical action, expression and communication, and executive functions to account for the different ways students express themselves. Providing an adapted keyboard to a student with a physical disability or giving more instruction on goal setting to a student with an executive function disorder are two examples.

Engagement

Engagement refers to why and how students learn. Cultural background, personal preference, content, and many other factors affect how students learn and what sparks their interest. Some like to work with peers, while others prefer to work alone. A structured classroom with strict rules may help one student flourish, whereas another student may need an extremely flexible atmosphere for success. In order to cultivate this principle, educators must provide options to attract student interest, sustain effort and persistence, and learn self-regulation. Engaging practices may include giving students choices, providing a safe learning environment, and using socially or culturally relevant information and sources.

Conclusion

UD is used to make products, environments, programs, and services accessible for people of widely varying abilities, especially people with disabilities. UDL is gaining acceptance as a tool for educators to prepare and present lessons, and UD is being used by the Global Universal Design Commission to develop voluntary commercial building design standards.

Kate Battoe
William N. Myhill
Syracuse University

See Also: Accommodation; Americans With Disabilities Act; Educational Services.

Further Readings

Hall, Tracey E., Anne Meyer, and David H. Rosa, eds. Universal Design for Learners in the Classroom. New York: The Guilford Press, 2012.

National Center for Universal Design for Learning. "About UDL." http://www.udlcenter.org/ (Accessed August 2013).

The RL Mace Universal Design Institute. "A Brief History of Universal Design." http://udinstitute.org/history.php (Accessed August 2013).

Universal Design. "What Is Universal Design?" http://www.universaldesign.com (Accessed August 2013).
Visitability. "Housing That Builds in Freedom." http://www.visitability.org (Accessed August 2013).

Universal Declaration of Human Rights

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) is one of the milestones in history of humankind endeavoring to protect the rights of the individual throughout the globe. Although human rights are violated in many parts of the world, the declaration stands apart from any other similar documents pertaining to human rights issues. Of course, the declaration was not the first effort toward protecting human rights. In earlier times, there was the Hammurabi Code and Justinian Codes. England promulgated human liberties in Magna Carta (1215), habeas corpus (1674) and the Bill of Rights (1689). The Bill of Rights of the U.S. Constitution (1776) heavily influenced the declaration. Likewise, the Rights of Man and of the Citizen (1789) during the French Revolution inspired the declaration. The Napoleonic Code (1804) had enshrined unalienable rights of humankind.

The codification of human rights became an important issue after the Holocaust and devastation during the World War II. The American President Franklin D. Roosevelt's four freedoms, freedom of speech and belief, as well as freedom from fear and want, also became guiding principles behind the declaration. The Charter of the United Nations, signed on June 26, 1945, put the promotion of human rights as one of the purposes of the international body. It asked the member states to respect human rights and fundamental freedom for all. Article 68 of the charter mentioned the Commission on Human Rights by name to be set up by the Economic and Social Council.

The chairperson of the interim nine-member commission (April 1946) was Franklin D. Roosevelt. Rene Cassin of France and K. C. Neyogi from India were vice chairperson and rapporteur, respectively. Afterward, a new 18-member Commission of Human Rights was established. The three influential members were P. C. Chang (China), Rene Cassin (France, and who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1968), and Charles H. Malik of Lebanon. The latter, who became the president of the Economic and Social Council (1948), played a major role in deliberations. The eight-member drafting committee prepared a draft International Declaration of Human Rights by June 1948.There was much debate over various issues in the climate of the Cold War.

The Soviet Union, along with Belorussia, Ukraine, and Yugoslavia, emphasized the duty of the individual to the state and the priority of economic as well as social rights over individual rights. In spite of ideological differences, the General Assembly of the United Nations meeting at Palais de Chaillot in Paris adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on December 10, 1948, proclaiming it as "a common standard of achievements for all peoples of all nations." Some 48 countries supported it, and eight countries (Saudi Arabia, South Africa and the Soviet bloc) were absent from the voting. There was not a single dissenting vote. During preliminary voting of each article by the General Assembly, 23 out of 30 articles witnessed no abstentions. Encompassing a broad spectrum of political, economic, social, and cultural rights, the declaration consisted of a preamble and 30 articles. The document was translated into 407 languages and proclaimed that all human beings were born with "equal and inalienable rights and fundamental freedoms."

The eight-paragraph preamble mentioned that the foundation of freedom, justice, and peace in the whole world was to be equal rights of all members belonging to what it called the human family. The highest aspiration of common people was to enjoy liberty of speech and belief along with freedom from fear as well as want. The preamble also proclaimed development of friendly relations among the countries. The member states were asked to keep the rights and freedoms of the declaration secure. Article 1 proclaimed the noble thought that all humans were born free and equal in dignity and rights. The next article stated that every individual is entitled to the rights and freedoms expressed in the declaration without any discrimination on the grounds of race, color, sex, language, religion, or nationality. Article 3, one of the core articles of the declaration, affirmed rights to life, liberty, and security of person. Slavery and the slave trade were banned by Article 4. The following article prohibits inhuman treatment and punishment. Articles 6 through 12 set forth basic legal rights of human beings such as equality before the law, no arbitrary arrests, the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty, the right to noninterference with privacy, including correspondence and family. The right to freedom of movement, residence inside the boundaries of a state, and asylum in another country from persecution were provisions of Articles 13 to 15. The declarations embodied the importance of family in society and the right to marriage in Article 16. Rights to property, freedom of thought, peaceful assembly, and equal opportunity in public services were mentioned in Articles 16 to 21.

The next five articles embodied various social and economic rights such as the right to social security, employment, equal pay for equal work, an adequate standard of living, education, and special care for mothers as well as children. Article 28 recognized the need for social and international order so that rights mentioned in the declaration were achieved. The next describes the duties of everyone to community. The last article restricts a person or state for acting in a way to destroy the rights and freedoms enshrined in the declaration.

Although the declaration was not legally binding on the member states, its moral implication was noteworthy. It aimed to protect human dignity and touched many spheres of an individual's life. There were expressions of human rights much earlier, but they were restricted to particular countries, be it Magna Carta or Bill of Rights in the U.S. Constitution. For the first time in human history, a universal declaration came into being. It was to the credit of declaration that the moral character of the declaration was buttressed by series of international human rights laws passed by many states. One could argue that the declaration had been invoked by countries till today, and this made it somewhat binding. A normative foundation of world politics was laid down with details of various human rights. The declaration became a frame of reference for subsequent human rights covenants, treaties, various nongovernmental organizations, human rights activists, and even countries with axes to grind with other nations on the pretext of violating human rights. Whether it was the demise of Soviet satellite states in the 1990s, racial discrimination, persecution by a dictatorial regime, or violence against ethnic minorities, the universal declaration was referred into. The declaration was followed by legally binding International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which came into force in January 1976. It codified the ideas expressed in the declaration. It, along with the two covenants, was referred to as the International Bill of Rights. One of the criticisms leveled against the declaration was that it was based on the values of the West, and its ideas were derived from documents of Western governments.

However, the members of the human rights commission were not only from the Western world. In the deliberations, Chang from China and Malik had played important roles. A number of third-world countries criticized the emphasis on political and civil rights. The Soviet delegate said that it was a conspiracy against communism. Although Pakistan, a Muslim majority state, signed the declaration, Saudi Arabia abstained, mentioning that it was against Islamic laws. For uplifting the ideals of the declaration, the member states as well as peoples from all over the world have to take strong measures against human rights abuses. Only then will the purpose of the declaration be realized.

Patit Paban Mishra
Sambalpur University

See Also: Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Office for Civil Rights; Social and Economic Justice.

Further Readings

Darraj, Susan Muaddi. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights. New York: Chelsea House Publishers, 2010.

Diller, Janelle M. Securing Dignity and Freedom Through Human Rights: Article 22 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Leiden, Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 2012.

Donnelly, Jack. Universal Human Rights in Theory and Practice. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1989.

European Workshop on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. New York: United Nations, 1989.

Glendon, Mary Ann. A World Made New: Eleanor Roosevelt and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. New York: Random House, 2001.

Henkin, Louis. "The Universal Declaration and the U.S. Constitution." Political Science and Politics, v.31 (1998).

Maddex, Robert L. International Encyclopedia of Human Rights: Freedoms, Abuses, and Remedies. Washington, DC: CQ Press, 2000.
Malik, Habib C. The Challenge of Human Rights. Oxford, UK: Charels Malik Foundation, 2000.
Morsink, Johannes. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights: Origin, Drafting, and Intent. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
Nickel, James W. Making Sense of Human Rights: Philosophical Reflections on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
Williams, Paul. The International Bill of Human Rights. Glen Ellen, CA: Entwhistle Books, 1981.

Urban Communities and Human Services

Governments and organizations delivering human services in urban areas face many challenges. This entry proposes that human service organizations serve their urban constituents better when they understand that each individual community has its own particular mix of social, economic, and cultural attributes that define its problems and their potential solutions, and paramount among these attributes are types and degrees of leadership, social cohesion, and most importantly, strategic partnerships. Consequently, interventions must take community differences into account and provide specific rather than generic solutions.

This entry suggests important relationships among community types and intervention strategies in order to suggest partnerships for success. For successful implementation of human services in urban areas, only partnerships can achieve a high level of synergy and participant ownership. Human services providers in urban areas have increasingly engaged stakeholders in partnerships. Consequently, the urban community has become more invested in solutions and motivated to achieve together tangible and intangible, sustainable solutions that are in the best interests of the urban communities. A multifaceted, integrated approach to building relationships among urban communities and human services providers in all phases of human services will result in more effective, sustainable interventions.

Disparity in income and opportunity among Americans is increasing. Many urban American neighborhoods are commonly referred to as communities at risk because this is where disparity manifests itself in a multitude of social issues that include illegal drug distribution and use, violence and crime, inadequate education, and social dislocation. Earlier, government tackled such challenges generically, imposing one-size-fits-all solutions: policies and programs. However, failure to recognize the unique character of a community may result in a mismatch between the human services provided and the needs of the at-risk population, and generic policies cannot be modified to fit local human service situations. Moreover, inadequate communication often has exacerbated relations between local political leaders and urban communities at risk.

Understanding Urban Communities

A community is any group of individuals sharing common values or interests and may inhabit a common area. Community describes social units with continuous communication and interaction as well as similar needs and obligations: A community is composed of neighbors. Urban communities are a cluster of social units or groups of individuals who reside in an area of high population and a high level of residential to commercial or industrial ratio.

An urban area contains multicultural communities, high population density, and a high ratio of residential to commercial or industrial areas. Urban implies cities. Urban communities present a paradox. They are motors of growth in an increasingly global economy, concentrating wealth, knowledge, and technical capacity, and at the same time, many of the worst problems facing society today are concentrated in urban areas, including congestion, crime, intolerance and racism, economic and social exclusion, degradation of the natural and built environment, and the loss of local identity. Consequently, they also must provide public services such as education, health care, communication, and transportation as discussed in the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services Administration for Children and Families; Administration on Children, Youth, and Families; Children's Bureau; and Office on Child Abuse and Neglect combined report.

Human services are community-wide actions planned to support or assist humans, usually in the confines of a system directly responsible for such assistance. According to Dr. Alan Tomkins, these actions and systems can be governmental or nongovernmental institutions, public as well as private. The field of human services maintains a commitment to improving the overall quality of life of the populations to be served; it is broad and includes interdisciplinary knowledge, a focus on prevention, as well as remediation of problems. As such, human services promote improved service delivery systems by addressing the quality of direct services and by seeking to improve accessibility, accountability, and coordination among professionals and agencies in service delivery through partnerships. The provision of human services is an investment in the current and future health of urban communities.

Approaches for Understanding Urban Communities and Human Services

The interweaving of the urban community with human services, and the many paths and connections among its people and institutions, creates a unique, complex social fabric that is an urban community. Three theoretical approaches contribute to the understanding of urban communities: (1) sustainable development, (2) civil society and social capital, and (3) organizational development and management theory. Each theoretical approach is supported by research and a body of literature that highlights different aspects of the relationships among communities and human services.

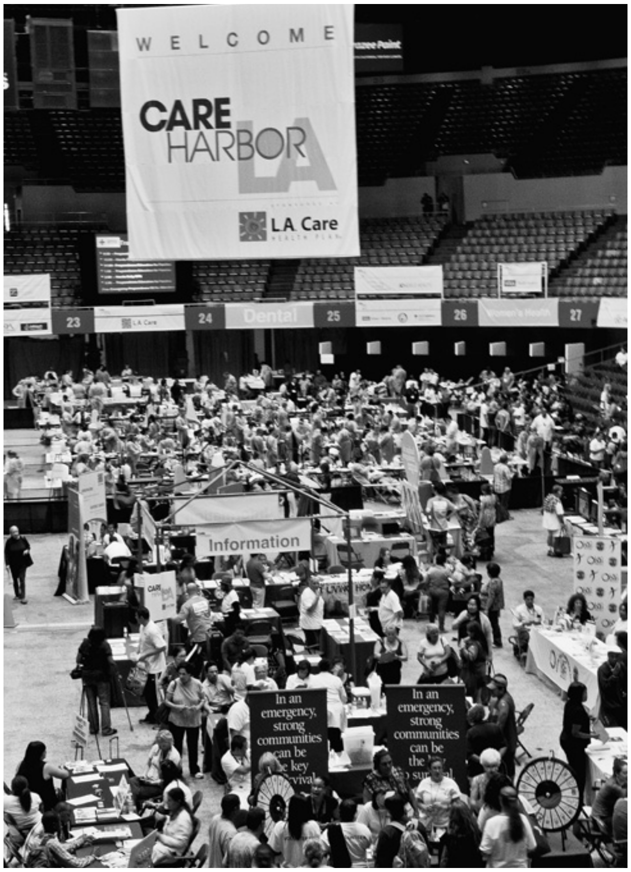
Sustainable development theory (research and literature) illustrates the inherent tensions and trade-offs that are associated with investment versus consumption of physical and human resources. Civil society and social capital theory provides insights into the dynamics of building trust among individuals and institutions leading to citizen action and emphasizes the relational aspects of urban community life. These theories hold that participation in formal and informal partnerships builds trust in individuals and institutions and forms habits of interaction. Organizational development and management theory address the internal versus external pressures and trade-offs that are frequently encountered in designing and implementing a capacity-building strategy. The nexus of these three intersecting theories (research and literature) provides an important approach for capacity building community and human services and, at the same time, frames important accumulations of human experience and knowledge; this is an example of social capital according to Roz Lasker and Elisa Weiss.

Promoting Community Participation in Human Services

Increasingly, public- and private-sector organizations involved in human services have been creating partnerships with community stakeholders. The rationale for this interest in community partnerships is compelling. Janet V. Denhardt and Kelly B. Campbell report that, from a philosophical perspective, people living in democratic societies have a right to a direct and meaningful voice about issues and services that affect them. At a practical level, many local problems have not responded to top-down, single-solution programs, while a growing number of people are involved in improving community health and the delivery of human services that go beyond the capability, resources, and authority of any single organization or sector, reports Michael Homan.

The role of community stakeholders may limit or enhance the effectiveness and sustainability of partnerships. A growing body of literature on partnerships has emphasized the importance of involving people who understand the needs, assets, priorities, and dynamics of the urban community, according to Michael Homan. Yet, little research has focused on the process of partnership building and what is needed in order to sustain community involvement and partnerships.

An understanding of the synergy of partnerships can help leaders and managers of partnerships appreciate and optimize the roles of community stakeholders. Synergy is the breakthroughs in thinking and action that are produced when a collaborative process successfully combines the complementary knowledge, skills, and resources of a group of participants. Synergy is the advantage that partnerships gain by involving diverse people and organizations in the community. Of most importance, synergy is the mechanism that explains how broad community participation strengthens the ability of partnerships to identify, understand, and solve complex problems, according to Lasker and Allegrante.



Doctors, volunteers and uninsured citizens in the dental care and information section of a free clinic provided by Care Harbor LA. Urban communities must provide public services such as education, health care, communication, and transportation.

Community Participation

Synergy is a key indicator of a successful partnership process because it reflects the extent to which a partnership can accomplish more than any of its individual participants and become a whole that is greater than the sum of its parts. When a partnership achieves a high level of synergy, the group as a whole has an advantage over its individual participants in solving complex problems, is able to think in new and better ways about the problems it is trying to address, takes more comprehensive actions to address those problems, and develops stronger and more supportive relationships with the greater community. The potential of partnerships to create synergy explains their unique value in addressing complex problems such as those related to urban community health. Problems like inadequate access to care, substance abuse, obesity, environmental hazards, and poverty go beyond the capacity of any single person, organization, or sector to solve. These problems are influenced by a variety of social, economic, environmental, and biological determinants, many of which are interrelated, affect diverse populations, and occur in many different kinds of local contexts. Only by combining the knowledge, skills, and resources of a broad array of people and organizations can communities understand the underlying nature of such problems or develop effective and locally feasible solutions to address them, reports Lisa O'Donnell.

Although partnerships must create synergy in order to realize their full potential in solving complex problems, most partnerships are far from realizing this potential. At a practical level, the capacity of partnerships to create synergy appears to be related to three factors: (1) who is involved in the partnership, (2) how they are involved, and (3) how well the leadership and management of the partnership support the interaction of the partners. A partnership that promotes ongoing discourse among people who have different kinds of knowledge is one that, as a whole, may overcome individual limitations.

Who Is Involved in the Partnership

The people and organizations involved in a partnership are the building blocks of synergy. They bring different kinds of knowledge, skills, and resources to a partnership, and partnerships with a broad and diverse array of participants have increased and more varied knowledge, skills, and resources with which to create synergy. It is not surprising that the community stakeholders involved in synergistic partnerships often go beyond the usual suspects, including service providers and also people who use the services; youth and low-income residents who are directly affected by problems; formal and informal community leaders; academics in different disciplines; government, private, and not-for-profit agencies; and schools, businesses, and faith-based organizations.

When a partnership brings together community stakeholders with many kinds of knowledge, it greatly enhances its ability to understand the problems it is trying to address and to plan an effective and realistic course of action, according to Lasker and Weiss. Together, a broad array of participants can do the following:

1. Obtain more accurate information (e.g., about the concerns and priorities of people in the community).
2. See the big picture (e.g., appreciate how different services, programs, and policies in the community relate to each other and to the problems the partnership is trying to address).
3. Break new ground (e.g., combine statistical and qualitative information to get a better understanding of the root causes of problems and discover innovative approaches to solving them).
4. Understand the local context (e.g., appreciate the values, politics, assets, and history of the local environment, and use this information to identify strategies that are most likely to work in that environment). For example, by combining the complementary skills, services, and resources of its diverse participants, a partnership is able to carry out interventions that build on community assets; are tailored to local conditions; connect multiple services, programs, policies, and sectors; and attack a problem from multiple vantage points simultaneously.

How Partners Are Involved

The range of urban community stakeholders plays a key role in determining the amount of synergy that a partnership can create. But, if these participants are not involved in a way that makes it possible for them to contribute their knowledge, resources, and skills, even a diverse partnership cannot create such synergy. The importance of focusing on how community stakeholders are involved can be illustrated by comparing two types of successful partnerships: the lead agency model and the community engagement model, which vary considerably in their ability to create synergy, reports Pennie Foster-Fishman.

The lead agency model refers to partnerships that are established to help a public- or private-sector organization carry out a predetermined program. These kinds of partnerships are quite common in the human services areas but, unfortunately, have a very limited capacity to create synergy regardless of how diverse the participants are. The reason these partnerships cannot create much synergy is that most of the thinking and planning is done by the lead human service agency, which is usually a hospital, health department, social service agency, or academic center. Generally, the lead agency diagnoses the problem in the community and develops the intervention to address the problem. While community residents and other stakeholders may provide the lead agency with some feedback and input about its plans (e.g., advice about how to tailor a program to a particular neighborhood or group), their primary role is to help the lead agency obtain community buy-in and provide the additional skills and resources needed to carry out the program. So, for example, they are often engaged to provide the lead agency with access to a target audience it currently does not reach, greater credibility for its message and program, or co-sponsorship of programs and events, according to Marsha Zibalese-Crawford and Lucius Botes.

In the community engagement model, a broad array of community stakeholders work together in all phases of the partnership's work—understanding the problem, developing plans, taking collective action, and refining the partnership's actions over time. The community engagement model has a much greater potential to create synergy than the lead agency model because diverse participants have an opportunity to influence the thinking and plans of the partnership as well as its actions. As a result, a cross-section of community stakeholders can create new ideas and strategies together, and the way the group ultimately understands issues and the actions it takes to address issues are usually very different from the way any single participant in the partnership started out, according to Zibalese-Crawford.

Synergistic partnerships often involve a number of people in the provision of leadership in both formal and informal capacities. Consistent with other work on collaborative leadership, the people who seem to be the most successful in these roles are not traditional leaders who tend to have a narrow range of expertise, speak in a language that can be understood only by their peers, are used to being in control, and relate to people as subordinates rather than partners. Instead, synergistic partnerships benefit from having boundary-spanning leaders who have backgrounds and experience in multiple fields, understand and appreciate different perspectives, can bridge diverse cultures, and are comfortable sharing ideas, resources, and power, propose Lasker and Zibalese-Crawford.

The management of partnerships is the glue that makes it possible for a broad array of community stakeholders to combine their knowledge, skills, and resources, so they can understand complex problems and develop and carry out innovative and comprehensive interventions to address these problems. Consequently, to be effective, partnerships need to find approaches to management that can support a synergistic group process as well as oversee the implementation of the projects and programs that come out of that process, according to Zibalese-Crawford and Stephen Shortell. The set of management capacities that these authors find important for inclusion are the ability to orient new partners as they join the partnership; to minimize barriers that can prevent some community stakeholders from participating in meetings and activities (e.g., by providing transportation, child care, and translation services and by holding meetings at convenient places and times); to make good use of participants' financial and in-kind resources and time; to facilitate timely communication (not only among a broad array of participants but also with community stakeholders outside the partnership); to coordinate meetings, projects, and other activities; and to provide the partnership with analytic support (e.g., by preparing documents that inform participants and help them make timely decisions and by evaluating the progress and impact of the partnership.

Implications

Understanding the relationship of community participation is important for urban communities and human services because the major impact is on who is involved in community partnerships, how community stakeholders are involved, and how different kinds of participants interact in the partnership. Increasing the role of urban community stakeholders in partnerships encourages community empowerment and community capacity building, which have been the focus of increasing attention in recent years. Community partnerships are unlimited in their capacity to create synergy and to achieve the breakthroughs in thinking and action that are needed to understand complex human services problems and develop, carry out, and sustain the kinds of interventions that can effectively address such problems. By involving a cross-section of urban community stakeholders in all phases of partnership work and by providing the kind of leadership and management that make it possible for diverse participants to combine their resources and create something new and valuable together, partnerships can create synergy and substantially increase their own capacity and sustainability as well as that of the urban community.

Although community partnerships are proliferating at a rapid pace, partnering is not a magic bullet, and partnerships are not the best way to develop or carry out all actions to improve community or the delivery of human services. Nonetheless, synergistic community engagement partnerships are becoming an increasingly important strategy human service administrators in urban communities because many of the problems they face—and are being held accountable for—are very complex. To make services more responsive to community residents and address the environmental and socioeconomic factors that ultimately determine the need for human services, administrators need to combine their knowledge and resources with those of many other people and organizations in the community.

For the successful implementation of human services in urban communities, the emphasis must be on working with the community versus taking care of the community. There is a need for many professionals to appreciate the limitations of their own expertise as well as to value combining that expertise with the knowledge and skills of other people in the community. Another challenge that many professionals face relates to their own role in partnerships. It may not always be optimal or appropriate for health and human services administrators to play leadership or management roles in partnerships; some community partnerships can create more synergy when these professionals function as participants.

Although many administrators are not used to participation in partnerships without being in a position of control, there are good reasons for them to consider doing so. It is not possible to assure that community stakeholders have real influence in the collaborative process if the partnership is—or is perceived to be—dominated by the agenda of a powerful agency. In addition, we propose it is not possible to achieve the significant breakthroughs that are needed to address complex and interrelated problems or if a partnership's thinking is constrained by any particular professional paradigm or if its actions are limited to the services or programs that only one organization or sector provides.

Conclusion

Governments and organizations delivering human services in urban areas face many challenges. These may be addressed successfully only when each community is considered unique and, hence, in need of unique, evidence-based solutions that include the support and active involvement of members of the community being served. A multifaceted, integrated approach to building relationships among urban communities and human services providers in all phases of human services will result in more effective, sustainable interventions. For successful implementation of human services in urban areas, only partnerships can achieve a high level of synergy and participant ownership. Human services providers in urban areas have increasingly engaged stakeholders in partnerships. Consequently, the urban community has become more invested in solutions and motivated to achieve together tangible and intangible, sustainable solutions that are in the best interests of the urban communities.

Marsha Zibalese-Crawford
Temple University
Yacov Zobel
Independent Scholar

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System; Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; At-Risk Youth Services, Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Child Welfare Services; Community Development Block Grants; Community Development Corporations; Community-Based Services; Crisis Services; Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cultural Services; Disability Services; Domestic Violence; Economic Support and Services; Educational Services; Employment/Career Assistance Services; Family Services; Housing Services; Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation, Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration; Workplace Health Services; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Foster-Fishman, P., S. L. Berkowitz, D. W. Lounsbury, S. Jacobson, and N. A. Allen. "Building Collaborative Capacity in Community Coalitions: A Review and Integrative Framework." American Journal of Community Psychology, v.29 (2001).

Homan, H. S. Promoting Community Change: Making It Happen in the Real World. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 2010.

Lasker, R. D., E. S. Weiss, and R. Miller. "Partnership Synergy: A Practical Framework for Studying and Strengthening the Collaborative Practice and Research." Milbank Quarterly, v.79/20 (2001).

O'Donnel, J., S. L. Kirkner, and N. Meyer-Adams. "Low-Income, Urban Consumers' Perceptions of Community School Outreach Practices, Desired Services, and Outcomes." School Community Journal, v.18 (2008).

Shortell, S. M., et al. "Evaluating Partnerships and Coordination for Community Health Improvement: Tracking the Footprints." Journal of Health Politics, Policy, and Law, v.27 (2002).

Tomkins, A., N. Shank, D. Tromanhauser, S. Rupp, and R. Mahoney. "United Way and University Partnerships in Community-Wide Human Services Planning and Plan Implementation: The Case of Lincoln/Lancaster County, Nebraska." Journal of Community Practice, v.13/3 (2005).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services Administration for Children and Families, Administration on Children, Youth, and Families, Children's Bureau and Office on Child Abuse and Neglect. "Community Partnerships: Improving the Response to Child Maltreatment." https://www.childwelfare.gov/pubs/usermanuals/partners/partners.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services

Since 1965, immigration to the United States has increased substantially, and the majority of new immigrants have hailed from developing countries, especially Asia and Latin America. Partly as a result of post-1965 immigration, America has become increasingly multiracial and multiethnic. Immigration is also an integral part of globalization that has increasingly characterized the world in the last about four decades. U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) plays a crucial role in serving the very diverse populations from around the world in the age of globalization. What kind of organization is USCIS? How have the services of immigration and naturalization provided by the U.S. government evolved organizationally over time? Currently what types of services are provided by USCIS? This brief entry provides answers to these questions.

What Is USCIS?

USCIS is a U.S. government agency within the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) that provides services in the areas of immigration to the United States and U.S. citizenship. Its mission, as it appears on the USCIS official Web site, states that "USCIS will secure America's promise as a nation of immigrants by providing accurate and useful information to our customers, granting immigration and citizenship benefits, promoting an awareness and understanding of citizenship, and ensuring the integrity of our immigration system."

USCIS has 250 offices around the world and employs 18,000 employees and contractors. Various USCIS offices handle different types of jobs. For example, field offices within the United States conduct scheduled interviews on nonasylum related applications. They also provide limited information and customer services that supplement those provided through the USCIS Web site and by phone. International offices provide services to U.S. citizens, permanent residents of the United States, and some other persons who are visiting or residing outside the United States and need assistance in immigration affairs. Application support centers provide fingerprinting and related services. Asylum offices handle scheduled interviews for asylum-related issues only. The National Records Center receives and processes Freedom of Information and Privacy Act requests. Service centers and the National Benefit Center receive and process a large variety of applications and petitions.

Brief History of USCIS and Its Predecessors

USCIS, with a formal name of the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services, was created in 2003 by the Homeland Security Act of 2002 (Pub. L. No. 107–296, 116 Stat. 2135) in response to the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Before then, services of immigration and naturalization offered by the U.S. government were carried out by different agencies under various departments. From the founding of the United States in 1776 until the late 1800s, there was no need for a government agency for immigration because the borders were open to everyone. Immigration became a federal issue starting in 1875. In 1891, the first federal immigration agency called the Office of Superintendent of Immigration (OSI) was established under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department. OSI was upgraded to the Bureau of Immigration in 1895, and the superintendent of Immigration became commissioner-general of immigration. In 1903, the Bureau of Immigration was moved to the newly created Department of Commerce and Labor. In 1906, Naturalization Service was established after Congress enacted the Naturalization Act of 1906, and the Bureau of Immigration became the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization. In 1913, the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization was split into two separate agencies: the Bureau of Immigration and the Bureau of Naturalization, both of which were within the new Department of Labor. In 1924, as a result of the National Origins Act of 1924, a new agency, the U.S. Border Patrol, was formed within the Bureau of Immigration. In 1933, the Bureau of Immigration and the Bureau of Naturalization were merged into a single agency named Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS). In 1940, The INS was transferred from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice.

The INS had been in existence for seven decades until 2003. The Homeland Security Act of 2002 dismantled the former INS into three components within the DHS. Immigration and Customs Enforcement runs immigration enforcement. Customs and Border Protection takes charge of border security functions. USCIS handles the administration of services related to immigration and naturalization.

Services Provided by USCIS

USCIS provides services in the following areas:

1. Immigration services: These include the processing of applications for permanent resident status (popularly known as green card), granting of permanent resident status, and renewal of green cards.
   Green cards can be obtained under the categories of family-sponsored immigrants, employment-based preferences, and diversity immigrants also known as lottery immigrants.

2. Naturalization or citizenship services: These comprise the processing and approval of petitions for naturalization. During the application process, USCIS will conduct an interview, including an English and civics test. Once the petition is granted, USCIS will send out a notice to take the oath of allegiance and hold a naturalization ceremony for new citizens to take the oath of allegiance.
3. Asylum and refugee application and approval. Refugees are people outside of their country of nationality who are unable or unwilling to return home because of prosecution or well-founded fear of prosecution. Asylum seekers or asylees are people living in the United States or at a port of entry who are unable or unwilling to return to their country of nationality or who seek the protection of the United States because of persecution or well-found fear of persecution. This is considered a humanitarian service.
4. International adoption. USCIS processes the immigration and U.S. citizenship of adopted children from abroad. The type of immigration visa issued to adopted children determines when and how they can acquire U.S. citizenship.
5. Issuance of nonimmigrant visas. USCIS processes and adjudicates petitions for nonimmigrant visas such as temporary visitors, temporary workers, exchanged scholars, and students. Some of the well-known nonimmigrant visas include B-1 and B-2 for temporary visitors and their dependents; F-1 and F-2 for international students and their dependents; J-1 and J-2 for exchange scholars and their dependents; H-1B for workers in a specialty occupation; H-1C for registered nurses working in a health professional shortage area as determined by the U.S. Department of Labor; H-2A for temporary or seasonal agricultural workers; H-2B for temporary nonagricultural workers; Q-1 for persons with extraordinary ability in sciences, arts, education, business, or athletics and motion picture or TV production; P-1A for internationally recognized athletes; R-1 for religious workers; and TN for North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) temporary professionals from Mexico and Canada.

Philip Q. Yang
Texas Woman's University

See Also: Immigration Law, History of U.S.; Naturalized Citizens; U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement; .

Further Readings

Homeland Security Act of 2002 (Pub. L. No. 107–296, 116 Stat. 2135).

Rodriguez, Robyn M. "(Dis)unity and Diversity in Post-9/11 America." Sociological Forum, v.23/2 (2008).

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. http://www.uscis.gov/portal/site/uscis (Accessed September 2013).

U.S. Cultural Regions

Regions are physical geographies bounded or connected by similar spatial features. Cultural regions are physical geographies of states that are connected by factors such as history, economy, or topography. In the United States, cultural regions have been nuanced by the intersection of historical, political, and human connections that collude to formulate regional identities that may or may not be imagined geographies. The borders of the regions and the confinement of individuals within a specific set of boundaries produce a cultural identity and narrative that operates to limit the agency of a particular place and people. The power relations that are in concert with regional formation have to be recognized as the agents of knowledge formation. The intervention of gender into geographical analyses and into the creation of place allows for more intersectional approaches to be utilized and more nuances of race, class, gender, and sexuality to become central to an understanding of geographic locale.

How Regions Become

It is important to understand how regions become understood in particular ways because the understanding allows for an interrogation into specificities of place and therefore understanding of service applications. In these examinations, considerations of how the people of a place are shaped by their location, both the natural and the built environments are brought into the consciousness of the discursiveness of place. The borders of a region are often contested. In many cases, regions are delineated by a subjective boundary, while in other cases, the demarcations are considered objective, formulated by quantitative measures. For example, the agencies of the federal government of the United States are not completely synchronized in their official definitions of region. Across the board, however, cultural regions have not actually been defined organically but rather manifest as remnants of sociohistorical processes and human–environment interactions. This type of definitiveness is problematic because it insinuates dichotomous categorizations that that do not acknowledge the opportunities, or realities, for more nuanced contexts, realities, and experiences of region that can be differentiated from one area to its neighboring space or placated in a comparative across distances, such as that of the west to the northeast.

Conceptualizing Regional Borders

Approaches to regional formation are traditionally problematic for their one-dimensional approach to conceptualization. As such, it is important to theorize the socio-spatial relationships that move beyond historical dimensions of regional circumstances. Rather, regional descriptions should be augmented to include the way regions characteristically shift over time, intertwined with multiple dimensions of space in the present in which regions are becoming. As a foundation to describing cultural regions, the location of regions must be identified. Regional identity is often a subjective process, often delineated by power relationships to policy, nature, or economy. For example, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services divides the nation into 10 distinct regions, which are centered on the nation's urban core—Seattle, San Francisco, Denver, Kansas City, Dallas, Chicago, Atlanta, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. Alternatively, the U.S. Census Bureau has long categorized the country into four distinct regions: northeast, Midwest, south, and West. This entry utilizes these divisions for the sake of discussing cultural complexities of use to human services as they align most closely with typical cultural connotations of U.S. regions. On a regional scale, cultural differences can account for variations in life that are of concern to human services professionals—such as parenting and child rearing and expectations in the labor sector.

United States Regional Delineations: Northeast

The northeast region is delineated by the following states: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. The states included in the northeast are subdivided into New England and midatlantic. New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania make up the midatlantic subregion, while the remaining six states compose the New England subregion. The region has historically been referred to as the rustic northeast. This nickname highlights the landscapes of the northeast, which are characterized by the natural beauty of the land (with the exceptions being the major metropolitan areas of New York City, Boston, and Philadelphia). Much effort has been made to preserve the rural idyll of the rustic northeast, which is important for sustaining the local economy. The region is heavily reliant on tourism, shipping, timber, and fisheries.

As of the 2010 U.S. Census, the northeast's total population was 55,378,402. Of this population, 43,364,085, or 78.3 percent, identified as white. In the New England states, self-identified whites account for 82 percent of the population (in Connecticut) up to 95.4 percent (in Vermont). The largest racial or ethnic minority group in the northeast region identified as Hispanic or Latino on the 2010 census. Approximately 51 percent of northeast people were women. The northeast is one of the most economically stable areas of the nation. Approximately 6,540,379, or 11.8 percent, of people were living at or below the poverty level. From a cultural standpoint, these numbers are significant because the data quantitatively support the diverse needs of human services in the region.

The Midwest Region

The Midwest region is defined by the U.S. Census Bureau as the following states: Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Missouri, and Kansas. The regions are divided into two subregions: west north central and east north central. West north central includes North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota. The remaining five states—Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Illinois—make up the east north central subregion. Midwest culture is characterized by its industrial relationships to the land, as evidenced by its nickname Prairie Grain Belt. In particular, industries such as agriculture and manufacturing have historically sustained the region's economy. A broad-scale issue facing the Midwest, as with other areas around the nation, has been the impacts of globalization. As a result, much of the labor force has shifted from manufacturing jobs to work in various management and service-sector positions.

As of the 2010 U.S. Census, the midwest's total population was 66,648,663. Of this population, 56,059,052, or 84.1 percent, identified as white. The largest racial or ethnic minority group in the midwest region varied based on a state level, with larger proportions of self-identified blacks in Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Missouri. Self-identified Hispanics and Latinos constituted the largest minority proportion in the remaining six midwest states. Women made up slightly more than 50 percent of the population. Approximately 8,946,831, or 13.4 percent, of people were living at or below the poverty level.

The Southern Region

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, the south is comprised of the following states: North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Virginia, Tennessee, Arkansas, Texas, Oklahoma, Kentucky, Maryland, Delaware, Louisiana, and West Virginia as well as the District of Columbia. The south is divided into three subregions: south atlantic, east south central, and west south central. The South Atlantic subregion includes: Delaware, Maryland, the District of Columbia, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. The east south central subregion includes: Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi. The west south central subregion includes: Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas. Perhaps more so than any other region in the United States, the south continuously battles with its historical legacies. The mention of the south as a location conjures varied images usually stemming from ideas about the country south or old south of the Civil War years. These notions of the south as a region are often impositions from socially constructed ideas based on presumed knowledge of cultural history. This idea creates a monolithic worldview that projects the south as incapable of possessing multiple lifestyles and thought processes.

As of the 2010 U.S. Census, the south's total population was 114,555,744. Of this population, 84,198,474, or 73.5 percent, identified as white. The largest racial or ethnic minority group in the south identified as black or African American on the 2010 census. Approximately 51 percent of southerners were women. Approximately 16,326,628, or 14.3 percent, of people were living at or below the poverty level.

West

The West region of the United States, as named by the U.S. Census Bureau, includes the following states: Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, Washington, California, Oregon, Alaska, Hawaii, and Utah. The west is divided into two subregions: Mountain and Pacific. The Mountain subregion includes: Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, Arizona, and Nevada. The Pacific subregion includes: Washington, Alaska, Oregon, California, and Hawaii. The west region is not typified by the same unifying characteristics of the other three regions described earlier in this entry. However, the west offers an interesting complexity due to its large indigenous or first nations presence (and reverence) as well as the influence of Asian ethnic and national cultures due to its geographically close position of the western United States to the continent of Asia. Moreover, the west has often been broadly construed and connected to visions of the Old West, which holds a particular position in American sociomythology. Relics of the Old West can be readily found in states such as Nevada, Arizona, and Colorado.

As of the 2010 U.S. Census, the west's total population was 71,945,553. Of this population, 28,778,221, or 40 percent, identified as white. The largest racial or ethnic minority group in the west region identified as Hispanic or Latino on the 2010 census. Roughly 51 percent of west people are women. Approximately 9,824,029, or 13.7 percent, of people are living at or below the poverty level.

Other U.S. Cultural Regions

Because regions often overlap—based on topography or sociocultural characteristics—the territories of multiple regions can cocreate other regional borders. With this consideration, two particular types of cultural regions in the United States are important to mention.

Appalachia is an imagined geographic region and a culture of people whose boundaries correspond with the Appalachian mountain range of the Eastern United States. The Appalachian mountain range runs through 13 states. The areas included in the region called Appalachia are determined through the research by the Appalachian Regional Commission (ARC). Appalachia as a region is not significantly different from other populated areas of the United States. The distribution of wealth varies. Social status in community is contingent on affiliation with certain networks, where a higher social status is indicated by a strong set of power relations. Negotiations of difference—religion, race, ethnicity, gender, sexuality, and class—are as present in Appalachia as they are in the most cosmopolitan of U.S. sites and regions. The romanticism of the Appalachian region has contributed to an othering of place, one in which the dominant, middle-class hegemony has set as the opposition to the standardized sense of time and place. Scholars argue that this leads to the idea of Appalachia versus an actual, tangible connection to a geographical and cultural locale.

Border regions categorize overlapping geographies of existing regions. Most often, a border region is used to describe the contact zone of two or more international borders. In the United States, the northern fringe of the country intersects with Canadian influences. To the south, the United States connects to Mexico. As such, both of these distinct areas are geopolitically and socially relative to their border spaces. The U.S.–Mexican border has gained significant attention over the past several years as the national, state, and local authorities in the United States contend with the influx of immigrants from Mexico and other Latin American countries. The geopolitical impacts of the mobility of people in the region carries significant implications for the ways that services have to be approached.

Issues Impacting Regions

In understanding United States cultural regions, attention must be given to national-scale political, economic, and social issues that have local implications.

Rural and Urban Divide

Regional culture provides an important perspective from which to understand place. However, the widely noted descriptions of region often create urbanized exceptions, creating a divide between the urban and the rural. The needs of city dweller can be differentiated from that of a rural resident, particularly based on perspectives such as access to resources, housing arrangements, and kinship networks. From a cultural standpoint, the borders of regions seem to be mediated by specific recognitions of aesthetic markers, marked by denotations of particular body performances and delineated by invocations of certain states of being. Exact codification of a region invoked as an idea of a place in discourse is grounded in the knowledge that it is specific to a particular location and context, which can be so identified by the recognition of the variance of terms that are seemingly synonymous—rurality, the country, farmland or agrarian, open space, and countryside, among many others.

Furthermore, the dichotomy of urban and rural is exacerbated in the popular imagination that understands rurality at any point on a continuum that operates both on a material and a discursive scale. The continuum encompasses anything from a romanticized idyll to an oppressive, backward existence for humans. The material status of the rural is recognized as a potential place to live and work, to vacation, and to experience forms of nature, perhaps in conjunction with or as opposed to the built environment. With this variance of rural subjectivities, the imagined and discursive significance of the rural space are undoubtedly important conceptualizations with which to grapple, if for nothing more than to be made relevant and securely defined.

Certain changes in the concepts of cultural necessities have been indoctrinated into the contemporary mainstream. The Internet and the mediums of film, television, and periodicals all play a role in rural identity formation. These social forces likewise contribute to how the location of the rural and rurality are portrayed, often as spaces that are out of place and abnormal, which affect how people negotiate their identities. People are more likely to know about rurality and the rural through television and media rather than through personal experience. As such, the cosmopolitan experience is privileged as normal and the standard for human experience.

A view of the Lehigh Valley from the Appalachian Trail. Appalachia is an imagined geographic region and a culture of people whose boundaries correspond with the Appalachian mountain range of the eastern United States.

Demographic Shift

The demographic profile of the United States is changing rapidly. It is estimated that, by 2050, the face of America will comprise more than 50 percent minority racial and ethnic groups. In the wake of this reality, it is important to understand the ways the shift in demography impacts spatial issues. Cultural regions have already begun and will continue to be influenced by the change in residents. One major change involves the phenomenon of reverse migration—where descendants of the Great Migration (blacks leaving the south for the northeast and midwest) are returning to their southern roots. The outmigration of African Americans from the northern United States impacts the cultural exchange and sociopolitical visibility of blacks in those regions. Another change involves the current influx of Latinos and Latinas to the United States. The migrant population, largely from Mexico, has instigated the transformation of goods and services provided in the region. For example, many public health clinics and retailers now have signage and instructions in Spanish as well as English, whereas that was not the case a decade ago. Moreover, the issues around immigration law and deportation are important to conceptualize contemporary cultural regions, particularly as they impact service needs.

