Another important government program affecting the lives of elders is Medicaid. This means-tested program pays for health and long-term care for low-income individuals of any age. Medicaid is a major funder of long-term care services for elders because a person needing skilled nursing services for many months or years will likely spend their assets and then become eligible for Medicaid.

Many community-based services are developed and funded throughout the United States through the Older Americans Act (OAA). The OAA supports area agencies on aging, which are referred to as the aging network, which links individuals with information and referral services.

Elder Care Careers and Training

The Association for Gerontology in Higher Education lists seven categories of roles for gerontological specialists: advocacy, direct service provision, education and training, management and administration, marketing and product development, program planning and evaluation, and research. In addition, many professionals specialize in gerontology, including architects, clinical psychologists, counselors, educators and researchers, lawyers, long-term care administrators, nurses, physicians, recreation therapists, rehabilitation therapists, and social workers.

Training

Some gerontology or geriatrics careers require specialized training or testing. Many universities offer coursework in gerontology, through which students can earn certificates, undergraduate minors, majors, or even graduate degrees in gerontology. Physical therapists take an exam to specialize in geriatric care, and occupational therapists submit a portfolio for peer review. Physicians complete an additional year of training and pass an exam to become a geriatrician. Nurses at all levels of certification can obtain a geriatric specialization through coursework and exams.

Coursework on aging covers biology, psychology, and social aspects of aging. Throughout their training, students learn to consider the needs of families and caregivers in addition to the needs of older individuals. Geriatric specialists learn to diagnosis and treat geriatric syndromes, which often have multiple causes and multiple symptoms. According to the American Geriatrics Society (www.americangeriatrics.org), some of these syndromes are malnutrition, sleep problems, delirium, dementia, dizziness, falls, and pressure ulcers.

Janet S. Hahn
Western Michigan University

See Also: Adult Day Care; Age and Clients; Aging and Adult Services; Case Management Services; Home and Community Services; Longitudinal Studies of Aging; Medicare, Medicaid, Nursing Home Care, National Institute on Aging, Senior Services; Protective Services for Adults.

Further Readings

Careers in Aging: Opportunities and Options. Washington, DC: Association for Gerontology in Higher Education, 2004.

Dannefer, Dale and Chris Phillipson. The SAGE Handbook of Social Gerontology. London: Sage, 2010.

Kane, Robert, Joseph Ouslander, Itamar Abrass, and Barbara Resnick. Essentials of Clinical Geriatrics, 7th ed. New York: McGraw Hill, 2013.

"Older Americans 2012: Key Indicators of Well-Being." http://www.agingstats.gov/Main_Site/Data/2012_Documents/Population.aspx (Accessed November 2013).

Emergency Fuel Services

The disruption of power impacts humans in enormous ways, particularly during a natural or human-caused disaster which can leave thousands of people without medical services, potable water, sanitation, critical communications systems, and electrical services for up to several weeks. This is certainly the case for emergency medical services (EMS) systems, a central component of a health care system, and even more acutely so for older patients, those in critical care, and populations that tend to be underserved.

Emergency fuel services refers to the logistical process of petroleum fuel delivered to propane- and diesel-powered backup generators in order to restore and maintain functionality of the infrastructure of emergency medical services, hospital services, and related needs during a large commercial power failure. Logistics include the deployment of backup generators during a power outage or natural or human-caused disaster, as well as the necessary activities to prepare for a disaster, such as routine and emergency fueling, maintenance, inspection, and repairs of emergency fuel delivery and operation systems.

Emergency fuel services are particularly critical in health care because emergency medical operations, hospitals, and other health care facilities cannot operate without power. In a natural or human-caused disaster, resources are needed to provide emergency medical care. The absence of electricity can cause life-threatening loss of oxygen; refrigeration for organ transplant procedures; and critical transportation, including ground transportation of emergency vehicles and air transportation, most notably life-flight procedures.

The Critical Need for Fuel in Medical Services

Health care and medical services, particularly emergency medical transport, are fundamentally petroleum dependent. Hospitals and other health care facilities pose the greatest need for unfailing power delivery ensured by well-maintained standby power systems. The Food and Drug Administration (FDA), Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), and Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) guidelines and mandates specify that backup power is required to guarantee the viability of medical or laboratory equipment for critical applications. Often, however, these guidelines and mandates fall short of specifying the full scope of the backup systems necessary for the applications.

Some studies have analyzed the critical need for fuel in health care, but far more research is needed to assess the use of fuel for EMS, the potential impacts of fuel scarcity on operations, or the strategies to minimize these impacts. One study analyzed the energy needs specifically to describe the location and timing of unmet disaster needs collected in real time through the disaster phases immediately following Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Researchers analyzed 635,983 recorded telephone calls placed from August to December 2005 to the Texas Health and Human Services Commission's Texas 2–1–1 program, which provides assistance in connecting citizens with critical services. Types of unmet needs were studied for specific time periods and locations. Results of the study revealed that of the total 2-1-1 calls placed, 65 percent arose from needs unmet after the hurricanes. The category of transportation and fuel appears to be the lowest subsection of unmet needs (at 4 percent), but it is important to understand the integral fuel needs for nearly all of the remaining, more substantial unmet needs reported in the study: housing and shelter (28 percent), health and safety (18 percent), and food and water (15 percent).

As with the above Texas 2–1–1 study, it is important to not overlook the myriad health care and emergency needs requiring electricity and, in the event of a power outage, fuel to operate emergency backup generators. For example, a specific case study in health care delivery, reported by a team of heating, ventilation, and air conditioning (HVAC) engineers, focused on vaccine implementation. In this case study, a state agency purchased one large refrigerator for central storage of vaccines and three smaller, more mobile refrigerator units in which to store vaccines at remote vaccination centers for its implementation of the CDC Vaccines for Children (VFC) program. Vaccines must be stored in refrigeration below temperatures mandated by the CDC to maintain their potency and viability. The study therefore analyzed the need to deliver emergency fuel and backup generators in the event of a full power outage and proposed a logistics plan.

Petroleum is used widely in health care—primarily it is a transport fuel, but it is also a feedstock for pharmaceuticals, plastics, and medical supplies; few substitutes for it are available. This dependence theoretically makes health care vulnerable to petroleum supply shifts, but this vulnerability has not been empirically assessed. An analysis to quantify key aspects of petroleum use in health care and explore historical associations between petroleum supply stocks and health care prices confirms that petroleum products are intrinsic to modern health care and that petroleum supply shifts can affect health care prices. In anticipation of future supply contractions lasting longer than previous shifts and potentially disrupting health care delivery, the study proposes an adaptive management approach and outlines its application to the example of emergency medical services and petroleum-intensive activities such as home health services and emergency medical transport of patients. (Staff transport is actually health care's largest category of petroleum use, but there are no published data on health care personnel transport.)

There is no doubt that modern medicine worldwide relies on petroleum, particularly to transport patients, staff, and supplies, and to manufacture supplies and pharmaceuticals. This reliance is particularly heavy in the United States, which consumes petroleum disproportionately on a per capita basis compared with other nations. There is increasing consensus that petroleum production has already declined or will soon begin to decline and that constrained supplies will adversely affect most sectors, including health care.

Several authors have highlighted health care's exposure to declines in petroleum production, but the issue has received little attention from economists or policy makers, and little has been done to further assess and manage the potential risk. Renewable power sources that do not depend on utility power are needed to help raise the level of comfort and keep critical loads and business equipment operating. Renewable resources, such as photovoltaic, biomass, geothermal, small hydro, solar thermal, and wind, have attractive security attributes and reduce the risk of pipeline interruptions and central station outages. They are an environmentally benign and inexhaustible source of energy.

Best Practices in Energy-Efficient Health Care

Dell Children's Medical Center in Austin, Texas, has implemented an integrated hybrid energy plant providing the 35,000-square-foot facility with power, chilled water, and steam. The system is connected to the itKal grid, giving it flexibility during normal operations and the ability to switch to what is known as island-mode operation, functioning completely separately from the power grid, in the event of a power grid outage.

The Dell Children's Medical Center energy system is central to the medical center's award of the Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design (LEED) EAl efficiency credit, the first hospital in the nation to earn this highest award of energy efficiency by the U.S. Green Building Council (USGBC), a nonprofit organization committed to a prosperous and sustainable future for the United States through cost-efficient and energy-saving green buildings.

Public health researchers and practitioners argue that the need for sustainable practices and independence from nonrenewable energy sources will avoid what they deem to be an inevitable crisis of petroleum scarcity. Researchers, practitioners, policy makers, and energy companies must all be actively involved in finding sustainable solutions. They note the need to clearly identify the explicit and often overlooked connections among all aspects of dependence on power as these connections relate to health and medical care, most notably but certainly not limited to emergency medical services.

Researchers have focused specifically on the critical response needs that would emerge in a future influenza or other pandemic in an energy-challenged situation. Connections among global economic conditions, energy availability, and public health are far more extensive than nearly anyone can comprehend, and health researchers and practitioners, particularly those in public health, need to be central in the consideration of energy sustainability.

Lara Lengel
Stephanie Salerno
Bowling Green State University

See Also: Emergency Medical Care; Natural Disasters, Service for; Pandemics; Policing and Safety; Public Health; Refugee Assistance; Rural Communities; Senior Services; Social and Economic Justice; Transportation Services; Trauma-Focused Services; Urban Communities and Human Services; Victim Services.

Further Readings

Frumkin, Howard, Jeremy J. Hess, and Stephen Vindigni. "Energy and Public Health: The Challenge of Peak Petroleum." Public Health Reports, v.124 (2009).

Hess, Jeremy J., Daniel Bednarz, Jaeyong Bae, and Jessica Pierce. "Petroleum and Health Care: Evaluating and Managing Health Care's Vulnerability to Petroleum Supply Shifts." American Journal of Public Health, v.101 (2011).

Hess, Jeremy J. and Lawrence A. Greenberg. "Fuel Use in a Large, Hospital-Based, Dynamically Deployed Emergency Medical Service." Prehospital and Disaster Medicine, v.26 (2011).

Mishra, Kirti Bhushan, Klaus-Dieter Wehrstedt, and Holger Krebs. "Lessons Learned From Recent Fuel Storage Fires." Fuel Processing Technology, v.107 (2013).

Monroe, A. T. "Gasoline Costs and Treatment Choices." Journal of the American Medical Association, v.29 (2008).

Osterholm, Michael T. and Nicholas S. Kelley. "Energy and the Public's Health: Making the Connection." Public Health Reports, v.124 (2009).

Schwartz B. S., C. L. Parker, Jeremy J. Hess, and Howard Frumkin. "Public Health and Medicine in an Age of Energy Scarcity: The Case of Petroleum." American Journal of Public Health, v.101 (2011).

Young, J. R. "Emergency Power for Critical Items." American Institute of Physics Conference Proceedings, v.1157 (2009).

Emergency Medical Care

Emergency medical care within the United States and most Western societies is a medical specialty that provides treatment for individuals who suffer from acute conditions or injuries that need immediate attention. Such conditions threaten patients' lives, eyesight, limbs, or mobility. These ailments can be physical and can include harms related to maternity and psychiatry. Other emergency situations require the alleviation of severe pain that could be symptomatic of a life-threatening condition, such as cardiac arrest.

In most facilities in the United States, the primary purpose of emergency care is to stabilize, manage, or diagnose patients in distress. A patient might receive a diagnosis after being admitted for one or more symptoms, such as chest pains, trauma or injury, obstructed breathing, poisoning, assault, or any other serious event requiring medical attention. Emergency care is often confused with urgent care, which attends to medical conditions that require serious attention, but do not pose a threat to life, limb, or eyesight. Examples of urgent care conditions are a physical symptom that signals an early stage of cancer or a physical injury to the mouth that requires dental care.

Emergency medical care is intended to be short term, and patients may be referred for long-term care or receive treatment that alleviates the medical condition. Following treatment during emergency medical care, patients often need to follow up with their primary care physicians or with a clinic. This is especially true if the acute condition is symptomatic of a chronic or ongoing problem. Despite the importance of seeking emergency medical care to address critical issues, disparities exist among populations who seek and receive care. In particular, racial and income-related disparities may exist due to lack of access to care, or there may be prejudice and discrimination on the part of providers.

Emergency medical care requires extensive knowledge of many skills, such as clearing blocked airways, relocating fractured or dislocated bones, suturing lacerations, stopping bleeding, treating or stopping heart attacks, combating drug and substance overdoses, and delivering babies, among many other procedures often performed in emergency situations. Emergency care providers not only serve patients for acute and urgent conditions; they also function to protect public health and safety as well as to prevent disease and injury. Through the interventions and treatments they provide, emergency medical care professionals often address conditions, disasters, or epidemics that potentially threaten the health and safety of others. Such behaviors and illnesses include substance abuse, human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection, undiagnosed mental disorders, and domestic and interpersonal violence, among other medical and safety issues.

Locations of Emergency Medical Care

Emergency medical care can be found in local hospitals, short-term emergency facilities, intensive-care units, and other locations where acute treatment is available. Not all locations are easily accessible by disenfranchised populations, especially by people who live in rural or underserved areas, which often are occupied by ethnic or cultural minorities. In addition to static locations, emergency care is required in the wake of disasters, crises, and terrorist attacks—cases in which medical professionals (e.g., emergency physicians, first responders, emergency medical services staff) would be required to go to the location of the disaster.

Emergency Medical Care Providers

Medical schools across the United States have a total of 76 emergency medicine care departments, and more than 120 emergency medicine residency programs are offered throughout North America. Emergency care fellows and interns can receive training in a subspecialty, such as hyperbaric medicine, palliative medicine, research, toxicology, pediatrics, sports medicine, or critical care, among others. The board that certifies the emergency care specialty is the American Board of Emergency Medicine, which conferred its first certification in 1980.

Physicians and registered nurses typically are traditional emergency medical care providers. In many cases, however, these professionals are not the first people patients see in an emergency. In addition to those who work in hospital emergency departments, first responders might arrive first on the scene, such as the home of a patient suffering a heart attack or the scene of a traffic accident. First responders often work with emergency medical services (EMS), including ambulance drivers, emergency medical technicians, medical dispatchers, paramedics, ambulance care assistants, and other professionals who provide basic life support at the primary scene of the emergency.

Emergency medical technicians in New York City transport a woman to the hospital as the woman's mother and son stand nearby hugging. Emergency medical care within the United States and most Western societies is a specialty that provides treatment for individuals who suffer from acute conditions or injuries that need immediate attention.

Physicians and other staff who work in emergency medical care are often overworked because their department is likely understaffed. Understaffing and the hectic atmosphere often associated with emergency medical care can leave many providers stressed and anxious. Because of the high volume of patients seeking emergency care, physicians and staff might experience a sense of helplessness when they are too busy or hassled to feel or show compassion and caring for their patients. Furthermore, perceived cultural differences between staff and patients can add to the stress, especially when language barriers make it difficult for patients to understand information and physician recommendations.

To show compliance or deference to their physicians, patients of a different cultural background or language might be passive or remain silent, even if they have questions or might have reservations about following the doctor's advice after leaving the emergency department. Cultural awareness and training of medical personnel in diversity, in addition to hiring diverse emergency care providers, can help close the gap in unequal access to emergency medical care.

As with other health care professionals, emergency care providers would benefit from communication skills to build rapport with their patients as well as assess medical situations. Unfortunately, evaluating the emergency situation often yields a limited view of the problem, and emergency care providers typically are unable to build and maintain patient relationships in order to better understand their patients' conditions in the same way other specialists can. In addition, emergency care providers often don't have access to patients' medical records, which can make evaluation and diagnosis difficult.

Public Use of Emergency Medical Care

For many individuals in the United States, the emergency room is the primary or only means of receiving basic health care, partly due to the lack of insurance or the inability to pay for traditional doctor visits. This situation was especially true prior to the implementation of the Affordable Care Act (known as Obamacare). Emergency care departments are typically understaffed and overcrowded, partly because laws require them to treat anyone who seeks care regardless of their ability to pay. In addition, emergency departments tend to be understaffed because they are often viewed by hospital administrators as a financial burden rather than a major source of income.

Providers who work in emergency medical care often encounter depressed, anxious, or even difficult patients. These difficulties might result from the trauma experienced by the patient, such as a heart attack or an accident, or stem from psychological issues, such as anxiety, post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), or other clinical conditions. The PTSD might even stem from an issue that is more physical in nature. For instance, patients seen in the emergency room for gunshot wounds, suicide attempts, sexual assault, cardiac arrest, or any other stressful event might already be exhibiting signs of PTSD, which can range from exhibiting fear or terror to feeling numb. Emergency room providers and staff are typically aware of and prepared for such patients, and physicians can prescribe medications that can sedate and treat patients whose symptoms do not subside.

Juliann C. Scholl
Texas Tech University

See Also: Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Community-Based Services; Crisis Services; Dental Services; Domestic Violence; Health Insurance; Hospitals; Information and Referral; Interpersonal Violence; Medical Necessity; Natural Disasters, Service for; Palliative Care; Pandemics; Public Health; Suicide Prevention Services; Uninsured Clients; Women, Battered.

Further Reading

Cone, D. C., L. D. Richardson, K. H. Todd, J. R. Betancourt, and R. A. Lowe. "Health Care Disparities in Emergency Medicine." Academic Emergency Medicine, v.10 (2003).

du Pré, Athena. Communicating About Health: Current Issues and Perspectives, 3rd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2010.

van Servellen, Gwen. Communication Skills for the Health Care Professional, 2nd ed. Boston: Jones and Bartlett, 2009.

"What Is Emergency Medicine?" Yale School of Medicine. http://medicine.yale.edu/emergencymed/whatis.aspx (Accessed November 2013).

"What is EMS?" National Highway Traffic Safety Commission. http://ems.gov/whatisEMS.htm (Accessed November 2013).

Emic and Etic

The words emic and etic describe standpoints or strategies for the study of human behavior. These terms distinguish approaches that seek to understand the meaning of an event within the specific cultural frame of the people observed (emic approaches) from those that assess human behavior within social scientific or professional frames of understanding (etic approaches).

In the context of human services, an emic approach seeks to understand what it is that actors in a social group perceive as problems or possibilities and how they may seek to explain, imagine, and influence the world. An etic approach instead shifts the perspective to that of the observer; the categories of assessment or inquiry that become important from an etic perspective are those that the researcher or professional applies across diverse contexts.

Origin

Linguist Kenneth Pike coined these two terms in 1954. Pike's proposed difference between emic and etic studies came from an analogy with the linguistic terms phonemic and phonetic. Phonemes are the sets of sounds produced in a particular language that are distinguishable by native speakers from other sets of sounds. Phonetics, on the other hand, is the field of study concerned with speech sounds, classified in categories devised by linguists, and presumed by some scholars to be universal. Pike distinguished emic and etic approaches as different standpoints from which an observer can describe human behavior. Emic approaches are attempts to discover and describe the pattern of a particular language or culture from the point of view of its speakers or actors. Etic approaches describe newly found data in reference to existing classificatory systems devised prior to the study. For Pike, emic standpoints are internally focused on the relationship of behaviors and events within a larger pattern, whereas etic studies require that analysts stand outside of the behavior and events they observe in order to compare them to behavior and events in other cultures and groups.

By the 1970s, these terms were in widespread use in anthropology, introduced by the influential anthropologist Marvin Harris, who applied the terms somewhat differently than did Pike. For Harris, emic and etic approaches are different strategies of research, distinguished by the operations of the observers. Emic descriptions are those that elicited accounts of values, intentions, meanings, groups, and practices. Etic accounts, in contrast, are accounts of human behavior described without attempting to infer or elicit choices or dispositions. Harris argued that an etic behavioral record was required to identify unexpected outcomes or aggregate consequences of individual behavior.

Human Services

Since the 1980s, the terms have found widespread use in human services. In this literature, the distinctions between emic and etic are often used in ways that overlap other opposite terms to which they are related but not synonymous with the usages as defined by Pike and Harris. Examples include insider versus outsider perspectives, mentalist versus behaviorist, or subjective knowledge versus scientific knowledge.

Within human services, these terms are particularly prevalent in literature that addresses cross-cultural encounters in professional contexts, such as medicine, psychology, counseling, education, and social work. Some scholars in these arenas encourage human services professionals to strive to understand the knowledge and meaning of problems from the perspective of those whom they seek to help as well as from the professional perspectives of the helper.

For example, it is possible to study child abuse from an etic perspective by assessing the distribution of the problem and its statistical correlates, including the characteristics of people who are involved in it and the interventions that have been applied and evaluated elsewhere to address the problem. Some scholars of cross-cultural practice, however, encourage professionals to also seek an emic perspective, prompting them to seek to understand why those accused of child abuse are behaving as they do, what meaning they assign to the events, and what help they may seek.

To use another example, an etic approach to the effects of welfare reform might measure the results in terms of predetermined criteria such as the size of welfare caseloads, or the level of labor force participation by adult recipients of assistance. An emic approach to this same subject might explore women who are seeking welfare benefits for their families, or strive to understand the meaning of welfare reform to children whose parents strive to meet the demands of revised welfare regulation.

Lynn M. Nybell
Eastern Michigan University

See Also: Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Ethnocentrism and Ethnorelativism; Help-Seeking Behavior, Cultural Differences in; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and.

Further Readings

Headland, T., K. Pike, and M. Harris, eds. Emics and Etics: The Insider/Outsider Debate. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 1990.

Pedersen, P. B., J. G. Draguns, W. J. Lonner, and J. E. Trimble. Counseling Across Cultures, 6th ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2007.

Pike, K. Language in Relation to a Unified Structure of Human Behavior, Part 1. Glendale, CA: Summer Institute of Linguistics, 1954.

Eminent Domain

Eminent domain allows governments (federal, state, or local) to take privately owned property for public use. The right to take privately owned property by eminent domain is an exceptional right of the government that must be balanced between the rights of the private property owner and the benefits to the public. In some cases, the property taken is in an area with a diverse population of citizens. Even though the owner of the private property must receive just compensation from the government for the property, these owners may not be able to recreate the unique aspects of their diverse community, including their businesses, community centers, services, and familial relationships. Human services practitioners should be aware that the use of eminent domain might irreparably change the nature of diverse communities. Thus, they should educate citizens regarding both the opportunities and pitfalls of the government's use of eminent domain to take private property. A summary of eminent domain is provided in this article, along with issues that may arise when faced with the prospect of property being taken by eminent domain.

The Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution gives the power to the government to take private property; however, this same amendment also provides the private property owner with rights under the due process clause. Specific guidelines govern taking property under eminent domain: (1) private property must be involved, (2) the private property must be taken, (3) the private property must be taken for a public use, and (4) the owner of the private property must receive just compensation.

Use of Eminent Domain

The government owns lands used for roads, utilities, and other government functions. However, expansion may require that the government acquire adjacent privately owned property. The government can take for public purposes all or a portion of the private property. Historically, the government would take privately owned lands for infrastructure expansion, such as for roads or additional utilities. However, the government has also taken private land for purposes such as to improve blighted areas or for economic development. Blight has not been universally defined, but it typically refers to an area that has properties that appear deteriorated or run down, have unpaid taxes that exceed the value of the properties, or are currently in such condition that they impact the vibrancy and safety of the neighborhood. In many cases, individuals living in blighted areas are people of color or those with a lower income or socioeconomic class. The government, in utilizing its power of eminent domain to take private property in blighted areas, may disproportionately affect these individuals. In these areas, owners of private property or renters living in privately owned property might be displaced simply based on where they live. The compensation provided by the government may be considered just, but it may not fully compensate property owners for reestablishing their lives, schools, communities, and connections to their neighbors.

In addition, although the government can utilize eminent domain to take land for public purposes, communities and private property owners must remain vigilant to ensure that the land is not turned over to private developers to redevelop the land for private purposes. The definition of public purposes has expanded to include economic development to revitalize an area. Economic development can include a number of land uses including commercial, residential, and recreational uses.

Challenges to Eminent Domain

Even though the government can legally use eminent domain for economic development purposes, private property owners recently have challenged this use of eminent domain. In 2005, the U.S. Supreme Court heard the case of Kelo v. City of New London (Connecticut), in which private property owners challenged the need of the government to take their property for economic development purposes. In this case, the private property owners owned land where the city of New London planned economic development. The plan for economic development included the construction of a waterfront hotel, retail stores, office space, restaurants, residences, marina, and support services. The proposed new development was expected to add approximately 1,000 new jobs, increase tax revenues, and revitalize the waterfront areas. The land needed by the city was planned to be taken by eminent domain.

Of the 15 private property owners in the area targeted for development, all but nine of them sold their land to the city. The nine property owners who refused to sell did not believe their property was in a blighted area or in poor condition. Essentially, the nine property owners argued that this public domain-taking was not for public purposes. The case was heard by the lower courts and ultimately was heard by the U.S. Supreme Court, which held that economic development would benefit the public by generating tax revenues and was a public purpose. The court determined that eminent domain could be used to take privately owned land in this case. Therefore, the nine private property owners lost their case.

As a result of this Supreme Court case, at least 44 states have implemented laws to limit or suspend the use of eminent domain for economic development purposes. However, at this time economic development is considered a public purpose and thus the government can still take private property for economic development purposes using eminent domain.

Compensation

As stated, the government must pay the private property owner just compensation if the property is taken for public uses. Therefore, the value of the property must be determined. The government utilizes an appraisal process to determine the value of the property. An appraiser determines the current value of the property considering, for example, the value of the land and any improvements on the property, access to roads, how the property is used, zoning of the property, nearby businesses, whether the property is rented and the value of the rents, and any recent sales of similar property. Based on the appraisal and any other factors relevant to the property, the government determines the value of the property and the price it wants to offer the property owner. If the property owner agrees with the appraised value of the property and accepts the offer from the government, then the government buys the property. If the property owner does not agree to the price offered by the government, then the matter proceeds to a condemnation proceeding. Condemnation proceedings vary by state, but generally the process formalizes taking by eminent domain and involves a proceeding and notice to the private property owner that the government is taking the property. The property owner has due process rights and an opportunity also to offer an appraised valuation of the property. The property owner presents this appraised value in an effort to gain agreement with the government on a price for the property.

The private property owner may also assert that the government is taking a larger portion of the property than is required for public use. If the private property owner is successful in making a case against taking the entire property for public use, then the government will pay the owner just compensation for the portion of the property taken. In this case, the land will be divided to include both private and public use. For example, the private owner may sell the government a portion of land to build a road, and the remaining land owned by the private owner may contain the family home located in close proximity to the road. Private property owners should consider the impact of sharing their remaining privately owned property with the nearby public use. Over time, the value of the privately owned property could be impacted either positively or negatively. These concerns should be factored into the value of the property when private property owners consider what price to accept when selling their private property to the government.

Conclusion

Eminent domain provides the government a mechanism to take private property for public use if it justly compensates private property owners. Over time, however, the government has begun declaring areas as blighted in order to take private property for economic development. In response, private citizens are keeping a watchful eye on government officials' use of blight to take private property by eminent domain in an effort to limit taking private property for for-profit ventures.

Edwina Thomas Washington
University of Memphis

See Also: Housing Services; Primacy of Place; Rural Communities.

Further Readings

Hoyman, M. M. and J. R. McCall. "'Not Imminent in My Domain!' County Leaders' Attitude Toward Eminent Domain Decisions." Public Administration Review, v.70/6 (2010).

Jackson, J. T. “What Is Property? Property Is Theft: The Lack of Social Justice in U.S. Eminent Domain Law.” St. John’s Law Review, v.84 (2011).

Kelo v. New London. 545 U.S. 469, 2005.

Saginor, J. and J. F. McDonald. “Eminent Domain: A Review of the Issues.” Journal of Real Estate Literature, v.17/1 (2009).

Employee Assistance Programs

Employee assistance programs (EAPs) are workplace human services that make up part of the fringe benefits system found in employment. EAPs constitute an important facet of diversity in human services because they are an important point of access to behavioral health services for U.S. workers who would otherwise not have access to prevention and treatment services for mental health and substance abuse issues.

Approximately 65 percent of U.S. employers offer EAP services to their employees and their families. EAPs were designed to identify and address issues related to employees whose personal problems impacted their performance at work. The core functions of EAPs later broadened to helping workplaces improve the health and productivity of the overall organization by providing consultation, training, and evaluation to strategic business groups within organizations as a way to promote the organizations’ investment in human capital, address the costs of doing business, and minimize business risk. At the individual employee level, EAPs address issues encountered by troubled employees through the use of professional human service skills to identify, assess, refer, and/or treat employees and their families. Key health and wellness concerns addressed by EAPs are mental health, substance abuse, and marital, financial, legal, and stress-related issues that affect job performance.

EAP professionals come from a variety of health professions (psychologists, marriage and family therapists, substance abuse specialists, occupational nurses, and occupational social workers) and work in a range of settings (hospitals, mental health clinics, unions, EAP companies, managed care organizations, and employer organizations). EAP counselors typically have a master’s degree in one of the human services fields; some hold a designation as a Certified Employee Assistance Counselor (CEAC).

Employees can access EAP services under a voluntary or mandatory referral process. Voluntary referrals are made through a self-referral process (or at the suggestion of a supervisor, colleague, or friend). Mandatory referrals are usually the outcome of a corrective strategy made by supervisors when an employee is not meeting performance standards. Employees can access services by telephone, in person, or over the Internet, typically depending on the location of the services themselves. Onsite programs provide services to employees at the workplace. Off-site programs provide services to employees in the community. Many employers offer their employees a combination of on-site, off-site, and Web-based services.

The Business Case for EAPs

The business case for EAPs operates from the premise that EAP services can help reduce the cost of employee absences, presenteeism, workplace injuries, and turnover by working within the organization to address the health and wellness of all employees. Presenteeism—the practice of coming to work when ill, injured, or distracted by other concerns—is the leading cause behind the total cost of worker illness and lost productivity at work.

The costs of employee absences are estimated to represent 36 percent of total payroll costs. Employee injury costs are an estimated $250 billion per year. Turnover costs associated with replacing employees can cost organizations as much as $60,000 per employee. EAPs reduce these costs by working with supervisors and other key business partners to address these risk areas through targeted (individual) or broad (organization-level) approaches.

The prevalence of mental health and substance abuse in the United States, coupled with the fact that the majority of people with these issues receive little to no treatment, make the need for EAPs imperative. Prevalence rates from the 2009 National Survey on Drug Use and Health estimate 45.1 million adults had a mental illness during the past year and 8.9 million had a substance use disorder. Among the 11.4 million U.S. adults aged 18 years or older with a serious mental illness in the past year, 11.1 percent were also employed. Mental illness impacts work productivity through increased absences, presenteeism, and turnover. Research has found that employees who suffer from depression, compared to their coworkers without this condition, are twice as likely to miss work for health reasons and seven times more likely to be ineffective at work. The National Institutes of Health reports serious mental illness to cost $193.2 billion per year in lost earnings.

Substance abuse rates similarly impact employer bottom lines through increased absences, presenteeism, accidents, and turnover. Prevalence rates for alcohol consumption among working adults suggest that the majority of working adults consume alcohol regularly. The 2009 National Survey on Drug Use and Health (NSDUH) reported that 64 percent of full-time employed adults reported drinking alcohol. Among the 56.5 million adult binge drinkers, 42.1 million (74.4 percent) were employed either full- or part-time. Of the 15.5 million heavy drinkers, 11.6 million (74.9 percent) were employed. Substance abuse costs workplaces an estimated $120 billion per year due to lost productivity at work.

Stress due to work is also a major concern for employers because it continues to be a leading cause of illness and lost productivity for most employers. A survey on work stress conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics found that the median number of work absences was 23 days per year, four times the incidence of nonfatal workplace injuries and illnesses. Stress has also been linked to presenteeism, a leading cause of lost productivity at work. Other issues of concern thought to impact work performance are financial issues, marital distress, and poor financial planning. These issues are often made more complex because they tend to appear in conjunction with both mental health and substance abuse concerns.

History of Employee Assistance Programs

Modern-day EAPs grew from welfare capitalism, which developed in response to increasing worker

Employee assistance programs (EAPs) constitute a critical facet of diversity in human services. Employees can access these services under a voluntary or mandatory referral process. EAPs are an important point of access to behavioral health services for U.S. workers who would otherwise not have access to prevention and treatment services for mental health and substance abuse issues.

dissatisfaction during the late stages of the Industrial Revolution. Welfare capitalism describes services provided by early industries for the benefit of workers. Often, companies would provide their workers with housing, education, medical services, recreation, and social activities. These benefits were a means to counter growing unionism as well as a belief that these services increased productivity and profits by signaling to workers that employers cared about their well-being.

Two features within welfare capitalism led to the later development of EAPs: (1) employers began to address employee problem drinking, and (2) the growth of the use of social secretaries to address other personnel issues. Problem drinking had long been recognized as an issue that costs organizations money through increased employee absenteeism, illness, accidents, and turnover. The development of effective treatment approaches to alcoholism resulted in the growth of early occupational alcoholism programs that were then placed within employer organizations. Social secretaries emerged later, during the 1920s; their function was to improve communication between the employers and their workers and help manage personal problems impacting work performance.

EAPs began as internal programs within large organizations and were part of human resource departments. Once managed behavioral health organizations (MBHOs) began to take over behavioral health services during the 1990s, EAPs became associated with benefit services. The entry of MBHOs into the EAP market changed the structure, function, and scope of services. Organizations began to contract out EAP services to third-party providers as a way to manage behavioral health care costs. This model of service became known as an external model. Modern EAPs are managed as internal and/or external units. Their form and function is often contingent on the resources and requirements of the organization. The commodification and quality of services provided by these external providers has been criticized for being uneven, fragmented, uncoordinated, and duplicative in terms of both costs and benefits. The Mental Health Parity Act of 2009 was meant to counter the use of caps and limits imposed on behavioral health services by MBHOs.

EAPs have recently begun to expand their service and focus to realign with the diverse needs of organizations. This reorganization has involved expansion of services into consulting and legal/financial management; new populations such as disaster victims and refugees; integration with work/life services; and focusing more programming on prevention, early intervention, and health and wellness services. This shift is partly due to an increased emphasis within organizations on workplace diversity, work/family issues, and health promotion as cost-saving strategies that can enhance the health of organizations.

Lisa M. Stewart
California State University, Monterey Bay

See Also: Health Care Delivery, Models of Care; Mental Health Services, Adult; Workplace Health Services.

Further Readings

Akabas, S. H. and P. A. Kurtzman. Work and the Workplace: A Resource for Innovative Policy and Practice. New York: Columbia University Press, 2004.

"Annual Total Direct and Indirect Costs of Serious Mental Illness." National Institute of Mental Health. http://www.nimh.nih.gov/statistics/4COST_TOTAN.shtml (Accessed June 2013).

Attridge, M., et al. "History and Growth of the EAP Field." EASNA Research Notes, v.1/1 (2009).

"EAP Core Technology." Employee Assistance Professionals Association, 2008. http://www.eapassn.org/public/pages/index.cfm?pageid=521 (Accessed June 2013).

Gornick, M. E. and B. R. Blair. "Employee Assistance, Work-Life Effectiveness, and Health and Productivity: A Conceptual Framework for Integration." In M. Attridge, P. A. Herlihy, and R. P. Maiden, eds. The Integration of Employee Assistance, Work/Life, and Wellness Services. New York: Haworth Press, 2005.

"Issues in Labor Statistics: Summary 99-10, September, 1-2; Occupational Stress." U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics. http://www.bls.gov/opub/ils/pdf/opbils35.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

Leigh, P. J. "Economic Burden of Occupational Injury and Illness in the U.S." Millbank Quarterly, v.89/4 (2011).

Masi, D. A. "Employee Assistance Programs in the New Millennium." International Journal of Emergency Mental Health, v.7/3 (2005).

"Results from the 2011 National Survey on Drug Use and Health: Summary of National Findings." NSDUH Series H-44, HHS Publication No. (SMA) 12-4713. Rockville, MD: Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, 2012.
Sharar, D. A. "The Changing Nature and Future of EAPs." Journal of Employee Assistance, v.39/2 (2009).
"The Total Financial Impact of Employee Absences: Survey Highlights." Mercer. http://www.fmlainsights.com/mercer-survey-highlights%5B1%5D.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

Employment/Career Assistance Services

The field of employment and career assistance services encompasses a broad range of activities, including vocational guidance within educational and social service institutions; governmental job training and job placement programs; and special services for population segments, such as veterans, the disabled, ex-prisoners, and individuals reentering the labor market after a long hiatus (e.g., former stay-at-home mothers seeking work after their children are grown). Because the world of work is constantly changing, those providing employment and career assistance services must be aware not only of the current and projected demand for particular skills and occupations, but also of the changing social context of work and patterns of employment.

Although they are often equated, it is useful to think of the terms job, career, and vocation as referring to separate entities. The most specific term is job, which refers to a particular instance of employment. Career refers to a more general pattern of employment—for instance, one could have a career in engineering that would include many separate jobs within the general field of engineering. Finally, vocation refers to a strong feeling, based on intuition or emotion as well as reason, that a person may have that they were meant to work in a particular field or at a particular job. Historically, the term vocation was used for the calling some people felt to enter the priesthood, or to become a monk or a nun, but the term is also used today to refer to secular occupations, so someone may feel they have a vocation to teach or to become a writer or a physician. Ironically, vocational education often means something quite different—to prepare an individual for a particular job, sometimes at the expense of their general or academic education—but it is rare that the two disparate meanings of vocation are confused.

These distinctions are important because the individual seeking employment and career assistance may have different priorities and motivations than the person providing the assistance or the governmental or other organization funding the assistance. For instance, employment services provided by the state to unemployed individuals may be focused primarily on placing them in any job that seems a reasonable fit, whereas the individuals may feel more strongly about what type of work they want to do. Similarly, a vocational guidance counselor in an educational institution may be most concerned with providing practical advice to students based on the expected demand for particular skills or occupations, whereas the students may feel they have a vocation to enter a field where steady employment is rare.

The number of people who persist in artistic careers (e.g., acting or writing), despite the well-known facts about how difficult it is to make a living in those fields, provides strong evidence that there is more to career choice than calculating the expected monetary rewards. Conversely, some people have criticized guidance counselors for urging students to "do what you love" and incurring large amounts of student debt with few prospects of earning enough to pay back the loans. It has been proposed that students at state universities in Florida who choose to study less practical or vocationally oriented subjects (such as the arts) should pay higher tuition than those in fields such as engineering or the hard sciences.

Attitudes toward employment and career assistance have also changed over the years. Today, it is rare for individuals to hold a single job over their lifetimes, and thus, for most people, greater emphasis should be placed on acquiring general skills and a flexible attitude toward employment rather than preparing for a single, highly specialized job. According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, people born between 1957 and 1964 held an average of 11.7 jobs between the ages of 18 and 46 years, with only 10 percent holding four or fewer jobs.

Attitudes have also changed concerning who is suitable for what type of career—for instance, women composed 4 percent of physicians in the United States in 1905, 7.6 percent in 1970, and 25 percent in 2004; in 2003, for the first time, half of new medical school students were female.

Various types of tests are available to assist in the employment and career assistance process, although the results of any test should be considered in the context of other information, including an individual's interests, experience, and academic background. Some tests are based on determining an individual's personality type and then matching that type with jobs. The Myers-Briggs Type Indicator (MBTI), based on the theory of Carl Jung, assigned individuals into psychological types based on four dimensions: extraversion or introversion, sensing or intuition, thinking or feeing, and judging or perceiving. The belief is that an individual's psychological type, determined by the MBTI, can then be used to suggest occupations that might suit him or her.

The Keirsey Temperament Sorter assigns individuals to one of four types: artisans, guardians, idealists, or rationals. Each of the four types has two roles, and each role has two variants. For instance, guardians are divided into administrators (further divided into inspectors and supervisors) or conservators (further divided into protectors and providers). As with the MBTI, certain jobs and careers are believed to be associated with certain temperaments.

In contrast, some tests used in employment and career assistance aim to evaluate concrete aptitudes and achievements. One of the best known tests of this type is the Armed Services Vocational Aptitude Battery (ASVAB), introduced in 1968, which is used both by the armed services and in many U.S. schools. In its current form, the ASVAB consists of 225 questions in nine subfields: general science, arithmetic reasoning, word knowledge, paragraph comprehension, mathematics knowledge, electronics information, auto and shop information, mechanical comprehension, and assembling objects. ASVAB scores are reported in percentiles, ranging from 1 to 99, and specific aptitude areas are associated with specific occupations. For instance, scores on the verbal, arithmetic reasoning, and mathematics knowledge would be considered particularly relevant for someone interested in entering a clerical profession.

Sarah Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Literacy; Disability Services; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Diversity in the Workplace; Hispanic Immigrants; Military Veterans; Prisoner Reentry Programs; Veterans Services.

Further Readings

Campbell, Valencia. Advice from the Top: What Minority Women Say about Their Career Success. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2009.

Herr, Edwin L. "Trends in the History of Vocational Guidance." The Career Development Quarterly, v.61 (September 2013).

King, Eden and Jennifer Knight. How Women Can Make it Work: The Science of Success. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2011.

"National Longitudinal Surveys: Frequently Asked Questions." Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor. http://www.bls.gov/nls/nlsfaqs.htm#anch41 (Accessed December 2013).

Wallace, Dee and Laura Wyckoff. Going to Work With a Criminal Record: Lessons from the Fathers at Work Initiative. Philadelphia: Working Ventures, 2008.

Walsh, W. Bruce, ed. Career Counseling for African Americans. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 2001.

Yellin, Susan and Christina Cacioppo Bertsch. Life After High School: A Guide for Students with Disabilities and Their Families. Philadelphia: Jessica Kingsley Publishers, 2010.

Zunker, Vernon G. Career Counseling: A Holistic Approach, 8th ed. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole/Cengage Learning, 2012.

Empowerment Research

Empowerment research is an essential component in the emerging role of science in informing the delivery of culturally and socially competent human services. Empowerment research differs from traditional approaches to research in the health and social sciences in that it aims to invert the typical top-down research process in which research participants' own knowledge and expertise are subjugated and viewed as less valuable than the knowledge and expertise of the scientist.

The empowerment stance in social science research has been informed by a number of ongoing trends, including multicultural psychology, social justice research, participatory research, and positive psychology. The impact of researchers adopting an empowerment approach in social science research has been considerable, particularly with regard to the reporting of research findings that represent the lived experience of members of marginalized groups.

The Need for Empowerment Research

Traditional research in the health and social sciences has been criticized for employing research methods that disempower research participants. Critics of the traditional research approach challenge the pervasive assumption that it is possible to create a bias-free science in which objective observation derives neutral information on which all rational individuals can agree. The claim of neutrality has been criticized for denying power differentials between researchers and participants, hence not fully acknowledging the risk of exploitative and damaging research practices to vulnerable populations, however unintentionally. This is true especially as it pertains to marginalized and oppressed groups that have little access to resources and power, such as women, indigenous people, people of color, refugees, and those living in poverty. Furthermore, social sciences have been criticized as being dominated by Western psychological perspectives and theories. Much research has been said to resemble a colonialist approach in which researchers enter communities uninvited and exploit existing resources and structures in order to gather data that are of no benefit to the communities under study. Empowerment research addresses this issue by assuring that researchers must follow the needs and wishes of the communities with which they work, thereby shaping methods, data, and theory that are decidedly community-driven.

Empowerment Research in Action

Empowerment research invites researchers to ally themselves with members of marginalized communities to collaboratively identify critical issues, design studies to illuminate these issues, and ultimately create action for social change. Much of this work has taken the form of participatory action research (PAR), an approach characterized by anti-oppressive, power-sharing projects. In PAR, university (or other professional) researchers do not conduct studies on community members, they conduct studies with community members on issues of local relevance and interest. Joining together in PAR teams, professional and community researchers have tackled many different kinds of local concerns around the world, including issues related to wellness, education, and environmental conditions, and have contributed new knowledge, services, and policy initiatives in the process.