U.S. Social Movements

Contemporarily, social movements have entered the national conversation in an effort to invoke societal changes. These issues have direct impact on the ways regions are considered and the ways that services can be provided. Same-sex equality movements have become influential in changing attitudes toward and legislation in favor of marriage equality. With the dismantling of DOMA and with several individual states continuously providing access to the institution of marriage for all couples, the conversations can impact the way providers view the issue with respect to a cultural region's history and broadly cast political stance. Gender and sexual minorities are often stigmatized in their lives for living in opposition to heteronormativity.

Heteronormativity is defined as the normative behaviors privileging opposite-gender attraction and intimacy. Regions such as the south and the Midwest have been slower to grant privileges of same-sex marriage than others. However, service providers should be wary of stereotyping or pathologizing individuals from a specific cultural region because of these broader knowledge productions. Likewise, women's reproductive rights have been at the core of national conversations. Stereotypes of cultural regions limit the ways one might perceive the acceptance (or lack thereof) of women's right to choose. It cannot be assumed that, because of the historically liberal leanings of the northeast, all individuals from that region would identify with a prochoice stance.

United States cultural regions can provide a useful framework for encapsulating the social, historical, economic, and political climate of a region. This framework, however, must be expanded in order to understand how regional culture is enacted on a local level. Additionally, the expansion must include the impacts of systemic cultural divisions—race, class, gender, an sexuality—as well as social structures such as religion in order to fully incorporate a human services model that is sensitive to and supports diversity.

LaToya E. Eaves
University of Connecticut

See Also: Appalachia and Human Services; Diversities; Ethnicity and Clients; Heterosexual Privilege; Intangible Cultural Heritage; LGBTQ Clients; Monoculturalism; Policing and Safety; Power, Race/Ethnicity and; Race and Clients; Regional Cultural Competence; Rural Communities; Same-Sex Marriage/Couples; Southern Communities and Cultural Competence; Spirituality/Religion and Diversity; Undocumented Immigrants; United States, Demographics of; Western Communities and Cultural Competence; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Ayers, Edward L., Patricia Nelson Limerick, Stephen Nissenbaum, and Peter S. Onuf. All Over the Map: Rethinking American Regions. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996.

Enloe, Cynthia H. and Joni Seager. The Real State of America Atlas: Mapping the Myths and Truths of the United States. New York: Penguin Books, 2011.

Rowe, John Carlos, ed. A Concise Companion to American Studies. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell, 2010.

U.S. Census Bureau. http://www.census.gov (Accessed December 2013).

U.S.Department of Health and Human Services. http://www.hhs.gov (Accessed December 2013).

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement

Special police forces emerged as a pattern in the federal government by the middle of the 20th century. Often, these organizations are created as a perceived need in society that traditional police forces are unable to address. By the mid-20th century, the United States had 80 such agencies, including the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), housed in the Department of Justice and tasked with the investigation and suppression of alien smuggling. Special police forces are then created by legislation to perform a particular function that might otherwise remain unaccomplished. The Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) represents a 21st-century version of the process.

The U.S. Customs Service was created in 1789 and tasked with the collection of import duties. The agency was housed under the Department of the Treasury and served not only as a revenue collection agency at the nation's ports but also the supervisor of lighthouse builders and law enforcers. In the 19th century, U.S. Customs became the enforcer of the 1882 Chinese Exclusion Act, and special immigration personnel were assigned to stop the flow of undocumented migrants through the nation's ports and along the northern and southern borders. Although the Bureau of Immigration was established in 1864, it was primarily a keeper of statistics, and immigration enforcement was carried out by the U.S. Customs Service until the early 20th century. The U.S. Customs Service ended its role as enforcer in 1910. However, the U.S. Customs Service has played a major role as a social enforcer during Prohibition and the current war on drugs and works closely with immigration officials in the Department of Homeland Security (DHS).

In 1882, the federal government began an oversight of immigration policy and assumed complete control over immigration policy in 1891. The Immigration Act of 1882 assigned the responsibility of examining new immigrants to the secretary of the Treasury. This was followed by the Immigration Act of 1891, which ended all state involvement in immigration issues and created the Bureau of Immigration within the Treasury Department. However, the Bureau of Immigration was moved in 1903 to the Department of Commerce and Labor. The role of immigration enforcement was assumed with the 1904 creation of a set of inspectors to patrol the Mexican border to stop illegal immigration. The Bureau of Immigration became the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and in1913 and was assigned to the Department of Labor.

In an effort to understand immigration impact, the 1907 United States Immigration Commission was created and became known as the Dillingham Commission. A series of immigration acts followed the submission of the report, which represented efforts to control immigration through screening, numerical quotas, and banning of selected categories. The restrictions and quotas created by the Immigration Acts of 1917, 1921, and 1924 remained in effect until 1965. The goal of the Immigration Act of 1965 was not to increase the number immigrants but to reunite families and follow the example of a 1952 program designed to attract workers whose skills were needed. Inadvertently, the act set off a fourth wave of immigration that currently continues and is currently framed in the aftermath of September 11, 2001.

The aftermath of September 11, 2001 (commonly referred to as 9/11), resulted in the passage of the Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act (the U.S.A. Patriot Act) and the creation of the DHS. The INS was moved to the DHS, and in 2007, the Bureau of Immigration was renamed ICE, while the closely connected Bureau of Customs and Border Protection was renamed the U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP). ICE has grown to the principle and largest criminal investigation agency within the DHS and the second-largest criminal investigation agency in the federal government. ICE is primarily tasked with the investigation and enforcement of immigration policy within the interior of the United States but also engages in border security and transnational enforcement focusing on transnational crime.

Immigration policy post-9/11 focused on four objectives: (1) enhanced border security, (2) restrictions on immigration, (3) increased surveillance of immigrant populations, and (4) an active effort to enforce immigration policy. The focus of ICE lies in surveillance and enforcement, thus framing immigration as a matter of national security or homeland security. The results of this reframing were a criminalization of immigration law and a dejurisdiction of immigration enforcement. In 2003, ICE formed the first national program dedicated to the enforcement of nonimmigrant visa violations. The Compliance Enforcement Unit (CEU) focused on visa overstays and status violations.

CEU responsibilities were expanded in 2010 with the Counter Terrorism and Criminal Exploitation Unit (CTCEU) that was designed to prevent exploitation of the immigration system by known terrorists and criminals. Its focus also centered on violations of the student and exchange visitor program. Detention and deportation of immigrants became easier with expedited removal and in a reversal of tradition policy, local, nonfederal law enforcement became involved in detention and deportation. ICE agents and local agencies created task forces for antigang programs, workplace raids, fugitive apprehension, and drug enforcement. A section of the Immigration and Nationality, known as 287g, was used to create a local community program for specially trained officers to investigate immigration status. ICE negotiated with local authorities for the use one of two models offered. The jail enforcement model allows local authorities to establish immigration status during regular booking procedures for those arrested. The task force model gives local authorities much broader discretion and does not require a criminal arrest, and local officials may hold an individual for as long as it takes to establish immigration status. ICE bureaucracy and responsibilities continue to expand into involvement with border control, interior enforcement, and transnational criminal investigation.

ICE's Homeland Security Investigation (HSI) reported significant increases in criminal arrests by 2012. Goals included border security, new approaches to interior enforcement, and the dismantling and disruption of transnational criminal organizations (TCOs). Transnational criminal investigative units (TCIUs) work in other countries to stop illegal activities and immigration of known criminals. ICE had employees in 48 countries as of 2012 focusing on human trafficking and the connections to drug traffic. Domestic responsibilities focus on border and interior enforcement.

ICE's enforcement and removal operations (ERO) concentrate on enforcing U.S. immigration policy. In 2012, ERO managed six processing centers, seven contract detention centers, and 1.71 million immigrants in the removal process. ERO also cooperates with the Criminal Alien Program (CAP) by supplying officers from the Office of Detention and Removal Operations (DRO). The purpose of this effort is to identify, process, and remove immigrant criminals that are incarcerated in federal, state, and local prisons and jails in the United States. Once again, local law enforcement may share in these activities. ICE also teams with local law enforcement to secure borders from criminal activity. The Border Enforcement Security Task Force (BEST) represents one ICE's border programs.

The scope of responsibilities and size of the bureaucracy have expanded greatly since ICE's inception. While framed on the "immigration problem," ICE has become both a global and local immigration policy enforcer. ICE investigates everything from workplace violations to the protection of intellectual property, from the smuggling of counterfeit goods to smuggling of humans, and from undocumented migrants to students and visitors overstaying their visas. DHS and ICE have also become powerful voices in the immigration reform debate.

Randall Adams
LaGrange College

See Also: Colonialism, Lingering Effects of; Displaced Persons; Family Reunification; Global South/Global North; Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of.

Further Readings

Chacon, Justin Akers and Mike Davis. No One Is Illegal. Chicago: Haymarket Books, 2006.

Coleman, Mathew and Austin Kocher. "Detention, Deportation, Devolution and Immigrant Incapacitation in the U.S., Post 9/11." Geographical Journal, v.177/3 (2011).

Department of Homeland Security. "Border Security: Frontline Perspectives on Progress and Remaining Challenges." http://www.dhs.gov/nes/2013/04/10/wriiten-testimony-us-immigration-and-custom--enforcement-senate-commitee-homeland (Accessed December 2013).

Garret, Earle W. "Special Purpose Police Forces." Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, v.291 (1954).

Prince, Carl E. and Mollie Keller. The U.S. Customs Service: A Bicentennial History. Washington, DC: Department of the Treasury, 1989.

Rodriguez, Robyn M. "(Dis)unity and Diversity in Post-9/11 America." Sociological Forum, v.23/2 (2008).

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. http://www.ice.gov (Accessed December 2012).

V

Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and

Values held by human service workers play an instrumental role in how services are delivered to persons of diverse backgrounds. In human services, how one responds to ethnic diversity is central in service provision. Understanding how one's values impact the development and delivery of services is a vital training component for human service workers. The type of services, the manner in which they are provided, and to whom services are delivered hinge on the values, beliefs, and perceptions of service providers at the micro, mezzo, and macro levels. The ideological foundation for the appreciation of ethnic diversity supports the idea that disparities should not exist in human service and that human service workers have an obligation to be familiar with and knowledgeable of diverse populations.

Values develop as a result of environmental, familial, cultural, and socioeconomic influences. Values are promoted through the belief systems of individuals, groups, communities, and societies. They help to shape how one views themselves, others, and the world. Values are what is held to be truth and are based on individual, group, community, and society experiences. Truth, or what is believed to be fact, for how the world functions or should function influences interactions and communications within and among these entities. Values impact judgment and help to shape the rules or ethics that human service workers are expected to abide by when providing services.

Morality and moral judgment are concepts that play a major role in the development of values. Morals cannot be seen or touched. They are merely one's inner feelings about right or wrong. A person often lives by a set of moral values and uses it as a yardstick by which to measure acceptable behavior. How one sees oneself in the world is oftentimes how he or she sees others. Conflict arises when moral values are so stringent that any behavior seen outside of one's own set of values is deemed as negative, adverse, or undesirable. This is moral judgment and should be avoided by human service workers. Human service workers may have their own set of values, but at no time should their values be pushed off on their clients. Standards, guidelines, and principles for human service workers on how they might avoid such situations are obvious in the human services field code of ethics.

Ethics are the procedures for professional conduct in human services. These ethics are mostly derived from values and can be seen in a number of human service disciplines. Many of the human service disciplines, including but not limited to, social work, psychology, nursing, education, and health care are governed by specific principles, guidelines, and standards for how one should react to ethical dilemmas within their field. Ethical dilemmas are situations that present to human service workers as matters that may cause one to question appropriate procedure when addressing ethically conflicting issues.

For example, a human service worker providing mental health services may face an ethical dilemma and have questions on how to proceed if asked to counsel a family member. Although the worker may have the expertise to provide counseling services, there may be a chance of conflicts of interest in provision of service because of a familial connection that may compromise impartial judgment and professional discretion. The principles, guidelines, and standards that address ethical dilemmas are referred to as codes of ethics and give the worker a point of reference or framework by which to measure his or her own practice behaviors. To address ethnic diversity issues related to the development and implementation of programs, policies, and services, a common thread highlighting requirements for addressing ethnic diversity in human services can be seen throughout discipline specific codes of ethics. Although these codes of ethics outline principles, standards, and guidelines for addressing ethically challenging issues, they are not prescriptive. It is expected that the human services worker has been educated and trained in the area in which he or she works and is competent in the field.

Ethnic diversity has been historically referred to the differences among people as it relates to ethnic origin. However, over time, the meaning of the term ethnic diversity has been expanded and is often talked about as multiculturalism. Today, the terms ethnic diversity and multiculturalism or multicultural diversity are interchangeably used and refer to the recognition, acceptance, and appreciation of people's unique characteristics while acknowledging the worth of distinctive qualities of varying cultures in creating and supporting a world of tolerance. Tolerance here refers to being open-minded to the fact that no one culture is superior to another culture and that the greatest benefit to society is the collective contributions of all cultures in creating a better world for all.

Human beings are diverse in a number of ways. Differences among people separate us by race, ethnicity, language, culture, national origin, gender, gender identity or expression, socioeconomic class, age, sexual orientation, color, marital status, political belief, religion, immigration status, ability, educational level, geographic origin, and values, among others. Familiarity and knowledge of diverse populations are believed to enhance service provision by assisting human service workers in assessing presenting issues and problems and developing and implementing culturally sensitive interventions.

As human service agencies, organizations, and workers strive to assist changing client populations in acquiring necessary supports services and successfully navigating negative circumstances, a one-size-fits-all approach in dealing with issues and problems presented by diverse clientele is detrimental to the human services field. Individuals do not respond the same to varying interventions and approaches. This difference in response can be attributed to several factors. One factor that may impact the differences in response to varying interventions and approaches may be diversity. It is imperative that agencies, organizations, agencies, and workers are aware of issues related to diversity when formulating, developing, and implementing policies and practices that may be offensive, inappropriate, or inadequate for use with diverse populations.

Education and Training on Diversity in Human Services

Educational requirements in consideration for employment in the human service field vary across disciplines. Although most employers prefer a bachelor's degree in sociology, psychology, or human services, a high school diploma is acceptable for entry-level positions. Professional degrees or master's or doctoral degrees in social work and psychology are preferred and, in some states, are required because each of these disciplines require licensing and are categorized as clinical positions. Beyond the hiring requirements for working in human services, workers must stay abreast of current knowledge and emerging developments related to practice and ethics by continuing their education through coursework, conferences, and workshops.

In human services, understanding the relationship among values, ethics, and ethnic diversity and how individual values and ethics impact service provision are at the core of preparation for working in the human service field. In order to provide appropriate direct services to individuals, families, groups, and communities, it is important that human service workers are educated and trained on ethnic diversity. Under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (1868) of the U.S. Constitution, states are required to provide equal protection of individuals and reject discrimination based on ethnic diversity. The law attempted to dispel the myth that ethnic diversity has little to do with hiring practices, service provision, and racial segregation.

However, it was the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that made it a criminal offense for institutions serving the general public to discriminate against persons because of race or ethnicity. Following the ending of separate-but-equal laws and policies in the 1960s, military and police departments were the first to put in place formal education and trainings on ethnic diversity. Institutions of higher learning soon followed. Today, most human service agencies have some form of required comprehensive diversity training for its employees. Mandatory comprehensive trainings on ethnic diversity are required for most human service personnel adhering to the International Human and Civil Rights Code of Ethics. These trainings have assisted in institutionalizing multiculturalism in human service agencies with policies and programs that promote ethnic diversity.

The trainings, mostly known as diversity, cultural diversity, or multiculturalism trainings, focus on understanding people's differences and learning to appreciate differences among varying groups. The trainings, most times, include a self-assessment of individual values, morality, presentations of ethical dilemmas, and best practices for handling issues related to diversity. The end result should be improved worker competency in the areas of diversity.

While mandatory comprehensive education and training on ethnic diversity in human services is the norm rather than the exception for human service workers, it is a controversial topic. Opponents argue that mandatory diversity education trainings have no real merit. They believe that social integration cannot truly be achieved and refer to this as the diversity illusion. They reason that the educational trainings are merely an exercise that organizations and agencies participate in to seem morally just and to comply with requirements of funding sources. Educational diversity trainings are seen to have little value in preparing workers to work with diverse populations. In the same vein, opponents of multiculturalism argue that multiculturalism is detrimental to the values of the country and can lead to social conflict. They maintain that persons of different cultures should assimilate into the existing dominate culture to avoid division among social groups.

Proponents of mandatory education and training argue that mandatory education and training are necessary and appropriate for anyone in the human services field. They purport that knowledge about and familiarity with characteristics and cultural history and background of the persons they are serving assist human services workers in developing and providing adequate interventions. They claim that understanding diversity helps workers to effectively communicate and interact with the persons to which they are providing services. It is believed that effective communication and interaction between the worker and client is the foundation for positive outcomes. They also believe that acceptance, appreciation, and respect of diversity are inevitable as the world becomes more diverse.

Human Service Settings and Ethnic Diversity

Human services professionals work in a variety of settings. They can be found in social service agencies, correctional facilities, youth service agencies, residential facilities, educational institutions, health-related institutions, mental health centers, and elsewhere. The settings are usually very busy and sometimes seem chaotic. The demographics of the persons whom these agencies and institutions serve include persons of diverse populations. Human service agencies address client issues and problems by accessing available benefits, providing counseling, educating, developing and implementing programs, and so on.

Human service workers find success in their work from helping other human beings in difficult situations. The work is hard, thankless, and usually low paying. Much of the work that human service workers engage in is referred to as case management. Heavy caseloads have been cited as a major cause of high turnover rates. The job requires gathering sensitive data on clients. Human services workers are privy to a host of personal identifying information about clients. Privacy and confidentiality of the data gathered are vital. In most human service agencies, workers are required to sign privacy and confidentiality statements that ask the worker to protect client information by not sharing it without getting informed consent.

Human service work can also be difficult and may require long hours. Because of the complexity of the job, workers must work efficiently. Being able to establish a rapport with the client assists in attaining efficiency. The worker must make the client feel that he or she is important, respected, and heard. This is often referred to as respecting the dignity and worth of individuals. For clients of diverse backgrounds, it is critical that the worker exhibit some knowledge of who the client is in order to establish a rapport with the client. Establishing this rapport leads to positive interactions and communications that help the worker to provide effective and efficient interventions for the client.

The Economy, Human Services, and Ethnic Diversity

The global economic decline began in 2007 and resulted in an economic crisis in 2008. The loss of jobs, closing of businesses, home foreclosures, and a bottoming out of the banking industry left many people in need of human services. The economic recovery, although steady, has been slow. Historically, when society experiences an economic crisis, funding to social services are decreased. Human service agencies have been impacted by the economy with cuts in federal and state funding, decreases in private donations, and few opportunities for additional funding above and beyond federal and state funding appropriations. This creates a very contingent situation.

As human service organizations and agencies continue to struggle to provide services to increasing client numbers with evolving needs, funding to support services to those requiring assistance has decreased. The evolving needs of increasing client populations, while contextually connected to the economic crisis, are partly due to the diversity of the clients served. While providing services to those in need and multiculturalism are seen as societal values, the decreases in funding to provide these services presents an ethical dilemma for human services organizations, agencies, and workers. They are left with the task of determining who receives limited available services. This determination often has no room for consideration of ethnic diversity, lending itself more toward the provision of services for those suffering the most devastation. It can be argued that those mostly impacted by economic crises would be those with more diverse backgrounds as greater numbers of minorities would suffer the greatest impact of an economic crisis. One of the goals of the institutionalization of ethnic diversity or multiculturalism in human service agencies is to provide culturally specific assessments and interventions. However, with swelling numbers of persons needing services and limited resources, the focus on multiculturalism and ethnic diversity may not be possible.

For example, one of society's most basic needs is for people to be able to eat. During economic crises, the number of persons needing assistance to provide food for themselves or their families increases. In September 2013, the U.S. government cut $4 billion from the budget of the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP), commonly referred to as food stamps. The cuts limited who was eligible to receive food stamps and the dollar amount recipients received and and increased the number of ineligible applicants by implementing stricter guidelines for those applying for SNAP. In this case, human services workers assisting individuals and families in obtaining food through federally funded SNAP would have little time to consider ethnic diversity or multiculturalism. The immediate need would be to help applicants to obtain food assistance. This situation is a practical one that questions the applicability of ethnic diversity education and training in human service agencies impacted by economic crises.

Ethnic Diversity, Multiculturalism, and Multicultural Diversity

As mentioned, ethnic diversity is more commonly known today as multiculturalism or multicultural diversity. In past years, the protection of cultural identity has been the focus of ethnic diversity discussions. However, in recent years, diversity has been acknowledged as a construct that goes far beyond cultural differences. This paradigm shift has led to the acknowledgment that differences among people exist at many different levels and should be respected and valued. For example, while physical differences of race, gender, age, or color may be apparent, more subjective characteristics of immigration status and gender identity or expression may not be so readily identifiable.

The term multiculturalism or multicultural diversity usually describes a place and the demographics of individuals or populations at the group, community, organizational, and institutional levels. In human service agencies, demographics plays a vital role in determining the types of services provided and the manner in which they are provided. For example, in the Hispanic culture, there is a greater sense of value for elders. If an agency outside of a particular Hispanic community wants to implement a new program and partner with an agency within such a community, it would be difficult to gain buy-in and participation from the residents of that community without the approval of the elders, whether that approval is verbal or nonverbal. It is important that human service organizations understand the community for which they are providing services in order that cultural idiosyncrasies are respected.

Since the 1980s, there has been an increase in the international population movement. While globalization and multiculturalism are welcome tenets for the world at large, the extent of the increase in the international population movement to different countries around the world was not anticipated. Adequate preparation to receive persons of differing backgrounds was not universally apparent. Hence, the need for education, training, and policies that assist in preparation to receive these diverse populations was brought to the forefront. Both national and international policy exist to address this issue.

Multiculturalism or multicultural diversity refers to theoretical frameworks within agencies and organizations that support the ideological constructs of diversity. This framework is determined by the specific policy and program initiatives developed and implemented within human service agencies to manage and respond to ethnic diversity. The constructs of diversity include the knowledge, awareness, and skills to work with diverse populations. The importance of culturally and ethically sensitive acknowledgement and recognition of differences when working with diverse populations are also emphasized. Multiculturalism or multicultural diversity also attempts to ensure access to resources for ethnic and cultural minority groups.

Shonda Lawrence
Jackson State University

See Also: Code of Ethics of the National Association of Social Workers; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Training in; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Multiculturalism.

Further Readings

Audi, Robert. Moral Value and Human Diversity. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.

Hugman, Richard. Culture, Values and Ethics in Social Work: Embracing Diversity. New York: Routledge, 2013.

Modood, Tariq. Multiculturalism. London: Polity, 2007.

Murphy, Michael. Multiculturalism: A Critical Introduction (Routledge Contemporary Political Philosophy). New York: Routledge, 2012.

National Organization for Human Services. Ethical Standards for Human Service Professionals. http://www.nationalhumanservices.org/ethical-standards-for-hs-professionals (Accessed November 2013).

Rattansi, Ali. Multiculturalism: A Very Short Introduction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2011.

Takaki, Ronald. A Different Mirror: A History of Multicultural America. New York: Back Bay Books, 2008.

Taylor, Charles. Multiculturalism: Examining the Politics of Recognition. Princeton University Press, 1994.

Traer, Robert and Harlan Stelmach. Doing Ethics in a Diverse World. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2007.

Veterans Services

While the United States military strives for unity and cohesion, each member is inherently unique. In providing services to veterans, it is imperative to keep in focus the various areas of diversity. Specifically, generational differentiation is significant as are combat and noncombat experiences. Veteran service delivery is often complex when symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), military sexual trauma (MST), and other mental health and medical complications such as traumatic brain injury (TBI) are involved. The Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) and non-VA veteran service organizations (VSOs) are often available to help veterans with many aspects of their post-military needs. The most salient are financial support (e.g., compensation and pensions for service connected disabilities), educational and vocational services (e.g., the G.I. Bill), health care, and burial and memorial services.

Military and Veteran Culture

The military has a distinctive culture of unity and cohesion. Within the military, though, lies significant diversity. In addition to differences in ethnicity, class, and gender, members of the military also differ in their reasons for being a part of the armed forces and in their professional and life experiences. Some who face discrimination in the general society may seek relief in the military. Due to its mission, the military strives to be fundamentally nondiscriminatory in its organizational behavior. For example, Native Americans who served during World War II were well integrated in military units but were discriminated against in general society.

Generational differences are also significant. Veterans of World War II and the Korean War, today's oldest veterans' groups, established a reputation as being heroes. In contrast, the Vietnam era veterans, due to societal changes, gained a reputation as being antiheroes. As time passed, and more was learned about the challenges of military service, veterans have attained a more positive status in society, and various organizational alliances have been reaching out to support them.

It is relatively easy to understand how and why military culture has its own distinction, origin, and purpose. It is much more difficult to understand what happens when members come back from combat and leave the military. There is no organized basic training to deconstruct military culture and prepare a person for reentry to civilian life. Veterans often come home dealing with reintegration issues, isolation, physical or emotional wounds from war, family alienation, and ambivalence about getting help.

One veteran's experience of the military will differ from another's. In addition, military experience during times of peace and times of war are often markedly different. In most cases, veterans are eligible to receive many services that enable them to reintegrate back into society, including access to health care. However, many veterans do not understand their benefits, so connecting them with services remains an ongoing challenge.

Workforce Services

All federal services for veterans are designed to be sensitive to issues of diversity and seek to work with the military in assisting veterans in transitioning to civilian life. This includes vocational rehabilitation and workforce development programs. The Office of Diversity and Inclusion (ODI) in the VA aims to foster a diverse workforce and an inclusive work environment that ensures equal opportunity through national policy development, workforce analysis, outreach, retention, and education to best serve veterans. One important role of the ODI is to measure how all groups protected by law are represented in the diverse workforce of federal offices. The government is also designating new funds for research on the integration of women and sexual minorities in the military.

To recognize the role of veterans in public service, and in appreciation of their thorough training, there is a requirement that veterans have priority in hiring for positions in federal agencies. However, the preferential hiring of veterans means that the number of employees from protected groups will not mirror their respective percentages in general society; this is especially true of women and naturalized citizens who haven't been well represented in the military. This effect is even stronger for groups not protected by law but only by recent presidential executive order, such as lesbians, gays, and bisexuals (LGBs). The Don't Ask Don't Tell (DADT) policy significantly affected the participation of LGBs in the military. Consequently, there was no official recruitment of these individuals to the military. The repeal of DADT and the Supreme Court ruling that the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) is unconstitutional insure that many current military members and subsequent veterans will be less affected by adverse discrimination.

Recent changes in the access to the military of women and some sexual minorities will increase overall diversity in the military and consequently in federal offices. The next steps will be changes to address persistent gender gap problems, transgender, and immigration policies.

Health Care

The VA provides health care for about 6 million recipients. Although largely male represented, by 2021, the number of women veterans enrolled in the VA's health care system is expected to increase by 45 percent. The VA is the single largest provider of health care services for several conditions, for example, hepatitis C and Agent Orange registry disorders. The need for mental health services has grown to be larger than for physical health services. One of the most recognized mental health problems related to military service, especially among veterans who were in combat, is PTSD. Many with PTSD also have symptoms related to TBI.

Often, the symptoms of PTSD and TBI coincide, and it is difficult to evaluate and choose the best treatment plan. Among women, PTSD is often related to MST, a significant problem in a quickly changing military culture. Other common mental health conditions for which veterans seek professional help are depression, anxiety, and substance abuse. Difficulties with sleep and digestive problems are also common. Because of readjustment difficulties, many veterans suffer legal consequences. The VA and local justice systems have recently teamed up to provide reduced sentencing in exchange for comprehensive rehabilitative care to these veterans.

In recent years, the VA has made battling the high occurrence of homelessness and suicide attempts or thoughts among veterans a top priority. To meet the increased need for mental health, family, and homeless services, the VA has begun to create new, integrative programs in cooperation with community providers. Telehealth initiatives and evidence-based therapies (EBTs) are on the front lines with devoted staffing hours and 24-hour hotlines available to ensure maximum service delivery. The implementation of Patient Aligned Care Teams (PACT) within the VA health care should help improve access to services due to direct, hands-on coordination among primary health care providers and several other clinical and nonclinical staff.

Community and Veteran Service Organizations

Veterans often turn to non-VA-sponsored avenues for services. VSOs are grassroots, nonprofit organizations often run by veterans themselves in support of other veterans. Services generally include working alongside veterans in advocacy for empowerment and rights in accessing health care and other benefits. According to the Directory of Veterans Service Organizations, there are more than 140 national non-VA VSOs. Examples of these organizations include the African American Post Traumatic Stress Disorder Association, Disabled American Veterans, Paralyzed Veterans of America, Women Marines Association, and the Wounded Warrior Project. There are also state and local government-based VSOs that connect veterans with benefits and services and provide outreach to veterans in rural areas.

A good example of cooperation between different government organizations and community agencies are recent grants for community providers to help homeless veterans. Funds from a joint effort of U.S. Departments of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and VA Supportive Housing (VASH) helped to develop evidence-based housing programs for homeless veterans. Additionally, the government has funded a program known as Supportive Services for Veteran Families (SSVF), run by community providers, to help veterans receive or maintain stable independent housing. Many universities and colleges have special programs for veterans assisting them with education, training, and employment and meeting life's challenges.

With cumulative years of wars, and several members enduring multiple deployments, there is an increased need for veteran services. It appears that, more than ever in American history, society recognizes the sacrifice and service of veterans by widely extending the support and diversity of the services they need.

James E. Phelan
Jaroslaw R. Romaniuk
VA Healthcare System

See Also: Homelessness; Immigration: Human Service Issues; Military Personnel; Military Veterans; Same-Sex Marriage/Couples; Suicide Prevention Services; Transgender Individuals.

Further Readings

Coll, Jose E., Eugenia L. Weiss, and Michael Metal, "Military Culture and Diversity." In Allen Rubin, Eugenia L. Weiss, and Jose E. Coll, eds., Handbook of Military Social Work. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2013.

National Alliance of Mental Illness. "Veterans of Culturally Diverse Populations" http://www.nami.org/Template.cfm?section=Multicultural_Issues (Accessed June 2013).

Shinseki, Eric K. Performance and Accountability Report. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, 2013.

"U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs Diversity and Inclusion Strategic Plan." Office of Human Resources and Administration. http://www.diversity.va.gov/products/files/StrategicPlan.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

"Veteran and Military Service Organizations." Office of the Secretary. http://www.va.gov/vso/VSO-Directory_2012-2013.pdf (accessed July 2013).

Victim Services

Survivors of crime may experience depression, anxiety, sleep and eating disorders, substance abuse, suicidal ideation, self-blame and posttraumatic stress disorder. To address their needs, crime victims assistance programs, rape crisis centers, and battered women's shelters have been in existence since the 1970s. Victim service organizations may be community based (independent of the criminal justice system) or system based (housed within and affiliated with police agencies). Services provided by community-based organizations include individual, collateral, and group counseling services; legal support; accompaniment to medical and police appointments; assistance in accessing federal compensation; information and referrals; updates on the status of legal cases; and preventive education.

While victim service agencies can assist with any crime, most focus is on domestic violence, sexual assault, stalking, and rape—crimes most frequently reported (both officially and unofficially) by girls and women. It is important for service providers to be aware of these services because any client can become a victim of crime, although not all workers know how to address the complex needs of survivors. Victim service workers, who often participate in interdisciplinary teams, may be a useful resource for other human service workers. Despite the valuable services victim advocates can provide, they are currently underutilized by victims and professionals.

Work With Secondary Survivors

Victim service organizations work to prevent and minimize, as well as intervene with, victimization. To accomplish this goal, victim advocates may assist co-victims of crime (also known as secondary survivors), who include family members, spouses, lovers, friends, and children of survivors. Co-victim responses are crucial in that social support is a key element in a survivor's recovery from trauma. As a result of their own feelings, co-victims may engage in behaviors that threaten a survivor's recovery. These may include overidentification, blaming, doubt, overprotection, silencing, embarrassment, avoidance, or pressure for resumed normalcy. Adolescents, the most frequent victims of rape, are especially prone to encounter these reactions. Among spouses and romantic partners, tensions may lead to the dissolution of relationships. Professionals such as police officers, nurses, and therapists may also exhibit these negative reactions. Counseling of co-victims can alleviate the stress they feel as a result of the crime and help them respond more helpfully to survivors.

Prevention Education

Victim service organizations have been instrumental in providing free community education (primarily in elementary, middle, and high school classrooms) on the subjects of rape prevention, bullying, and dating violence. Presentations are geared to specific age groups and may be vetted by teachers and parents. These programs have at times been viewed as controversial because they are associated with sexuality (rape and dating) and may result in disclosures of abuse to teachers unprepared to handle them. As a result, parents were permitted to have their children opt out of these programs. However, it is in keeping with the philosophy and mission of victim services organizations to engage in prevention of, as well as assistance after, criminal victimization.

History and Values

Before the 1970s, victims of crime sought help from traditional institutions such as police departments, hospitals, and counseling centers. However, studies showed that women were not receiving the information and support they needed following rape and domestic violence. This made recovery from crime-related trauma and accessing redress through the criminal justice system difficult. Thus, as part of the women's movement, victim service agencies were established by volunteers through grassroots activism. They were independent of other institutions, which they sought to reform. Today, victim advocacy organizations have become professionalized, leading to tension between the early goals of independence from mainstream institutions and the contemporary impetus to collaborate with systems of power.

The philosophy behind victim services agencies is that of empowerment, freedom from judgment, confidentiality, and choice. In many states, a victim advocate's case notes cannot be subpoenaed; in other states, advocates take minimal notes to protect their clients from confidentiality violations. Services are expected to be delivered in an egalitarian, respectful manner, free of charge. Community-based organizations do not require victims to lodge a police report or undergo a forensic exam in order to receive services; rather, they help the survivor explore options and come to his or her own conclusions. In addition, through a beeper service, agencies characteristically offer 24-hour availability.

Senator Barbara Boxer, the junior U.S. senator from California, speaks at a women's rights event. Boxer was a sponsor of the original Violence Against Women Act in 1994.

A main activity of crime victim advocates is to inform survivors of their rights. Although state laws vary, there is a Federal Crime Victims Bill of Rights that asserts victims' needs for respect, access to information about their cases, compensation, opportunity to make statements before the court, and others. However, these rights are interpreted differently by states and jurisdictions. The right to have a victim advocate present during police interviews is currently discretionary in many states, despite the difficulty of undergoing this process.

The federal government provides most of the funds for sustaining victim service agencies, most notably through the Violence Against Women Act of 1994, which is renewed periodically. However, funding has been reduced in recent years, which has limited the preventive and collaborative activities of victim advocacy organizations. In addition, the 2013 reauthorization of the act was delayed by lawmakers who objected to its provisions for Native American and immigrant victims.

While victim advocates are not lawyers, they are familiar with aspects of legal policy and procedure that may impact survivors. In addition, they are familiar with local judges, prosecutors, and police officers. As a result, they are valuable resources for clients contemplating criminal justice involvement.

Effectiveness

In a groundbreaking study, Rebecca Campbell demonstrated that rape victims were treated more professionally by police and medical staff when a victim advocate was present. It is not known whether the same result would occur if survivors were accompanied by friends. Qualitative studies indicate that survivors of rape and domestic violence feel better about themselves when involved with victim advocates. That said, studies to measure the effectiveness of victim advocates are sparse. However, there is evidence that police officers who work collaboratively with victim advocates are better rape victim interviewers.

Other Victim Service Programs

Another kind of victim-specific program is domestic violence shelters, organizations within each community that provide refuge for women fleeing abusive partners. They are staffed by paraprofessionals who provide concrete services, counseling, and referrals. As a result of meager funding, they characteristically have more applicants than available beds; however, shelters are well utilized by clients. Some issues remaining to be addressed are where to house male adolescent children of survivors, accommodation of gay survivors, and provision of aide services to women with disabilities dependent on physical assistance.

Another important service for survivors is Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner (SANE) units in hospitals. These are composed of one or more nurses, available 24 hours a day, to provide specialized emergency rape exams for victimized women. Forensic evidence needed for prosecution can thereby be collected in the most effective and compassionate way possible—minimizing survivor trauma. Pregnancy and venereal disease testing are provided at no cost to survivors. SANE nurses are cognizant of legal requirements and are often members of multidisciplinary teams to assist survivors. They were developed as an alternative to long hospital waits, disgruntled physicians uncomfortable performing forensic exams, and lack of physical privacy.

Diverse Populations and Use of Victim Services

Crime victim agencies may be underutilized by vulnerable populations who need their services. Cultural groups vary in terms of attitudes and approaches to crime; some cultures believe the public disclosure of victimization exposes a survivor's family to dishonor and shame. Lack of trust is another issue. Marginalized populations, such as Native Americans, may not expect help from official (county, state, or federal) agencies. Survivors in military environments may doubt the ability of civilian victim assistance organizations to protect them. Fears of deportation may limit the willingness of immigrants to seek help. Persons with disabilities may fear that disclosure will result in lost privileges or placement in restrictive environments. Men may feel that programs will be unresponsive to their needs, and gay victims may not be able to access accommodations within shelters. Thus, there are many holes in the service delivery system despite the value of these organizations to clients.

Interdisciplinary Collaboration and Challenges

Victim advocates experience satisfaction in their work but are also at risk for stress and burnout. This may be due to the nature of the work they do, their exposure to secondary trauma (as a result of hearing so many stories of victimization), their lack of adequate monetary compensation, and the lower status they hold in the perception of criminal justice authorities. They may head up teams of community professionals (nurses, police administrators, advocates, mental health counselors, shelter workers, case managers, disability professionals, school principals, and others) where their values about confidentiality and client empowerment may be challenged. Psychologists may feel that clients need formal psychotherapy rather than the informal counseling (devoid of diagnoses, fees, and session notes) provided by victim advocates. As with all multidisciplinary collaborations, there are perceptual, linguistic, ideological, and cultural barriers to be addressed—although the usual outcome is improved services to survivors.

Victim advocacy organizations vary in their relationship to a feminist ideology, with some adhering closely to the feminist ideals with which they were founded and others espousing a more conciliatory viewpoint. This has resulted in competing opinions about the role of victim service organizations in serving men or transgendered women. It has also resulted in conflict among those who propose compromise and interdisciplinary collaboration and others who resist perceived co-opting by other disciplines. The recent creation of in-house victim advocacy organizations by police departments has sparked a controversy based on these competing principles. These special victims units are located at police stations and usually staffed by female officers; they may also comprises human service workers whose goal is to ensure cooperation with police. From one perspective, this situation undermines the victim services goals of client empowerment, confidentiality, and freedom of choice; from another perspective, the collaboration among advocates, survivors, and police officers can happen easily and with a minimum of conflict.

Future Goals

A recent interest of governmental authorities is trafficking in persons; task forces across the United States are currently being developed, with victim advocates playing key roles that utilize their skills in survivor engagement, networking, advocacy, and community education. In addition, legal, housing, and medical professionals are developing victim assistance protocols for the unique needs of this population.

In the present legal environment, when a survivor's case is tried, he or she is viewed only as a witness, not a complainant, in the proceedings. This means that his or her interests and those of the prosecutor may not be in alignment; instead, he or she becomes a tool in the state's action. However, the notion of a victim's attorney, whose interest is solely to protect the survivor in legal proceedings, is being developed. If this were institutionalized, at a criminal trial, there would be the state's attorney (prosecutor), the accused party's lawyer (defense), and a third lawyer for the victim. This would increase the likelihood of victims' coming forward and would create another collaborative opportunity (with survivors' legal aid societies) for victim advocates.

Another goal for legal professionals is to strengthen federal and state Victims Bills of Rights. This would elevate the status of victim advocates, some of whose authority rests on the existence of this law. The right to have a victim advocate present during police interviews could be made enforceable.

Strengthening and elaborating existing policies may go a long way toward improving institutional responses to survivors of these crimes.

Karen Rich
Marywood University

See Also: Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Institutional Oppression.

Further Readings

Campbell, Rebecca. "Rape Survivors' Experiences With the Legal and Medical Systems: Do Rape Victim Advocates Make a Difference?" Violence Against Women, v.12 (2006).

Martin, Patricia Y. Rape Work: Victims, Gender and Emotions in Organization and Community Context. New York: Routledge, 2005.

Nichols, Ann J. "Gendered Organizations: Challenges for Domestic Violence Victim Advocates and Feminist Advocacy." Feminist Criminology, v.6/2 (2011).

Ullman, Sarah, E. and Stephane M. Townsend. "Barriers to Working With Sexual Assault Survivors: A Qualitative Study of Rape Crisis Center Workers." Violence Against Women, v.13/4 (2007).

Vietnamese Americans

The Vietnamese population of the United States is the fifth-largest immigrant population. The rapid growth of this group began after the end of the Vietnam War in the mid-1970s. While the inflow of immigrants has slowed, the needs of this large group are significant to the human services community. While the total Vietnamese population in the U.S. is approximately 1.6 million, at the last census, just over 1 million in this community are immigrants. California has the most Vietnamese Americans. Los Angeles and several other nearby cities makes up the metropolitan area with the most Vietnamese. Other cities in California with large populations include San Jose, Sunnyvale, and Santa Clara. The Houston, Dallas, and Washington, D.C. metro areas also host large numbers. The U.S. Census Bureau estimates the age distribution of Vietnamese Americans as follows: under 5 about 8 percent, 5 to 17 about 19 percent, 18 to 64 about 65 percent, and over 65 about 8 percent. While Vietnamese immigrants have adapted better than many immigrants to the economy of the United States, there is a continuing need in this population for human services. Cultural issues are crucial in this community. If those seeking to help this immigrant population are to be effective, there must be an understanding of the Vietnamese culture. One of the major factors in the culture of those in this population is the importance of family. It is only in the context of family that the most effective help can be offered.

The length of time that Vietnamese immigrants have been in the country impacts the level of human service needs evidenced in a particular population. Certainly those who came in first were primarily refugees fleeing from the communist takeover of South Vietnam. Most refugees came with no material possessions. They needed everything. They first had to be provided with a place to live. Some lived first in temporary housing, many on army bases in the U.S. Gradually, through help provided by the U.S. government, churches, and other organizations, more permanent housing was provided. These new residents were given financial help and help in finding work. Language learning opportunities were provided. Family reunification services were very important to new Vietnamese arrivals in the U.S. Because the family is so important in Vietnamese culture the effort to reunite families was valued very highly. The trauma that many refugees faced in their efforts to come to the United States made necessary the provision of counseling services for many of the new arrivals. Some spent months, or years, in refugee camps in some very difficult places. Some left Vietnam in crowded and dangerous boats. Many lost family members and friends in the difficult journey away from Vietnam. Often they were troubled by family members left behind in Vietnam.

Due to a very strong work ethic and strong family support many Vietnamese adapted quickly and very effectively to the American environment in which they found themselves. As the years passed immigrants adjusted to their new home. At the same time, new immigrants continued to come in from Vietnam and from other countries where they had resided since initially leaving Vietnam. Language acquisition continued to be a real need for many. Many older immigrants, having been in the United States for decades, still have not learned to speak English. While normally more aged immigrants might have a higher level of needs for human services delivery, among some in the Vietnamese population this might not be the case given the special status older individuals have and also because of the importance of family. Older family members would be given extraordinary care by their family members. However, in many families, leaving Vietnam has led to a loss of many of their cultural values. Senior adults would not have the place of honor and respect that traditional Vietnamese families would give to them. This would leave elders in these families facing undue hardships and feeling lost in a world they were not familiar with.