An example of empowerment research includes a 2007 project by Lisa Goodman and colleagues. Their ROAD (Reaching Out About Depression) project was organized by a network of counseling and law school faculty and students in collaboration with a group of low-income women in Boston. ROAD's goal was the discovery of alternative solutions for depression for women in the community, and the project group met with community members in their homes to conduct collaborative meetings and workshops and to support community members in carrying out project functions of direct benefit to them.

A second example involves the development of Anti-Oppression Advocacy (AOA), as reported by Alisha Ali and Kristin Lees in 2013. AOA was developed to address economic justice and promote emotional well-being. The authors described an example of AOA that used photovoice, an image-based technique for storytelling and meaning-making that was created by Caroline Wang and her colleagues for use by PAR teams. The community members who participated in the AOA project used their photographic images documenting unsafe building conditions to partner with local homelessness groups to advocate for safer low-income housing. As evidenced in these examples, empowerment research fulfills the researcher's goals of unearthing new research findings as well as community goals for positive change and social action.

Future Directions

Empowerment research is a relatively new approach to conducting investigations in the social and human service sciences. As such, the types of projects described here are often considered to be outside of the mainstream of scientific research. However, with growing recognition of the need for more socially relevant science, acceptance of empowerment research is expanding. Challenges still remain for researchers who adopt an empowerment approach, including the need for researchers who are not trained in an entirely Western model of science.

Global research outside of North America and Europe is thus essential to the growth of empowerment research. Similarly, conventional methods for the dissemination of research findings need to be expanded to include dissemination and engagement with the broader communities in which researchers conduct their work.

Alisha Ali
New York University
Laura Smith
Columbia University
Nirit Gordon
New York University

See Also: Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of; Culturally Diverse Practice, Theories of; Service Providers and Diversity.

Further Readings

Ali, A. and K. Lees. "The Therapist as Advocate: Anti-Oppression Advocacy in Psychological Practice." Journal of Clinical Psychology: In Session, v.69 (2013).

Brown, L. A. and S. Strega, eds. Research as Resistance: Critical, Indigenous, and Anti-Oppressive Approaches. Toronto: Canadian Scholars' Press, 2005.

Goodman, L. A., et al. "Applying Feminist Theory to Community Practice: A Multilevel Empowerment Intervention for Low-Income Women With Depression." In E. Aldarondo, ed., Advancing Social Justice Through Clinical Practice. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 2007.

Kidd, S. A. and M. J. Kral. "Practicing Participatory Action Research." Journal of Counseling Psychology, v.52 (2006).

Pittaway, E., L. Bartolomei, and R. Hugman. "'Stop Stealing Our Stories': The Ethics of Research With Vulnerable Groups." Journal of Human Rights Practice, v.2/2 (2010).

Smith, L. T. Decolonizing Methodologies. New York: Zed Books, 1999.

Enterprise Community Partners

Enterprise Community Partners (hereinafter referred to as Enterprise) is based in Columbia, Maryland, and is a national nonprofit dedicated to creating housing opportunities for low- and moderate-income people in the United States. In 1982, legendary developer Jim Rouse and his wife Patty Rouse founded Enterprise (originally the Enterprise Foundation), with the ambitious goal that every person should live in a decent and affordable home and be able to move out of poverty. Today, 30 years later, Enterprise provides both funding and technical expertise to achieve this goal. Enterprise comprises a network of related entities to address the issues of housing access as well as community-based solutions. Enterprise is guided by the belief that for housing to be a platform for success, it must exist in an environment with jobs, quality schools, child care, transportation, health care, and support for seniors, with access to parks, community spaces, and food and retail services that support a healthy lifestyle.

The History of Enterprise

In 1972, members of a Washington, D.C., church were working to create low-income housing in the Adams Morgan neighborhood of Washington. These women had no development, financial, or construction experience whatsoever; despite that, and based on their commitment, they made a nonrefundable deposit to purchase two apartment buildings. This commitment impressed James Rouse (1914–96), then chief executive officer of the Rouse Company, a successful and well-known developer in the Washington area. Rouse had focused in the 1960s on the development of Columbia, the planned community in Maryland, and in the 1970s on the development of festival marketplaces, such as Faneuil Hall in Boston and Harborplace in Baltimore. Rouse helped the women secure $625,000 to complete the purchase of the two buildings and $125,000 toward the cost of rehabilitation. Jubilee Housing was born in 1973, with Rouse as a founding member. Jubilee served as the launchpad for The Enterprise Foundation, which Jim and Patty Rouse founded in 1982. In 2005, it was renamed Enterprise Community Partners.

Since its inception, Enterprise has raised and invested nearly $14 billion in equity, grants, and loans to help build or preserve 300,000 affordable rental and for-sale homes as well as to create more than a half million jobs nationwide. Its award-winning Enterprise Green Communities initiative offers the first national framework for green affordable housing, and more than half of the homes it finances meet the Enterprise Green Communities criteria.

The Structure of the Enterprise Companies

Enterprise is headquartered in Columbia, Maryland, and has offices across the United States. In 2013 it had projects in 14 states (California, Colorado, Georgia, Illinois, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Washington), and the District of Columbia.

Through a network of companies, Enterprise, the parent company, offers a range of financial products and programs to improve and increase the supply of affordable housing as well as to revitalize communities. Enterprise provides technical expertise to local development partners, leads policy advocacy work and initiatives, operates national programs such as Enterprise Green Communities, and makes grants to partners to help them strengthen operations or plan projects. These grants come from funds raised from individual donors, corporations, foundations, and the government.

Enterprise Community Investment helps bring necessary capital into Enterprise projects. This includes the Low Income Housing Tax Credit (LIHTC), an indirect federal subsidy used to finance the development of affordable rental housing for low-income households; and the New Markets Tax Credit, which allows a tax credit for those making equity investments in specialized financial institutions serving low-income communities. Enterprise Community Investment also provides multifamily and commercial real estate lending through Bellwether Enterprise Real Estate Capital, a national commercial real estate and multifamily mortgage banking company. In addition, Enterprise Community Loan Fund brings early-stage debt capital to support community development lending, and Enterprise Community Asset Management oversees a portfolio of homes from project construction, to leasing, to completion.

Enterprise's Current Challenges

Current economic, energy, and environmental challenges demand greater investment in affordable housing and healthy communities. Enterprise has introduced solutions through public−private partnerships with financial institutions, governments, community organizations, and other partners to address these issues. According to Enterprise officials, politics and economic pressures at the federal, state, and local levels mean that needed federal dollars will continue to wane, and Enterprise must diversify its funding by expanding access to capital that is targeted not just for low-income projects, and by encouraging systems that make the most of every public subsidy and philanthropic dollar.

Recognizing this need, Enterprise conducted a thorough search of market opportunities across the country to enable it to expand geographic reach, product offerings, and ability to serve multifamily and commercial real estate borrowers. In addition, the merger of Enterprise's Multifamily Mortgage Finance business with Bellwether Real Estate Capital in 2012 moved Enterprise beyond affordable multifamily and community building finance into the commercial real estate sector. This merger strengthened Enterprise's ability to expand financing for its projects. In 2011, before the merger with Bellwether, Enterprise's multifamily mortgage finance business closed $157 million in loans. After the merger, Bellwether Enterprise provided $1.2 billion in financing.

Enterprise's Advocacy Efforts

Enterprise plays a key role in several important advocacy campaigns. First, it is involved in efforts to increase affordable rental housing through a coalition named "A Call to Invest in Our Neighborhoods," which is focused on protecting and preserving the federal Low Income Housing Tax Credit. Second, Enterprise works with the Green Affordable Housing Coalition to advocate for green affordable housing at the federal, state, and local levels. Third, Enterprise works to mitigate the impact of foreclosures on low- and moderate-income communities through the National Foreclosure Prevention and Neighborhood Stabilization Task Force, with an eye to develop appropriate policy, legislative, and programmatic initiatives in this area.

Stephenie Foster
American University

See Also: Community Development Block Grants; Housing Services; Low-Income Housing Tax Credits

Further Readings

Enterprise Community Partners. "2012 Annual Report: Impact & Opportunity: Under One Roof." http://www.enterprisecommunity.com (Accessed April 2014).

Enterprise Green Communities. "2011 Enterprise Green Communities Criteria Overview." http://dhcd.dc.gov/sites/default/files/dc/sites/dhcd/publication/attachments/GB-1%20Overview%20and%20FAQs%20-%202012_3.pdf (Accessed April 2014).

Enterprise Zone

Enterprise zones (EZs) relate to a special policy meant to attract investment and to encourage economic growth in distressed areas. Grounded in a free-market economic principle, this policy consists of mainly fiscal incentives for companies operating within a designated area. EZs are located in declining urban and rural regions with high unemployment, poverty, vacant land, and deteriorated infrastructure. In the United Kingdom (UK), EZs are linked with the regeneration of former industrial sites, whereas in the United States, enterprise zones are often linked to inner-city economic downturns. EZs marked the shift from the Keynesian economic model, which favors an active government and controlled growth, to the need for economic revitalization by any means. The concept has seen resurgance during the recent economic crisis, despite evaluative research questioning the effectiveness of enterprise zones.

The concept of enterprise zones is attributed to British urban planning professor Peter Hall, who, inspired by Asian freeports, saw in EZs an "extremely last-ditch solution" to be tried "only on a very small scale" following the collapse of the UK manufacturing industry. Margaret Thatcher's administration initiated many EZs as a quick fix for abandoned industrial areas. In the United States, Stuart Butler, the director of a conservative think tank, is credited for the concept. During the Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush administrations, more than 40 states developed EZs according to their own legislation. However, not until 1993 was the first federal program legislation enacted. Initially, the liberal and Democrat members of Congress were skeptical about the feasibility of private-sector growth tackling poverty and complex social issues. There was also a concern that the policy would provide rationale for eliminating other urban aid programs. Evaluations, such as a 2005 review of EZs by the Minnesota House of Representatives, validated this concern.

The rationale behind the EZ program is that a free market is a solution for overcoming concentrated poverty or for reviving the local economy in abandoned industrial areas. The underlying assumption is that high costs are the main barrier to economic activity in disadvantaged areas. Declining areas pose transportation problems; have poor capital, low-skilled workers, and high criminality; and raise safety concerns and costly environmental problems. Research such as that by Wilton Hyman shows that small enterprises provide the highest economic advantage because, unlike larger companies, they are more likely to (1) find existing infrastructure sufficient, (2) create the largest number of new jobs, (3) hire local unskilled labor, and (4) risk operating in marginal neighborhoods.

Across the United States, the enterprise zone program provides a large variety of incentives and eligibility criteria. Generally, companies benefit from cost-saving mechanisms (e.g., hiring-tax credits, loans at below-market interest rates, and reduced sales taxes) and, in some cases, less government regulation. Companies (and individuals) are eligible if they have an office location or manufacturing facility within the boundaries of an EZ, and if they hire employees from an EZ or have equipment operating there. In California, for instance, the hiring-tax credit can amount to 50 percent of the entire salary of an employee.

Controversies and Critiques

Despite being studied extensively, there is no clear evidence that EZs are effective in the sense of (1) bringing new (and not relocated) business to the region, (2) producing sustained growth rather than short-term booms, (3) subsidizing companies that would otherwise fail, and (4) causing job or income growth that otherwise would not have occurred. Evaluations, however, led to mixed and inconclusive results because of the paucity of data, methodological limitations in inferring causality, different economic conditions among cities, the absence of control groups, and ultimately difficulties in balancing the costs of the subsidies with the social benefits. Evaluations also need to account for the various subterfuges for meeting eligibility criteria among beneficiaries (e.g., reverse commuting for employees, rapid turnover of firms, and opportunistic relocation from neighboring areas).

Mounting data demonstrate that EZs generate low-wage jobs, rapid turnover of firms, and little investment in the disadvantaged areas. Whether the EZs make the transition to unsubsidized and sustainable economic areas or they remain dependent on external state support is still uncertain. Data from the United Kingdom indicate that up to 80 percent of the jobs created are taken from other places, and EZs generate a short-term boom followed by a long-term falling off into depression. In the United States, the conclusion of an evaluation of 75 EZs located in 13 states was that most EZs failed to meet the expectations of sustainable economic growth and community revival. The 2005 Minnesota House of Representatives study indicated that "some zones in occasional situations may be at least temporarily successful."

The program is being criticized for favoring corporate interest at the expense of small entrepreneurs, who end up competing with highly subsidized companies that relocate in their area. The level of disadvantage in several EZs has been questioned. For example, EZs include such affluent zones as the Los Angeles downtown office area and San Francisco's financial district and Fisherman's Wharf. Other concerns refer to the program being applied uniformly across many regions with different economic and social profiles.

EZs are expensive programs, with as much as £23,000 (US$37,800) per new job they created in the United Kingdom during the 1980s. The Minnesota review uncovered situations in which provisions have led to cuts in public spending inside the EZ or increasing taxes outside the zones. Concerns over unbalanced industrial development, the so-called suburbanization of investment at the expense of inner-city minorities, and prioritization of capital over labor add up, according to an assessment of the program by Alan H. Peters and Peter S. Fisher. Allegations in the United Kingdom state that selection of EZs is linked to political party consideration. Following calls for transparency, the U.S. Senate is considering requiring the creation of a public database of companies that receive the fiscal incentives and the number of jobs they created.

Maria-Carmen Pantea
Babeş-Bolyai University

See Also: Community Development Block Grants; Poverty; Urban Communities and Human Services.

Further Readings

Butler, Stuart M. Enterprise Zones: Pioneering in the Inner City. Washington, DC: Heritage Foundation, 1981.
Hyman, Wilton. "Empowerment Zones, Enterprise Communities, Black Business, and Unemployment." Journal of Urban and Contemporary Law, v.53 (2001).
Minnesota House of Representatives Research Department. Enterprise Zones: A Review of the Economic Theory and Empirical Evidence. St. Paul: Minnesota House of Representatives Research Department, 2005.
Peters, Alan H. and Peter S. Fisher. State Enterprise Zone Programs: Have They Worked? Kalamazoo, MI: Upjohn Institute Press, 2002.

Environmental Justice

One of the gifts of globalization to humankind is environmental awareness. In fact, globalization has affected ecology in both positive and negative ways. On the one hand, globalization promotes neoliberalism, which offers freedom of markets and trade without intervention of states. On the other hand, it raises awareness of environmental problems, such as climate change, environmental degradation, pollution, and waste disposal. To deal with these problems, the concept of environmental justice emerged in the early 1980s. In today's world, environmental justice has been understood with broader scope and is more globalized, thereby focusing on fair distribution of justice and raising concerns on social issues.

In the last two decades, scientific research has clearly indicated that disparities in the location of environmental hazards related to race and class have gradually increased. Thus, environmental justice emerged mainly as a result of the disparity in locating polluting industries and facilities such as landfills and power plants. In the United States, these environmental pollutants are often located near low-income communities as well as African American, Hispanic, and indigenous communities. The main idea is that certain communities, particularly low-income societies, are disproportionately burdened by pollution and are having insufficient access to environmental resources. Increasing public concerns about the negative impact that human activity could cause to the environment has led the U.S. government to take action against this issue by ratifying the National Environmental Policy Act, which later ensured the creation of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) in 1970.

The term environmental justice is defined by the EPA as being about the protection of human health and the environment, highlighting fair treatment to all people and their involvement regardless of race, color, ethnicity, or income, thus prioritizing the development, implementation, and enforcement of environmental laws, regulations, and policies. In this sense, fair treatment means that any group of people, including racial, ethnic, or socioeconomic entities, should not be exposed to disproportionately negative environmental consequences resulting from industrial, municipal, and commercial operations or the execution of federal, state, local, and tribal programs and policies. Much empirical evidence has also corroborated the existence of environmental injustice, particularly in low-income and minority communities.

Regarding the definition of environmental justice, David Schlosberg has suggested that the term has two different aspects. Whereas the first aspect refers to a social movement focusing on fair distribution of environmental burdens (e.g., pollution, industrial facilities, and crime), the second aspect refers to theories of environment, theories of justice, environmental law and governance, environmental policy, political ecology, development, and sustainability. In addition to cited definitions of environmental justice, the South African Environmental Justice Networking Forum, a nationwide umbrella organization coordinating the activities of environmental activists and organizations that are interested in social and environmental justice, defined the term environmental justice as a social transformation directed toward meeting basic human needs and improving the quality of life, health care, housing, human rights, environmental protection, and democracy.

A photo of New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina in 2005. The flood event affected the city's poor, black neighborhoods disproportionately in comparison to the city's wealthier, white neighborhoods. Considering disproportionate environmental burdens, it is clear that low-income and minority communities are vulnerable in many ways regarding the equal distribution of justice.

Forms of Environmental Justice

Many countries agree that environmental justice provides a better life and more inhabitable world for future generations, but safeguarding of environmental justice is still a controversial issue. In this respect, in order to achieve environmental justice across the world, distributive, procedural, and structural forms of injustice should be considered together.

Distributive forms of environmental injustice. Considering disproportionate environmental burdens, it is clear that low-income and minority communities are vulnerable in many ways regarding the problems of the distribution of justice. According to fair share principles, everyone gets an equal share of environmental benefits (goods) and burdens (bads) regardless of race and class. To achieve this, states, policy makers, and international communities have tried to focus on sanctions for the overall reduction or prevention of harm rather than applying a simple redistribution of environmental burdens. Therefore, the distribution of equity requires institutional structures that aim to raise awareness of issues of justice. In this respect, participatory practices are claimed to be most likely distributive ones. Thus, the distribution of inequities in environmental justice communities is interdependently related to procedural and structural injustices.

Procedural forms of environmental injustice. Environmental justice can also be defined as fairness in decision-making processes, and it asks for righteous participation in any level of decision-making processes, including the levels of need assessment, planning, implementation, enforcement, and evaluation. As observed in democratic societies, more participation enhances fairness over decision-making processes. In this sense, public participation plays a key role in issues of environmental justice. Currently, though, environmental justice policies aim to improve public participation, particularly in disadvantaged communities; implementation of this policy, however, raises concerns over how and to what extent public participation will be carried out. This is still a contentious issue among state officials. In this regard, John Forester provides participatory practices for environmental justice program coordinators to deal with structural and procedural forms of injustice:

- Cultivate community networks of liaisons and contacts, rather than depending on the power of documents to provide and disseminate information.
- Listen carefully to gauge the concerns and interests of all participants in the planning process in order to anticipate probable political obstacles, struggles, and opportunities.
- Notify less organized interests early in the policy-making process.
- Educate citizens and community organizations about the policy-making process.
- Supply technical and political information to citizens to ensure informed and effective political participation.
- Make sure that community as well as neighborhood nonprofessional organizations have access to public planning/policy-making information, plans, notices, laws, relevant meetings, and consultations with agency contacts.
- Encourage community-based groups to express open and full information about proposed projects and policy-making possibilities.
- Develop skills aimed at working with groups and to dealing with problematic situations.

Structural forms of environmental injustice. When environmental injustices are structurally examined, the focus mainly concentrates on environmental racism. In this context, David Pellow has attempted to explain the complexity of the structural forms of environmental injustice by creating the environmental inequality formation that integrates the notions of environmental racism and structural forms of environmental inequality. Pellow suggests that the term environmental racism focuses on disparities of environmental hazards, and environmental justice is centered on making people's ordinary lives better and improved.

The Environmental Justice Movement

The environmental justice movement is a relatively new social phenomenon that emerged as a result of protests by African Americans in the south against hazardous waste facilities in predominantly low-income communities. These environmental justice cases increased awareness and interest in low-income and minority communities dealing with disproportionate environmental burdens by arguing that everybody has a right to access clean water and clean air, and that nobody has the right to destroy the environment. Environmental justice, as a powerful sense of justice directed against inequities and social conflicts over polluting factories, toxic waste facilities, and road construction, has contributed to the emergence of the environmental justice movement. For example, the process of institutional improvement united large groups such as Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace, and contributed to the resurgence of grassroots environmental groups during the 1990s (e.g., the United Kingdom's antiroads protesters and the U.S. environmental justice movement).

The environmental justice movement emerged in the United States during the 1980s with the mushrooming of networks of grassroots groups such as the Clearing House for Hazardous Waste. The main idea of the environmental justice movement is the recognition that environmental hazards are closely interlinked with race and poverty, which can be seen in the large numbers of African Americans and Hispanics who live close to hazardous and toxic waste sites. The other principle of the environmental justice movement is that environmental justice requires a public policy that should be based on mutual respect and justice for all people. To reach a degree of intragenerational equity as a condition for intergenerational equity, no group should be asked to bear a disproportionate share of environmental burdens, which is a referred principle within the context of environmental justice.

Having considered the history of environmental justice, it is obvious that there are many lessons to be learned. For example, the protection and preservation of the natural environment should be noted as an important and crucial issue before involving in a debate about ensuring justice in environmental issues. Thus, environmental justice requires universal protection from nuclear testing, as well as extraction, production, and disposal of toxic/hazardous wastes and poisons that threaten the fundamental right to access clean air, land, water, and food. In this respect, the establishment of environmental justice and its sustainability will contribute to the achievement of peace and prosperity worldwide.

Irfan Ciftci
Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Environmental Racism; Public Health; Racism, Long-Term Effects of.

Further Readings

Baptista, Ana Isabel. Just Policies? A Multıple Case Study of State Envıronmental Justıce Policies. Dissertation, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, NJ, 2008. UMI#3335515.

Bullard, Robert D. "Environmental Justice for All." Nature Transformed, TeacherServe®. National Humanities Center, 2013. http://nationalhumanitiescenter.org/tserve/nattrans/ntuseland/essays/envjust.htm (accessed November 2013).

Carter, Neil. The Politics of the Environment: Ideas, Activism, Policy. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2007.

Fischer, F. Citizens, Experts and the Environment; The Politics of Local Knowledge. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2000.

Forester, J. Critical Theory, Public Policy, and Planning Practice: Toward a Critical Pragmatism. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.

McDonald, David A. What Is Environmental Justice? Athens: Ohio University Press, 2002.

Pellow, D. N. "Environmental İnequality Formation: Toward a Theory of Environmental Injustice." American Behavioral Scientist, v.43/4 (2000).

Schlosberg, D. "The Justice of Environmental Justice: Reconciling Equity, Recognition, and Participation in a Political Movement." In Moral and Political Reasoning in Environmental Practice, A. Light and A DeShalit, eds. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2003.

Environmental Racism

Environmental racism is a combination of environmental practices and policies aimed at directing unpopular industrial businesses to locate disproportionately in communities of color. The problem of environmental racism gained traction in U.S. politics in the early 1980s, when local officials in Warren County, North Carolina, a predominately poor, black area, decided to locate a polychlorinated biphenyl (PCB) landfill there.

This resulted in mass protests and led to an investigation by the U.S. General Accounting Office (GAO) to determine whether the phenomenon of "siting," or placement of hazardous industrial sites, were indiscriminately located in areas with high concentrations of minority and poor residents. The concept of "environmental racism" is often coupled with the term environmental justice, a movement aimed at fairly distributing the burdens of environmental hazards across individuals and groups. Issues of NIMBY (not in my backyard), uneven political power, and lack of access to decision makers, as well as economic development policies of local and state governments, also complicate the issue of environmental racism.

Americans have traditionally viewed environmental degradation as something that affects individuals equally, regardless of location. Following the protests in Warren County, however, the GAO report, which looked at hazardous waste landfill locations across the south at that time, found that three out of four were located in communities that had high concentrations of African Americans. Later research also found that these decisions are not driven primarily by racial factors alone, but have both race- and class-biased components to placement choices along with other factors such as the percentage of the population employed in manufacturing.

Environmental Racism and Public Policy

A description of the general dangers of hazardous waste is warranted before considering the issue of environmental racism. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) describes hazardous waste as any by-products of industrial production that present significant health and/or environmental problems. These types of by-products can be corrosive, toxic, reactive, or ignitable. Until the late 1970s, many hazardous waste products were discarded without much consideration for the potential dangers they posed. Over time, lax regulation of industrial waste produced large waste sites, and environmental damage was approaching a tipping point.

When the EPA began an inventory of these hazardous sites across the country in the mid 1980s, they found nearly 20,000 uncontrolled sites that had the potential to cause severe harm to the environment through seepage into groundwater stores, affecting both livestock and citizens. In response, Congress passed the Resource, Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA), and the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (CERCLA), in 1976 and 1980, respectively, to curb abuses of industrial producers. These acts stipulated that new waste must be managed at approved facilities (i.e., landfills, incinerators, or impoundment facilities). The main differences between the two laws are that RCRA is focused on the management of storage, treatment, and disposal of hazardous waste in facilities that are currently in operation, whereas CERCLA handles the administration of remediating abandoned sites.

Among the provisions of RCRA, the federal government, along with states and localities, shares the burden assuring the responsible generation, storage, transportation, and disposal of newly created waste by-products. RCRA directs states to grant siting, or approval, of new locations for waste sites. The public is granted some rights under RCRA, namely, the ability to sue companies found to be in violation of RCRA or even sue the EPA for lax oversight.

Under CERCLA, Congress authorized the federal government to provide financing and assistance to clean up abandoned waste sites. The financing comes from a trust fund established with revenues from taxes levied on certain products, such as petrochemicals, crude oil, and imported petroleum products. It also permits the federal government to require parties who are found to be creating uncontrolled hazardous waste sites to finance cleanup. Additionally, CERCLA requires states to monitor and participate in cleanup activities within their borders. Finally, CERCLA identified a number of so-called Superfund sites that are prioritized for long-term cleanup efforts through either removal of hazardous materials at the site or remediation.

At the local level, government officials are responsible for providing avenues for public comment on decisions to locate waste sites in communities. Additionally, local governments are highly regulated in providing adequate zoning and easements between residents and incompatible land uses. Local governments can also be held financially responsible for violations of either act.

Environmental Racism and Politics

Community decision making is an important component to understanding the prevalence of environmental racism. The absence of minorities or the economically disadvantaged from the policymaking process at the local level often results in their communities being targeted for placement of these sites. Lack of representation on city councils, in government positions, or at hearings related to these types of issues negatively impact minorities and the poor. Lax enforcement of the various federal and state statutes and regulations can also have disproportionate effects.

Segregated housing patterns and low home values in areas with high concentrations of minorities have been linked with environmental racism. In many cities and towns across the United States, African Americans, Hispanics, Asians, and other minority groups tend to live in homogenous neighborhoods, unlike their economically disadvantaged white counterparts. Those in the middle class tend to be more engaged with local politics; it is assumed that poor whites who live in neighborhoods that are more heterogeneous by income are able to avoid adverse political decisions due to strong middle-class opposition to locally unwanted land uses (LULUs). Being voiceless in the political process is detrimental not only in regard to health outcomes but also in depressing home values further. Low housing values also increase the likelihood of siting hazardous waste sites, thus creating a vicious cycle that minorities and the poor have trouble breaking, as many are limited in their ability to “move with their feet” to neighborhoods or communities where these issues are not as prevalent.

Mitigating Environmental Racism

Public officials have some tools at their disposal for reducing the disparate effects of environmental racism, namely, through the use of administrative or bureaucratic discretion. First, implementing a comprehensive strategy to notify affected residents of location decisions should occur early and often. Representation on boards and other decision-making bodies are also critical in these types of situations. The right to accurate and complete information for industries wishing to locate in communities is also something local officials should require from corporations. Additional soil and monitoring procedures may need to be utilized in order to correctly estimate levels of toxicity in communities.

City officials and corporate partners should also be aware of the proximity of citizens to sites and be cognizant that discriminatory effects may occur; therefore, leaders should take care to ensure segments of the population are not bearing a disproportionate burden of the risks associated with toxic chemicals in the local environment.

Davia Cox Downey
Grand Valley State University

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Environmental Justice; Racism, Long-Term Effects of

Further Readings

Bowman, A. O. and K. A. Crews-Meyer. “Locating Southern LULUs: Race, Class, and Environmental Justice.” State and Local Government Review,v.29/2 (1997).

Bullard, Robert D. Confronting Environmental Racism: Voices from the Grassroots. Boston: South End Press, 1993.

Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980, Pub. L. 96-510, 42 U.S.C.§9601, 94 Stat. 2767 (1980).

Resource, Conservation and Recovery Act of 1976, Pub. L. 94-580, 42 U.S.C.§6901, 90 Stat. 2795 (1976).

Strong, Denise and Kathy Allen Hobbs. “Administrative Responses to Environmental Racism.” International Journal of Public Administration, v.25/2–3 (2002).

Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights

Human society is very diverse, with sociopolitical and economic differences in addition to cultural and other differences. Many modern societies are multicultural in nature. To ensure equality in the distribution of human needs and services, the principles of equal opportunity and civil rights must be enshrined in the rules and regulations that govern human interactions. Socioeconomic inequality pervades human relationships; issues underpinning inequality have been subjected to constitutional provision under local, national, and international laws. Equal opportunity principles have provided an explicit understanding that human services and their delivery be devoid of inequality, oppression, segregation, prejudice, exclusion, and stereotypes, and allow application of equality in the distribution of society's goods and services. Civil rights encompass equal opportunity. Civil rights are described as natural or constitutional law bestowed on an individual simply by right of being a human being. The inclusion of civil rights in how people deal with one another ensures equal opportunity and efficient human services delivery based on recognition of individuals' backgrounds and diversity.

Equal opportunity provides positive steps toward ending discrimination, preventing its occurrence, and creating opportunities that were previously denied to qualified minorities and women. A need for equal opportunity comes with enormous implications for the positions of women and people of color because such programs provide opportunities that were previously gender- and color-based. In spite of equal opportunity law, however, many women and minorities are in vastly lower-paying jobs and still face active discrimination in some sectors. Equal opportunity and civil rights laws provide increased opportunities for women and people of color in the workplace. Equal opportunity in employment ensures that a fair chance at job opportunity is created irrespective of class, age, gender, and background.

Equal opportunity also removes barriers such as biased testing and hiring practices. It also reaches out to underrepresented women and minorities through institutions such as colleges, minority organizations, and ethnic media. Equal opportunity is created to remove biases in recruitment, hiring, promotion, and compensation practices, such as unnecessary job requirements. Many employers now design equal opportunity and diversity forms to be filled out by work supervisors and managers so that workplaces comply with equal opportunity laws. Managers and supervisors are required to take appropriate corrective or disciplinary steps in cases of discovery of discrimination, reprisal, civil rights violations, and related misconduct in employment and are held accountable for failure to do so. Annual performance appraisals for managers and supervisors include an evaluation of their compliance with the commitment to civil rights and equal opportunity.

Equal opportunity in education in the United States has been described as successful as a result of the increase in the number of women and people of color in schools, colleges, law schools, and elsewhere. For example, in 1978, in the case Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, the Supreme Court ruled that diversity could be a compelling governmental interest that permits the use of race as a factor in a narrowly tailored admission program.

Human Diversity in the Context of Equal Opportunity

Society is changing and developing—globalization has brought the whole world together as a family. Individuals' social identities may impact their experiences in life. Discrimination works in different ways, including making assumptions and hasty generalizations, stereotyping, patronizing, humiliating, ignoring some people, and disrespecting people.

The following principles demonstrate how an individual's identity and diversity can be valued appropriately: treating everyone as an individual; responding to an individual and his or her social identity in an individual manner; recognizing differences and responding appropriately; respecting everybody's sociocultural, economic, and political characteristics or social situations; increasing the knowledge and understanding of aspects of social identity that may be different; avoiding stereotyping or making assumptions about people based on social identity; recognizing that some interactions may impact on someone in a negative or difficult way because of an aspect of the person's social identity; recognizing that life experience may impact on some people more than others; recognizing that one's own social identity may create cultural conflict in different ways; and avoiding the use of inappropriate and disrespectful language relating to social identity or social situation.

Equal Opportunity in the Context of Civil Rights

Civil rights include protection from discrimination based on race, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity, national origin, color, ethnicity, religion, and disability, as well as individual rights such as privacy and the freedoms of thought and conscience, speech and expression, the press, assembly, and movement. Civil rights are constitutional rights or international human rights tools to prevent discrimination against individuals at both the domestic and international levels (e.g., the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the 1969 International Convention on Civil and Political Rights).

Civil rights movements began as early as 1848 in the United States with such documents as the Declaration of Sentiment. Other examples of civil rights movements are the U.S. civil rights struggle in the 1960s, when the rights of black citizens had been violated; the Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association; and civil rights movements in many countries (e.g., Charter 77 in Czechoslovakia, the Civil Liberty Organization in Nigeria, and a host of others). The techniques of civil rights movements to achieve equal rights include civil disobedience, strikes, demonstrations, lobby campaigns, civil unrest, armed rebellion, civil resistance, and nonviolent methods. Civil rights promote and ensure that people have equal access and opportunity to participate in certain human services programs without facing unlawful discrimination.

Civil rights for women and minorities encompass the following aspects of human values: women's rights, which include equal pay for equal work; the Fair Pay Act of 1999, which provides equal wages and benefits for work of equivalent value; breaking the glass ceiling, which is defined as the hidden barriers that women and people of color face as they move up the social strata; and the U.S. Domestic Violence Act of 1995. Minority rights provide protection orders for hate crimes, which could be defined as intentional selection of a victim because of that individual's actual or perceived race, color, national origin, ethnicity, gender, disability, or sexual orientation. Minority rights also support affirmative action to ensure that minority applicants are preferentially treated to make up for past discrimination. To ensure equal opportunity in the United States, special language programs are required of all schools that accept federal funding.

Civil rights also encompass health rights for ill and disabled persons to protect victims against discrimination and denial. Examples include the Americans with Disability Act (ADA), AIDS/HIV Act, handicapped access, and laws against mental illness discrimination. Other civil rights include religious rights, which include school prayer, posting the Ten Commandments in public places, and recognition of hours of prayer.

Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights Work

To ensure equal opportunity and civil rights, some countries created government entities to oversee equal opportunity and civil rights, such as the U.S. Office of Civil Rights and Equal Opportunity, which has responsibility for a wide range of equal opportunity and diversity activities. Examples of these responsiblities include the following:

- Planning, implementing, and directing programs designed to ensure equality of employment opportunity for all regardless of gender, race, color, ethnicity, religion, age, disability status, or sexual orientation
- Managing the system for processing, adjudicating, and resolving complaints of discrimination in compliance with all applicable laws
- Developing and directing a program of reasonable accommodation for employees with disabilities
- Developing and maintaining all necessary information systems to manage equal opportunity programs
- Developing reliable statistical analyses and tracking equal opportunity workloads.

Coverage of Equal Opportunity

Equal opportunity ensures that all persons shall have the opportunity to be considered for employment without regard to their race, color, religion, national origin, ancestry, alien or citizenship status, age, disability, gender, sexual orientation, veteran status, or any other characteristic protected by applicable federal, state, or local laws. In sum, it covers all forms of discrimination. Discrimination, including treating some employees less favorably or harassing employees on any of the grounds stipulated above, can happen as a result of negative attitudes or prejudice. Even if it is unintentional, such actions can still be considered as discrimination.

Discrimination could also be described as barriers or stringent requirements that make it impossible for some class of people to access opportunities or services available to others. For example, work experience may put a recent graduate at a disadvantage when applying for a job. Likewise, stringent work requirements, such as overtime or full-time employment, may put women at a disadvantage as a result of gender roles performed by women. Some of these stringent requirements may be justified, however, in certain employment situations; but if the justifications are not lawful, a court or tribunal may decide that unlawful discrimination has taken place.

Ideally, equal opportunity covers the right to enjoy equal treatment and a life free from discrimination. Equality legislation is designed to protect people from unfair treatment, covering many areas of daily life such as employment, training, education, housing, the policies of public authority, and the provision of goods, facilities, and services. Equality law applies to a wide variety of situations, including getting a job, finding accommodation, accessing education and health care, and services such as those provided by banks, insurance companies, shops, pubs, restaurants, and leisure facilities. This is the case whether the services are paid for or free of charge.

In relation to employment, services, and functions, equal opportunity covers the following areas: disability, gender reassignment (undergone or proposing a change in gender form), pregnancy and maternity, identity (race, color, nationality, ethnic origin), religion or belief, gender, and sexual orientation (gay or lesbian, heterosexual, bisexual, or transgender). In relation to employment only, equal opportunity covers age (exemption, attainment of retirement age), marriage, and civil partnership. To ensure an organization is in compliance with equal opportunity policy, the organization must put policies in place to deal with complaints about discrimination on any grounds, discuss equality with employees' unions or those representing labor, ensure that employees know where to go if they have concerns about discrimination, ensure that there are adequate procedures in place for assessing and managing the needs of employees with disabilities, deal with complaints adequately and promptly, keep adequate records, freely discuss issues related to equality within the institution, and provide timely feedback to the individual.

Case Study

Understanding how inequality can impact an individual's course of life is essential to preventing potential discrimination. People can encounter unfair treatment in many aspects of their everyday lives because of their individuality, such as personal appearance, size, personal preferences, or social situation (e.g., being an ex-offender, being homeless, being a single parent); misuse of drugs or alcohol; citizen status; or health. Inequality also occurs with respect to some protected features, including being refused a job because of sexual orientation, or limited access to health care because of disability. In a practical sense, inequality can surface in the following ways: a female clerk discovers she is earning less than a male colleague doing similar work, a foreign student is teased and harassed by fellow students because she cannot speak the English language fluently, a house owner advertising a rental house indicates that blacks need not apply, a woman is fired from her job because she wants maternity leave, a man is not treated by a doctor because his religion is different from the others in his locality, a staff member is refused promotion because he is of a different ethnic background than the other workers; a student applicant is denied college admission because he is indigent, or a person is denied work because she changed her sexual orientation. People who experience inequality need services that restore their dignity and freedom.

Human services needed by the persons facing unequal treatment include psychological support, education, and legal assistance. Government departments and institutions and nongovernmental organizations provide support for people facing inequality and unfair treatment. An equality and human rights legal framework covers employment practices and service delivery, and employees need to work within this framework to avoid discrimination. For example, the Equality Commission in Northern Ireland offers free, confidential information and protection for people who are victimized because they have been involved in a discrimination complaint. As human society becomes increasingly diverse and multicultural, there is a growing need to be able to respond appropriately and sensitively to diversities. Employers should enable their workfoces to reflect this diversity around gender, race and ethnicity, disability, religion, sexuality, class, and age to promote equal opportunities. Successful implementation of equality and diversity in all aspects of work and education will ensure that human beings are highly valued, motivated, and treated fairly.

It is instructive to note that equal opportunity legislation and civil rights law play complimentary roles. They ensure that fair play, equality, and justice dominate the way human beings organize themselves in this diversified modern world. They are also implemented at both the public and private sectors to promote affirmative action that serves women, people of color, and people with disabilities.

Olakunle Folami
University of Ulster

See Also: Education for Diversity in Human Services; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Office for Civil Rights; Service Providers and Diversity; Social and Economic Justice.

Further Readings

Equality Commission For Northern Ireland. http://www.equalityni.org/site/default.asp?secid=home (Accessed June 2013).

Perez, Tom. “Confirm Tom Perez for U.S. Secretary of Labor.” Leadership Conference organized by Civil and Human Rights Coalition. Overview of Equal Opportunity. http://www.civilrights.org/equal-opportunity/overview.html (Accessed June 2013).

Umpstead, Regina R. “Three Essays on Education Law and Policy.” Doctoral dissertation. Michigan State University: Act ProQuest, 2008.

University of Ulster. “Diversity, Equal Opportunities and Human Rights.” Faculty Development. http://www.faculty.londondeanery.ac.uk/e-learning/diversity-equal-opportunities-and-human-rights (Accessed June 2013).

University of Utah, Office of Equal Opportunity and Affirmative Action. http://www.oeo.utah.edu (Accessed June 2013).

Equal Pay Act of 1963

The U.S. Equal Pay Act (EPA) is a federal law that seeks to equalize the salaries and wages paid to employed women with the levels paid to men for work of an equal nature and quantity. The act amended the Fair Labor Standard Act of 1938 and was a key element of President John F. Kennedy’s New Frontier program. The year 2013 marked the 50th anniversary of the passing of the EPA.

History and Development

At the turn of the 20th century, women composed around 18 percent of the U.S. labor force, increasing to just 25 percent in 1940. The entry of the United States into World War II in 1941 precipitated a massive influx of women into paid employment, and many of these women remained in the workforce following the conclusion of the war. Consequently, by 1960, some 23.3 million women were part of the U.S. workforce, a figure equivalent to almost 40 percent of all women of working age. Although the majority of women workers in 1940 were single, those joining the labor force after that time were predominately married, and a large proportion of those were from low-income families. This suggests that a key driver of the uptick of paid work among wives was family need.

These changes in the composition of the labor force did not, however, precipitate much change in occupational sex segregation or wage disparities. The entry of women into occupations traditionally dominated by men was in many cases prevented by collective bargaining agreements, employer resistance, or even the law. Women who were able to take up male-dominated roles typically received much lower wages for performing the same work as men did. For instance, U.S. Department of Labor survey data from 1960 show that the median salary of a woman in a sales job was just 40.9 percent of her male counterpart, and male bank tellers received up to $31 per week more than women in the same job. Evidence also suggested that these wage differentials could not be accounted for by differences in age or education. Data presented to the Labor Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in 1962 revealed, for example, that women pharmacists who had received a degree two years prior were paid $1,560 per year less than a male pharmacist who had received the same qualification at the same time. Overall, the gender pay gap of full-time workers in 1960 was 39.2 percent.

Several actions to rectify this situation were presented to Congress from 1945 to 1960, but it was not until 1961 that the President's Commission on the Status of Women, set up by John F. Kennedy, proposed real policy action on the subject of equal pay for comparable work. During the hearings that followed under the auspices of the House Committee on Education and Labor, an amendment to the general order was presented that replaced the notion of comparable work with equal work. The change bolstered public and partisan support for the policy, and the concept was enshrined in law in the Equal Pay Act on June 10, 1963.

In endorsing the new law, President Kennedy stated the following:

> The lower the family income, the higher the probability that the mother must work. Today one out of five of these working mothers has children under three. Two out of five have children of school age. Among the remainder, about 50 percent have husbands who earn less than $5,000 a year—many of them much less. I believe they bear the heaviest burden of any group in our nation. Where the mother is the sole support of the family, she often must face the hard choice of either accepting public assistance or taking a position at a pay rate which averages less then two-thirds of the pay rate for men.

Provisions of the Act

Under the terms of the EPA, women and men performing jobs that demand "equal skill, effort, and responsibility, and which are performed under similar working conditions" must be paid the same. The EPA protects the rights of both sexes. An individual who seeks to establish a case under the act must demonstrate that (1) an employer pays one sex more than another; (2) both sexes perform an equal amount of work that demands equal levels of skill, effort, and responsibility; and (3) working conditions for both sexes are equivalent. An employer who is accused of discrimination under the EPA can present one of four defenses, known as affirmative defenses. An employer may legally pay employees of one sex more than another sex if wages are based on a system of seniority, a system of merit, a system that distinguishes payment on the basis of quality and quantity of production (e.g., certain piece rates), or if payment is differentiated on any factor other than sex. Of these four defenses, the "factor other than sex" defense has been invoked most frequently and has been the subject of intense debate and controversy. Critics have argued that this defense enables employers to fabricate other reasons for the wage gap.

Consequences of the EPA

In the 50 years since the Equal Pay Act was passed, wage disparities between men and women have slimmed, but a gender pay gap remains. In 1963, the average woman was paid 59 cents for every dollar earned by a man; in 2013, Census Bureau data showed that women are paid on average 77 cents for every male dollar earned. Critics have argued that there are too many loopholes in the legal framework of EPA for wage equalization to be achieved. Enforcement is complainant driven, but many wage policies are not transparent, so individuals may not know whether they are being discriminated against. It is argued that the reference to equal work does not allow comparable worth policies to be established; that is, the idea that sex-segregated jobs that require different, but equally valuable, skills (e.g., office secretaries and construction workers) should be paid similarly. Given the pervasiveness of occupational segregation by sex, many believe that legislation based on the principle of comparable worth would do more to equalize wages than legislation based on the principle of equal work. The Paycheck Fairness Act was a bill designed to tackle the vagueness of the fourth affirmative defense and eliminate salary secrecy, but it was filibustered in the Senate in June 2012. In 2013, Senator Tom Harkin, with co-sponsor Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, introduced the Fair Pay Act, a bill based on comparable worth, which they argued would address the undervaluing and underpaying of work in which women predominate, which includes much of human services employment, such as child care, nursing, and social work.

Implications of the EPA for Human Services

The Equal Pay Act applies equally to all sectors and occupations, but it has had a substantially positive effect on human services occupations, which tend to be dominated by women and are generally found in the public sector. The disproportionate effect of the EPA on female-dominated public sector jobs means that the wage gap is much slimmer among human services workers than among men and women in many other occupations. In some states, such as Minnesota, the wage gap in human services is said to have been eliminated completely. Data from 2010 suggests that the average female social and human services assistant earned $33,543, compared to $35,748 for her male counterpart. This contrasts favorably with, for example, the average female aircraft mechanic, who, at $40,884, earned almost $16,000 less than her male counterpart.

Natalie Sappleton
Manchester Metropolitan University

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Diversity in the Workplace; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Fair Labor Standards Act.

Further Readings

England, Paula. "The Case for Comparable Worth." Quarterly Review of Economics and Finance, v.39/5 (1999).

Houghton, Kimberly J. "The Equal Pay Act of 1963: Where Did We Go Wrong?" Labor Lawyer, v.155 (1999).

Kennedy, John F. "Remarks Upon Signing the Equal Pay Act.." June 10, 1963. In Gerhard Peters and John T. Woolley, "The American Presidency Project." http://www.presidency.ucsb.edu/ws/?pid=9267 (Accessed July 2013)

Kim, Marlene. "Policies to End the Gender Wage Gap in the United States." Review of Radical Political Economics, v.45 (2013).

Ethnic Diversity and Values

"Ethnic diversity," "ethno diversity," or "multiculturalism" are all terms used to describe nations, communities, and/or societies that comprise multiple cultures. Typically, ethnic diversity describes the degree of variety of ethnic groups living together on a common territory. In a descriptive fashion, it applies to the demographic makeup of the culture; generally from an administrative standpoint these can include nations, states, cities, local neighborhoods, communities, businesses, schools, institutions of higher learning, and the like. In its normative manner, ethnic diversity refers to ideologies and/or political and societal policies put into place to promote diversity as an institutional norm. In this implication, ethnic diversity or multiculturalism is a social order that is completely accepting of the full mosaic of differences human beings embody as well as their aspirations of self-expression, through whatever means they deem most appropriate in relation to a specific ethnic culture.

Presently, social sciences has a very substantial literature on what constitutes ethnic groups and what binds them together. Ethnic groups may live together in a plural society (a society comprising different ethnic groups or cultural customs), or in the supporting structure of which ethnic or cultural differences are reflected, or may form cultural enclaves or dispersion of a different culture within a host society. In the past, issues around ethnic diversity were the domain of social anthropologists. These issues now frequently are also taken up by the mass media and politicians and are established with a suggestive normative mode, being mostly seen as a burden or a challenge rather than a benefit, especially in nation-building efforts. Similarly, the aspects of culture lead to value systems, which shape behavior, and can be the forerunner to unfair or different treatment of ethnic groups other than one's own, especially in some areas of human services. As a result, principles and policies that affect ethnic diversity values show wide discrepancies, particularly on a national level. As a consequence, the espoused ethnic diversity (multiculturalism) values are inseparable from human services and diversity issues. Overwhelmingly, the focus of human services professionals and scholars has changed in the past few decades as they face a progressively more diverse service population in the United States.

Although diversity itself covers a wide-ranging collection of human differences, included in these diverse collections, along with ethnic diversity and values, are differences in ability and disability, age, ethnic background, gender and gender role, geographic origin, level of education, religion, sexual orientation, and socioeconomic class. Accordingly, the major elements of an ethic group's culture orient it to activities, social relations, self, the world, and the passage of time. For that reason, the valuation of ethnic diversity is strictly related to cultural patterns. All the same, diversity in the population necessitates a shift in diversity focus in education, training, and information for the human services labor force to perform in their professions as interculturally competent service providers. Consequently, it is extraordinarily important that human services professionals understand diversity in cultural patterns (beliefs, norms, values, and social practices) if their desire is to become competent in intercultural communication in the effective and efficient delivery of professional human services.

Thus, the scope of these ideologies and policies correlate with human services and diversity through the cultural underpinning of the ethnic diversity values, norms, and belief systems in place. This scope may vary from support of equal respect for the various cultures in a society, to a policy of promotion of the maintenance of ethnic diversity, to policies focusing on whether people of diverse ethnic and religious groups are attended to by the authorities as characterized by the category of which they are members. Conversely, two main dissimilar and ostensibly conflicting strategies have developed through different government policies and approaches. One main approach focuses on competent intercultural communication that transverses cultures and interpersonal communication and interaction linking different cultures. This approach makes available junctures for cultural dissimilarities to interconnect and interact to conceive multicultural values and belief systems and norms. Simply put, it advocates support for cross-cultural channels of communication and challenges the tendencies for a culture to separate itself from a societal unit, commonly giving rise to interculturalism. The focal point of the second approach is diversity and cultural distinctiveness. In this approach, cultural isolation is viewed as a way to safeguard the uniqueness of an indigenous culture of a nation or area and also play a major role in universal cultural diversity. One common aspect of many policies following the second approach is that it avoids the presentation of any specific ethnic, religious, or cultural community's values, norms, and belief systems as most important. Thus, values being a component of cultural patterns, the relationships between values and human services in this overview would be best represented within the cultural pattern framework of intercultural communication and interaction.

Diversity is defined in terms of religious beliefs, ethnic backgrounds, gender and gender roles, age, and cultural values; increasingly, though, diversity is being defined in terms of the physical environment and technology, over and above terms of social organization, imaginative thoughts, and constructions of reality. As a consequence, an intricate collection of theories and concepts has arisen to take account of these changes in the real world. These theories differ greatly as to whether diversity is a valuable good or disadvantageous to progress and social structure. Nonetheless, according to sociological systems theory, to regard solely one influential tradition is to assume that increasing differentiation of social systems enhances their adaptive capacity to challenges ahead. The result is a multiplicity of social structures—organizations and schools of thought that are, to a greater extent, particular to solving specific problems, leading to a general advancement of research and development. Increasing social diversity, however, also creates growing problems of governance. Managing multifaceted systems requires additional social devices of control and management of resource distribution and conflict arbitration resolution. At any rate, one particular empirical studies model has proven useful because it describes a broad range of cultural patterns in comparison to which a particular culture's values can be understood through its five major elements: activity, social relations, self, world, and time orientations. The comparison and contrast of the elements of cultural patterns reveal strong links among these elements and the evolution of valuation of ethic diversity.

Values and Cultural Patterns

Values are unambiguous or implied, idiosyncratic of an individual or an attribute of a group, shaping choices from available ways, means, and outcomes. Nevertheless, diversity and cultural values also differ throughout ethnic groups as well, as is evident in their beliefs (what people assume to be true about the world), norms (socially shared expectations of appropriate behavior), and social practices (typical, predictable behavior patterns followed by a culture). Accordingly, values are the desired characteristics or objectives to which a collective aspires, and are therefore a component of cultural patterns. A particular group's cultural values are not, however, typically an interpretation of that group's actual behaviors and characteristics and what they illustrate. Nevertheless, how ethnic diversity is valued in a society and the influence of these values define the basic understanding of what a group of people regard as important or unimportant, good or bad, fair or unfair, appropriate or inappropriate. Also, from culture to culture, the intensity (importance of the value) differs. Thus, application of this intensity reveals itself as the foundation upon which human services are built, from the perspectives of competent and professional human services providers as well as those who receive the services.

Activity Orientation

Activity orientation is a culture's view of human actions and the activity of expression of oneself. It also provides answers to questions such as the following:

- Is engaging in "good" activities important to being a member of one's culture?
- Is the capability to change one's life circumstances important?
- Are work and play different, and which is more important?
- Is life a series of solvable problems or a collection of event experiences?

A culture's activity orientation is typically defined by choosing a place, on the range of being, doing, and becoming.

- Being cultures value inaction and acceptance of the condition or state of affairs that currently exists. African American and Greek cultures as well as Hindus from India are described as espousing this view. These ethnic groups also tend to adopt the view that all events are predetermined and thus will inevitably occur.
- In contrast, European Americans' dominant characterization is an orientation toward doing (assuming that it is important to get things done, but work is done only at work, and social and personal relationships are totally separate from the working environment). The evaluation of activity comes from scrutinizing a tangible product or observable action directed at others. The values of striving and seeking to change and control one's circumstances, as well as encouragement to work hard, be tenacious, and not give up are embodied in a doing culture. Doing cultures find problem solution a preferable course in dealing with challenges, rather than acceptance of the world's present characteristics.
- Ethnic groups such as Native Americans and South Americans value the activity of becoming; humans are evolving, changing, and are predisposed to reason ways in which to change themselves as a means to effect change in the world.

As a consequence, when being and becoming cultures work and/or interact in an environment of doing cultures, their behavior is often misinterpreted because activity is not typically associated with external products or actions, and interpersonal communication is differently shaped. As a result, interpersonal communication relationship values of being and becoming cultures are ostensibly differentiated from that of doing cultural groups, in which social and personal relationships are totally separate from the working environment. This may lead to reprimands of employees who mix working and socializing.

Social Relations Orientation

Social relations is a description of how a culture of people organize themselves and form relationships with each other. These relations can vary from emphasizing differences and a societal class structure to striving for equality and the absence of a societal class structure. What a culture values in social relationships affects interpersonal communication style. Some cultures may emphasize implicitness, subtlety, and indistinctness. An example of this would be eastern Europeans, African Americans, and Mexican Americans. However, for example, African Americans prefer not to use mediators in communication with fellow culture members. Conversely, the European American preferred value of interpersonal communication is to be specific, explicit, and direct in personal reactions and ideas. They also value, ideally, the belief that people should depend on self to achieve professional business goals. Likewise, some cultures value interdependence and a minimum number of obligations, whereas others encourage acceptance of obligation and independence.

For example, many European Americans underscore equal opportunity and uniformity in their interpersonal relationships, even though certain groups have been treated in discriminatory and unequal ways, especially in regard to human welfare and the organized welfare services that a community provides. Nonetheless, equality as a value and belief is frequently expressed and is a justification of one's actions. In contrast, cultures such as Korean emphasize status differences, while Mexican Americans draw on cultural roots in traditional Mexican values and formalize diverse ways of communicating depending on one's social characteristics, even though a noticeable difference exists in the degree of importance on formality.

Conversely, many people from other cultures have difficulty with cultures such as the United States that stress equality and thus informality in interpersonal relationships

Insomuch as groups are concerned, cultures such as those of Japan, Korea, and China identify with only a few distinct groups, and they value the ties that bind them to these groups; thus, membership may endure a lifetime. In contrast, European Americans typically value membership in many groups, but these alliances may be easily discarded when there is no perceived value, so they are transitory in nature and important for only brief periods of time (e.g., changing jobs, best friends for short intervals of time).

Both African Americans and European Americans value the belief that socioeconomic class should not be a precursor to opportunities and choices that define one's social role. They believe that people should not be restricted by conditions of their origin. Nevertheless, values in cultural patterns can also prescribe different and or appropriate behaviors for men and women, some being strict and specific whereas others allow for more ambiguous interpretation.

Self-Orientation

A culture's self-orientation involves how members of the culture value and describe their identities, the kinds of people who are valued and respected, whether the self is viewed as changeable, and what motivates individuals to actions. For most European Americans the emphasis on the individual self is so intense and omnipresent that it is nearly unfeasible to grasp an opposing outlook. This, too, is the motivation for the value of self-orientation among European Americans as well as African Americans. This belief, combined with the doing culture, helps create a set of beliefs and values that puts individuals in control of their own destinies. Consequently, failure is viewed as a lack of determination and not being inclined toward giving a full effort.

Another point of diversity value distinction as it relates to self is the perception of whether a culture believes people are inherently bad, good, or a combination of the two. For example, the Chinese culture believes people are inherently good and therefore valued, and they must be protected from exposure to corruption. Other cultures, however, rely on religious doctrine and see humans as inherently bad. Related to the emphasis on duties or rights, for instance, the Japanese culture expects its members to act fairly to others because it is their duty. The concept of duties and obligations to others, however, is not a strong motivator for other cultures, such as European Americans.

The allegiance to the old or the young and how these individuals are valued varies across cultures. For example, many Asians and Asian Americans base decisions on the preferences and desires of the senior. In contrast, European Americans place greater value on youth; new ideas and innovation are more important than the wisdom of the past in that culture.

World Orientation

The value placed on whether humans are intrinsically evil, whether humans are different from other animals and plants, and whether they are subjugated or living in harmony with nature, the spiritual world, and other living things defines a culture's world orientation. For instance, in the African and African American worldview, humans exist interactively in a hierarchal unity with God, man, and the natural world. One is to be aligned with the forces of nature and to be an integral part of nature and strive to live in harmony with the universe. Native Americans likewise espouse this value.

The Latino culture places tremendous value on spirituality and sees humans as being subjugated to nature. In contrast, European Americans see humans as separate and distinct from nature and other forms of life. Nature is regarded as something to be manipulated, conquered, and controlled in order to improve life. This is a result of the value placed on the accepted primacy and individuality of each person. Because humans are viewed as distinct from nature, disease, poverty, and hardship can be overcome to accomplish wealth and health. Also, European Americans generally believe and understand that the physical world and spiritual world are separate.

Time Orientation

Time is conceptualized and valued differently among cultures. Some cultures express the future as most important; others, the present; and yet others, the past. Japanese and Chinese cultures place value on the past. Most European Americans view time as valuable and scarce; thus, they strive to save time, daily events are dictated to schedule, and punctuality is defined. For cultures such as Indian, Kenyan, and Argentinian as well as among African Americans, time is less hectic, more relaxed, and more comfortably paced. For African Americans, time is less driven by a need to accomplish tasks than it is to participate in events that create their own cadence.

Benefits of Ethnic Diversity

Nevertheless, management theory's contrast of diversity valuation to politics has in the interim taken a constructive direction. Ethnic diversity values management is being used to transform ethnic diversity into a commerce benefit. Ethnically diverse teams are consciously created to augment innovations and improve output. For example, empirical studies in Europe and the United States show that areas and organizations with a highly diverse work force are innovative and productive. Ethnic diversity, specifically, is seen as a positive feature for development of a knowledge-based economy.

Economists have now started to propound whether ethnic diversity is good or bad from an economic point of view, and why. The common assumption looks to be that ethnic diversity is good for innovations; however, it is troublesome if social consistency is nonexistent. Similarly, business studies literature is even more concrete in stressing the positive aspects of workforce diversity in terms of ethnicity along with gender and age. For instance, one of the world's largest banks refers to the positive aspects of diversity. In addition to ethnic diversity, other individual differences are recognized and appreciated, as well as how diverse perspectives generate creativity, productivity, and performance that would lead organizations to progress.

Ben F. Linton II.
Independent Scholar

See Also: Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Services; Diversity in the Workplace; Ethnicity and Clients.

Further Readings

Gordon, Marshall. "Society, Plural." In "A Dictionary of Sociology" (1998). http://www.encyclopedia.com/doc/1O88-societyplural.html (Accessed September 2013).

Hills, M. D. "Kluckhohn and Strodtbeck's Values Orientation Theory." Online Readings in Psychology and Culture, v.4/4 (2002). http://dx.doi.org/10.9707/2307-0919.1040 (Accessed September 2013).

Lustig, Myron W. and Jolene Koester. Intercultural Competence: Interpersonal Communication Across Cultures, 6th ed. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2010.

Ethnic Groups and Drug and Alcohol Use

Historically, substances such as drugs and alcohol have been utilized throughout the ages. Drugs and alcohol have been used for ceremonial, religious, social, and recreational as well as abusive purposes. That is, drugs and alcohol may be viewed to serve a prosocial or antisocial function for the varying ethnic groupings and persons who imbibe. Societal, political, and moralistic values also contribute to the determination of whether a certain drug or behavior (e.g., alcohol use) is condoned rather than condemned. For example, in the era of Prohibition in the United States, some believed alcohol to be a moral evil, whereas others believed its usage, although illegal, was an inherent right.

A more recent example involves state laws permitting marijuana for medical and/or personal usage. Although this issue has opponents as well as proponents, what appears to have taken place is a general societal shift condoning the use of marijuana for medicinal purposes. In fact, the U.S. Justice Department recently indicated that where state law(s) conflict with, and perhaps contradict, federal law(s), governmental emphasis will be placed upon prosecuting dealers and traffickers rather than individual users themselves. For some, this is seen as a dramatic policy change, particularly since persons of nonmajority groupings who were previously found guilty of nonviolent drug offenses were given what may be considered harsh and long sentences for similar behavior. Although societal, political, and religious values may wax and wane—as well as change—altogether over time there remains a belief that certain minority groupings are predisposed genetically, prone behaviorally or personality-wise, and/or structurally different from the larger majority group.

Biopsychosocial Model

Although biological, psychological, and sociological factors and related theories to explain drug and alcohol use were often seen as contradictory, the overarching biospychosocial model put forth by George Engel is widely held today to better explain the complex nature and interaction of factors that play a role in drug or alcohol use and abuse. Although no one theory is universal, the biospychosocial model allows multiple influences to be accounted for in terms of the development of use and abuse (i.e., alcoholism and addiction).

The biospychosocial model examines a continuum in terms of contributions toward subsequent use and abuse of substances, including such variables as genetics and neurobiology, expectancies for and behaviors prone to use and abuse, as well as familial and peer influences. Furthermore, the biopsychosocial model in effect provides a multifaceted lens from which to view ethnic minority (as well as majority) group drug and alcohol use to provide a comprehensive approach to treatment via human and social services.

What Constitutes a Drug and Drugs of Choice

Many consider a drug to be an illicit or illegal substance that has no medicinal value. Others use a broader interpretation and consider all psychoactive substances, such as caffeine and nicotine, as drugs. Further, many Americans do not perceive alcohol to be a drug per se, notwithstanding the myriad negative consequences (e.g., breakdown of relationships, accidental deaths) associated with drug and alcohol misuse and abuse. Just as societal, political, and moral values shape whether a certain drug or alcohol is considered harmful or inappropriate, there is also disagreement and debate about just what substance(s) rise to the level of being considered drugs. Thus, drugs of choice, such as alcohol, may be perceived as less detrimental than, say, cocaine, even though it is equally damaging physically, psychologically, and socially. Therefore, an ethnic minority user's drug of choice may be seen to be less (or more) self and other impactful, dependent upon a range of issues.

For example, crack cocaine use and its negative effects upon the African American population have been widely viewed as much more damaging to society at large than cocaine usage among the majority Anglo population. What seemingly is agreed, in general, is that a drug's accessibility in combination with the user's monetary means often impacts the choice of substance. Notwithstanding that alcohol is the most widely used drug in America, so-called gateway drugs such as cigarettes or inhalants are often seen to lead to later harder drug usage. For example, a Hispanic individual may initiate drug use by inhaling gasoline, which may lead to alcohol and then marijuana use, which may later lead to cocaine use. What is almost a certainty is that the negative consequences and effects of drugs themselves do not discriminate, yet they are seen to disproportionately impact ethnic minority groupings.

Ethnicity and Risk Factors

Risk factors for ethnic groups are considered to be aspects that influence and increase the likelihood of using drugs or alcohol, and may include heightened socioeconomic difficulty, lack of resources, financial strain, familial unemployment, abuse or violence within the home leading to or resulting in child welfare and department of human services involvement, parental and/or peer substance use, risk-taking personality, positive attitudes and beliefs toward substances, accessibility to alcohol and drugs, neighborhood poverty, community disorganization, targeted enforcement and incarceration, disease, and potential for premature death.

According to the Annie E. Casey Foundation report "Faith Matters: Race/Ethnicity, Religion, and Substance Use," the poor as well as African and Hispanic Americans disproportionately experience negative health and social costs of substance abuse, even though they use substances at similar or lower levels than white Americans. The 2011 National Survey on Drug Use and Health (NSDUH) Summary of National Findings reported that among persons aged 12 years or older, the current rate of illicit drug usage was highest for persons reporting two or more races, followed in order by American Indians or Alaskan Natives, Native Hawai'ians or Pacific Islanders, blacks, whites, Hispanics, and Asian Americans. In contrast, that same NSDUH survey reported that among persons aged 12 years or older, the current rate of alcohol usage was highest for whites, followed in order by persons reporting two or more races, American Indians or Alaskan Natives, Hispanics, blacks, and Asian Americans. Put another way, although substance use does not discriminate by ethnicity, drug and alcohol use is widespread across racial and ethnic groupings.

Which individual, family, peer, and community factor(s) might engender the initiation of substance use? One such community risk factor includes target marketing of alcohol and tobacco products. Focused marketing to ethnic groups has taken place for decades and has been criticized over the years for the disproportionate number of billboard advertisements seen in ethnic neighborhoods. For example, research has shown that marketers advertise billboards containing products with higher alcohol by volume (e.g., malt liquors known as 40s) within ethnic neighborhoods. Not only are larger sizes and brands advertised on billboards, the Annie E. Casey Foundation report indicated that black-oriented magazines contain more alcohol and tobacco advertisements than magazines targeted at the general population. In fact, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) issued an advanced notice of public rule-making as of July 2013 to obtain information related to the potential regulation of menthol in cigarettes, in part due to concerns that the impact of the advertising, sale, and distribution of menthol cigarettes may negatively and disproportionately impact the health of specific ethnic and racial subpopulations. The 2010 NSDUH summary reported that African Americans and other ethnic minority groups were more likely than whites to smoke menthol cigarettes (i.e., African American 86 percent, Hispanic 38 percent, Asian 33 percent, white 27 percent). Thus, disproportionate marketing to ethnic minorities may be viewed to increase risk, particularly so in black and Hispanic communities, in part due to media exposure and alcohol accessibility at neighborhood convenience stores as well as a level of disorganization. Notwithstanding, risk factors may be seen to influence certain ethnic groups' drug and alcohol use, as well as factors believed to delimit one's initiation and harmful use of substances and related negative consequences.

Ethnicity and Protective Factors

Protective factors for ethnic groups are considered to be aspects that act as buffers or preventive agents that decrease the likelihood of using drugs and alcohol. These factors may include education and school involvement; access to resources; familial employment; nurturing and supportive homesteads; parental and/or peer nonuse of substances; high self-esteem; religiosity; inaccessibility and difficulty procuring drugs and alcohol; healthy neighborhoods; communities that thrive, due in part to policing, and are organized; access to health and wellness care; and potential for individual, familial, and community growth and development.

A person smoking a marijuana joint. In the 21st century there has been a general societal shift condoning the use of marijuana for medicinal purposes.

A strong community connection and ties to religiosity and spirituality that certain ethnic groupings evidence (e.g., black, Hispanic, and American Indian) may serve to buffer against substance use through social control. According to the Annie E. Casey Foundation report, a review of 150 studies on alcohol and drug abuse found that persons who consider themselves highly religious were less likely to use substances altogether or to experience negative consequences. A person's attachment, commitment, involvement, and belonging to a group often instill positive attitudes, beliefs, and practices, which may ultimately shape and determine individual values, and thus influence prosocial constructive rather than antisocial destructive behaviors.

Treatment Issues for Ethnic Minorities

Just like no two persons are alike, no two individuals from within an ethnic grouping are exactly alike, neither in terms of presentation nor background. That is, although certain factors may predispose or prevent drug and alcohol use, there is both similarity as well as diversity among persons of a particular ethnicity. Although human and social services workers should be well trained and become learned about ethnicity and racial issues, a wholly complete understanding and accurate picture of the nature of substance use and ethnicity as a factor has yet to materialize nor become clear.

Notwithstanding the aforementioned, human and social services practitioners should familiarize themselves with the culture and customs of those persons and groupings with whom they interact. Information should be sought from the client regarding their own values and beliefs as well as experiences, so as not to stereotype, but rather to tailor an individualized treatment plan that both recognizes one's self-determination and is mindful of one's ethnicity.

Todd Gomez
Northeastern State University

See Also: Acculturation; Alcohol Consumption, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Culturally Specific Services; Drug and Alcohol Screening; Ethnicity and Clients.

Further Readings

Engel, George L. "The Clinical Application of the Biopsychosocial Model." American Journal of Psychiatry, v.137 (1980).

"Faith Matters: Race/Ethnicity, Religion and Substance Use." Annie E. Casey Foundation. http://www.aecf.org/KnowledgeCenter/Publications.aspx?pubguid={823BF99A-67D7-4C09-B3CF-ECCA7CDA6FE1}(Accessed August 2013).

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. Results From the 2010 National Survey on Drug Use and Health: Summary of National Findings. NSDUH Series H-41, HHS Publication No. (SMA) 11-4658. Rockville, MD: Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, 2011.

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. Results From the 2011 National Survey on Drug Use and Health: Summary of National Findings. NSDUH Series H-44, HHS Publication No. (SMA) 12-4713. Rockville, MD: Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, 2012.

Ethnicity, Definitions of

Although the use of the term ethnicity is not very old, the concept goes back to antiquity. It was earlier understood as the feeling of clan and kinship, solidarity of a group or community, and the common strands of behavior and culture. In every phase of human history the consciousness of ethnicity has shown a major presence, and it has been a major cause for conflicts in medieval and ancient times, when racial and cultural pride played vital roles.

The word ethnicity is commonly used as a synonym for nationality, race, and tribe, and denotes the link and identity of any person with any specific culture, region, race, belief, behavioral group, custom, or dialect. Ethnicity has been defined in multiple ways, including three core elements, namely common descent, a common history, and/or a common homeland. Ethnicity has been variously defined in cultural anthropology but no consensus definition has been reached. It is the cultural and social background of an individual in the broad sense of the term. Some scholars associate ethnicity and ethnic groups with nationalities, such as German, French, British, Arab, and Turk.

Since human services professionals aim at ameliorating human problems, the proper understanding of the term ethnicity can help them improve upon the policies and programs for making the term more acceptable, efficient, and dynamic, and will, of course, help these professionals in designing their human services strategies in a diversified human environment.

Etymology

The word ethnicity has been derived from the Greek word ethnos, which entered into English via the Latin word ethnicus. In Homeric Greek, the term had a variant connotation such as swarm, flock, host, or band, which later came to be known as nation or people. Hellenistic Greeks used the term ethnicity to define someone as a foreigner or barbarous. From the late Middle English, it came into vogue as an equivalent to folk or people. In early modern English usage, the term ethnic has been used to describe a pagan or heathen people—those who were not the believers in Christianity, or participated in the Christianoikumene.

The Hebrew word goyim, translated at that time as ta ethne (the nations), was generally used to represent being of little worth, showing a sense of contempt and disdain for the attitudinal behavior, values, and practices of non-Jews. Sometimes it was used in a neutral, even positive way to refer to a Christian; however, it suggested a degree of condescension.

In the 19th century, the term ethnic meant something peculiar to a race, people, or nation, which is somehow closer to the original Greek meaning. As a term, ethnic group was used for the first time in 1935. The Oxford English Dictionary placed ethnicity in its vocabulary in 1972. In a broad sense, therefore, the term ethnic group describes a group sharing common cultural heritage, ancestry, physical appearance, mythology and history, motherland, ritual, culture, cuisine, dialect, and linguistic patterns.

Modern Definitions of Ethnicity

Different social scientists have used various approaches, such as primordialism, essentialism, perennialism, constructivism, modernism, and instrumentalism, to study and define ethnicity. In pre-Weber intelligentsia, social scientists had blended the concept of race and ethnicity. Max Weber's introduction of ethnicity as a social construct has segregated the study of ethnicity from race. Cultural theorists such as Stuart Hall, Etienne Balibar, and Immanuel Wallerstein hold the view that ethnicity must be viewed as a plastic and malleable social construction that derives its meanings from the particular situations of those who invoke it. They find that "ethnicity has no essence or center, no underlying features or common denominator." John Hutchinson and Anthony D. Smith focus on ethnic group, or ethnie, as the major catalyst of ethnicity, and find the six main features of an ethnic group to be "a proper name, common ancestry, historical memories, elements of common culture, an association with the homeland, and a sense of solidarity." Gerald Berreman finds ethnicity to be a level of social stratification or social inequality that also includes race, class, kinship, age, estate, caste, and gender. He has clearly differentiated ethnicity from race or class.

Sian Jones has summarized the existing definitions and theories of ethnicity, and has suggested her own definition with the help of three terms: "ethnicity, ethnic identity, and ethnic group." To Jones, ethnicity is a "social and psychological phenomena associated with a culturally constructed group identity." She has analyzed the patterns of primordialists and instrumentals, and has suggested her alternative approach, known as practice theory, which includes many aspects of both. Primordialists such as Clifford Geertz, Edward Shils, and Harold Isaacs have found ethnicity to be a natural phenomenon with its foundations in family and kinship ties. Isaacs described ethnic identity as the "basic group identity."

While critiquing primordialists' approaches, Jones finds that they are not balanced, and simply make the ex post facto arguments. Jones finds the instrumentalist theory to be relating ethnicity with the mediation of social relations, "and the negotiation of access to resources, primarily economic and political resources." She finds the instrumentalists to represent two groups—those focusing on the sociostructural and cultural dimensions of ethnicity, and those representing the interpersonal and behavioral aspects of ethnicity with greater subjectivist stance.

Later, Jones offered a balanced definition of ethnicity. To her, ethnicity "is not a passive reflection of similarities and differences in the cultural practices and structural conditions in which people are socialized." It is not created "entirely in the process of social interaction, whereby epiphenomenal cultural symbols are consciously manipulated in the pursuit of economic and political interests."

In summary, ethnicity can be defined as an understanding or allegiance to a specific cultural group on the basis of genetics, mythology, dialectical patterns in language, sociopolitical consciousness, behavior, shared developmental patterns, and cultural manifestations.

Ravindra Pratap Singh
University of Lucknow

See Also: Biculturalism; Cultural Determinism; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Ethnocentrism; Honor Killings; Subcultures.

Further Readings

Banks, Marcus. Ethnicity: Anthropological Constructions. London: Routledge, 1996.
Hutchinson, John and Anthony D. Smith, eds. Ethnicity. London: Oxford University Press, 1996.
Jones, Sian. The Archaeology of Ethnicity: Constructing Identities in the Past and Present. London: Routledge, 1997.
Sollors, Werner. Theories of Ethnicity: A Classical Reader. New York: New York University Press, 1996.

Ethnicity and Clients

This overview of ethnicity highlights some of the problems inherent in its definition as well as its utility in the human services. The current political goals to decrease ethnic health disparities rely heavily upon human services professionals' use of the term ethnicity. Ethnicity can be utilized to either clarify or muddle aspects of the client that relate to mental health. Human services professionals who are committed to the well-being of their clients will use ethnicity along with an array of other salient characteristics to best serve their clients. Professionals who are complacent might rely on ethnicity alone for predicting therapeutic outcomes or pathology, ignoring the more relevant statuses or divisions of its meaning, The different components of ethnicity as well as the statuses related to it have been well researched by psychologists and social workers. This information can be used to understand the client and to identify a professional orientation to ethnicity that is practical and beneficial. By understanding the meaning of ethnicity, professionals in human services can help ensure that disparities are reduced, not perpetuated, while serving, evaluating, and generating programs to enhance the well-being of ethnic clients.

The meaning of ethnicity relies most upon its political context followed by its use among professionals, its measurement as either open-ended or a forced choice, and the varying degrees to which individuals identify with the label. Today, ethnicity is defined within a political context that seeks to reduce health disparities. This means that the inclusion of ethnic labels is required for federally funded research so as to reduce ethnic health disparities as part of a sociopolitical agenda. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services offers the following five categorizations for ethnicity: "No, not of Hispanic, Latino/a, or Spanish origin"; "Yes, Mexican, Mexican American, Chicano/a"; "Yes, Puerto Rican"; "Yes, Cuban"; and "Yes, another Hispanic, Latino or Spanish origin." These standard ethnic group, were derived from the U.S. Office of Management and Budget. This measurement of ethnicity is considered a forced, rather than open-ended choice. It has been adopted by national organizations such as the U.S. National Institutes of Health, Census Bureau, Department of Health and Human Services, and Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The inclusion of ethnic categories in research and practice is required in accordance with the Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association and Guidelines on Multicultural Education, Training, Research, Practice and Organizational Change for Psychologists.

Professional Orientations to Ethnicity

Professionals in human services are typically concerned with when to use ethnicity appropriately as opposed to reaching consensus on its definition. Paired with modern requirements to capture ethnicity using standards set by the government, the term ethnicity, in its essence, is dynamic and interactive. Ethnicity represents a social construct whose use by practitioners demonstrates either their complacency or commitment to achieving a clearer definition. A professional whose orientation to ethnicity is more complacent than committed will use the category to provide insight to appropriate practices, to explore pathologies related to ethnic group membership, or to predict outcomes. An orientation to ethnicity that is committed reflects a consideration of the validity of the term or the heterogeneity of its group members. Individuals with a committed orientation to ethnicity are less likely to use the concept alone as a predictor of outcomes, pathology, or appropriate services, and instead to focus on related factors that are more reliable and well-researched.

Understanding ethnicity as having three components—culture, subjective identity, and shared experiences—has utility in the human services even though orientations to ethnicity are varied between complacent and committed. Professionals in the human services can further understand ethnicity and the client by identifying the characteristics perceived to be shared among Hispanics/Latinos, despite the group's heterogeneity. Some of these characteristics include interdependence, willingness to sacrifice for group welfare, avoidance of conflict, strong attachment, loyalty, connectedness to extended family, adherence to gender roles, obedience to authority, and being flexible about time.

Professional Utility of Ethnicity

Effectively utilizing ethnicity to improve the quality of services requires knowing the individual's orientation to ethnicity (i.e., culture, subjective identity, and shared experiences) simultaneous to understanding the professional's orientation to ethnicity (i.e., complacent or committed) while identifying how it has been assessed (open-ended versus forced choice). An example of complacent practice would be assuming the aforementioned ethnic group characteristics to be true for an individual whose ethnicity is measured via forced-choice categorization. For professionals whose orientation to ethnicity is committed, the assessment of an individual's ethnicity as open-ended helps avoid stereotypes. Assessing ethnicity open-endedly taps into the client's orientation to the social group. Individuals who choose to freely identify with an ethnic label reveal their perceptions about shared experiences. Aspects of an ethnic group that are viewed as homogenous in the eyes of the client generate useful clues about that client's subjective identity. The shared characteristics of an ethnic group, as perceived by the client, are most likely to be assessed by committed professionals open-endedly in order to generate a truer definition. In this capacity, ethnicity may help in understanding clients and the degree to which they identify with their ethnic group.

Ethnic groups in the United States lack the characteristics of a category; therefore, knowing a client's ethnicity alone will not explain outcomes per se. Heterogeneity within an ethnic category (more differences within a group than similarities) is inevitable. This is especially true for forced-choice measures and those who respond to the category "Yes, another Hispanic, Latino, or Spanish origin." The ethnicity of the client relies partially on the practitioner's orientation to the term and the framing of its assessment. Assessing ethnicity open-endedly generates more knowledge about the client's subjective identity, whereas understanding ethnicity via forced choice generates a social address that provides a clinician with an idea of where that client has been placed in and by society.

To utilize ethnicity effectively when providing help or care, the consideration of ethnically salient statuses becomes increasingly important. These salient features are immigrant, generational, and acculturative status—better suited for use in the human services than ethnicity alone. These different statuses have been well researched in terms of the pathology of mental illness, access to mental health services, and outcomes. Ethnic group members are shaped and impacted by these statuses in ways that are important for professionals in the human services to understand.

Immigrant Status and the Client

Immigrant status refers to whether an individual was born within the United States. It further specifies the characteristics of ethnic clients that are perceived as being shared but often are not. Immigrant status is more characteristic of a category than the label of ethnicity. Immigrant status is capable of distinguishing important differences among ethnic group members and is related to the human services in three different ways: accessing mental health services, mental health outcomes, and the pathology of certain mental illnesses.

Ethnic group members born outside of the United States are more likely than ethnic clients born in the country to inhabit immigrant communities. Within these immigrant communities the visibility of mental health services is poor. This environmental barrier to service, combined with individual differences among immigrant clients, is a determinant of underutilizing mental health services. Identifying whether an ethnic individual was born in the United States is valuable toward understanding why and/or how an ethnic client accesses services as it relates to the composition of his or her community.

The immigration statuses of clients can be related to outcomes by way of their environment, similar to accessing care. The degrees to which immigrant ethnic clients access care and rely on familial bonds for support relate to how well a client responds to receiving services in a professional setting. Family as a primary source of support is considered a barrier to accessing services outside of the home. Familial bonds are often anticipated to be stronger for immigrant clients compared to those who were born in the United States. Reasons for this difference include community settings, language, customs, practices, and access to ethnic foods, as well as other factors, including generational status and acculturation. Members of a particular ethnic group vary individually in terms of resiliency, mental health problems, vulnerability, and responses to services as well. These ideas suggest that professionals in the human services need to focus more on environmental factors than ethnic group membership alone. Therefore, in terms of outcomes, immigration status explains factors salient to mental health better than ethnicity alone.

Immigrant status is related to the pathology of mental illness, and this relationship has come to be known as the immigrant paradox. The idea is that immigrant status protects against a variety of psychological disorders. This phenomenon is labeled a paradox because it is often assumed that the stress related to immigration or emigration would be a risk factor for these individuals. Ethnic group members who were born outside of the United States, however, are far less likely to develop anxiety or depression disorders compared to their non-Hispanic white counterparts. Ethnic group members born in the United States are more likely to have psychological issues similar to nonethnic groups. This paradox is not, however, generalizable to all Hispanics and Latinos—it has been found to be most consistent among Mexican Americans, whereas for Cubans and other ethnic groups it holds true only for substance abuse disorders. Again, the strength of the familial bond is an influence on the relationship between immigrant status and mental health pathology. Familial bond relates to acculturation, generational status, and environmental conditions, explaining the way in which immigrant status maintains or enhances well-being.

Acculturation and the Client

Acculturation is known as the process in which a client adapts to the culture of their country of residency. Aspects of this process include language use, behaviors, and subjective identity. The process of acculturation is dynamic. It can be both beneficial and harmful to well-being, and is influenced by generational status, age, and immigrant status. Acculturation and mental health are related in three different ways: (1) the degree to which an individual acculturates to their country of residence, (2) the degree to which the individual retains the culture of their country of origin (enculturation), and (3) the way in which the two interact. The latter, termed biculturalism, is anticipated to be the most protective orientation to culture for ethnic group members.

Ethnic group members who were born in the United States or have lived in the country for a long period of time may adopt dominant cultural norms. Specifically, acculturation via language, behaviors, and identity has been found to relate to positive mental health experiences. Language is one of the necessary tools to navigate society. The relationship between language and education, employment, and other adaptive features of society explains why ethnic group members who acculturate typically have better well-being than those who do not.

Ethnic group members who are highly enculturated, or have maintained the culture from their country of origin, have been found to have adverse mental health outcomes as a result. Feelings of not belonging can relate to poor mental health.

Individuals who acculturate minimally to the dominant culture are more likely to experience anxiety as a result. Immigrant communities that do not require the use of dominant cultural behaviors or practices, however, may not relate to negative mental health. Varying degrees of acculturation within the family can generate discourse related to well-being. Children of immigrant parents may not feel as though their parents have the resources to cope with problems specific to the dominant culture norms, which can relate to accessing mental health care.

Ethnic group members can benefit most by acculturating and enculturating: it can increase their resources and maintain well-being. Clients who identify with the dominant culture as well as with their ethnic culture have twice the cultural tools required for interaction and acclimation. This concept of biculturalism is useful in the human services as it identifies more than one source of cultural information for the client. Knowing that the more cultures a client identifies with is beneficial can help achieve positive outcomes.

Generational Status and the Client

“First generation” refers to individuals born outside of the United States being the first members of their family to migrate to the United States. The offspring of first-generation individuals constitute the second generation of a family, and their offspring constitute the third, and so on. Generational status is intertwined with dimensions of ethnic clients that relate to acculturation and mental health; it is specific to family context and immigration status. As previously mentioned, familial bond—the degree to which family members rely on one another for support—is predictive of accessing outside help or care. Families with no more than two generations present in the household would be expected to have greater family cohesion. Third-generation ethnic group members are anticipated to have more familial conflict than first- or second-generation households. As a result, multigenerational family members may seek out services at rates comparable to non-Hispanic whites. In the community, generational status influences which coethnic group members a client chooses to identify (or not identify) with. Differences between generations are often related to acculturation. First-generation ethnic clients are more likely to live in communities highly populated with immigrants and are strongly enculturated to their country of origin. First-generation clients living in nonimmigrant communities, especially those clients who are younger, may be more likely to have adverse mental health issues arise as a result of their otherness. For use in the human services, generational status is relevant to ethnic clients because of its interaction with immigration and acculturation. Ethnicity alone tells little about clients, their environment, or the outcomes in the context of the human services.

Compounding Race and Ethnicity

A portion of clients in the United States are identified as being nonethnic group members. For some of those clients, their racial categorization may make salient some of the topics discussed in this article. Ethnicity is intended to identify only those who have an ancestry of Latin or Hispanic background. Clients from racial groups such as Asian, Pacific Islander, or eastern European may not meet the criteria for ethnic group membership per se, but they are impacted by generational, acculturative, and immigrant status as well. As a result of this, ethnicity and race are often used interchangeably or inclusive of other social groups such as Jewish, Amish, or Mormon.

Ethnicity, however, is defined in the United States to pertain only to individuals who identify through forced-ethnic labels whether their ancestors, or they themselves, came from Spanish-speaking countries. These countries include, but are not limited to, Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Puerto Rico, Spain, Uruguay, and Venezuela.

Together, race and ethnicity can generate two subtypes of ethnic group members determined by skin color: white-ethnic and black-ethnic. This intersection of race and ethnicity promotes that non-Hispanic white is the norm and that other racial groupings require further specification, or ethnicity, to describe to what degree they are Hispanic/Latino. Therefore, non-Hispanic whites, by definition, are without ethnicity. The racial groupings within Latin countries (e.g., Mexico, Puerto Rico, or Cuba) are not considered, even when assessing ethnicity within the context of race. For Americans whose ancestry is within one of the aforementioned countries, a label of ethnicity is an option. The label is not universal. For example, a person with markedly dark skin residing in the United States could potentially identify racially as black/African American and ethnically as Hispanic/Cuban. In this sense, the role of identifying ethnicity is simply to determine whether that individual is tied, historically, to a Spanish-speaking country. This same individual may opt not to respond further and identify only in terms of race. The importance of assessing ethnicity open-endedly relates to its effective use in the human services. Understanding individuals and the degree to which they identify with the shared experience of their ethnic group simultaneous to their own orientation to ethnicity is the ideal for professional practices.