Most competent human service providers are able to provide somewhat effective service to Vietnamese clients, but language and cultural differences prevent the level of service from being what many Vietnamese desire. This has led to the formation of Vietnamese social and other service organizations. These organizations, staffed mostly by people of Vietnamese background, are able to deal with the language and cultural mazes that those not very familiar with special issues Vietnamese face are not able to navigate. These entities are usually found near high concentrations of people of Vietnamese descent. One example of an organization that has specialized in providing services to this community is Vietnamese Social Services of Minnesota. This is a nonprofit organization providing basic social services for the Vietnamese community. Education, health, work with elders and youth, and language work are among the services provided. In recent years this organization has broadened its scope of services to provided help to those from other backgrounds like Karen and Somali refugees.

Another example of a service provider reaching out to Vietnamese Americans in special circumstances is the Mary Queen of Vietnam Community Development Corporation (MQVCDC). This organization was formed as an extension of the Mary Queen of Vietnam Catholic Church in New Orleans. This is a large, primarily Vietnamese, church planted in the heart of an immigrant Vietnamese Community. MQVCDC was created in 2005 to help those in the Vietnamese community rebuild their lives after the devastation of Hurricane Katrina. This organization provided case management to residents seeking to rebuild their homes, lives, and businesses after the flood. MQVCDC was also very influential in getting a post-Katrina landfill very near the Vietnamese neighborhood closed. The Vietnamese community in New Orleans was among the first communities to start rebuilding and was restored almost before any other neighborhood. The Vietnamese emphasis on family helped get this community restored much more quickly. There was no shortage of neighbors and family members to help rebuild. In the years after Katrina, MQVCDC continued to provide much-needed services for the mostly immigrant community and to promote economic development. MQVCDC even helped get a new charter school in the neighborhood. The school was multicultural and taught the Vietnamese language to the students.

In 2011 the massive BP oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico, just off the Louisiana coast, had a dramatic impact on many Vietnamese residents. One of the reasons that so many Vietnamese immigrated to Louisiana after the end of the Vietnam War was that Louisiana offered a climate much like that of Vietnam and also had rich fishing and shrimping waters. A large percentage of Vietnamese earned their living from the fishing industry. The oil spill virtually shut down fishing in the Gulf of Mexico, especially near New Orleans. MQVCDC mobilized to provide a place where those negatively impacted by the oil spill could come for help. Case managers once again reached out and provided guidance and resource referral. Claims were filed for reimbursement on behalf of Vietnamese and others who had lost jobs and income. MQVCDC also helped residents develop urban farms and aquaponic endeavors so that fish could be raised in tanks on land. MQVCDC has become a needed fixture in the Vietnamese community of New Orleans.

Ken B. Taylor
New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary

See Also: Acculturation; Asian Americans; Asian Immigrants; Family Reunification; Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of; Immigration, Human Service Issues; Legal Services; Office of Refugee Resettlement; U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

Further Readings

Terrazas, Aaron and Cristina Batog, "Vietnamese Immigrants in the United States." Migration Policy

Institute. http://www.migrationpolicy.org/article/vietnamese-immigrants-united-states (Accessed March 2014).
Tseng, Winston. Immigrant Community Services in Chinese and Vietnamese Enclaves. El Paso, TX: LFB Scholarly Publishing (2006).

Volunteer Services

Volunteer services are programs or activities provided to benefit the public without the expectation of receiving payment in exchange for services. Volunteer services preceded almost every field of practice in human services. Historically, during the 18th and 19th centuries, volunteer services were responsible for improving transportation, sanitation, fire prevention, public safety, and education. Volunteer services helped bring about fair labor practices, better medical practices, and the humane treatment of the mentally ill, and brought attention to the debilitating effects of alcohol. Volunteer services founded relief societies, children's homes, day care programs, recreation services, and family and child welfare associations. Currently, volunteer services remain crucial to the quality of life of individuals and communities. Individuals benefit from receiving services. They also benefit from helping others and participating in civic matters. Volunteer services benefit communities by helping citizens gain a sense of responsibility to the greater welfare of the public. Communities also benefit from the assistance provided to individuals by volunteer services. In some instances, volunteer services are the only option for people in communities with certain needs. In other instances, communities form partnerships between volunteer services and other community agencies to expand access and improve the effectiveness of human services.

Volunteer Services and Individuals

Giving and receiving support from volunteer services contribute positively to the well-being of all people. In fact, volunteer service opportunities are one of the few activities that bring people together from diverse backgrounds to support one another. People of different races, genders, ethnicities, and religious backgrounds often interact when participating in volunteer services. The services received can benefit people regardless of their age, marital status, occupation, or socioeconomic level. In the same way, individuals from diverse backgrounds experience similar benefits when they invest time and energy volunteering to help others. For instance, one reason people volunteer is to express altruistic and humanitarian values that are important to them. Volunteering gives individuals the opportunity to act on their concern for other people. Another benefit involves providing people new learning experiences. Volunteer services give individuals a chance to acquire and use new knowledge, skills, and abilities that they might otherwise go undeveloped. Increasing and reinforcing social networks is another benefit of volunteer services. When people volunteer, they often meet new people, develop new relationships, strengthen acquaintances, and gain a sense of enhanced social status by engaging in volunteer activities that are often viewed favorably by others. For some people, volunteering can have career-related benefits. Volunteer services give individuals the chance to explore a new career or progress in their current field by gaining new skills in a short amount of time.

Human service professionals should recognize and appreciate the treatment potential of incorporating volunteer services when working with individual clients. Volunteering can be a healthy way for individuals to cope with stress, loss, or even trauma. When individuals volunteer, they usually interact with people experiencing difficult circumstances. Working with people in need helps individuals gain insight and perspective, allowing them to reduce feelings of guilt and begin feeling different about their own circumstances. Likewise, volunteering, for some people, can be a way of coping with feelings of isolation, uselessness, and hopelessness. Instead of feeling trapped by such negative feelings, individuals who volunteer can increase their self-confidence and sense of self-worth. Overall, volunteer services offer individuals the unique opportunity to build upon their strengths and capacities while simultaneously addressing social problems.

Volunteer Services and Communities

The positive influence of volunteer services on communities is multilayered and multifaceted. Consider, for instance, the effect of volunteer services on communities from an abstract, theoretical perspective. Providing opportunities for people to serve and volunteer promotes a community ethos or culture where people believe it is important to care for the needs of others. In essence, volunteer services in the community help to create an expectation that citizens participate in giving and receiving support for each other. Moreover, volunteer services help cultivate a sense of commitment for the welfare of the community beyond self-interest. As people volunteer, they take on a vested interest in what is best for everyone in a community.

Another powerful benefit for the community is the ability to bring a diverse group of people together for common purposes. Volunteer services is one of the few ways that communities can promote interaction of people from different ages, genders, income levels, or even religious beliefs. The interaction among such diverse people makes it possible for volunteer services to effectively address social problems. Stated differently, when a need or issue arises that affects enough individuals, they will collaborate with each other to address the problem. For example, if a community is dealing with an increase in vandalism, bringing a diverse group of volunteers together to clean up will help personalize the issue with a cadre of concerned citizens. Beyond cleaning up, the concerned citizens are then in a position to mobilize their efforts to minimize or eliminate vandalism in the community more so than if they simply learn about the issue from watching the news on television or reading about it in the local newspaper.

Volunteer services are usually provided at minimal or no financial cost to communities. Perhaps the best way to appreciate the financial impact on communities is to consider the replacement value of volunteer services. Replacement value represents the cost it would take to replace the services and assistance provided by volunteer services. Assessing the value of volunteer services to be approximately $18 per hour and estimating that volunteers give, on average, 4 hours per month, the overall economic contribution generated by volunteers in the United States, for example, is $239 billion each year. In some instances, the help provided by volunteer services is the only method of support available for people in a community. In such cases, the impact is even more valuable, making it difficult to assess a replacement value. For example, volunteer emergency services are usually the only avenue of support for people in crisis. If individuals in a community are without food, are about to lose their place of residence, need help paying a utility bill, or need clothing or other basic necessities for survival, volunteer services are usually the only means of getting help as quickly as needed. Even when people seek help from public agencies, when they need immediate support or relief, human service professionals at public agencies will often refer them to volunteer services for short-term assistance.

The Future of Volunteer Services

Volunteer services will continue to be important to the welfare of communities in the future. Historically, at first, volunteer services were primarily responsible for providing social welfare services. The role of public community services was minimal. Next, in the process of providing services and addressing social problems, volunteers advocated that government participation was necessary. As public community services expanded, however, a major pendulum shift occurred where government and professional human services became primarily responsible for social welfare, while volunteer services took on a supplemental role. Currently, there is a need for an optimal balance of shared responsibility between government and professional human services and volunteer services determined by the unique contexts of different communities. In some instances, government and professional human services will continue to play a leading role in addressing the well-being of people in communities. In other instances, volunteer services will play a larger role. In either case, volunteer services will continue to expand and play a crucial role in the overall quality of life for individuals and communities.

Volunteer Services and Human Service Professionals

It will be important for human service professionals to appreciate the important role of the volunteer sector in the future. As part of the knowledge and skills necessary for competent social work and other human service practice, professionals will need to know how to access volunteer services. They will also need to know how to initiate and maintain strategic partnerships with volunteer service providers as public funding for services will likely decline, and the need for services will continue to increase.

Michael E. Sherr
University of Tennessee Chattanooga

See Also: Aftercare Services for Children Aging Out of Foster Care; After-School Services; Aging and Adult Services; Changing the Client Versus Changing the Environment; Community Action Agencies; Community-Based Services; Economic Support and Services.

Further Readings

Cnaan, Ram A. "Our Hidden Safety Net." Brookings Review, v12/2 (1999).
Ellis, Susan J., and Katherine H. Campbell. By the People: A History of Americans as Volunteers. Philadelphia: Energize Inc., 2006.
Katz, Michael B. In the Shadow of the Poorhouse: A Social History of Welfare in America. New York: Basic Books, 1996.
McLean, Scott L., David A. Schultz, and Manfred B. Steger, eds. Social Capital: Critical Perspectives on Community and "Bowling Alone." New York: New York University Press, 2002.
Sherr, Michael E. Social Work with Volunteers. Chicago: Lyceum, 2008.
Trattner, William I. From Poor Law to Welfare State: A History of Social Welfare in America. New York: Free Press, 1999.
Wineburg, Robert J. A Limited Partnership. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.

Voting Rights Act of 1965

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA) is widely considered to be landmark civil rights legislation that enforces the 15th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. This act, signed into law by President Lyndon B. Johnson on August 6, 1965, authorized the federal government to oversee voter registration and elections in counties that had employed voter suppression tactics or where registration or turnout had been less than 50 percent in the November 1964 election. It also banned discriminatory literacy tests and expanded voting rights for non-English-speaking Americans.

Background

After the Civil War, several amendments to the U.S. constitution were ratified, including the 13th Amendment, which prohibited slavery, the 14th Amendment, which granted citizenship to all people born or naturalized in the United States, and the 15th Amendment, in which citizens were guaranteed the right to vote. The 15th Amendment gave Congress the authority to regulate voting.

After Reconstruction (1865–77), other means of voter suppression like violence, intimidation, and Jim Crow laws were aimed at minority voters. Initially, the Supreme Court upheld some voting provisions (United States v. Cruikshank), but by the early 20th century, the Supreme Court began to find these provisions unconstitutional. However, through the early 1960s, southern states effectively disenfranchised most black voters. Following the 1964 presidential election, a variety of civil rights organizations joined forces to demand federal intervention to prevent voter discrimination. Following the March 1965 protests in Selma, Alabama, known as Bloody Sunday, which included TV coverage of Alabama police officers beating nonviolent protesters, President Johnson addressed a joint session of Congress and called for them to pass a strong voting rights bill. Johnson's administration drafted a bill that passed the Senate in May 1965 and the House in July 1965. President Johnson signed the VRA into law on August 6, 1965, with civil rights leaders, including Martin Luther King, Jr., and Rosa Parks, in attendance.

A paper ballot from a 2008 Massachusetts state election. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 ensured that citizens could participate in the political process and vote for candidates of their choice.

Provisions

The Voting Rights Act prohibits poll taxes (Section 10), the refusal of a qualified voter to vote or the use of voter intimidation (Section 11), and literacy tests (Section 201), among other acts of voter suppression. Section 203 allows for language assistance for minority populations. Section 2 is a general prohibition on voting discrimination, allowing for federal enforcement. Congress amended this section in 1982, prohibiting any voting practice that has a discriminatory result. This section is permanent and does not require renewal. Section 3 provides for federal election examiners, suspension of any voting eligibility testing, and the requirement of preclearance for certain states and counties before changing voting practices. Section 5 states that any covered jurisdiction may not make voting changes without federal preclearance. Initially, the coverage formula of the VRA (in section 4[b]) to determine preclearance was if, as of November 1964, the jurisdiction used some form of test to restrict voter registration or if less than half of eligible voters were registered or voted in November 1964. In June 2013, the preclearance formula in section 4(b) was found to be unconstitutional in the Supreme Court case Shelby County v. Holder. Section 5 of the VRA is still enforceable, but Congress needs to readdress the preclearance formula.

States and Counties Covered by Preclearance

Many, but not all, of the preclearance states and counties were in the South, highlighting voter suppression across the United States. Before the June 2013 decision that struck down the preclearance formula, the following jurisdictions were covered by Section 5 of the VRA:

- States: Alabama (except Pinion), Alaska, Georgia (except Sandy Springs), Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, most of Texas (except for two districts), and most of Virginia (except for 24 counties).
- Counties: California (King, Monterey, and Yuba), Florida (Collier, Hardee, Hendry, Hillsborough, and Monroe), New York (Bronx, Kings [Brooklyn], New York [Manhattan]), North Carolina (40 out of its 100 counties, and South Dakota (Shannon and Todd).
- Municipalities: Michigan, including Clyde Township and Buena Vista Township.

Bail In and Bail Out

Bail out is a process by which covered jurisdictions can seek exemption from Section 4(b) preclearance. Eighteen Virginia jurisdictions; Kings Mountain, North Carolina; Sandy Springs, Georgia; and New Hampshire have all successfully bailed out. Section 3(c) provides a process for jurisdictions outside of those covered by Section 4(b) to become subject to preclearance, or bail in. While the 2013 Supreme Court ruling held section 4(b) unconstitutional, it did not affect Section 3(c), thus those jurisdictions remain subject to preclearance.

- States: Arkansas and New Mexico (has since been terminated).
- Counties: California (Los Angeles), Florida (Escambia), Nebraska (Thurston), New Mexico (Bernalillo), and South Dakota (Buffalo and Charles Mix).
- Municipalities: Tennessee (Chattanooga)

Enforcement

Section 3 provides for federal election examiners, suspensions of voter eligibility testing, and the requirement of federal preclearance to change voting practices. With the 2013 suspension of Section 4(b) preclearance formula, states, including Mississippi and Texas, immediately put into action changes to their voting laws. Section 12 of the VRA provides for civil fines and the possibility of imprisonment for anyone violating the VRA. Section 14 of the VRA describes how to bring enforcement proceedings.

Voting Rights Act Renewal

The VRA became law in 1965, and temporary provisions of the VRA were renewed in 1970, 1975, 1982, and 2006. In 2006, a group of legislators signed a letter by Steve King (R–Iowa) that objected to part of the VRA requiring language provisions for U.S. citizens who do not speak English, and a group headed by Lynn Westmoreland (R–Georgia) claimed it was unfair to continue targeting their states with preclearance; however, the VRA was renewed for another 25 years and signed by President George W. Bush in July 2006. The June 2013 ruling by the Supreme Court found Section 4(b) unconstitutional by a 5–4 margin, but the preclearance rule in Section 5 was not invalidated by this ruling. The majority opinion noted Congress cannot subject a state to preclearance based on a history of discrimination. The dissenting opinion held that Congress should have sufficient evidence to determine the coverage formula. Further, the decrease in voter discrimination is attributed much to the VRA itself, noting that "[t]hrowing out preclearance when it has worked . . . is like throwing away your umbrella in a rainstorm because you are not getting wet."

Implications for Human Services and Diversity

Voting is a way for citizens to be ensured the opportunity to participate in the political process and be represented by candidates of their choice. The VRA worked to broaden franchise to include more voters rather than discourage voting, particularly by minority populations. While the opportunity to vote is integral to democratic rule in the United States, not all populations have had that right. Building upon the 15th and 19th Amendments, the VRA of 1965 implicitly included African American, Asian American, and Alaska Native citizens and allowed for equal opportunity to vote in elections free from bias and intimidation. The VRA, however, did not just cover federal elections; it allowed for increased voting in presidential elections all the way to local school board elections.

Sarah E. Colonna
University of North Carolina at Greensboro

See Also: African Americans; Border Communities; Colonialism, Lingering Effects of; Critical Race Theory; Cultural Literacy; Cultural Paradigms; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Ethnocentrism and Ethnorelativism; Global South/Global North; Hate Group; Implicit Bias; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; Institutional Oppression; Intelligence Testing; Literacy Testing; Model Minority Stereotype; Naturalized Citizens; Office for Civil Rights; Power, Race, Ethnicity and; Prejudice, Theories of; Race, Social Definition of; Race and Clients; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Howe, Amy. Details on Shelby County v. Holder: In Plain English. SCOTUSblog. http://www.scotusblog.com/2013/06/details-on-shelby-county-v-holder-in-plain-english (Accessed June 2013).

Liptak, Adam. "Supreme Court Invalidates Key Part of Voting Rights Act." New York Times. (June 26, 2013). http://www.nytimes.com/2013/06/26/us/supreme-court-ruling.html?pagewanted=all (Accessed June 2013).

The Voting Rights Act of 1965. United States Department of Justice. http://www.justice.gov/crt/about/vot/intro/intro_b.php (Accessed August 2013).

W

War and Terrorism, Survivors of

Given the abundance of political violence and conflict in the 20th and 21st centuries, the ability to observe and make sense of how survivors of war and terrorism have fared in their communities has been widespread and, in many cases, thorough. Genocide, torture, ethnic cleansing, terrorism, civil war, and forced migration are all part of the complex puzzle that informs how researchers' understand various survivors. In the United States and other industrialized nations around the globe, more information about survivors is known and accessible. The fields of psychology, social work, sociology, health communication, and medicine, among others, provide many of the richest understandings of the various outcomes associated with survivors of war and terrorism. To distill and begin to understand the vast database of information on this topic, it may be simplest to proceed by considering the following four broad categories: health and emotional outcomes, domestic survivors of war and terrorism, international survivors of war and terrorism, and community engagement and interventions.

Health and Emotional Outcomes

Major disasters, specifically war and terrorism, are frequently associated with increased rates of psychological distress and morbidity among survivors. Posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and crisis intervention have been two of the foundational routes to examining survivor populations and although it varies by population and how the study is conducted, it has been found that, in the year following terrorist incidents, the prevalence of PTSD in directly affected populations varies between 12 and 16 percent.

More recently, a plethora of theory and data has focused on the systemic relationships between political violence and individual and collective trauma, individual and collective healing, and individual and community resilience. The individual and the collective may experience trauma, healing, and resilience differently, though they are usually interrelated experiences. Across several fields of inquiry, it is widely accepted that the disparate health and emotional needs and outcomes of survivors of war and terrorism need to be addressed in culturally diverse and context specific ways. Similarly, it is often found that traumas such as war or terrorism spur new or preexisting tensions related to race, discrimination, and social and economic inequalities, making health care and community intervention all the more necessary. Because of the intensity of the feelings of loss or displacement often associated with surviving war or terrorism, coping skills become essential. Relational communication has also been considered integral given the high levels of anxiety, depression, and loneliness found among survivors, with many reporting reduced social involvement, feelings of social detachment, a sense of alienation, and diminished interest in life.

Domestic (United States) Survivors of War and Terrorism

Given the nation's relative involvement in political violence in the past 100 years, the United States has a comparatively large population of survivors of war and terrorism. One group that has been effectively tracked, specifically by the Department of Veteran Affairs (VA), in terms of overall well-being are veterans. According to the 2010 census, there are 21.8 million veterans (20.1 million male and 1.6 million female) in the United States, represented mainly by the veterans from World War II, the Korean War, the Vietnam era, and both Gulf War eras. Among these veterans, 17.5 million are Caucasian, 2.4 million are black, 1.4 million are Latino or Hispanic, 265,000 are Asian, 157,000 are American Indian or Alaska Native, and 28,000 are Native Hawaiian or Pacific Islander (note: the figures represent only those reporting a single race). Among these veterans, there are several notable distinctions.

First, on average, veterans make $10,000 more per year than nonveterans and own 9 percent of all businesses in the United States. Still, roughly 8,000 veterans commit suicide each year, often as a result of an untreated mental health issue such as PTSD or other adjustment reactions. Close combat during war has been one of the major predictors of mental health complications among veterans. In addition, experiences of war and terrorism by civilians have been examined.

Most notably, the 9/11 attacks and the Oklahoma City bombing had enormous effects on survivors. A more recent American Medical Association study found that 11 percent of all New Yorkers showed symptoms of PTSD 2 months after the 9/11 attacks, which is almost three times the national average. Not surprisingly, this was found to be heavily correlated with the amount of media coverage consumed. Also, the emotion found to be more common than anger among survivors is a pervasive fear of everything that begins to loom in the survivors' consciousness, beginning with their first awareness of their loved one's death and persisting for several years or more.

International Survivors of War and Terrorism

International political conflict is quite prevalent, with several wars occurring in various locations around the globe at any given time. Cultural, social, economic, and political factors all impact survivors of these conflicts in a myriad of ways. For example, in an individualistic culture like the United States, in terms of health care and adjustment support, more attention may be paid to the individual who survived, while in a collectivistic culture like Japan, the recovery focus will likely be on the larger group. The culture in which survivors are living may greatly impact the experience of recovery.

The era in which the violence occurred may play a large role. Rwanda's genocide occurred in 1994, and in the aftermath of the enormous national trauma, a progressive form of transitional justice was used: the Gacaca Courts. The Gacaca Courts system was a process of justice rooted in the notion of reconciliation and unity for all Rwandans. Similarly, independent nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), nonprofit organizations (NPOs), national governments, and internationally recognized entities such as the United Nations (UN) have examined survivors of the Holocaust, the Khmer Rouge, and Sudan's Civil War, among others, revealing widespread and prolific experiences of suffering, migration, displacement, and grief following these major traumas.

Community Engagement and Intervention

The role of the community in recovering from war or terrorism plays a crucial role in survivors' lives. There are several engagement and intervention models that have been used in various communities, yet many overlap with some basic ideas related to developing multilayered approaches, considering social ecology, increasing community competence, fostering a sense of safety and calm, and valuing connectedness. Nearly all models argue for several phases of recovery. More specifically, the project on trauma, peace building, and development initiated by the International Conflict Research Institute (INCORE) generated several recommendations for psychosocial support and transformation including, but not limited to, creating historical and intergenerational awareness, supporting livelihoods and economic initiatives, taking into account the valuable role of dialogue, the interconnection between psychosocial support and peace-building efforts, and avoiding the narrow focus of the individual trauma and instead focusing the collective strengths. Needless to say, communities and thoughtful interventions play a crucial role in helping survivors reacclimatize in society.

Unfortunately, survivors of war and terrorism are not uncommon, with local and global political violence impacting millions of individuals domestically and internationally every year. Some estimates suggest that terrorism is likely on the rise, yet it is hard to predict the future in this realm. Still, the experience of war or terrorism is harsh for many survivors, and individual and community intervention is almost always necessary to provide the needed support required by these vulnerable populations.

C. Vail Fletcher
University of Portland, Oregon

See Also: Children and War; Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Displaced Persons; Holocaust Survivors; Military Veterans; National Institute of Mental Health; Office of Refugee Resettlement; Rape as an Instrument of War; Torture, Survivors of; Veterans Services.

Further Readings

DiMaggio, Charles and Sandra Galea. “The Behavioral Consequences of Terrorism: A Meta-Analysis.” Academic Emergency Medicine, v.13 (2006).

Miller, Laurence. “Psychotherapeutic Interventions for Survivors of Terrorism.” American Journal of Psychotherapy, v.58 (2004).

Moghimi, Yavar. “Anthropological Discourses on the Globalization of Posttraumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) in Post-Conflict Societies.” Journal of Psychiatric Practice, v.18 (2012).

National Institute of Mental Health. Mental Health and Mass Violence: Evidence-Based Early Psychological Intervention for Victims/Survivors of Mass Violence. A Workshop to Reach Consensus on Best Practices. NIH Publication (No. 02-5138). Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 2002.

Saul, Jack. Collective Trauma, Collective Healing: Promoting Community Resilience in the Aftermath of Disaster. New York: Routledge/Taylor and Francis Group, 2014.

Williams, Meagan and Sandra Thompson. “The Use of Community-Based Interventions in Reducing Morbidity From the Psychological Impact of Conflict-Related Trauma Among Refugee Populations: A Systematic Review of the Literature.” Journal of Immigrant and Minority Health, v.13 (2011).

War on Poverty Programs

The war on poverty began in the 1960s, and as legislation was implemented, programs developed, and staffing needs were met by skilled human service workers. Diverse populations and relevant social issues were addressed creating a range of solutions and service providers.

In 1963, President John F. Kennedy asked his advisors to prepare a legislative agenda to address poverty. During his 1964 State of the Union address, President Lyndon B. Johnson declared: “Unfortunately, many Americans live on the outskirts of hope—some because of their poverty, and some because of their color, and all too many because of both. Our task is to help replace their despair with opportunity. This administration today, here and now, declares unconditional war on poverty in America. I urge this Congress and all Americans to join with me in that effort.”

The call to action suggested that society should not just deal with the symptoms but rather attack poverty at its roots through improved educational opportunities, health care, and job creation. President Johnson set in motion the largest package of legislation to deal with poverty and unemployment since Franklin D. Roosevelt’s (FDR) New Deal legislation to counter the effects of the Great Depression. The war on poverty legislation and the Civil Rights Act of 1965 formed the basis of the Great Society domestic programs of the 1960s.

Legislation and Programs

Four pieces of legislation are identified with the war on poverty: the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, the Social Security Act of 1965, the Food Stamp Act of 1965, and the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

The first piece of legislation was the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, which created the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO). The OEO provided state grants to establish antipoverty projects, which resulted in numerous education and work training programs, many of which continue to today. Job Corps provided work, basic education, and training for young men and women, while Neighborhood Youth Corps provided work and training for those from impoverished families and neighborhoods. Work Study funded grants to colleges and universities for part-time employment of students from low-income families to help them finance their educations.

Urban and Rural Community Action provided financial and technical assistance to local projects for community-based activities that included the participation of poor individuals. Adult Basic Education programs focused on teaching reading and writing in English to improve job opportunities. Investment incentives provided small business loans. Funding was provided for demonstration projects to provide training and work opportunities to individuals who were poor or receiving public assistance. Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA), envisioned as the domestic Peace Corps, trained volunteers for public agencies or private nonprofit organizations. Young people were given the opportunity to see and combat poverty at the community level. In the summer of 1965, Project Head Start began as an 8-week OEO program designed to help break the cycle of poverty by providing preschool children of low-income families with educational enhancement to reduce the achievement gap between poor and middle-class students.

The original Social Security Act of 1935 was part of FDR's New Deal legislation to eradicate poverty among retired workers. The Social Security Act of 1965 created Medicare and Medicaid, the first federal programs to provide health care to the elderly and the poor. Both were seen as alternatives to universal health insurance for all Americans. Health care options for the elderly had been debated and various options proposed since the original 1935 legislation. Title XIX of the Social Security Act is a federal and state entitlement program that pays for medical assistance for certain individuals and families with low incomes and resources. Medicaid does not provide benefits for all poor individuals but only for those who fall into federally defined needy groups. States have the option of offering Medicaid assistance to additional individuals.

In 1961 President Kennedy signed an executive order to expand food distribution to the poor, and in 1965, President Johnston signed the Food Stamp Act to make these food projects permanent. Administered by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, its goals were to strengthen the agricultural economy and provide improved levels of nutrition for low-income households. The income levels established for eligibility for this program were set higher than other welfare programs and allowed many low-income and working-poor families to subsidize their food budgets when they did not qualify for other welfare programs.

The Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 promoted equal access to education and established high standards and accountability. Title I provided funding to schools and school districts, with a high percentage of students from low-income families, to develop programs to improve academic performance. This legislation was revised by the Education Amendments of 1972, which instituted Title IX, prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sex in educational institutions receiving federal aid. In 2002, it was reauthorized by Congress as the No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB).

Diversity and the War on Poverty

President Johnson also signed the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to eradicate racial discrimination, which allowed many African Americans to take advantage of federal and state programs. According to Joseph A. Califano, Jr., a former U.S. Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, Johnson's Great Society legislation has been credited with reducing the national poverty rate from 22 percent in 1963 to approximately 13 percent by 1970.

At the time of the war on poverty, the poverty rate for African and Latino Americans was higher than for non-Latino whites and Asian Americans. The legislative programs that composed the war on poverty were very effective in reducing the rate of poverty for African and non-Latino white Americans. The percentage of non-Latino white Americans living at or below the poverty rate dropped from 18.1 percent in 1959 to 9.1 percent in 1969; similarly, the rate dropped from 55.1 percent to 32.2 percent among African Americans, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. Unfortunately, data was not collected on poverty rates for Latino or Asian Americans until later. By 1972, the poverty rate among Latino Americans was 22.8 percent, and the earliest data on Asian Americans, in 1987, was 16.1 percent. Poverty continues to reflect racial disparities in the United States.

The war on poverty, coupled with the Civil Rights Act, allowed many African Americans to have access to public welfare, education, and job training programs. Barriers were removed that had historically prevented many from participating in federally funded programs, and many settings became racially integrated.

The new and expanded programs required staffing by human services workers holding vocational training certifications, high school diplomas, and associate's or bachelor's degrees. Participants in many job training and educational programs were able to get off of welfare and continue their educations, eventually entering the human services fields as paraprofessional or community workers. Because many of the participants in the war on poverty programs were members of minority groups, this brought staffing diversity to agencies and programs.

Adele Weiner
Metropolitan College of New York
Kim Lorber
Ramapo College of New Jersey

See Also: Education for Diversity in Human Services; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Head Start and Prekindergarten Programs; Poverty.

Further Readings

Califano, Jr., Joseph A. "What Was Great About the Great Society?" Washington Monthly Online. http://www.washingtonmonthly.com/features/1999/9910.califano.html#byline (Accessed January 2014).

Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (ESEA). http://www.house.gov/legcoun/Comps/EDII_CMD.PDF (Accessed January 2014).

Johnson, Lyndon B. "Annual Message to the Congress on the State of the Union, January 8, 1964." http://www.lbjlib.utexas.edu/johnson/archives.hom/speeches.hom/640108.asp (Accessed January 2014).

PBS. "The American Experience, War on Poverty." http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/americanexperience/features/bonus-video/presidents-economy-lbj (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Census Bureau. "Historical Poverty Tables—People, Table 2. Poverty Status, by Family Relationship, Race, and Hispanic Origin." http://www.census.gov/hhes/www/poverty/data/historical/people.html (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Department of Agriculture, Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program. "A Short History of SNAP." http://www.fns.usda.gov/snap/rules/Legislation/about.htm (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Social Security Administration. "Legislative History." http://www.ssa.gov/history/law.html (Accessed January 2014).

U.S. Social Security Administration, Office of Retirement and Disability Policy. "Medicaid Program Description and Legislative History." http://www.ssa.gov/policy/docs/statcomps/supplement/2011/medicaid.html (Accessed January 2014).

Welfare Reform, Role of

The Great Depression was the most traumatic phenomenon that America experienced during the 19th century. During the Great Depression, our traditional faith in ourselves was badly shaken. We came to the realization that government intervention was needed to effectively counter life's blows. The 1920s decade was largely a time of prosperity in the United States. Then in October 1929, the New York Stock Exchange crashed. Many investors lost their businesses, homes, and life savings. The number of people who were unemployed rose from 3 million in the spring of 1929 to 15 million in January 1933. Many banks closed as farmers and business owners went bankrupt. In some states, relief efforts were launched to provide assistance for the millions of people who were poverty stricken as a result of the depressed economy. However, only 40 percent of the population received some type of aid.

In 1932, Franklin Delano Roosevelt was elected president of the United States. Roosevelt instituted emergency legislation that provided assistance for the jobless and poor. He also admonished the legislature to review the constitution and remember its responsibility to provide for the welfare of each American. The states were the conduits through which federal dollars would flow to provide for those affected by the economy's depressed state. Programs such as the Works Progress Administration, a workforce program in which Americans obtained employment through state, local, and the federal government were established. Low-interest loans were given to farmers and to small business operators to regain entrepreneur status, and it also gave them an opportunity to hire those who did not have federal jobs. Programs were also designed for youth that provided resources for college and employment training.

Today, fewer people are staying on welfare, and fewer are applying for benefits. Several state evaluations of the welfare reform program indicate that many welfare recipients have foregone cash payments for paychecks. Of course, there is ample room for debate over what constitutes a decent job and self-sustaining wage. Further, initial studies show that, while most people who left the welfare rolls found jobs, about one-third of the recipients could not obtain employment. Research intimated that the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996, which replaced Aid to Families of Dependent Children (AFDC) with the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) program, made the massive contemporary experiment possible in accessing the role of welfare reform in society. TANF strictly limits the number of months a family can receive cash aid. Welfare under TANF became a block grant to the states instead of an entitlement, allowing states to set work requirements and to sanction citizens who were not willing to meet them. Simply put, welfare reform was designed to move people from dependence to self-sufficiency. The welfare reform law allows former welfare recipients to retain some of their cash assistance as well as noncash benefits such as health insurance and child-care services while making the transition into the workplace. The welfare program underwent many changes when TANF replaced AFDC. Under AFDC, women and children received cash and in-kind benefits, which provided their sustenance on a monthly basis. For more than 60 years, the federal government in cooperation with state governments provided cash and in-kind benefits to families who met certain eligibility requirements.

In order to obtain the cash and in-kind benefits from AFDC, however, a family had to qualify for this assistance by meeting certain rigid eligibility requirements. For a family to meet these requirements, applicants should demonstrate that they were the custodial parents; that they were unemployed; and that their children were under the age of 18. Families had to be literally penniless to qualify for assistance. Families were cleared for assistance only after they were cleared by a state welfare worker. It is interesting to note that, after qualifying for the resources, the recipient was then restricted from working to earn any additional income. This self-defeating regulation virtually guaranteed that a family would stay on welfare and would remain poor.

Under the new law, TANF limited the number of months a family would receive welfare assistance. Another major change was that recipients were now required to work in order to receive cash and in-kind benefits. Also, in an effort to gain cooperation from state governments, the federal government gave the power to the states for the management and operations of the new reform programs. Under the reform rules, each state would now be responsible for developing workforce programs that would equip their constituents with employment skills and provide jobs when these skills were actualized.

In the state of Georgia, Governor Zell Miller began to look at the bulging welfare rolls. In 1995, there were 150,000 active cases in the state. Initial steps were taken to connect welfare benefits to personal responsibilities and work. Legislation was submitted by Governor Miller and was passed by the Georgia general assembly, which established a family cap on the number of months a parent could receive benefits. An employment requirement was instituted that sanctioned able-bodied recipients, with no children under the age of 4, who quit or refused to take a full-time job. Eligible teenage mothers were forced to live with their parent or guardian before they were eligible to receive services. Georgia was one of the nation's first states to target TANF recipients who reached the end of their assistance through its Good Works Program. In 1997, the number of adults on assistance dropped from 84,801 to 57,236. This was a reduction of about 33 percent. However, celebration of the success of this decrement was short-lived when the financial solvency of the U.S. economy took a nosedive. Corporate moguls over the years concocted elaborate fiscal schemes through stocks, bonds, and subprime loans. These actions precipitated a domino effect that caused the collapse of the economy. Highly skilled individuals who lost their jobs in corporate America and local midlevel positions moved to service areas. This action closed opportunities for TANF recipients as employers opted for hiring highly skilled employees for lesser pay.

The implementation of a workforce development program was put forward as a way to help these new welfare reform workers adjust to the new requirements of the new law. Workforce development was designed as a multifaceted approach, which addressed the range of factors impacting the ability of individuals of various classes, specifically former welfare recipients, and their ability to function on a job. The Workforce Development Program instituted a systems perspective. Unlike more traditional approaches, it was broad and comprehensive rather than just addressing education and the training of individual frontline workers. The primary aim of the Workforce Development Program was to facilitate change and to help sustain a welfare-to-work, or TANF, workforce. Methods utilized were formal education, training, workplace training, mentoring, supervision, on-the-job training, online training, and best practice guidelines.

Collaboration between welfare and workforce development agencies has increased since the implementation of welfare reform, the Welfare to Work Grant program, and the Workforce Investment Act. The welfare and workforce development system has proven to be an effective system of employment and training services for welfare recipients. Different patterns of coordination and integration have emerged on the state and local levels in response to the flexibility afforded by the TANF program. The Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, the Workforce Investment Act and legislation authorizing the Welfare to Work Grant program created new opportunities and incentives for collaboration. However, in 2007, America faced a general slowdown in economic activity, a downturn in the business cycle, and a reduction in the amount of goods and services produced and sold. Furthermore, in 2011, states implemented some of the harshest cuts in recent history for many of the nation's most vulnerable families with children who were receiving assistance through the federal TANF block grant. The cuts affected 700,000 low-income families that included 1.3 million children; these families represented more than one-third of all low-income families receiving TANF nationwide.

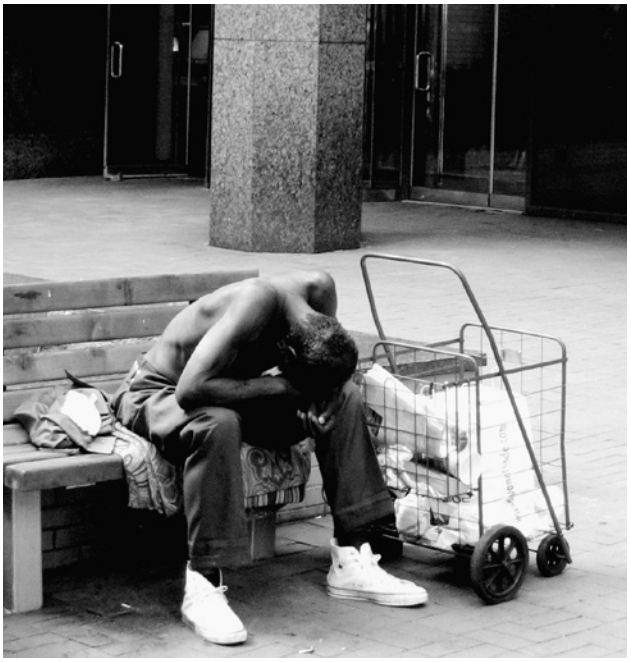
Finding jobs for welfare recipients presented another problem. Communities discovered that this was not an easy task because most of the welfare recipients had virtually no job skills and required extensive training. As a result, most of the recipients were placed in low-paying service jobs that had little to no opportunity for promotions and very little chance for a successful work experience. Also, communities discovered that many welfare recipients were not suited for any type of job because of their low educational attainment. Because of their lack of education, even jobs available to former welfare recipients were dead-end, low-paying positions that offered little chance for a satisfactory job experience.

Welfare recipients represent a large segment of the nation's population and a large portion of the nation's budget. Single adults, mostly mothers, are the head of about 70 percent of all the households who were receiving assistance from TANF. The rest of the families, or about 30 percent, are composed of two-parent families or children living with an adult caretaker not included in the welfare grant. The average monthly TANF payment amount per family in 1997 was about $362, which was about one-third of the amount of the federal poverty line for a family of three. Welfare recipients often face personal or family challenges that make it difficult for them to switch from welfare to work. One survey indicated that 44 percent of parents on welfare experienced significant obstacles to work. These obstacles included but were not limited to remedial levels of education, lack of work experience, caring for young or disabled children, lack of day-care services when employment was obtained, and very poor mental or physical health. An even greater problem was that many of the TANF recipients were unhappy with the jobs they had acquired from their state social service agencies under the new welfare reform programs.

Additionally, a number of states have cut cash assistance deeply for families that already live far below the poverty line, ended it entirely for many other families with physical or mental health issues or other challenges, or cut child care or other work-related assistance that make it harder for many poor parents fortunate enough to have jobs to keep them. At least five states—California, Washington, South Carolina, Wisconsin, and New Mexico—and the District of Columbia have cut monthly cash assistance benefits for TANF families, reducing already very low benefits. These cuts are pushing hundreds of thousands of families and children below, or further below, half of the poverty line. Many of the cuts run counter to states' longstanding approaches to welfare reform. For example, some states that had provided support to poor parents working in low-wage jobs have abandoned those policies. Similarly, states have shortened their time limits, eliminated some bases for extensions or exemptions, and applied these changes retroactively. As a result, states have terminated or reduced benefits for some of the most vulnerable families.

The initial premise of welfare reform was to break the cycle of poverty and end generational welfare dependency in America as outlined under the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996. It was largely dependent upon former welfare recipients successfully finding and keeping permanent jobs. The evaluation of the welfare reform program has focused on how well business employers are able to relate to and accommodate former welfare recipients as new employees in the workforce and decrease the number of individuals who have been recipients of these benefits throughout their family life cycle. However, because of the recent cuts in the federal budget and the ever-increasing unemployment rate, analysts have found that many of the strides made in removing welfare recipients from the federal and state apportionments have flip-flopped the economy into a menagerie of sorts because now there are now more people in poverty due to the loss of their income as a result of the recession. Those who are not eligible for the monthly benefits provided by the social welfare system are now applying for food stamps and general assistance (GA) after passing through an eligibility or means test.

Studies concerning welfare reform are limited to analyzing the need for welfare for those individuals who are considered poverty stricken. The decision by the government to place the responsibility of the care of its constituents on the states is a major departure from contemporary welfare and appears to be returning its attention back to rugged individualism. Also, the changes caused by welfare reform have shifted the way research is conducted. In analyzing the role of welfare reform, it is important to note that society has shifted from an environmental reform approach to more technological reform. Life is interpreted through images and sound bites. In answering this question it is important to keep in mind the following: (1) Research is encouraged in order to develop baseline data on the former welfare recipients who were participants in workforce development and other programs. (2) Policy makers encourage the use of research of the workforce development programs to find out what part of the program was successful and how could they improve on meeting the needs of the indigent and those who are displaced in the job market. (3) Programs should be developed to deal specifically with research findings related to welfare reform and workforce development. (4) Human services professionals can become advocates for this population group to insure that they receive adequate training in addition to job referrals and placements.



A homeless man on a New York City street. While the initial premise of welfare reform was to break the cycle of poverty, it was largely dependent on recipients finding jobs.

Michelle E. Martin
DePaul University

See Also: Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Historical Role of; Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act; Temporary Aid to Needy Families.

Further Readings

Ajo, A. A Multivariate Analysis of Job Satisfaction in the Study of the Management of Human Resources. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Atlanta University, Georgia, 1987.

Hefferman, J., G. Suttersworth, and R. Ambrosino. Social Work and Social Welfare: An Introduction, 3rd ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 1997.

Loprest, P. Families Who Left Welfare: Who Are They and How Are They Doing? Urban Institute, 1999.