Amanda L. Almond
University of Rhode Island, Kingston

See Also: Acculturation; Biculturalism; Cuban Americans; Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Dominican Americans; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Ethnic Groups and Drug and Alcohol Use; Ethnicity, Definitions of; Family Structure, Diversity of; Health Disparities, Role of; Help-Seeking Behavior, Cultural Differences in; Hispanic Americans; Hispanic Immigrants; Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of; Immigration: Human Services Issues; Mexican Americans; Puerto Ricans; Racial and Ethnic Categories, U.S. Census; South American Immigrants.

Further Readings

Alegira, M. et al. “Prevalence of Mental Illness in Immigrant and Non-Immigrant U.S. Latino Groups.” American Journal of Psychiatry, v.165 (2008).

American Psychological Association Presidential Task Force on Immigration. “Crossroads: The Psychology of Immigration in the New Century.” Journal of Latina/o Psychology, v.1 (2013).

Delgado-Romero, E., N. Galvan, P. Maschino, and M. Rowland. “Race and Ethnicity in Empirical Counseling and Counseling Psychology Research: A 10-Year Review.” The Counseling Psychologist, v.33 (2005).

Marin, G. and B. Marin. Research with Hispanic Populations. Newbury Park, CA: Sage, 1991.

Phinney, J. “When We Talk about American Ethnic Groups, What Do We Mean?” American Psychologist, v.51 (1996).

Ruiz, E., R. Auirre, and D. Mitschke,. “What Leads Non-U.C.-Born Latinos to Access Mental Health Care?” Social Work in Health Care, v.52 (2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. “HHS Announces Refined Survey Standards to Examine and Help Eliminate Differences in Care Based on Race, Ethnicity, Sex, Primary Language, or Disability.” CHHN press release. http://www.hhs.gov/news/press/2011pres/10/20111031b.html (Accessed November 2013).

Ethnocentrism

Ethnocentrism is a term commonly used to describe a group-held belief that one’s group is the center of everything and that all others should be rated with reference to it. The original conceptualization of ethnocentrism was defined as a belief that one’s own group has a style of living and values that were better or superior to those of other groups. By the mid 1900s, ethnocentrism had come to stand for an individual’s unsophisticated reactions to cultural differences. Research by Gordon Allport confirmed this allegiance to in-group norms. Ethnocentrism has been extended to understand in-group/out-group violence, intolerance, and the presence of authoritarianism in particular members of society.

In recent years, the term has been further expanded to apply to acts of discrimination toward new immigrant groups in transitioning democracies or in societies that have, until now, enjoyed a relatively homogenous population. It can also be used to explain judgmental thoughts and actions toward out-groups. Finally, ethnocentrism should be understood as assuming out-groups are threatening in some fashion, typically through misunderstanding or disregard for other ethnicities as well as racial, cultural, or historic traditions.

In the fields of sociology, urban politics, political behavior, and psychology, much research has been conducted to determine the extent of ethnocentric attitudes in society. In the field of human services, caseworkers, personnel, and clients should be aware of all forms of ethnocentrism because it can affect interpersonal communication, evaluation, efficacy of service provision, and overall work conditions.

Ethnocentrism, In-Groups, and Out-Groups

William Sumner held that groups in society are naturally in conflict and that peace between warring factions could be explained by the demands of war by the in-group on an out-group to maintain peace. Ethnocentric behavior is based on boundaries created by the in-group that are usually defined by one or more observable characteristics (such as physical features, religion, or language) regarded as indicators of common descent. An in-group can also be described as a group of individuals with cultural, racial, historic, or ethnic similarities that share an attitude of superiority toward an out-group. In-group members hold that out-group members are alien, foreign, or otherwise by nature—they are different and therefore can be discriminated against.

In-group members often think they have a proprietary claim on privileges, benefits, and power. They also are suspicious that the out-group has designs on in-group benefits. This situation of open and constant warfare produces within the in-group sentiments of loyalty, superiority, and approval of distinct views coupled with disdain, hatred, and contempt for the out-group. This hostility toward any out-group, typically referred to as xenophobia, is exhibited in small forms ranging from preferences of consumer choices (e.g., Ford over Honda) to large-scale conflicts (e.g., the Chechen War, discrimination toward Jews in Nazi Germany, the U.S. civil rights movement), euthanasia, and voting. Extending the definition further, Sumner states that for group cohesion to last, it must be well-disciplined; therefore, discord within the in-group could result in expulsion. Thus, the creation of internal practices that promote solidarity and similar belief structures to hold the group together against outside influences fosters attitudes of ethnocentrism.

Ethnocentrism and Culture

In a multicultural society, the dominant group (in-group) determines the standards for society. Therefore, when the dominant group holds the belief that their standards or beliefs are superior or ideal, then the behaviors of the minority groups are viewed as inferior. This difference can be seen by comparing one's feelings toward the people who live in a neighboring town or city in the United States. In this example, one feels an affinity toward one's friends and local community, as well as the uniqueness of community activities, the local economy, and civic culture.

Thus, the neighborhood affinity, also called in-group consciousness, is superior to that of a nearby neighborhood. But both neighborhoods, as part of one town, are superior to those of another town. Compare this to the way people use knives and forks. Individuals usually do not think of the way knives and forks are used in one town as superior to the way another town or neighborhood uses them, but may consider these implements handier when eating than say, chopsticks or tearing meat directly from the bone. This in-group consciousness is born from familial relationships, territorial interests, or other associative affinities in daily or periodic contact. Through the process of socialization and enculturalization (forks, yes; chopsticks, no) as well as regular reintegration of cultural patterns between and within individuals, feelings of in-group superiority can develop, leading to ethnocentrism.

Present Day Ethnocentrism

In the United States, studies of ethnocentrism have shown that white attitudes toward civil rights issues have shifted over time from outright discrimination to specific grievances with social programs aimed at redressing social inequities. In current discussions on racism and discrimination, ethnocentrism is hidden, or discussed in a language that cloaks actual meaning. Additionally, by eliminating legal discrimination by race, religion, or ethnic background, in-groups have tried to exhibit their dominance by putting into place restrictive employment standards vis-à-vis state immigration laws in Arizona and Mississippi, or using other means to determine in-group membership (e.g., name bias, not in my backyard, or systemic bias in health care).

Ethnocentrism is thought to involve substantial cognitive ability and is based on a variety of social and cultural inputs. Forms of ethnocentrism can be found in most societies and is even thought to be something developed in the preconscious. Individuals exhibiting ethnocentric ideology tend to divide humanity into groups, and then determine whether they identify or counteridentify with them. If a group is counteridentified, individuals react by rejecting the out-group's legitimacy. Ethnocentric persons will express their disdain by criticizing the out-group in moralistic or pseudopatriotic terms.

They also tend to shift in-group/out-group distinction, depending on the issue being discussed. By asking respondents how close or far they feel from other groups or individuals in society, researchers have reliably been able to identify anti-Semitism, racism, and sexism as well as ethnic discrimination in respondents and the traits connected to the formation of ethnocentric attitudes.

Research since the 2000s has focused on the mechanisms by which people incorporate ethnocentric thinking into their evaluations of others. Explorations in subliminal priming, rationalized racism, and the creation of social identity as a psychological phenomenon have been shown to be contributors to decreases in overt racial or ethnic discrimination while simultaneously showing increases in ethnocentrism throughout society as a whole. More recently, ethnocentrism has been correlated to increases in ethnic conflict, consumer decisions in purchases based on marketing strategies, changes in voting behavior, and war across the world. As national boundaries, globalization, and immigration practices take hold throughout the world, it would seem that ethnocentrism as a strategy to self-select into like-minded groups will increase.

Davia Cox Downey
Grand Valley State University

See Also: Ethnicity, Definitions of; Implicit Bias; Power, Race, Ethnicity and; Racism, Long-Term Effects of.

Further Readings

Adorno, Theodor W., Else Frenkel-Brunswik, Daniel J. Levinson, and Nevitt Sanford. The Authoritarian Personality. New York: Harper, 1950.

Allport, Gordon W. The Nature of Prejudice. Cambridge, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1954.

Campbell, Donald T. and Ronald A. Levine. Ethnocentrism: Theories of Conflict, Ethnic Attitudes and Group Behavior. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1972.

Kinder, Donald R. and Cindy D. Kam. Us Against Them: Ethnocentric Foundations of American Opinion. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2012.

Schuman, Howard P., Charlotte Steeh, Lawrence D. Bobo, and Maria Krysan. Racial Attitudes in America: Trends and Interpretations. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997.

Sumner, William G. Folkways: A Study of the Sociological Importance of Usages, Manners, Customs, Mores and Morals. Boston: Ginn, 1906.

Ethnocentrism and Ethnorelativism

Human services professionals aim at ameliorating human problems; a knowledge of ethnocentrism and ethnorelativism can help them improve policies and programs and make them more acceptable, efficient, and dynamic. A knowledge of ethnocentrism and ethnorelativism will, of course, help them in designing their human services strategies in a diversified human environment.

Ethnocentrism

Ethnocentrism is defined as having the idea that your own group or culture is better or more important than others. Expression of ethnocentrism may be subtle of overt and generally has a negative connotation. A person with ethnocentrism believes in the superiority of one's own culture. Such individuals or groups do not allow other people or other groups into their category and create barriers in the smooth flow of communication. This tendency in its extreme stage takes the form of xenophobia, phobia of foreigners and strangers, which becomes a deadly barrier in communication.

Ethnocentrism can occur due to the conditioning of the individual. In other words, it has to do with how individuals or groups have developed an understanding toward the socially acquired rules or norms of human behavior. Ethnocentrism may be regional, cultural, or can originate from the manner that an individual adopts to educate himself or herself.

Based on cultural, contextual, psychological, social, and rational factors, ethnocentrism is a development of a kind of tendency in which individuals or groups become judgmental on their own set principles and rules of human behavior. Ethnocentrism can also be correlated to cultural relativism, a concept in anthropology. Cultural nearsightedness is the mild form of ethnocentrism, which is characterized by a person simply neglecting another culture in comparison to the person's own culture.

The term ethnocentrism, coined by William G. Sumner, is used in anthropology and cultural studies. It has mixed response among the intelligentsia Franz Boas and Bronislaw Malinowski, who have criticized the concept of ethnocentrism and suggested that any cultural scientist should avoid this practice.

Antiethnocentric ideas have been propounded by Malinowski in The Sexual Life of Savages in North-Western Melanesia, by Ruth Benedict in Patterns of Culture, and by Margaret Mead in Coming of Age in Samoa. Ethnocentrism creates the paradigm of self and other by creating the icon of binary opposition at a later stage, which harbors subconscious discrimination in public spheres and the workplace as well.

Ethnocentric behavior can be seen throughout history in human civilizations across all cultures. Many religious sects and cultures had long been involved in group favoritism and other group condemnation. Belief in ethnocentrism has led to the development of cultural and social barriers. The bush tradition in the settlers' colonies in Canada, cultural chauvinism, and distinction based on creed or sect have emanated from such a belief. In colonial situations, it has been observed as a rampant pattern.

Ethnocentrism has created many constructs leading to cultural chauvinism, such as the names Brahmavart and then Aryavart in ancient India, deprecating the existence of other non-Aryan cultures in the land. Derogatory words such as kafir (nonbeliever) and savage, among others, or addressing any nation or culture by expressions such as "one nation under God," "God's own country," "divine nation," "God's promised land," and "God's chosen people" are typical.

British expansionism in the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries, expressions such as "white man's burden," the mandate of heaven in China, the concept of Arya and Anarya cultures in ancient Indian history, the concept of Nazi versus others in Nazi Germany, opposition of believers and nonbelievers in the Islamic and non-Islamic world, unwanted cultural colonization in the later decades of the 20th century and in the 21st century, and many more examples coincide with the cult of ethnocentrism.

Examples of ethnocentrism are spread in subcultures, pop cultures, and literature. Television serials and movies in all cultures have shown instances of ethnocentrism. Other examples include William Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, George Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion, Zora Neale Hurston's Their Eyes Were Watching God, and George Ryga's The Ecstasy of Rita Joe.

Ethnocentrism is a big barrier in intercultural communication and stands as a major factor for the clashes of different cultures, religions, castes, and sects all over the world. It emanates racism and prejudice, pride and vanity, and weakens human bonds and the cult of universal brotherhood. To avoid ethnocentrism, one should avoid simplification and unnecessarily being judgmental, and one should be thorough and objective in idea formation and criticism.

Ethnorelativism

Ethnorelativism, in contrast, is a concept of embracing the values of other cultures. It is prouniversal brotherhood, with a trend of looking at other cultures with a sense of understanding. The trend of liberalization and globalization has made the world a global village in which the bonds of cultures are breaking, giving way to a world culture truly based on cosmopolitanism. The Internet and social media sites have largely contributed to the concept of ethnorelativism. Gone are the days when blind nationalism and cultural chauvinism were the words of pride and superiority. Nationalism is not enough today, and mutual cooperation and understanding have become the current buzzwords.

If ethnocentrism sees a threat in another culture, ethnorelativism sees amity in that culture. A shift from ethnocentrism and ethnorelativism means a diversion from hatred toward love. Whereas ethnocentrism is based on denial, ethnorelativism stands for acceptance. Milton Bennett has presented categorical development of the two concepts, and has sketched the journey from ethnocentrism to ethnorelativism as a movement in six stages: denial, defense, minimization, acceptance, adaptation, and integration. From the first stage to the last, the behavior and attitude of the practitioners of the culture change toward other cultures. A person or culture that journeys from ethnocentrism to ethnorelativism moves from an uncultured vision to a multicultural rainbow of perception. For education and learning, trade and commerce, world peace and sustainable development, ethnorelativism is the need of the hour.

Ravindra Pratap Singh
University of Lucknow

See Also: Biculturalism; Cultural Determinism; Ethnicity, Definitions of; Honor Killings.

Further Readings

Andersen, Margaret L. and Howard Francis Taylor. Sociology: Understanding a Diverse Society. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2006.

Bennett, Milton. "Towards Ethnorelativism: A Developmental Model of Intercultural Sensitivity." In M. Paige, ed., Education for the Intercultural Experience. Yarmouth, ME: Intercultural Press, 1993.

Hammond, R. A. and R. Axelrod. "The Evolution of Ethnocentrism." Journal of Conflict Resolution, v.50/6 (2006).

Merton, Robert King and Piotr Sztompka, eds. On Social Structure and Science. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

Omohundro, John T. Thinking Like an Anthropologist: A Practical Introduction to Cultural Anthropology. New York: McGraw-Hill, 2008.

European Americans

Because U.S. society increasingly sees itself as a "salad bowl" rather than a "melting pot," diversity and multicultural perspectives in human services provision need to extend to clients who are part of the European American majority, not just members of ethnic and racial minority groups. This shift poses several challenges. The European minority is expected to maintain political and economic power, dominance and influence, it is projected to retain a European American majority. In previous times, members of this group thought of themselves as simply Americans. While many European Americans think of themselves as race- and culture-free, social scientists understand European American identity as a socially constructed set of categories to be understood, addressed, and engaged in effective service delivery. Whereas some immigrants from Europe are nonwhite, the term European American today typically refers to persons who are racially white—a distinction not always made in the 19th and 20th centuries, when some European immigrant populations were not always considered "white." This is not a neutral issue of terminology; white, European American social identity is charged with subjective meaning and carries economic and social mobility advantages.

Some European Americans are immigrants from western and eastern European countries, each with distinctive cultures and cultural values; others are their children born in the United States; most are descendants of immigrants from generations past. Distinctions relevant to human services provision are drawn between those assimilated and acculturated to the U.S. majority culture, those in the process of acculturating, and those who retain a "hyphenated American" identity. These distinctions, not limited to a generational dimension, have implications for the language of service delivery and for whether services should be provided in culture- or community-specific programs. European Americans are diverse in socioeconomic status, religion, and many other dimensions. Increasingly, they prefer or insist that human service providers respect and address their chosen identity, cultural particularities, and needs. While this can at times assume racist and anti-immigrant overtones, it is important that human services providers recognize that this is not always or exclusively the case, but can reflect positive self-regard and cultural pride.

Intersectionality theory developed as a way to understand that identity is complex, layered, and conflictual, not unidimensional. Thus, the identities and human service needs of European Americans involve considerations of socioeconomic status, gender, sexual orientation, religious, and other categories. Intersectionality theory argues that human service provision program design and service delivery needs to take into account that European Americans fit into multiple, sometimes conflicting categories of identity; a diversity of client preferences, values, and needs have to be taken into account in program design and provider training. This acquires particular salience when serving European American language and religious minorities.

European Americans living in poverty may need service providers to have particular sensitivity to their shame at being a socioeconomic minority within a majority seen as privileged. European American men may feel that human service providers are insensitive to their values and needs, especially if they follow traditional role models and values. European American women receiving human services often need providers to appreciate that they may embrace diverse gender role experiences and values, may or may not have histories of domestic and sexual violence and rape or be open to speaking about them, and may or may not embrace feminism. In programs serving persons with hyphenated white ethnic identities, lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transsexual (LGBT) individuals may feel invisible and inhibited from articulating their needs. Persons with religious orientations may be reluctant to engage in human services, or guarded in their interactions with providers; conversely, religiously identified human services organizations may need to pay particular attention to making their services attuned to diverse groups of European American clients.

White privilege is defined as the unearned advantages that come from being white in a racially stratified society, and is embedded in institutional structures largely unnoticed among European Americans. Whites are carefully taught to ignore this privilege, but to believe that their lives are neutral, normative, and typical—that people of color are marginalized and oppressed through some inherent fault of their own. Public policies, laws, and unspoken practices reflect this oppression in human services systems and society. Racial socialization describes the process, often intergenerational, by which people learn about themselves and others. In a society that advantages whites, most often the belief is that this is the only legitimate worldview. Most European Americans do not self-identify as white. It is often difficult for European Americans to acknowledge whiteness and white privilege.

When European Americans first become aware of their white privilege, feelings of shame, guilt, anger, and considerable pain may surface. Such acknowledgement may come in human services systems, in which European Americans often encounter ways that they are similar to and simultaneously privileged over oppressed populations of color. Human services workers, on the front lines of such charged encounters, can help European American clients understand their emotional reactions to white privilege and understand how they contribute to and are hurt by oppressive practices. Understanding European Americans as a cultural group with both historical and cultural specificities and within-group diversity is an emerging perspective in the human services. By reviewing ways in which European Americans present both legitimate cultural needs and issues of privilege in human services settings, one hopes to offer program developers, administrators, and service providers some conceptual tools for making their work with this population more sensitive, attuned, and effective.

Richard Ruth
Deanna Davis
George Washington University

See Also: Ethnic Diversity and Values; Ethnicity and Clients; Ethnicity, Definitions of; Ethnocentrism; Ethnocentrism and Ethnorelativism.

Further Readings

Hasenfeld, Y., ed. Human Services as Complex Organizations. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2009.
Ignatiev, N. How the Irish Became White. New York: Routledge, 2008.
Lund, C. L. "The Nature of White Privilege in the Teaching and Training of Adults." New Directions for Adult and Continuing Education, v.125 (2010).
Putnam, R. D. "E Pluribus Unum: Diversity and Community in the Twenty-First Century." Scandinavian Political Studies, v.30/2 (2007).
Rothenberg, P., ed. Race, Class, and Gender in the United States. 7th ed. New York: Worth, 2007.

Executive Orders

According to the National Organization for Human Services, human services workers need to "have preparation which helps them to understand human development, group dynamics, organizational structure, how communities are organized, how national policy is set, and how social systems interact in producing human problems." A key service performed by human services workers is integrating their clients into the community by helping them obtain a job. Human services workers serve a wide variety of clients, including the elderly,

President Barack Obama signs legislation in the Oval Office on December 22, 2010. Executive orders (EOs) are issued by the president and have the full force of law, even without the approval of Congress. EOs differ in that they cannot create new laws and can only interpret old ones. EOs generally affect only government workers and contractors.

homeless, immigrants, and veterans, as well as people with addictions, criminal records, disabilities, and mental illnesses. Many of these groups may be subject to different types of discrimination and stigma.

As such, it is important for human services workers to advocate for their clients, repudiate potential stereotypes, and remind employers of the legal statutes protecting their clients. To do this, human services workers must be familiar with past employment laws to help protect and advocate for their clients in the employment sphere.

Legislation passed by Congress is not the only way laws are enacted. Executive orders (EOs) are issued by the president and have the full force of law, despite not being approved by Congress. Presidents have the right to issue EOs due to an overarching grant of "executive power" in the Constitution and a clause charging them to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." However, EOs differ from actual laws in that EOs cannot create new laws, but only interpret old ones. Generally, EOs are used to manage the federal government and affect only government workers and contractors.

In the past, EOs have been used by presidents to protect equality as well as perpetuate inequality. For example, Executive Order 10730, issued by President Dwight Eisenhower, sent troops to protect African American students trying to integrate into a public school in Arkansas. However, Executive Order 9066 issued, by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, allowed Japanese Americans to be put in internment camps during World War II. Although some have contested the president's right to make laws without congressional approval, executive orders continue to be an active part of the legislative process.

EOs started to be numbered under President Abraham Lincoln, and there have been well over 13,000 executive orders enacted. However, only recently have presidents begun to issue executive orders protecting the increasingly diverse populations found in the United States. One of the first executive orders protecting the rights of citizens was Executive Order 8802, issued in 1941 by President Roosevelt, which prohibited discrimination by defense contractors based on race, creed (also known as religion), color, or national origin.

The EO also established the Fair Employment Practices Committee, which did not last long and was terminated in 1945. President Harry S Truman expanded upon this in 1948 when he announced Executive Order 9981, which required equal treatment, regardless of race, color, religion, or national origin, in the armed services. He established a committee called the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Forces, which was abolished two years later in 1950.

President John F. Kennedy was the first to make significant headway when, in 1961, he enacted Executive Order 10925, establishing the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and requiring all government contractors to take affirmative action in the recruitment, employment, promotion, and training of employees regardless of their race, creed, color, or national origin. This was an especially important EO because it was the first that mandated affirmative action. In 1964, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act (CRA) transformed the President's Committee on Equal Employment and Opportunity into the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). In 1965, President Lyndon B. Johnson extended affirmative action by issuing Executive Order 11246, which added gender to the categories of nondiscrimination and substituted religion for creed. He also furthered Title VII of the CRA by requiring that all government contractors have to take affirmative action, whereas in the original Title VII, affirmative action was required only after an employer had been found guilty of discrimination.

Other executive orders focused on expanding protection to different groups. Executive Order 11141 by President Johnson in 1964 prohibited discrimination on the basis of age unless it was based on a bona fide occupational qualification, retirement plan, or statutory requirement. In 1969, President Richard Nixon issued Executive Order 11478, superseding Executive Order 11246, by requiring equal employment opportunities in the federal government, prohibiting discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, national origin, handicap, or age, and extending affirmative action programs.

Recently, attempts have been made to add sexual orientation to the list of protected groups in employment. Executive Order 13160 in 2000 was signed by President Bill Clinton to provide limited protection to people in federally conducted education and training programs. It prohibited discrimination based on race, sex, color, national origin, disability, religion, age, sexual orientation, and parental status. Also signed by President Clinton in 2000, Executive Order 13166 successfully protected people with limited English proficiency (LEP) by requiring federal agencies to provide meaningful access to services and programs for people with LEP.

While the issuance of an EO against discrimination is a good first step, violations of EOs have found limited success in litigation. Courts generally dismiss cases based on EOs because EOs do not state that individuals have a right to pursue personal litigation against companies who fail to comply with the EO. The only penalties described in EOs for failure to comply with its statutes are that the Secretary of Labor has the right to publish the names of the contractors, to recommend to the Department of Justice or EEOC to hold legal proceedings, and to terminate or suspend any current and/or future contracts.

Therefore, in Cohen v. Illinois Institute of Technology (1975), when a professor attempted to sue for sex discrimination based on Executive Order 11246, she was denied. The court ruled that there was no right to pursue personal legal action in the EO. Thus, EOs are similar to the guidelines published by the EEOC in that they cannot be used as the only ground for a legal action.

Joel T. Nadler
Tiffany G. Maglasang
Southern Illinois University, Edwardsville

See Also: Employment/Career Assistance Services; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Equal Pay Act of 1963; Hispanic Immigrants; Legal Services; Meaningful Access; Office for Civil Rights.

Further Readings

Anderson, Leanna M. "Executive Orders, 'The Very Definition of Tyranny,' and the Congressional Solution, and the Separation of Powers Restoration Act." Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly, v.29 (2002).

Branum, T. L. "President or King—The Use and Abuse of Executive Orders in Modern-Day America." Journal of Legislation, v.28/1 (2002).

Codification of Presidential Proclamations and Executive Orders: April 13, 1945–January 20, 1989. Washington, DC: Office of the Federal Register, National Archives and Records Service, General Services Administration, 1989.

Mayer, K. R. With the Stroke of a Pen: Executive Orders and Presidential Power. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2002.

Encyclopedia of

HUMAN SERVICES AND DIVERSITY

F

Face Blindness (Prosopagnosia)

Prosopagnosia (PA) is a neurological condition of being blind to or having impaired perceptual deficit for recognizing faces (human or animal). Prevalence rates in the population have been reported as high as 2.5 percent. Possible reasons that PA was not identified earlier as a major deficit disorder might be that it comes in degrees of severity and persons living with PA tend to use other sensory cues to compensate, so it is unnoticed, even in some adults. This neurological deficit is not due to a lack of attention, eye anatomical deficits, a learning disability, or memory disturbance. It most probably has existed in humans for thousands of years.

Description

To be blind to recognizing someone an individual knows well (including a spouse, children, or friends) by their facial features alone means one does not identify them by looking at them. Moreover, when looking in a mirror, people with PA do not recognize their own faces in the reflection. The act of facial recognition requires the scanning and encoding of many different aspects and proportions of facial structures into a unified composite of chin and cheek curvatures, slope of the forehead, angularity or broadness of the nose, mouth shape, teeth, eyes, size of eye orbits, eyebrows, thickness of the lips, and ears. Most people take for granted the ease by which their brains holistically synthesize visual sensory stimuli to provide them with a near instant facial recognition of hundreds or thousands of relatives, friends, colleagues, and celebrities. Among the more perplexing aspects of people's brains is that they underlie the production of perceptual events without realizing how they accomplish it.

A description of PA was popularized in 1947 by German neurologist Joachim Bodamer. He published case studies of World War II soldiers, including that of a young man who survived brain damage due to a bullet wound and lost the ability to recognize his own facial reflection and the faces of others. Bodamer coined the term prosopagnosia from the Greek prosopon for face and agnosia for the absence of knowledge about objects, shapes, colors, and so on. PA is characterized as only sensation without perception and observation without realization. People with PA can name specific facial features, even point them out, and yet, cannot synthesize the whole from different facial features to generate a recognition of someone they know.

Persons exhibiting PA are always struggling to find connection and create recognition that a non-afflicted person seems to create effortlessly. People with severe PA find it nearly impossible to distinguish a male face from a female face, process emotions from facial expressions, or to estimate age from facial features alone. Furthermore, television and movie plots could be rendered meaningless, as they require the ability to track the identity of the characters in order to make sense of what happens to them from scene to scene. Without facial recognition, following character development is haphazard at best.

Types of PA

There are two types of PA, developmental and acquired (with two acquired subcategories, associative and apperceptive). Developmental (congenital) PA is described as a lifelong condition wherein facial recognition has never occurred. This type of PA is not attributed to a known incident of brain damage; it has been present since childhood. Some evidence exists that a genetic defect may underlie this type of PA. A heritable hypothesis of PA has been forwarded to explain situations when PA occurs in more than one family member. The prevalence of finding multiple family members displaying PA is consistent with autosomal dominant inheritance.

Acquired PA is correlated with right hemispheric brain damage to the fusiform gyrus, a brain area that is associated with facial feature recognition and memory; however, bilateral damage could be observed as well. The causes of acquired PA include tumor growth (astrocytoma, glioblastoma, or oligodendroglioma), stroke (infarctions), head trauma/injury (resulting in lesions), and forms of neurodegenerative disorders. Brain lesions in the medial occipitotemporal area most often result in PA abnormalities or impairments. Recently, mapping neural networks of the right hemisphere ventromedial (deep-middle) occipital to the temporal cortices are believed to be involved in facial recognition abilities.

Associative PA is characterized as the inability to match a face with an identity, yet some people with PA retain a limited ability to process facial features piecemeal. A major difference between associative and apperceptive PA involves a degree of severity, with associative PA being more frequently observed. Anterior temporal damage can also be seen as well. Apperceptive PA is a more complete form of facial recognition blindness and is reflective of more extensive fusiform damage.

Similarities exist between PA and Capgras syndrome (CS), as well as differences. People with CS believe the delusion upon face-to-face meeting with their real parents or friends that they have been replaced with impostors. The key feature of the Capgras-afflicted is they are unable to believe recognizable persons are authentic, yet a person diagnosed with CS retains the ability to recognize the voice of a parent or friend as authentic. How this can occur remains unexplained. Given some seemly similar identification deficits characteristic of Alzheimer's disease, autism, and nonverbal learning disorders, it is of great importance to find and employ a diagnostic tool specific for PA. A recently developed test for PA, the Cambridge Face Memory Test, has shown promising results. The Prosopagnosia Research Centers provide online testing (www.faceblind.org).

Treatment

Effective treatment for persons with PA involves teaching them strategies to focus on other sensory features and cues to generate recognition. One approach is to help them develop compensatory skills to assist in correct person recognition. Thus, learning to notice nonfacial features (e.g., clothing type and color, hair color and shapes, facial hair shape and distribution, teeth, body/head shape, scars, and gait) provide useful cues to spark recognition. For example, in one case, a patient with PA lost the ability to recognize another person when that person removed eyeglasses.

What is lacking or impaired in PA is the holistic processing of facial features as one facial gestalt as opposed to separate unconnected features. How all-in-one recognition of faces occurs remains to be explicated beyond the descriptive stage. PA manifests in different types and qualitative degrees of impairment, and is thus not believed to be one unified disorder.

Minimally, PA affects personal identity and social interactions, such as schooling difficulties, being considered shy, the inability to read facial emotional signals, or difficulty in making friends, and can easily lead to clinical depression. Thus, providing an improved quality of life for PA-afflicted individuals is critical. Doing so requires finding a way to fix defective brain processes that are rendered unable to synthesize specific facial features and leave faces looking equally unrecognizable. The big challenge for PA remains development of effective treatments in addition to teaching coping strategies. The creation of novel interventions (perhaps combinations of stem cell therapy, gene therapy, or even brain connection restructuring) to establish or recover brain processes underlying the wholeness of feature synthesis for facial recognition is required.

Daniel J. Calcagnetti
Fairleigh Dickinson University

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Disability Services; Learning Disabilities, Services for Individuals With; Sociology of Disability.

Further Readings

Gruter, Thomas, Martina Gruter, and Claus-Christian Carbon. "Neural and Genetic Foundations of Face Recognition and Prosopagnosia." Journal of Neuropsychology, v.2 (2008).

Prosopagnosia Research Centers. http://www.Faceblind.org (Accessed September 2013).

National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke. NINDS Prosopagnosia Information Page. http://www.ninds.nih.gov/disorders/prosopagnosia/Prosopagnosia.htm (Accessed April 2014).

Factline: Tracking Health in Underserved Communities

Toward the goal of raising public awareness and facilitating distribution of information on health disparities, Factline: Tracking Health in Underserved Communities was a Web-based project focusing on health disparities. Paralleling the structure of Healthy People 2010, as designed by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Factline sought to make information and recources on public health and health disparities widely available to a range of target audiences.

Factline: Tracking Health in Underserved Communities was a project of the Institute on Health Care for the Poor and Underserved, associated with the Journal of Health Care for the Poor and Underserved housed at Meharry Medical College in Nashville, Tennessee. The National Library of Medicine supported the Factline project with three years of funding from 2004 to 2007.

The Factline Web site housed information, including statistics, graphics, and research reports, on disparities in health in several underserved groups. These populations include people of color, the elderly, and women. Web site information was accessible in both English and Spanish.

The project objectives included supporting Healthy People 2010 goals by making information easily available. In particular, Factline sought to translate and condense research findings, making this work available to, understandable for, and usable by several diverse audiences. Target audiences included activists, policy makers, educators, students, practitioners, journalists, and researchers.

Information on the Factline Web site was organized into five main areas: Access to Health, Mental Health, Minority Health, Sexually Transmitted Diseases, and Women's Health. Within each focal area were several resources and subtopics with additional depth.

A highly useful function of the Factline Web site was its facilitation of further research. The site was constructed to support research in the medical literature or on media coverage of particular topics. Factline entries also contained references for the individual works featured on the site.

Due to the conclusion of the funding cycle and the staff time necessary to continue the Web-based project, Factline was discontinued. Earlier information and resources are no longer available via Web searches.

Joy L. Hart
University of Louisville

See Also: Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality; Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Disparities, Role of; National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities; National Health Care Disparities Reports; Public Health.

Further Readings

Barr, Donald A. Health Disparities in the United States: Social Class, Race, Ethnicity, and Health. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2008.

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "CDC Health Disparities and Inequalities Report—United States, 2011." Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, v.60/Supplement (2011).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, Office of Minority Health and Health Disparities. http://www.cdc.gov/omhd/ (Accessed November 2013).

Meharry Medical College. http://www.mmc.edu (Accessed November 2013).

National Institutes of Health, National Institute on Minority Health and Health Disparities. http://www.nimhd.nih.gov/ (Accessed November 2013).

National Library of Medicine. http://www.nlm.nih.gov (Accessed November 2013).

Smedley, Brian D., Adrienne Y. Stith, and Alan R. Nelson, eds. Unequal Treatment: Confronting Racial and Ethnic Disparities in Health Care. Washington, DC: National Academies Press, 2003.

Fair Labor Standards Act

A major piece of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's protective legislation for workers and the last measure of the New Deal, the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) of 1938, was a federal statute that

- Mandated a maximum workweek and a minimum hourly wage
- Provided for adequate compensation for overtime
- Severely restricted child labor on a national scale.

The FLSA aimed at social justice by preventing workers' exploitation and restrained employers' strategy to compete on the market by reducing salaries. Moreover, it set the general principle that the government could rely on the commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution to regulate labor matters in industries involved in interstate commerce.

Repeatedly amended since the postwar decades, the Fair Labor Standards Act has not only increased the minimum wage several times to help adjust salaries to the inflation rate, it also has expanded its coverage to previously exempted workers and broadened its scope to protect female employees by prohibiting gender pay disparity. Overall, the FLSA has improved the well-being of laborers by sustaining wage rates and has shielded children from dangerous occupations. However, it has revealed little concern for issues of diversity, especially regarding workers with disabilities.

The Precedents

The FLSA supported the right to a living wage as the cornerstone of citizenship in a workers' republic. As such, it was part of Roosevelt's general commitment to uproot the social evil of poverty in the United States and, in particular, to come to the relief of the destitute during the hard times of the 1930s.

The 1916 Keating-Owen Act had already intended to strictly limit child labor. Likewise, the 1933 National Industrial Recovery Act had stipulated that requirements regarding minimum wages and maximum hours should be included in the fair competition code agreements that businesses had been encouraged to create. Yet the Supreme Court invalidated both measures in 1918 and 1935, respectively.

The latter decision also struck a heavy blow against Roosevelt's plans for economic recovery. Actually, the president's humanitarian vision of labor protection intertwined with the means to overcome the Great Depression. On the one hand, preventing the exploitation of wage earners by curbing their workweek would force entrepreneurs to hire more personnel and help relieve the unemployment rate. On the other hand, the increase of workers' purchasing power would ease their access to consumerism, and thereby contribute to reducing overproduction.

A Troubled Legislative Process and its Consequences

In 1937, the Fair Labor Standards Bill reintroduced the provisions that had previously fallen under the ax of the Supreme Court. Specifically, it outlined definite standards to prevent a new ruling of unconstitutionality on the ground of improper delegation of legislative authority to the federal government.

The proposed piece of legislation met with strong opposition, however. Most southern Democratic congressmen, even though they belonged to Roosevelt's political party, feared that the establishment of national standards for wages would further cripple the economy of their region because the competitiveness of industries below the Mason-Dixon

Line relied on the payment of lower salaries than those of businesses in other sections of the country. Unions were unenthusiastic as well. Worried about the defense of their own prerogatives, their leaders thought that the bill would undermine their own authority among workers because government stipulations would replace collective bargaining by labor representatives in securing better wages and hours for the work force. Consequently, Congress tabled the bill. It was only after the unexpected victory of one of its most vocal advocates, Senator Claude Pepper (D-FL), against a conservative opponent in a hotly fought 1938 primary election that the bill was eventually brought out to the floor. However, it also needed Roosevelt's masterful legislative maneuverings to pass.

The Fair Labor Standards Act established a 44-hour workweek, with a further reduction to 40 hours within two years, and a 25-cent minimum wage per hour, to be increased to 40 cents in the same period. It also required that overtime be paid at one and a half times the standard rate. In addition, the FLSA outlawed the labor of children under the age of 16 years, as opposed to age 14 in the 1916 legislation, and raised the minimum age to 18 for hazardous occupations.

The quid pro quo to secure the votes to pass the bill was a number of concessions to appease single congressmen seeking immunity for the main businesses of their respective districts. Consequently, the FSLA was eventually unable to result in a significant reduction of regional differentials in wages. Furthermore, it failed to offer coverage for those categories most in need of protection, such as agricultural and domestic workers, among whom ethnic and racial minorities were overrepresented. In addition, the FLSA had overall a significant exemption rate for female employees, reflecting the paternalistic approach of the New Deal to labor and welfare legislation, with its focus on protecting male breadwinners and marginalizing women in the job market in order to persuade the latter to stay home and raise children. Indeed, upon its initial enforcement, the new legislation covered 39 percent of male and as little as 14 percent of female workers nationwide.

Section 14(c) allowed discrimination against people with disabilities, who could be paid less than the minimum wage, on the alleged ground that they were underproductive workers. This measure was conceived in part to offer enterprises financial incentives to hire disabled individuals and to offer them the basic training to enter the work force. It also encouraged the employment of laborers with disabilities in segregated workplaces, called sheltered workshops, where they performed mainly menial tasks.

Postwar Developments

World War II delayed the full enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act. For example, the 40-cent rate became effective as late as October 1945. The postwar decades, however, witnessed a progressive growth of the hourly minimum wage, which rose from 75 cents in 1949 to $7.25 in 2007. Coverage was also extended to new groups, most notably farm workers in 1966 and seasonal and migrant agricultural laborers in 1983, classes with a remarkable concentration of Hispanic immigrants.

Other statutes included provisions that banned a few discriminatory practices that the original Fair Labor Standards Act had not addressed. In 1963, following a significant increase in the number of breadwinning women, the Equal Pay Act forbade lower wages for female workers performing the same tasks as their male colleagues. In 1967, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act outlawed unequal compensation on the basis of age, including the denial of health benefits, that had theretofore usually affected new employees of at least 40 years of age. It applied, however, only to enterprises with more than 20 workers, and it permitted wage differentials on the ground of seniority in any businesses.

Attempts at curbing additional forms of discrimination were to no avail. For instance, amendments to also place workers with disabilities under the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act—most recently introduced in 2011 and 2013—had not been passed.

The Fair Labor Standards Act eventually concerned itself with health services as well. It required employers to inform employees of coverage options available through an Health Insurance Marketplace in compliance with the 2010 Affordable Care Act.

Stefano Luconi
University of Naples L'Orientale

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990; Diversity in the Workplace; Equal Pay Act of 1963; Poverty.

Further Readings

Douglas, Paul H. and Joseph Hackman. “The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.” Political Science Quarterly v.53/4 (1938), v.54/1 (1939).

Kennedy, David M. Freedom from Fear: The American People in Depression and War, 1929–1945. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Kessler-Harris, Alice. In the Pursuit of Equity: Women, Men, and the Quest for Economic Citizenship in 20th Century America. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Whittaker, William G. The Fair Labor Standards Act. Hauppauge, NY: Novinka, 2003.

Fair Lending Practices

A loan is a debt owed by a borrower to a lender. In the case of a monetary loan, the borrower (customer), who can be an individual person (consumer) or a business, borrows an amount of money from the lender (creditor). The borrower agrees to pay the lender back at least the same amount of money at a later time, which generates an obligation to repay. This repayment is usually done in partial payments. Loans are to be distinguished from acts of charity, and also from a joint investment, in which the investor shares in the risk. In the case of a loan, the lender expects the same amount of money to be repaid regardless of the borrower’s own profit or loss.

The amount of money borrowed in a monetary loan is called the principal. In the case of most monetary loans, the borrower must pay an extra amount of money, called the interest, in addition to paying back the principal. The interest is the cost of the loan to the borrower. In a legal monetary loan, a note specifies the principal, the rate of interest on the principal, and the date of repayment. By agreeing to the loan, the borrower is obligated to repay the lender the principal plus the interest by the date of repayment—that is, when the loan matures. A legal monetary loan is a contract enforced by law.

History of Usury

Historically, charging interest on loans has been controversial. Although the practice was legal among the Mesopotamians, the Hittites, the Phoenicians, and the Egyptians, the Torah prohibited the Israelites from lending at interest to other Israelites—they could lend only to non-Israelites (Deuteronomy 23:19: “Thou shalt not lend upon interest to thy brother”). The Qur’an prohibits lending at interest as well, and as a result specialized codes of banking have been developed for those obeying Qur’anic law.

Saint Anselm of Canterbury (1033–1109) argued that charging interest on loans was not merely a lack of charity but was the same as theft. Saint Thomas Aquinas (1225–74) argued, following Aristotle, that charging the borrower interest was charging the borrower twice: for the money and for the use of the money. Hence, charging interest was deemed unjust. The original meaning of the word usury (from the Latin usura, meaning interest) was to charge any fee whatsoever for the use of money. Usury consisted of either charging interest on loans or charging a fee for changing money (as is done in a currency exchange)—according to William Blackstone, (1765–69), “When money is lent on a contract to receive not only the principal sum again, but also an increase by way of compensation for the use, the increase is called interest by those who think it lawful, and usury by those who do not.” Pope Clement V (1264–1314) abolished all laws that permitted usury and made the belief in the right to usury a heresy in 1311. It therefore was a sin to charge interest on a monetary loan. Pope Sixtus V (1521–90) condemned usury as “detestable to God and man, damned by the sacred canons and contrary to Christian charity.” The prohibition against usury in Christianity led the Jews to become moneylenders to Christians.

However, in the 16th century, with the passing in 1545 of An Act Against Usurie by King Henry VIII (1491–1547), interest rates on shorter-term loans dropped from around 20 to 30 percent to around 9 to 10 percent, and the practice of charging moderate interest on loans became acceptable. Then usury came to mean the practice of lending money at unreasonably high or excessive rates of interest. As a result, unreasonably high or excessive rates of interest are now described as usurious.

Types of Loans

The interest rate charged on a monetary loan depends on the type of loan. A secured loan (e.g., mortgage loan or automobile loan) is one in which the borrower pledges an asset as collateral in case of defaulting on the loan. An unsecured loan is one not secured with the borrower's asset(s). Unsecured loans include personal loans, lines of credit, bank overdrafts, payday loans, and credit cards.

Interest rates on unsecured loans are nearly always higher than on secured loans because the options for recourse by the lender against the borrower in the event of default are more limited. Since the lender in the case of an unsecured loan has an additional risk that the loan may be uncollectable in the event of the borrower's insolvency, the lender will charge a higher interest rate. This is not considered predatory by lenders.