Loprest, P. and T. Roberts. Final Synthesis Report of Findings From ASPE "Leavers" Grant. Washington, DC: Urban Institute, 2001.

Pavetti, L. and A. Gregory. Moving Up, Moving Out or Going Nowhere: A Study of the Employment Patterns of Young Women and the Implications for Welfare Mothers. Washington, DC: Urban Institute, 1997.

Relave, N. "Improving Collaboration Between Welfare and Workforce Development Agencies." Welfare Information Network Issue Notes, v.6/4 (2002).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Low Income and Low-Skilled Workers in Non-Standard Employment. Washington, DC: Author, 1999.

Waymer, R. A Study of Work Autonomy and Job Satisfaction of Social Workers in Metropolitan Atlanta. Doctoral dissertation, Atlanta University, 1995.

Zastrow, C. Introduction to Social Work. Wadsworth Publishers, 2000.

Western Communities and Cultural Competence

Western communities include, broadly, those of Europe (especially western Europe and in some contexts, the differences with eastern Europe are relevant) and the countries formed in large part by European immigration and colonization, such as those of the Americas, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. Though much of Africa is as far west as much of Europe, Africa is usually not considered part of either the West or the East (which generally refers to Asia). Western communities share a cultural heritage in which Christianity and Judaism, the philosophers and political traditions of the ancient Mediterranean world (especially Greece and Rome), and the arts, sciences, philosophy, and political thought of the Renaissance and Enlightenment have all played formative roles, as have the Scientific Revolution, the Industrial Revolution, the Catholic Church, and the early Protestant denominations in shaping European history, and the economic, political, and cultural effects of the age of discovery and colonization.

Though there are clearly many differences within Western culture, and within any given Western culture there are great differences of opinion and of values, when we speak of Western culture, we speak of the cluster of facts, events, associations, works of art and writing, scientific and political traditions, and other cultural elements that provide a common frame of reference. This frame of reference includes a tradition upholding the values of rational thought (and the scientific method), human rights, equality and equal justice, democracy, fairness, free thought, the separation of church and state, and a respect for the variety of cultures and faiths in the world. It also includes a history of racism, sexism, cultural imperialism, and economic exploitation, and many important modern features of Western culture developed in response to these ills.

Culture is a messy concept. Any individual is a member of multiple cultures. In addition to being an American and a resident of South Carolina, she may be a Red Sox fan, a Wellesley alumna, a progressive Democrat, a Daughter of the American Revolution, a debutante, a Methodist, a feminist, a graduate of the Iowa Writers Workshop, a poet, a blogger, a hipster, a mother—all descriptors that refer (or can refer) to membership in some larger group with its own traditions and values, its own sense of itself, and what is or is not a part of itself. Some of these cultures loom larger than others: Being a Red Sox fan may not make her any less able to relate to other Americans, but attending two prestigious college programs and having time to spend on low-paying work like blogging and poetry despite having at least one child to raise may make it difficult for her to relate to migrant workers with poor English fluency who send most of their income home to a family they only see for a few months a year.

Cultural competence is the ability to interact with members of other cultures in a way that is respectful, effective, and meaningful without adopting stances like culture blindness, which claims to ignore differences and deal only with the individual without acknowledging that culture impacts not only what sort of individual we are but also how we conduct ourselves, how we communicate, and how we expect to be communicated with. (Just as color blindness with respect to race often means treating others as though they were white, so does culture blindness often mean treating others as though they share one culture, which is not as productive as the "culture blind" may believe.) Cultural competence is important for everyone, particularly as the United States becomes less predominantly white and globalization and the Internet increase contact and communication among people in far-flung corners of the world. But, it is critical for people working in human services because that increasingly diverse world means that it is more and more likely that, in any worker–client combination, there will be some cultural difference. The nature of human services work is such that failing to negotiate with this difference, failing to effectively engage and communicate with the client, is a serious problem and may be serious enough to prevent any work from being done.

Working with a victim of domestic abuse, for instance, requires understanding the norms of the victim's culture (and of the perpetrator's culture) in order to know which questions to ask, which signs to look for, and which responses to expect. Cultural norms have successfully been used as a defense in domestic violence cases by Asian immigrant defendants; for instance, the court upheld the idea that, if physical discipline of a wife was the norm back home, it did not become abuse when transpiring in the United States. This is not to say such a view is acceptable—no matter the court decision—only to underscore the cultural differences that arise when dealing with issues like gender and violence. An abused wife may not identify with the idea of being the victim of abuse if she has been raised to expect it, which does not excuse it, but means that the abuse is likely to continue or go unpunished if the human services worker is not competent enough to bridge the cultural gap in order to meaningfully work with the victim,perhaps the abuser, and their family and community. At the same time, cultural competence means avoiding false positives in detecting such problems: The red marks on a minor patient's skin may look like physical abuse but be the result of a coin harmlessly rubbed on the skin, a cultural practice for treating fever. Other symptoms may be the result of side effects of home remedies that should be discontinued but do not constitute abuse.

Cultural competence should not be confused with linguistic competence, and it is not a service that can be provided by an interpreter; often competence means knowing when one's own fluency in a second language is insufficient and a more fluent interpreter should be called upon, but simply interpreting dialogue is not sufficient to confer cultural competence.

Textbook examples of cultural competence in a service context frequently refer to health care examples because health care is the field that has pioneered implementing cultural competence in workers. Community health centers first developed culturally competent care programs in the 1960s. Urgent care facilities in New York City, for instance, have a long history of serving a population with incredible cultural, religious, ethnic, and linguistic diversity. The Ryan-NENA Community Health Center in New York's Lower East Side has developed a cultural competence program that has in turn been used as a model for a proposed cultural competence program for Denmark's universal health care system. Staff at Ryan-NENA are almost all bilingual, and community needs assessments are performed on a regular basis.

But, cultural competence is not limited to health care either. The American Library Association lists 11 standards in its guide to cultural competence: cultural awareness of self and others; cross-cultural knowledge and skills; organizational and professional values; development of collections, programs, and services; service delivery; language diversity; workforce diversity; organizational dynamics; cross-cultural leadership; professional education and continuous learning; and research.

Bill Kte'pi
Independent Scholar

See Also: Acculturation; African Americans; Alaskan Natives; Arab Americans; Asian Americans; Assimilation; Biculturalism; Cuban Americans; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Training in; Cultural Literacy; Culturally Specific Services; Dominican Americans; Ethnicity and Clients; Ethnocentrism; European Americans; Haitian Americans; Hawai'ian Native Americans; Hispanic Americans; Mormons; Muslim Americans; Pacific Islanders.

Further Readings

Brown, Laura S. Cultural Competence in Trauma Therapy. Washington, DC: American Psychological Association, 2008.
Hogan, Mikel. The Four Skills of Cultural Diversity Competence. Stamford, CT: Cengage Learning, 2012.
Moule, Jean. Cultural Competence: A Primer for Educators. Stamford, CT: Cengage Learning, 2011.
Perez, Miguel A. and Raffy R. Luguis, eds. Cultural Competence in Health Education and Health Promotion. New York: Jossey-Bass, 2008.

White Privilege

White privilege describes unearned advantages afforded to people who are assumed, based largely on complexion and specific physical features, to be of European, especially western European, ancestry. The concept of white privilege emerged from within critical race theory (CRT), a branch of jurisprudence that argues race-based (and other) preferences are embedded in societal laws and policies rather than merely a function of discrepant interpretation and enforcement of these directives. CRT scholars assert that justice (meted out via societal rules) has never been blind, neutral, or objective, but because it is touted to be all of these things, it favors people who are, or are presumed to be, white by enabling political and economic systems and corresponding power structures to grant only these people unmerited and simultaneously unacknowledged advantages. At the same time, these systems and structures disadvantage people who cannot pass as white while simultaneously denying that such institutional disadvantage is occurring and asserting that challenges these people experience are a function of their individual or group (often characterized as cultural) deficiencies.

In the 1990s, CRT began to be formally extended from law to other fields of study, including human services. As a result, the manners in which white privilege operate in society have been further explicated. From a human services work perspective, white privilege can be understood as the standard against which so-called normal human functioning is measured. Inherent, but often undeclared, in this work is the focus on the individual rather than on groups or communities in the context of a competitive rather than cooperative or collaborative social order. Because white privilege erroneously promotes the ideal that white people function independently (as individuals), at the same time that it affords only white people various forms of assistance (based on group membership), people of color are more likely to be judged as functioning abnormally because they are both visibly identifiable as nonwhites (a group) and also often consciously identify themselves as members of various other groups and because they often prioritize alliance-oriented approaches in pursuing the activities of daily living (ADLs) at the focus of human services interventions.

Illness in Man or Society

In the 1960s, progressive social scientists began asking whether madness originated in humans or society. Was mental illness a function of human biological predisposition or social maladaptation, or was society itself sick, thus were people deemed unwell actually expressing what could be understood as normal (adaptive) responses to a dysfunctional system? If the latter, then people deemed well had to be undertood as, in fact, mentally ill in that they failed to express recognition of societal malady.

This line of inquiry led to the development of racial identity development models, which examined the manners in which the self-concepts of white and black peoples, born into institutionally racist societies, are systematically differentially impacted. Inherent in these models (and others that have been developed since) is the argument that racism (among other forms of discrimination) is a sickness that infects both agents and targets of it. However, when racism is codified in a society (as opposed to simply being expressed between peoples engaged with one another on more or less equitable footing), the sickness of the dominant group is, through white privilege, rendered invisible, and that of the nondominant group is amplified.

Medical scientists have consistently maintained that mental and physical illnesses are the function of physiological imbalances in human biology that can be corrected with medication or behavioral modification. While these scientists use the phrase allostatic load to describe the wear and tear on the body produced by chronic exposure to stress, they pay only limited attention to the idea of institutional racism as a chronic stressor that disproportionately impacts racial minorities.

Multicultural Transformation of Human Services Practice

While individual human service workers cannot change larger societal biases that more negatively affect some of their clients than others, they can alter the perspectives from which they engage their work and, in so doing, enable their clients to secure more durable solutions to life challenges. Toward this end, beginning in the 1970s, a degree of multicultural consciousness has emerged in the literature and practice deriving therefrom in various human services-related fields. Largely well-meaning, this work has been framed in terms of working with the culturally different, or the diverse client, or multicultural populations.

While these orientations are a step in a positive direction, they continue to center whiteness as the point of reference from which most of the work is being done. That is, the white client and her or his culture are still, at least implicitly, the covert norms against which so-called cultural difference is being recognized. Further, white clients are not typically included in the pool of clients named diverse or multicultural. As a result, there is an implicit bias, still eminanting from white privilege, that continues to regulate the work. According to this bias, white clients are just clients, and thus, the nature of human services work with them is just work. In contrast, racial minority clients are, on the one hand, made unique, often even to the point of being seen as exotic and, on the other hand, reduced to a monolithic, often still deficit other.

While the manners in which people of color are being engaged as clients in human services work are beginning to trend toward a more sociopolitically located or socially just frame of reference, there is work still to be done to more effectively extricate this work from its historical tethering to institutional racism and white privilege. Foundational to this effort are the needs to: (1) better prepare human service workers to understand how power relations function in the work for individuals, groups, and society at large; and (2) proactively recruit and retain people of color as researchers and practitioners in human service fields. It is imperative that white people and culture, and related mental and physical health needs, can be examined in human services work as pathological and deficit at the same time that people and cultures of color, and corresponding comprehensive health care requirements, are considered through myriad human service work lenses that uphold them as models of health and well-being, thus models to which white society should aspire.

Christine Clark
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

See Also: Bias in Service Delivery; Changing the Client Versus Changing the Environment; Critical Race Theory; Cultural Determinism; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Ethnocentrism; Institutional Oppression; Melting Pot Theory; Monoculturalism; Race, Social Definition of; Race and Clients; Racial Identity Development, Models of; Reverse Discrimination; Social Darwinism.

Further Readings

Cross, Jr., William. "The Thomas and Cross Models of Psychological Nigrescence: A Review." Journal of Black Psychology, v.5/1 (1978).

Delgado, Richard and Jean Stefancic, eds. Critical White Studies: Looking Behind the Mirror. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1997.

Egerter, Susan, Paula Braveman, and Colleen Barclay. "Stress and Health." Exploring the Social Determinants of Health, v.1/3 (2011).

Helms, Janet. "Toward a Theoretical Explanation of the Effects of Race on Counseling: A Black and White Model." The Counseling Psychologist, v.12/4 (1984).

Ladson-Billings, Gloria and William Tate. "Toward a Critical Race Theory of Education." Teachers College Record, v.97/1 (1995).

Laing, Ronald D. The Divided Self: An Existential Study in Sanity and Madness. New York: Penguin, 1965.

López, Ian Haney. White By Law: The Legal Construction of Race. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

Omi, Michael and Howard Winant. Racial Formation in the United States: From the 1960s to the 1990s. New York: Routledge, 1994.

Sue, Derald Wing and David Sue. Counseling the Culturally Different: Theory and Practice. New York: John Wiley, 1990.

Szasz, Thomas. The Manufacture of Madness: A Comparative Study of the Inquisition and the Mental Health Movement. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1997.

Terry, Robert. "The Negative Impact of White Values." In Benjamin Bowser et al., eds., Impacts of Racism on White Americans. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage. 1981.

Women, Battered

A battered woman is a woman who experiences physical and psychological abuse within a romantic relationship. Interpersonal violence is observed worldwide; however, it occurs more frequently in some cultures than in others. In these cultures, violence and the violent treatment of women may be socially condoned either directly or indirectly. Interpersonal violence also occurs across socioeconomic groups, with more reported violence occurring within lower income groups. Most of the interpersonal violence studied occurs in heterosexual relationships; however, some lesbian and transgender people also batter their female partners.

Battering Relationships

Battering relationships can be distinguished from nonbattering (but also violent relationships) by several characteristics. In battering relationships, the violence is conceived as the means a batterer uses to exert power and control over his partner. In the United States, many women describe the early development of the battering relationship in similar terms. Often, the relationship with the batterer develops quickly, and the batterer develops a rapid and intense affection for the female partner. Over time, the relationship changes, and the batterer may become jealous, controlling, or volatile. The batterer may or may not express remorse for early episodes of physical or emotional abuse, but most often, the violence is minimized and excused. Over time, the violence or psychological abuse used against the partner tends to become more frequent and severe. The term cycle of abuse is used to describe abusive relationships that are characterized by periods of relative calm, increasing tension, and an eventual violent episode, sometimes followed by a honeymoon period, where the batterer expresses remorse. Not all battering relationships fit this pattern, and patterns can change over time.

Across the globe, battering most often consists of a combination of physical violence, maltreatment, and psychological abuse inflicted upon a partner. Physical abuse ranges from behaviors unlikely to cause lasting harm, for example, pushing, shoving, or restraining, to violence causing a need for emergency medical treatment. Violence causing severe damage, disability, or death is possible. Many abusers engage in sexual abuse, including harm to breasts and genitals, vaginal or anal rape, and genital mutilation. Maltreatment and psychological abuse may consist of the battering partner's engaging in behavior designed to create humiliation, shame, intimidation, or fear in the victim and often involves threats of violence or the implication of threats of violence to the partner or others (children, pets, or other loved ones). The batterer may try to isolate his partner from any and all sources of support and independence and monitor and control avenues of communication, transportation, finances, and connection with others. Batterers may stalk their partners to observe their behavior using a variety of means. Batterers may also engage in inconsistent behaviors, sometimes behaving in loving and supportive ways, at other times, withdrawn, rejecting, demanding, or inconsolable and dejected. A common thread is often the implication or direct message that the battered partner is the cause of the distress.

Some controversy exists in the study of interpersonal violence as to whether heterosexual women are more often battered by their male partners, engage in mutual violence, or initiate violence. In the United States, some research has found that female heterosexuals engage in individual acts of violence at rates higher than or equal to their male partners. International research examining rates of female-initiated violence indicate a small percentage of women initiating violence. Most experts in the field of domestic violence agree that women are less likely to engage in battering behavior. Some point out that women generally cause less injury when they are violent and are harmed more frequently by violence because of their generally smaller size and reduced muscle strength as compared to males.

Effects of Being a Victim of Battering

Battered women may experience many consequences as a result of the abuse they endure. Women in ongoing violent relationships may experience physical harm from injuries, disease, and malnutrition. They are also likely to experience mental health difficulties, including traumatic stress-related disorders, alcohol and other substance use disorders, anxiety disorders, depression, suicidal thoughts and behaviors, and an overall poor quality of life. Women who are currently in, or have recently left, an abusive relationship report more mental health difficulties as compared to nonvictimized women. Research indicates that women with a past history of a single abusive partner do not seem to differ from women who have not experienced an abusive relationship and will likely recover well psychologically. Research has also found an association between the number and severity of symptoms experienced by the survivors and the duration and severity of abuse suffered. Most negative mental health outcomes have been found for those who were abused by multiple partners or suffered severe abuse and experienced childhood trauma in some form.

Understanding Battered Women

Many factors contribute to the continuation of the relationship between a batterer and the battered woman. Early in the relationship, a woman may experience intense feelings of love and attraction for her partner; the batterer may appear contrite following violent episodes, blame the woman for relationship problems, and beg for love and assistance. The violence, which typically does not begin at frequent and extreme levels, may be perceived as unusual.

As the relationship progresses, the attachment between the batterer and the battered woman may grow, and the partners' social lives, finances, families, and domiciles become common. They may share children and have legal status as married partners. The more intertwined the partners' lives become, the more difficult it is to contemplate ending the relationship. In some cultures, divorce is very uncommon or comes with significant social and financial consequences. The battered woman may accept some degree of responsibility for the violence, rationalize and minimize its effects, and perhaps perceive it as a normal occurrence. Battering may be perceived as beyond the batterer's control and the batterer perceived as a "good" person who does not mean to do harm. In some battering relationships, the battering partner's abusive behavior occurs primarily under the influence of alcohol or other drugs, and the battered women may perceive that she has no control over her partner's behavior.

The coping strategies battered women use to endure the abusive relationship may paradoxically contribute to increased difficulties in leaving the relationship. Abused women often focus upon fulfilling the wishes or demands of the abusive partner in an effort to maintain calm and good relations. Concentrating upon trying to keep the abuser happy or calm may become the dominant goal of a woman's life. Women who use alcohol and other drugs or exhibit excessive work, food, or other behaviors usually intensify these behaviors in an effort to cope with the stress of the abusive relationship. These behaviors may serve to numb, distract, or calm the abused partner and may also make it more difficult for her to realistically appraise her situation. Women who have experienced extreme abuse interspersed with periods of good treatment may develop a traumatic attachment to their partner. Other women may believe that they can never leave the abuser or find someone better and have a profound resignation and helplessness. Leonore Walker used the term Battered Woman Syndrome to describe women who developed posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD), and she described a pattern of physical and psychological symptoms in response to exposure to relationship violence.

Those who are poor, live in rural areas, are immigrant, lesbian or transgender, elderly, very young, mentally or physically disabled, or women of color often face additional obstacles in coping with and trying to leave an abusive partner. These obstacles include but are not limited to financial dependence upon the abusive partner, dependence upon the partner for care, fear of deportation, fear of racist or sexist treatment, fear of judgment for sexual orientation or transgender status, fear that abuse will be discounted or minimized, fear that the abuser will suffer harsh treatment, lack of knowledge of and ability to access services, or the absence of any support services.

When an Abused Woman Leaves Her Abuser

Battered women attempting to leave an abusive relationship may face enormous obstacles, including lack of social support, lack of money, and condemnation from friends, family, and religious authorities. Additionally, abusers often become increasingly violent and controlling when their partner attempts to leave them. Some will attempt to thwart or sabotage any attempt at independence. Threats to injure or kill the battered woman, her family, pets, or their children are common. The batterer may threaten or attempt suicide or stalk, harass, or try to woo their partner to return. Despite this, women can and do leave abusive relationships. Several factors are considered facilitators for this process. Many formerly abused women describe their concern for their children's welfare as a primary stimulus to leaving an abuser. Some women leave when there is an increase in the level of violence in the relationship, they have better financial resources, they give up on the relationship, or the battering becomes public in some way.

In the United States, many battered women eventually leave their abusive partners, although some may leave and return to the battering partner several times. Many communities have shelters, counseling, legal aid, and other services to aid in their departure and recovery. Internationally, many countries do not have specialized programs and services for battered women, and some may turn to their families or religious leaders for assistance. Unfortunately, in many countries where battering occurs in a marriage, battered women may find little support or be blamed for the violence.

Kathryn Lewis Ginebaugh
Western Michigan University

See Also: Domestic Violence; Domestic Violence, Victims of; Family Violence Prevention and Services; Interpersonal Violence.

Further Readings

The National Center on Domestic Violence, Trauma and Mental Health. http://www.nationalcentervtramamh.org (Accessed January 2014).

Walker, Lenore. The Battered Woman. New York: Harper and Row, 1979.

Wilson, K. J. When Violence Begins at Home. Alameda, CA: Hunter House, 2005.

Women Minorities

Women of color is a broad category of women that includes nonwhite women and multiple racial and ethnic groups in the United States, according to L. Cornelius and colleagues. The category includes but is not limited to African Americans, Asians or Pacific Islanders, American Indians, and Latino women. Women of color experience a lower quality of life, shorter life expectancy, and higher rates of a many chronic disease states, including cardiovascular disease (CVD), diabetes, and reproductive health. Women of color not only experience these diseases disproportionately but also experience reduced access to screening, linguistic, and culturally appropriate education and materials; lower quality of care; and higher mortality and morbidity rates, reports L. Mullings. Women of color represent more than half of all women in the United States, and therefore, the disparities experienced by this large group require that all health and social science research continue to explore how and why the health disparities are so great as well as what needs to be done to reduce if not eliminate the multiple health disparities. Social determinants of health, such as poverty, racism, and limited access to care, contribute to health outcomes, quality of life, and overall life expectancy of this group and serve as mediating and moderating factors that contribute to the disparities.

Cardiovascular Disease Among Women of Color

CVD is a collection of conditions that result in the abnormal functioning of the heart or blood vessels. It includes coronary heart disease, hypertension, congestive heart failure, congenital cardiovascular defects, and atherosclerosis, describes the Office of Research on Women's Health. The greatest risk factors for CVD are genetic predisposition, having diabetes, physical inactivity, obesity, smoking, and increased age. Genetics contribute to the risk of CVD; however, social determinants of health such as socioeconomic status (education, income, and wealth), health behaviors, and access to health care are the greatest predictors for CVD among women of color. Almost half of all women of color at or below the poverty line have little or no access to health care and underestimate their risk of CVD. Additionally, women of color experience higher levels of stress related to social bias, racism, and sexism that ultimately result in disproportionate mortality rates from CVD in comparison to their Caucasian counterparts, report V. Earnshaw and colleagues. Health and social science research focusing on identifying the unique signs and symptoms of CVD, how the social determinants of health contribute to the risk of CVD, and establishing best practices of prevention, treatment, and monitoring need to be further identified for women of color collectively and within each subcategory.

Diabetes

Diabetes is a disease identified by the presence of high levels of glucose in the bloodstream resulting from an insulin deficiency (type 1) or a rejection or insufficient production of insulin (type 2). Type 1 diabetes is an autoimmune disease where the insulin-producing cells of the pancreas are destroyed and insulin is no longer produced to properly metabolize sugar. Less than 10 percent of those diagnosed with diabetes have type 1, states the Office of Research on Women's Health. Therefore, 90 percent or more of all diabetes cases are type 2; the risk factors for type 2 diabetes are CVD, genetic predisposition, obesity, physical inactivity, and a history of gestational diabetes. Women of color are almost twice as likely to experience diabetes as Caucasian women; additionally, women of color have poorer outcomes and have a higher mortality rate from diabetes than Caucasian women.

The health disparity is glaring, and the social determinants of health prove to contribute a great deal to the risk, treatment, and outcome of diabetes among women of color. Social stress deriving from racism, sexism, and social bias, access to health care, and socioeconomic status predict a women's ability to manage diabetes as a chronic illness as well as her quality of life and health outcomes. As more and more people are diagnosed at younger ages with diabetes, the clinical treatment of the disease has improved; however, prevention and effectively managing the disease for better health outcomes remain a challenge among women of color. There is a need for more research in order to identify better prevention, education, and management of diabetes among women of color.

Reproductive Health

Reproductive health encompasses conditions and diseases that affect a women's ability to reproduce. The category includes breast and cervical cancer, low birth weight and infant mortality, sexually transmitted infections (STI), and human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), describes R. Webb. The challenge among women of color is access to reproductive health care, including annual gynecological exams, prenatal care, disease screening, and access to medically appropriate birth control. The greatest barrier to reproductive health among women of color is access to regular gynecological care. Early detection and treatment is also key to establishing positive health outcomes for the treatment of breast and cervical cancer, STI, and HIV. The diagnosis of reproductive disorders and diseases among women of color occur in later stages, resulting in more complications and higher mortality rates.

Women of color experience many diseases disproportionately, and also experience reduced access to screening, linguistic, and culturally appropriate education and materials; lower quality of care; and higher mortality and morbidity rates

Women of color are diagnosed with breast cancer less often than their Caucasian counterparts but have greater mortality. The prevention or early identification of STI can eliminate cervical cancer and reduce high-risk pregnancies and the occurrence of preterm labor and infant mortality. The barriers to reproductive health among women of color are multifaceted but include the social determinants of health, cultural and linguistic barriers, failure or delay to follow up on results, and lack of culturally and linguistically appropriate information and education. Reproductive health is culturally sensitive with a large social component; women of color report having negative experiences within the health care setting that result in delayed or lack of annual exams and follow-up report V. Earnshaw and colleagues.

Social and cultural paradigms hinder understanding, identification, and action. Although women of color may underestimate their risk of disease, there have also been systemic policies that, in the past, did not support women's health and contributed to poor reproductive health outcomes. Continued research and new educational platforms need to be established so women of color fully understand their risks and options for prevention and treatment in order to achieve and maintain reproductive health across the life span.

Conclusion

Women of color live with a menagerie of social challenges, stressors, and lack of understanding of health risks. The outcome has been health disparities, poor health outcomes, and reduced quality of life across the life span. Legislation, research, and cultural shifts are required to reverse the incidence of disease and early death among women of color. Education; access to prevention, including screening and timely, culturally, and linguistically appropriate care; and information and treatment are needed to reduce health disparities and improve the quality and span of life for women of color.

Marya L. Shegog
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

See Also: Cultural Paradigms; Health Disparities, Role of; Social Determinants of Health; Social Work Practice and People of Color.

Further Readings

Cornelius, L., et al. "What Factors Hinder Women of Color From Obtaining Preventative Health Care?" American Journal of Public Health, v.92/4 (2002).

Earnshaw, V., et al. "Maternal Experiences With Everyday Discrimination and Infant Birth Weight: A Test of Mediators and Moderators Among Young, Urban Women of Color." Annals of Behavioral Medicine, v.45/1 (2013).

Mullings, L. "The Sojourner Syndrome: Race, Class and Gender in Health and Illness." Voices, v.6/1 (2002).

Office of Research on Women's Health. Moving Into the Future With New Dimensions and Strategies: A Vision for 2020 for Women's Health Research. Bethesda, MD: National Institutes of Health, 2010.

Office of Research on Women's Health. Women of Color Health Information Collection: Cardiovasuclar Disease. Washington, DC: National Institutes of Health, 2012.

Office of Research on Women's Health. Women of Color Health Information Collection: Diabetes Mellitus. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, 2011.

Webb, R. "Reproductive Health Disparities for Women of Color." In Health Disparities Practice Update. Office of Human Rights and International Affairs. Washington, DC: National Association of Social Workers, 2004.

Workplace Health Services

A company's human workforce is its most valuable asset. Even highly technical industries that rely on computerized equipment during production require a solid foundation of human capital to be successful. The provision of workplace health services by an organization helps to demonstrate a commitment to the wellbeing of its employees, thereby transforming the "most valuable asset" sentiment from rhetoric into practice.

There is neither a standard definition of what constitutes workplace health services nor a requirement in most jurisdictions for a company to provide services outside of its legally mandated health and safety obligations. However, many companies provide forms of workplace wellness programs, medical services, executive health services, and disability management to its workers as a total compensation benefit. Workplace health services is a term that captures a broader range or composition of benefits, whereas occupational health services is much narrower in focus.

At its fundamental level, a company's workplace health service will consist of an occupational health and safety department that provides emergency and standard medical care for occupational and nonoccupational injuries or illnesses. Typically provided by a registered nurse, services may include workplace hazard screening, ergonomic assessments, health education, stress management, blood pressure monitoring, allergy injections, and immunizations. In industrial settings, occupational health services may also offer proactive services such as respiratory fit testing, hearing protection, and air and water quality monitoring. These departments may also serve as a liaison with a company physician, the human resources department for injury and return to-work issues, and the risk management department when hazards are identified.

In many occupations, such as that of commercial pilot or oil field worker, a worker's participation in and satisfactory completion of regulated medical exams is required as a condition of employment. Companies in these industries will provide expanded workplace health services to ensure that these nonnegotiable testing requirements are met and that overall risk is mitigated. Additionally, many services are offered with the hope of preventing the development of chronic illnesses later in a person's career. These expanded health services will include mandatory physical, psychological, and drug and alcohol assessments but will also screen for cardiovascular risk factors, diabetes, concerns related to diet and exercise, and personal challenges that interfere with the quality of both work and home life.

Building on these services, many companies will offer senior executives an expanded health program as both an employment benefit and way of mitigating turnover, preventable death, and disability risks. However, these services are extremely comprehensive and offer testing that is extraneous to that offered by the government and most private insurance plans. As a result, from a business perspective, they are not cost effective and thus are reserved only for the most senior executives in large firms. Executive health services typically include diabetes, cancer, and cardiovascular screening; heart and lung function testing; nutritional assessments; bone density, vision, and hearing tests; complete blood and urinalysis; mole mapping; and, gait analysis. Outside of a clinic setting, health club memberships and a personal health coach may be provided free of charge. Health benchmark reports and accessible, online health records may be offered to the employee, along with an individual health and wellness plan. These services are more proactive than reactive, which is ideal in the long-term prevention of illness and disability. Unfortunately, they remain cost-prohibitive in a primarily reactive medical care industry, where only medically necessary treatment, not prevention, is compensable.

Finally, disability management services may be subsumed under workplace health, although they may be the responsibility of a company's human resources department rather than its occupational health department. Disability management services address absences from work that are the result of illness, injury, or disability, and strive to prevent recurrences that can negatively impact engagement and productivity. Access to an employee and family assistance program (EFAP) may be offered to help the employee adjust to the illness or disability and associated stressors. However, most employers now offer this service to all employees, regardless of classification, in recognition of the effects that personal and occupational stress can have on the person and the broader workplace. Disability management services often resemble case management in that an individual plan for accommodation is developed, which includes duty or scheduling modifications and a return to work timeline. The employer will also facilitate disability benefits and workers' compensation if the injury is work related.

Emerging models of workplace health and wellness are more holistic than those congruent with the traditional medical model of disability. Newer conceptualizations recognize the interactive impact that factors such as working relationships, the physical environment, the work–home life interface, and control and decision-making practices can exert on the workforce. They attempt to move away from individual pathology in favor of contextual approaches. They emphasize not only physical risks but also the psychological, social, spiritual, intellectual, and cultural components that promote a well workplace. Many are premised on principles of participatory democracy, encouraging shared leadership and decision making at all levels of an organization. Regardless of the industry, workplace health services recognize that workforce issues are as important as profit and productivity. The challenge now is to maintain the momentum toward holistic and preventive approaches to illness and disability that address environmental and individual concerns in tandem.

Derek Chechak
Memorial University of Newfoundland

See Also: Accommodation; Employee Assistance Programs; Reasonable Accommodations.

Further Readings

Chenoweth, David. Workplace Health Promotion. 3rd ed. Champaign, IL: Human Kinetics, 2013.

Csiernik, R., ed. Wellness and Work: Issues and Responses. Toronto: Canadian Scholars' Press, 2014.

Guidotti, T. L., et al. Occupational Health Services: A Practical Approach, 2nd ed. New York: Routledge, 2012.

Wraparound Services/Systems of Care

Wraparound services are a comprehensive plan of care integrating several services for an individual developed by an interdisciplinary team. Team members include the patient, caregivers, an advocate, a case manager, and service providers (e.g., educators and health professionals). The plan is tailored to an individual's need for care rather than being based on any type of standard care or theoretical model. Services are patient centered and designed to ensure that the patient's quality of life improves in one of several domains, including education, health, safety, social relationships, and so on. Two standards, with several core principles, are central tenets of the wraparound philosophy. The first standard defines the practice model, which focuses on engaging team members, preparing the care plan, implementing the plan, and developing a transition process to maintain care and service delivery when the wraparound process concludes. The second standard determines core principles guiding care, which include maintaining a team-driven process, ensuring that service provision meets individual needs, implementing flexible care plans based on the individual's strengths, utilizing natural and community supports for implementing culturally appropriate care, and evaluating the effectiveness of service provision. In communities where patients who have complex needs may not have access to diverse services, such as those residing in rural areas, wraparound plans can be an ideal. However, this approach can be time-consuming and expensive.

The wraparound approach has been at the forefront of mental health service delivery in the United States for children and youth with serious emotional and behavioral disturbances since the mid-1980s. The effectiveness of wraparound services for children with serious emotional and behavioral issues is mixed. In some studies, these services were more successful than comparison treatment programs, while in other studies, alternative treatments, such as those including family therapy, were more successful. Researchers have concluded that the effectiveness of wraparound services may vary based on the population served and the setting and conditions where these services are implemented. Key examples of successful wraparound services include the Kaleidoscope project in Chicago, Alaska's Youth Initiative, and Wraparound Milwaukie.

The system of care philosophy upholds the notion of developing a broad array of all services needed for individuals with special health and mental health care needs. A system of care ensures that a system exists, such that all individuals receive the most appropriate services to meet their special needs in the least-restrictive environment. The system of care philosophy could be interpreted as enlarging the wraparound concept on a large-scale level for populations with special healthcare needs. A system of care rests on several tenets, including interagency collaboration, knowledge and application of innovative methods of service delivery, patient- and family-centered care, patient and family involvement in care plans, culturally competent care and respect for diversity, and outcomes-based research to ensure that the service delivery system is functioning well and delivering cost-effective, high-quality services. Cultural competence and respect for diversity are defined at a broad level, incorporating responsiveness to ethnic, racial, and cultural differences of the population receiving services. Other key principles of systems of care are having screening mechanisms in place for early identification of individuals who might need services, providing case management to integrate the diverse array of services and individual needs, and advocating for community-based services and transitional services that will advance the individual to less restrictive care as functioning improves. In a system of care, the individual and family are at the hub of all activities. Often, a case manager may be needed to coordinate the broad array of services. Services that can be included to improve functioning vary based on individual needs but are grouped in many of the following areas: social services, mental health treatment, recreational planning, health and substance abuse services, and educational and vocational planning. The notion of social services comprises a vast array of services including, but not limited to, financial assistance, protective services and respite care, self-help and support groups, transportation, and legal services, states B. A. Stroul.

The federal government's Child and Adolescent Service System Program (CASSP) standards, which promote tailored programs to meet the clinical and systemic needs of the child and family through collaboration, coordination, and integration of services, has promoted key concepts synonymous with both wraparound services and the system of care philosophy. The objective of CASSP was to improve systems of care for children and families in their communities and in the least-restrictive environment. Systems of care can be successful for other high-need populations. For example, providing care plans for individuals experiencing mental health or substance use problems has been another area where the concepts of having a system of care with wraparound services is a mechanism for providing a broad array of integrated services. Systems of care also can be crucial to providing services for homeless and runaway youth or children who have experienced trauma and are in foster care.

Here is a basic example of a case in which several types of services can be provided to a young child and his family. Kwan is a 7-year-old boy with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) and significant delays in reading comprehension. He attends a low-income school in an urban area, where the school psychologist is present only one day per week. He often attends school hungry and appears very tired. An additional step might be to refer Kwan to receive an evaluation of his academic skills. Then, wraparound services could be developed to support his learning by addressing problems with attention and activity level related to ADHD and additional supports, perhaps with weekly visits to the school reading specialist, to support improvement in reading skills. Moreover, Kwan might benefit from having his school-based counselor become involved to interview his parents and ensure that he has enough food to eat at home and is getting appropriate rest.

His parents might benefit from attending a support group for parents to learn ways to work with a child with ADHD to help him complete homework and follow instructions at home. Determining services needed to support Kwan and his family in achieving better lives is a hallmark feature of wrapping services around a child to fit the needs of the child within his or her immediate contexts, such as the family and school. As services are provided and wrapped around the child to improve functioning, it will be important to ensure that providers are sensitive to broader contextual issues, including cultural and religious needs and background as well as the financial situation for the family.

Challenges to implementation of systems of care include coordinating services, and addressing financial concerns. Whether such large systems can function optimally in managed care and privatized environments must also be addressed. Furthermore, ensuring that service providers have the necessary training in service integration and cultural competence in the care provided are other key facets that promote the positive functioning of a system of care. Finally, integration of the system of care, within existing service structures and with other governmental and system reforms to health care, can be challenging. However, these systems can be instrumental in a patient- and family-centered approach that wraps care around individuals based on his or her needs. Consequently, systems of care can be the hub for full-service care to improve the voice and choice of individuals and their families.

Laura Nabors
Rebecca Elkins
Kenneth Woodson
University of Cincinnati

See Also: Continuum of Care; Culturally Specific Services; Home and Community Services; Mental Health Services, Children; Rural Communities.

Further Readings

Stambaugh, L. F., et al. "Outcomes From Wraparound and Multisystemic Therapy in a Center for Mental Health Services System-of-Care Demonstration Site." Journal of Emotional and Behavioral Disorders, v.15/3 (2007).

Stroul, B. A., ed. Children's Mental Health: Creating Systems of Care in a Changing Society. Baltimore, MD: Paul H. Brookes Publishing, 1996.

VanDenBerg, J. E. and E. M. Grealish. "Individualized Services and Supports Through the Wraparound Process: Philosophy and Procedures." Journal of Child and Family Studies, v.5/1 (1996).

Walter, U. M. and C. G. Pet. "Best Practices in Wraparound: A Multidimensional View of the Evidence." Social Work, v.56/1 (2011).

Y

Yale Center for Dyslexia and Creativity

The Yale Center for Dyslexia and Creativity (YCDC), a part of the Yale University School of Medicine, is a nonprofit center founded in 2007 to conduct and communicate the latest research and treatments for dyslexia as well as to advocate for individuals with dyslexia. Under the codirection of Drs. Sally E. and Bennett A. Shaywitz, the YCDC advocated in Washington, D.C., for recognition of individuals with dyslexia under the Americans with Disabilities Amendments Act (ADA). The YCDC also started the Multicultural Dyslexia Awareness Initiative (MDAI) a two-day symposium at Yale University in 2013, where leaders in education, legislation, and public policy can share and gain insight into dyslexia. YCDC research has been published in Psychological Science, School Psychology Quarterly, and Development and Psychopathology. The YCDC is conducting clinical research studies of children and adolescents with dyslexia ages 10 to 16 to test whether the prescription drug Strattera improves reading outcomes.

Sally Shaywitz (BA, CUNY; MD, Yeshiva University) is the Audrey G. Ratner Professor in Learning Development at the Yale University School of Medicine, while Bennett Shaywitz (BA and MD, Washington University) is the Charles and Helen Schwab Professor in Dyslexia and Learning Development and Chief of Pediatric Neurology; together they are the inaugural codirectors of the YCDC. Shaywitz's research provides conceptual models and epidemiology for studying dyslexia. Shaywitz's research explores the neurobiological basis of reading and dyslexia via functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) to develop better treatments for dyslexia. Together, the doctors developed the sea of strengths model of dyslexia that argues that individuals with dyslexia have a sea of strengths that include capacities for higher critical thinking and creativity. Both codirectors are nationally recognized doctors and researchers, having between them authored more than 500 scientific articles, chapters, and books and holding several editorial and advisory board and committee positions in addition to their positions at YCDC.

YCDC uses scientific research to advocate for the right of individuals with dyslexia, through lobbying in politicians in Washington, D.C., to recognize dyslexia in an amendment to the ADA. The ADA was written and first introduced in the U.S. Senate by Tom Harkin (D–IA) in 1989 to honor his brother Frank, who was deaf, and signed into law in 1990 by then President George H.W. Bush. The YCDC argued that, since its enactment, the ADA was being interpreted as only protecting the rights of individuals with visible disabilities that could not be remedied by a medical or other intervention.

The YCDC supported an amendment to the ADA because the Supreme Court rulings of Sutton v. United Airlines, Inc., Murphy v. United Parcel Service, Inc. and Albertsons, Inc. v. Kirkingburg in 1999 seemingly excluded individuals, like those with dyslexia, from ADA protection if they could outwardly adapt (e.g., with a prosthetic, medicine, or a coping strategy) and could function like the average person. The YCDC used fMRI scans of dyslexic and nondyslexic brains to provide visible evidence of the need for the ADA to protect individuals with dyslexia.

YCDC representatives met with the U.S. government's disability coalition and with business leaders and shared with them the current dyslexia research. The YCDC communicated with Representatives George Miller (D–CA), Rob Andrews (D–NJ), and Joe Courtney (D–CT), and Senator Chris Dodd (D–CT).

In passing the ADA, Representatives Stark, Miller, and Courtney spoke on the congressional record about the intent of ADA to cover conditions like dyslexia. This is significant because the Supreme Court refers to the congressional record when deciding how to interpret the ADA that went into effect in January 2009. Since the passage of the ADA, YCDC awarded Representatives Bill Cassidy (R–Louisiana) and Pete Stark (D–California) with Champion for Dyslexia Awards for forming the bipartisan Congressional Dyslexia Congress in 2012.

Since the passage of the ADA, the YCDC still continues to advocate for social changes that allow individuals with dyslexia to reach their full potential. The YCDC argues that persons with dyslexia who excel academically are denied accommodations for extra time for reading-based tasks, even though reading can be an extremely slow process for them, because their grades are so high. One such case is when Dr. Fred Romberg sought the help of the YCDC when the National Board of Medical Examiners (NBME), which administers the exam for doctors to be licensed to practice medicine in the United States, initially turned down his request for extra time to take the exam. The NBME cited Romberg's prior exemplary academic and work record when initially turning down the request. Romberg contacted YCDC and codirector Sally Shaywitz, and as a result, he filed a complaint with the U.S. Justice Department, which then opened its own investigation. The NBME reconsidered its position and eventually doubled the allotted time for Romberg to take the exam, though it denied in any way violating the ADA.

In 2013, YCDC launched the MDAI, a 2-day symposium at Yale University in 2013 for leaders in education, legislation, and public policy. The symposium was designed to bring awareness to dyslexia in the African American and Hispanic American communities, where the YCDC argues, dyslexia more often goes undiagnosed and thus untreated. The YCDC argues that dyslexia affects one in every five people regardless of race. The keynote for the event was celebrity and activist Harry Belafonte, and the event drew accomplished dyslexics such as Pulitzer Prize nominee Victor Villasenor. The MDAI was funded via the YCDC and the Seedling Foundation.

Also in 2013, the YCDC has undertaken two clinical studies on children ages 10 to 16 to test whether the prescription medication Strattera (drug name atomoxetine) could improve their reading ability. Strattera is currently approved to treat attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder in children and adults and has been studied as a treatment for depression, binge eating, and bedwetting. Children and adolescents in the study are assigned to medication and placebo groups to test the effectiveness of the drug. Children and adolescents with good reading skills are recruited for the study as a group for interpreting the results in the children with dyslexia.