Prime lending is lending in which the prospective borrower has a good credit history, has demonstrated the ability to properly manage credit, and has sufficient documentation of requisite financial resources. According to James Carr and Lopa Kolluri, subprime lending is lending in which the prospective borrower has a poor credit history, has demonstrated an inability or unwillingness to properly manage credit, has insufficient documentation of requisite financial resources, and often has other application shortcomings as well. Subprime loans carry higher interest rates than prime loans, in part due to the higher risk to the lender.

According to Kenneth Temkin, however, subprime loan rates are also higher because the underwriting guidelines for such loans are not standardized across the industry. Temkin states that subprime loans are "three times more likely in low-income neighborhoods than in high-income neighborhoods, and five times more likely in black neighborhoods than in white neighborhoods. In predominantly black communities, high-cost subprime lending accounted for 51 percent of home loans in 1998, compared with only 9 percent in predominantly white areas," despite the fact that "lower-income status is not synonymous with higher credit risk." Also, according to Temkin, the "level of subprime lending to black households and communities far exceeds the measured level of credit problems experienced by such households." Based on a Freddie Mac study from 1999, however, "black households have roughly twice the credit problems" of white househholds, but "blacks rely on subprime refinance roughly four times as much for their mortgage credit."

Predatory Lending

Predatory lending is a subset of subprime lending that, Carr and Kolluri explain, generally has at least one of the following three further characteristics: (1) "unreasonable and unjustifiable loan terms"; (2) "outright and fraudulent behavior that maximizes the destructive financial impact on consumers of inappropriate marketing strategies and loan provisions"; and (3) "targeted marketings to households on the basis of their race, ethnicity, age or gender or other personal characteristic unrelated to creditworthiness."

Most predatory lending has all three characteristics. First, its abusive lending may involve both the loan itself and the terms of the loan. The loan may be unnecessarily large and in excess of the market value of the home, making it difficult to pay off; it may be structured to extract the greatest possible return for the lender; and it may be designed to preclude the borrower's ability to pay it off, such as with negatively amortizing loans, in which the monthly payment is less than the interest, and the deferred interest is added to the principal, so that the principal increases each month. The loan terms may include excessive closing or appraisal charges, high origination and administrative fees, and exorbitant penalties for prepayment of loans (true of 80 percent of subprime mortgages). Also, the terms may be such that the borrowers are locked into the loan and cannot refinance to take advantage of lower interest rates. The loan may also include single-premium credit life insurance, and have a large so-called balloon payment due when the loan matures, effectively making refinancing unavoidable.

Second, fraudulent behavior by predatory lenders may include refusing to provide modest home equity loans; giving expensive loans to borrowers who could qualify for regular loans; pressuring people to fully refinance their homes; consolidating consumer debts into home equity loans that have a higher rate of interest than the consumer debt; not presenting the interest rate of the loan and other charges on the loan as negotiable; failing to clearly and accurately disclose terms and risks, including hidden fees in the amount borrowed; providing obscure information; using high-pressure tactics to force prospective borrowers to continue through the loan application process; omitting explanations of credit life insurance or balloon payments; discouraging borrowers from exploring lower-cost options; disguising a high annual percentage rate in a lower short-term rate; structuring loans with payments the borrower cannot afford; adding cosigners whom they believe have no intention to contribute to payments; refinancing loans for a lower interest rate when the rate is not lower and/or there are higher processing fees (flipping); refinancing loans with the result that beneficial loan terms are lost; forging loan documents; altering loan documents after they have been signed; and using abusive and high-pressure collection practices such as harassing phone calls and threats.

Finally, predatory lenders typically, although not exclusively, target the poor, the less educated, the financially unsophisticated, racial minorities, women, and the elderly. They especially target households that have limited incomes but significant equity in their homes. These households are often in neighborhoods in which better loans are not readily available. As has been reported by Carr and Kolluri, “a community flush with ‘fringe lenders’—check cashing outlets, pawnshops, rent-to-own stores, title lenders, and similar operations—as well as excessive subprime lending, is the environment in which predatory lending activities often flourish.” People can be lured into taking out such loans by aggressive mailing, phone calls, TV ads, and door-to-door salespersons. They are often told that the loan is a quick way to pay down a credit card, to take a vacation, to pay off expenses, or to have lower monthly mortgage payments. In addition to home loans, predatory lending includes cash advances or payday loans (a short-term loan until the borrower’s next payday), tax refund application loans (a fee for an advance on an anticipated tax refund), credit card late fees, and checking account overdraft fees, where the fee paid is equivalent to an unreasonably or excessively high interest rate .

A study found that minorities were much more likely to be charged higher interest rates than whites with similar credit ratings. Such mortgage discrimination played a role in the real estate bubble that burst in 2008, where it was found that minorities had been disproportionately steered into subprime loans and represented a disproportional percentage of foreclosures.

Note that if the predatory loan is a secured loan, upon default the lender can obtain the collateral (e.g., property or automobile) and make a profit on the sale of the asset.

Mortgage Discrimination

One form of predatory lending is mortgage discrimination on the basis of race or ethnicity. Earlier in the 20th century, African Americans and other minorities were systematically denied loans, which contributed to urban decay in many cities. The Home Mortgage Disclosure Act of 1975 required banks to disclose their lending practices in the communities they served, and this improved conditions for minorities. However, contemporary mortgage discrimination takes the form of targeting minorities and charging them more than would be charged to a similarly situated majority borrower. According to Michael Powell, a former Wells Fargo loan officer, for the 10 years prior to 2009, "employees had referred to blacks as 'mud people' and to subprime lending as 'ghetto loans.'" The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) has filed class-action lawsuits in a number of cities (e.g., Los Angeles and Salt Lake City) against many lenders such as Wells Fargo, HSBC Bank, JPMorgan Chase, and Washington Mutual, alleging that they systematically offer substandard terms on loans to African American and Hispanic applicants with similar credit, income, and qualifications to white applicants.

A 2007 study by the Furman Center for Real Estate and Urban Policy at New York University held that home buyers in predominantly African American and Hispanic neighborhoods in New York are more likely to get mortgages from subprime lenders than can home buyers in white neighborhoods with similar income levels. Another national study by the Center for Responsible Learning found that African Americans and Hispanics were 30 percent more likely to be charged higher interest rates than whites with similar credit ratings. A report by the Neighborhood Economic Development Advocacy Project and other groups cited by Manny Fernandez found that compared to whites in New York, African Americans were five times more likely and Hispanics were four times more likely to pay higher interest rates on loans. Such mortgage discrimination played a role in the real estate bubble that burst in 2008, where it was found that minorities had been disproportionately steered into subprime loans and represented a disproportional percentage of foreclosures, according to Barbara Ehrenreich and Derek Muhammad.

A further related practice is mortgage discrimination on the basis of sex or gender. As Anita Hill argues, "Across the economic spectrum, women receive less favorable terms than similarly situated men on home purchase, refinance, and home improvement loans," with the result that women are less able to reach economic self-sufficiency. Further, she states, "there is evidence that subprime lenders charge black women and Latinas higher rates and fees than same-race men and white men, again, regardless of income and across all loan types," compounding race and gender discrimination.

It is also the case that elderly women are prime targets of refinance and home improvement subprime lenders, meaning that they are in greater jeopardy of becoming dependent on their families or social services. Indeed, single-parent women, who have difficulty obtaining loans, are often told that "the conventional loans are unavailable to them and that subprime loans are their only recourse," and the cost of an escalating subprime loan payment has seen an increase in homelessness among such women. Hill points out, "A former loan officer testified about how she marketed subprime mortgages: 'If someone appeared uneducated, inarticulate, was a minority, or was particularly old or young, I would try to include all the [additional costs] CitiFinancial offered.'" Mortgage brokers may also check property deeds and other public records and identify homeowners who have substantial equity in their properties and encourage them to refinance with a predatory lender, who then provides the broker with a referral fee. "Elderly, black, widowed women are frequent targets," according to Carr and Kolluri.

States' Laws

Historically, in the United States, usury laws have been states laws that specify the maximum interest rate that can be charged on loans. After 1776, all states in the Union adopted usury laws, and most states capped the interest rate at 6 percent. Loans with unlawfully high interest rates were unenforceable in court. However, in the early 1900s, a number of states eliminated their usury laws, and other states raised their interest limit to 10 or 12 percent. Between 1945 and 1979 all states adopted special loan laws that capped the interest rate at 36 percent. However, in Marquette National Bank of Minneapolis v. First of Omaha Service Corp. (1978), the U.S. Supreme Court established that lenders are allowed to charge the legal rate of interest in their home state regardless of the borrower's state of residence.

Some states eliminated their interest rate caps, with the result that several credit institutions relocated to states without interest rate caps, effectively allowing them to operate nationally with no interest rate caps. Furthermore, in 1980, the Depository and Institutions Deregulation and Monetary Control Act exempted certain federally chartered lending institutions from state usury interest caps. In 1994, the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act identified certain potentially predatory mortgage loans and provided some substantive protections to home mortgage borrowers with interest rates that were extraordinarily high, but set no caps on what interest rates could be charged for these loans.

The 1968 Truth in Lending Act requires disclosures of the annual percentage rate (APR) of charge, either nominal APR (simple interest rate for a whole year), or effective APR (fee plus compound interest rate for a whole year) and terms of the loan, but does not regulate interest rates. The Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act in 1970 made it a federal felony to lend money at an interest rate more than twice the state usury interest rate and to try to collect this unlawful debt. It is also a federal offense to use violence or threats to collect such unlawful debt. These federal criminal laws are aimed at coercive loan sharks.

James E. Mahon
Washington and Lee University

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Financial Literacy Programs; Microlending Programs.

Further Readings

Americans for Fairness in Lending. http://americansforfairnessinlending.wordpress.com (Accessed December 2013).

Blackstone, William. Commentaries on the Laws of England (1765–1769).

Carr, James H. and Lopa Kolluri. "Predatory Lending: An Overview." Fannie Mae Foundation, 2001. http://www.knowledgeplex.org/kp/text_document_summary/article/relfiles/hot_topics/Carr-Kolluri.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Ehrenreich, Barbara and Derek Muhammad, "The Recession's Racial Divide." New York Times (September 12, 2009).

Fernandez, Manny. "Study Finds Disparities in Mortgages by Race." New York Times (October 15, 2007).

Hill, Anita. Reimagining Equality: Stories of Gender, Race, and Finding Home. Boston: Beacon Press, 2012.

Hill, Anita. "Women and the Subprime Crunch: Gender Discrimination in Lending Practices." Boston Globe (October 22, 2007).

Hudson, Mike and E. Scott Reckard. "Workers Say Lender Ran 'Boiler Rooms.'" Los Angeles Times (February 4, 2005).

Powell, Michael. "Bank Accused of Pushing Mortgage Deals on Blacks" The New York Times (June 6, 2009).

Tempkin, Kenneth. "Subprime Lending: Current Trends and Policy Issues," NeighborWorks Journal, v.18 (2000).

Families, Nontraditional

Families have traditionally been defined in terms of a mother and father who are married and have biological children of this union. However, the definition of family has evolved over the last few decades with the changes in American culture and with the migration of various cultures to the United States. Nontraditional families are those families that do not fit the traditional definition of family described above. Susan Stewart notes that nontraditional families do not include two married parents and their biological children. Nontraditional families include adoptive, foster, cohabitating, single parent, grandparent head of household, blended, divorced, and same-sex parents.

In the field of human services, practitioners encounter and service all types of family from traditional to nontraditional. Human services practitioners may take on the role of advocate, case manager, monitor, social service worker, job developer, and aide in their work with nontraditional families. Human services practitioners can be found servicing nontraditional families in a number of environments, including educational settings, nonprofit agencies, and local and federal government agencies. In fact, human services practitioners may develop home studies for adoptive and foster families to predict the outcome of children being placed in these homes. They may work with single parents to remove barriers to social issues that impede family function as well as evaluate or refer these populations for services. They may also offer support services to blended, divorced, and same-sex–parent families. Understanding the characteristics of nontraditional families is important to practice in the field of human services.

Adoptive Families

Many states have a number of children in care who will never return to a biological family member. There is an increased need for adoptive families in the United States, even though infertility issues within families have led to an increased use of adoption to create familial environments for children and meet the needs of these families to parent. Scenarios range from mothers who have given their children up for adoption to provide a better lifestyle for them to mothers whose rights have been terminated, forcing their children into adoption. In all instances, adoption involves the loss and gain of a family. Marta Reinoso, Femmie Juffer, and Wendy Tieman note that adoption implies the building of a family as well as the loss of a birth family.

Children can enter into adoptive homes as early as birth and as late as 18 years of age. Adoptive families can be headed by single parents, same-sex parents, and family members. In fact, when parental rights are terminated, immediate family members are often targeted to adopt. Stepfamilies often turn to adoption so that the children within the family can legally establish a relationship with the stepparent in the family. By adopting their stepchildren, stepparents give their stepchildren the same legal rights within the family unit as the biological children of the marital relationship that binds them. The changes in marital laws that govern the marriage of same-sex couples have increased the prevalence of same-sex family adoptions. International adoption has become more prevalent in today's society as well. Many couples, including celebrities, have traveled to other countries and adopted children who are at risk or in orphanages in those countries. The adoption process is more complex in these situations; however, international adoptions are more visible today than they have been in previous years.

Human services practitioners work with the adoptive population in a variety of ways. They may develop home studies of the families seeking to adopt. As a part of these studies, human services practitioners make suggestions to the court and agencies on whether adoption should be granted to the family. They may provide ongoing monitoring or support to new families as well as parenting training to support positive family functioning to adoptive families. In cases where families decide to rescind their adoption and give the children back to the agency or state, human services practitioners work with the state, family, and children to remediate the issues and provide services to the children. In international adoptions, human services practitioners may work as liaisons between orphanages and private adoption agencies. They can also work for the orphanage in caring for the children within that facility. Advocacy for children is a key role within adoptions, and human services practitioners work with other professionals in order to properly advocate for the children involved.

Foster Families

Families in today's society face many challenges. Many of these challenges result in children being removed from their biological family environments. These removals are thought to be temporary, and the children are placed in temporary familial environments until they can be reunited with their biological family members. Foster families include those families who contract with the state or a private nonprofit agency governed by the state to provide parenting to children in the state's custody as well as biological relatives (also referred to as kinship foster care). Foster families have been defined in terms of children being in out-of-home placements.

The number of children in state custody within the United States is increasing. The characteristics of these families differ from other nontraditional and traditional families because they involve complex relationships among the state-funded foster agency, biological parents, the legal system, and social workers. Foster parents are responsible for the typical day-to-day care and activities of the children as well as for meeting court requirements. Foster families are licensed by the state in which they wish to provide services, and they must attend training to prepare them for fostering children in state custody. Many foster families become adoptive families when biological parents permanently lose their legal parental right to raise their children.

Human services practitioners work with foster families in a number of capacities. Human services practitioners may work for the state or a nonprofit foster care agency that places children in foster homes. Human services practitioners may also license foster homes and train people to be successful in their roles as foster parents. Human services practitioners can also work as liaisons among biological parents, agencies, and foster families in arranging parental visits, making recommendations, and removing barriers to reunification of children with a biological parent.

Cohabiting Families

Cohabiting families may seem on the outside to be traditional families. These families include a mother, a father, and biological children. However, cohabiting families do not include a married mother and father. In the United States, the prevalence of cohabiting families is increasing as marriage within certain cultures declines. Cohabiting families function as traditional family units but have no desire or intention of becoming legally bonded through marriage.

Cohabiting families may have limited resources in regard to health care or the recognition of the union. Human services practitioners may encounter this population in a number of environments, including programs that service low-income families or children of these families such as Head Start. In these roles, human services practitioners may refer families for services to assist them in removing barriers or may work one-on-one with these families to increase healthy family functioning. Human services practitioners may find difficulty working within the confines of the cohabitating relationship in advocating or supporting the needs of the family.

Single-Parent Families

The past few decades have seen a rise in single-parent head-of-household families. Nevertheless, human services practitioners may encounter difficulty in working with this population due to the stigma of single parenting. Ken Lewis historically defined single-father families as including an unmarried male and his minor children living in the same household. This population includes widowers, divorced, separated, never-married, and single adoptive fathers. Single-mother heads of households are much more prevalent than single-father heads of households, with one in five children in the United States living in a single-mother household. William Doherty and Shondam Craft have found that in most cases mothers have custody of the children.

The number of single parents within the United States is growing; it can include those in military service and individuals who utilize surrogates due to the lack of physical presence of the other parent in child rearing. Military families take on many of the characteristics of single-parent families when the military spouse is away for extended periods of time, leaving child rearing to the nonmilitary spouse. Homosexual parents can fall into the single-parent status due to the use of surrogates as well as adoption. Human services practitioners service single parents in a number of environments, including working with families in accessing resources, finding employment, obtaining legal guidance for custody, and locating support networks. Human services practitioners may also work with the children of these families in helping them to cope with the physical absence of the other parent.

Grandparent Heads of Households

Grandparents are increasingly raising their grandchildren when biological parents no longer can. Molly Williams describes grandparent caregivers as those who have primary responsibility for their coresident grandchildren under the age of 18 years. The U.S. census has reported 5.8 million coresident grandparents; of these, 2.4 million are grandparent caregivers. Many of these families fall into the category of kinship foster care families as well. Grandparent heads of households encounter many barriers to parenting in addition to age and health concerns, such as fixed incomes (retirement and Social Security) or the inability to get children to various appointments due to a lack of transportation. Some grandparents return to work in order to provide for their grandchildren. However, these children seem to thrive in familiar family environments.

Human services practitioners often work with this population in providing resources to limit and/

Maryland First Lady Katie O'Malley's foster parent appreciation luncheon, May 19, 2012. Seated are the guests of honor—foster parents and the children they care for. Foster families involve children being in out-of-home placements, and families contract with the state or a private nonprofit agency governed by the state to provide parenting to children in the state's custody as well as biological relatives.

or remove barriers. Human services practitioners offer support and develop grandparent networks to enhance the development of children within these families. Transportation services are often provided to the grandparents by nonprofit agencies. Public transportation is often provided at no cost to these families. Nonprofit agencies that work with grandparents may provide transportation to agency-related appointments. Human services practitioners work to establish these relationships and advocate for the family.

Blended Families

Blended families are often seen in the image of the Brady Bunch, a popular television show of the late 1960s that was among the first shows to depict this type of family. Ottilia Brown and Juliet Robinson describe blended families as deriving from second marriages with children from previous marriages all living in the same household. These families can include children on both sides of the marriage, creating a stepfamily. The term blended families has also been used to include cohabiting unmarried couples with children who have come from previous relationships. The dynamics of blended families are complex, which creates difficulty among the relationships involved. Researchers have focused on defining these complexities and the characteristics of these families. Tension among family members is a common characteristic due to the reorganization of the family. Blended families are often confused with biracial families; however, the characteristics differ greatly in focus. Biracial families include couples with different ethnic and cultural backgrounds who have biological children. The greatest challenge of biracial families is functioning through the prejudices brought against them. In contrast, the challenges of blended families lie within the family unit, as children in blended families may have difficulty adjusting to the new family functioning.

Human service practitioners may work with the family in increasing homeostasis and family functioning, identifying problem areas, and referring families to support resources. Human services practitioners may work in providing parenting workshops and support groups.

Same-Sex Families

The population of same-sex families within the United States is growing. Laws have changed in many states to recognize the unions of gays and lesbians, allowing them to marry and obtain the same rights as heterosexual married couples. Societal changes have led to changes in the family structure among these populations. Damian McCann and Howard Delmonte note that same-sex families are created through lesbian and gay couples becoming parents through adoption, foster care, in vitro fertilization, and surrogacy. In fact, lesbian couples have used anonymous sperm donors to become pregnant as well. Some lesbian couples have used one spouse's egg and a sperm donor, and had the fertilized egg planted in the other spouse. Society may argue against same-sex couples having parental rights. Despite ridicule, prejudices, and barriers, however, homosexual couples are becoming parents at a growing rate.

Human services practitioners encounter this population in their journey to becoming parents through adoption and foster care. Human services practitioners work with these families in educational settings and in providing support services. In providing services to this population, human services practitioners have to be aware of the barriers this population faces in order to adequately provide support. Advocacy is a major part of the role between same-sex families and human services practitioners.

Divorced Families

Divorce has been on the rise for decades in the United States. The rate of divorce has created a structure of families that are complex in their ability to parent and cope with divorce. The dissolution of the family unit causes a notion of family in which emotion and tension are at the forefront. Children within these families have difficulty coping, articulating, and working within the new confines of the family. These children often have to adjust to two homes, two sets of rules, and two structures. Human services practitioners may encounter divorced family structures in support group, educational, and court-enforced environments. The latter causes the most tension within the families. Human services practitioners work in these environments in roles that offer support, referral services, and homeostasis to the family structure.

Narketta Sparkman
Old Dominion University

See Also: Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Historical Role of; Family Services; Family Structure, Diversity of; Family Therapy; National Survey of Family Growth.

Further Readings

Brown, Ottilia and Juliet Robinson. "Resilience in Remarried Families." South African Journal of Psychology, v.42/1 (2012).
Doherty, William and Shondam Craft. "Single Mothers Raising Children With 'Male Positive' Attitudes." Family Process, v.50/1 (2011).
Haegar, Rebecca and James Rosenthal. "Kinship Care and Sibling Placement." Child Behavior, Family Relationships, and School Outcomes, v.31 (2009).
Lewis, Ken. "Single Father Families: Who They Are and How They Fare." Child Welfare, v.57/10 (1978).
McCann, Damian and Howard Delmonte. "Lesbian and Gay Parenting: Babes in Arms or Babes in the Woods?" Sex and Relationship Therapy, v.20/3 (2005).
Reinoso, Marta, et al. "Children's and Parents' Thoughts and Feelings about Adoption, Birth Culture Identity and Discrimination in Families with Internationally Adopted Children." Child and Family Social Work, v.18 (2012).
Williams, Molly. "The Changing Roles of Grandparents Raising Grandchildren." Journal of Human Behavior in the Social Environment, v.21 (2011).

Families of Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners

Research indicates that currently more families are impacted by incarceration than at any point in the history of the United States. More than 2 million men and women reportedly are incarcerated in state or federal prisons. Further, more than 5 million men and women are under the jurisdiction of some form of community corrections (i.e., probation or parole). Annually, more than 700,000 people are released from state and federal prisons, and more than 10 million will cycle in and out of city and county jails. Women (often mothers) have the dubious distinction of being the fastest-growing prison population in the United States. It is estimated that more than 2 million children have a parent incarcerated, and more than 5 million have a parent on probation or parole.

This entry highlights a few of the many human services needs of families impacted by incarceration. Families are defined to include children, blood and legal relatives, as well as partners that incarcerated and formerly incarcerated people have lived with or plan to live with once released. Human services examines the financial, social, and emotional needs of families impacted by incarceration.

Financial Needs

Most incarcerated individuals contributed financially to their families prior to incarceration. Thus, incarceration creates an immediate loss of income to the family. The financial loss is further exacerbated as the incarcerated individual looks to the family for assistance with legal fees and court fines or surcharges (if found guilty) as well as other needs not provided by prisons and jails, such as stamps to send letters and money for phone calls. The majority of individuals incarcerated in the United States hail from poor communities, where the loss of income can have a substantial impact on the quality of life of family members left behind. In many studies, grandparents are forced to raise children left behind by an incarcerated parent. This often has the ability to seriously compromise their financial flexibility and quality of life. Unfortunately, the financial situation does not get better after the individual is released.

The stigma of being formerly incarcerated often inhibits newly released prisoners from obtaining jobs. Numerous research studies have shown that formerly incarcerated people face discrimination in the job market at unprecedented levels, thus placing an even greater financial strain on the family to not only continue to take care of themselves, but to now care for the returning family member. In many cases, families have no choice but to turn to the welfare system in an attempt to make ends meet.

Social and Emotional Needs

The loss to more than 2 million children of mothers and fathers who are incarcerated creates serious social and emotional challenges. Incarcerated individuals are severely limited in their ability to provide emotional support for their families. Prisons tend to be in remote locations that often are inaccessible for family member visititation. Studies show that more than half of incarcerated men and women who report to be parents don't receive visits from their children. Families that are able to visit their loved ones while incarcerated report being frustrated by the security and prison requirements, some of which may require the removal of clothing as well as the examination of body cavities. Depending on the level of confinement (minimum, medium, or maximum custody), visiting families may not be able to physically engage with their loved ones, thus exacerbating the confusion and frustration created by the incarceration.

The inability to communicate regularly by telephone (calls are charged at higher-than-market rate and are highly restricted) further inhibits the incarcerated individuals' ability to provide social and emotional support for their family members, who often report feeling scared, lonely, and depressed throughout the incarceration of the loved one. Research in this field is limited, but the few studies that have been carried out show that children with incarcerated parents tend to suffer from various social and emotional inhibitors such as depression, trauma, anxiety, and shame. Their ability to form healthy relationships is severely compromised. These children tend to exhibit greater levels of hostility, engage in illicit drug use, have higher levels of truancy, and are at greater risk for suspensions and expulsions from school.

The trauma present in these families tends to inhibit healthy communication and coping mechanisms. Younger children are often kept in the dark regarding an incarcerated family member; older children who know more may experience shame, frustration, or resentment. Adult family members don't fare much better—the stigma of prison often leaves them to deal with the challenges of incarceration and reentry (release from prison) by themselves. Many families report feeling ashamed to discuss a loved one's incarceration with friends and other family members, often making excuses for their absence.

The transition home for most formerly incarcerated people is not an easy one. Research indicates that within three years, more than half will return to prison for new crimes or a violation of their release stipulations. Their inability to secure employment and adjust to a new role in a family with changing dynamics, coupled with their expectations to return as providers for their families, tend to strain already compromised relationships. Greater research is needed in this area, as it is clear that the needs of families impacted by incarceration are extensive.

Kirk A. James
University of Pennsylvania

See Also: Community Corrections; Incarceration and Sentencing, Racial Disparities in; Jail Diversion Programs for Children and Adolescents; Juvenile Justice System; Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners; Probation and Parole Officers; Restorative Justice

Further Readings

Bushfield, Suzanne. "Fathers in Prison: Impact of Parenting Education." Journal of Correctional Education, v.55/2 (2004).

Mazza, Carl. "And Then the World Fell Apart: The Children of Incarcerated Fathers." Families in Society: The Journal of Contemporary Social Services, v.83/5 (2002).

Travis, Jeremy and Michelle Waul, eds. Prisoners Once Removed: The Impact of Incarceration and Reentry on Children, Families, and Communities. Washington, DC: Urban Institute, 2003.

Family, International Variations in Definitions of

It is difficult to separate the idea of family from the marriage and postmarital residence rules in different societies. Marriage has been defined by anthropologists as a formalized, essentially universal, culturally accepted relationship between two or more people, usually of opposite sexes, who have mutual rights and obligations. Marriage forms a family of procreation between the marrying parties. The marital household becomes a family of orientation to any children of the marrying parties. Robin Fox has conducted research demonstrating that some people on Tory Island, Ireland, continue to reside with their families of orientation following their weddings. A similar family system is found among the Nayar caste in India. In both of these family types, male individuals live with their mothers, siblings, and female sibling's children, but only women live with their own children.

Monogamy

Monogamy is (usually) marriage between one man and one woman at a time (exception: the Nuer of the southeastern Sudan and the Ibibio of southeastern Nigeria have so-called woman marriages). Monogamy is the cultural ideal in only 25 percent of the world's societies, such as the United States, England, France, and other Westernized countries. Nonetheless, it is the most common real form of marriage in many more societies for a variety of reasons, such as economics or different stages of the life cycle. Although some politicians have claimed in recent years that monogamy is the only biblically approved form of marriage, this is not true; the Bible contains many cases of polygamy.

Polygamy

Polygamy can be any form of multiple-partner marriage, and it creates families that share members with other families to create a superfamily. Usually polygamy refers to polygyny, the most common culturally ideal form of marriage in the world (about two-thirds of the world's cultures favor it).

Polygyny

Polygyny is marriage between one man and two or more women at a time, as in some biblical cases of marriage, such as Joseph, Leah, and Rachel. (Often, the women are sisters; this is called sororal polygyny.) A type of polygyny found among the Nuer is called ghost marriage, in which a woman marries a dead man, and his living brother (who may be married to someone else) acts as proxy for the ghost. This forms a family that consists of a woman, a ghost, and any children that they may have (with help from the ghost's living brother).

Polyandry

Polygamy may also refer to polyandry, which is very rare. It is marriage between two or more men and one woman at a time, as found among some families in Limi, Nepal, where one woman will marry a group of brothers. This form of family is known as fraternal polyandry.

Consensual Unions

Some families do not involve marriage; these may be based on consensual unions, which are are nonmarital sexual and/or economic unions. These unions may be temporary or permanent. Families based in consensual unions are found in many parts of the world, including the modern United States. Judith Gussler found consensual unions among some poorer families on the island of St. Kitt's in the Caribbean, where women did not choose to marry their children's fathers, reasoning that by having their children with several men, they maximize the economic potential of child support. This leaves families consisting of mothers and multiple children who may have only one parent in common.

Nuclear Family

In the United States, the standard definition of a family is what anthropologists refer to as the nuclear family. A nuclear family can be defined as a married couple and any unmarried children that they may have who still are living with them. There can be many variants on this basic form: children who no longer have parents still would be a family, as would one-parent households. Couples who have no children would still constitute a family, as would same-sex households, as well as marriages between women traditionally recognized among the Nuer of the southeastern Sudan and the Ibibio-speaking Anang of southeast Nigeria. But what constitutes a family varies in different societies, and the standard American definition of what constitutes a family is not necessarily the case—even in the United States. Older (and sometimes younger) people who are without immediate biological relatives locally sometimes construct families from nieces, nephews, or a few close friends or neighbors, who all watch out for and perform tasks for each other.

Stem Family

Conrad M. Arensberg and Solon T. Kimball described the stem family in their book, Family and Community in Ireland, about County Clare, Ireland. The stem family lies between the nuclear family and the extended family and is made up of grandparents, one married son, his wife, and any children they may have, and the unmarried siblings of the married son. During the time of Arensberg and Kimball's research in the 1930s, County Clare farms were too small to subdivide among all of the possible heirs, so only one member of a family (as a rule a son) would inherit the patrimony. Only one daughter might be able to marry because there might be enough for only one dowry (inheritance at a daughter's matrimony). Some children might enter a seminary or convent, become shop apprentices, emigrate, or they could stay on the farm as unmarried, unpaid farmhands and housemaids, likened to stems off the family tree that never bore fruit.

Extended Family

Extended families may be defined as multiple generations of closely related nuclear families who live conterminously, that is, within the same house or very near to one another. Extended families often are found in agricultural societies that practice patrilocal residence, wherein most farming is done by men, such as the Jats of Haryana State in India. Patrilocal residence is postmarital residence with the husband's family; technically, this is called virilocal residence until the couple have children. Extended family households may also be found in other parts of India, the Arab world, and China. This involves billions of people, making the patrilocal extended family the most common ideal family type in the world, practiced by about two-thirds of human cultures. Other examples of societies with patrilocal families include some traditional Native American societies, such as the Omaha and Shawnee in North America and the Yanomamo in South America.

Matrilocal extended families are more common in horticultural societies in which most farming is done by women, such as the Hopi of the southwestern United States. Matrilocal residence is postmarital residence with the wife's family; technically, this is called uxorilocal residence until the couple have children. Matrilocal extended family households are more rare than patrilocal extended family households, being practiced by only about 15 percent of cultures. The Cherokee, Crow, and Navajo are examples of Native American societies with matrilocal families, as are the Yoruba from Nigeria.

Clans

The word clan comes from the Gaelic word clann, which means family. A clan is a very large family that believes it shares a common ancestor, who may have existed so far in the past that they cannot trace their genealogies back to that ancestor. Frequently, this is because it may be a totemic ancestor—a plant, animal, or force of nature that they believe took human form and gave birth to the first human clan member. A collection of related clans is called a phratry.

The Universal Incest Taboo

All societies prohibit incest. This is a universal taboo, but what defines incest varies in different societies. In the United States, it is generally considered incestuous to marry anyone closer than a third cousin, but anthropologist Alan Beals reports that in Gopalpur, a village in southern India, a man's parents may arrange a marriage between him and his sister's daughter. However, in all societies, marriage or mating is forbidden between mothers and sons, fathers and daughters, and sisters and brothers. Historically, very few exceptions to this taboo exist, and those are royal families who ruled by divine right; in ancient Egypt, the Inca in Peru, and in Hawai'i, heirs who did not have the requisite divine ancestry would not have the right to rule.

Michael J. Simonton
Northern Kentucky University

See Also: Families, Nontraditional; Family Structure, Diversity of; International Adoptions and Families.

Further Readings

Ember, Carol R. and Melvin Ember. Cultural Anthropology. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Prentice Hall, 2007.

Fox, Robin. Kinship and Marriage: An Anthropological Perspective (Cambridge Studies in Social and Cultural Anthropology). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1984.

Fox, Robin. Tory Islanders: A People of the Celtic Fringe. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1978.

Neely, Sharlotte and Barbara Thiel. "Kinship Details." In Introduction to Cultural Anthropology, Michael J. Simonton, ed. Dubuque, IA: Kendall Hunt Publishing Company, 2012.

Simonton, Michael J., ed. Introduction to Cultural Anthropology. Dubuque, IA: Kendall Hunt Publishing, 2012.

Family Crisis Intervention Planning

Family crisis intervention planning refers to the activities related to the preparation and provision of actions to intercede, assess, and prevent incidents and circumstances that create disruption and destruction in the life of a family member or the family as a whole. Most commonly, family crisis intervention planning is related to families with members who suffer from serious emotional, behavioral, and/or mental disorders. Mental health crises tend to occur in such situations, and these disturbances tend to disrupt or damage the balance, equilibrium, or homeostasis of the family, thereby leading to or resulting in personal or familial harm. Often, family crisis intervention planning entails preparation, forecasting, and provisioning. In addition, families with histories of domestic violence, physical abuse, or sexual abuse can also benefit from family crisis intervention planning. Finally, families with a member or members suffering from alcohol, drug, or chemical dependency and addiction are also candidates for family crisis intervention planning.

When things fall apart as a result of a mental health crisis, individuals quickly learn that this crisis is just as important to address as any other health care crisis or emergency. It can be difficult, or even impossible, to predict just when a crisis event will happen. In fact, a crisis can occur without warning. A mental health crisis can occur even when a family has a crisis intervention plan in place. A crisis also can take place when the family crisis intervention plan has been closely followed and the family used well-practiced techniques taught to them by mental health professionals. Having a family crisis intervention plan does not prevent a mental health crises from occurring. Mental health profesionals do the best they can with the information and resources available at the time of a family crisis. Family crisis intervention planning is an important tool or means to help families cope with a mental health crisis, and can produce proactive and reactive plans. Proactive plans include tangible or intangible supports that are expected to prevent a specific family crisis from happening. Reactive plans are created and designed by the team to prepare for what actions will be taken if and when a crisis actually occurs.

In the context of mental health issues, the first step of family crisis intervention planning is to fully understand what a mental health crisis is. A mental health crises is any situation in which a person's behavior puts that person at risk of harming or hurting themselves or others and/or when the parent or family members are not able to resolve the situation with the skills and resources available. Mental health crises can be caused by a variety of factors, such as increased stress, changes in family situations, stress associated with changes in life situations, or substance use, as well as other factors that may trigger an increase in behaviors that lead to a mental health crisis. Medical illnesses can also impact mental health and subsequently can lead to a crisis. Any of these things can present coping problems to someone, but they can be more difficult for someone with a diagnosis of mental illness. Many people with mental illness don't understand their illness and the symptoms that may suddenly appear. Family crisis intervention planning is critical to the safety and well-being of the individual and to the family as a whole.

Family Diversity and Family Crisis Intervention Planning

Every family has its own unique culture, traditions, history, and values. Family culture includes definitions of success; attitudes about time, money, and personal space; language; food; and concepts of beauty, art, and music. From family to family, there are a wide range of dissimilar beliefs, a variety of communication styles, differing problem-solving techniques, an assortment of individual role and power arrangements, as well as many other diverse characteristics of family structure. These distinctive and diverse features of family culture make every family crisis intervention planning experience uniquely individualized to each client-family. Although culture is important, family diversity extends far beyond the concept of culture and comprises all forms of diversity, such as differences related to disability, ethnicity, marital status, sex and/or gender choice, economic status, age, class, color, and national origin.

Consequently, family diversity factors into intervention planning by requiring human services professionals to possess or acquire and utilize new knowledge and skills in ways to make possible and ultimately ensure the competent delivery of services. For many, the new knowledge begins with self-knowledge or self-awareness of their own values, beliefs, biases, prejudices, and stereotypes. The journey to become a competent diversity service provider can be both exciting and frightening. The acquisition of knowledge and understanding related to family diversity enables human services professionals to interact, build positive and supportive relationships, and more effectively facilitate family intervention crisis intervention planning. Effective interventions require service providers to be sensitive and open to learning, accepting, honoring, and respecting those family structures, roles, values, attitudes, and behaviors that are different from their own. Furthermore, human services agencies and organizations have the responsibility to incorporate responsive services matched to the assets, strengths, and needs of diverse families.

Diverse families perceive and respond to a wide variety of life situations in vastly different, widely varied, and culturally unique ways. In reality, culture influences what type of threat or event is perceived as a crisis, how families interpret the meaning of crisis, and, in turn, how families respond to their perceptions and react to their interpretations of events perceived as family crises. In family crises, culturally diverse families may seek help or sometimes choose not to seek help; they express emotions or remain silent, and/or describe the circumstances surrounding their family crisis in distinctively different ways that are often foreign to the human services provider. In addition to between-group cultural differences, significant diversity exists within racial, ethnic, gender, age, ability (and disability), and class groups. Customs unique to the culture of origin can and often do influence and even determine how the family will deal with crises and whether contact and interactions with human service providers will be managed by the family, and if so, how this will be done.

A family crisis typically occurs when the family is confronted with unexpected change. Sudden events or life changes can be confusing, difficult, and seemingly impossible for the family to successfully adapt or cope. Culturally diverse families seek help from human services professionals as a result of experiencing a wide range of family crises including the loss or death of a loved one or relative, the loss of a job, divorce, and poor school performance or dropping out of school. For example, Asian American students at all levels are generally stereotyped as technology savvy, academically high-achieving students. In reality, Asian American students are a diverse group. Not all are brilliant, exceptional students, or computer geeks. This stereotyping hides the reality of many Asian Americans who find it difficult and sometimes impossible to achieve at high levels in school. Struggling with a new culture and language, some do not reach the heights of the celebrated few who are successful, and they drop out of school. This circumstance brings a great deal of shame to the family, creating a family crisis.

Another example of family crisis concerns a Haitian family in which the husband has been caught cheating on his wife, which precipitates marriage and family counseling. Because of their belief in voodoo, the wife is adamant that the husband is currently under a spell by which he is also possessed by spirits that govern his unfaithful behavior. Voodoo is an ancient West African religion practiced by more than 30 million people. Voodoo is a religion of spirits, and practitioners of voodoo believe that the world of humans is shared by the world of the spirits who can influence, control, and subsequently impact the world of the living. In such cases, human services professionals encounter families with strong beliefs very different from their own.

Human services professionals face a multitude of challenges in understanding and effectively addressing the complex and complicated family crises presented by diverse families. Human services professionals accustomed to a so-called one-size-fits-all model must come to grips that this approach will not suffice. The uniqueness of each culturally diverse family requires flexibility in the type and duration of the treatment experience. To meet these challenges it may be suggestive for human services professionals to remember that families respond to crisis and recover within their cultural context including their traditions, beliefs, and value systems. It may be helpful for human services professionals to enlist the assistance of a cultural broker (someone familiar with the family's culture) to help in the recovery from the family crisis. Although there is no single suggested approach, care should be taken to provide respectful, accessible, equitable, and informed services to families from diverse backgrounds.

Wraparound and Family Crisis Intervention Planning

Using the wraparound approach to plan for family crisis intervention in which mental health issues are present, the family begins by meeting with family members and the people who know the person with the mental health condition and who are familiar with the crisis behavior. Despite the intensity of the crisis behavior and the range of emotions that it can create, the group begins by working to develop a clear picture of the crisis behavior. This review is possible because most crises have happened before. The group continues by prioritizing crisis or safety situations using likeliness of occurrence and severity indicators of importance. The group discusses the crisis setting or environment, events prior to the crisis, and conditions that may be helpful in predicting a potential crisis situation.

This phase is critically important and useful, as in many cases the crisis has occurred many times. The group is looking for keys to understanding the crisis, triggers, and precipitating events. Other discussion topics during the family crisis intervention process include what happens during the crisis and what person or persons are involved. The group seeks to determine whether other activities or events going on in the environment have an impact that influences or worsens the crisis. Next, the discussion focuses on what happens after the crisis to help define the destructive and damaging behavior. This phase of the discussion concludes with a review of what has been attempted in previous crisis situations and how effective or successful previous attempts were at intervening.

The next phase of the wraparound approach to family crisis prevention planning begins with the group identifying the benefits attached to the behavior exhibited or during the crisis situation for the family member, relative, or significant other(s). Next, the group turns its attention to brainstorming possible alternatives for preventing or intervening in the crisis situation. The group develops a set of simple and clearly defined action steps created specifically to respond, intervene, and prevent the crisis from happening. The family crisis intervention plan identifies the signs or behaviors that indicate what is about to happen or happening and the actions necessary to prevent the crisis from happening or to mitigate the crisis once it begins. Each member of the team reveals his or her concerns regarding what could possibly go wrong. The team should identify where its plan seems most vulnerable and what the potential consequences would be if the plan does not function, and should be prepared to make course corrections in the plan as needed. Finally, the family crisis intervention plan lists a thorough and ordered set of steps to be followed by the group if and when the predicted crisis occurs.

Addiction and Family Crisis Intervention Planning

When loved ones are struggling with the self-destructive behaviors associated with addiction or are facing other problems that are negatively impacting them and the people around them, it can be difficult to figure out how to help them to get the help they need. It is especially challenging when family members continue to avoid help or refuse to seek help, or simply do not realize and accept the severity of their problems. Often an intervention is an effective way to persuade loved ones to take the first step toward recovery. This type of family crisis intervention consists of a gathering of family members, partners, close friends, and significant others, who meet to persuade a person to seek help or treatment for a problem. Family crisis interventions of this sort are considered important to address a range of problems, including drug or alcohol addiction or abuse, eating disorders, addictions to behaviors, domestic violence or self-harm, and even the reluctance of an elderly family member to seek the level of care required for their safety and health care needs. These family crisis interventions are a caring, considerate way to guide and motivate someone to get the needed treatment.

Family intervention crisis plans that address addictions are a chance to let loved ones know that people close to them are concerned for their health and well-being. If done properly, family crisis interventions are thoughtful, nonjudgmental, and respectful. They can also be helpful and healing for friends and family because they are opportunities to share their feelings of pain and frustration amid a group of supportive people.

Family crisis intervention planning that addresses addictions begins with someone close to the person experiencing the challenges of making a proposal to utilize an intervention as a tool or mechanism to assist the person in getting the needed help. Next, a planning team is formed, usually consisting of several persons who are willing to take on leadership roles in the intervention process. The entire family crisis intervention planning process is a learning experience for the members. It is not uncommon for a mental health or addictions specialist or professional to take a leadership role in the planning process. In fact, it is recommended that a counselor, social worker, or professional interventionist be consulted when planning an intervention before any action is taken. These interventions are highly charged and may produce violent results. Family crisis interventions of this type will typically produce a wide range of feelings, including anger, shame, resentment, and a sense of betrayal. It is critically important that family members play significant roles in the development and implementation of the crisis intervention plan. To work effectively, a successful family crisis intervention must be planned well. A poorly planned family crisis intervention can worsen the situation and create emotional and psychological wounds that are difficult to heal.

Conclusion

All family crisis intervention plans should include a debriefing. The debriefing occurs as immediately as possible after each crisis occurs. The team should meet to review the crisis to determine whether the plan actually worked and if course corrections are necessary going forward. All plan modifications should be discussed with the entire group and communicated to any absent team members for implementation of the plan in the future.

Jerry Watson
University of Mississippi

See Also: Crisis Services; Domestic Violence; Family Violence Prevention and Services.

Further Readings

Roberts, Albert R. and Kenneth R. Yeager. Pocket Guide to Crisis Intervention. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2009.

Rowatt, Wade G. Adolescents in Crisis. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2007.

Family Permanency Planning

The establishment of a permanent, safe, and nurturing environment to promote a child's well-being cuts across all human service arenas, no matter the diversity of children across race, ethnicity, gender, age, and socioeconomic background. According to A. Maluccio and E. Fein, permanency planning "involv[es] a mix of family-centered, child-focused, and culturally relevant philosophies, management, and program components and practice strategies designed to help children and youth live in families that offer a continuity of relationships with nurturing parents or caregivers and the opportunity to establish lifetime relationships." Establishing a place of permanency is best done with the inclusion of a child's family members or close family friends who have intimate knowledge of a child's needs and specific life situation. This focus on including those intimately involved in a child's life, most notably family members, embodies a family-centered approach to permanency planning. Family-centered permanency planning assists in a child's transition and adjustment into his or her new placement, as those closest to the youth are consulted about the plan. Possible permanency goals include reunification with the child's biological parent(s), adoption, guardianship, or placement with a relative.

There are four types of permanency planning: reunification with the biological parent(s), foster care, adoption, and kinship care. Reunification of the child with their biological parent(s) is usually the first type of permanency planning pursued. Recently, both the rights of fathers in child custody disputes and the consideration of the father as a "permanent parent' have received more national attention in permanency planning. When circumstances do not warrant reunification of their biological parent for various reasons (e.g., parent struggles with substance abuse or mental health issues, or if a child was sexually abused in parental care), children may be placed with a relative, called kinship care, or placed in a licensed foster home with foster parents who have passed a background check and are trained in addressing the well-being of children in their care.

When practicing culturally sensitive family permanency planning with diverse groups, many child welfare workers have relied on kinship care as a viable option. It is defined by the Child Welfare League of America as the act of caring for and protecting children by their relatives, godparents, stepparents, members of their tribes, or any other capable adult who shares an existing kinship bond with the child. Kinship care is often practiced informally as members of a family or close community may share responsibility in nurturing and protecting their children without any involvement from the child welfare system; however, these informal arrangements are usually temporary. Alternately, formal kinship care involves the child welfare and family court systems, inherently implying legal oversight of the child's care while under the supervision of kin (e.g., kinship homes must be approved according to state law and licensed). Although formal kinship care requires an outside party to assess a kin's suitability to provide care as opposed to more informal arrangements, this continuum of family permanency planning is considered one of the most collaborative and culturally sensitive approaches to child placement.

The 1980 Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act (ASFA) (P.L. 96-272) was passed in response to concern about the longer periods of time children remained in foster care. It highlighted family reunification for children in foster care, and as a result, child welfare agencies refocused on this policy goal of reunification. ASFA also focused on the prevention of foster care placement, including the provision of services and supports to families to prevent foster care placement. Adoption is often viewed as the last type of permanency planning to be employed. Even under the best circumstances, the removal of a child from their home is traumatic, with the child experiencing multiple placements and losses prior to their adoption by a "new" family. Approximately 400,000 children are in the foster care system in the United States, with about 25 percent of them eligible to be adopted. The most common form of adoption in the United States is called Stepparent Adoption, "the legal adoption of a child by the spouse of the child's birth or previous adoptive parent." Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, or same-sex couples seeking to adopt a child face additional barriers, as only the District of Columbia and 19 states allow joint adoptions by same-sex couples.

Children from underrepresented and ethnic minority groups are often disproportionately represented in permanency planning programs. Due to the overrepresentation of these youth and their unique needs, it has become increasingly common in social services to employ more targeted efforts when finding placements for these children. One such effort includes engaging families of ethnic minority youth (i.e., family-centered permanency planning) to identify the most culturally appropriate placements. Further, "permanency planners" should utilize more targeted and tailored recruitment strategies when seeking out adoptive families for children from minority groups. Whether youth are being reunified with their biological families or placed in new homes, the goal is to place a child into a safe and lasting home, one in which the child will thrive. Within the context permanency planning for children of ethnic minorities, the Department of Health and Human Services reports that those youth who are matched with families of similar cultural backgrounds and ethnicities are more likely to be well-adjusted and experience less stress as a result of the life change.

Children with clinical mental health and behavioral health needs, those with medical conditions requiring 24-hour care, and those referred to as "medically fragile" are usually placed in a higher level of foster care called therapeutic foster care, where foster parents have received intensive training to help meet the child's mental health, behavioral, and medical needs.

A. Suzanne Boyd
Kathryn Grimsley
University of North Carolina at Charlotte

See Also: Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Child Protective Services; Families, Nontraditional; Foster Care Agencies; Mental Health Services, Children.

Further Readings

Family Equality Council. "50 States of Adoption." http://www.familyequality.org/get_informed/families_for_all/50_states_of_adoption (Accessed June 2014).

Mallon, G. P. and P. M. Hess, eds. Child Welfare for the 21st Century. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.

Maluccio, A. N., E. Fein, and I. Davis. "Family Reunification: Research Findings, Issues and Directions." Child Welfare, v.73 (1994).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services: "Engaging Parents in Permanency Planning." https://www.childwelfare.gov/permanency/overview/parents.cfm (Accessed June 2014).

Family Planning Services

Until the early 19th century, no formal system was in place to support women and men with decisions about pregnancy and access to health status information. By the early 20th century, however, family planning advocacy efforts accelerated. Having access to options when making decisions about birth control can have impact on individual, family, and community health. Family planning provides information about sexual and reproductive health and assists with decisions regarding abstinence and preventing, delaying, or achieving pregnancy. Through family planning services, men and women can be helped to make decisions about having children that take into account all aspects of their lives, including financial and health conditions and personal situations.

Family planning services include a range of reproductive health options that offers access to effective, safe, and affordable contraceptive supplies and information, as well as preventive health services. Family planning options include natural, medical, surgical, or chemical contraceptive methods, infertility services, adolescent services, and breast and cervical cancer screening. Family planning services also include access to human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) and sexually transmitted disease (STD) screening, testing, and information. Inherent in family planning is the right of men and women to be informed, make their own reproductive decisions, and obtain medically appropriate services. The World Health Organization (WHO) considers family planning a critical poverty reduction and health improvement method. Similarly, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) indicates that the systematic provision of family planning services is a significant public health achievement.

History

Birth control and family planning were practiced in early Egyptian and Greek societies. However, in medieval England, family planning and birth control were viewed as a moral issue, and efforts to delay or prevent pregnancy were frowned upon. By the 20th century, lack of access to services and information had become an important public health concern. Margaret Sanger, a public health nurse, was an early advocate of the benefits of family planning, and spurred the early birth control movement.

Family planning services include a range of reproductive health options that offers access to effective, safe, and affordable contraceptive supplies and information.

Sanger, concerned with high miscarriage rates and frequent pregnancies among low-income families, began a campaign to provide information on and access to birth control. Sanger eventually opened the first family planning clinic in 1916 in Brooklyn, New York. She continued to open clinics across the United States while promoting changes in laws that prevented distribution of contraception. Sanger is credited with starting the modern family planning movement and with founding the American Birth Control League, which eventually became Planned Parenthood of America.

Sanger's association with the eugenics movement is viewed with controversy. Eugenicists believe that the human race could be improved through careful breeding. Although she did not agree with all aspects of the eugenics stance, Sanger thought the spread of untreatable disease and mental illness could be ended with population control efforts. Sanger eventually distanced herself from the American eugenics movement.

During the 1960s, the birth control pill and the intrauterine device (IUD) provided accessible and convenient birth control methods and increased their availability to women and families in underserved communities. In 1965, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down laws that prohibited contraception use by married couples. Further government sanctions of family planning services occurred in 1970, when federal funding was authorized under the Family Planning and Research Act, which established Title X of the Public Service Act. Title X provides access to family planning information, contraceptive supplies, and health prevention activities. Authorization for Medicaid payments for family planning services occurred in 1972.

Title X now provides funding for family planning clinics throughout the United States, including state, county, and local health departments; community health centers; Planned Parenthood centers; and hospital, school, and faith-based programs, along with other private nonprofits. Under Title X, abortion is not covered as a method of family planning. Funded services include contraceptive care, screening for HIV and other STDs, as well as for cervical cancer. Title X–funded programs offer these services to men and women in their communities and provide access to care that may otherwise be unavailable. Providers funded under the Title X program must deliver service despite a person's ability to pay. The majority of those served in these programs have incomes that fall below the federal poverty line. One of the primary objectives of Title X is to expand access to health care for low-income communities.

Working in Family Planning

Individuals who work in the family planning field include physicians, nurses, social workers, pharmacists, and community health workers. Most family planning professionals work in community clinics and other community-type organizations. Family planning professionals engage in an array of activities that enable women and men to make informed decisions about their reproductive health. A clinician, who may be a physician, physician's assistant, nurse practitioner, or nurse midwife, provides medical services. Clinical services involve reviewing the client's medical history and conducting a medical exam. Counseling may be provided by any of the family planning professionals and includes offering information to help clients understand contraceptive options, correct use, possible side effects, and safer sex options. Family planning professionals are concerned with promoting family well-being, responsible decision making, and healthy pregnancy outcomes.

Many young people become sexually active during adolescence, and family planning professionals are especially concerned with providing them needed information and services. Several risk factors exist for sexually active adolescents that information and services can prevent. Sexually active adolescents are at high risk of HIV and STD infection, unintended pregnancy, and poor pregnancy outcomes. Family planning professionals seek to increase skills among young people to make choices that have a positive impact on their future development.

Effective strategies used by family planning professionals involve engaging with a variety of community institutions to better support young people. For example, reproductive health education programs are offered in schools, community centers, churches, and other places where young people gather. Positive messages are also promoted in the media. Engaging youth is an important task in family planning services.

Worldwide Concern

Meeting family planning needs in developing countries is a critical concern among family planning advocates. Worldwide, family planning programs have been developed that seek to enable individuals to have control over their sexual and reproductive health. These efforts are designed to overcome obstacles that prevent access to information and services. Family planning in developing countries is also viewed as an effective poverty-reducing effort that has the potential to bring about improvements in women's and children's health.

Evaluating family planning programs is another critical endeavor that determines the overall effectiveness of services. Evaluation determines whether family planning services have met their overall goals and are delivered in the most cost-effective manner. Evaluation of these factors is especially important in light of national and international funding cuts to family planning services. It is clear that in the long run, funding cuts will have a direct impact on the quality and availability of services, and thus the overall health and well-being of families and communities may be impacted as well.

Desiree Stepteau-Watson
University of Mississippi

See Also: AIDS/HIV Programs; Female Genital Mutilation; Gender Issues and Roles in Developing Countries; Gender Issues and Roles in Non-Western Countries; Health Care, Disparities in; Infant Mortality/Sudden Infant Death Syndrome; Infanticide, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Midwifery; Public Health.

Further Readings

Frost, J. J. and L. Lindberg. "Reasons for Using Contraception: Perspectives of US Women Seeking Care at Specialized Family Planning Clinics." Contraception, v.87 (2013).

Bocanegra, H., et al. "Enhancing Service Delivery through Title X Funding: Findings from California." Perspectives on Sexual and Reproductive Health, v.44 (2012).

Pillai, V. K., and R. Gupta. "Reproductive Rights Approach to Reproductive Health in Developing Countries." Global Health Action, v.4 (2011).

Family Preservation Services

Although the term family preservation services (FPS) did not emerge until the late 1970s and early 1980s, this intensive intervention strategy has been in implementation and revision since the turn of the 20th century. Conceptually, the framework of family preservation has remained the same throughout its history: to provide assistance to low-resource children and families living in poverty through strengths-based interventions. In the mid-20th century, however, the focus shifted from giving resources such as money and food to families to providing therapeutic services for families in crisis in order to stabilize the unit and prevent children from being removed from their homes. Additional interventions included supporting families reunifying after placement and interrupting intergenerational cycles of family violence and separation. This article centers on a brief history of government legislation, diversity, empirical research, and theoretical underpinnings of FPS interventions.

History of Government Legislation

The Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act (AACWA) of 1980 was put into place to provide assistance for children at risk for out-of-home placement and to prevent placements within the foster care system. AACWA contained multiple provisions, but as it pertains to FPS, it provided that all participating agencies must provide reunification and prevention programs for children and families involved in the foster care system. Due to this legislation, the decade of the 1980s showed a decline in children placed in foster care. Additional funding for FPS was obtained with the Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997, which provided support for child placement permanency and family support systems such as crisis stabilization, reunification counseling, and domestic violence assistance. The most recent efforts to clarify and support the needs of children and families was provided in the Child Welfare Policy Manual in 2001, which defined expectations of agencies to provide "reasonable efforts" to prevent out-of-home placement of children.

Diversity

Although FPS is intended to service low-resource families, evidence suggests that there is a gap in services for children and families who fall into categories within special populations. These populations can include, but are not limited to (1) families and children of color—specifically African Americans, Hispanics, and Native Americans; (2) families with older children; and (3) families with children who are severely emotionally disturbed (SED). Although families and children of color (predominantly African American) are disproportionately represented in foster care, evidence suggests that FPS is not targeted toward these groups and treatment modality is not congruent with these clients' needs. Concomitant to this phenomenon is the large number of FPS workers who self-identify as European American and who may have worldviews that are not congruent with minority values regarding family functioning. These issues as well as others must be addressed to increase efficacy of FPS for all families and children.

Empirical Research

Utilizing empirical studies to identify the overall efficacy of FPS has been difficult for a number of reasons. Given the multitude of responsibilities that service agencies have, adhering to a strict research protocol may not always be a top priority of workers due to clients' more emergent needs. Common issues with past FPS efficacy research have included (1) a lack of experimental groups for a true experimental design, (2) inadequate documentation of clients' progress through FPS interventions, (3) issues with data collection, (4) poorly defined research terms, and (5) issues with statistical analysis. Additionally, within research literature, no specific definition exists of what constitutes success in FPS interventions.

Although it may be assumed that children remaining in their own homes is evidence of a successful intervention, this may not necessarily be the case because family crises can vary in length (chronic versus short term) and severity. Therefore, using the measure of custody could be an incorrect sign of success. Moreover, agencies that intervene with children and families may be required to measure variables such as arrest rates, hospitalizations, and/or social services interventions that could prove useful in determining intervention success. This information may be as valuable as prevention of out-of-home placement, but if data are not uniformly collected, it is difficult to compare one agency or intervention program to another. To improve studies regarding FPS outcomes, researchers may need to focus on creating a cohesive definition of success, create a metric to measure FPS success, and develop a metric that can help measure the efficacy of services received.

Theoretical Underpinnings

FPS services have been provided by both public and private agencies with varying treatment modalities and levels of success. The intent of treatment variation is to create tailored interventions that match treatment strategies with families' needs to create the best possible outcomes. Specific factors that could influence the success of families receiving FPS services include highly motivated clients, intensive intervention by clinicians with highly developed family therapy skills, and follow-up services conducted by the same clinicians who performed initial FPS services. Additional factors that may influence success include the cultural competence of clinicians, limited caseloads to allow clinicians to focus more on a few families, and strong clinician/family relationships.

Many clinicians working in FPS will initially utilize crisis intervention strategies for their first interventions. Crises in the life of a family can be developmental and/or environmental in nature. Developmental crises can include incidents such as adolescents engaging in criminal behaviors, parents being unemployed or underemployed, and the death of a family member. Environmental crises include gang violence, riots, and unstable living conditions. When either type of crisis is a chronic part of family life, all members tend to experience emotional side effects such as anger, depression, and anxiety. FPS interventions tend to focus on crisis stabilization techniques to alleviate tension and stress in single events and those families living in chronic crisis. This type of stabilization can take several hours to a few days to complete, depending on the severity of the crisis and the nature of the disruption to family life.

As clinicians develop a working relationship with families and are able to stabilize the initial crisis situation, they may engage in systemic therapy interventions to help conceptualize families' functioning and create a treatment plan. Systemic theorists promote the idea that the family should be conceptualized in terms of a holistic unit whose functioning is unique and at its best helps maintain the overall well-being of the individual members. Ideas of family systems theory that aid in understanding the family as a unit include family dynamics and reciprocal interactions; communication patterns that promote homeostasis within the family; patterns of power and control; and family members' rules, roles, and interaction patterns.

Elizabeth R. O'Brien
University of Tennessee at Chattanooga

See Also: Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Family Services; Family Therapy; Family Violence Prevention and Services; Mental Health Services, Adult; Mental Health Services, Children.

Further Reading

Garrison, M. E. and L. B. Blalock. "Intensive Family Preservation Services." Journal of Prevention & Intervention in the Community, v.14/1–2 (1996).

Pecora, Peter J., et al. The Child Welfare Challenge: Policy, Practice, and Research (Modern Applications of Social Work). Piscataway, NJ: Aldine Transaction, 2009.

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "Child Welfare Information Gateway: Family Preservation Services." https://www.childwelfare.gov/supporting/preservation (Accessed April 2014).

Family Reunification

Family reunification has long been a cornerstone of U.S. immigration policy. Many advocates and researchers suggest that families should not be separated by using laws that prohibit family members in the country of origin from joining U.S. naturalized citizens or legal permanent residents (LPRs), also known as green card holders. Not only is reunification socially acceptable, but many studies suggest positive impacts for the family and the receiving economy. A close association exists between family-based and employment-based policies. Supported by family networks, reunited immigrants tend to have increased social and occupational mobility, demonstrate entrepreneurship, and build increasing social capital. Another benefit of reunification is the ability to maintain a single household rather than multiple households in different countries and to contribute to the domestic economy rather than remitting funds to the country of origin. However, some do not see these advantages; they fear a multiplier effect in which each new naturalized citizen or LPR will geometrically increase the number of immigrants that may be allowed into the country as each new immigrant becomes the sponsor of more family members. Immigration policy of the 20th century has prevented the multiplier effect and created long waiting lists and backlogs of visa requests by family members.

History

Immigration policies and acts have been an ongoing concern and continue to be a concern in the United States in the 21st century. Early moves by the federal government to control immigration date back to 1882, when individual states surrendered immigration legislation to the federal government. By 1917, serious efforts were under way to control immigration and to screen individual immigrants, and in 1921 the first ethnic quotas were set. The National Origins Act of 1924 effectively ended the so-called open-door immigration by establishing annual limits and exact ethnic quotas. However, family reunification remained a pillar of immigration policy.

Family reunification appeared as a major concern as early as 1885 with the Foran Act. Although this act was designed to control the import of labor, family reunification presented the most used loophole to allow new immigrants to enter. The original language of the act indicated that no suggestion was intended that would not allow any individual from assisting family members, relatives, or personal friends from migrating to the United States for the purpose of establishing a home. The phrase "personal friend" was removed in 1891. The National Origins Act of 1924 continued the policy of reuniting families by assigning 50 percent of quotas to the fathers and mothers of U.S. citizens (USCs) over 21 years of age or to husbands of USCs. Another large portion of the quotas were reserved for family members of LPRs. LPRs could sponsor minor children under 21 years of age and wives, but husbands were not included. The policy of reunification was continued in the 1945 War Brides Act that allowed spouses and children of U.S. citizens or veterans to enter the country.

The executive branch of the U.S. government was examining immigration policy changes by 1963, and President John F. Kennedy envisioned three criteria for immigration reform: the need for skilled workers, family reunification, and a priority of registration. Two changes were considered for reunification: parents of U.S. citizens would qualify as nonquota numbers, and preference would be extended to parents of LPRs. The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965 set preference percentages for family members including siblings of U.S. citizens, removed the quota system, established visa categories, and set family reunification as a cornerstone of immigration policy.

The next major changes occurred in 1986 and 2001. The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (IRCA) offered amnesty to undocumented immigrants, and as immigrants became naturalized citizens and LPRs, the doors opened for the multiplier effect. However, requirements for reunification became more stringent with the Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001. Better known as the USA PATRIOT Act, immigration duties were moved to the newly created Department of Homeland Security. Both the 1986 and 2001 acts created backlogs and long waits for visas, and the USA PATRIOT Act criminalized many family members seeking to be reunited with relatives. A strict bureaucratic model and requirements define the current process.

Process of Reunification and Immigration Reform

The current process for reunification establishes two family categories: immediate family (family reunification) and family preference (legislative numerical limits). Immediate family includes parents, spouses, and minor children of USCs, whereas family preference is a tiered category that gives preference to (1) unmarried adult children of USCs, (2) spouses and unmarried children of LPRs, (3) married children of USCs, and (4) siblings of USCs. Other relatives, such as aunts, uncles, and grandparents, are not included in the family reunification process nor are the siblings and parents of LPRs. USCs must be over 21 years of age, establish the relationship through documentation, and demonstrate an ability to support a relative at 125 percent of the poverty line. Sponsors must fill out an I-130 form, which will be approved or denied by the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. Approved relations who are currently in the country may file a Form I-485 and request a status change to LPR, and approved relatives outside the country must report to a U.S. consulate to be processed for a visa. The process can be long and often may take several years, resulting in cases of undocumented immigrants desperate to reunite with family members residing in the United States.

The 21st century has witnessed a new concern and effort for immigration policy reform. Many family members without documentation have been criminalized as they cross the border in an effort to rejoin families. Mothers, fathers, and children have been caught in a time-consuming process and bureaucratic administration of current laws, have been criminalized, and have suffered imprisonment or deportation. A deported relative cannot return to the United States legally for a period of 10 years.

Randall Adams
LaGrange College

See Also: Immigration: Human Service Issues; Immigration Law, History of U.S.; U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Further Readings

Daniels, Roger. Guarding the Golden Door. New York: Hill and Wang, 2004.

Hatch, Patricia. U.S. Immigration Policy: Family Reunification. LWVUS Immigration Study: Background Papers, 2007. http://www.lwv.org/files/ImmigrationStudy_FamilyReunification_Hatch.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Human Rights Watch. "Turning Migrants into Criminals: The Harmful Impact of US Border Prosecutions." 2013. http://www.hrw.org (Accessed December 2013).

Jasso, Guillermina and Mark R. Rosenzweig. "Family Reunification and the Immigration Multiplier: U.S. Immigration Law, Origin-Country Conditions and the Reproduction of Immigrants." Demography, v.23/3 (1986).

Portes, Alejandro and Ruben G. Rumbaut. Immigrant America: A Portrait. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. "Annual Report of Immigrant Visa Applicants in the Family-Sponsored and Employment-Based Preferences Registered at the National Visa Center as of November 1, 2012." http://www.travel.state.gov/pdf/WaitingListItem.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Family Services

A family is viewed as a cohesive unit; when an individual within the unit has an issue, the entire unit suffers to some degree. Service agencies within the United States take a holistic approach to working with families. In fact, the services offered at most human services agencies are designed to meet individual needs but also address the family unit as a whole. Maeve O'Halloran and Owen Doody contend that an approach with a person-centered care philosophy when servicing families will enable individual family members to receive the help needed while addressing the needs of the family as a unit. Fostering relationships in the family by valuing and promoting the family's strengths is central to providing a supportive environment in family-centered services. Many agencies in the United States are designed to service families by assisting in removing barriers, strengthening bonds, creating familial environments, and supporting the family unit.

Community Services

Community agencies within each state provide the community with mental health, intellectual disability, and substance abuse services. These services assist families by enabling participants to stay near their family and friends while receiving services. Services can be short term or long term and involve treatment planning that includes family members of the clients being serviced. Such services are also provided through local departments of human services.

Departments of Human Services

Agencies of state departments of human services offer a variety of programs to support the family. Programs include adoption, foster care, child protective services (CPS), and many other prevention services to strengthen families and improve child well-being.

Adoption agencies provide children who are unable to be raised by their biological parents the opportunity to be legally united with another family. Family service agencies work to unite children with families as well as families with children. In some instances, children can maintain contact with their biological families, but this is not common practice. Adoption offers positive benefits for the children and families. There are lifelong implications for the adopted individual, the adoptive parents, and the birth parents in navigating the new relationships. Differences in familial environments and in decisions to continue biological relationships can be a challenge to adoptive families.

Foster care is a program that provides services for children who no longer can reside with their families due to abuse, neglect, and abandonment. These children are provided a familial environment in which care is provided on a temporary basis. During this time, a permanency goal is designed to ensure the children will have an appropriate placement. The ultimate goal of foster care is reunification with the biological family. The children will remain in the foster care placement until their families are able to provide for them again or until permanent placement is available for the children.

Child protective services, a federally mandated program, accepts and investigates reports of abuse and neglect of children under the age of 18 years. The goal of CPS is to protect children from physical, mental, and medical neglect and from sexual abuse and exploitation, as well as to prevent and alleviate family crises. Child protective services are available around the clock every day. CPS is also an intervention method to help families who are struggling. The goal is to assist families in getting back on track by intervening if abuse or neglect is present. In some circumstances, children are permanently removed from homes and become a part of the adoption and foster care programs.

Family Preservation and In-Home Service Programs

Kristin Duppong Hurley described family preservation services (FPS) as short-term, family-focused services designed to assist families in crisis by improving parenting and family functioning while keeping children safe. Jennifer Mullins described FPS as a program designed to prevent out-of-home placement for children who are at risk of child maltreatment. The services are founded on the belief that when parents are provided with services and support, the children can be protected and safe within their own families. The services are provided 24/7 and include a brief but intense four- to six-week program, as well as in-home training to provide families with skills to address real-world situations as they occur.

In-home services are performed in the client's or family's home, and typically are used by low-income families. These services can include counseling, prevention, education, and support for families who are unable to easily access services in their community. Many community programs have an in-home component to service families.

Counseling Services and Family Programs

In many areas, counseling facilities offer individual, couple, and family counseling. These services can be found in hospitals, private clinics, schools, treatment centers, and other service facilities. Many community agencies have a counseling component to assist families that qualify. Depending upon the facility, the services can be short term or long term.

Some communities have facilities that offer programs for families, such as educational workshops, counseling services, and family recreational activities. Services also include parenting support, career development, and food support. These programs focus on removing barriers and strengthening families.

Child Care and After-School Programs

Most communities have child care facilities to support working families. Churches, educational institutions, and the workplace can provide child care services. These services provide families the opportunity to work, attend school, and perform other responsibilities. Children who attend child care facilities are given an opportunity to develop socially. Many facilities are educational facilities and provide an opportunity for educational development for the children who attend. Community-based child care programs are often supported with government funding to assist in servicing families in a holistic manner.

After-school programs provide services for families who need added support during the hours immediately following school. Each program is unique and can be housed within the local school or community agency. These programs typically are offered to elementary school children but may extend to middle school children. The average program provides tutoring services and other activities to learning such as character building.

Hospice and Respite Care

Hospice is end-of-life care for those who have been medically certified with an expected six months or less to live. Typically, hospice teams provide emotional and spiritual care for the patient and the family. Hospice can be provided in hospitals, nursing homes, or the patients' homes. Typically, patients choose to receive care in their homes to provide them more comfort and time with family.

Respite care provides family caregivers additional help with a family member who has development delays, physical disability, and/or intellectual disability. Respite care can be provided by sitter-companions in-home, at a specialized facility, at a therapeutic adult day care center, and for emergency care. Respite care provides families with a break from the day-to-day care of disabled patients. These breaks are typically short term and temporary.

Family Planning Services

Family planning clinics can be found in many communities. The World Health Organization (WHO) describes family planning as services allowing individuals and couples to plan and prepare for their desired number of children and the timing of their births. These services include education about preparing and planning for children; education about and distribution of contraceptive methods is also a part of most family planning programs. Many clinics offer treatment of involuntary infertility. Family planning programs help prevent the transmission of the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) and other sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) and infections. Family planning services recognize that a woman's ability to understand the importance of the number and space of her pregnancies has a direct impact on her health and well-being as well as the outcome of each pregnancy. These services have been found to reduce unsafe abortions.

Laura Wherry states that the U.S. government, under the national family planning policy, provides contraceptive and related preventive services for low-income women without health insurance or access to affordable health care. The goal of this policy is to increase access to contraceptive services, supplies, and education to reduce the number of unplanned pregnancies. Other preventive services are provided, such as breast and cervical cancer screenings and STD tests.

Family Peer Advocates

Jennifer Wisdom describes Family Peer Advocates (FPAs) as a service that provides parents with a model, coach, and support to help them understand and cope with various service systems. It is a family-to-family support service that can help reduce barriers families may face when accessing children's services, and it helps the parents become more involved in these children's services. According to the New York State Family Peer Advocate credential, FPAs have lived-experience and receive skills and training to empower and support other families. Advocates typically can be found through government agencies and state programs.

Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer Families

Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ) families are gaining more interest, but are marginalized in communities and research. A number of communities offer services and centers for the LGBTQ community, and this number is increasing. The LGBTQ centers across the United States offer services such as care management, housing, administrative support, outreach, resource centers, meals programs, HIV education and testing, case management, children's outreach, individual and family counseling, support groups, adult and youth services, and social and educational events, as well as LGBTQ video educational resources. These centers offer a safe haven for the LGBTQ population.

Families With Severe Physical Disabilities

Families with children who have physical disabilities need a variety of services and support in accordance with the unique needs of each family. P. S. Samuel explains that the traditional model of disability intervention was focused on fixing the family rather than supporting the family. Current services focus on the family and delivering the services needed. Maeve O'Halloran found that when families with children who have intellectual, developmental, or physical disabilities are serviced with a family-centered approach in which families are considered to be the center of society, better outcomes are achieved compared to traditional models. When families are supported and receive effective quality services, they in turn support the society and community in which they live.

Support for families with children who have disabilities includes services that are formal and informal as well as tangible goods that enable the full participation of each member of the family. P. S. Samuel found that minority families, such as families of color and lower socioeconomic status, face barriers in accessing these services. Minorities with disabilities in the United States are considered the most marginalized of the marginalized populations. These support services need to be more readily and easily accessible to minority families.

Community Outpatient Mental Health Services

Community mental health services that provide outpatient care offer counseling services to individuals and families that do not require the person or family to stay at the center. Outpatient care gives patients the opportunity to be a part of a familial environment on a day-to-day basis while receiving treatment. Mary J. Baker-Ericzen reported that there is a need to improve the quality of care in outpatient mental health community service agencies; this is a national health care priority. These services are needed to provide clinical care for children and adolescents with disruptive behavior problems. Community mental health agencies also provide support for the families of children with disruptive behavior problems. These services are typically found as a part of community health departments.

Financial Services

Families all have financial obligations, and when dealing with financial obligations each family has unique circumstances. Some families are low-income and need added support, which is offered through such government services as food stamps; Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF); Medicaid; Medicare; and the federally funded health and nutrition program for women, infants, and childen (WIC). James Grubman explained that one of the most important decisions a family makes is whom to entrust with their financial resources. He goes on to highlight the need for financial services staff and managers to increase their knowledge of how to help families in these important areas. Socioeconomic status does not solely determine a need for financial support. Financial planning is needed for all families in preparation for the future.

Depending on the type of support a family needs, financial advisors work at local banks and financial centers, and financial educators within the community support families. These advisors provide needed information to individuals and families about managing money, budgeting, saving, loans, trust funds, investments, and other financial information and resources.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture explains that WIC provides federal grants to states for food, health care referrals, and nutrition education for low-income pregnant, breast-feeding, and non-breast-feeding postpartum women, and to infants and children up to the age of 5 years. Typically, the women and families would apply for WIC at their local department of human services.

Military Family Support

Military bases worldwide offer military family support centers. Fleet and Family Support Centers are located on naval bases and provide services such as mental health counseling, financial counseling, family counseling, career counseling, referral services, community information, job-seeking information, volunteer opportunities, homecoming support, seminars, how-to publications, outreach programs, school programs, spouse programs, teen programs, and education/classes. Many communities have Veteran Affairs (VA) facilities that provide veterans with similar services, such as education and training, vocational rehabilitation and employment, loans, life insurance, pensions, compensation, financial counseling, independent living programs, mortgage delinquency assistance, and fiduciary programs. In addition to the military bases and government offices, a few programs support military families in the community. Community agencies are evolving in their support of military families due to the growing recognition of the needs of military families.

Services for At-Risk Families

Services for at-risk families can be provided in communities, schools, and other facilities. At-risk families typically are more prone to having social and economic challenges. These families are often identified by the community in which they belong and the prevalence of challenges they face. Having one or more socioeconomic challenges can make a family prone to having other challenges. Umatilla Morrow Head Start defines at-risk families as having one or more of the following: low-income, substance abuse, child abuse, neglect, domestic violence in the home, recent divorce, loss of family member(s), child development issues, extreme or questionable health, mental health or nutrition issues, changes in typical behavior, and disabilities, among other factors such as family stress and literacy issues. Programs that service at-risk families often provide education, prevention, and methods to remove barriers to positive family development. Family service agencies are designed to address the needs of families in a holistic and comprehensive manner. The issues supported by these agencies vary, but ultimately result in increased family functioning.

Narketta M. Sparkman
Kira A. Woodrow
Old Dominion University

See Also: Adoption, Agencies and Services; At-Risk Youth Services; Child Protective Services; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Family Planning Services; Family Preservation Services; Family Reunification; Foster Care

Agencies; LGBTQ Clients; Medicaid; Medicare; Mental Health Services, Adult; Health Services, Children; Respite Care; Adoption; Foster Care; Counseling; Veteran Services; Temporary Assistance to Needy Families.

Further Readings

Baker-Ericzen, M. J., M. M. Jenkins, and R. Haine-Schlagel. "Therapist, Parent, and Youth Perspectives of Treatment Barriers to Family-Focused Community Outpatient Mental Health Services." Journal of Child and Family Studies, v.22/6 (2013).

Grubman, J. and D. Jaffe. "Client Relationships and Family Dynamics: Competencies and Services Necessary for Truly Integrated Wealth Management." Journal of Wealth Management, v.13/1 (2010).

Hurley, K. D., et al. "An Approach to Examining the Proximal and Intermediate Outcomes of an Intensive Family Preservation Program." Journal of Child and Family Studies, v.21/6 (2012).

Mullins, J. L., J. R. Cheung, and C. A. Lietz. "Family Preservation Services: Incorporating the Voice of Families into Service Implementation." Child and Family Social Work, v.17/3 (2012).

O'Halloran, M. and O. Doody. "Promoting Mutuality in a Family-Centred Service." Learning Disability Practice, v.16/4 (2013).

Samuel, P. S., K. L. Hobden, B. W. LeRoy, and K. K. Lacey. "Analysing Family Service Needs of Typically Underserved Families in the USA." Journal of Intellectual Disability Research, v.56/1 (2012).

Wherry, L. R. "Medicaid Family Planning Expansions and Related Preventive Care." American Journal of Public Health, v.103/9 (2013).

Wisdom, J. P., S. Olin, P. Shorter, G. Burton, and K. Hoagwood. "Family Peer Advocates: A Pilot Study of the Content and Process of Service Provision." Journal of Child and Family Studies, v.20/6 (2011).

Family Structure, Diversity of

The view of the traditional nuclear family, made up of two biological married parents with children, dominates in most social and health services delivery settings. However, family structure in the 21st century varies considerably and has significant implications for the development and delivery of family policies and human services. A review of current family arrangements reveals many family types, including not only traditional two-parent families but single-parent families, stepfamilies and blended families, cohabiting or civil union partnerships, same-sex couples, foster and adoptive families, and grandparent-headed families. Having a sound understanding of how families are organized and how family composition can influence an individual's day-to-day functioning, development, and outcomes over the life course is central for human service providers as they work to meet the needs of the clients they serve.

Describing family structures and the processes (e.g., marriage, divorce, having children) that generate those structures is rooted in the disciplines of family studies and demography (the study of the characteristics of human populations). However, a wide range of practice, research, and policy fields have had long-standing interest in understanding variation in family structure because of the broad implications such diversity has for providing services to varied populations in society. The purpose of this entry is to describe variation in family structures today with particular attention given to the diversity of family types across different demographic groups and, where applicable, prominent demographic transitions that affect family structure.

Definitions

The term family is defined in different ways across settings and disciplines. For example, family demographers use information about household members' sex, age, marital status, the number of people in a household, and the relationships people have to one another to describe the structure of families. The U.S. Census Bureau uses a legal definition of family in its survey research, which is "a group of two people or more (one of whom is the householder) related by birth, marriage, or adoption and residing together." The census further defines a stepfamily as "a married-couple family household with at least one child under age 18 who is a stepchild (i.e., a son or daughter through marriage, but not by birth)," a married couple as "a husband and wife," and an unmarried couple as "two unrelated adults of the opposite sex." Numerous family subgroups are not represented by these census definitions and are also missing from other common sources of data and analysis on family structure. This article draws from these various census definitions and expands on them to focus on a variety of family types in the United States in an effort to capture some, but certainly not all, of the significant diversity that represents American families.

Married Two-Parent Biological Families

Marriage has been the bedrock of family life in the United States for years, representing the key structure around which young adults organize their lives. The predominant form of family life today still consists of two married heterosexual adults with children, but since the mid-20th century, the United States has witnessed a significant change in family structure, namely, delayed marriage and, in some groups, postponement of marriage alltogether. The vast majority of people do eventually marry but the proportion of the population who marries has dropped, and the median age at which both men and women first get married is at a historical high point: 28.4 for men and 26.5 for women, according to data from the 2009 American Community Survey (ACS). The percentage of women who were married was highest in 1950 at approximately 65 percent. In 2009, the ACS found that less than half (48.3 percent) of all men and women age 15 years and over were married. Differences in marriage by race suggest that a higher proportion of black men and women never marry compared to white men and women. Blacks represent the group with the lowest proportion married (29 percent), compared to Hispanics (43 percent), whites (52 percent), and Asians (58 percent).

Tied to the delay in marriage appears to be a trend toward the postponement of childbearing, especially among more highly-educated groups in society. That is, individuals are putting off getting married and having children until later in life. In addition, a decoupling of marriage and childbirth altogether is occurring whereby parents have children outside

Single-parent families have long been a part of the U.S. social fabric. Death was once the primary cause of single parenthood, but more recently, divorce and childbirth outside of marriage have become the primary drivers behind this segment of the population. Unmarried individuals adopting or caring for relatives' children also represent single-parent family configurations of marriage and raise them without both biological parents present in the household. In place of the traditional family structure encompassing marriage and childbearing early in life, some individuals are choosing alternative approaches to forming a family that result in delayed or forgone marriage and selection of some other family configuration.

Single-Parent Families

Single-parent families have long been a steady part of the U.S. social fabric. Death was once the primary cause of single parenthood, but now divorce and childbirth outside of marriage have become the primary drivers behind this segment of the population. Mother-headed families, in which the father, while legally or socially tied to the family, is separated for military or employment reasons (e.g., migrant workers), constitute single-parent–like families as well. Children adopted by unmarried individuals or children cared for by relatives represent other types of single-parent family configurations. According to the 2011 Annual Social and Economic Supplement of the U.S. Census, approximately 27 percent of children live with only their mother or father today, and women head up the vast majority of single-parent families. Rates of single parenthood vary considerably by race or ethnicity, education, and age. Approximately 16 percent of white, 27 percent of Hispanic, and 52 percent of black children live in single-mother families. Well-educated people are less likely to divorce or have children outside of marriage compared to those who are poorly educated; older women and those with higher incomes are also less likely to raise children on their own.

Expanded employment opportunities, modest increases in wages, and in many cases public assistance have enabled women to leave problematic marriages or to have children outside of marriage. These labor market and income support changes are potentially advantageous to working mothers, but single parenthood—especially for women—puts families at significant risk of poverty. On average, women earn less than men, tend to face obstacles in collecting child support from fathers, and are pulled out of the labor force more often and for longer periods than men, resulting in fewer wage-earning adults in the household. This combination of factors puts children and their mothers in single-parent families at risk for a host of negative social, economic, and health outcomes.

Stepfamilies or Blended Families

A stepfamily is formed when two adults enter into a cohabiting partnership and at least one of the adult partners has a child from a previous relationship. Today, significant diversity among stepfamilies characterizes this growing group of individuals. Data from the 2009 Survey of Income and Program Participation indicate that of the 50.8 million children who live with two parents, 10 percent (5.3 million) lived with a biological parent and married or cohabiting stepmother or stepfather. Families in which both adults have children from a previous relationship are sometimes known as blended or complex families and are differentiated from simple stepfamily households in which only one of the adults has prior children.

Historically, stepfamilies formed when a spouse died and the other partner remarried. While remarriage rates did not change significantly over the course of the 20th century, it was not until the 1970s, when remarriage following divorce, as opposed to spousal death, became the most common cause for the formation of stepfamily households. Unfortunately, complete data that accurately capture the number and configuration of stepfamilies in the United States are lacking because of the complexity inherent in where children, parents, and partners reside and how they relate to one another. For instance, in a mother-stepfather household in which the mother's biological child lives, the Census Bureau would count the family as a stepfamily household only if the stepfather completed the census form. If the mother participated in the survey, she would report her relationship to the child as biological and thus be precluded from being identified as a stepfamily. Complex family configurations that involve stepfamilies and that may span generations and households have implications for child and adult well-being and should be considered in assessments of individual and family functioning.

Cohabiting Families

Cohabitation is defined as the coresidence of two individuals who are in a romantic or intimate relationship. According to The National Center for Family and Marriage Research, 60 percent of women ages 19 to 44 have cohabited at some point, and an estimated two-thirds who married for the first time in the last decade cohabited prior to marriage. Cohabitation rates rose significantly over the last several decades among all racial/ethnic groups, as well as across education levels. Increases in cohabitation were greatest, however, among individuals with less than a high school diploma and among non-Hispanic whites. Although often short-lived, this nonmarital, coresidential form of partnership has become a normative experience for many American couples. Young men and women today view cohabitation as a trial form of marriage, and they live together in hopes of testing out their compatibility before entering into matrimony. The rapid rise in cohabitation is also linked to another significant demographic transition in society, namely the increase in nonmarital childbearing. The 2002 National Survey of Family Growth indicates that 40 percent of recent nonmarital births were to cohabiting women. Cohabitation has garnered considerable attention because of the relational implications associated with this form of family composition. As cohabitation becomes increasingly common and socially legitimized, years of research suggest that premarital cohabitation has a negative relation with future marriage and relationship stability. As such, cohabitation should be taken into consideration when aiding families in human services settings.

Same-Sex Unions (Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual Families)

Lesbian, gay, and bisexual families vary extensively in composition, legal recognition, and household membership. The children in these families may be biological, adopted, step, or nonrelated (e.g., child of a partner). Families may also include gay, lesbian, or bisexual children with heterosexual parents. As of August 2014, 13 states legally recognized same-sex marriages. Data from the 2010 ACS indicate that about 1 percent of all couple households nationally (594,000) were same-sex unions, and of these couples, 26 percent reported that they were spouses. Of the same-sex couple households, almost one out of five reported having children. Issues pertinent to gay, lesbian, and bisexual families are complex and vary widely. Factors to consider include policy and social debates on same-sex marriage and domestic partnerships, discrimination in the workplace and other settings, and family relationships and the dynamics related to homosexual disclosure either by parents who are gay or lesbian or by children who disclose to their heterosexual parents.