The YCDC Advisory Council is chaired by Kurt C. Mobley and includes celebrities such as actress Kate Capshaw and director Steven Spielberg, educators such as Sarah Gund and Kyle Redford, and political figures including Sam Gejdenson and Reed Hundt. The YCDC and its codirectors, the Shaywitzes, work primarily to discover and share the latest research on and most effective treatments for dyslexia in order to advocate for people with dyslexia so that they might reach their full potential. In so doing, the Shaywitzes and YCDC have challenged laws on disability (e.g., working to amend the ADA) and questioned the efficacy of current treatments for dyslexia (e.g., response-to-intervention models).

Gordon Alley-Young
Kingsborough Community College

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Individuals With Disabilities Education Act; Learning Disabilities, Services for Individuals With.

Further Readings

National Center for Learning Disabilities. http://www.ncld.org (Accessed August 2013).

U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. "ADA Amendments Act of 2008." http://www.eeoc.gov/laws/statutes/adaaa.cfm (Accessed November 2013).

The Yale Center for Dyslexia and Creativity. "About the Yale Center for Dyslexia and Creativity." http://www.dyslexia.yale.edu/aboutcenter.html (Accessed November 2013).

Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System

The Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System (YRBSS) was established in 1991 by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) to understand the major risks to the long-term health of young people in the United States. The data system was designed to enable public health professionals, educators, policy makers, and researchers to describe the prevalence of health-risk behaviors among youths, assess trends in health-risk behaviors over time, and evaluate and improve health-related policies and programs. YRBSS data are obtained from multiple sources, including a national school-based survey conducted by CDC as well as school-based state, territorial, tribal, and large urban school district surveys conducted by education and health agencies. The national surveys include representative samples of students in Grades 9 through 12. The oversampling of black and Hispanic youth makes the YRBSS particularly useful in examining these racial and ethnic subgroups.

The YRBSS monitors six categories of health-risk behaviors that have been identified as priority areas. The CDC identified these categories of interrelated and preventable behaviors as the leading causes of morbidity (illness) and mortality (death) among youths and adults. The majority of all deaths among young people (72 percent) result from car accidents, accidental injuries, homicides, and suicides, reports N. D. Brener and colleagues. The major causes of deaths among adults are cardiovascular disease and cancer, which can be linked to unhealthy behaviors around inactivity, diet, and tobacco, drug, and alcohol use, all of which often begin in youth. The goal of the YRBSS is to improve understanding of young people's health behaviors around these issues in order to better help young people improve their health in both the short and long terms. The YRBSS's six priority areas include (1) unintentional injuries (e.g., car accidents) and violence; (2) tobacco use (e.g., cigarettes and smokeless tobacco); (3) alcohol and other drug use; (4) sexual behaviors that can lead to sexually transmitted infections and to unintended pregnancy; (5) unhealthy eating; and (6) physical inactivity. Behaviors in these areas often are established during childhood and adolescence and set the groundwork for adulthood. In addition to the six priority areas, the YRBSS monitors asthma and obesity among youth.

As part of the YRBSS, the CDC has administered the national Youth Risk Behavior Survey (YRBS) every two years since 1991. It is a nationally representative school-based survey, and its results describe the population of students in the United States. It is administered to students in all four years of high school, so it provides data about students at different ages. This survey can be used to separately examine patterns of risk in different subgroups based on age, race or ethnicity, and gender. The YRBS does not include demographic questions on socioeconomic status, family patterns, immigration status, or sexual orientation. Therefore, it cannot be used to study how these factors influence health behaviors. There are also limits in using the data from the survey to describe state- or local-level populations, but the most recent YRBS (in 2011) has extensive state-level data for 43 states, and some data is available for four additional states as well as six nonstate territories (including Puerto Rico) and two tribal governments.

In addition to the national YRBS, which is administered to high school students, many states and local school districts also use the middle school YRBS. The middle school questionnaire does not include all of the questions on the high school version, but it does track students' alcohol, tobacco, drug, and sexual practices, as well as car and bike safety. Although the survey does show that middle school students engage in risky behavior, it is difficult to make statements about the national population of middle school students as a whole based on this data. However, it can be used by individual school districts and states to understand health behaviors among students before high school.

Since its inception in 1991, the YRBSS has conducted ongoing revision of the questionnaire, added new populations, and adopted innovative methods for data collection (e.g., web-based surveys).The YRBSS has been used by many different stakeholders concerned about young peoples' health and well-being. School districts and local health agencies have used the information from the YRBSS to educate students, to identify unhealthy behaviors that are a particular problem in their state or school, to seek funding for programs to improve student health and health behaviors, and to influence health program design at the local and state level.

Access to the YRBSS data is readily available through the CDC. They have compiled a variety of reports on the results of the surveys and health-risk behavior trends over time. Most users will best be able to access the data through Youth Online, a web-based portal that allows the user to select responses for any individual question on the YRBSS. There is also functionality to examine subpopulations based on sex, race or ethnicity, or grade. Users can also use Youth Online to create customized tables and graphs and perform basic statistical analysis. Youth Online includes national, state, and local data from both middle school and high school students. For those who want to conduct more-detailed statistical analysis, the national-level data can be directly downloaded from the CDC in a number of formats. State, district, and other data can be accessed by contacting the CDC.

Stella M. Resko
Wayne State University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; At-Risk Youth Services; Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths; Monitoring the Future; Substance Abuse Treatment for Children and Adolescents.

Further Readings

Brener, N. D., et al. Methodology of the Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System—2013. U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 2013.

Cauce, A. M., R. Cruz, M. Corona, and R. Conger. "The Face of the Future: Risk and Resilience in Minority Youth." In Health Disparities in Youth and Families. New York: Springer, 2011.

Foti, K., A. Balaji, and S. Shanklin. "Uses of Youth Risk Behavior Survey and School Health Profiles Data: Applications for Improving Adolescent and School Health." Journal of School Health, v.81/6 (2011).

Yuppies and Buppies

Social acronyms and semantic neologisms, words created from the initials of other words to communicate new meanings, often sound silly. However, one characteristic of this specialized form of language is that it often reflects new social, economic, and political trends. Although the history of socioeconomic or sociopolitical acronyms has never been systematically explored, new words have been introduced to describe new social trends throughout the 20th century in the United States. For example, flappers (1920s), swingers (1930s and 1940s), rockers (1950s and1960s), and hippies (1970s) are commonly recognized words. Yuppies appeared in the 1980s, a term derived from young, urban professional, which describes the defining characteristics of the yuppie demographic.

"Buppies" and "guppies" followed the term yuppies in the late 1980s and 1990s as a way to refer to well-educated, young, black or gay upwardly mobile achievers, respectively. This phenomenon is by no means restricted to the United States. For example, the term WASP (white Anglo-Saxon Protestant) is used in Australia and Canada to refer to a high-status group of people, or families, with disproportionate social and financial power. Now, there are OINKs (one income, no kids) and DINKs (dual income, no kids), DIMPS (dual income, money problems), and NIKS (no income, kids to support). It appears that this creative process of socially constructing acronyms could work with anyone or anything.

Several linguists suggest that the innovation of new words reflects innovation and change in society. The evolution of language and the role of discourse in establishing and making distinctions among people ensure a recognition of differences and diversity across groups that has a place within human services professions. Effectiveness in the human service sector requires consideration of individual differences, of course. Some key individual differences include, but are not limited to, age, ethnicity, gender, geographic origin, and race. Human service professionals also consider the broader distinctions within communities and society that influence individual differences in ability and disability, educational level, religion, and sexual orientation. As the social acronyms presented earlier suggest, there are obvious distinctions across socioeconomic class and values. As such, human service personnel do their jobs with an increased awareness and focus on inclusion among an increasingly diverse service population.

Yuppies

Yuppies are associated with social and economic class movement from middle class to the upper-middle or upper class. The term is most often used to refer to individuals who have acquired their increased wealth on their own and not to individuals who have had or come from wealth. Besides being typically young, usually between the ages of the mid-20s and 30s, yuppies are also generally affluent and working in well-paid professional positions that may come with benefits. It is common for yuppies to partner with other yuppies, thereby significantly increasing their purchasing power. Many yuppies work hard to play hard, putting in long hours at work so that they can pursue expensive hobbies and extracurricular activities. Yuppies are also characterized as politically conservative and upwardly mobile, working hard to achieve the goal of rising within the social and economic class system.

Yuppies are often found living in up-and-coming neighborhoods, which sometimes causes community tensions. This urban gentrification typically displaces people in the lower classes and minorities. Some people also resent the yuppie subversion of their culture and traditions, arguing that an arrival, or invasion as the case may be, of wealthy people into a neighborhood can change the character of a community markedly. Opponents of urban gentrification suggest that it promotes homogeneity over individuality, eradicating the very unique characteristics that might have made a neighborhood appealing in the first place.

Buppies, Guppies, and So On

The term buppies (black urban professionals) seems to have originated in South Africa with the disillusion of apartheid and the rise a black middle class. Buppies are also associated with social mobility and the acquisition of material wealth, like yuppies. Buppies are also sometimes seen as being overly interested in materialist status symbols. However, it is a movement from the lower class to the middle or upper-middle class. The emergence of the buppies, with their increased economic and therefore political clout, has altered the political and financial landscape in South Africa and the West. Unlike yuppies, buppies are more economically liberal and more socially conservative.

Like yuppies, the term guppies (gay urban professional) has its origins in the 1980s United States. Specifically it is a term used to refer to homosexual individuals who have embraced a middle-class lifestyle. This includes, like the yuppies, a focus on career and the accumulation of wealth. Also, like the yuppies, guppies are seen as being overly interested in materialistic status symbols. Guppies are also associated with mobility to the upper class. Like yuppies, they are associated with fiscal conservatism and social liberalism. However, for this group, there is a particular emphasis on the advancement of gay and lesbian rights, in particular the advancement of the institution of marriage to include homosexual populations.

Guppies also challenge the status quo implicitly. Gay men and women who are out in society often face economic and political hardship as a result of bigotry and oppression. Being out could accompany a huge loss in social status for an individual, making it difficult to get employment, receive basic protections from the state, or in some cases, have any connection to one's own family. Guppies are sometimes viewed as abandoning or attempting to abandon their lower status social group by embracing the higher status, middle-class, heterosexual lifestyle.

Social Acronyms, Class, and Class Distinctions in Human Services and Diversity

All of the groups discussed represent challenges to the economic and political status quo. This challenge can be implicit, as in the case of the yuppies. Yuppies are seen for the most part in popular culture as a group that is in a socially advantageous position as white, middle-class, and educated. However, they are distinguished as yuppies by their social mobility from the middle class to the upper-middle or even upper class, hence, the accusations of being superficial, and nouveau riche, a common accusation levied against the upwardly mobile.

Also, all three of these groups represent people who have moved up in social class, making their social positions more precarious than someone born middle class, upper-middle class, or upper class. Perhaps more notable, however, is the social process involved in identifying, distinguishing, differentiating, and naming these groups with unique names and specialized meanings. The creation and use of these social acronyms and semantic neologisms may also reflect an increase in economic and political power for groups that may not have originally had any.

In a world where the field of global economic competition is leveling, there are also individual mountains and valleys. People born into fortunate conditions and circumstances have the opportunities to attend schools that will educate them and connect them to others who will stimulate them and help them flourish. Others may live in an industrialized or otherwise wealthy country but reside in communities where the schools are poor, the education is substandard, and where, most unfortunately, a pool of bright and creative children are not pushed or motivated to be the best that they can be. They may fall through the cracks of a social or economic system in which a life with encouragement and enthusiasm is unavailable. Therefore, human service professionals need a breadth of tools to employ in working with these diverse populations.

Many educational and vocational disciplines have a rich history of addressing social problems (e.g., social work, public health, public administration, community and social psychology, anthropology, sociology, education, and law). As such, these diverse disciplines have informed the development of public policies and human service programs concentrating on the most disenfranchised. Combining the unique assets of different professional disciplines has the potential to minimize the redundancy of services and better serve client populations.

Jody A. Worley
University of Oklahoma

See Also: Bias in Service Delivery; Blue Collar/Pink Collar/White Collar; Cultural Determinism; Social Capital, Role of; Social Welfare Policy, Cultural Competence in; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Appleford, Gines. "The Rhetoric of Specialized Language." http://citeseerx.ist.psu.edu/viewdoc/download?doi=10.1.1.195.8140&rep=rep1&type=pdf (Accessed January 2014).

Ashley, Leonard R. N. "Yuppies, Buppies, Oinks and Dinks." Word Ways, v.21/ 2 (2012).

Ayto, John. Movers and Shakers: A Chronology of Words That Shaped Our Age. Oxford University Press, 2006.

Bourdieu, Pierre. Distinctions: A Social Critique of the Judgment of Taste. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1984.

Bourdieu, Pierre. Language and Symbolic Power. Malden, MA: Polity Press, 1991.

Z

Zero Tolerance Approach in Schools

"Zero tolerance" is a term used to describe an all-or-nothing, prescriptive approach employed by school programs or districts to managing student behavior. In other words, a predetermined punishment, usually suspension or expulsion, is applied consistently and without regard for age, intent, severity, or any other factors. There is no middle ground and no room for compromise. Zero tolerance policies can be traced back to the passage of federal legislation in the United States that made possession of a weapon on school grounds a criminal offense. The Gun Free Schools Act of 1994 introduced a national policy for zero tolerance of weapons. The act then required states to enact statutes that included mandatory one-year expulsions from school for students in possession of weapons.

Since that time, zero tolerance approaches have gradually expanded in many states to encompass a variety of other, mostly severe, infractions, such as violent behavior, drug use, and sexual harassment. While there is no single definition of zero tolerance, there is a set of associated characteristics. Zero tolerance policies are applied uniformly without consideration of circumstance. Consequences for infractions are predetermined and are usually severe and punitive in nature—usually mandatory expulsion or suspension.

Rationale for Zero Tolerance Policies

Concerns about school violence are linked to overwhelming popular support of the media and of local communities for zero tolerance policies. Supporters believe that uncompromising approaches to serious infractions will make school environments safer. Removal of disruptive students diminishes the risk of violent behavior and allows others to focus their attention on their studies in a secure and safe environment. Additionally, the presence of harsh penalties for infractions is presumed to act as a deterrent for the general populace of students. Despite the widespread adoption of zero tolerance approaches in schools across the United States and Canada, there is growing opposition to their utilization.

The Impact of Zero Tolerance Policies

Questions remain over whether zero tolerance policies have achieved their intended objective of making schools safe. Many indicators seem to suggest that they are not making a difference. There is no causal evidence, for example, that the employment of zero tolerance policies results in reduced instances of violence. In fact, instances of school violence have continued to trend upward. On an individual student level, zero tolerance policies are not associated with changes in student behavior. Mandatory expulsion and suspension can lead students on a path toward juvenile delinquency and may affect academic achievement and lead to dropping out of school.

Students return from suspensions displaying the same problematic behaviors or worse. There is also evidence to suggest that zero tolerance policies, on a broad scale, do more harm than good. Schools with greater levels of mandatory expulsions, even when demographics and other variables are controlled for, tend to have lower levels of overall academic achievement.

Controversies and Potential for Harm

As the number of school expulsions and suspensions increase in response to zero tolerance policies, so too do the criticisms associated with this approach. The inflexible nature of zero tolerance policies eliminates discretion and prevents the consideration of any exceptional circumstances. As a result, zero tolerance policies sometimes lead to the inequitable and nonsensical treatment of students. For example, zero tolerance policies provide no consideration for students with special needs. Zero tolerance policies also make no allowances for mistakes and errors of judgment that are known features of child development. Age-appropriate responses, in contrast, would include a range of more supportive and instructional consequences for problematic behavior.

Zero tolerance policies have the potential to harm children because they do away with the principle of innocent until proven guilty. In response, students' attitudes toward justice and fairness may be damaged, as may their ability to develop trusting relationships with adults. These policies also have long-range consequences for students, with reduced opportunities for social mobility and decreased earnings a potential result. Zero tolerance policies in schools also stand in opposition to the educational mission of schools and are incongruent with the roles educators play in helping students learn from their mistakes and develop good judgment.

Zero Tolerance Policies and Disproportionality

While the original intent of zero tolerance policies was not to discriminate, discrimination on the basis of race, gender, and socioeconomic status has been the result. Male students, minority students, and students from lower socioeconomic backgrounds are disproportionately impacted by zero tolerance approaches. These are groups that are generally overrepresented in cases of school expulsion and suspension.

Alternatives to Zero Tolerance Policy

There are many alternatives to zero tolerance policies. These alternative solutions focus on building supportive school environments and developing preventive instructional strategies. Prevention programs may target a variety of concerns, such as bullying and harassment, conflict resolution, gang prevention, or drug and alcohol abuse programs to name a few. Some programs are aimed at helping students with emotional and behavioral disorders. Stop and Think and Positive Behavioral Interventions and Supports (PBIS) are two such programs. Preventive instructional strategies that include better quality training for school staff in classroom behavior management are other alternatives. Addressing academic deficits that put students at risk for school failure and chronic behavior problems can also be put in place. Involvement of school mental health experts is important, as is the involvement of families, and communities represent another significant measure.

Alternative consequences for disruptive behavior are available. These consequences are generally less severe and more supportive of students than are those imposed by zero tolerance policies. These include peer mediation, teen courts, restitution, and anger management training, among others. Early intervention programs may also prevent inappropriate behavior from escalating into violence, and programs such as these can significantly reduce the need for harsh consequences later. Programs such as First Step to Success (Kindergarten) and Positive Adolescent Choices Training (developed for African American youth) are examples of these.

Zero Tolerance Policies and Common Sense

Critics of zero tolerance policies point to numerous examples of their use that seem to defy common sense. For example, an instance of a kindergartener being expelled for bringing a toy gun to school or of a child being suspended for making gun sounds while waving a pencil—zero tolerance punishments for these types of behaviors are an indication for some that an all-or-nothing approach to school discipline may be going a bit too far.

Laura A. Lewis
University of Buffalo

See Also: Gangs in Schools; Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools; School Mental Health Project.

Further Readings

"Are Zero Tolerance Policies Effective in Schools: An Evidentiary Review and Recommendations." American Psychologist, v.63/9 (2008).

Ayers, W., B. Dohrn, and R. Ayers. Zero Tolerance—Resisting the Drive for Punishment in Our Schools: A Handbook for Parents, Students, Educators, and Citizens. New York; New Press, 2001.

Henault, C. "Zeroing Out Zero Tolerance: Eliminating Zero Tolerance Policies in Texas Schools." Journal of Law and Education, v.30 (2001).

Losen, D. J. and R. J. Skiba. "Suspended Education: Urban Middle Schools in Crisis. In UC Los Angeles: The Civil Rights Project/Proyecto Derechos Civiles. http://escholarship.org/uc/item/8fh0s5dv (Accessed January 2014).

Skiba, R. "Zero Tolerance, Zero Evidence: An Analysis of School Disciplinary Practice" (Policy Research Report #SRS2). Bloomington: Indiana Education Policy Center, 2000.

Glossary and Acronyms

ABA: Applied behavior analysis, a behavior modification technique derived from the work of B. F. Skinner that uses rewards and punishments to shape behavior. ABA is most commonly applied in teaching children with autism, although it may be applied in other areas as well.

Accommodation in education: The act of making adjustments or modifications to allow a student with a disability to take part in academic programs and activities and removing barriers to their participation.

Acculturation: The process of becoming comfortable in a culture different from one's culture of origin; originally conceptualized as a movement away from the culture of origin and toward the new culture, acculturation today is conceptualized as more of a process in which values from the old culture are retained while aspects of the new are assimilated.

ACT: Action for Children's Television, a national organization organized in 1968 to address issues with television advertising aimed at children and to militate for the production of higher quality children's programming.

Adult Basic Education (ABE): Educational services for adults with less than a high school education, who are not currently enrolled in school and are over the age of 16.

Affinity group: A group of individuals sharing common interests and who work together to support each other through means such as sharing knowledge, networking, and problem solving.

African American English (AAE): Also known as African American Vernacular English, a dialect of English spoken by many African Americans in the United States.

Agency-based research: Research carried out within a social service agency, by that agency's staff, as opposed to research carried out under university auspices.

American Homecoming Act: A 1987 federal law simplifying the process for Vietnamese American children, many of whom had fathers who served in the military during the Vietnam War, to immigrate to the United States; close relatives of eligible children are also allowed to immigrate. By 2009, about 25,000 Vietnamese American children and 60,000 of their relatives were admitted to the United States under this law.

American Public Human Services Association (APHSA): A nonprofit membership organization, founded in 1930, to improve public health and human services; APHSA members are the top-level leaders of their organizations.

Americanization movement: A movement between approximately 1880 and 1920 focused on teaching new immigrants to assimilate to American culture, including learning English and adopting American cultural and political norms.

Antioppressive education: A term coined by Kevin Kumashiro in 2002 referring to efforts teachers could use to challenge what they saw as the oppressive functions in schools.

APS: Adult Protective Services, public agencies allowed to investigate and to intervene in cases of adult self-neglect, neglect, and abuse.

ASPIRA: An organization founded in New York City by Antonia Pantoja in 1961 to support educational achievement among Latin American young people; the core of ASPIRA is school-based clubs that offer leadership training, community projects, and cultural enrichment.

Bicultural education: Education in which two cultures are valued equally and during which aspects such as the language and images of both cultures are incorporated simultaneously.

Big Book, The: Alcoholics Anonymous: The Story of How Many Thousands of Men and Women Have Recovered From Alcoholism, first published in 1939 by Bill Wilson and Robert Smith; it is a founding text of Alcoholics Anonymous and includes a description of the 12-step program that has since been adopted by many other self-help groups.

Bilingual education: An approach to education in which students are taught for part of the day in one language and part of the day in another; for instance, schoolchildren whose home language is not English might have some of their classes in their home language and some in English.

Brown Berets: A Mexican American organization founded in Los Angeles in 1967, aimed at ending discrimination, improving schools, and supporting Mexican Americans in exercising their civil rights.

CAPTA: The Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, passed in 1974, the first U.S. federal law to create and enforce national standards for the prevention of child abuse throughout the nation.

Carl D. Perkins Vocational Education Act: A federal law, first passed in 1984 and reauthorized in 1990 and 1998, providing federal funds to develop high-quality vocational and technical education programs for young people and adults.

Case management services: Services that coordinate the care or other services (e.g., medical care, social services, counseling) received by an individual for the purpose of meeting his or her needs in a cost-effective manner.

CBPR: Community-based participatory research, a method of research in which community members, researchers, and representatives of organizations work as partners to conduct research that responds to the needs and experiences of the community members.

CCBA: The Chinese Consolidated Benevolent Association, also known as the Chinese Six Companies, an organization founded in the 1850s to serve the needs of the Chinese American community.

CCC: The Civilian Conservation Corps, an organization created in 1933 as part of the New Deal, to employ young men, provide academic and vocational training, and perform work in the nation's parks and forests.

CDF: Children's Defense Fund, a private organization founded in 1973 to advocate for the rights of children.

CETA: The Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, a 1973 federal law providing funding for job training and job creation.

Chautauqua Movement: An adult education movement in the late 19th and early 20th centuries that included correspondence courses, reading circles, and traveling exhibitions and lectures.

Citizen Schools: A nonprofit organization founded in 1995 to provide quality after-school programs to middle-school students, including academic support and apprenticeship programs; the organization was founded in Boston, but now exists in several other cities, including New York and Houston.

Client-centered therapy: A type of therapy developed by Carl Rogers that focuses on providing an accepting environment, so that patients are able to see their situations more clearly, and eventually arrive at solutions to their problems.

College Settlement Association: An organization founded in the United States in 1890 to address the role of women in the settlement house movement. Although the first settlement house was populated by men, by 1910, over 75 percent of U.S. settlement houses had been founded by women.

Congregate meal programs: Programs that provide meals to adults in a social setting, such as a senior center or church, usually five or more days per week.

Contracting out: The governmental purchase of social services from a nongovernmental provider, such as a nonprofit or for-profit organization; the practice dates back at least to the English Poor Law of 1732 and was in widespread use in the United States by the 18th century.

COS: Charity Organization Society, a type of charitable organization first founded in London in 1869, with the first American COS established in Buffalo, New York, in 1877. The COS movement emphasized requiring the poor to help themselves, rather than simply distributing money or other assistance to them.

Council on Social Work Education: A nonprofit association founded in 1952 that is the accrediting agency for social work education in the United States

Country Life Commission: A commission created in 1907 by President Theodore Roosevelt; among the commission's recommendations were ways to strengthen rural schools and to assist farmers in becoming more efficient.

Creole language: A language that began as pidgin, that is, as a simplified version of another language, but is then adopted as a first language by a group of people.

CRT: Critical race theory, an approach to legal analysis that evolved in the 1970s and was later applied in other fields; CRT focuses on analyzing how dominant groups (e.g., white Americans) exert institutionalized authority over other groups.

CSWE: The Council on Social Work Education, an organization that sets standards for academic social work programs; the CSWE was created in 1952 by the merger of the American Association of Schools of Social Work (AASSW) and the National Association of Schools of Social Administration (NASSA).

Cultural relativism: A doctrine, first developed in anthropology by Franz Boas, arguing that the institutions and practices of culture should be understood in context and not judged by the standards of another culture.

Culture-bound syndrome: Physical or mental illnesses and symptoms, such as amok or ghost sickness, which occur only within a particular cultural group.

Delgado v. Bastrop Independent School District*: A 1948 decision by the U.S. District Court of the Western District of Texas ruling that public schools could not segregate Mexican American students into separate schools, although they could provide separate classes for students needing language enrichment.

Demand-responsive transportation services: Transportation that allows people to schedule door-to-door rides to medical appointments and many other places; demand-responsive transportation services are most often provided to the elderly and to handicapped individuals who are unable to provide their own transportation or use conventional, route-based public transportation.

Dialogical education: A method of education developed by Paulo Freire in which students and teachers engage in discussion and learn from each other.

Diaspora: A population living outside the geographic area of its origin, for instance, the Caribbean community in the United States.

Ethnic Dilemma in Social Services, The: A 1981 book by Shirley Jenkins, based on the study of 54 agencies in six states serving Asian Americans, African Americans, Puerto Ricans, Chicanos, and Cherokees.

Ethnic group: A group of people who are linked by biology and culture, sharing characteristics such as a kinship system, a belief system, a common biological heritage, and/or a common place of origin.

Ethnic minority agency: A service agency providing services to members of an ethnic minority group, which is staffed by members of the same ethnic minority group, thus reducing cross-group tension.

Everson v. Board of Education, Irving Township: A 1947 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that it was not a violation of the First Amendment for public funds to be used to bus children to schools run by religious organizations.

Fair Housing Act: A 1968 federal law prohibiting discrimination in the sale or rental of housing on the basis of race, religion, gender, ethnicity, national origin, family status, or handicapped status.

Family foster care: The most common type of out-of-home care provided for children, family foster care is offered to children in the home of a family not related to them.

Farrington v. Tokushige: A 1927 U.S. Supreme Court decision that establishes the right of parents to send their children to Japanese-language schools.

Freedom Summer: In summer 1964, many civil rights movement volunteers traveled to Mississippi to assist in voter registration efforts and establish Freedom Schools; these actions met with reprisals, including the murder of some of the volunteers.

Friendly visiting: A practice championed by the Charity Organization Societies, in which individuals, often volunteers and generally members of the middle and upper classes, would visit poor families and serve as an example, while also counseling members of the family about ways to escape poverty. The practice was widespread in the late 19th century; for instance, in 1892, Boston had 683 friendly visitors, and Brooklyn, New York, had 532.

Fukuin Ka: The first Japanese American organization in the United States, founded in 1877; the Fukuin Ka ran a boarding house, offered English lessons, and provided meeting rooms.

Gender variant: Sometimes called gender nonconforming, children whose interests, behaviors, and gender expressions are outside the norm for their biological sex; for example, a girl who prefers boys' sports or a boy who prefers to play with dolls. A gender-variant child will not necessarily grow up to be transgender.

Gender-neutral language: Language that does not favor or omit mention of one gender over the other; also known as nonsexist language.

General Education Board (GEB): A philanthropic organization created by John D. Rockefeller in 1902, and chartered by Congress in 1903, to improve education in the southern United States, without regard to the race, religion, or gender of students.

GLSEN: The Gay, Lesbian and Straight Education Network, an organization founded in 1990 by Kevin Jennings to advocate for the rights of people of all gender identities and sexual orientations to feel safe and respected in primary and secondary schools.

Gong Lum v. Rice: A 1927 U.S. Supreme Court decision that denied the right of a Chinese man in Mississippi to send his daughter to a white public school and ruled that it was not discriminatory to require her to attend the local black school instead.

Griffin v. School Board of Prince Edward County*: A 1964 U.S. Supreme Court decision ordering the Board of Supervisors of Prince Edward County, Virginia, to reopen their public schools, which had been closed in 1959 in order to avoid integrating them.

HBCU: Historically black colleges and universities, institutions of higher education founded before 1954 with the primary mission of educating African Americans; as of 1996, there were 103 HBCUs in the United States, educating about 16 percent of African American college and university students.

Head Start: A program authorized in 1964 by the federal Economic Opportunity Act to provide enriched, educational summer programs for children from poor families, with the goal of improving long-term outcomes for these children.

Hidden curriculum: "Lessons" learned by children in school, even if they are not explicitly taught; for instance, if teachers expend more attention on the education of male or white students, the lesson learned by female and nonwhite students is that they, and their education, are not a priority.

Holt International Children's Services: An adoption agency found in the 1950s by Harry and Bertha Holt, an American couple who adopted eight children from Korea.

Home health care: Medically oriented services provided in the home to someone recently discharged from a hospital, including nursing service and social work; home health care services are typically provided for a limited time, often only for two to three months.

Home-delivered meal programs: Programs that provide cooked meals to homebound adults in their homes, usually one or two meals per day, five days per week.

Homemaker and personal care services: Home-based services to support an individual's personal care (e.g., bathing, ambulation) and instrumental activities of daily living (e.g., housekeeping, meal preparation) that may be provided on a long-term basis.

Hopwood v. State of Texas*: A 1996 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, ruling that colleges and universities may not use race or national origin as a factor in admissions decisions; the plaintiff was a white applicant to the University of Texas Law School who claimed she was discriminated against because of her race.

Hospice care: Services provided, either in the home or in a facility, to offer holistic and palliative care for individuals with terminal illnesses; hospices generally do not provide treatment to either forestall or hasten death, but concentrate on making individuals comfortable and helping them prepare for the end of their lives.

ICWA: The Indian Child Welfare Act, a 1978 federal law creating conditions that must be met before Indian children can be taken from their families, and favoring placements within homes reflecting Indian culture when children must be placed out of their own homes.

IDEA (1975): The Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, a 1975 federal law, originally called the Education for All Handicapped Children Act; IDEA provides federal grants to states to improve education for individuals with disabilities and specifies procedures for individuals to appeal for services specified in the act.

IDEA (1990): The Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, a 1990 federal law requiring that children with mental, emotional, and physical disabilities be provided with a free and appropriate public education, and providing money to the states to improve their educational offerings for these children.

IEP: Individualized education program, a legally binding document that specifies an instructional plan for a school-age or preschool child with a disability, developed jointly by the child's parents and a team of professionals, and possibly the child as well.

IES: The Institution of Education Sciences, a federal organization within the U.S. Department of Education, created by the Education Sciences Reform Act of 2002.

Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act: A 1975 federal law providing funds to construct schools on Native American reservations, giving Native Americans more control over the education of their children, and allowing preferences toward Native Americans in the granting of subcontracts.

Institutionalized racism: Racism that occurs through the usual practices and policies of an institution, possibly without a deliberate attempt to discriminate; for instance, if jobs are discussed and advertised only on occasions when, and in locations where, African Americans are unlikely to see or hear about them, that could be considered institutionalized racism.

Involuntary client: A client who is pressured or forced into taking part in social work services by those who have power over them, as opposed to a voluntary client, who freely chooses to participate.

Keyes v. School District No. 1*: A U.S. Supreme Court decision regarding public schools in Denver, Colorado, which rules that Latinos are a minority group that must be considered in desegregation plans, and that segregation due to gerrymandered school districts is illegal.

Kinship foster care: Foster care provided to children by someone who is related to them, often grandparents.

LEP: Limited English Proficiency, a designation for individuals (often students in elementary and secondary school) who are not fluent in spoken and written English.

Life-span development: A theory of development, put forth in 1987 by P. B. Baltes, arguing that development does not end in adolescence but continues over the life span, is a multidimensional and multicausal process, is modifiable, and includes both gains and losses with increasing age.

LULAC: The League of United Latin American Citizens, an organization founded in 1929 in Corpus Christi, Texas, with the goal of using constitutional means to enhance the well-being, civil rights, education, and economic conditions of Latinos.

MALDEF: The Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, founded in 1968 in El Paso, Texas, to protect the civil rights of Latinos; some initial funding was provided by a grant from the Ford Foundation.

McCollum v. Board of Education*: A 1948 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that holding religion classes in a public school in Champaign, Illinois, during the school day is a violation of the First Amendment.

Melting pot: A model of integration in which immigrants from diverse countries, races, and backgrounds give up some of their unique identities to create a new type of person, the American.

Mendez et al. v. Westminster School District of Orange County*: A 1946 decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit that ruled that requiring Mexican American children to attend different schools from white students is a violation of their rights.

Mexican repatriation: A response to the Great Depression in which people from Mexico, including U.S. citizens, who applied for social services were encouraged to return to Mexico; an estimated 400,000 people left the United States, not all of them voluntarily, between 1929 and 1934.

Meyer v. Nebraska*: A 1923 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court overturning a Nebraska state law banning foreign language instruction in schools before the eighth grade.

Model minority: A description of an ethnic group believed to be particularly successful or to otherwise have admirable traits, such as strong family values or high per capita income; Asian groups are sometimes stereotyped as model minorities.

NASW: The National Association of Social Workers, the largest membership organization of social workers in the world; the NASW was created in 1955 through the merger of the American Association of Social Workers, the American Association of Psychiatric Social Workers, the American Association of Group Workers, the Association for the Study of Community Organization, the American Association of Medical Social Workers, the National Association of School Social Workers, and the Social Work Research Group.

National Association of Black Social Workers: An organization founded in 1966 by African American social workers upset with the lack of interest in the National Association of Social Workers (NASW) in addressing social issues; it split from the NASW in 1969.

National Human Services Assembly: An organization founded in 1923 as the National Social Work Council to help existing agencies work more effectively by exchanging information with each other.

Naturalization Act of 1790: The first U.S. law to address the process of becoming a naturalized citizen, it offered naturalization to white persons of good moral character who had resided for at least two years in the United States.

NCANDS: The National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System, a federal program that collects child abuse data from the states.

Neighborhood Guild: The first settlement house in the United States, established in New York City in 1886, and later renamed the University Settlement.

OAA: The Older Americans Act, a 1965 federal law that created the Administration on Aging and provided funds to states to create services for older adults, including senior and adult day care centers, employment support, protective services, and home delivery of cooked meals.

Pensionado Act of 1903: A federal program to provide scholarships for Filipino students to study in the United States which aimed to foster the Philippines independence movement and create goodwill between the two countries.

Pidgin language: A simplified language that is not native to any community but is used for communication among people who do not share a common language.

Plessy v. Ferguson*: An 1896 U.S. Supreme Court decision upholding the constitutionality of state laws requiring segregation in public facilities; the original lawsuit was brought by Homer Plessy, a man of mixed race who was arrested after he refused to leave a train coach reserved for white passengers.

Plyler v. Doe*: A 1982 U.S. Supreme Court decision overturning a Texas law that denied public education to undocumented immigrant children; among other things, the court's decision bars schools from refusing to admit undocumented children, treating them differently from other students, and investigating and disclosing their immigration status.

Progressive Era: A period in late-19th- and early-20th-century American history, often described as beginning in 1890 or 1895 and ending in 1914 or 1917, during which many charitable organizations, societies, settlement houses, and other organizations serving the poor were founded and expanded.

Proxemics: The study of personal and social norms and how they affect interactions with others; for instance, the expected physical distance between two speakers differs among cultures.

Pygmalion effect: Also known as the self-fulfilling prophecy, the concept that expectations can exert a strong influence; for example, children whose teacher expects them to do well will learn more than the same children taught by a teacher who expects little of them.

Respite services: Services provided to allow caregivers, often relatives, to take a break from their duties of providing care; most respite services are provided in the home and for a few hours at a time, but some programs also offer overnight respite services.

Roberto Alvarez v. the Lemon Grove School*: A successful 1931 challenge to the segregation of Latino students in San Diego, California, resulting in Latino children being allowed to attend the Lemon Grove School with white children rather than being required to attend a separate and unequal facility for Latino students.

Roberts v. City of Boston*: An 1849 decision by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, upholding the city's right to force an African American child to attend a black-only school, although several white-only schools were located nearer her home.

Rosenwald Fund: A philanthropic fund established in 1917 by Julius Rosenwald that played a key role in financing programs to improve the health and welfare of African Americans in the southern United States and also provided partial funding for the construction of almost 5,000 schools in that region.

SAMHSA: The Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, an agency within the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, whose goal is to reduce the impact of mental illness and substance abuse in the United States.

Settlement house: A residence for university graduates in city slums, where they could offer education and services to help residents escape poverty and address other social problems. In 1897, there were 74 settlement houses in the United States, and 413 by 1909.

Social context: As described by D. Lum in 2003, elements of the environment that play a crucial role in shaping an individual.

Social control: Methods to directly or indirectly encourage or force people to conform to values and behaviors approved in a society, with social control often exerted by dominant groups such as members of the society's political or economic elite.

"Standards for Cultural Competence in Social Work Practice": A 2006 document issued by the National Association of Social Workers (NASW) and covering areas such as language diversity, cross-cultural leadership, service delivery, empowerment and advocacy, self-awareness, and ethics and values.

Stereotype threat: The fear harbored by a member of a minority or nondominant group that he or she will be treated or judged in terms of a prevailing, distorted view of his or her group.

Supportive housing: Noninstitutional housing that provides residents, such as elderly adults, with more assistance and oversight than is typical in private housing.

Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education*: A 1971 U.S. Supreme Court decision establishing that the responsibility for creating desegregation plans lies with school authorities.

Tarasoff v. the Regents of the University of California*: A 1976 California Supreme Court decision ruling that the responsibility to prevent harm to a third party could take precedent over the usual presumption of the confidentiality of patient records if a psychotherapist has knowledge suggesting that his or her patient may cause harm to someone.

Theory of general systems: A theory created by the Austrian American biologist Karl Ludwig von Bertalanffy, which has been used to describe the way groups of human beings function, including families, professions, and communities. According to Bertalanffy, at its most basic level, a system is a complex of components that interact with each other.

Trabajadores de la Raza: A national social work organization founded in 1969 by Mexican Americans who believed the National Organization of Social Workers (NASW) was not responsive to the needs of their communities.

Twelve steps: A set of 12 behavioral steps fundamental to Alcoholics Anonymous but also used in other self-help programs; the steps begin with the need for the addict to admit that they cannot control their addiction and end with helping others who also suffer from addition.

War on Poverty: A political movement in the 1960s, led by presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson, to create a more equal U.S. society through means such as improved education and job training programs.

White Rose Mission: The second settlement house in New York City to serve the needs of the African American community, the White Rose Mission was founded in 1898 by Victoria Earle Matthews and operated until the 1960s.

Sarah E. Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University

Resource Guide

Books

Allatson, Paul and Jo McCormack, eds. Exile Cultures, Misplaced Identities. New York: Rodopi, 2008.

Anderson, Joseph and Robin Wiggins Carter, eds. Diversity Perspectives for Social Work Practice. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2003.

Anderson, Kim L. and Bonnie M. Davis. Creating Culturally Considerate Schools: Educating Without Bias. Thousand Oaks, CA: Corwin Press, 2012.

Appleby, George A., Edgar Colon, and Julia Hamilton. Diversity, Oppression, and Social Functioning: Person-in-Environment Assessment and Intervention. 2nd ed. Boston: Pearson/Allyn and Bacon, 2007.

Ball, Carlos A. The Right to be Parents: LGBT Families and the Transformation of Parenthood. New York: New York University Press, 2012.

Barrett, Robert L. and Bryan E. Robinson. Gay Fathers: Encouraging the Hearts of Gay Dads and Their Families. Rev. ed. San Francisco: Jossey Bass, 2000.

Berry, John W. et al. Cross-Cultural Psychology: Research and Applications. 3rd ed. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2011.

Berzoff, Joan, ed. Falling Through the Cracks: Psychodynamic Practice With Vulnerable and Oppressed Populations. New York: Columbia University Press, 2012.

Bodley, John H. Victims of Progress. 5th ed. Lanham, MD: Altamira Press, 2008.

Boehm, Debora A. Intimate Migrations: Gender, Family, and Illegality Among Transnational Mexicans. New York: New York University Press, 2012.

Carter, Carolyn S. Social Work and Women's Health: Resources on Health Empowerment, Advocacy, and Literacy (HEAL). Alexandria, VA: Council on Social Work Education, 2006.

Chuang, Susan S. and Robert P. Moreno, eds. Immigrant Children: Change, Adaptation, and Cultural Transformation. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 2011.

Constantine, Madonna G., ed. Clinical Practice With People of Color: A Guide to Becoming Culturally Competent. New York: Teachers College Press, 2007.

Dana, Richard H. Multicultural Assessment: Principles, Applications, and Examples. Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum, 2005.

Dennison, George C., Frederick M. Hodges, and Marilyn Fayre Milos, eds. Genital Autonomy: Protecting Personal Choice. New York: Springer, 2010.

Diller, Jerry V. Cultural Diversity: A Primer for the Human Services. 4th ed. Belmont, CA: Thomson Brooks/Cole, 2011.

Drozdek, Boris and John P. Wilson, eds. Voices of Trauma: Treating Survivors Across Cultures. Boston: Springer Science + Business Media, 2007.

Featherstone, Brid, Mark Rivett, and Jonathan Scourfield. Working With Men in Health and Social Care. Los Angeles: Sage, 2007.

Fontes, Lisa Aronson. Interviewing Clients Across Cultures: A Practitioner's Guide. New York: Guilford Press, 2008.

Funk, Rus Ervin. Reaching Men: Strategies for Preventing Sexist Attitudes, Behaviors, and Violence. Indianapolis, IN: JIST Life, 2006.

Furman, Rich. Social Work Practice With Men at Risk. New York: Columbia University Press, 2010.

Gabbidon, Shaun L. Criminological Perspectives on Race and Crime. 2nd ed. New York: Routledge, 2010.

Gebo, Erika and Brenda J. Bond. Looking Beyond Suppression: Community Strategies to Reduce Gang Violence. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 2012.

Gelfand, Michelle Jl, Chi-yue Chiu, and Ying-yi Hong. Advances in Culture and Psychology. New York: Oxford University Press, 2011.

Gemert, Frank van, Dana Peterson, and Inger-Lise Lien, eds. Street Gangs, Migration and Ethnicity. Portland, OR: Willan, 2008.

Georgas, James et al. Families Across Cultures: A 30-Nation Psychological Study. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

Gibson, Mark. The Feeding of Nations: Redefining Food Security for the 21st Century. Boca Raton, FL: CRC Press, 2012.

Goldberg, Abbie E. Gay Dads: Transitions to Adoptive Fatherhood. New York: New York University Press, 2012.