Conclusion

The diversity of family structures in the 21st century is notable and extends far beyond the traditional nuclear family consisting of two heterosexual adults with children. While the inclusion of more common nontraditional family types, such as cohabiting and same-sex unions, is essential in any discussion of contemporary family structure, so too are other family arrangements. Alternative family types include foster and adoptive families, grandparents raising children, complex or multiple partner fertility families (when adults have children with more than one partner), polygamous families, and nonchildbearing families. Although beyond the scope of this discussion, all family arrangements are important when taking stock of human services and diversity.

The fluidity with which family types develop and function today calls for an expanded conceptualization of family structure and an ongoing review of the complex nature of family arrangements. As the work of human service providers moves away from large institutional contexts to smaller, often community-based settings, having a fuller understanding of the family context in which children, youth, and adults live will be helpful. Extending human service providers' knowledge of family structure, cultural context, and family bonds and networks can be useful in identifying families' strengths and where resources and support are needed. Human services providers, policy makers, and researchers together can continue the important work of examining and embracing the broadening landscape of family arrangements that encompasses family life in the United States in the 21st century.

Pajarita Charles
Aneurin Bevan Health Board, Wales

See Also: Co-Parenting, Cultural Aspects of; Divorce; Same Sex Marriage/Couples; Single Parents; United States, Demographics of

Further Readings

Bengston, Vern L., et al., eds. Sourcebook of Family Theory & Research. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2004.

Chandra, A., et al. "Fertility, Family Planning, and Reproductive Health of U.S. Women: Data from the 2002 National Survey of Family Growth." National Center for Health Statistics. Vital Health Stat 23(25), (2005). http://www.cdc.gov/nchs/data/series/sr_23/sr23_025.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Demo, David. H., et al., eds. Handbook of Family Diversity. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Elliott, Diana B., et al. "Marital Events of Americans: 2009," American Community Survey Reports, ACS-13. Washington, DC.: U.S. Census Bureau, 2011. http://www.census.gov/prod/2011pubs/acs-13.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Lofquist, Daphne. "Same-Sex Couple Households." American Community Survey Briefs, ACSBR/10-03. Washington, DC.: U.S. Census Bureau (2011). http://www.census.gov/prod/2011pubs/acsbr10-03.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Manning, Wendy D. "Trends in Cohabitation: Over Twenty Years of Change, 1987–2010," Family Profiles, FP-13-12. National Center for Family and Marriage Research (2013). http://ncfmr.bgsu.edu/pdf/family_profiles/file130944.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Manning, Wendy D. and Jessica A. Cohen. "Premarital Cohabitation and Marital Dissolution: An Examination of Recent Marriages." Journal of Marriage and Family, v.74/2 (2012).

Scott, Jacqueline, et al. The Blackwell Companion to the Sociology of Families. Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2007.

Sweeney, Megan, M. "Remarriage and Stepfamilies: Strategic Sites for Family Scholarship in the 21st Century." Journal of Marriage and Family, v.72 (2010).

U.S. Census Bureau. "Current Population Survey: Definitions." http://www.census.gov/cps/about/cpsdef.html# (Accessed August 2013).

U.S. Census Bureau. Current Population Survey, 2011 Annual Social and Economic Supplement. "Table C3: Living Arrangements of Children under 18 Years and Marital Status of Parents, by Age, Sex, Race, and Hispanic Origin and Selected Characteristics of the Child for all Children." http://www.census.gov/hhes/families/data/cps2011.html (Accessed August 2013).

Family Therapy

Family therapy emerged from a systems theory of behavior to assess and transform reciprocal patterns of interaction between two or more people. These interactions continually organize and reorganize roles and responsibilities across three or more generations. Conceived in the late 1950s as an alternative to the individual focus of psychodynamic and behaviorist theories, family therapy focuses on the interactions that shape family structure to support development of family members. Based on family composition, these roles and responsibilities reflect ethnic and socioeconomic norms of family members.

Sigmund Freud's psychoanalytic therapy and its progeny, psychodynamic theory, postulate that human behavior is the product of an individual's internalized childhood experience. Behavioral therapy in the mid-20th century saw human behavior as a function of a linear cause-and-effect relationship among an external antecedent, the individual's behavioral response to it, and the subsequent external consequence.

However, in family therapy, why a behavior occurs is not a useful question. Instead, a family therapist perceives and adjusts who does what with whom, when, and in what manner in the reciprocal interactions of family members. Family roles, responsibilities, and organizational structure are manifest in these interactions. Thus, family process and structure rather than the content within or the rationale for these interactions is its primary concern.

Early Pioneers

At its inception, family therapy pioneers split between those who continued to work through intrapsychic constructs of psychodynamic theory and those who fully embraced systems theory. Nathan Ackerman, a psychoanalytically trained child psychiatrist, initially studied unemployment's effects on the mental health of Pennsylvania miners and their families. Later, although he experimented with in-home therapy and with assigning a single therapist to work with a mother and child at the Menninger Clinic, he continued to emphasize the psychological impact on individual family members of family patterns of interaction. With Don Jackson in 1962, he founded the seminal peer-reviewed journal, Family Process, with Jay Haley serving as its first editor.

Murray Bowen, another pioneer who worked at the Menninger Clinic, also incorporated psychodynamic constructs and assumptions to an expanded focus on families as systems. Bowen postulated that schizophrenia was the product of an unresolved symbiosis of mother and child, and articulated concepts such as undifferentiated family ego mass, triangulation, differentiation of self, and intergenerational transmission of symptoms.

Through the 1960s, a blending of constructs from Ludwig von Bertalanffy's general systems theory with Gregory Bateson's work on cybernetics and communication theory produced the foundation of a family systems theory. Much of this occurred at the Mental Research Institute (MRI) in Palo Alto, California. There, Jay Haley, Don Jackson, Paul Watzlawick, John Weakland, Virginia Satir, and others, merging perspectives from a variety of disciplines, joined Bateson in examinations of interactions between schizophrenic patients and their families, and then examined the transformation of family interactions around delinquency, school problems, psychosomatic disorders, and marital conflict.

Structural and Strategic Models

From this foundational theory testing at MRI, many family therapy models emerged. Jay Haley joined Salvador Minuchin, Braulio Montalvo, Harry Aponte, Peggy Papp, Charles Fishman, and others at the Philadelphia Child Guidance Clinic, which developed a significant family therapy training program. Minuchin and Fishman published seminal books on structural family therapy, a well-defined, easy-to-learn model. They supported Haley as he explored communication patterns in his book Problem Solving Therapy.

By the late 1970s, Haley and his wife Cloe Madannes founded the Family Therapy Institute in Washington, D.C., and published seminal texts on strategic family therapy and reparative therapy in families in which a child was sexually abused. Related to Haley's work, Mara Selvini Palozzoli, Luigi Boscolo, Gianfranco Cecchin, and Guliana Prata, Italian family therapy pioneers at the Milan Institute, developed a contextual and positive reframing of problem behaviors to transform paradoxical processes in family structure. Although Minuchin's work often focused upon lower-class and working middle-class families, these models were tested with a variety of populations and presenting problems. Researchers used videotape review and live supervision from behind one-way mirrors to enhance therapist knowledge, skills, and effectiveness. All of these models focused upon family process and cultural norms that shaped roles, responsibilities, and boundaries within and between family subsystems (couple, parental, child, and extended family). All viewed behaviors of concern as a product of current family process. By changing that process, family structure and beliefs changed as presenting problems diminished.

Rethinking Assumptions and Focus

By 1980, the focus of family systems theory increasingly included the context of family member interactions with schools, youth peer groups, and the community. This gradual shift toward the ecology of human interactions was propelled by Bateson's Steps to an Ecology of Mind (1972) and Mind and Nature (1979) and especially by Uri Bronfenbrenner's The Ecology of Human Development (1979), which applied constructs from more than a decade of development of family systems theory to produce a theory of social ecology called ecological systems theory.

Through the final decades of the 20th century, systems theories of behavior and family therapy models were also reshaped by the critical and constructivist thought influencing most Western social sciences. The Women's Project critically examined male pioneer assumptions about and emphasis upon differentiation, individuation, and mother-child interactions as targets for change. Betty Carter and Monica McGoldrick highlighted the influence of culture and ethnicity. Countering Milton Erickson's psychodynamic, male perspective of individual human development, they produced The Family Life Cycle, a stage theory of family development that applied constructs from family and ecological systems theory across three or more generations while acknowledging the influence of gender, race, culture, socioeconomics, and community resources, among other factors in shaping family achievements or problems.

In this same period, the voices of families also emerged to criticize a deficit, medical model focus that characterized much of the language and process of all therapy. Organizations such as the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI) and the Federation of Families for Children's Mental Health noted that an overemphasis on so-called dysfunctional interactions in families ignored real strengths that could be the basis for change. These and other groups insisted on a collaborative role in assessment and treatment that often extended to research.

Multisystemic therapy (MST) also emerged in these decades. Developed through research, it embraced a community-based collaborative assessment and intervention process with families. It is defined, taught, and supervised through nine principles anchored in ecological systems theory.

Constructivist thought shaped the emergence of Tom Anderson and Michael White's narrative family therapy. Similarly influenced, William O'Hanlon, Michele Weiner-Davis, Steve DeShazer, and Kim Insoo-Berg defined and tested solution-focused brief family therapy.

Both approaches have roots in Bateson's communications theory. However, unlike structural, strategic, or multisystemic therapies, or the use of cognitive behavioral therapy as an intervention technique within some of these models, the clinician does not actively intervene in family process. Drawing from the philosophical deconstruction of postmodernist thought, narrative therapy seeks change through neutral conversation that simply reimagines family experience. For these reasons, Minuchin and others continue to question postmodernist narrative approaches with families.

Rosalyn M. Bertram
University of Missouri-Kansas City

See Also: Family Structure, Diversity of; Marriage and Family Therapy; Multisystemic Therapy.

Further Readings

Becvar, Dorothy and Raphael Becvar. Family Therapy: A Systemic Integration, 8th ed. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2012.

McGoldrick, Monica, Betty Carter, and Nydia Garcia-Preto. The Expanded Family Life Cycle: Individual Family and Social Perspectives, 3rd ed. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2011.

Nichols, Michael. Family Therapy Concepts and Methods, 10th ed. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2012.

Family Violence Prevention and Services

Family Violence Prevention and Services administers the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act (FVPSA) programs. First authorized in 1984 as part of the Child Abuse Amendments (P.L 98-457), FVPSA is the primary federal government's funding support dedicated to emergency shelter and related assistance for domestic violence victims and their dependent children. Operationally, FVPSA is a part of the Family and Youth Services Bureau, a division of the Administration on Children, Youth and Families within the Administration for Children and Families.

The main allocations of FVPSA funding come from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, which funds the essential services for domestic violence and primary and secondary prevention plans. Through FVPSA's funded programs, a network of community-based shelters and nonresidential services provide safe housing, advocacy, legal assistance, counseling and support groups, safety planning, and crisis response to domestic violence victims. The major objective of the FVPSA is to address domestic violence as a widespread social problem with serious health costs and consequences.

Domestic Violence and Abuse and the FVPSA

Domestic violence entails a pattern of abusive behavior in any relationship that is perpetrated by one partner to gain or maintain power and control over another intimate partner. Domestic violence has been referred to as domestic abuse, spousal abuse, battering, family violence, and intimate partner violence.

It can take many forms, including physical, sexual, emotional, economic, or psychological abuse or actions that detrimentally impact another person. Domestic violence and abuse includes any behaviors or actions that blame, coerce, frighten, humiliate, hurt, intimidate, isolate, terrorize, threaten, or wound someone. Domestic violence and abusive behaviors are varied, as follows.

- Physical abuse behaviors include hitting, slapping, grabbing, biting, and punching, among others. They also include such acts as denying medical care to a partner or forcing consumption of drugs and/or alcohol upon another person.
- Sexual abuse behaviors include, among others, coercing or attempting to coerce sexual contact or behavior without consent, marital rape, and attack on sexual parts of the body.

- Emotional abuse includes constant criticism, name calling, damaging behavior of the other person's relationship with his or her children, and undermining the other's sense of self-worth and/or self-esteem.
- Economic abuse includes behaviors such as attempting to control another person by withholding access to money or causing loss of employment and/or income, as well as actions intended to make an individual financially dependent.
- Psychological violence and abuse include causing trepidation by intimidation, verbal abuse, destruction of pets and property, threatening harm to self, and threating to harm those related to the other (e.g., parents, children, and friends).

Domestic violence can also mean endangerment, criminal coercion, unlawful imprisonment, trespassing, kidnapping, stalking, and harassment. Domestic violence and abuse occur in various cultures across the world, irrespective of socioeconomic background, educational levels, ethnicity, age, sexual orientation, religion, or gender. It occurs in all forms of relationships, including opposite-sex or same-sex married partners, those living together, and those dating. The adverse impact of domestic violence and abuse not only affects those who are directly victimized, but also has a substantial consequence on the community and society at large. The victim's family members, friends, coworkers, and other witnesses are all affected. Approximately 15.5 million children are exposed to domestic violence each year. Those children who witness domestic violence and abuse while growing up are adversely affected by that experience. Exposure of children to frequent domestic violence and abuse experiences in the home predisposes them to multifarious social, health, and behavioral problems. It also teaches them that violence is normal, which increases their likelihood of becoming violent and abusive in their own future relationships.

Prevalence of Domestic Violence and Abuse

Accurate statistics on the scope of domestic violence and abuse are difficult to establish because data may vary depending on the reporting source. Nonetheless, approximately 1 to 5 million women in the United States suffer nonfatal violence each year at the hands of an intimate partner. Every year, one in three women homicide victims is murdered by her former or current partner. Women are five to eight times more likely than men to be victims of domestic violence. One in every four women will experience domestic violence during their lifetimes, with females who are 20 to 24 years of age at the greatest risk of nonfatal intimate partner violence. The Department of Justice reports that between 1998 and 2002 in the United States, 73 percent of family violence victims were female, 84 percent of spouse abuse victims were female, and 86 percent of victims of violence committed by an intimate partner were female.

Annually, more than 4 million women experience domestic violence of physical assaults and rapes, and nearly 3 million men are victims of domestic violence in the form of physical assaults. Although the majority of domestic violence victims are women, abuse and violence against men occur far more often. It is estimated that as many as one in three victims of domestic violence are male; however, men are reluctant to report abuse by women because they feel embarrassed, or they fear that they will not be believed, or worse, that law enforcement will assume that they are the perpetrator of the violence and not the victim, since they are male. Similarly, women who do not report intimate partner violence to the police frequently identify three cardinal reasons for keeping silent: the private nature of the relationship, their fear of retaliation from their abuser, and their feeling that the police would not respond properly to the abuse.

Role of the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act

By far the most extensive legislative response to the problem of domestic violence and abuse—FVPSA's additional funded programs—include the National Domestic Violence Hotline, State Domestic Violence Coalitions, a network of National Resource Centers and Culturally Specific Institutes, and targeted discretionary grants, as well as the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's DELTA Program. The legislative charge for FVPSA is twofold: (1) to assist states in efforts to increase public awareness about and prevent family violence and to provide shelter and related assistance for victims of family violence and their dependent; and (2) to provide for technical assistance and training relating to states, local public agencies (including law enforcement agencies, courts, legal, social services, and health care professionals), nonprofit private organizations, and other persons seeking assistance. Currently, FVPSA formula grants are awarded to every state and territory and to more than 200 tribes. In addition, subgrant funds are awarded to more than 1,200 community-based domestic violence shelters and 300 nonresidential services programs providing shelters and other domestic violence prevention services.

The outcome evaluation of FVPSA's efforts in accomplishing its objectives concluded that the nation's domestic or family violence shelters are addressing victims' urgent and long-term needs and are helping victims protect themselves and their children. Public awareness of the social problem of family or domestic violence has tremendously increased through FVPSA efforts. After the FVPSA's program expiration in 2008, efforts of domestic violence advocates led to the reauthorization of the legislation as part of the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, which Congress passed on November 10, 2010. The bill was signed into law by President Barack Obama on December 20, 2013, reauthorizing FVPSA through fiscal year 2015.

Felix O. Chima
Prairie View A&M University

See Also: Domestic Violence; Domestic Violence, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Domestic Violence, Victims of.

Further Readings

"Compendium of State Statutes and Policies on Domestic Violence and Health Care." Family Violence Prevention Fund, 2100. http://www.endabuse.org/health (Accessed January 2014).

Davis, L. V. "Domestic Violence." Encyclopedia of Social Work, 19th ed. Washington, DC: NASW Press, 1995.

"Family Violence Prevention and Services Program," Report to Congress, FY 2007–2008, Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, 2008.

Wolfe, D. W., et al. "The Effects of Exposure to Domestic Violence on Children: A Meta-Analysis and Critique." Clinical Child Family Psychology Review, v.6 (2003).

Family Violence Prevention and Services Act

Domestic violence is a severe problem that affects men, women, and children throughout the United States. The Family Violence Prevention and Services Act (FVPSA) is a U.S. law that provides government funding to aid victims of domestic violence, family violence, and dating violence. Aid exends to the dependent children of these victims. Each type of violence encompasses acts or threats of physical abuse, psychological abuse, sexual abuse, economic abuse, or emotional abuse. Domestic violence and dating violence refer to the perpetration of these abuses from one member of an intimate or dating relationship toward the other, whereas family violence refers to abuse that occurs between any two members of a family or household.

Originally enacted as a component of the Child Abuse Amendments of 1984, the FVPSA currently provides the single largest federal funding source for domestic violence emergency services, which include shelters and counseling services, legal advocacy, victim assistance, and prevention and education programs. The FVPSA allocates funds to each state, including more than 2,000 private nonprofit and public agencies that carry out research, information sharing, and training. The goal is to improve the collaborative efforts of mental health, legal, and medical professionals to better serve the needs of victims of domestic violence. The reach of the FVPSA is extensive, as domestic violence affects men, women, and their dependent children regardless of age, race, socioeconomic status, religion, and sexual orientation..

Scope of Domestic, Dating, and Family Violence

Domestic violence, including dating violence, is a prevalent problem affecting more than 12 million men and women each year. According to a survey conducted in 2010 by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), one in four women and one in seven men reported being victims of physical violence perpetrated by an intimate partner. In 2007, domestic violence accounted for approximately 14 percent of homicides. Domestic and family violence can also have detrimental effects on victims' health and well-being. Victims may suffer minor or serious physical injuries, such as scratches, bruises, head trauma, broken bones, or internal bleeding. Victims may also report psychological effects, including trauma symptoms, panic attacks, difficulty sleeping, difficulty forming new relationships, and low self-esteem. Furthermore, victims of domestic or family violence are at an increased risk for depression, eating disorders, suicidal thoughts or actions, and the use of harmful coping strategies, such as dangerous alcohol consumption or drug abuse.

The monetary costs associated with incidents of domestic violence are high. The cost of medical and mental health expenses, decrease in productivity from time out of work, and law enforcement and legal services subsequent to domestic violence is more than $37 billion annually. Such costs, coupled with the wide-ranging negative effects on men, women, and children, solidify the need for the FVPSA and its funded programs.

Funding and Authorization

After its authorization in 1984, the FVPSA became the sole funding source with the purpose of providing financial support to domestic violence programs and shelters. The FVPSA was amended and reauthorized by Congress in 2010 as an element of the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act and was again reauthorized in 2013 through fiscal year 2015. Changes to the 2010 act include broader definitions of types of violence and of eligible entities to ensure greater access to services as well as a greater focus on preventive programs. The approved funding in the amount of $175 million allows the FVPSA program to provide formula grants to states, territories, and Native American tribes; subgrants to local domestic violence programs; national centers for training and technical assistance; and operation of the National Domestic Violence Hotline.

Appropriation of Funding

The FVPSA is the only source of federal funding dedicated solely to domestic violence victims' assistance, prevention, and emergency services. State formula grants account for 70 percent of the total appropriation of the FVPSA and serve as the main method through which the FVPSA funds are dispersed nationally to U.S. states and territories. Each state, as well as the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia, receive a base grant of $600,000 annually. Ten percent of the FVPSA appropriation is set aside each fiscal year for Native American tribes and organizations. The remaining funds are divided and allocated to states based on population. Funding is then granted to local private, public, nonprofit, and faith-based agencies that have verified research-based practices, as mandated by the FVPSA legislation.

States utilize the FVPSA funding for a variety of services for victims of domestic violence and their dependents. Emergency services funded through the FVPSA are perhaps some of the most crucial in that they support more than 1,600 shelters and provide safety and short-term stability. The FVPSA-funded state programs further provide medical care, mental health counseling services, transportation, and legal advocacy to victims and their children. State programs also appropriate funds to execute outreach and prevention programs as well as to raise public awareness to encourage victims to seek assistance and report violent crimes. Goals of the FVPSA program further include increasing access to domestic violence–related services and better serving victims in marginalized communities.

To support these efforts and meet the needs of victims of dating, domestic, and family violence, the FVPSA encourages and funds collaborative efforts among health care professionals, law enforcement, violence prevention and service programs, and state coalitions. The FVPSA funding plays an important role in improving the overall quality of life for men, women, and children affected by domestic violence in the United States.

Lindsay Labrecque
Maribel Plasencia
Butler Hospital and Brown University
Gregory L. Stuart
University of Tennessee-Knoxville

See Also: Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act; Domestic Violence, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Domestic Violence, Victims of; Family Violence Prevention and Services

Further Readings

Legal Information Institute at Cornell University Law School. "Title 42—The Public Health and Welfare; Chapter 110: Family Violence Prevention and Services." http://www.law.cornell.edu/uscode/pdf/lii_usc_TI_42_CH_110.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

McLaughlin, Monica. "The Family Violence Prevention and Services Act (FVPSA) 2010." The National Network to End Domestic Violence. http://www.ncdsv.org/images/NNEDV_FVPSA-Analysis_2010.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Female Genital Mutilation

Female genital mutilation (FGM, also called female circumcision or female cutting) involves the practice of removing part or all of a girl's external genitalia for nonmedical purposes. This practice, which dates as far back as the 5th century B.C.E., is believed to have its roots in ancient Rome and Egypt. FGM is considered a rite of passage marking a girl's transition to womanhood. It is often deeply intertwined into the fabric of the societies where it is most frequently practiced, and is often rooted in the cultural and/or religious belief that female circumcision is necessary to ensure a woman's sexual purity and restraint. Additionally, the female sex organs are considered dirty, evil, and even dangerous in many cultures that practice FGM. For instance, men in some tribes in the Sudan believe that if a woman's clitoris is not removed, it will grow to rival the size of a man's penis.

FGM is classified into four categories, each with increasing levels of severity. Type 1 involves the partial and/or full removal of the clitoris (often called clitorectomies), with the labia kept intact. Type 2 involves the removal of the clitoris as well as the labia minora. Type 3, the most extreme form of FGM (often called infibulation), involves the removal of the clitoris and the complete scraping away of the labia minora. In many countries, infibulation also involves the creation of a vaginal seal, involving the stitching together of the labia majora, with only a small opening being left for the passage of urine and menstrual blood. When a woman (or girl) marries, her vaginal seal is broken by her husband (often ceremoniously and quite painfully), which proves she is a virgin. The process of breaking the vaginal seal is often repeated throughout a woman's life, as the ripped pieces of her labia are sewn back together again to ensure ongoing chastity, only to be broken apart again during subsequent sexual intercourse or at childbirth. Clearly, the constant sewing up and breaking apart of the woman's vagina causes significant physical trauma as well as great psychological distress. Type 4 involves all other forms of nonmedial genital mutiliation, such as stretching, scraping, notching, and piercing.

FGM is most often performed by local midwives or tribal healers in nonmedical settings where unsterilized traditional tools, such as razor-like instruments or some type of scalpel, are used on one girl after another in succession. The girls do not receive pain medication and often must be immobile for up to a month at a time due to bleeding and pain. FGM is most frequently performed on girls between the ages of 10 and 16 years, but in some cultures it is performed on girls as young as 4 or 5 years old. FGM ceremonies, which often are attended by the entire community, include several girls laying in rows, with parents or community leaders pinning them down and holding their legs open so that the girls' genitalia can be cut. Physical side effects include profuse blood loss, infection, urinary problems, scar tissue that intereferes with childbirth, recurrent pain, reinjury, and even death.

Female genital mutilation is almost universally considered a serious human rights violation and many advocacy campaigns have been initiated in an attempt to stop it.

Psychological consequences include post-traumatic stress disorder, depression, feelings of powerlessness, and loss of self-esteem.

In many regions, the consequences for girls who do not undergo FGM are harsh. For example, in many societies that practice FGM, if a girl's family refuses to allow her to undergo the genital cutting ritual (or if the girl refuses), she will be ostracized completely from society and will not be allowed to marry. In some societies, the consequences are even harsher and may included complete social shunning. For instance, in many Masai tribes in Kenya, women who are uncircumcised are also excluded from all forms of cultural engagement, including marriage, family events, communal celebrations, and even communal eating. Unfortunately, many girls who have not been circumsized are left with no alternative other than to enter prostitution, which then serves to support the myth that the clitoris leads to promiscuity. This type of social shunning often leads many loving mothers and aunts to force their daughters and nieces to undergo FGM because they fear that is the only way to ensure their daughters' social and physical protection.

FGM is almost universally considered a serious human rights violation, and many advocacy campaigns have been initiated in an attempt to stop this practice on a global basis. In response to international pressure, many at-risk countries have passed legislation making FGM illegal, but enforcement remains a challenge because FGM is deeply ingrained into everyday norms and traditions in these cultures. In many countries, FGM tends to be practiced more frequently in rural areas, far away from urban centers where enforcement is easier and communities tend to be more progressive. International efforts have also focused on campaigns to address FGM and its consequences within a local context. In fact, the United Nations has partnered with several nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in the development and implementation of awareness campaigns targeting community and tribal leaders, as well as providing services for victims of FGM, focusing on medical, mental health, and residential needs.

Human services professionals can contribute to the fight against FGM on both a micro- and macrolevel in many ways. Human services professionals engaging in counseling and case management with diverse populations, such as refugees, are likely to encounter women who are survivors of FGM. When counselors and case managers are more aware of this historic practice and the impact it has on female survivors, they will be more likely to anticipate the short- and long-term consequences (both psychological and physical), even if their clients do not initially disclose their experiences. Counseling and case management can then focus on a range of issues, including assisting clients in managing these consequences, which are likely to be at least partially seated within a cultural context. On a macrolevel, human services professionals can be most effective when they collaborate with a network of social justice advocates, including advocacy organizations working on an international level. It is vitally important to also engage with members of the local community, since those within the communities that practice FGM are likely to have the best understanding of the cultural forces that are the most resistant to change. Human services professionals can then be partners in the development of so-called home-grown solutions that take into consideration the belief systems, feelings, and needs of the local community, which will increase the likelihood of effecting enduring change.

Michelle E. Martin
DePaul University

See Also: Gender Issues and Roles in Developing Countries; Trauma-Focused Services; United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Further Readings

Lexow, J., M. Berggrav, and S. Taraldsen. "Prevention and Eradication of Female Genital Mutilation (FGM) and Other Harmful Traditional Practices (HTPs)." Norad Collected Reviews. 2009. http://www.norad.no/en/Tools+and+publications/Publications/Publication+Page?key=125122 (Accessed January 2014).

United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA). "The End Is in Sight: Moving Toward the Abandonment of Female Genital Mutilation/Cutting." Annual Report 2009. New York: UNFPA/UNICEF Joint Programme.

World Health Organization. "Eliminating Female Genital Mutilation." An Interagency Statement of UNAIDS, UNDP, UNECA, UNESCO, UNFPA, UNHCHR, UNHCR, UNICEF, UNIFEM, WHO. Geneva: World Health Organization, 2008.

World Health Organization. "Female Genital Mutilation." Fact Sheet No 241. Geneva: World Health Organization, February 2010. http://www.who.int/mediacentre/factsheets/ fs241/en (Accessed January 2014).

World Health Organization. "Female Genital Mutilation." A Joint WHO/UNICEF/UNFPA Statement. Geneva: WHO, 1997.

Fetal Alcohol Syndrome and Drug-Exposed Infants

Women's use of alcohol and drugs during pregnancy leads to a continuum of impairments among the infants who were prenatally exposed to these substances. Infants who were exposed to opioids or multiple drugs experience the highest risk for adverse neonatal outcomes compared to infants who were exposed to a single substance. Prenatal exposure to illicit drugs increases the risks for sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS) and can lead to impairments in infants' psychomotor development. Women who engage in frequent bouts of binge drinking when pregnant increase their newborns' risk for adverse neonatal outcomes compared to women who may have had a few alcoholic drinks during pregnancy. Due to the adverse effects for newborns, the best strategy is for women to abstain from using alcohol and drugs when pregnant. It is important to realize that some fetal alcohol effects might occur even before a woman realizes she is pregnant.

Definitions

Fetal alcohol syndrome disorder (FASD) comprises a group of conditions that can occur in a person whose mother drank alcohol during pregnancy. Fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS) is a serious developmental disorder caused by prenatal exposure to alcohol, and it represents the severe end of FASD. The consequences of FAS range from mild intellectual and behavioral issues to profound disabilities or premature death. FASD is among the most commonly known causes of mental retardation and is a major public health problem. Alcohol-related neurodevelopmental disorder (ARND) and alcohol-related birth defects (ARBD) are also part of the spectrum of fetal alcohol disorders. People with ARND might have intellectual disabilities and problems with behavior and learning. Those with ARBD might have heart, kidney, bone, or hearing problems or a mix of these problems.

The lifetime cost for one individual with FAS in 2002 was estimated to be $2 million. This is an average for people with FAS and does not include data on people with other FASDs. People with severe problems, such as profound intellectual disability, incur much higher costs. The cost to the United States for FAS alone is more than an estimated $4 billion annually.

Diagnosing Prenatal Alcohol Exposure

The possible detrimental effects of prenatal alcohol exposure have been known for some time. Although historically it has been recognized that the children of alcoholics had problems, the cause was thought to be the result of poor genetic stock rather than any direct effects of alcohol.

The modern era of recognition of the detrimental effects of prenatal alcohol exposure began when Ken Jones, David Smith, and associates published two papers in 1973 describing a common set of features in 11 children whose mothers were known to be alcoholics or heavy drinkers during their pregnancies. Jones and colleagues named this constellation of features FAS. Subsequently, it was discovered that French physician Philip Lemoine had previously described this common pattern of anomalies in 1967.

The number of people with an FASD is unknown. Scientists believe that there are at least three times as many cases of FASD as FAS. Studies conducted by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention have shown that 0.2 to 1.5 cases of FAS occur for every 1,000 live births in certain areas of the United States. In 2010, approximately 10 percent of pregnant women reported any alcohol use in the preceding 30 days, and about 2 percent of pregnant women reported binge drinking in the preceding 30 days.

It may be easier to diagnose FAS in young children, whereas the diagnosis in the neonatal period may be more difficult. Furthermore, changes in the face may occur as the individual grows into adulthood and obscure the typical facial appearance of FAS. Of concern is (1) the necessity of documenting the exposure history of the mother, (2) the reluctance of physicians to inquire about the drinking histories of pregnant women or women contemplating pregnancies, and (3) the fact that not all physicians and other health care providers are well trained or confident in their ability to recognize these effects.

There are three criteria for diagnosing FAS: specific pattern of facial features, pre- and/or postnatal growth deficiency, and evidence of central nervous system (CNS) deficiency. The individual must meet all three criteria to be diagnosed with FAS. However, the facial characteristics basically define FAS. The discriminating facial features are short palpebral fissures (the length of the eye opening), a flat midface, an indistinct or flat philtrum (the ridge under the nose), and a thin upper vermilion lip. Although each of these features can occur in a variety of disorders, the combination appears to be consistent with heavy prenatal alcohol exposure. Children with FAS can have other facial features, such as epicanthic folds (tiny folds of tissues along the eye opening), a low nasal bridge, an underdeveloped jaw, and minor ear anomalies. Usually the children are born small (less than 25th percentile) and remain small, at least until puberty. Finally, there must be evidence of CNS dysfunction, which might be physical (e.g., microcephaly, where the head is smaller than normal) or behavioral (e.g., hyperactivity, mental retardation). High levels of prenatal alcohol exposure are related to an increased risk for deficits in intellectual functioning. However, deficits in intellectual functioning can occur in children without all of the physical features required for a diagnosis of FAS. Children with FAS can also have heart defects, skeletal anomalies, altered palmar creases (creases on the hands), and urogenital anomalies.

Only a minority (10–40 percent) of the children of chronic alcoholic women are diagnosed with FAS. This suggests that some individuals are more susceptible than others, and that there are certain factors that increase the risk to the adverse effects of prenatal alcohol. First, the higher the dose of prenatal exposure to alcohol, the more likely it is that the child will exhibit fetal alcohol effects. The pattern of exposure is also important. Binge drinking, which produces high blood alcohol levels, is more damaging to the fetus than chronic alcohol exposure that produces lower blood alcohol levels. Thus, peak blood alcohol level may be an important factor. In addition, the developmental timing of alcohol exposure may influence the outcome. For example, the facial features associated with FAS appear to be related to alcohol exposure during the first trimester. In addition, genetic factors, nutritional factors, parity, and synergistic reaction with other drugs may influence the effects of prenatal alcohol exposure.

Children with FAS experience a range of developmental concerns, such as mental health problems and disrupted school experiences. As they mature, children with FAS also engage in relatively high rates of inappropriate sexual behavior, and a significant number have alcohol and drug abuse problems themselves. The factors that are protective against such developmental concerns include being raised in a stable, nurturing home; diagnosis before 6 years of age; no sexual or physical abuse; not changing households every few years; not living in a poor-quality home; and early intervention services.

Interventions

Given that there is no cure for FAS or FASD, the most appropriate strategy is prevention, such as assuring that all women have access to prenatal care and other services needed to ensure a healthy pregnancy. Women identified as being at high risk of having a child with FAS can be targeted for prevention interventions. These risk factors include being older; American Indian/Alaska Native; black, not Hispanic; unmarried; unemployed; without prenatal care; and a smoker during pregnancy. Mothers of children with FAS have a lower educational level, have more live-born children than mothers of children without FAS, and have been binge drinking and/or drinking heavily (seven days a week) during pregnancy. Other potential risk indicators include being on public assistance, receiving Medicaid at their child's birth, having a history of treatment for alcohol abuse, having been confirmed as an alcoholic, having a history of marijuana or cocaine use during pregnancy, having their infant screen positive for alcohol or drugs at birth, having a history of induced abortion, and having a mental illness.

Very little work has been done to develop interventions and treatment for children with FAS and for infants prenatally exposed to drugs. Data suggest that some children with FAS who also have attention deficit disorder do indeed respond favorably to stimulant medication. Early motor training to address motor deficits, balance problems, and gait anomalies may also be effective. Such services may be available through local early intervention programs. The Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) states that children younger than 3 years of age who are at risk of having developmental delays may be eligible for such services. However, prevention is still the best approach.

To summarize, almost 50 percent of pregnancies in the United States are unplanned, stressing the importance of educating all women of childbearing age about the risks of drinking alcoholic beverages and using illicit drugs. Public health campaigns to increase awareness of how to prevent FAS and the risks of women using drugs when pregnant can be beneficial in improving infants' health outcomes.

Cathleen A. Lewandowski
George Mason University

See also: Adoption: Infants, International, and Older/Special Needs Children; Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Ethnic Groups and Drug and Alcohol Use.

Further Readings

Bunikowski, R., I. Grimmer, A. Heiser, B. Metze, A. Schäfer, and M. Obladen. "Neurodevelopmental Outcome After Prenatal Exposure to Opiates." European Journal of Pediatrics, v.157/9 (1998).

Cannon, M. J., Y. Dominique, L. A. O'Leary, J. E. Sniezek, and R. L. Floyd. "Characteristics and Behaviors of Mothers Who Have a Child with Fetal Alcohol Syndrome." Neurotoxicology and Teratology, v.34/1 (2012).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorders," August 12, 2012. http://www.cdc.gov/ncbddd/fasd/data.html (Accessed June 2013).

de Sanctis, L., L. Memo, S. Pichini , L. Tarani, and F. Vagnarelli. "Fetal Alcohol Syndrome: New Perspectives on an Ancient and Underestimated Problem." The Journal of Maternal, Fetal & Neonatal Medicine, v.24/suppl 1 (2011).

Fares, I., K. M. McCulloch, and T. N. Raju. "Intrauterine Cocaine Exposure and the Risk for Sudden Infant Death Syndrome: A Meta-Analysis." Journal of Perinatology: Official Journal of the California Perinatal Association, v.17/3 (1997).

Jansson, L. M., J. A. Di Pietro, A. Elko, E. L. Williams, L. Milio, and M. Velez. "Pregnancies Exposed to Methadone, Methadone and Other Illicit Substances, and Poly-Drugs without Methadone: A Comparison of Fetal Neurobehaviors and Infant Outcomes." Drug and Alcohol Dependence, v.122/3 (2012).

Jones, K. L., D. W. Smith, C. N. Ulleland, and A. P. Streissguth. "Pattern of Malformation in Offspring of Chronic Alcoholic Mothers." Lancet, v.1 (1973).

Lemoine, P., H. Harousseau, J. P. Borteyru, and J. C. Menuet. "Les Enfants de Parents Alcoliques: Anomalies Observees. A propos de 127 Cas" [Children of Alcoholic Parents: Abnormalities Observed in 127 Cases]. Ouest Medical, v.21 (1968).

Mattson, S. N. and E. P. Riley. "A Review of the Neurobehavioral Deficits in Children with Fetal Alcohol Syndrome or Prenatal Exposure to Alcohol." Alcoholism: Clinical and Experimental Research, v.22/2 (1998).

Mattson, S. N., E. P. Riley, L. Gramling, D. C. Delis, and K. L. Jones. "Heavy Prenatal Alcohol Exposure With or Without Physical Features of Fetal Alcohol Syndrome Leads to IQ Deficits." Journal of Pediatrics, v.131/5 (1997).

Filipino Americans

Asian Americans are one of the largest racial groups in the United States. Yet, while studying or discussing Asian Americans, it is critical to understand that the monolithic group called Asian Americans actually comprises many different ethnicities reflecting a diversity of traditions, cultures, and languages. In addition, a dramatic difference in socioeconomic status and immigration status exists among the groups, which needs to be recognized when considering the well-being of Asian American communities.

Filipino Americans are the second-largest Asian American population in the United States. A predominantly immigrant, foreign-born group, Filipino Americans reside primarily in California, Hawai'i, and the U.S. east coast. Close to 2.9 million Filipinos live in the United States, according to the U.S. Census Bureau, and close to 4 million Filipinos will be living in the United States by 2030. Filipinos were one of the earliest groups to immigrate to the United States, and they came in four distinct waves. The first Filipinos, who came to the United States in the mid-1700s as seafarers on the Manila galleons, eventually settled in Louisiana. The second wave arrived during the time that the Philippines was a U.S. colony with a population primarily of laborers from the Ilocano- and Visayan-speaking provinces. The third wave arrived post–World War II and consisted mostly of Filipinos who served with the U.S. Armed Forces and were given the opportunity to become U.S. citizens. The fourth and largest wave of Filipinos came to the United States as part of the passage of the 1965 Immigration Act. Many of these Filipinos came as occupational migrants (e.g., nurses, physicians, accountants, and teachers) and were highly educated and English-speaking.

A diverse group, Filipinos consist of more than 60 cultural minority groups and speak 100 ethnic languages. Filipinos have a long history of colonization, which has greatly impacted their culture and social structure. Filipinos were colonized by Spain for roughly 300 years and were subsequently colonized by the United States. During Spanish colonial times, regionalism was encouraged in order to prevent nationalist revolt, and social policies were enacted that severed the Filipino social structure. The Spaniards also brought the religion of Catholicism, which continues to heavily influence Filipino customs. The differences in language and subculture might explain the divisiveness and lack of unity that persists in the Filipino American community.

Compared to other Asian Americans, Filipino Americans can be characterized as at high risk for mental disorders. Compared to white Americans and the general U.S. population, Filipino American adults have higher rates of depression. Prevalence of depression is also higher compared to Japanese and Chinese Americans, but rates may be underestimated because Filipinos tend to deny, somatize, and endure emotional problems. Filipino adults have lower suicide rates than whites and other minorities, possibly due to the influence of Catholicism as well as available extended family and social support systems. For depression, Filipinos have the tendency to seek spiritual, personal, or social treatments, rather than Western medical treatments, and consider interpersonal factors as important treatments. For example, highly religious Filipino Americans are more likely to seek help from religious clergy, whereas those who are highly spiritual are less likely to seek help for mental health issues. Despite their middle-class status, English proficiency, employment status, educational attainment, acculturation levels, and access to health care, Filipino Americans underutilize mental health services.

Filipino Americans, along with other ethnic communities, face racism, which can adversely impact their mental health. Various studies have shown that Filipino Americans report the highest rates of perceived discrimination, which is significantly associated with depression. Researchers indicate that chronic exposure to racial discrimination is related to chronic diseases (e.g., heart disease, diabetes, blood pressure, and alcohol and substance abuse). Studies of the influence of racism on the psychological health of Filipino Americans are limited. Even though Filipinos are generally family-oriented and rely primarily on family for social support, compared with other Asian Americans, Filipino Americans use mental health services at a much lower rate. Possible explanations for lower rates of help-seeking include loss of face, adherence to Asian cultural values, help-seeking attitudes, low levels of social trust, and cultural mistrust toward seeking professional mental health services.

Researchers have documented mental health differences between U.S.-born and foreign-born immigrants. U.S.-born individuals tend to use specialty mental health care at higher rates than immigrants, yet immigrants have better mental health than their U.S.-born counterparts. Furthermore, other studies indicate that for mental health indicators, U.S.-born and foreign-born adults were equally likely to experience serious psychological distress. Indeed, this distinction between U.S.-born and foreign-born adults holds merit for Filipinos. Foreign-born Filipinos, compared to U.S.-born Filipinos, have significantly lower levels of depressive symptoms. In contrast, U.S.-born Filipino Americans are more likely to use the lay system as their usual source of care, compared to professional or folk systems. Compared to other immigrants, Filipino Americans have high socioeconomic status, yet their mental health does not reflect this social status. The mental health needs and help-seeking behavor of Filipino Americans must be examined within the context of various social factors.

Recent health statistics provided by the President's Commission on Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders in 2001 show that Filipino American adolescents have one of the highest rates of suicide ideations and attempts in the United States. Furthermore, alarmingly high statistics on other health issues, such as rates of HIV/AIDS, unintended pregnancy, eating disorders, sexually transmitted diseases, and drug use, are also reported for Filipino American communities across the United States. Indeed, increased research and clinical attention on the Filipino American population are needed. Second-generation Filipino youth also face heightened risk for health concerns.

Young Filipino men and women experience contradictory messages and pressures to succeed with the standards of their families, gender differences, and specifically the intense messaging around academic majors or career choices and expectations of being a family (e.g., not to get pregnant out of wedlock). As a result, some second-generation Filipinos experience suicidal ideation and severe stress from pressures to succeed, combined with little to no outlets for support or encouragement to seek help from outside the family. This suggests that although not all Filipino children of immigrants suffer from alienation from their parents, the model minority picture of Filipino immigrants being able to assimilate with little cost may have detrimental effects.

Aileen Duldulao
Independent Scholar
Ethel Nicdao
University of the Pacific
Alma Trinidad
Portland State University

See also: Arab Americans; Asian Americans; Vietnamese Americans.

Further Readings

Cherry, Stephen M. F*aith, Family, and Filipino American Community Life*. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2013.

Nadal, Kevin. Filipino American Psychology: A Handbook of Theory, Research, and Clinical Practice. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2011.