Graham, Mekada. Black Issues in Social Work and Social Care. Bristol, UK: Policy, 2007.

Green, James W. Cultural Awareness in the Human Services: A Multi-Ethnic Approach. 2nd ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 1995.

Guadalupe, Krishna L. and Doman Lum, eds. Multidimensional Contextual Practice: Diversity and Transcendence. Belmont, CA: Thomson Brooks/Cole, 2005.

Hagedorn, John M. Gangs in the Global City: Alternatives to Traditional Criminology. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2007.

Hernlund, Ylva and Bettina Shell-Duncan, eds. Transcultural Bodies: Female Genital Cutting in Global Context. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2007.

Herrera, Socorro Guadalupe. Biography-Driven Culturally Responsive Teaching. New York: Teachers College Press, 2010.

Hinton, Devon E. and Byron J. Good, eds. Culture and Panic Disorder. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2009.

Holz, Rosemarie Petra. The Birth Control Clinic in a Marketplace World. Rochester, NY: University of Rochester Press, 2012.

Hunter, Ski, Sandra S. Sundel, and Martin Sundel. Women at Midlife: Life Experiences and Implications for the Helping Professions. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 2002.

Hutto, Daniel D. and Matthew Ratcliffe, eds. Folk Psychology ReAssessed. London: Springer, 2007.

Kagitcibasi, Cigdem. Family, Self, and Human Development Across Cultures: Theory and Applications, 2nd ed. Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum, 2007.

Keith, Kenneth D., ed. Cross-Cultural Psychology: Contemporary Themes and Perspectives. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell, 2011.

Kim, Uichol, Kuo-shu Yang, and Kwang-kuo Hwang. Indigenous and Cultural Psychology: Understanding People in Context. New York: Springer, 2006.

Koppelman, Kent L. The Great Diversity Debate: Embracing Pluralism in School and Society. New York: Teachers Colleges Press, 2011.

Kramer, Betty J. and Edward H. Thompson, eds. Men as Caregivers: Theory, Research, and Service Implications. New York: Springer, 2002.

Lansford, Jennifer E., Kirby Deater-Deckard, and Marc H. Bornstein, eds. Immigrant Families in Contemporary Society. New York: Guilford Press, 2007.

Lott, Bernice. Multiculturalism and Diversity: A Social Psychological Perspective. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell, 2010.

Lum, Doman, ed. Cultural Competence, Practice Stages, and Client Systems. Belmont, CA: Thomson Brooks/Cole, 2005.

Lum, Doman. Social Work Practice and People of Color: A Process-Stage Approach. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole-Thomson Learning, 2004.

Maclean, Mavis and John Eekelaar, eds. Managing Family Justice in Diverse Societies. Oxford, UK: Hart Publishing, 2013.

Mahalingam, Ramaswami, ed. Cultural Psychology of Immigrants. Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum, 2006.

Markward, Marth A. and Bonnie Yegidis. Evidence-Based Practice With Women: Toward Effective Social Work Practice With Low-Income Women. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2011.

Massey, Douglas S. and Magaly Sanchez. Brokered Boundaries: Creating Immigrant Identity in Anti-Immigrant Times. New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 2010.

Maynard, Ashley E. and Mary I Martini. Learning in Cultural Context: Family, Peers, and School. Boston: Kluwer Academic/Plenum Publishers, 2005.

McCaffrey, Paul, ed. Families: Traditional and New Structures. Ipswich, MA: H.W. Wilson, 2013.

Mullaly, Bob. Challenging Oppression and Confronting Privilege: A Critical Social Work Approach. 2nd ed. Don Mills, Canada: Oxford University Press, 2010.

Nieto, Sonia. The Light in their Eyes: Creating Multicultural Learning Communities. 10th anniversary ed. New York: Teachers College Press, 2010.

Okitikpi, Toyin and Cathy Aymer. Key Concepts in Anti-Discriminatory Social Work. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2010.

Parker, Woodrow M. and Mary A. Fukuyama. Consciousness-Raising: A Primer for Multicultural Counseling. 3rd ed. Springfield, IL: Charles C Thomas, 2007.

Pederson, Paul, Hugh C. Crethar, and Jon Carlson. Inclusive Cultural Empathy: Making Relationship Central in Counseling and Psychotherapy. Washington, DC: American Psychological Association, 2008.

Peterson, K. Jean and Alice A. Lieberman, eds. Building on Women's Strengths: A Social Work Agenda for the Twenty-first Century. New York: Haworth Social Work Practice Press, 2001.

Prowse, C. E. Defining Street Gangs in the 21st Century: Fluid, Mobile, and Transnational Networks. New York: Springer, 2012.

Rabin, Claire Low, ed. Understanding Gender and Culture in the Helping Process: Practitioners' Narratives from Global Perspectives. Belmont, CA: Thomson/Wadsworth, 2005.

Randolph, Antonia. The Wrong Kind of Different: Challenging the Meaning of Diversity in American Classrooms. New York: Teachers College Press, 2013.

Rice, Stephen K. and Michael D. White, eds. Race, Ethnicity, and Policing: New and Essential Readings. New York: New York University Press, 2010.

Roberts, Albert R., ed. Battered Women and Their Families: Intervention Strategies and Treatment Programs. 3rd ed. New York: Springer, 2007.

Sensoy, Ozlem and Robin DiAngelo. Is Everyone Really Equal? An Introduction to Key Concepts in Social Justice Education. New York: Teachers College Press, 2012.

Sisneros, Jose, et al. Critical Multicultural Social Work. Chicago: Lyceum Books, 2008.

Skaine, Rosemarie. Female Genital Mutilation: Legal, Cultural and Medical Issues. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2005.

Slaughter-Defoe, Diane E., ed. Racial Stereotyping and Child Development. New York: Karger, 2012.

Souto-Manning, Mariana. Freire, Teaching, and Learning: Culture Circles Across Contexts. New York: Peter Lang, 2010.

Steffen, Charles G. Mutilating Khalid: The Symbolic Politics of Female Genital Cutting. Trenton, NJ: Red Sea Press, 2011.

Svasek, Maruska, ed. Moving Subjects, Moving Objects: Transnationalism, Cultural Production and Emotions. New York: Berghahn Books, 2012.

Valtonen, Kathleen. Social Work and Migration: Immigrant and Refugee Settlement and Integration. Burlington, VT: Ashgate, 2008.

Walker, Steven. Effective Social Work With Children, Young People and Families: Putting Systems Theory into Practice. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2012.

Wilson, John P. and Catherine So-kum Tang. Cross-Cultural Assessment of Psychological Trauma and PTSD. New York: Springer, 2007.

Wong, Paul T. P. and Lillian C. J. Wong. Handbook of Multicultural Perspectives on Stress and Coping. New York: Springer, 2006.

Journals

Adoption Quarterly
Advances in Family Intervention, Assessment and Theory Advances in Social Work
American Journal of Drug and Alcohol Abuse
American Journal of Family Therapy
Anthropology & Medicine
Archives of Women's Mental Health
Asia Pacific Journal of Social Work
Asian American Journal of Psychology
BMC Women's Health
British Journal of Social Work
Community Mental Health Journal
Couple and Family Psychology: Research and Practice
Cultural Diversity and Ethnic Minority Psychology
Culture, Medicine, and Psychiatry
Diversity in Health and Social Care Drug and Alcohol Dependence
Drug and Alcohol Review
Ethnicity & Disease
Family Journal
Family Violence Prevention and Health Practice
Gender Issues
Gender Medicine Georgetown Journal of Gender and the Law
Harm Reduction Journal
International Journal of Family Therapy
International Journal of Mental Health
International Journal of Mental Health and Addictions
International Journal of Social Welfare
International Perspectives on Sexual and Reproductive Health Issues in Social Work Education
Journal of Addictions and Offender Counseling
Journal of Addictive Diseases
Journal of Comparative Social Welfare
Journal of Cultural Diversity: An Interdisciplinary Journal
Journal of Diversity in Higher Education
Journal of Ethics in Mental Health
Journal of Ethnic and Cultural Diversity in Social Work
Journal of Ethnobiology and Ethnomedicine
Journal of Feminist Family Therapy
Journal of Global Social Work Practice
Journal of Health and Social Behavior
Journal of Human Behavior in the Social Environment
Journal of Indigenous Voices in Social Work
Journal of Latina/o Psychology
Journal of Muslim Mental Health Journal of Rural Mental Health
Journal of Social Work
Journal of Women's Health
Medical Anthropology
Medical Anthropology Quarterly
Mental Health, Religion & Culture
Minority Nurse
New England Journal of Human Services
Perspectives on Sexual and Reproductive Health
Psychology of Men & Masculinity
Psychology of Sexual Orientation and Gender Diversity
Psychology of Violence
Rehabilitation Counseling Bulletin
Social Psychology Quarterly
Social Science & Medicine
Social Service Review
Social Work Abstracts
Social Work Forum
Society and Mental Health
Spirituality in Clinical Practice
Studies in Family Planning
Widener Journal of Law, Economics, & Race
Women & Health
Women & Therapy
Women's Health & Urban Life
Women's Health Issues

Web Sites

American Psychological Association: Guidelines for Providers of Psychological Services to Ethnic, Linguistic, and Culturally Diverse Populations. http://www.apa.org/pi/oema/resources/policy/provider-guidelines.aspx
Association for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual & Transgender Issues in Counseling. http://www.algbtic.org/resources/lgbtq-references-and-resources
Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development. http://www.multiculturalcounseling.org

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Immigrant and Refugee Health.
http://www.cdc.gov/immigrantrefugeehealth

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Minority Health.
http://www.cdc.gov/minorityhealth

Centers for Medicare & Medicaid: Medicaid.
http://www.medicaid.gov

Children's Defense Fund.
http://www.childrensdefense.org

National Association of School Psychologists: Resource Library.
http://www.nasponline.org/resources/index.aspx

National Association of Social Workers: Social Work Month 2012 Toolkit Topics.
http://www.socialworkers.org/pressroom/swMonth/2012/default.asp

National Rural Health Association.
http://www.ruralhealthweb.org/go

U.S. Department of Education: Office of Vocational and Adult Education.
http://www2.ed.gov/about/offices/list/ovae/pi/AdultEd/index.html

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children & Families, Adoption.
https://www.childwelfare.gov/adoption

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children & Families, Child Abuse & Neglect.
https://www.childwelfare.gov/can

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, AIDS.
http://www.aids.gov

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, National Center for Complementary and Alternative Medicine.
http://nccam.nih.gov

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office on Women's Health.
http://www.womenshealth.gov

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.
http://beta.samhsa.gov/about-us

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Temporary Assistance for Needy Families.
http://www.hhs.gov/recovery/programs/tanf

U.S. Department of Justice, Civil Rights Division, Americans with Disabilities Act.
http://www.ada.gov

World Health Organization: Social Determinants of Health.
http://www.who.int/social_determinants/en

Sarah E. Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University

Appendix

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention
Health Disparities and Inequalities Report — United States, 2013

Selected Reports

Social Determinants of Health

Health Outcomes: Morbidity

Health Outcomes: Mortality

Education and Income — United States, 2009 and 2011

Gloria L. Beckles, MD[1]
Benedict I. Truman, MD[2]
[1]National Center for Chronic Disease Prevention and Health Promotion, CDC
[2]National Center for HIV/AIDS, Viral Hepatitis, STD, and TB Prevention, CDC

Corresponding author: Gloria L. Beckles, Division of Diabetes Translation, National Center for Chronic Disease Prevention and Health Promotion, CDC. Telephone: 770-488-1272; E-mail: glb4@cdc.gov.

Introduction

The factors that influence the socioeconomic position of individuals and groups within industrial societies also influence their health (1,2). Socioeconomic position has continuous and graded effects on health that are cumulative over a lifetime. The socioeconomic conditions of the places where persons live and work have an even more substantial influence on health than personal socioeconomic position (3,4). In the United States, educational attainment and income are the indicators that are most commonly used to measure the effect of socioeconomic position on health. Research indicates that substantial educational and income disparities exist across many measures of health (1,5–8). A previous report described the magnitude and patterns of absolute and relative measures of disparity in noncompletion of high school and poverty in 2005 and 2009 (9). Notable disparities defined by race/ethnicity, socioeconomic factors, disability status, and geographic location were identified for 2005 and 2009, with no evidence of a temporal decrease in racial/ethnic disparities, whereas socioeconomic and disability disparities increased from 2005 to 2009.

The analysis and discussion of educational attainment and income that follow are part of the second CDC Health Disparities and Inequalities Report (CHDIR) and update information on disparities in the prevalence of noncompletion of high school and poverty presented in the first CHDIR (8). The 2011 CHDIR (9) was the first CDC report to describe disparities across a wide range of diseases, behavioral risk factors, environmental exposures, social determinants, and health-care access. The topic presented in this report is based on criteria that are described in the 2013 CHDIR Introduction (10). The purposes of this analysis are to discuss and raise awareness about group differences in levels of noncompletion of high school and poverty and to motivate actions to reduce these disparities.

Methods

To monitor progress toward eliminating health disparities in the prevalence of noncompletion of high school and poverty, CDC analyzed 2009 and 2011 data from the Current Population Survey (CPS), using methods described previously (8). The CPS is a cross-sectional monthly household survey of a representative sample of the civilian, noninstitutionalized U.S. household population that is conducted jointly by the U.S. Census Bureau and the Bureau of Labor Statistics (11). Data on the continuous income-to-poverty ratio (IPR) in the 2009 and 2011 National Bureau of Economic Research (NBER) data sets based on the March CPS were merged with the March supplement files from the 2009 and 2011 Integrated Public Use Microdata Series — Current Population Surveys (IPUMS-CPS) (12,13).

Self-reported data were collected on various characteristics, including demographic, socioeconomic, and geographic characteristics and place of birth. Group disparities in age-standardized prevalence of noncompletion of high school and poverty were assessed according to sex, race/ethnicity, age, educational attainment, poverty status, disability status, place of birth, world region (country) of birth, U.S. census region of residence, and metropolitan area of residence.

Race/ethnicity categories included non-Hispanic white, non-Hispanic black, American Indian/ Alaska Native, Asian/Pacific Islander, Hispanic, and multiple races. Age groups included 25–44, 45–64, 65–79, and ≥80 years. Educational attainment categories included less than high school, high school graduate or equivalent, some college, and college graduate. Poverty status was derived from the IPR, which is based on family income relative to federally established poverty thresholds that are revised annually to reflect changes in the cost of living as measured by the Consumer Price Index (14).

Disability status was defined by the national data collection standards released by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) in 2011 (15). World region of birth was aggregated to approximate the regions of the world from which the foreign born now originate (16). Absolute and relative disparities in noncompletion of high school were assessed separately for adults aged ≥25 years and 18–24 years; for poverty, disparities were assessed for the total population aged ≥18 years.

Disparities between groups were measured as deviations from a referent category rate. Referent categories were usually those that had the most favorable group estimates for most variables; for racial/ethnic comparisons, white males and females were selected because they were the largest group (17,18). Absolute difference was measured as the simple difference between a group estimate and the estimate for its respective reference category, or referent group. Relative difference, a percentage, was obtained by dividing the absolute difference by the value in the referent category and multiplying by 100. To evaluate changes in disparity over time, relative differences for the groups in 2009 were subtracted from relative differences in 2011 (17,18). The z statistic and a two-tailed test at $p<0.05$ with Bonferroni correction for multiple comparisons were used to test for the statistical significance of the observed absolute and relative differences and for changes over time. To calculate the standard errors for testing the change over time, a previously described method was used (19), modified to account for the parameter being compared (i.e., relative difference). Statistically significant increases and decreases in relative differences from 2009 to 2011 were interpreted as increases and decreases in disparity, respectively. CDC used statistical software to account for the complex sample design of the CPS and to produce point estimates, standard errors, and 95% confidence intervals. Estimates were age standardized by the direct method to the year 2000 age distribution of the U.S. population (20). Estimates with relative standard error ≥30% were not reported.

Results

In the 2011 population aged ≥25 years, statistically significant absolute disparities in noncompletion of high school were identified for all the characteristics studied (Table 1). Noncompletion of high school increased with age; the absolute differences between the age-specific percentages in the referent group (45–64 years) and the age groups 65–79 years and ≥80 years were 6.6 and 14.8 percentage points, respectively. The absolute racial/ethnic difference between non-Hispanic whites and each of the other racial ethnic groups was highest for Hispanics (30.4 percentage points), lowest for the multiple races group (4.0 percentage points), and intermediate for non-Hispanic American Indian/Alaska Natives (11.6 percentage points), and non-Hispanic blacks (8.8 percentage points). This pattern was similar in both sexes, except that among women, the absolute difference for the multiple races group (3.1 percentage points) was not statistically significant. Absolute differences between the age-standardized percentages of adults who had not completed high school in each poverty status group and the referent group (high income, IPR ≥4) were statistically significant overall and in both men and women. Noncompletion of high school increased with increasing poverty; the absolute difference for the poorest group was approximately three times the absolute difference for the middle-income group (6.4 versus 1.7 percentage points). Significant absolute differences between adults with and without a disability in noncompletion of high school also were found (total: 9.8 percentage points; men: 9.5 percentage points; women: 10.1 percentage points).

Among adults aged ≥25 years in 2011, noncompletion of high school was generally more common among foreign-born than U.S.-born adults (Table 1). Significant absolute differences from the U.S. born were observed in the total population (24.9 percentage points), among non-Hispanic whites (3.1 percentage points), A/PIs (9.0 percentage points), and Hispanics (27.7 percentage points). Disparities in noncompletion of high school also were found according to world region (countries) of birth. In 2011, significant absolute differences were found between persons born in the United States (referent group) and those born in Latin American and Caribbean countries (46.1 percentage points) or in countries in Asia and the Pacific (6.1 percentage points). In 2011, significant absolute differences were also found between residents of the U.S. census regions of the Midwest, South, or West and the referent group (the Northeast). The absolute difference in age-standardized noncompletion of high school between residents who lived inside metropolitan areas and those who lived outside metropolitan areas (referent group) also was significant. In 2009 and 2011, the magnitude and pattern of age, poverty status, and disability differences were similar in men and women. No significant differences were identified in the relative differences of any these characteristics from 2009 to 2011.

Among younger adults aged 18–24 years in 2011, significant disparities in place of birth and in demographic, socioeconomic, disability, and geographic characteristics were found in the age-standardized percentages of adults who did not complete high school (Table 2). Unlike adults aged ≥25 years, the absolute difference between the percentages of young adults who did not complete high school in the younger age group (18–19 years) and older referent group (20–24 years) was significant (33.1 percentage points). The relative difference between persons aged 18–19 years and the referent group increased significantly by 61.6 percentage points from 2009 to 2011, whereas no change occurred from 2009 to 2011 in age-specific disparities in the older population (≥25 years) (Table 1). Among racial/ethnic groups, absolute differences from non-Hispanic whites were only significant among non-Hispanic blacks (7.2 percentage points) and Hispanics (12.4 percentage points), with the magnitude and pattern

TABLE 1. Age-standardized[*] percentage of adults aged ≥25 years who did not complete high school, by selected characteristics — Integrated Public Use Microdata Series, Current Population Survey, United States, 2009 and 2011

	2009				2011				Change in relative difference from 2009 to 2011 (percentage points)
Characteristic	% who did not complete high school	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	% who did not complete high school	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)
Sex
Male	14.1	(0.2)	1.4[†]	11.0	13.2	(0.2)	1.4[†]	11.9	0.9
Female	12.7	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	11.8	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Age group (yrs)[§]
Both sexes
25–44	11.7	(0.2)	0.7	6.2	11.0	(0.2)	0.4	4.1	-2.1
45–64	11.0	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	10.5	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
65–79	19.5	(0.4)	8.5[†]	77.3	17.2	(0.4)	6.6[†]	63.1	-14.2
≥80	27.6	(0.8)	16.6[†]	150.7	25.3	(0.7)	14.8[†]	140.6	-10.0
Male
25–44	13.0	(0.3)	1.3[†]	11.5	12.1	(0.2)	1.0[†]	9.0	-2.5
45–64	11.7	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	11.1	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
65–79	18.5	(0.6)	6.8[†]	58.0	16.6	(0.5)	5.4[†]	48.7	-9.4
≥80	27.2	(1.1)	15.5[†]	132.1	26.0	(1.1)	14.9[†]	133.5	1.4
Female
25–44	10.3	(0.2)	0	-0.3	9.8	(0.2)	-0.2	-1.7	-1.4
45–64	10.4	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	9.9	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
65–79	20.4	(0.5)	10.0[†]	96.7	17.7	(0.5)	7.7[†]	77.8	19.0
≥80	27.9	(0.9)	17.5[†]	169.0	24.9	(0.8)	15.0[†]	150.6	-18.4
Race/Ethnicity
Both sexes
White, non-Hispanic	8.0	(0.1)	Ref.	Ref.	7.3	(0.1)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Black, non-Hispanic	17.0	(0.4)	9.0[†]	112.6	16.1	(0.4)	8.8[†]	121.2	8.9
Asian/Pacific Islander	12.7	(0.7)	4.7[†]	59.1	12.1	(0.6)	4.9[†]	66.8	7.7
American Indian/Alaska Native	20.0	(1.8)	12.0[†]	149.8	18.8	(1.9)	11.5[†]	158.5	8.8
Multiple races	13.4	(1.0)	5.4[†]	67.8	11.3	(1.0)	4.0[†]	55.4	-12.4
Hispanic[¶]	40.1	(0.6)	32.1[†]	400.8	37.7	(0.5)	30.4[†]	419.3	18.5
Male
White, non-Hispanic	8.6	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	7.9	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Black, non-Hispanic	17.6	(0.6)	9.1[†]	106.0	17.3	(0.6)	9.4[†]	120.1	14.1
Asian/Pacific Islander	10.3	(0.8)	1.8	20.9	10.2	(0.7)	2.3[†]	29.5	8.6
American Indian/Alaska Native	21.0	(2.2)	12.4[†]	145.0	20.8	(2.4)	13.0[†]	165.1	20.1
Multiple races	13.3	(1.4)	4.7[†]	55.1	12.7	(1.5)	4.8[†]	61.6	6.5
Hispanic	41.1	(0.7)	32.5[†]	380.4	38.4	(0.7)	30.5[†]	388.2	7.8
Female
White, non-Hispanic	7.4	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	6.7	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Black, non-Hispanic	16.6	(0.5)	9.2[†]	123.3	15.2	(0.5)	8.5[†]	127.1	3.8
Asian/Pacific Islander	14.6	(0.8)	7.2[†]	96.1	13.6	(0.7)	7.0[†]	104.2	8.1
American Indian/Alaska Native	19.6	(2.1)	12.2[†]	163.8	16.9	(2.1)	10.2[†]	152.8	-11.0
Multiple races	13.1	(1.2)	5.7[†]	76.3	9.8	(1.2)	3.1	46.3	-30.1
Hispanic	38.7	(0.6)	31.3[†]	420.0	36.8	(0.6)	30.1[†]	450.9	30.9
Income-to-poverty ratio[]
Both sexes
Poor, <1.00	18.4	(0.5)	7.4[†]	66.6	16.6	(0.4)	6.4[†]	61.9	-4.7
Near poor, 1.00–1.9	15.6	(0.3)	4.6[†]	41.7	14.7	(0.3)	4.4[†]	42.9	1.2
Middle income, 2.00–3.9	13.2	(0.2)	2.1[†]	19.4	12.0	(0.2)	1.7[†]	16.9	-2.5
High income, ≥4.0	11.0	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	10.3	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Male
Poor, <1.00	18.9	(0.6)	7.5[†]	66.5	17.3	(0.6)	6.5[†]	60.1	-6.4
Near poor, 1.00–1.9	17.0	(0.5)	5.7[†]	50.2	16.0	(0.5)	5.2[†]	48.1	-2.1
Middle income, 2.00–3.9	14.1	(0.3)	2.8[†]	24.3	12.7	(0.3)	1.9[†]	17.6	-6.7
High income, ≥4.0	11.3	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	10.8	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Female
Poor, <1.00	17.9	(0.5)	7.2[†]	67.1	15.9	(0.5)	6.2[†]	63.0	-4.1
Near poor, 1.00–1.9	14.3	(0.3)	3.6[†]	34.1	13.5	(0.4)	3.7[†]	37.9	3.8
Middle income, 2.00–3.9	12.3	(0.3)	1.6[†]	14.9	11.3	(0.3)	1.5[†]	15.8	0.9
High income, ≥4.0	10.7	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	9.8	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.

See table footnotes on the next page.

TABLE 1. (Continued) Age-standardized[*] percentage of adults aged ≥25 years who did not complete high school, by selected characteristics — Integrated Public Use Microdata Series, Current Population Survey, United States, 2009 and 2011

	2009				2011
Characteristic	% who did not complete high school	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	% who did not complete high school	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Change in relative difference from 2009 to 2011 (percentage points)
Disability status
Both sexes
Disability	23.3	(0.5)	11.4[†]	95.5	21.1	(0.5)	9.8[†]	87.3	-8.3
No disability	11.9	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	11.2	(0.1)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Male
Disability	23.3	(0.8)	10.4[†]	80.8	21.5	(0.7)	9.5[†]	78.9	-1.9
No disability	12.9	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	12.0	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Female
Disability	23.2	(0.6)	12.2[†]	111.2	20.6	(0.7)	10.1[†]	96.3	-14.9
No disability	11.0	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	10.5	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Place of birth
All racial/ethnic groups
United States or U.S. territory	9.6	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	8.7	(0.1)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	35.6	(0.6)	26.0[†]	270.0	33.7	(0.6)	24.9[†]	286.0	16.0
White, non-Hispanic
United States or U.S. territory	8.0	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	7.2	(0.1)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	10.6	(0.7)	2.6[†]	33.1	10.3	(0.7)	3.1[†]	43.3	10.3
Black, non-Hispanic
United States or U.S. territory	17.3	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	16.1	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	15.7	(1.3)	-1.6	-9.2	16.3	(1.4)	0.2	1.1	10.3
Asian/Pacific Islander
United States or U.S. territory	4.7	(1.1)	Ref.	Ref.	4.7	(1.0)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	14.2	(0.8)	9.5[†]	199.8	13.7	(0.7)	9.0[†]	191.3	-8.5
American Indian/Alaska Native
United States or U.S. territory	20.1	(1.8)	Ref.	Ref.	19.0	(2.0)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	—[††]	—	NA	NA	20.0	(5.7)	1.0	5.2	NA
Multiple races
United States or U.S. territory	14.4	(1.2)	Ref.	Ref.	12.3	(1.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	—	—	NA	NA	—	—	NA	NA	NA
Hispanic
United States or U.S. territory	22.3	(1.0)	Ref.	Ref.	20.5	(0.9)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	50.5	(0.7)	28.1[†]	125.9	48.2	(0.7)	27.7[†]	135.3	9.3
World region (country) of birth
United States	9.8	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	8.8	(0.1)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Canada, Europe, Australia, or New Zealand	5.3	(1.0)	-4.5[†]	-45.9	6.0	(1.3)	-2.8	-32.2	13.7
Mexico, South America, Central America, or Caribbean	57.2	(0.9)	47.4[†]	485.8	54.9	(0.9)	46.1[†]	522.9	37.1
Africa or the Middle East	11.6	(2.3)	1.8	18.5	9.1	(2.3)	0.3	2.9	-15.6
Asia or the Pacific Islands	17.3	(1.7)	7.5[†]	77.3	14.9	(1.6)	6.1[†]	69.3	-8.0
U.S. census region[§§]
Northeast	9.4	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	8.7	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Midwest	10.7	(0.4)	1.3	13.9	10.2	(0.4)	1.5[†]	17.4	3.5
South	12.2	(0.4)	2.8[†]	30.4	11.3	(0.3)	2.6[†]	29.5	-0.8
West	12.6	(0.6)	3.3[†]	34.8	11.0	(0.5)	2.3[†]	26.8	-8.0
Area of residence
Inside metropolitan area	16.4	(0.4)	1.4[†]	9.1	15.7	(0.4)	1.4[†]	9.5	0.4
Outside metropolitan area	15.0	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	14.3	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.

Abbreviations: FPL = federal poverty level; NA = not applicable; Ref. = referent; SE = standard error.

[*] Age standardized to the 2000 U.S. standard population.

[†] Difference between a group estimate and the estimate for its respective referent group is significant ($p<0.05$, two-tailed z test with Bonferroni correction for multiple comparisons).

[§] Age-specific estimates are not age standardized.

[¶] Persons of Hispanic ethnicity might be of any race or combination of races.

[] On the basis of the U.S. FPL. FPL was based on U.S. Census Bureau poverty thresholds (available at http://www.census.gov/hhes/www/poverty.html).

[††] Estimate is statistically unreliable because relative SE ≥30%.

[§§] Northeast: Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont; Midwest: Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin; South: Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia; West: Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.

TABLE 2. Age-standardized* percentage of adults aged 18–24 years who did not complete high school, by selected characteristics — Integrated Public Use Microdata Series, Current Population Survey, United States, 2009 and 2011

	2009				2011
Characteristic	% who did not complete high school	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	% who did not complete high school	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Change in relative difference from 2009 to 2011 (percentage points)
Sex
Male	22.4	(0.5)	4.6[†]	25.8	22.4	(0.5)	3.6[†]	18.9	-6.9
Female	17.8	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	18.8	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Age group (yrs)[§]
Both sexes
18–19	40.1	(0.7)	28.7[†]	252.8	43.6	(0.8)	33.1[†]	314.4	61.6[§§]
20–24	11.4	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	10.5	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Male
18–19	43.9	(1.0)	30.9[†]	238.9	47.0	(1.1)	35.4[†]	305.2	66.3
20–24	13.0	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	11.6	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Female
18–19	36.2	(1.0)	26.4[†]	271.3	40.2	(1.1)	30.8[†]	327.1	55.8
20–24	9.7	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	9.4	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Race/Ethnicity
Both sexes
White, non-Hispanic	16.3	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	17.2	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Black, non-Hispanic	24.4	(1.1)	8.2[†]	50.2	24.3	(1.0)	7.2[†]	41.7	-8.5
Asian/Pacific Islander	13.8	(1.3)	-2.5	-15.3	16.2	(2.0)	-1.0	-5.9	9.4
American Indian/Alaska Native	25.1	(3.2)	8.9	54.4	26.0	(3.7)	8.9	51.7	-2.7
Multiple races	19.9	(2.2)	3.6	22.2	18.8	(2.2)	1.6	9.4	-12.8
Hispanic[¶]	31.5	(1.0)	15.2[†]	93.7	29.5	(0.9)	12.4[†]	72.0	-21.7
Male
White, non-Hispanic	18.2	(0.6)	Ref.	Ref.	18.4	(0.6)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Black, non-Hispanic	26.7	(1.8)	8.6[†]	47.2	26.7	(1.5)	8.3[†]	45.0	-2.2
Asian/Pacific Islander	14.6	(1.8)	-3.6	-19.7	17.1	(2.5)	-1.3	-7.2	12.5
American Indian/Alaska Native	28.6	(4.7)	10.4	57.4	31.0	(5.9)	12.6	68.4	11.0
Multiple races	22.5	(3.1)	4.3	23.6	16.0	(2.5)	-2.4	-13.0	-36.6
Hispanic	35.1	(1.4)	17.0[†]	93.3	32.0	(1.2)	13.6[†]	73.8	-19.5
Female
White, non-Hispanic	14.3	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	15.9	(0.6)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Black, non-Hispanic	22.2	(1.3)	7.9[†]	55.4	22.0	(1.5)	6.1	38.5	-16.9
Asian/Pacific Islander	12.7	(1.6)	-1.6	-11.3	15.2	(2.3)	-0.7	-4.5	6.9
American Indian/Alaska Native	21.9	(4.1)	7.6	53.4	23.2	(5.0)	7.4	46.3	-7.0
Multiple races	17.0	(2.8)	2.7	18.9	21.3	(3.4)	5.4	34.1	15.2
Hispanic	27.6	(1.2)	13.3[†]	92.8	26.6	(1.1	10.7[†]	67.4	-25.4
Income-to-poverty ratio
Both sexes
Poor, <1.00	23.7	(1.1)	5.9[†]	32.9	23.5	(0.9)	4.7[†]	25.1	-7.8
Near poor, 1.00–1.9	22.8	(0.8)	5.0[†]	27.8	22.3	(0.9)	3.6[†]	19.0	-8.7
Middle income, 2.00–3.9	19.8	(0.6)	1.9	10.8	20.4	(0.6)	1.6	8.5	-2.3
High income, ≥4.0	17.9	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	18.8	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Male
Poor, <1.00	25.0	(1.4)	5.4[†]	27.4	24.9	(1.3)	4.4	21.3	-6.1
Near poor, 1.00–1.9	26.0	(1.2)	6.3[†]	32.0	24.6	(1.3)	4.1[†]	19.9	-12.1
Middle income, 2.00–3.9	22.5	(0.9)	2.9	14.6	22.0	(0.9)	1.5	7.2	-7.4
High income, ≥4.0	19.7	(0.8)	Ref.	Ref.	20.5	(0.7)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Female
Poor, <1.00	22.5	(1.4)	6.5[†]	40.6	22.0	(1.1)	5.0[†]	29.6	-11.0
Near poor, 1.00–1.9	19.5	(1.0)	3.5[†]	21.6	20.0	(1.1)	3.0	17.9	-3.7
Middle income, 2.00–3.9	17.0	(0.7)	1.0	6.3	18.6	(0.8)	1.6	9.2	3.0
High income, ≥4.0	16.0	(0.7)	Ref.	Ref.	17.0	(0.7)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Disability status
Both sexes
Disability	32.4	(2.0)	12.7[†]	64.5	35.5	(2.3)	15.4[†]	76.3	11.8
No disability	19.7	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	20.1	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.

See table footnotes on the next page.

TABLE 2. (Continued) Age-standardized* percentage of adults aged 18–24 years who did not complete high school, by selected characteristics — Integrated Public Use Microdata Series — Current Population Survey, United States, 2009 and 2011

	2009				2011				Change in relative difference from 2009 to 2011 (percentage points)
Characteristic	% who did not complete high school	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	% who did not complete high school	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)
Male
Disability	29.5	(2.4)	7.3†	32.7	38.0	(2.8)	16.1†	73.8	41.1§§
No disability	22.2	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	21.8	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Female
Disability	36.0	(3.4)	18.8†	109.4	32.0	(3.3)	13.6†	73.7	-35.7
No disability	17.2	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	18.4	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Place of birth
All racial/ethnic groups
United States or U.S. territory	18.5	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	19.1	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	32.7	(1.4)	14.2†	77.1	31.4	(1.4)	12.0†	63.0	-14.1
White, non-Hispanic
United States or U.S. territory	16.5	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	17.3	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	13.2	(2.3)	-3.4	-20.3	16.6	(3.2)	-0.7	-4.1	16.2
Black, non-Hispanic
United States or U.S. territory	24.9	(1.2)	Ref.	Ref.	24.7	(1.1)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	22.1	(4.1)	-2.8	-11.4	23.3	(4.4)	-1.4	-5.6	5.7
Asian/Pacific Islander
United States or U.S. territory	—††	—	Ref.	Ref.	—	—	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	18.1	(2.3)	NA	NA	22.1	(3.6)	NA	NA	NA
American Indian/Alaska Native
United States or U.S. territory	24.7	(3.2)	Ref.	Ref.	26.8	(3.9)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	0	(0)	-24.7	-100.0	—	—	NA	NA	NA
Multiple races
United States or U.S. territory	21.1	(2.7)	Ref.	Ref.	20.4	(2.6)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	—	—	NA	NA	—	—	NA	NA	NA
Hispanic
United States or U.S. territory	24.6	(1.5)	Ref.	Ref.	24.5	(1.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	44.9	(1.9)	20.4†	82.9	40.6	(1.8)	16.0†	65.4	-17.4
World region (country) of birth
United States	18.4	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	19.2	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Canada, Europe, Australia, or New Zealand	—	—	NA	NA	—	—	NA	NA	NA
Mexico, South America, Central America, or the Caribbean	46.5	(2.1)	28.1†	153.1	42.5	(2.1)	23.4†	121.9	-31.3
Africa or the Middle East	—	—	NA	NA	30.5	(0)	11.3	58.9	NA
Asia or the Pacific Islands	20.1	(4.0)	1.7	9.3	24.8	(3.8)	5.6	29.2	19.9
U.S. census region¶¶
Northeast	15.5	(1.1)	Ref.	Ref.	18.0	(1.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Midwest	18.6	(0.9)	3.1	20.0	19.2	(0.8)	1.2	6.8	-13.2
South	20.8	(0.9)	5.3†	34.1	21.1	(0.9)	3.1	17.3	-16.8
West	22.6	(1.2)	7.1†	46.0	20.4	(1.0)	2.4	13.4	-32.6
Residence in metropolitan area
Inside metropolitan area	21.3	(0.8)	0.1	0.3	22.1	(0.7)	-1.3	-5.3	-5.6
Outside metropolitan area	21.3	(1.0)	Ref.	Ref.	23.4	(1.0)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.

Abbreviations: FPL = federal poverty level; NA = not applicable; Ref. = referent; SE = standard error.

* Age standardized to the 2000 U.S. standard population.

† Difference between a group estimate and the estimate for its respective referent group is significant (p<0.05, two-tailed z test with Bonferroni correction for multiple comparisons).

§ Age-specific estimates are not age standardized.

¶ Persons of Hispanic ethnicity might be of any race or combination of races.

 On the basis of the U.S. FPL. FPL was based on U.S. Census Bureau poverty thresholds (available at http://www.census.gov/hhes/www/poverty.html).

†† Estimate is statistically unreliable because relative SE ≥30%.

§§ Difference between the relative differences in 2011 and 2009 is significant (p<0.05, two-tailed z test with Bonferroni correction for multiple comparisons).

¶¶ Northeast: Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont; Midwest: Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin; South: Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia; West: Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.

similar in men and women. Overall, absolute differences in noncompletion of high school between the referent group (high income) and those who lived in poor (4.7 percentage points) or near-poor families (3.6 percentage points) were significant; however, absolute differences were only significant for men in middle-income families and women in poor families. Significant absolute differences in noncompletion of high school also were found among young adults with a disability (15.4 percentage points); however, unlike men aged ≥25 years, the disparity among younger adult men worsened from 2009 to 2011 by 41.1 percentage points. No temporal change in disability disparity was observed among young adult females (Table 2). In 2011, absolute differences in the age-standardized percentage of persons who did not complete high school among those who were foreign born and U.S. born (referent group) were significant in the total population (12.0 percentage points) and among Hispanics (16.0 percentage points). In addition, absolute differences were only significant between U.S.-born young adults and young adults born in Latin American and Caribbean countries (23.4 percentage points). No significant differences were found by U.S. census region or metropolitan area. No significant changes in the U.S. census region disparities occurred from 2009 to 2011.

In 2011, overall and for men and women, significant absolute differences in the age-standardized percentages of adults in poor families (IPR <1.00) were found among the youngest adults, non-Hispanic blacks, and Hispanics; all groups that had not completed college; and adults with disabilities (Table 3). In 2009 and 2011, disparities in poverty increased with decreasing level of educational attainment, with the greatest disparity experienced by the group with the lowest level of educational attainment. Significant absolute differences in the age-standardized percentages in poor families were found between persons of either sex with a disability and those with no disability (referent group) (men: 3.2 percentage points; women 3.5 percentage points). In 2009 and 2011, the absolute differences between persons who were foreign born and U.S. born (referent group) in age-standardized percentages of adults in poor families were significant in the total population (1.7 and 1.6 percentage points, respectively) but not by race/ethnicity. In addition, significant absolute differences also were found between adults born in Latin American and Caribbean countries and those born in the United States. In 2009 and 2011, significant absolute differences in the percentages of adults who lived in poverty were found between residents of the U.S. census regions of the West, South, or Midwest and the referent group (Northeast region) but not between residents who lived inside compared with outside metropolitan areas. From 2009 to 2011, no statistically significant changes in the relative differences in poverty by any characteristic were found (Table 3).

Discussion

The findings in this report indicate that racial/ethnic, socioeconomic, and geographic disparities in noncompletion of high school and poverty persist in the U.S. adult population; little evidence of improvement from 2009 to 2011 was identified. Within each year studied to date, significant absolute and relative differences were found; however, between years, these differences were not statistically different. The pattern of disparities is consistent with sociodemographic and geographic differences reported by several national surveys (6–8,16,21–25). The findings also reveal that young racial/ethnic, foreign-born, and poor adults might be especially vulnerable to early onset and progression of poor health as evidenced by marked disparities in noncompletion of high school among these subgroups.

Educational attainment and income provide psychosocial and material resources that protect against exposure to health risks in early and adult life (1–3). Persons with low levels of education and income generally experience increased rates of mortality, morbidity, and risk-taking behaviors and decreased access to and quality of health care (1,6–8). This report confirms that the lowest levels of education and income are most common and persistent among subgroups that systematically exhibit the poorest health. For example, two out of five Hispanics and nearly one out of five non-Hispanic blacks or American Indian/Alaska Natives had not completed high school, and at least one out of 10 of these racial/ethnic groups had incomes less than the official poverty threshold. However, substantial empirical evidence from the United States and elsewhere consistently shows no thresholds in the relationships between education or income and health. Among children and adults in the overall population and within racial/ethnic groups, rates of mortality, morbidity, and poor health behaviors decrease in a continuous and graded manner with increasing levels of education and income (6,7,23–25).

Health-promotion efforts have emphasized racial/ethnic disparities in health as part of an approach to risk reduction that focuses on groups at high risk, with little or no improvement in disparities (24,26). The patterns described in this report suggest that interventions and policies that are also designed to take account of the influence of educational attainment, family income, and other socioeconomic conditions on health risks in the entire population might prove to be more effective in reducing health disparities (27,28).

TABLE 3. Age-standardized* percentage of adults aged ≥18 years with incomes less than the federal poverty level, by selected characteristics — Integrated Public Use Microdata Series — Current Population Survey, United States, 2009 and 2011

	2009				2011
Characteristic	% with IPR <1.00	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Percentage with IPR <1.00	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Change in relative difference from 2009 to 2011 (percentage points)
Sex
Male	11.4	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	13.2	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Female	11.9	(0.1)	0.5[†]	4.0	13.5	(0.2)	0.4	2.9	-1.1
Age group (yrs)[§]
Both sexes
18–24	12.8	(0.3)	1.9[†]	17.1	15.1	(0.4)	2.4[†]	18.6	1.5
25–44	11.9	(0.2)	0.9	8.5	13.5	(0.2)	0.8	6.2	-2.3
45–64	11.0	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	12.8	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	—
65–79	11.1	(0.3)	0.1	1.1	12.5	(0.3)	-0.2	-1.6	-2.7
≥80	12.1	(0.6)	1.1	10.0	12.8	(0.5)	0	0	-10
Male
18–24	12.3	(0.4)	1.7[†]	15.8	14.8	(0.5)	2.1[†]	16.2	0.4
25–44	11.7	(0.2)	1.1[†]	10.2	13.5	(0.3)	0.8	6.1	-4.1
45–64	10.6	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	12.7	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
65–79	11.1	(0.5)	0.4	4.2	11.6	(0.4)	-1.1	-8.7	-12.9
≥80	11.4	(0.9)	0.8	7.5	13.0	(0.9)	0.3	2.1	-5.4
Female
18–24	13.3	(0.4)	2.1[†]	18.6	15.5	(0.5)	2.7[†]	21	2.4
25–44	12.0	(0.2)	0.8	6.9	13.6	(0.2)	0.8	6.3	-0.6
45–64	11.2	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	12.8	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
65–79	11.1	(0.4)	-0.2	-1.7	13.3	(0.4)	0.5	4.0	5.7
≥80	12.4	(0.6)	1.2	10.4	12.6	(0.7)	-0.2	-1.5	-11.9
Race/Ethnicity
Both sexes
White, non-Hispanic	10.7	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	12.4	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Black, non-Hispanic	14.4	(0.4)	3.7[†]	34.8	16.4	(0.4)	4.1[†]	32.8	-2.0
Asian/Pacific Islander	10.7	(0.5)	0	0.1	11.5	(0.5)	-0.8	-6.8	-6.9
American Indian/Alaska Native	15.3	(1.9)	4.7	43.6	18.9	(3.5)	6.6	53.4	9.7
Multiple races	11.2	(0.9)	0.5	4.6	12.4	(1.0)	0	0.2	-4.4
Hispanic[¶]	14.5	(0.4)	3.9[†]	36.3	16.0	(0.4)	3.7[†]	29.7	-6.6
Male
White, non-Hispanic	10.5	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	12.2	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Black, non-Hispanic	14.0	(0.5)	3.5[†]	33.4	15.6	(0.5)	3.4[†]	28.1	-5.3
Asian/Pacific Islander	10.8	(0.6)	0.3	3.0	12.0	(0.7)	-0.2	-1.6	-4.6
American Indian/Alaska Native	12.9	(1.9)	2.4	22.5	18.6	(3.1)	6.4	52.1	29.6
Multiple races	9.4	(1.2)	-1.1	-10.3	12.6	(1.4)	0.4	3.3	13.6
Hispanic	14.3	(0.5)	3.8[†]	36.2	15.8	(0.5)	3.5[†]	29.0	-7.2
Female
White, non-Hispanic	10.8	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	12.5	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Black, non-Hispanic	14.7	(0.5)	3.9[†]	35.6	17.0	(0.6)	4.5[†]	36.1	0.5
Asian/Pacific Islander	10.5	(0.6)	-0.3	-3.0	11.1	(0.5)	-1.4	-11.1	-8.1
American Indian/Alaska Native	17.7	(2.4)	6.9	63.8	19.3	(4.3)	6.8	54.2	-9.5
Multiple races	12.6	(1.2)	1.8	16.9	12.1	(1.2)	-0.4	-3.4	-20.4
Hispanic	14.9	(0.4)	4.1[†]	37.6	16.2	(0.4)	3.8[†]	30.1	-7.5
Educational attainment
Both sexes
Less than high school	15.8	(0.4)	5.6[†]	55.0	17.6	(0.4)	6.1[†]	53.1	-1.8
High school graduate or equivalent	11.8	(0.2)	1.7[†]	16.2	13.8	(0.3)	2.3[†]	20.3	4.2
Some college	10.9	(0.2)	0.7	6.8	12.9	(0.3)	1.4[†]	12.5	5.8
College graduate	10.2	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	11.5	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Male
Less than high school	15.1	(0.5)	4.6[†]	43.5	17.1	(0.5)	5.6[†]	48.4	4.9
High school graduate or equivalent	11.2	(0.3)	0.7	7.1	13.2	(0.3)	1.6[†]	14.1	7.1
Some college	10.8	(0.3)	0.3	2.5	12.8	(0.3)	1.3[†]	11.5	9.0
College graduate	10.5	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	11.5	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Female
Less than high school	16.6	(0.5)	6.7[†]	66.9	18.0	(0.5)	6.7[†]	58.4	-8.5
High school graduate or equivalent	12.5	(0.3)	2.6[†]	26.0	14.6	(0.3)	3.2[†]	27.6	1.6
Some college	11	(0.2)	1.0[†]	10.5	13.0	(0.3)	1.6[†]	13.7	3.3
College graduate	10	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	11.5	(0.3)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.

See table footnotes on the next page.

TABLE 3. (Continued) Age-standardized* percentage of adults aged ≥18 years with incomes less than the federal poverty level, by selected characteristics — Integrated Public Use Microdata Series — Current Population Survey, United States, 2009 and 2011

	2009				2011
Characteristic	% with IPR <1.00	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Percentage with IPR <1.00	(SE)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Change in relative difference from 2009 to 2011 (percentage points)
Disability status
Both sexes
Disability	14.7	(0.5)	3.4[†]	29.8	16.4	(0.6)	3.4[†]	25.8	-4.0
No disability	11.4	(0.1)	Ref.	Ref.	13.0	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Male
Disability	14.1	(0.7)	2.9[†]	26.0	16.1	(0.7)	3.2[†]	24.9	-1.1
No disability	11.2	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	12.9	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Female
Disability	15.4	(0.7)	3.8[†]	33.2	16.7	(0.8)	3.5[†]	26.8	-6.4
No disability	11.5	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	13.2	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Place of birth
All racial/ethnic groups
United States or U.S. territory	11.4	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	13.1	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	13	(0.3)	1.7[†]	15.1	14.6	(0.3)	1.6[†]	12.4	-2.7
White, non-Hispanic
United States or U.S. territory	10.6	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	12.3	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	11.1	(0.6)	0.5	4.7	13.4	(0.7)	1.1	8.7	3.8
Black, non-Hispanic
United States or U.S. territory	14.4	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	16.5	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	13.3	(1.0)	-1.1	-7.8	16.8	(1.3)	0.3	1.5	9.3
Asian/Pacific Islander
United States or U.S. territory	10.2	(1.4)	Ref.	Ref.	12.6	(1.8)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	10.8	(0.6)	0.7	6.7	12.0	(0.6)	-0.6	-4.8	-11.5
American Indian/Alaska Native
United States or U.S. territory	15.4	(1.9)	Ref.	Ref.	19.7	(3.7)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	—	—	NA	NA	—	—	NA	NA	NA
Multiple races
United States or U.S. territory	11.8	(1.0)	Ref.	Ref.	12.9	(1.1)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	—	—	NA	NA	—	—	NA	NA	NA
Hispanic
United States or U.S. territory	13.7	(0.7)	Ref.	Ref.	16.0	(0.8)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Foreign country	14.8	(0.5)	1.1	7.8	16.3	(0.5)	0.2	1.5	-6.3
World region (country) of birth
United States	11.4	(0.1)	Ref.	Ref.	13.1	(0.2)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Canada, Europe, Australia, or New Zealand	12.2	(1.8)	0.8	7.0	11.7	(1.7)	-1.4	-10.6	-17.6
Mexico, South America, Central America, or the Caribbean	15.6	(0.6)	4.2[†]	37.0	16.5	(0.6)	3.4[†]	26.0	-11.0
Africa or the Middle East	7.1	(1.2)	-4.3	-37.5	14.0	(3.1)	0.9	6.6	44.1
Asia or the Pacific Islands	8.9	(1.1)	-2.4	-21.4	12.6	(1.3)	-0.5	-4.1	17.3
U.S. census region[††]
Northeast	9.4	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	9.8	(0.5)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.
Midwest	11.1	(0.4)	1.7[†]	18.2	12.7	(0.4)	2.9[†]	29.1	10.9
South	11.3	(0.3)	1.9[†]	20.3	13.8	(0.4)	4.0[†]	40.8	20.5
West	11.7	(0.5)	2.3[†]	24.5	12.9	(0.6)	3.1[†]	31.6	7.1
Residence in metropolitan area
Inside metropolitan area	12.7	(0.3)	0.2	1.2	14.4	(0.3)	0.4	2.5	1.3
Outside metropolitan area	12.6	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	14.1	(0.4)	Ref.	Ref.	Ref.

Abbreviations: IPR = income-to-poverty ratio; NA = not applicable; Ref. = referent; SE = standard error.

* Age standardized to the 2000 U.S. standard population.

[†] Difference between a group estimate and the estimate for its respective referent group is significant.

[§] Age-specific estimates are not age standardized.

[¶] Persons of Hispanic ethnicity might be of any race or combination of races.

 Estimate is statistically unreliable because relative SE ≥30%.

[††] Northeast: Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont; Midwest: Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin; South: Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia; West: Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.

Limitations

The findings in this report are subject to at least two limitations. First, all data were self-reported and therefore are subject to recall and social desirability bias. Second, CDC used cross-sectional data for the analyses; therefore, no causal inferences can be drawn from the findings. The limited findings for disparities in place of birth among racial/ethnic groups might reflect small sample sizes in single years of data, as suggested by unstable estimates in the foreign-born strata of several racial/ethnic groups.

Conclusion

The U.S. Department of Education's Institute of Education Sciences recommends effective evidence-based interventions to prevent or reduce the dropout rates among middle school and high school students (29). The U.S. Task Force on Community Preventive Services recommends interventions that promote healthy social environments for low-income children and families and to reduce risk-taking behaviors among adolescents (30). Since 2011, HHS has released several complementary initiatives to eliminate health disparities (26,31). The 2011 HHS action plan focuses specifically on reduction of racial/ethnic disparities but includes education and social and economic conditions among its major strategic areas (26). The 2012 National Prevention Council action plan will implement strategies of the National Prevention Strategy by targeting communities at greatest risk for health disparities, disparities in access to care, and the capacity of the prevention workforce; research to identify effective strategies; and standardization and collection of data to better identify and address disparities. CDC proposes increasing its efforts to eliminate health disparities by focusing on surveillance, analysis, and reporting of disparities and identifying and applying evidence-based strategies to achieve health equity (31). Integration of these efforts across federal departments; among federal, state, and local levels of government; and with nongovernment organizations could increase understanding of how socioeconomic disparities in health arise and persist and provide information on how best to design effective interventions for populationwide and targeted approaches.

References

1. Lynch J, Kaplan G. Socioeconomic position. In: Berkman LF, Kawachi I, eds. Social epidemiology. 1st ed. New York, NY: Oxford University Press; 2000:13–35.
2. Adler NE, Stewart J. Health disparities across the lifespan: meaning, methods, and mechanisms. In: Adler NE, Stewart J, eds. The biology of disadvantage. New York, NY: New York Academy of Sciences; 2010;1186:5–23.
3. Ross CE, Mirowsky J. Neighborhood socioeconomic status and health: context or composition? City Community 2008;7:163–79.
4. Macintyre S, Ellaway A, Cummins S. Place effects on health: how can we conceptualise, operationalise and measure them? Soc Sci Med 2002; 55:125–39.
5. Krieger N, Williams DR, Moss NE. Measuring social class in public health research: concepts, methodologies, and guidelines. Annu Rev Public Health 1997;18:341–78.
6. CDC, National Center for Health Statistics. Health, United States, 2011: with special feature on socioeconomic status and health. Hyattsville, MD: CDC, National Center for Health Statistics; 2012.
7. Singh GK, Siahpush M. Trends and disparities in socioeconomic and behavioral characteristics, life expectancy, and cause-specific mortality of native-born and foreign-born populations in the United States, 1979–2003. Int J Epidemiol 2006;35:903–19.
8. CDC. Education and income—United States, 2005 and 2009. In: CDC health disparities and inequalities report—United States, 2011.MMWR 2011;60(Suppl; January 14, 2011).
9. CDC. CDC health disparities and inequalities report—United States, 2011. MMWR 2011;60(Suppl; January 14, 2011).
10. CDC. Introduction. In: CDC health disparities and inequalities report—United States, 2013 MMWR 2013;62(No. Suppl 3).
11. US Census Bureau. Current population survey. Design and methodology. Technical paper 66. Washington, DC: US Census Bureau; October 2006. Available at http://www.census.gov/prod/2006pubs/tp-66.pdf.
12. National Bureau of Economics Research. NBER CPS supplements. Cambridge, MA. Available at http://www.nber.org/data/current-population-survey-data.html.
13. Minnesota Population Center. Integrated public use microdata series—Current Population Survey [Online database]. Version 3.0. Minneapolis, MN: Minnesota Population Center; 2010. Available at http://usa.ipums.org/usa.
14. DeNavas-Walt C, Proctor BD, Smith JC. Current Population Reports. P60-239. Income, poverty and health insurance coverage in the United States: 2010. Washington, DC: US Census Bureau; 2011.
15. US Department of Health and Human Services. Implementation guidance on data collection standards for race, ethnicity, sex, primary language, and disability status. Washington, DC: US Department of Health and Human Services; 2011. Available at http://aspe.hhs.gov/datacncl/standards/ACA/4302/index.pdf.
16. Kandel WA. The U.S. foreign-born population: trends and selected characteristics. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service; 2011. Available at http://www.fas.org/sgp/crs/misc/R41592.pdf.
17. Keppel K, Pamuk E, Lynch J, et al. Methodological issues in measuring health disparities. Hyattsville, MD: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC, National Center for Health Statistics. Vital Health Stat 2005;2(141).
18. Keppel KG, Pearcy JN, Klein RJ. Measuring progress in Healthy People 2010. Statistical Notes, No. 25. Hyattsville, MD: National Center for Health Statistics; 2004. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/statnt/statnt25.pdf.
19. US Department of Health and Human Services. Healthy people 2010. Final review. Appendix A: technical appendix. Washington, DC: US Department of Health and Human Services; 2012:A-9–10. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/hpdata2010/hp2010_final_review_technical_appendix.pdf.
20. Anderson RN, Rosenberg HM. Age standardization of death rates: implementation of the year 2000 standard. Natl Vital Stat Rep 1998;47:1–16, 20.
21. Ryan CL, Siebens J. Educational attainment in the United States: 2009. Washington, DC: US Census Bureau; 2012. Current Population Reports Series P20, No. 566.
22. Everett BG, Rogers RG, Hummer RA, Krueger PM. Trends in educational attainment by race/ethnicity, nativity, and sex in the United States, 1989–2005. Ethn Racial Stud 2011;34:1543–66.

23. Ohlshansky SJ, Antonucci T, Berkman L, et al. Differences in life expectancy due to race and educational differences are widening, and may not catch up. Health Aff 2012;31:1803–13.
24. Braveman PA, Cubbin C, Egerter S, Williams DR, Pamuk E. Socioeconomic disparities in health in the United States: what the patterns tell us. Am J Public Health 2010;100(Suppl 1):S186–96. DOI:10.2105/AJPH.2009.166082.
25. Harper S, Lynch J. Trends in socioeconomic inequalities in adult health behaviors among U.S. states, 1990–2004. Public Health Rep 2007; 122:177–89.
26. Koh HK, Graham G, Giled SA. Reducing racial and ethnic disparities: the action plan from the Department of Health and Human Services. Health Aff 2011;30:1822–9.
27. Marmot MC, Bell R. Action on health disparities in the United States. JAMA 2009;301:1169–71.
28. Woolf SH, Johnson RE, Phillips RL, Philipsen M. Giving everyone the health of the educated: an examination of whether social change would save more lives than medical advances. Am J Public Health 2007;97:679–83.
29. Dynarski M, Clarke L, Cobb B, Finn J, Rumberger R, Smink J. Dropout prevention: a practice guide (NCEE 2008–4025). Washington, DC: National Center for Education Evaluation and Regional Assistance, Institute of Education Sciences, U.S. Department of Education; 2008. Available at http://ies.ed.gov/ncee/wwc.
30. Task Force on Community Preventive Services. Recommendations to promote healthy social environments. Am J Prev Med 2003;24(3S):S21–4.
31. CDC. Fact sheet: health disparities in education and income. Atlanta, GA: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC; 2011. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/minorityhealth/reports/CHDIR11/FactSheets/Educationincome.pdf.

Health-Related Quality of Life — United States, 2006 and 2010

Matthew M. Zack, MD
Division of Population Health, National Center for Chronic Disease Prevention and Health Promotion, CDC

Corresponding author: Matthew M. Zack, Division of Population Health, National Center for Chronic Disease Prevention and Health Promotion, CDC. Telephone: 770-488-5460; E-mail: mmz1@cdc.gov.

Introduction

Health-related quality of life is physical and mental health, as perceived by a person or group of people, during a period of time (1,2). This measure complements traditional public health measures of mortality and morbidity. Fair or poor self-rated health, physically unhealthy days, and mentally unhealthy days are reported by higher percentages of women, older persons, minority racial/ethnic groups (except Asian/Pacific Islanders), and persons with less education, with lower annual household incomes, who are unemployed, with a disability or a chronic disease, and who are widowed, separated, or divorced than, respectively, men, younger persons, and non-Hispanic whites, and those with more education, with higher annual household incomes, who are employed by others or self-employed, without a disability or a chronic disease, and who are married (1).

This report is part of the second CDC Health Disparities and Inequalities Report (CHDIR). The 2011 CHDIR (3) was the first CDC report to assess disparities across a wide range of diseases, behavioral risk factors, environmental exposures, social determinants, and health-care access. The topic presented in this report is based on criteria that are described in the 2013 CHDIR Introduction (4). This report provides information concerning disparities in health-related quality of life, a topic that was not discussed in the 2011 CHDIR. The purposes of this health-related quality of life report are to describe and raise awareness of how different kinds of disparities affect health-related quality of life among adults in the United States, whether and how these effects changed from 2006 to 2010 and to prompt actions to reduce disparities.

Methods

To examine health-related quality of life disparities by selected characteristics among adults (aged ≥18 years) in the United States, CDC analyzed 2006 and 2010 data from the Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System (BRFSS). BRFSS is a continuous, random-digit–dialed telephone survey of noninstitutionalized adults aged ≥18 years in the 50 states, the District of Columbia (DC), Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands, Guam (5,6) (available at http://www.cdc.gov/brfss/index.htm). This analysis compares health-related quality of life measures stratified by specific characteristics in respondents from the 50 states and DC in 2006 (N = 347,790) and 2010 (N = 444,927).

Two indicators of BRFSS survey quality are its cooperation rate and its overall response rate (7,8). The cooperation rate is the proportion of all respondents interviewed of all eligible units in which a respondent was selected and actually contacted. In 2006, the cooperation rate ranged from 56.9% in California to 83.5% in Minnesota; in 2010, the cooperation rate ranged from 56.8% in California to 86.1% in Minnesota. The overall response rate is an outcome rate with the number of complete and partial interviews in the numerator and an estimate of the number of eligible units in the sample in the denominator that assumes that more unknown records are eligible, specifically, that all likely households are households and that 98% of known or probable households contain an adult who uses the telephone number. In 2006, the overall response rate ranged from 20.5% in Georgia to 58.4% in Utah, and in 2010, from 19.2% in Oregon to 57.4% in Utah.

The three health-related quality of life measures represented in BRFSS are 1) self-rated health status, 2) number of physically unhealthy days, and 3) number of mentally unhealthy days. The related BRFSS questions were as follows: 1) "Would you say that in general your health is excellent, very good, good, fair, or poor?" 2) "Now thinking about your physical health, which includes physical illness and injury, for about how many days during the past 30 days was your physical health not good?" and 3) "Now thinking about your mental health, which includes stress, depression, and problems with emotions, for about how many days during the past 30 days was your mental health not good?" CDC calculated the percentage reporting fair or poor self-rated health, mean number of physically unhealthy days, and mean number mentally unhealthy days as the primary health-related quality of life outcome measures. Respondents with the responses "do not know/not sure" or "refused to respond" were excluded from the analysis on a question-by-question basis.

Health-related quality of life disparities were assessed by stratifying results by sex, age group (18–24, 25–34, 35–44, 45–64, 65–79, and ≥80 years), race/ethnicity (non-Hispanic white, non-Hispanic black, Hispanic [might be of any race or any combination of races], non-Hispanic Asian/Pacific Islander [A/PI], non-Hispanic American Indian/Alaska Native [AI/AN], and other), educational attainment at the time of the survey (less than high school, high school graduate or equivalent, some college, and college graduate), the primary language spoken at home (English, Spanish, or other), and disability status, which was defined as an affirmative answer to either or both of the following questions (9): "Are you limited in any way in any activities because of physical, mental, or emotional problems?" and "Do you now have any health problem that requires you to use special equipment, such as a cane, a wheelchair, a special bed, or a special telephone?") Each outcome measure was analyzed separately. Household income was not examined because educational attainment was considered a sufficient indicator of socioeconomic status for examination of disparities and because approximately 14% of BRFSS respondents did not know or refused to report household income, but <2% did not know or refused to report their educational attainment.

CDC used statistical software for the analyses to account for the stratified, complex sampling design of BRFSS (10). Data were weighted using the respondents' sampling weights based on the population of noninstitutionalized adults aged ≥18 years in their states of residence and aggregated across the 50 states and DC. Because age is associated with the health-related quality of life measures and because the age composition differs among the various categories analyzed, CDC adjusted the health-related quality of life measures by using age group categories in the specific survey year as covariates in logistic regression (for fair or poor self-rated health) and linear regression (for number of physically and mentally unhealthy days). No formal statistical testing was conducted for this analysis. Differences were assessed by calculating and comparing the 95% confidence intervals (CIs) around the age-adjusted percentages and means. In this approach, CIs were used as measure of variability, and nonoverlapping CIs were considered statistically different. Using CIs in this way is a conservative evaluation of significance differences; this might lead to a conclusion that estimates are similar when the point estimates differ at a significance level of 0.05. CIs were assessed before rounding for the tables.

Disparities were measured as the deviations from a referent group, which was the group that had the most favorable estimate for the variables used to assess disparities during the time reported. Absolute difference was measured as the simple difference between a population subgroup estimate and the estimate for its respective reference group. The relative difference, a percentage, was calculated by dividing the difference by the value in the referent category and multiplying by 100. Change in percentage and mean from 2006 to 2010 was calculated by subtracting the estimate for 2010 from the estimate for 2006. The significance of changes over time was assessed by comparing CIs as described in this section.

Results

Overall, the age-adjusted percentage of respondents rating their health as fair or poor did not change significantly from 2006 (16.3%) to 2010 (16.1%) (Table 1). A higher percentage of women than men reported fair or poor health in both years. However, neither of the groups experienced a significant change from 2006 to 2010. A higher percentage of persons in older age groups than younger groups rated their health as fair or poor in both years. The percentage of persons aged ≥65 years reporting fair or poor health significantly decreased approximately 2 percentage points from 2006 to 2010. Both in 2006 and 2010, a significantly lower percentage of non-Hispanic whites rated their health as fair or poor than all other racial/ethnic groups except A/PIs. However, only two of these racial/ethnic groups experienced a significant change in self-rated health from 2006 to 2010: the percentage of non-Hispanic blacks reporting fair or poor health increased by 2 percentage points, and that of Hispanics decreased approximately 3 percentage points. In both 2006 and 2010, a higher percentage of those who had not graduated from high school reported fair or poor health than did high school graduates, and a lower percentage of college graduates reported fair or poor health than did high school graduates. From 2006 to 2010, the percentage of high school graduates who reported fair or poor self-rated health increased by 1.2 percentage points, and the percentage of persons with some college education who reported fair or poor self-rated health decreased by 1.6 percentage points. A higher percentage of persons who spoke a language other than English at home reported fair or poor health than those who spoke English at home. However, the percentage of those who spoke Spanish at home and reported fair or poor health decreased by 7 percentage points from 2006 to 2010. A higher percentage of persons with a disability rated their health as fair or poor than did those without a disability both in 2006 and 2010. Nonetheless, the percentage of persons without a disability who rated their health as fair or poor decreased by 0.8 percentage points from 2006 to 2010.

From 2006 to 2010, the overall age-adjusted mean number of physically unhealthy days in the last 30 days increased by approximately 0.1 days (2006: 3.6 days; 2010: 3.7 days (Table 2). A higher mean number of physically unhealthy days were reported by women than men in 2006 and 2010. However, only men experienced a statistically significant increase in mean number of days (0.2 days) over time. A higher mean number of physically unhealthy days was reported by older respondents than younger respondents. From 2006 to 2010, only persons aged 25–34 years reported a statistically significant increase in mean number of physically unhealthy days (0.3 days). In both 2006 and 2010, the fewest physically

TABLE 1. Estimated percentage of adults aged ≥18 years who rated their health as fair or poor, by selected characteristics — Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System, United States, 2006 and 2010

	2006				2010
Characteristic	Age-adjusted percentage	(95% CI)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Age-adjusted percentage	(95% CI)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Change from 2006 to 2010 (percentage points)
Total	16.3	(15.9–16.6)	—	—	16.1	(15.9–16.4)	—	—	-0.2
Sex
Male	15.8	(15.3–16.3)	-0.8*	-5.3*	15.4	(15.0–15.8)	-1.4*	-8*	-0.4
Female	16.7	(16.3–17.0)	Ref.	Ref.	16.8	(16.5–17.1)	Ref.	Ref.	0.1
Age group (yrs)
18–24	9.3	(8.3–10.2)	-2.4*	-21*	7.6	(6.8–8.4)	-4.0*	-34*	-1.7
25–34	9.9	(9.2–10.7)	-1.7*	-15*	9.9	(9.3–10.5)	-1.6*	-14*	0.0
35–44	11.7	(11.0–12.3)	Ref.	Ref.	11.5	(11.0–12.1)	Ref.	Ref.	-0.2
45–64	18.8	(18.3–19.3)	7.2*.	61*	19.0	(18.6–19.4)	7.5*	65*	0.2
65–79	27.4	(26.6–28.2)	15.8*	135*	25.1	(24.6–25.6)	13.6*	118*	-2.3*
≥80	33.2	(31.9–34.5)	21.6*	185*	31.1	(30.3–31.9)	19.6*	170*	-2.1*
Race/Ethnicity
White, non-Hispanic	13.1	(12.8–13.4)	Ref.	Ref.	13.3	(13.0–13.5)	Ref.	Ref.	0.1
Black, non-Hispanic	21.3	(20.3–22.2)	8.1*	62*	23.3	(22.5–24.1)	10.0*	76*	2.0*
Hispanic[†]	31.0	(29.5–32.5)	17.9*	137*	28.1	(27.1–29.1)	14.8*	112*	-2.9*
Asian/Pacific Islander	11.8	(9.8–13.7)	-1.3	-10	11.9	(10.7–13.1)	-1.4	-10	0.1
American Indian/ Alaska Native	26.7	(23.9–29.6)	13.6*	104*	30.8	(28.0–33.6)	17.6*	133*	4.1
Other	22.0	(18.5–25.5)	8.9*	68*	18.6	(15.9–21.3)	5.3*	40*	-3.4
Educational attainment
Less than high school	39.1	(37.8–40.5)	20.0*	104*	38.4	(37.4–39.5)	18.1*	89*	-0.7
High school graduate or equivalent	19.2	(18.6–19.7)	Ref.	Ref.	20.3	(19.8–20.8)	Ref.	Ref.	1.2*
Some college	13.8	(13.3–14.3)	-5.3*	-28*	15.5	(15.0–15.9)	-4.9*	-24*	1.6*
College graduate	7.1	(6.8–7.4)	-12.0*	-63*	7.3	(7.0–7.6)	-13.0*	-64*	0.2
Language spoken at home
English	14.8	(14.5–15.1)	Ref.	Ref.	15.0	(14.8–15.3)	Ref.	Ref.	0.2
Spanish	44.8	(42.3–47.3)	30.0*	203*	37.6	(35.9–39.3)	22.6*	151*	-7.2*
Other language	41.9	(18.2–65.6)	27.1*	183*	40.7	(31.3–50.1)	25.7*	171*	-1.2
Disability status
With disability	38.7	(37.9–39.6)	29.3*	312*	39.4	(38.7–40.0)	30.7*	356*	0.6
Without disability	9.4	(9.1–9.7)	Ref.	Ref.	8.6	(8.4–8.9)	Ref.	Ref.	-0.8*

Abbreviations: 95% CI = 95% confidence interval; Ref. = referent.

* Difference considered statistically significantly different by comparison of nonoverlapping 95% CIs. Unrounded CIs do not overlap.

[†] Persons of Hispanic ethnicity might be of any race or combination of races.

unhealthy days were reported by A/PIs (2006: 2.4 days; 2010: 2.5 days) and the most were reported by AI/ANs, (2006: 6.2 days; 2010: 6.3 days). Hispanics showed an increase in mean number of physically unhealthy days from 2006 to 2010 (0.6 days). Compared with high school graduates, more physically unhealthy days were reported by those who had not graduated from high school than by those with at least some college. However, all but college graduates experienced an increase in physically unhealthy days from 2006 to 2010, with the least educated showing the largest increase (0.8 days). More physically unhealthy days were reported by those who spoke a language other than English at home than by those who spoke English at home. From 2006 to 2010, those who spoke Spanish at home had an 0.8-day increase in physically unhealthy days, compared with an almost 10-day decrease among those who spoke languages other than English and Spanish. Approximately 8 more physically unhealthy days were reported by persons with a disability (10 days) than by those without a disability (1.8 days). Neither group had a significant change in number of days from 2006 to 2010.

From 2006 to 2010, the overall age-adjusted mean number of mentally unhealthy days in the last 30 days increased by approximately 0.1 days (2006: 3.4 days; 2010: 3.5 days) (Table 3). The mean number of mentally unhealthy days for women exceeded those for men by approximately 1 day in both years. However, only men showed a significant increase from 2006 to 2010 (by 0.2 days). A higher percentage of younger respondents reported a mean number of mentally unhealthy days than older respondents. Only those aged 35–79 years experienced an increase in mean number of days from 2006

TABLE 2. Mean number of physically unhealthy days in the past 30 days among adults aged ≥18 years, by selected characteristics — Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System, United States, 2006 and 2010

	2006				2010
Characteristic	Age-adjusted mean no. of days	(95% CI)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Age-adjusted mean no. of days	(95% CI)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Change from 2006 to 2010 (percentage points)
Total	3.6	(3.5–3.6)	—	—	3.7	(3.6–3.7)	—	—	0.1
Sex
Male	3.2	(3.1–3.3)	-0.7*	-19*	3.4	(3.3–3.5)	-0.6*	-14*	0.2*
Female	3.9	(3.8–4.0)	Ref.	Ref.	4.0	(3.9–4.0)	Ref.	Ref.	0.1
Age group (yrs)
18–24	2.1	(1.9–2.3)	-0.7*	-24*	2.0	(1.9–2.2)	-0.8*	-29*	-0.1
25–34	2.2	(2.1–2.3)	-0.6*	-20*	2.5	(2.4–2.6)	-0.4*	-13*	0.3*
35–44	2.8	(2.7–2.9)	Ref.	Ref.	2.9	(2.8–3.0)	Ref.	Ref.	0.1
45–64	4.3	(4.2–4.4)	1.6*	55*	4.3	(4.3–4.4)	1.5*	51*	0.1
65–79	5.3	(5.2–5.5)	2.6*	92*	5.1	(5.0–5.2)	2.3*	79*	-0.2
≥80	6.6	(6.3–6.9)	3.8*	127*	6.2	(6.0–6.4)	3.3*	116*	-0.4
Race/Ethnicity
White, non-Hispanic	3.4	(3.4–3.5)	Ref.	Ref.	3.5	(3.4–3.6)	Ref.	Ref.	0.1
Black, non-Hispanic	4.0	(3.9–4.2)	0.6*	18*	4.3	(4.1–4.4)	0.8*	22*	0.2
Hispanic†	3.8	(3.6–4.0)	0.4*	10*	4.4	(4.2–4.5)	0.9*	25*	0.6*
Asian/Pacific Islander	2.4	(2.2–2.7)	-1.0*	-30*	2.5	(2.3–2.7)	-1.0*	-29*	0.1
American Indian/ Alaska Native	6.2	(5.5–6.9)	2.8*	82*	6.3	(5.7–6.9)	2.8*	79*	0.0
Other	5.2	(4.3–6.1)	1.8*	52*	4.3	(3.9–4.8)	0.9*	24*	-0.9
Educational attainment
Less than high school	5.7	(5.4–5.9)	1.6*	40*	6.5	(6.3–6.7)	2.2*	51*	0.8*
High school graduate or equivalent	4.0	(3.9–4.2)	Ref.	Ref.	4.3	(4.2–4.4)	Ref.	Ref.	0.3*
Some college	3.7	(3.6–3.8)	-0.4*	-9*	3.9	(3.8–4.0)	-0.4*	-9*	0.2*
College graduate	2.2	(2.2–2.3)	-1.8*	-44*	2.3	(2.2–2.3)	-2.1*	-48*	0.0
Language spoken at home
English	3.5	(3.5–3.6)	Ref.	Ref.	3.6	(3.6–3.7)	Ref.	Ref.	0.1
Spanish	4.0	(3.6–4.4)	0.5*	13*	4.8	(4.5–5.1)	1.2*	33*	0.8*
Other language	12.7	(4.4–21.0)	9.2*	260*	2.9	(1.8–4.0)	-0.7	20	-9.8*
Disability status
With disability	10.0	(9.8–10.2)	8.3*	464*	10.2	(10.0–10.3)	8.4*	471*	0.1
Without disability	1.8	(1.7–1.8)	Ref.	Ref.	1.8	(1.7–1.8)	Ref.	Ref.	0.0

Abbreviations: 95% CI = 95% confidence interval; Ref. = referent.

* Difference considered statistically significantly different by comparison of nonoverlapping 95% CIs. Unrounded CIs do not overlap.

† Persons of Hispanic ethnicity might be of any race or combination of races.

to 2010 (0.2–0.3 days). A/PIs reported the fewest mentally unhealthy days, and AI/ANs reported the most. However, from 2006 to 2010, only Hispanics showed a significant increase (0.6 days). The number of mentally unhealthy days in 2006 and 2010 was higher for persons with less education than for those with more education. However, all groups without a college degree experienced a significant increase in the number of days from 2006 to 2010. Similar to the change among Hispanic respondents, who experienced an increase of 0.6 mentally unhealthy days from 2006 to 2010, the mean number of mentally unhealthy days increased among those who spoke Spanish at home by 0.9 days. The mean number of mentally unhealthy days among persons with a disability (7 days) was approximately five more than among persons without a disability (2 days). Nonetheless, only persons with a disability showed a statistically significant increase from 2006 to 2010 (0.3 days).

Discussion

The patterns of the health-related quality of life measures among the various groups in this report are similar to previous findings (1,11). Groups with higher percentages of fair or poor health and who report more physically unhealthy days and more mentally unhealthy days are usually women, older persons (with respect to physical health), younger persons (with respect to mental health), minority racial/ethnic groups (except for A/PIs), those with less education, those who speak another language besides English at home, and those with a disability.

Groups that had statistically significant changes in health-related quality of life from 2006 to 2010 differ from groups with statistically significant differences from the reference groups during the individual years. Although minimal change occurred overall, statistically significant changes occurred in

TABLE 3. Mean number of mentally unhealthy days in the past 30 days among adults aged ≥18 years, by selected characteristics — Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System, United States, 2006 and 2010

	2006				2010
Characteristic	Age-adjusted mean no. of days	(95% CI)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Age-adjusted mean no. of days	(95% CI)	Absolute difference (percentage points)	Relative difference (%)	Change from 2006 to 2010 (percentage points)
Total	3.4	(3.3–3.5)	—	—	3.5	(3.5–3.6)	—	—	0.1
Sex
Male	2.7	(2.7–2.8)	-1.3*	-32	3.0	(2.9–3.0)	-1.2*	-28*	0.2*
Female	4.0	(4.0–4.1)	Ref.	Ref.	4.1	(4.0–4.2)	Ref.	Ref.	0.1
Age group (yrs)
18–24	4.3	(4.0–4.5)	0.9*	26*	4.0	(3.8–4.2)	0.4*	10*	-0.3
25–34	3.7	(3.5–3.8)	0.3*	9*	3.8	(3.7–4.0)	0.2	6	0.2
35–44	3.4	(3.3–3.5)	Ref.	Ref.	3.6	(3.5–3.8)	Ref.	Ref.	0.3*
45–64	3.6	(3.5–3.7)	0.2	6	3.8	(3.8–3.9)	0.2*	6*	0.3*
65–79	2.1	(2.0–2.3)	-1.2*	-37*	2.3	(2.3–2.4)	-1.3*	-36*	0.2*
≥80	2.0	(1.9–2.2)	-1.3*	-40*	2.0	(1.9–2.1)	-1.7*	-46*	-0.1
Race/Ethnicity
White, non-Hispanic	3.4	(3.3–3.4)	Ref.	Ref.	3.5	(3.4–3.5)	Ref.	Ref.	0.1
Black, non-Hispanic	3.8	(3.6–4.0)	0.5*	13*	4.0	(3.8–4.2)	0.5*	15*	0.2
Hispanic†	3.2	(3.0–3.5)	-0.1	4	3.8	(3.6–4.0)	0.3*	10*	0.6*
Asian/Pacific Islander	2.1	(1.9–2.4)	-1.2*	-37*	2.0	(1.7–2.3)	-1.5*	-42*	-0.1
American Indian/ Alaska Native	5.7	(5.0–6.3)	2.3*	68*	5.7	(5.1–6.4)	2.3*	65*	0.1
Other	5.1	(4.3–6.0)	1.7*	52*	3.9	(3.4–4.5)	0.5	14	-1.2
Educational attainment
Less than high school	4.9	(4.6–5.1)	1.1*	28*	5.6	(5.4–5.8)	1.6*	40*	0.7*
High school graduate or equivalent	3.8	(3.7–3.9)	Ref.	Ref.	4.0	(3.9–4.1)	Ref.	Ref.	0.2*
Some college	3.6	(3.5–3.8)	-0.2	-5	3.9	(3.8–4.0)	-0.1	-3	0.3*
College graduate	2.3	(2.2–2.4)	-1.5*	-39*	2.3	(2.3–2.4)	-1.7*	-42*	0.0
Language spoken at home
English	3.5	(3.4–3.5)	Ref.	Ref.	3.5	(3.5–3.6)	Ref.	Ref.	0.1
Spanish	2.9	(2.6–3.3)	-0.5*	-15*	3.8	(3.6–4.1)	0.3	9	0.9*
Other language	8.9	(0.0–17.9)	5.5	159	3.9	(2.3–5.5)	0.4	11	-5.0
Disability status
With disability	7.2	(7.1–7.4)	4.9*	207*	7.5	(7.4–7.7)	5.2*	220*	0.3*
Without disability	2.4	(2.3–2.4)	Ref.	Ref.	2.4	(2.3–2.4)	Ref.	Ref.	0.0

Abbreviations: 95% CI = 95% confidence interval; Ref. = referent.

* Difference considered statistically significantly different by comparison of nonoverlapping 95% CIs. Unrounded CIs do not overlap.

† Persons of Hispanic ethnicity might be of any race or combination of races.

specific groups. Men (but not women) reported an increase in the number of physically and mentally unhealthy days over time. Persons aged ≥65 years rated their overall health better in 2010 than in 2006. Hispanics and those who spoke Spanish at home also rated their overall health better in 2010 than in 2006, despite reporting increases in numbers both of physically and mentally unhealthy days. Numbers of physically and mentally unhealthy days increased from 2006 to 2010 among persons without a college degree. The number of mentally unhealthy days but not of physically unhealthy days increased among persons with a disability, although persons without a disability rated their overall health better.

Reasons for particular changes in health-related quality are unclear. Differences in risky and protective health behaviors, in socioeconomic circumstances such as employment status and household income, and in disease status have been associated with differences in the measures used in this analysis to assess health-related quality of life (1,11). Hispanics and those without a college degree reported more physically and mentally unhealthy days in 2010 than in 2006; however, others in similar socioeconomic circumstances (e.g., non-Hispanic blacks and AI/ANs) did not. What accounted for these differences is unclear. Additional analyses that adjust for changes in employment status, the effects of housing loss, and the recent increase in enforcement against illegal immigrants might clarify these differences.

Limitations

The findings in this report are subject to at least four limitations. First, although the BRFSS health-related quality of life questions have been shown to be reliable in predicting 30-day and 1-year hospitalization and mortality (12,13), because the health-related quality of life data are self-reported, they might be misclassified because they are not objectively verifiable and are subject to recall bias and measurement error. Second, although BRFSS uses poststratification to adjust respondent sampling weights for non-response (7,8), this adjustment assumes that nonrespondents would have answered in similar ways to respondents with similar demographic characteristics; such poststratification might not have fully adjusted for differences between nonrespondents and respondents, given the low, state-specific overall response rates. Third, BRFSS data are cross-sectional; therefore, changes in the composition of the BRFSS sample from 2006 to 2010 that affect responses to the health-related quality of life questions might affect measured differences from 2006 to 2010. Finally, the results were adjusted for age only; therefore, other confounding variables also might have affected measured differences from 2006 to 2010.

Conclusion

Although direct interventions to improve health-related quality of life are not possible, indirect interventions to change characteristics associated with health-related quality of life might result in improvements. For example, risky health behaviors can decrease health-related quality of life. Persons who smoke cigarettes have worse health-related quality of life than former smokers or never smokers (14), and smoking is more prevalent among those with certain health conditions such as epilepsy (15).

Cigarette smoking is a well-known cause of multiple types of cancer (16). Persons with epilepsy (17) and cancer (18) have worse health-related quality of life than those without these conditions. Moreover, protective health behaviors can increase health-related quality of life. For example, persons who engage in physical activity have better health-related quality of life than those who are sedentary (19). Physical activity also reduces obesity (20) and its complications and has been associated both with reduced colon cancer rates (20) and reduced complications from different kinds of arthritis (21). Persons who are obese (22), have cancer (18), or have arthritis (23) have worse health-related quality of life than those without these conditions. Therefore, interventions to eliminate risky behaviors, promote protective behaviors, and delay or prevent complications from diseases and other conditions would probably improve health-related quality of life.

References

1. CDC. Measuring healthy days: population assessment of health-related quality of life. Atlanta, GA: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC; 2000. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/hrqol/pdfs/mhd.pdf.
2. Moriarty DG, Zack M, Kobau R. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's Healthy Days Measures—population tracking of perceived physical and mental health over time. Health Qual Life Outcomes 2003;1:37 .
3. CDC. CDC health disparities and inequalities report—United States, 2011. MMWR 2011;60(Suppl; January 14, 2011).
4. CDC. Introduction. In: CDC health disparities and inequalities report—United States, 2013. MMWR 2013;62(No. Suppl 3).
5. Li C, Balluz LS, Okoro CA, et al. Surveillance of certain health behaviors and conditions among states and selected local areas—Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System, United States, 2009. MMWR 2011;60(No. SS-9).
6. Mokdad AH. The Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System: past, present, and future. Annu Rev Public Health 2009;30:43–54.
7. CDC. 2006 Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System summary data quality report. Atlanta, GA: CDC; 2007. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/brfss/annual_data/2006/2006SummaryDataQualityReport.docx.
8. CDC. 2010 Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System summary data quality report. Atlanta, GA: CDC; 2011. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/brfss/annual_data/2010/2010_Summary_Data_Quality_Report.docx.
9. CDC. Healthy people 2010 operational definition: 6–1. Atlanta, GA: CDC. Available at http://ftp.cdc.gov/pub/health_statistics/nchs/datasets/data2010/focusarea06/O0601.pdf.
10. Research Triangle Institute. SUDAAN language manual, release 10.0. Research Triangle Park, NC: Research Triangle Institute; 2010.
11. Zahran HS, Kobau R, Moriarty DG, et al. Health-related quality of life surveillance—United States, 1993–2002. MMWR 2005;54(No. SS-4).
12. Andresen EM, Catlin TK, Wyrwich KW, Jackson-Thompson J. Retest reliability of surveillance questions on health related quality of life. J Epidemiol Community Health 2003;57:339–43.
13. Dominick KL, Ahern FM, Gold CH, Heller DA. Relationship of health-related quality of life to health care utilization and mortality among older adults. Aging Clin Exp Res 2002;14:499–508.
14. Mody RR, Smith MJ. Smoking status and health-related quality of life: Findings from the 2001 Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System. Am J Health Promot 2006;20:251–8.
15. CDC. Epilepsy surveillance among adults—19 states, Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System, 2005. MMWR 2008;57(No. SS-6).
16. US Department of Health and Human Services. How tobacco smoke causes disease: the biology and behavioral basis for smoking-attributable disease: a report of the Surgeon General. Atlanta, GA: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC; 2010.
17. Kobau R, Zahran H, Grant D, et al. Prevalence of active epilepsy and health-related quality of life among adults with self-reported epilepsy in California: California Health Interview Survey, 2003. Epilepsia 2007; 48:1904–13.
18. Richardson LC, Wingo PA, Zack MM, Zahran HS, King JB. Health-related quality of life (HRQOL) in cancer survivors between 20 and 64: Population-based estimates from the Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System (BRFSS). Cancer 2008;112:1380–9.
19. Brown DW, Balluz LS, Heath GW, et al. Associations between recommended levels of physical activity and health-related quality of life. Findings from the 2001 Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System (BRFSS) survey. Prev Med 2003;37:520–8 Available at http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S0091743503001798.
20. US Department of Health and Human Services. Physical activity and health: a report of the Surgeon General. Atlanta, GA: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC; 1996.

21. Loew L, Brosseau L, Wells GA, et al. Ottawa panel evidence-based clinical practice guidelines for aerobic walking programs in the management of osteoarthritis. Arch Phys Med Rehabil 2012;93:1269–85.
22. Ford ES, Moriarty DG, Zack MM, Mokdad AH, Chapman DP. Self-reported body mass index and health-related quality of life: findings from the Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System. Obes Res 2001;9:21–31.
23. Furner SE, Hootman JM, Helmick CG, Bolen J, Zack MM. Health-related quality of life of U.S. adults with arthritis: analysis of data from the Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System, 2003, 2005, and 2007. Arthritis Care Res (Hoboken) 2011;63:788–99.

Suicides — United States, 2005–2009

Alex E. Crosby, MD[1]
LaVonne Ortega, MD[2]
Mark R. Stevens, MSPH, MA[1]
[1]National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, CDC
[2]Center for Surveillance, Epidemiology, and Laboratory Services, CDC

Corresponding author: Alex E. Crosby, Division of Violence Prevention, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, CDC. Telephone: 770-488-4272; E-mail: aec1@cdc.gov.

Introduction

Injury from self-directed violence, which includes suicidal behavior and its consequences, is a leading cause of death and disability. In 2009, suicide was the 10th-leading cause of death in the United States and the cause of 36,909 deaths (1). In 2005, the estimated cost of self-directed violence (fatal and nonfatal treated) was $41.2 billion (including $38.9 billion in productivity losses and $2.2 billion in medical costs) (2). Suicide is a complex human behavior that results from an interaction of multiple biological, psychological, social, political, and economic factors (3). Although self-directed violence affects members of all racial/ethnic groups in the United States, it often is misperceived to be a problem affecting primarily non-Hispanic white males (4).

This report is part of the second CDC Health Disparities and Inequalities Report (CHDIR). The 2011 CHDIR (5) was the first CDC report to assess disparities across a wide range of diseases, behavior risk factors, environmental exposures, social determinants, and health-care access. The topic presented in this report is based on criteria that are described in the 2013 CHDIR Introduction (6). This report updates information that was presented in the 2011 CHDIR (7) by providing more current data on suicide in the United States. The purposes of this report are to discuss and raise awareness of differences in the characteristics of suicide decedents and to prompt actions to reduce these disparities.

Methods

To determine differences in the prevalence of suicide by sex, race/ethnicity, age, and educational attainment in the United States, CDC analyzed 2005–2009 data from the Web-based Injury Statistics Query and Reporting System — Fatal (WISQARS Fatal) (8) and the National Vital Statistics System (NVSS). In this report, NVSS data provided as of February 2012 were used. The 2009 data were used to describe the overall patterns in suicides. The aggregate 2005–2009 reporting period was used to describe patterns for the combined age group and race/ethnicity because sample sizes for any single year were limited. Mortality data were drawn from CDC's National Vital Statistics System (NVSS), which collects death certificate data filed in the 50 states and the District of Columbia (1). Data in this report include suicides from any cause during 2005–2009. The WISQARS database contains mortality data based on NVSS and population counts for all U.S. counties based on U.S. Census data. Counts and rates of death can be obtained by underlying cause of death, mechanism of injury, state, county, age, race, sex, year, injury cause of death (e.g., firearm, poisoning, or suffocation) and by manner of death (e.g., suicide, homicide, or unintentional injury) (8).

NVSS codes racial categories as non-Hispanic white, non-Hispanic black, American Indian/Alaska Native (AI/AN), and Asian/Pacific Islander (A/PI); ethnicity is coded separately as Hispanic or non-Hispanic (1). Persons of Hispanic ethnicity might be of any race or combination of races. Absolute differences in rates between two populations were compared using a test statistic, z, based on a normal approximation at a critical value of $\alpha = 0.05$ (9).

Educational attainment is recorded by two methods on death certificates. In 28 states* and the District of Columbia (DC), the 2003 version of the standard certificate of death is used (which collects the highest degree completed), whereas 20 states† use the 1989 version of the certificate (which collects the number of years of education completed). For this reason, these two groups of states were analyzed separately. Death rates by educational attainment were based on population estimates from the U.S. Census Bureau's 2009 American Community Survey (ACS) (10). Data for Georgia and Rhode Island were excluded because educational attainment was not recorded on their death certificates. Rates are presented only for persons aged ≥25 years because persons aged <25 years might not have completed their formal education (9).

---

* Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Washington, and Wyoming.

† Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Colorado, Hawaii, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, Wisconsin, and West Virginia.

Unadjusted (crude) suicide rates were based on resident population data from the U.S. Census Bureau (10). Rates based on <20 deaths were considered unreliable and not included in the analysis. Confidence intervals were calculated in two ways: 1) groupings of <100 deaths were calculated by using the gamma method (9), and 2) groupings of ≥100 deaths were calculated by using a normal approximation (9).

Results

In 2009, a total of 36,909 suicides occurred in the United States, 83.5% of which were among non-Hispanic whites, 7.0% among Hispanics, 5.5% among non-Hispanic blacks, 2.5% among A/PIs, and 1.1% among AI/ANs (Table). Although AI/ANs represented the smallest proportion of suicides of all racial/ethnic groups, they shared the highest rates with whites. Overall, the crude suicide rate for males (19.2 per 100,000 population) was approximately four times higher than the rate for females (5.0 per 100,000 population). In each of the racial/ethnic groups, suicide rates were higher for males than for females, but the male-female ratio for suicide differs among these groups. Among non-Hispanic whites, the male-female ratio was 3.8:1; among Hispanics it was 4.5:1; among non-Hispanic blacks it was 4.7:1; among A/PIs it was 2.3:1; and among AI/ANs it was 2.8:1. These male-female ratios did not change significantly from those reported previously (7).

Overall, suicide rates varied by the level of educational attainment. Persons with the highest educational attainment had the lowest rates, those with the lowest educational attainment had intermediate rates, and those who had completed only the equivalent of high school (or 12 years of education) had the highest rates. This pattern was consistent for males, but the pattern of educational inequalities was different among females. Females with a lower educational level had the lowest suicide rates followed by those with the highest educational level, while those females with a high school education (12 years of education) had the highest suicide rates. For each version of the death certificate, whether overall or by sex, suicide rates differed significantly between levels of educational attainment, except that rates for females did not differ significantly between the lowest and highest educational attainment levels in the states on the basis of data from the 1989 death certificate version.

Suicide rates by race/ethnicity and age group demonstrated different patterns by racial/ethnic group, with the highest rates occurring among AI/AN adolescents and young adults aged 15–34 years (Figure). Rates among AI/ANs and non-Hispanic blacks were highest among adolescents and young adults, then declined or leveled off with increasing age, respectively. Among A/PIs and Hispanics, rates were highest among young adults in their early 20s, then leveled off among other adults but increased for those aged ≥65 years. In contrast, rates among non-Hispanic whites were highest among those aged 40–54 years. Although the 2009 overall rates for AI/ANs are similar to those of non-Hispanic whites, the 2005–2009 rates among adolescent and young adult AI/ANs aged 15–29 years were substantially higher.

Discussion

The burden of suicide among AI/AN youths is considerably higher than that among other racial/ethnic groups. In 2009, suicide ranked as the fourth leading cause of years of potential life lost (YPLL) for AI/ANs aged <75 years, accounting for 6.8% of all YPLL among AI/ANs (8). Studies examining the historical and cultural context of suicide among AI/AN populations have identified multiple contributors to the high rates such as individual-level factors (e.g., alcohol and substance misuse and mental illness), family- or peer-level factors (e.g., family disruption or suicidal behavior of others), and societal-level factors (e.g., poverty, unemployment, discrimination, and historic trauma [i.e., cumulative emotional and psychological wounding across generations]) (11). Although certain protective factors exist within AI/AN communities, including spirituality and cultural continuity, these factors often are overwhelmed by the magnitude of the risk factors (11). If the overall suicide rate among the AI/AN population (highest rate) could be decreased to that of non-Hispanic blacks (lowest rate), 271 (66.6%) of the total 407 AI/AN deaths during 2009 might have been prevented. This idea of achieving rates of the lowest group is similar to that proposed in the Healthy People 2010 objectives (12).

Prevention efforts and resources also should be directed toward adults aged 40–54 years because this age group has the highest (and increasing) suicide rate, but this age group often is overlooked as a group at which prevention efforts should focus (13). The National Strategy for Suicide Prevention has identified males in this age group as one of the populations at increased risk for suicide for whom additional surveillance, research, and prevention programs need to be focused (14).

The findings regarding the association of suicide rates and educational attainment are mixed in this study and in others. Certain studies (15) have found an inverse relationship between educational status and suicide among males (i.e., suicide rates decrease as educational attainment increases), whereas other studies (16) have not found this pattern. Patterns among females identified in other studies seem more consistent (i.e., the lowest rates occur among those with the lowest educational attainment) or find no association, but the

TABLE. Number and rate[*] of suicides, by selected characteristics — National Vital Statistics System, United States, 2009

Characteristic	Male			Female			Total
	No. of deaths	Rate	(95% CI)[†]	No. of deaths	Rate	(95% CI)	No. of deaths	Rate	(95% CI)	% of total
Age group (yrs)
0–4	0	—[§]	—	0	—	—	0	—	—	—
5–9	4	—	—	2	—	—	6	—	—	—
10–14	171	1.7	(1.4–1.9)	88	0.9	(0.7–1.1)	259	1.30	(1.1–1.5)	0.7
15–19	1,325	12.0	(11.3–12.6)	344	3.3	(2.9–3.6)	1,669	7.75	(7.4–8.1)	4.5
20–24	2,270	20.5	(19.6–21.3)	432	4.1	(3.8–4.5)	2,702	12.5	(12.1–13.0)	7.3
25–29	2,184	19.7	(18.8–20.5)	515	4.9	(4.5–5.3)	2,699	12.5	(12.0–12.9)	7.3
30–34	2,109	20.9	(20.0–21.8)	512	5.2	(4.8–5.7)	2,621	13.2	(12.7–13.7)	7.1
35–39	2,414	23.3	(22.4–24.3)	681	6.7	(6.2–7.2)	3,095	15.1	(14.5–15.6)	8.4
40–44	2,728	26.0	(25.0–27.0)	854	8.1	(7.6–8.7)	3,582	17.1	(16.5–17.6)	9.7
45–49	3,176	28.1	(27.1–29.1)	1,036	9.0	(8.4–9.5)	4,212	18.5	(17.9–19.0)	11.4
50–54	3,293	30.8	(29.8–31.9)	1,093	9.9	(9.3–10.5)	4,386	20.2	(19.6–20.8)	11.9
55–59	2,661	28.9	(27.8–30.0)	830	8.5	(7.9–9.1)	3,491	18.4	(17.8–19.0)	9.5
60–64	1,796	23.7	(22.6–24.8)	521	6.3	(5.8–6.9)	2,317	14.7	(14.1–15.3)	6.3
65–69	1,357	24.6	(23.3–25.9)	312	5.0	(4.4–5.5)	1,669	14.2	(13.5–14.8)	4.5
70–74	1,037	25.4	(23.9–27.0)	211	4.3	(3.7–4.9)	1,248	13.9	(13.1–14.6)	3.4
75–79	945	30.0	(28.1–31.9)	157	3.8	(3.2–4.4)	1,102	15.0	(14.2–15.9)	3.0
80–84	844	36.7	(34.3–39.2)	117	3.3	(2.7–3.9)	961	16.5	(15.5–17.6)	2.6
≥85	763	42.8	(39.8–45.8)	115	3.0	(2.4–3.5)	878	15.6	(14.6–16.6)	2.4
Unknown	12	—	—	0	—	—	12	—	—	—
Race/Ethnicity
White, non-Hispanic	24,248	24.4	(24.1–24.7)	6565	6.4	(6.2–6.5)	30,813	15.2	(15.1–15.4)	83.5
Black, non-Hispanic	1,649	8.9	(8.5–9.3)	385	1.9	(1.7–2.1)	2,034	5.2	(5.0–5.5)	5.5
American Indian/Alaska Native	298	23.2	(20.6–25.8)	109	8.2	(6.7–9.8)	407	15.6	(14.1–17.1)	1.1
Asian/Pacific Islander	639	8.8	(8.1–9.5)	295	3.8	(3.4–4.3)	934	6.2	(5.8–6.6)	2.5
Hispanic[¶]	2,135	8.5	(8.2–8.9)	438	1.9	(1.7–2.1)	2,573	5.3	(5.1–5.5)	7.0
Unknown	120	—	—	28	—	—	148	—	—	0.4
Educational attainment (28 states[] and DC)
Less than high school graduate or equivalent	2,211	22.4	(21.5–23.4)	431	4.5	(4.0–4.9)	2,642	13.6	(13.0–14.1)	14.0[††]
High school graduate or equivalent	6,283	37.1	(36.2–38.0)	1,436	7.9	(7.5–8.4)	7,719	22.0	(21.6–22.5)	40.8[††]
Some college/college graduate	6,336	18.1	(17.7–18.6)	2,242	5.9	(5.7–6.1)	8,578	11.8	(11.5–12.0)	45.3[††]
Educational attainment (20 states[§§])
<12 yrs	1,548	33.3	(31.7–35.0)	244	5.4	(4.7–6.1)	1,792	19.5	(18.6–20.5)	16.0[††]
12 yrs	3,963	39.7	(38.4–40.9)	948	9.0	(8.4–9.6)	4,911	23.9	(23.3–24.6)	43.9[††]
≥13 yrs	3,273	18.5	(17.8–19.1)	1,203	6.0	(5.7–6.3)	4,476	11.9	(11.5–12.2)	40.0[††]
Total	29,089	19.2	(19.0–19.4)	7,820	5.0	(4.9–5.1)	36,909	12.0	(11.9–12.1)	100.0

Abbreviations: 95% CI = 95% confidence interval; DC = District of Columbia; GED =general equivalency diploma.

[*] Unadjusted (crude) suicide rates per 100,000 population.

[†] CIs based on <100 deaths were calculated by using a gamma method; CIs based on ≥100 deaths were calculated by using a normal approximation. Additional information available from Xu J, Kochanek KD, Murphy SL, Tejada-Vera B. Deaths: final data for 2007. Hyattsville, MD: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC, National Center for Health Statistics; 2010. National Vital Statistics Reports Vol. 58, No. 19. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/nvsr/nvsr58/nvsr58_19.pdf.

[§] Rates based on <20 deaths were considered unreliable and not included in the analysis.

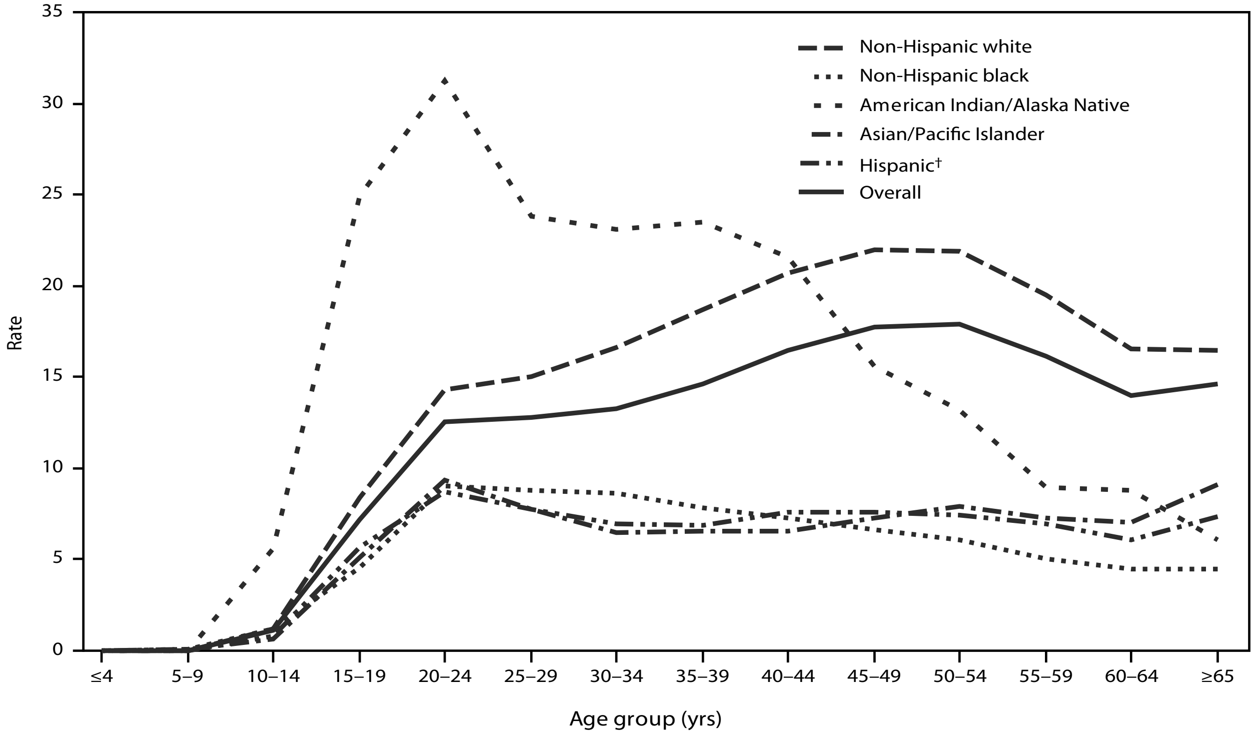
[¶] Persons of Hispanic ethnicity might be of any race or combination of races.

[] Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Washington, and Wyoming used the 2003 version of the Standard Certificate of Death for persons aged ≥25 years.

[††] Percentages reflect a percentage of the three levels of educational attainment shown for each set of states with their respective versions of the Standard Certificate of Death, not a percentage of the total count of suicides. Suicide counts shown do not include 1) 4,648 suicides for persons aged 0–24 years or whose age was unknown; 2) 1,104 suicides from Georgia and Rhode Island, which do not collect data on educational attainment; and 3) 1,039 suicides for whom the state in which the suicide occurred records educational attainment in a different version than that used by the deceased's state of residence.

[§§] Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Colorado, Hawaii, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, Wisconsin, and West Virginia used the 1989 version of the Standard Certificate of Death for persons aged ≥25 years. For rates, the definition of educational attainment differs for the numerator and the denominator. Additional information available from Xu J, Kochanek KD, Murphy SL, Tejada-Vera B. Deaths: final data for 2007. Hyattsville, MD: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC, National Center for Health Statistics; 2010. National Vital Statistics Reports Vol. 58, No. 19. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/nvsr/nvsr58/nvsr58_19.pdf.

FIGURE. Suicide rates,* by race/ethnicity and age group — National Vital Statistics System, United States, 2005–2009



* Unadjusted (crude) suicide rates per 100,000 population.
† Persons of Hispanic ethnicity might be of any race or combination of races.

underlying explanation is unclear (17,18). It has been suggested that studies on the association between education and suicide should perform more specific analysis (e.g., by examining combinations of age, ethnicity, culture, and sex variables to assess the true association) (19).

As a result of multiple challenges (e.g., narrow theoretical focus, lack of longitudinal studies to provide a range of modifiable risk and protective factors, and insufficient study designs), the evidence for the proven effectiveness of suicide prevention programs is sparse (20). Suicide prevention efforts often focus on counseling, education, and clinical intervention strategies for persons at high risk for suicide, neglecting a broader population-based approach (20). Although these efforts might assist those persons at the highest risk for adverse outcomes, they also require high levels of effort and commitment and might have a limited population-level impact, a critical goal of public health (21). In contrast, strategies that seek to address societal-level factors demonstrated to be associated with suicide (e.g., economic strain, poverty, and misuse of alcohol and other psychoactive substances) and improving the health-care system infrastructure in impoverished and underserved communities to address this problem might have a greater population impact but need additional development and testing (22).

Limitations

The findings presented in this report are subject to at least four limitations. First, suicides often are undercounted on death certificates, and studies have indicated that they are differentially undercounted for females and racial/ethnic minorities (23); therefore, the suicide rates in this analysis are likely to be underestimated. Second, injury mortality data likely underestimate by 25%–35% the actual numbers of deaths for AI/ANs and certain other racial/ethnic populations (e.g., Hispanics) because of the misclassification of race/ethnicity of decedents on death certificates (24). Third, data on educational attainment must be interpreted with caution because of misclassification of the decedent's years of education, which has been shown with comparisons between educational attainment as recorded on the death certificate versus that in census surveys (9). Finally, certain variables that have been associated with suicidal behavior (e.g., psychiatric illness, sexual orientation, and social isolation) are not collected in U.S. mortality data, and therefore patterns of suicide based on these factors cannot be described. Other data sources (e.g., the National Violent Death Reporting System) that collect a broader array of information about the circumstances surrounding suicides and other violent deaths can provide additional insight (25).

Conclusion

Comprehensive suicide prevention programs focus on risk and protective factors, including coping skills, access to mental health treatment, substance misuse, and social support. However, only a limited number of programs have been developed specifically for higher risk or racial/ethnic minority populations (3). An example of a comprehensive prevention program that has been reported to reduce suicidal behavior within an AI/AN community is the Natural Helpers Program (26). This program includes health education and outreach activities to the community and at-risk persons, training for community members in identification of at-risk persons, and support for local behavioral health efforts like alcohol and substance abuse programs.

Strategies that address the health and well-being of persons at risk and that support the widespread implementation of culturally relevant and effective programs are needed to reduce the rates of suicide among groups that are disproportionately affected. To address some of these issues, CDC has focused on studying and promoting individual and organizational connectedness as a way to prevent suicide (27).

References

1. CDC. Deaths: final data for 2009. Atlanta, GA: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC; 2011. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/dvs/deaths_2009_release.pdf.
2. CDC. Web-based Injury Statistics Query and Reporting System (WISQARS): cost of injury reports. Atlanta, GA: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC; 2012. Available at http://wisqars.cdc.gov:8080/costT.
3. Goldsmith SK, Pellmar TC, Kleinman AM, Bunney WE, eds. Reducing suicide: a national imperative. Washington, DC: National Academies Press; 2002.
4. Earls F, Escobar JI, Manson SM. Suicide in minority groups: epidemiologic and cultural perspectives. In: Blumenthal SJ, Kupfer DJ, eds. Suicide over the life cycle: risk factors, assessment, and treatment of suicidal patients. Washington, DC: American Psychiatric Publishing; 1990:571–98.
5. CDC. CDC health disparities and inequalities report—United States, 2011. MMWR 2011;60(Suppl; January 14, 2011).
6. CDC. Introduction. In: CDC health disparities and inequalities report—United States, 2013. MMWR 2013;62(No. Suppl 3).
7. CDC. Suicides—United States, 1999–2007. In: CDC health disparities and inequalities report—United States, 2011. MMWR 2011;60(Suppl; January 14, 2011).
8. CDC. Web-based Injury Statistics Query and Reporting System (WISQARS): fatal injury data. Atlanta, GA: US Department of Health and Human Services, CDC. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/injury/wisqars/fatal.html.
9. Xu J, Kochanek KD, Murphy SL, Tejada-Vera B. Deaths: final data for 2007. National Vital Statistics Report 2010;58(19).
10. US Bureau of the Census. 2009 American Community Survey 1-Year Estimates, prepared by the US Census Bureau. Available at http://factfinder2.census.gov.
11. Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. To live to see the great day that dawns: preventing suicide by American Indian and Alaska Native youth and young adults. Rockville, MD: US Department of Health Human Services, Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration; 2010. Publication no. SMA 10-4480.
12. US Department of Health and Human Services. Healthy people 2010. 2nd ed. With Understanding and Improving Health and Objectives for Improving Health. 2 vols. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office; 2000.
13. Phillips JA, Robin AV, Nugent CN, Idler EL. Understanding recent changes in suicide rates among the middle-aged: period or cohort effects? Public Health Rep 2010;125:680–8.
14. US Department of Health and Human Services, Office of the Surgeon General and National Action Alliance for Suicide Prevention. 2012 national strategy for suicide prevention: goals and objectives for action. Washington, DC: US Department of Health and Human Services; 2012.
15. Abel EL, Kruger ML. Educational attainment and suicide rates in the United States. Psychol Rep 2005;97:25–8.
16. Fernquist RM. Education, race/ethnicity, age, sex, and suicide: individual-level data in the United States, 1991–1994. Current Research in Social Psychology 2001;6:277–90. Available at http://www.uiowa.edu/~grpproc.
17. Kposowa A J. Marital status and suicide in the National Longitudinal Mortality Study. J Epidemiol Community Health 2000;54:254–61.
18. Lorant V, Kunst AE, Huisman M, Costa G, Mackenbach JP. Socio-economic inequalities in suicide: a European comparative study. British Journal of Psychiatry 2005;187:49–54.
19. Stack S. Education and risk of suicide: an analysis of African Americans. Sociol Focus 1998;31:295–302.
20. De Leo D. Why are we not getting any closer to preventing suicide? Br J Psychiatry 2002;181:372–4.
21. Frieden TR. A framework for public health action: the health impact pyramid. Am J Public Health 2010;100:590–5.
22. Knox KL, Conwell Y, Caine ED. If suicide is a public health problem, what are we doing to prevent it? Am J Public Health 2004;94:37–45.
23. Phillips DP, Ruth TE. Adequacy of official suicide statistics for scientific research and public policy. Suicide Life Threat Behav 1993;23:307–19.
24. Arias E, Schauman WS, Eschbach K, Sorlie PD, Backlund E. The validity of race and Hispanic origin reporting on death certificates in the United States. Vital Health Stat 2 2008;148:1–23.
25. Steenkamp M, Frazier L, Lipskiy N, et al. The National Violent Death Reporting System: an exciting new tool for public health surveillance. Inj Prev 2006;12(Suppl 2):ii3–5.
26. May PA, Serna P, Hurt L, DeBruyn LM. Outcome evaluation of a public health approach to suicide prevention in an American Indian tribal nation. Am J Public Health 2005;95:1238–44.
27. Kaminski JW, Puddy RW, Hall DM, Cashman SY, Crosby AE, Ortega LAG. The relative influence of different domains of social connectedness on self-directed violence in adolescence. J Youth Adolesc 2010;39:460–73.

Conclusion and Future Directions: CDC Health Disparities and Inequalities Report — United States, 2013

Pamela A. Meyer, PhD[1],
Ana Penman-Aguilar, PhD[2],
Vincent A. Campbell. PhD[3],
Corinne Graffunder, DrPH[4],
Ann E. O'Connor, MPA[5],
Paula W. Yoon, ScD[6]
[1] Office for State, Tribal, Local and Territorial Support, CDC
[2] Office of Minority Health and Health Equity, CDC
[3] National Center on Birth Defects and Developmental Disabilities, CDC
[4] Office of the Associate Director of Policy, CDC
[5] Office of the Associate Director for Program, CDC
[6] Center for Surveillance, Epidemiology and Laboratory Services, CDC

The reports in this supplement document persistent disparities between some population groups in health outcomes, access to health care, adoption of health promoting behaviors, and exposure to health-promoting environments. Some improvements in overall rates and even reductions in some health disparities are noted; however, many gaps persist. These finding highlight the importance of monitoring health status, outcomes, behaviors, and exposures by population groups to assess trends and target interventions. In this report, disparities were found between race and ethnic groups across all of the health topics examined. Differences also were observed by other population characteristics. For example, persons with low socioeconomic status were more likely to be affected by diabetes, hypertension, and human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection and were less likely to be screened for colorectal cancer and vaccinated against influenza.

CDC plays a key role in addressing disparities by collecting and analyzing data and identifying, monitoring, and reporting differences and trends. CDC's national survey data and some state level data are used by the Healthy People initiative to monitor trends in health outcomes and determinants. The Healthy People initiative provides goals and objectives with 10-year targets designed to guide national health promotion and disease prevention efforts to improve the health of all persons in the United States. It is grounded in the principle that setting national objectives and monitoring progress can prompt action and improve health. The Healthy People 2000 initiative had goals to reduce health disparities among persons in the United States. Healthy People 2010 added elimination, not just reduction, of health disparities, and Healthy People 2020 goes even further to achieve health equity, eliminate disparities, and improve the health of all population groups (1). State and local health departments use the Healthy People program as a way to track the effectiveness of local health initiatives.

This supplement provides decision makers with information that they can use to select interventions for certain populations to reduce health disparities. There is a growing awareness that limited health-care coverage and lack of access are only part of the reason why health disparities exist. Many of the strongest predictors of health are social, economic, and environmental factors. Reducing disparities requires national leadership to engage a diverse array of stakeholders; facilitate coordination and alignment among federal departments, agencies, offices, and nonfederal partners; champion the implementation of effective policies and programs; and ensure accountability (2). In addition, a complementary national strategy is required that focuses on a comprehensive, community-driven approach to reduce health disparities in the United States and achieve health equity through collaboration and synergy (3).

Data to Identify Health Disparities

A persistent barrier to documenting health disparities is the lack of data on certain population characteristics. All of the reports in this supplement (n=29) examined differences by race/ethnicity. The next most frequent population characteristics that were examined were age (n=24), sex (n=24), education (n=17), poverty (n=14), place of birth (n=11), and disability (n=nine). The least frequently reported characteristics were the language spoken at home (n=four) and sexual orientation (n=one). Only the paper on HIV infection reported rates by sexual orientation. Some data sources used in this report have very limited information on social and demographic characteristics. For example, death certificates do not have information on sexual orientation, poverty level, or disability (4). Some national health surveys have begun to collect data on sexual orientation, but there are issues that affect the usability of this data. In many instances, the sample sizes are too small to provide meaningful estimates for categories other than heterosexual, and the response rate to the questions on sexual identity is often low. In addition, lack of familiarity with terminology used to describe sexual orientation might have resulted in some misclassification (5).

To promote uniform collection of data on sex, race, ethnicity, primary language, and disability status, in October 2011, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) promulgated standards pursuant to Sec. 4302 of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (ACA) (6). The standards were developed by the Section 4302 Workgroup organized by the HHS Data Council in collaboration with the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) and the U.S. Census Bureau. These data standards apply to all population health surveys conducted or supported by the federal government that use self- or proxy-reported data "to the extent practicable." The recommended data standards require that questions be tested and demonstrate adequate performance in national surveys and comply with any existing mandates by OMB (7). The recommended questions are considered to be a minimum set, and additional questions can be asked in surveys "provided that the additional detail could be aggregated back to the minimum standard and the sample design and sample size support estimates at that level of granularity" (7). The purpose of this provision of ACA is to provide standard approaches for collecting, analyzing, and reporting on health disparities that might exist between various demographic segments of the U.S. population. A standard set of questions to be asked in all national population surveys will improve understanding of the role of certain conditions as a risk factor for preventable poor health. CDC is evaluating the feasibility of incorporating the new data standards into many of its surveys and public health surveillance systems. Some modes of questionnaire administration might not readily support elements of the data standards because of the length of time needed to collect the data. For example, the 2011 data standard for classifying race establishes 14 categories that can be collapsed into the five categories established in 1997 by OMB. The 14 categories are preferred when sample sizes can support the increased detail. More than one race can be specified but there is no "multiracial" category.

Although a mandatory minimum set of six questions was established for determining disability status, no provision exists for modifying data collection modes to accommodate the new questions. One of the questions is, "Are you deaf or do you have serious difficulty hearing?" Notably, persons with serious hearing difficulties might not be able to participate in telephone surveys without the assistance of a Telecommunications Relay Service or other adaptive telephone equipment or services, making it problematic to collect reliable information on the prevalence of this disability and health outcomes for which they might be at risk. Another option for gathering data on persons with serious hearing difficulty is internet panel surveys.

CDC Initiatives to Reduce and Prevent Health Disparities

CDC is conducting many activities that support reducing health disparities and promoting health equity. For example, CDC provides technical support to the independent Community Preventive Services Task Force (Task Force). The Task Force makes recommendations based on systematic reviews of published studies on many important public health topics (8). These recommendations identify programs, services, and policies proven effective in a variety of real-world settings (e.g., communities, worksites, schools, and health plans). One topic the Task Force considered was effectiveness of interventions to improve colorectal, breast, and cervical cancer screening. After reviewing the evidence, the Task Force recommended nine strategies for helping bring those who are eligible for colorectal, breast, and cervical cancer screening to the point of care, including such services and programs as client reminders, one-on-one education, reducing structural barriers (e.g., providing scheduling assistance and transportation and offering extended hours), and provider reminders to screen patients. Many of these services have been effective for underserved populations and communities that are at greatest risks for cancer (9).

CDC's Office of Minority Health and Health Equity (OMHHE) advances policy, scientific, and programmatic efforts to eliminate health disparities affecting populations at social, economic, or environmental disadvantage and achieve health equity in the U.S. population. For example, OMHHE provides leadership in the development and promotion of Healthy People 2020 Social Determinants of Health objectives and is leading an effort to compile promising practices and strategies used by CDC-funded programs to address health disparities. Through all of its activities, OMHHE focuses attention on efforts to achieve health equity, facilitating implementation of relevant policies, furthering the science of health equity and its application, and building and strengthening national and global partnerships for health equity.

CDC provides scientific and technical support to the National Prevention Council. Created by ACA, the National Prevention Council developed the National Prevention Strategy (NPS) to realize the benefits of prevention for all persons in the United States. Eliminating health disparities is one of four strategic directions identified in NPS (2). NPS recommends five approaches to reducing disparities: 1) focus on communities at greatest risk, 2) increase access to quality health care, 3) increase workforce capacity to address disparities, 4) support research to identify effective strategies to eliminate disparities, and 5) standardize and collect data to better identify and address disparities. Recognizing that disparities are closely linked with social, economic, and environmental disadvantage (e.g., lack of access to quality affordable health care, healthy food, safe opportunities for physical activity, and educational and employment opportunities), the National Prevention Council has representation from 20 federal departments including Agriculture, Housing and Urban Development, Defense, Education and Transportation, and is chaired by the Surgeon General.

CDC supports the implementation of the National Prevention Council Action Plan (10). The plan outlines the Federal commitment to implementing the vision, goal, and recommendations of NPS. CDC is working with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Environmental Protection Agency on Health Impact Assessments (HIAs). HIAs examine ways to create healthy communities, provide health protection, and promote health.

CDC also works to reinforce cross-sector collaborations that can advance CDC programs, priorities, and initiatives. CDC's Community Transformation Grant (CTG) program seeks to improve health and wellness by implementing strategies included in NPS. CTG communities are engaging partners from multiple sectors, such as education, transportation, housing, and business, to create healthier communities where persons work, live, learn, and play. CDC's grant programs strive to achieve the greatest possible health impact and eliminate health disparities. Since October 1, 2012, all CDC domestic nonresearch funding opportunity announcements require that grantees describe how health disparities will be addressed, where relevant. When addressing health disparities, CDC programs might require grantees to identify existing health disparities in their communities and develop or implement evidence-based strategies to address those disparities.

Future Directions

Despite persistent racial, ethnic, and socioeconomic gaps in health care and health status, awareness of such disparities remains low among the general public (11). Much can be accomplished within the health and public health arena; however, the multiple and complex web of causes of health disparities can be fully addressed only with the involvement of many partners in fields that influence health such as housing, transportation, education and business. Identifying disparities and monitoring them over time is a necessary first step toward the development and evaluation of evidence-based interventions that can reduce disparities. CDC will continue to document health disparities and promote awareness of disparities as part of its contribution to the national goal to eliminate health disparities for vulnerable populations as defined by race/ethnicity, socioeconomic status, geography, sex, age, disability status, sexual orientation, and primary language, and among other populations identified to be at-risk for health disparities.

References

1. U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Office of Disease and Prevention and Health Promotion. Healthy People 2020. Washington, DC. Available at http://www.healthypeople.gov/2020.
2. National Prevention Council. National Prevention Strategy, Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of the Surgeon General, 2011. Available at http://www.surgeongeneral.gov/initiatives/prevention/strategy/report.pdf.
3. U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. HHS Action plan to reduce Racial and ethnic health disparities: a nation free of disparities in health and health care. Available at http://minorityhealth.hhs.gov/npa/files/Plans/HHS/HHS_Plan_complete.pdf.
4. CDC. 2003 Revisions of the U.S. standard certificates of live birth and death and the fetal death report. Available at http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/nvss/vital_certificate_revisions.htm.
5. Miller K, Ryan JM. Design, development and testing of the NHIS sexual identity question. October 2011. Available at http://wwwn.cdc.gov/qbank/report/Miller_NCHS_2011_NHIS%20Sexual%20Identity.pdf.
6. Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (Pub.L. 111-148, 124 Stat. 119, March 23, 2010). Data Collection to Support Standards Related to Essential Health Benefits; Recognition of Entities for the Accreditation of Qualified Health Plans. Federal Register, July 2012.
7. U.S Department of Health and Human Services. Implementation Guidance on Data Collection Standards for Race, Ethnicity, Sex, Primary Language, and Disability Status. Available at http://aspe.hhs.gov/datacncl/standards/ACA/4302/index.pdf.
8. The Guide to Community Preventive Services. Available at http://www.thecommunityguide.org/index.html.
9. The Guide to Community Preventive Services. Cancer Prevention and Control. National Prevention Council, National Prevention Strategy, Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of the Surgeon General, 2011. Available at http://www.healthcare.gov/prevention/nphpphc/2012-npc-action-plan.pdf.
10. National Prevention Council, National Prevention Strategy, Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of the Surgeon General, 2011. Available at http://www.healthcare.gov/prevention/nphpphc/2012-npc-action-plan.pdf.
11. Benz JK, Espinosa O, Welsh V, Fontes A. Awareness of racial and ethnic health disparities has improved only modestly over a decade. Health Aff 2011;30:1860-7.

The Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report (MMWR) Series is prepared by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) and is available free of charge in electronic format. To receive an electronic copy each week, visit MMWR's free subscription page at http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/mmwrsubscribe.html. Paper copy subscriptions are available through the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, DC 20402; telephone 202-512-1800.

Address all inquiries about the MMWR Series, including material to be considered for publication, to Editor, MMWR Series, Mailstop E-90, CDC, 1600 Clifton Rd., N.E., Atlanta, GA 30333 or to mmwrq@cdc.gov.

All material in the MMWR Series is in the public domain and may be used and reprinted without permission; citation as to source, however, is appreciated.

Use of trade names and commercial sources is for identification only and does not imply endorsement by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

References to non-CDC sites on the Internet are provided as a service to MMWR readers and do not constitute or imply endorsement of these organizations or their programs by CDC or the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. CDC is not responsible for the content of these sites. URL addresses listed in MMWR were current as of the date of publication.

U.S. Government Printing Office: 2013-623-210/XXXXX Region IV ISSN: 1546-0738

Index

Index note: Volume numbers and article titles and their page numbers are in boldface.

Photo Credits

VOLUME 1 Centers for Disease Control and Prevention: 16; Federal Emergency Management Agency: 470; Flickr: 5, 26 (Ed Yourdon), 28 (David Wilson), 51 (Michael Cardus), 63, 78 (Tony Webster), 91, 123 (Seth Dickens), 143 (Doug Kerr), 148 (Luca Masters), 164, 183 (Healing Field of Flags), 197 (Paulina Kondraskov), 209 (38 Degrees), 211 (Agata Grzybowska), 216, 238 (Richard Patterson), 299 (Elias Gayles), 354, 378 (Birmingham Culture), 387, 408 (Elvert Xavier Barnes), 412, 422, 446 (Christopher Cornell); iStockphoto: 461; Library of Congress: 45, 86, 155; National Archives and Records Administration: 249, 261, 434; U.S. Air Force: 400; U.S. Army: 307, 346, 367 (Frank H. Carter), 396; U.S. Department of Agriculture: 175, 370; U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service: 70; U.S. Marines: 160; White House: 499 (Pete Souza); Wikimedia Commons: 99, 191, 229, 280, 287 (David Shankbone), 339, 360, 384, 405 (Adam Jones), 440, 455, 486.

VOLUME 2 Federal Emergency Management Agency: 958; Flickr: 510, 515 (Maryland Government), 706, 739 (Ben Pollard), 818 (Lisa F. Young), 829 (Natalie Maynor), 843, 915 (Overpass Light Brigade); iStockphoto: 583; Library of Congress: 773; Los Angeles County Department of Public Health: 693; Montgomery County, Maryland Government: 680; National Archives and Records Administration: 867, 924, 987; National Institute of Mental Health: 933; National Museum of Health & Medicine: 980; Public Domain via California Indian Education: 699; U.S. Air Force: 961 (Matthew Rosine); U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement: 676; U.S. Navy: 597 (Jennifer L. Jaqua), 604 (Steve Carlson), 633 (Ronald Gutridge), 648 (Alan Gragg), 690 (Steven King), 796 (Adam R. Cole), 920 (Jay C. Pugh), 950 (Michael B. Watkins), 954 (Erica R. Gardner), 965 (Bruce Cummins); White House: 918 (Shealah Craighead); Wikimedia Commons: 526, 536 (Lauren Wood), 545 (Amnon Shavit), 554 (Jef Poskanzer), 565 (John Stephen Dwyer), 573, 587, 611, 644, 656, 709, 713, 721 (Eric Lin), 752, 765, 783, 791, 809, 823, 837, 853 (Sander van der Wel), 862 (GiveWell), 864, 877 (Virginia Reza), 883, 904 (Dane Hillard), 942, 946 (Kendra Williams), 983 (Oregon Department of Transportation), 985 (Salvation Army), 992 (Tim Evanson).

VOLUME 3 Flickr: 1049, 1110, 1145, 1172, 1181, 1190 (Jay Baker), 1205, 1230 (Rod Library), 1247 (Jim Moore), 1256, 1265, 1295 (Greenbelt Alliance), 1319 (Quinn Dombrowski), 1336, 1344 (Rosa Trieu), 1353 (Nicholas A. Tonelli), 1365, 1371; Library of Congress: 1090, 1152; Morguefile: 1103, 1239, 1390; National Archives and Records Administration: 1070; StockXchnge: 1132; USAID: 1119; U.S. Air Force: 1223; U.S. Army: 1003, 1020; U.S. Department of Agriculture: 1288; U.S. Navy: 1128 (Anastasia Puscian); Wikimedia Commons: 1023 (Edward C. deBree), 1037 (National Guard), 1042 (National Guard), 1046, 1054, 1076, 1163, 1196, 1215, 1273, 1286, 1327 (Michael Büker), 1382 (C. G. P. Grey).