National Federation of Filipino American Associations. http://naffaausa.org/ (Accessed April 2014).

Financial Literacy Programs

Contemporary interest in financial literacy has been traced to a 1992 report prepared for the National Westminster Bank in London that focused on adolescents and their need for financial education in light of the financial deregulation in the 1980s. Growing concern about the state of financial illiteracy in Great Britain led to the creation in 2000 of the first national agency in the world charged with elevating consumer levels of financial literacy, the Financial Services Authority (FSA). In short order, the FSA was followed by the Financial Consumer Agency of Canada (2001), the European Clearinghouse for Financial Literacy in the Directorate General for the Internal Market (2001), the Financial Literacy and Education Commission in the United States (2003), and the Financial Literacy Foundation in Australia (2005). The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) announced a two-phase financial education project in January 2004 concerned with the protection of individual investors, the uninformed insured, and the shift in risk to the investor that accompanies defined-contribution retirement plans in contrast to defined-benefit retirement plans.

Many factors have stimulated international interest in increasing the financial literacy or financial capability of consumers and citizens in economically developed countries. Aging populations in these countries have stressed the financial capabilities of social welfare programs. Improving financial literacy encourages greater individual preparation for retirement and may relieve some of the financial stress on national budgets. The growing interconnectivity of the global economy, especially the restructuring of global financial markets and deregulation of major financial institutions, has made it virtually impossible for individual nations to maintain monetary independence, stable exchange rates, and access to capital investments. Improving financial literacy converts consumers into partners working collaboratively with national economic goals. From a national perspective, elevating financial literacy among consumers is a protective strategy internationally and internally.

Definitions

Financial literacy is the most common of a variety of terms (e.g., financial capability, economic literacy) used to refer to consumer financial acumen. Attempts to define financial literacy presume adequate reading literacy and mathematical proficiency, but extend beyond these basics to include access to the knowledge, skills, or resources necessary to make effective financial decisions. The explicit goal of improving consumer financial literacy is to change financial behaviors. All economically developed nations define the desired financial behaviors with little concern for subjective consumer desires. Substantial differences exist, however, between the United States and other economically developed nations regarding the means by which the desired financial behaviors are pursued.

In the United States, financial literacy means knowledge and skills for individual economic maximization. Areas of concern include budgeting, savings, investing, asset accumulation, spending, credit/debt management, avoidance of predatory financial products, consumer and investor rights, and participation in mainstream financial institutions. The financially literate decision is the decision in each of these areas that produces the maximum return at the minimal costs to the individual decision maker. The underlying assumption is consistent with classic free market capitalism in which individual self-interest produces collective benefits.

Other economically developed nations place their emphasis on the national economy rather than the individual. Areas of concern expand beyond the individual profit motive to include a variety of national interests as diverse as increasing social inclusion, decreasing social deprivation, reducing overall consumer debt, increasing household savings, or improving the efficiency of government-sponsored social welfare programs. The means of achieving the goal of financial literacy is not the education of the individual but rather increased access to informational resources. Thus, the financially literate decision is that which conforms to national goals rather than that which serves the individual consumer.

Financial Education

Outside the United States, financial education programs tend to focus on improving consumer confidence in the national economy and increasing access to financial advice in the form of financial professionals or online financial information. In the United States, the more decentralized and complex social welfare mosaic has created a larger variety of financial education programs that address the needs of specific populations (e.g., debtor counseling or investor advice) or prepare participants for inclusion in the mainstream economy (e.g., potential homebuyers or credit repair). Nonprofit organizations serve target groups as diverse as victims of interpersonal violence, who may be reluctant to leave an abusive relationship for financial reasons, and ex-offenders returning from incarceration, who may be completely unfamiliar with modern innovations such as debit cards and the Internet.

The U.S. Federal Reserve Board provided seed money for the nonprofit Jump$tart Coalition for Personal Financial Literacy in 1995 to promote some degree of collaboration with a modicum of success. Today, Jump$tart is a coalition of 150 organizations and 49 state coalitions dedicated to the financial education of primary, secondary, and tertiary students through resources, advocacy, research, and standards development. Further centralization of financial education in the United States since 2001 has been promoted by the free Money Smart financial education curricula and training available from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC). The FDIC claims that 2.75 million consumers have benefited from Money Smart.

Diversity

Financial literacy programs rarely promote diversity. The explicit focus, changing consumer behaviors against a normative standard, promotes conformity. These normative standards are almost universally determined from the perspective of the financial services industry, with a high degree of insensitivity to the context of the financial decisions and avoidance of the subjective consequence of financial outcomes to the individual consumer. Those on the margins of national economic activity are prepared to and persuaded by these programs to move into the economic mainstream.

Critiques and Criticisms

Educational programs to improve financial literacy may be unstated justifications for a new form of laissez-faire economics in which the consumer loses protective financial regulations and access to formal state assistance. In the worst case, the individual consumer's personal financial interest may be vulnerable to subversion by state and corporate objectives. This critique of financial literacy programs is particularly acute in those nations with a robust and growing alternative economy for people with low and unstable incomes. Characterized by payday lenders, pawnbrokers, buy here–pay here auto dealers, rent-to-own stores, tertiary labor markets, and a close affinity with illicit economic activities, the alternative, fringe, or underground economy receives little more than cursory attention in most financial literacy programs. Accordingly, financial literacy programs, especially those sustained by financial institutions, are little more than training programs to promote middle-class and higher economic behaviors. To households without the stable incomes to sustain middle-class lifestyles, financial literacy programs are often irrelevant. When financial literacy programs understand that financial decisions are bounded by different contexts, participants in these programs will be more likely to benefit from the training.

Peter A. Kindle
University of South Dakota

See Also: Economic Support and Services; Employment/Career Assistance Services; Life Skills Training; Microlending Programs; Services for Victims of Domestic Violence; Prisoners and Exprisoners.

Further Readings

Barr, Michael S. No Slack: The Financial Lives of Low-Income Americans. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press, 2012.
Birkenmaier, Julie, Margaret Sherraden, and Jami Curley, eds. Financial Capability and Asset Management: Research, Education, Policy, and Practice. New York: Oxford University Press, 2013.
Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). Improving Financial Literacy: Analysis of Issues and Policies. Paris: OECD Publishing, 2005.

Food Desert

Food deserts are generally defined as areas with a lack of access to affordable good-quality food that allows for a healthy diet. The term food desert has a variety of definitions. In one definition, there is no access to a supermarket with annual sales of $2 million or more within a specified area, either a mile or 10 to 20 miles. The U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA), offers an online Food Access Research Atlas that shows what areas of the United States are food deserts. Food deserts are found in both urban and rural areas. An estimated 13.6 million people throughout the United States live in food deserts. People living in food deserts are generally of low income, have high levels of food insecurity, and have very poor access to affordable food, particularly fresh produce. Since low-income people throughout the nation live in food deserts, obtaining knowledge of what they are, what causes them, why they persist, and their impact are crucial to address problems of poverty, inequality, and food insecurity in the United States.

Description of Food Deserts

People who live in food deserts are far from supermarkets and often lack access to the food required to maintain a healthy diet. Lacking supermarkets, food deserts are often served by high-priced convenience stores and gas stations with limited food options. Food available in food deserts tends to be less healthy, more expensive, and of low quality. The processed foods available may contribute to rising rates of obesity. In addition, high concentrations of food deserts exist in areas with high rates of regressive taxation, such as Mississippi and Alabama. In fact, these two states have some of the highest rates of food deserts, have sales taxes on food that are high as 10 percent, and they tax foods that in most states are exempt from sales tax, creating further problems for food affordability..

What Causes Food Deserts

As stated, food deserts are often in low-income communities. Several factors lead to the creation of food deserts. One is the shift over the past several decades from local food stores to supermarkets and increasingly to superstores. This shift occurred as many urban areas were declining. Many urban cities lost supermarkets and smaller businesses, such as butchers, as poverty increased and middle-class people fled to the emerging suburbs. Certain rural areas have similarly experienced population loss. The economic downturn of 2007 through 2009 exacerbated the problem when many food stores

Lacking supermarkets, food deserts are often served by high-priced convenience stores and gas stations with limited food options. Food available in food deserts tends to be less healthy, more expensive, and of low quality. The consumption of processed foods is thought to contribute to rising rates of obesity.

throughout the country were forced to close, leaving rural areas in particular deeply impacted.

Location and Population of Food Deserts

Food deserts are located in both urban and rural communities. Poverty rates are one of the best predictors of the location of food deserts. In most areas, the higher the percentage of the population who are people of color, the more likely an area is to be a food desert. Communities with large numbers of African Americans and Latinos also have a higher probability of being food deserts. Rural areas that are not experiencing population growth are also likely to be food deserts.

The USDA has identified several areas of concern to policy makers when addressing food deserts. Designing the right public policies requires a knowledge of the factors shaping food deserts. Among the concerns identified were income and transportation. Many rural areas have little to no public transportation, and isolated rural communities are often more than 20 miles from a grocery store.

Some studies of people living in food deserts have contradicted the stereotypes of people uninterested in health food. These studies seem to suggest that lack of access rather than personal habits shapes eating habits. When healthy food is available in cities such as New Orleans, people are likely to consume items such as fresh fruits and vegetables. Indeed, a food bank in Sacramento, California, experienced success when it worked to encourage healthier eating.

Impact of Food Deserts

Food deserts have the potential to have a significant impact on public health in areas such as obesity, heart disease, and diabetes. The lack of access to healthy food creates the potential for many public health problems. Increasingly, reports suggest that low-income children growing up in food deserts will be part of a generation that faces a lower life expectancy than their parents. Eating processed foods can lead to increased obesity, and the unhealthy diet that many food desert residents experience can have a profound impact on health, increasing the cost of programs such as Medicare and Medicaid.

Academic and Public Policy Responses to Food Deserts

In June 2011, the University of Nebraska at Omaha held a forum on food deserts and public policy. Attendees represented a cross section of those attempting to formulate policies who brought up many issues. Since food deserts are beginning to get more attention, it is possible that there will be more coordinated policy responses; in fact, in the past 15 years, responses have emerged.

Politicians at the federal, state, and local levels have worked to create solutions to the problem of food deserts. The federal New Markets Tax Credit (NMTC), established in 2000, provides much support to promoting food banks and other responses to food deserts. In 2010, the Obama administration unveiled the Healthy Food Financing Initiative (HFFI), based on a program that originated in Pennsylvania. The program aimed to eliminate food deserts within seven years through measures such as $250 million in tax credits and providing federal funds to assist local efforts. At the launching, then Governor Ed Rendell noted that even strong school lunch programs made little impact without access to healthy food at home.

State and local efforts have also been devoted to combating food deserts. Pennsylvania's policy, the basis for HFFI, resulted in 80 supermarkets opening in former food deserts over a period of five years. The Pennsylvania initiative provided one-time loans and grants to help entrepreneurs start businesses in underserved areas. These initiatives improved access to a healthy diet for an estimated 400,000 people while also creating an estimated 5,000 jobs. The New York State Food Policy Council was founded in 2007 by then Governor Eliot Spitzer to combat the problem of food deserts and other food issues. Conducting public hearings throughout New York State, the council compiled a report exploring issues and possibilities.

First Lady Michelle Obama has devoted a great deal of attention to combating childhood obesity and promoting healthy eating, particularly through her Let's Move program. She has made creative efforts to promote healthy eating and combat food deserts, even appearing on an episode of the television show Restaurant Impossible in which a nonprofit organization redesigned its space to serve healthy food to a larger number of children.

In addition to public policy efforts that can assist food deserts are initiatives under discussion that could potentially exacerbate problems. Since 2000, there has been a tremendous growth in enrollment in the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP, formerly known as food stamps). Proposals to reform SNAP could make it more difficult for stores in food deserts to accept SNAP funds, thereby reducing eligibility. In addition, potential cuts in safety-net programs that focus on nutrition could make access to food more difficult.

Moving beyond governmental action, nonprofit organizations also attempt to work in food deserts, sometimes by providing meals rather than education. One Massachusetts organization, the Food Project, grows fresh produce in the affluent suburb of Lincoln, the Roxbury section of Boston, and the North Shore. It sells the produce and donates the proceeds to local hunger-relief organizations and homeless shelters. Other programs, such as the Texas Hunger Initiative, work to combat food insecurity through access to meals using the community and civil society. Efforts across public and private sectors are ongoing.

Conclusion

Food deserts are located throughout the nation and have the potential to create extensive public health problems, such as obesity. They are characterized by a lack of access to affordable, healthy food. People who live in food deserts often depend on convenience stores and gas stations for food. Public policy efforts at every level of government

Matthew Gritter
Angelo State University

See Also: Food Insecurity; Food Support; National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey.

Further Readings

Food Access Research Atlas. http://www.ers.usda.gov/data-products/food-access-research-atlas/go-to-the-atlas.aspx#.Uunz3rSzLh0 (Accessed December 2013).

Pringle, Peter, ed. A Place at the Table: The Crisis of 49 Million Americans. New York: Public Affairs, 2013.

Food Insecurity

Currently, about 1 billion people live on less than $1 a day. As a result, one-fifth of the world's population is suffering from hunger or undernutrition. Most of these people are poor farmers who lack arable land or have difficulties in accessing clean water. Moreover, climate change; global warming; natural disasters such as earthquakes, tsunamis, and hurricanes; erosion; and deforestation are all affecting the world's food and water resources. The enormous population growth is signaling increasing scarcity of food and water in the near future.

Definition

Food security is defined by the World Food Summit of 1996 as existing "when all people at all times have access to sufficient, safe, nutritious food to maintain a healthy and active life." In this respect, the concept of food insecurity can be defined as the lack of physical or economic access to sufficient, safe, and nutritious food. The levels of food production and distribution are among the root causes of food insecurity. Moreover, a third factor can be added, which is consumption. Responsible consumption results in a decrease of the level of food waste and thus hunger and malnutrition because less food waste in one part of the world translates into less food loss in other parts of the world.

Relationship Between Food Insecurity and Poverty

Many people in the world do not know where or when they will find their next meal. These people, who suffer from hunger or undernutrition, are generally poor farmers. In this respect, a strong relationship exists between poverty and food insecurity. Extreme poverty is mostly seen in the regions with the lowest levels of per capita income in the world; in addition, both famines and undernutrition continue to affect a great many people. According to the 2005 research results of the World Bank, 880 million people were living on less than $1 a day, which was then the poverty line. In 2009, more than 1 billion people in the world did not have enough to eat, and 98 percent of the world's hungry lived in developing countries.

In 1993, of the world's 1.271 billion extreme poor, 1.036 billion who lived at less than the poverty line ($1.08 a day at that time) were from rural regions. Similarly, in 2004, of the world's 1.165 billion extreme poor, 0.882 billion were living in rural areas. According to these results, more than three-quarters of all poor people live in rural areas in the world.

Today, most of the poor still live in the rural areas of the world. Gemmo Lodesani, head of the World Food Program office in Brussels, is tasked with fulfilling the organization's primary commitment of fighting hunger worldwide. He reported in 2010 that "three-quarters of the more than one billion hungry people in the world are poor farmers." The vast majority of the rural poor are self-employed in agriculture.

For the rural poor, historically scarcities of water and arable land have caused great hardship with the growing population, which will continue to be a big problem. A contemporary projection by Population Action International (PAI) regarding available arable land for humanity indicates that whereas there was a lack of 7 percent arable land for the world population in 2005, this lack will increase to 10 percent by 2025.

Food insecurity stems from the injustice in the distribution of food globally rather than the insufficiency of food. In this respect, current levels of food production are enough for all people in the world both for today and the future. However, current studies and contemporary projections show that the gap between the amount of global food and the world population is increasing. The International Rice Research Institute's Web site shows, for example, that the world population is increasing every second while the amount of the world's productive land is decreasing. There are about 1 billion hungry in the world today, and it is expected that number will reach 3 billion by 2050.

Conflicts Arising From Food Insecurity

According to studies commissioned by the University of Toronto and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, many conflicts in the world have been caused by the scarcities of renewable resources. As Thomas F. Homer-Dixon claimed, “These conflicts may foreshadow a surge of similar violence in coming decades, particularly in poor countries where shortages of water, forests and, especially, fertile land, coupled with rapidly expanding populations, already cause great hardship.”

Rich countries can overcome such scarcities in renewable resources, but poor ones cannot. The most important thing about these scarcities in renewable resources is that they are a problem only in the case of poverty. Of the 50 countries in sub-Saharan Africa, 31 (more than 60 percent) experienced conflicts during the 1980s and 1990s. Not surprisingly, 21 of these conflict-torn countries are among the world’s 40 poorest countries. Other poor countries, such as Bangladesh, Haiti, Myanmar, and Afghanistan, have also experienced conflicts. The common thing among the 40 poorest countries of the world is that their average annual income level is US$995 or less. In this regard, James D. Fearon and David D. Laitin assert that “$1,000 less in income corresponds to 34 percent greater annual odds of outbreak.” Four different recent studies addressed the relationship between national income level and conflicts, and concluded that when per capita gross domestic product (GDP) decreases, the risk of conflict in a country increases.

Based on all aforementioned arguments, poverty, which is directly related to food insecurity, is the key root cause of conflict. Poor countries have experienced conflicts within their borders, and this is also going to be seen in the future unless precautions are taken to alleviate poverty, hunger, and malnutrition.

Hakan Aydogan
Rutgers University

See Also: Food Desert; Food Support; National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey.

Further Readings

Banerjee, Abhijit and Esther Duflo. “The Economic Lives of the Poor.” Journal of Economic Perspectives, v.21/1 (2007).

Brown, Oli. “The Environment and Our Security. Manitoba : International Institute for Sustainable Development, 2005.” http://www.iisd.org/pdf/2005/security_env_peace_iran.pdf (Accessed August 2013,).

Chen, Shaohua and Martin Ravallion. “Absolute Poverty Measures for the Developing World, 1981–2004.” Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, v.104/43 (2007). http://www.pnas.org/content/104/43/16757.full.pdf+html (Accessed August 2013).

Collier, Paul. The Bottom Billion: Why the Poorest Countries Are Failing and What Can Be Done About It. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007.

Collier, Paul, et al. “What Makes a Country Prone to Civil War?” In Breaking the Conflict Trap. Washington, DC: World Bank, 2003.

Fearon, James D. and David D. Laitin. “Ethnicity, Insurgency, and Civil War.” The American Political Science Review, v.97/1 (February, 2003).

Food and Agriculture Organization, United Nations. http://www.fao.org/docrep/012/al390e/al390e00.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Frayssinet, Fabiana (2010). “Three-Quarters of Hungry Are Rural Poor.” Inter Press Service International Association. http://ipsnews.net/news.asp?idnews=49920 (Accessed August 2013).

Hauge, Wenche and Tanja Ellingsen. “Beyond Environmental Scarcity: Causal Pathways to Conflict.” Journal of Peace Research, v.35/3, Special Issue on Environmental Conflict (May 1998).

Hampson, Fen Osler et al. Madness in the Multitude. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Homer-Dixon, Thomas F., Jeffrey H. Boutwell, and George W. Rathjens. “Environmental Change and Violent Conflict.” Scientific American, v.268/2 (1993).

Lomborg, Björn. “Resource Constraints or Abundance?” In Paul F. Diehl and Nils Petter Gleditsch, eds. Environmental Conflict. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2001.

Luckham, Robin, Ismail Ahmed, Robert Muggah, and Sara White. “Conflict and Poverty in Sub-Saharan Africa: An Assessment of the Issues and Evidence. IDS Working Paper 128, 2001. http://www.ids.ac.uk/files/dmfile/Wp128.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Rice, Susan E., Corrine Graff, and Janet Lewis. Poverty and Civil War: What Policymakers Need to Know. Global Economy and Development Working Paper. Washington, DC: The Brookings Institution, 2006.

“World Population by Arable Land Availability.” Population Action International, 2010. http://www.populationaction.org/Publications/Reports/People_in_the_Balance/Interactive/peopleinthebalance/pages/?s=3&t=graphs (Accessed November 2010).

Food Support

The food service industry consists of various components, including companies and community-based services that provide prepared meals in restaurants, hotels, hospitals, schools, shelters, correctional facilities, and other institutions with cafeterias, catering, or meal services. Some institutions work with food service distributors to provide bulk inventories of food and nonfood products such as disposable kitchenware. Food services can also include nonprofit/charitable organizations such as food banks, nutrition programs, and federal and state food regulatory agencies.

Food Banks and Charitable Organizations

Food banks are nonprofit, charitable organizations that provide food for shelters, residential child care facilities, soup kitchens, and predominantly low-income schools. Food banks solicit donations from large and local businesses, faith-based organizations, federal programs, and individuals through food drives conducted in the community. One of the largest food banks in the United States is Feeding America, a nonprofit organization that serves more than 37 million Americans through corporate and community partnerships. Feeding America also conducts research about the issue of insufficient nutrition and provides insight into the impact of hunger on communities and individuals. Therefore, not only do food banks provide food for individuals in need, they also work to provide hunger-free advocacy efforts.

Nutrition Programs

The Food and Nutrition Center (FNIC) was formally established in 1977, through the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977, to collect and provide the public with health and nutritional information and resources. FNIC offers updated resources lists and other educational materials for multiple nutrition and food service program Web sites such as the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP), Health Meals Resource System (HMRS), and the WIC Works Resource System (WWRS). The SNAP program provides nutrition assistance and education for low-income families, HMRS is an online resource for individuals working with or in child nutrition programs, and WWRS offers resources for nutrition professionals.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture administers several programs geared toward child nutrition, which include: the School Breakfast Program, the Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Program, the Special Milk Program, the Summer Food Service Program, the Child and Adult Care Food Program, and the National School Lunch Program.

The School Breakfast Program provides financial assistance to school- and residential-based nonprofit breakfast programs for children. The program is administered on the federal level and operates in more than 89,000 institutions. The Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Program is a federally administered program that provides fresh fruits and vegetables to schools in order to combat obesity and offer healthier food choices to children. The program primarily targets schools serving large numbers of children who receive free or reduced-cost lunches in all 50 states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. The School Milk Program reimburses schools and child care agencies that provide milk to students who do not participate in other federal meal programs. This program serves approximately 4,700 schools, residential child care facilities, summer camps, and other child care institutions.

The Summer Food Service Program is a state-administered program that provides free meals and snacks to low-income children in order to ensure that they continue to receive nutritious meals when school is not in session. This program targets areas in which the majority of children come from families with incomes at or below 185 percent of the national poverty level, and can be sponsored by many types of community and private organizations that provide meal services. The Child and Adult Care Food Program is a nutrition, education, and meal-reimbursement program that aims to increase the health and wellness of at-risk and low-income children, older adults, and persons with disabilities. The National School Lunch Program, established under the National School Lunch Act of 1946, is a federal meal program that serves public schools, nonprofit private schools, and residential child care facilities, and provides free and reduced-cost lunches to approximately 31 million children.

Food Regulation

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) publishes a food code designed to provide guidelines to states regarding the regulation of retail food service industries. The FDA is the authority regarding food safety in the United States. While the federal government provides a model for regulation and may conduct inspections, as needed, it is primarily the duty of the states to inspect and supervise the over 1 million food establishments. States also contract with the FDA to provide oversight for various FDA-regulated programs and services, with 80 percent of inspections conducted at the state and local levels. The FDA provides evidence-based regulation standards that help state health agencies protect against food-borne illnesses. State agencies primarily govern licensure revocation and the penalties associated with violations of federal and state food regulation codes.

The National Association of State Departments of Agriculture (NASDA) seeks to create a consistent system of food regulation among the different regulatory agencies through oversight of the agencies and reform of the policies governing national- and state-level food regulation codes. NASDA highlights food-borne illnesses and the many other threats to the U.S. food supply. The United States has various food suppliers around the world, which increases the nation's potential for exposure to contaminants due to food quality issues and makes the U.S. food supply a potentially vulnerable target of bioterrorism. Evidence-based and uniform programs help increase efficiency and information-sharing regarding food regulation.

Ione N. Paiva
Laurie M. Craigen
Kathleen Levingston
Old Dominion University

See Also: Food Desert; Food Insecurity; Nutritional Services and Assessment.

Further Readings

Dot Foods. "The Nation's Largest Food Redistributor." http://www.dotfoods.com/home (Accessed March 2014).

National Association of State Departments of Agriculture. "Food Regulation and Safety." http://www.nasda.org/Policy/5332/4908.aspx (Accessed March 2014).

U.S. Department of Agriculture. Food and Nutrition Information Center. https://fnic.nal.usda.gov (Accessed March 2014).

U.S. Department of Agriculture. Food and Nutrition Services. http://www.fns.usda.gov/school-meals/child-nutrition-programs (Accessed March 2014).

U.S. Food and Drug Administration. Retail Food Protection. http://www.fda.gov/Food/GuidanceRegulation/RetailFoodProtection/default.htm (Accessed March 2014).

Foster Care Agencies

Foster care agencies are licensed agencies that have the responsibility for recruiting foster parents or finding foster homes and placing in their care individuals for whom placement outside their own homes is necessary for a temporary or extended period. Although foster care placement now has expanded to include some mentally or physically disabled adults and (more rarely) the elderly, it historically has been concerned with the placement of children who continue to make up by far the greatest part of the fostered population. Because child welfare services are the province of individual states in the United States, each state has in place administrative and legal structures and programs for the welfare of children. Typically, the foster care system falls under the direction of a division of family and children's services, and state agents superintend county social services departments and private foster care agencies licensed by the state. Private foster care agencies range in size from small, local agencies to large, multistate agencies, such as the Casey Family Programs and Girls and Boys Town that place hundreds of children in family-based foster care. The historic role of private agencies in the evolving foster care system is a central one, predating most state services, which were established after the Social Security Act of 1935 authorized the first federal grants for child welfare services. The federal role in the foster care system has grown in size and scope since those early, relatively small grants.

Government regulations at the national, state, and local levels determine such issues as requirements and training for foster parenting and procedures for termination of parental rights, but a substantial amount of the day-to-day operations of the foster care system is performed by county social services agencies, whose authority varies from state to state, as well as private foster care agencies licensed by the state. Private agencies may receive government funds, but they are usually dependent to some degree upon charitable contributions. The county agencies and the private agencies provide training sessions for foster parents, place children in foster homes, work with birth families for reunification when possible, advocate for adoption for those children who cannot be reunited with their families, and generally handle the details of each child's movement through the foster care system.

In the 18th century, children who were orphaned or whose parents were unable to care for them were frequently indentured to families willing to put them to work. It was not until the early 19th century that the practice of placing such children in orphanages began, usually established by private religious and charitable organizations. Toward the end of the 19th century, private agencies began placing orphans and destitute children with foster families, but orphanages continued to be the placement of choice for most children who could not live with their birth families. The first private children's charity, the New York Orphan Asylum Society, was founded in 1806. Similar institutions were soon in place in Boston, Massachusetts, and Baltimore, Maryland. By 1910, the United States had more than 1,000 orphanages. These institutions were committed to providing a basic education for their residents and then to placing them into apprenticeships or indentured servitude.

In the mid-19th century, economic recession, industrialization, and the influx of immigrant families into large eastern cities such as New York and Boston were stretching social resources thin. The problem of vagrant, indigent children begging and engaging in petty thefts was an increasing concern. According to some contemporary accounts, as many as 30,000 such children roamed the streets of New York and Boston. Despite the proliferation of orphanages, there was no room for many of these children other than almshouses, where they were placed with adults, including the ill, the diseased, and the insane. The lack of jobs in urban centers made the usual routine of apprenticing impossible, so states authorized orphanages and other institutions in charge of children to place males under age 21 and females under age 18 in homes outside the state that were willing to accept them and train them to work.

It was in this environment that Charles Loring Brace, a young minister horrified by the street children of New York, founded the Children's Aid Society in 1853 to raise the funds, obtain the necessary legal permissions, and arrange the trips that would move thousands of street Arabs, as the children were called, to new homes in rural America, where the need for labor in the expanding farming communities was significant. Between 1854 and 1929, an estimated 200,000 orphaned, abandoned, and runaway children were placed aboard trains to find new lives in more than 48 states, the District of Columbia, and Indian Territory locations, although most by far were placed in the Midwest.

The placing out of children, as it was called, did not begin with Brace's program, and the Children's Aid Society was only one of several agencies that placed children on trains that took them to new foster homes. It was Brace's orphan trains, however, that captured the public imagination and sympathy. Experts christened this period of mass relocation of children the orphan train era and acknowledged the efforts of Brace and his agency as the precursor to the modern foster care system.

The Federal Role in Foster Care

The Social Security Act of 1935 authorized the first federal grants for child welfare services under what came to be known as Title IV-B. The grants were not large, but they were enough to encourage those states that did not have child welfare agencies to establish them and to develop programs to deliver the services. Foster care was one of the services. Statistics reveal that by 1950, the number of children in foster care was greater than the number in institutions. By 1960, the foster care number had doubled. The antipoverty program of the 1960s increased federal funding for foster care, and a dramatic increase in the number of children in out-of-home family placements followed.

Even after the Social Security Act of 1935, the federal role in the work of foster care agencies remained limited. That role began to expand in 1960 with what became known as the Louisiana incident, in which Louisiana removed 23,000 children from its welfare rolls because their mothers had borne children outside of marriage. Although Louisiana's expulsion of clients was not an isolated occurrence, it was the one that motivated the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (DHEW), which administered Aid to Dependent Children (ADC), to put in place a new rule that a state could not ignore its responsibility to children living in homes the state deemed to be unsuitable. DHEW required the state to either provide services to make the home suitable or to remove the child from the home to an appropriate placement while continuing to support the child financially. Amendments to the Social Security Act in 1961 made the new rule law, creating the foster care component of ADC, which provided federal matching funds for foster care payments made on behalf of children who were removed from unsuitable homes if the children would have received ADC funds had they remained in their homes. In 1962, ADC changed to Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC). In 1967, Congress again amended the Social Security Act and, among other changes, made Aid to Families with Dependent Children–Foster Care mandatory for all states. Foster care soon became the main form of assistance provided to poor children in the United States who could not remain in their own homes because of neglect or abuse.

With increased federal funding came increased federal laws and regulations that governed the decisions foster care agencies were required to make. In 1978, the Indian Child Welfare Act recognized that tribal courts have jurisdiction in child welfare issues involving Native Americans and that placement with relatives should have preference. The Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980 required reasonable efforts to be made to prevent placement in foster care; the statute also required case and permanency planning for all children and youths in foster care and established time limits on reunification and adoption subsidies. Other laws required opportunities to be created for young people in foster care to prepare for independent living; forbade making foster care and adoption placement decisions routinely on the basis of race, culture, and ethnicity; and mandated that the state initiate termination of parental rights when a child has been in state care for 15 of the previous 22 months (excepted in certain circumstances).

Successes and Failures in Foster Care

Despite a decline in the number of children in the foster care population since 2002 and the improvements of increased adoptions, funded legal guardianships, and greater attention to the needs of young people aging out of the foster care system, progress made by foster care agencies is inconsistent and limited by financial constraints. The quality of care varies not only from state to state but also within states and even cities, as large numbers of foster care agencies are involved. New York City alone has more than 40 foster care agencies. The statistics for children in foster care and for those who have been shaped by the system are dismal.

Foster care was intended as a temporary solution, but children in foster care today have already spent an average of two years separated from their families without a permanent solution. More than one in 10 children will experience five or more placements during their time in foster care, with overwhelming evidence that such a lack of stability puts children at high risk for reactive attachment disorder, which leads to a lifetime of disrupted relationships. One in seven children (one in three teens) in foster care live in nonfamily settings, often not because of anything they have done or to meet their special needs, but simply because the system has failed to connect them with a family.

Children often enter the foster care system with chronic health, developmental, and psychiatric disorders, reflecting the neglect and abuse they experienced in addition to the trauma of being separated from their families. However, the U.S. General Accounting Office found that many foster children fail to receive adequate preventive health care and have significant problems that are not diagnosed and treated while they are in foster care. Nearly 40 percent will wait longer than three years, even though studies find many families willing to adopt.

Disparities plague the system. African American children, who made up more than one-third of the foster care population in 2002, had declined to slightly over one-fourth by 2012. Nevertheless, the rate of African American children in foster care is twice the percentage of African American children in the general population in the United States. African American and Native American children are more likely than other groups to suffer disparity within the foster care system. Not only are they more likely to be reported, investigated, substantiated, and placed in foster care, but they are also less likely to receive comprehensive services, and are less likely to reunify with their families than white children. Latino children in the foster care system increased from 17 to 21 percent between 2002 and 2012. The highest increase was among children belonging to two or more races. Although numerically small (only 6 percent), this group doubled in percentage between 2002 and 2012.

Latino immigrant children are underrepresented in the foster care population, but the problems confronting those who do enter the system are magnified. These children may not speak English, they are likely to have different cultural backgrounds from child welfare workers and often from foster families, and they may lack relative networks. They are more often placed in group homes and institutions than children from other ethnicities.

Research has consistently shown a higher percentage of males in foster care. In 2011, 52 percent of the children in foster care were male, and 48 percent were female. Despite their smaller numbers, girls, many of whom have histories of sexual abuse and numerous parental transitions, are more likely than boys to be at risk for such problems as health-risking sexual behaviors (HRSB), involvement in the juvenile justice system, substance use, failed placements/foster care drift, homelessness, and serious educational problems as they enter adolescence. But adolescent girls are less likely to receive specialty mental health or school-based services than are their male counterparts. A major study in 2010 revealed that most former foster children struggle with limited success to live productive, satisfying lives as adults. By age 23 or 24, fewer than half of the former foster care youths in the study were working. Close to a quarter had no high school diploma or equivalency degree, and only 6 percent had completed a two- or four-year postsecondary degree. Nearly 60 percent of males had been convicted of a crime, and 77 percent of females had been pregnant. Problems with recruiting, maintaining, and training a qualified workforce and foster parents plague agencies at every level. Children are removed from their homes with insufficient cause, and this happens disproportionately with children of color.

At the other extreme, other children are left in unsafe homes, as headlines detail the examples of children who die of abuse and neglect. The percentage of children who return home within 30 days of being removed from their homes varies across the states, from 11 to 48 percent.

Wylene Rholetter
Auburn University

See Also: Abuse and Neglect; Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System; Aid to Families with Dependent Children, Historical Role of.

Further Readings

Bartholet, Elizabeth. Nobody's Children: Abuse and Neglect, Foster Drift, and the Adoption Alternative. Boston: Beacon Press, 1999.

Curtis, Patrick A., Grady Dale, and Joshua C. Kendall. The Foster Care Crisis. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

Holt, Marilyn. The Orphan Trains: Placing Out in America. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992.

"When Child Welfare Works: A Working Paper." The Annie E. Casey Foundation. October 23, 2013. http://www.aecf.org/~/media/Pubs/Topics/Child%20Welfare%20Permanence/Permanence/WhenChildWelfareWorks/WhenChildWelfareWorksWorkingPaper.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008

The Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act was passed with strong bipartisan support and became federal law in fall 2008. The act was largely considered to include some of the most significant federal reforms to the child welfare system since the passage of the Adoption and Safe Families Act in 1997. This legislation was passed with the intent to keep at-risk children out of the foster care system, provide support to relative caregivers, and increase adoptions. Furthermore, the act has a number of provisions aimed at improving the overall care of both children in the foster care system and youth aging out of foster care. Due in large part to the fact that racial and sexual minority youth are disproportionately overrepresented in the foster care system, this law has widespread implications for diversity and human services.

The Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act addressed six different areas, many of which have plagued the federal child welfare system for decades: (1) incentives and assistance for adoption, (2) improved educational stability and opportunities, (3) coordinated health services, (4) support for relative caregivers and family connections, (5) support for older youth and youth aging out of foster care, and (6) tribal foster care and adoption.

According to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, at the time of the passage of the Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act, more than 100,000 youth in foster care were awaiting an adoptive family. The act included a number of provisions aimed at ensuring that states have the resources necessary to support adoptive families. Among the most notable of the adoption provisions included efforts to unlink eligibility for federal adoption assistance support from the child's birth family's eligibility for welfare services. Prior to the passage of this law, just under half of foster children were ineligible for federal IV-E adoption assistance due to the fact that their birth parents' income exceeded the eligibility level. New eligibility requirements in this legislation ensure that children awaiting an adoptive family will be eligible for federal adoption support regardless of their birth parents' income. This provision addresses the long-standing concerns of linking a child's eligibility to his or her birth family when parental rights have already been terminated.

In an attempt to reduce the number of older children and children with special needs awaiting adoption, the act reauthorized the Adoption Incentive Program, significantly increasing the amount of adoption incentive bonuses available to states. Shortly after the program's reauthorization, states' adoption incentive earnings rose significantly, from $7.3 million in 2006 to more than $40 million in 2010.

Improved Educational Stability and Opportunities

For decades, research on the educational experiences of foster youth has highlighted a number of areas in which these youth are at an increased risk educationally. These areas include academic achievement, drop rates, and higher rates of grade retention. In fact, only about half of youth in the foster care system complete high school and less than 10 percent attend college. A goal of the Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act is to address a number of the issues that have historically been identified as barriers to the educational success of youth in foster care. One educational challenge for many youth in foster care is mobility. Frequent placement changes, school changes, and considerable amounts of time out of the classroom often result in youth repeating courses—in many cases even grades. The most significant educational provision in the act requires that all school-age children be enrolled full time. Furthermore, the law is clear in that it is the intent of these provisions to keep children in their school of origin whenever it is in their best interests.

Coordinated Health Services

Each year nearly half (48 percent) of youth entering the foster care system have some form of chronic heath problem. Similarly, Healthy Foster Care America reports that many foster youth have a history of prenatal substance exposure and/or premature birth. In addition, studies suggest that the use of mental health services by youth in foster care can be up to 10 times greater than that of other at-risk youth populations. The State Health Oversight and Coordination Plan that is required in the Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act was developed with the intention of improving coordination between child welfare agencies and Medicaid agencies in developing a plan of health care and oversight for foster youth. Each plan must include a schedule for physical health, mental health, and dental screening. Furthermore, the plan must provide detailed steps necessary to maintain the continuity of health care services, including oversight of prescription medications, most of which are psychotropic medications.

Support for Kinship Care and Family Connections

In recent years, the number of kinship families or relative caregivers has increased significantly. Research suggests that these kinship caregivers often have less training and resources than nonkinship caregivers. Studies on kinship caregivers have also brought to light a number of the burdens and challenges that often accompany caring for a relative child. The kinship provisions in the current act establish a strong federal preference for relative care. Among the most notable of the provisions includes a requirement that state agencies make due diligence to provide notice to adult relatives when a child is removed from a family home. To address long-standing concerns about the resources available to kinship care providers, provisions were created to offer federal support to states that offer subsidized guardianship payments to relative caregivers.

The issue of placing siblings together has come to the forefront of child welfare practice and policy in recent years. Forty-four percent of youth placed in foster care are separated from at least one sibling. Many child welfare professionals have advocated for federal intervention to assist in reducing the number of sibling separations. The Fostering Connections and Increasing Adoptions Act is the first federal law to address this issue. The act requires reasonable efforts on the part of the state to place siblings together when it is in the children's best interests. In addition, the act includes provisions requiring frequent visitation for youth who are separated from their siblings.

Support for Older Youth and Youth Aging Out of Care

Recent studies of foster care alumni have shed some light on how youth and young adults fare after foster care. The Casey National Foster Care Alumni Study found that emancipated youth often experience negative outcomes in the areas of education, physical health, mental health, housing, and employment. Fortunately, research suggests that remaining in care beyond the 18th birthday is largely associated with more positive outcomes for youth who have aged out of foster care. The current act continues a number of provisions that provide support for youth to remain in care to assist in their education, employment, and family connections. The act also calls for a personalized transition plan for all youth 90 days prior to their leaving the foster care system that addresses the areas of housing, employment, mentoring, continued support, and insurance.

Tribal Foster Care and Adoption

At the time of the passage of The Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act more than half of all federally recognized tribes did not have an agreement with states to administer their own foster and adoption programs. Under the current act, tribes are eligible to receive access to Title IV-E funds for foster care, kinship care, and independent living.

Adam McCormick
University of Texas at El Paso

See Also: Administration of Children, Youth, and Families; Adoption and Safe Families Act; Child Welfare Services; Indian Child Welfare Act; John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program.

Further Readings

Bramlett, M. D., L. F. Radel, and S. J. Blumberg. "The Health and Well Being of Adopted Children." Pediatrics, v.119 (2007).

"Guidance on Fostering and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008." Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, 2008. ACYF-CB-PI-11-09.

Pecora, P., , et al. "Educational and Employment Outcomes of Adults Formerly Placed in Foster Care: Results from the Northwest Foster Care Alumni Study." Children and Youth Services Review, v.28/12 (2006).

Fundamentalist Christian Americans

Fundamentalist Christians believe in one universal truth and adhere to a literal interpretation of scripture. Fundamentalists represent a distinct culture of clients with their own set of therapeutic needs. Fundamentalists face barriers to seeking mental health services, from a lack of trust in mental health professionals to the belief that all answers lie within scripture. Fundamentalist Christians may believe that mental health professionals will not respect their religious beliefs. Recommendations for providing mental health services to fundamentalist Christians include being culturally sensitive and ensuring the helping relationship is egalitarian. In addition, many persons in this population may feel more comfortable with a mental health professional who adheres to Christian beliefs and practices or a specialty form of counseling such as pastoral or Christian counseling.

Who are Fundamentalist Christians?

Fundamentalists believe there is one set of religious teachings containing a universal truth about humanity and deity and that this truth must be followed exactly according to past practices. Those who do so have a special relationship with their deity. They contend that this fundamental truth is opposed by forces of evil that must be fought vigorously. Thus, fundamentalist Christians have separate and distinct lives from nonbelievers. Fundamentalist Christians (also called conservative Christians) believe in the inerrancy of scripture, evangelism, and the literal interpretation of the Bible. They also believe in the deity and virgin birth of Jesus Christ, Christ's death as a substitution for humanity's sins, Christ's literal resurrection from the dead, and the destruction of the world and the literal return of Christ.

Fundamentalist Christians as a Culture

Culture has been defined as having a set of shared worldviews and adaptive behaviors as a result of simultaneous membership in various contexts (i.e., religious background, minority status, political leanings, or values derived from partaking of single historical moments or particular ideologies). Thus, fundamentalist Christians are considered a distinct culture because of their similar beliefs, similar behaviors, similar religious backgrounds, and similar political leanings. Fundamentalist Christians are not a homogenous group, and individuals may not share all of these beliefs. This group represents a culture unique from other groups of Christians (e.g., evangelical Christians) because of their lifestyles and scriptural interpretation. Fundamentalist Christians traditionally shun attending movies, use of alcohol and tobacco, and listening to secular music, and they don conservative clothing and hairstyles.

Barriers to Seeking Mental Health Services

Because of their beliefs, fundamentalist Christians face several barriers to seeking mental health services. One barrier is the belief that all issues of the soul and emotions are resolvable through spirituality, usually through the church. Spiritual bypass occurs when one tries to heal psychological wounds only at the spiritual level while avoiding important work at other levels including cognitive, physical, emotional, and interpersonal. Fundamentalist Christians may seek assistance from their spiritual leader to deal with psychological illness rather than seeking assistance from a mental health professional. Other barriers include the beliefs that (1) focusing on the self is selfishness and is a sin, (2) Christianity is the only true and necessary way to God and salvation, (3) the Bible has all the answers to problems and is the only source for answers Christians need, (4) feelings of joy and peace are the only acceptable emotions, and (5) social issues, such as divorce, same-sex attraction, and abortion, are evil and Christians should not participate in them.

Fundamentalist Christians are considered a distinct culture because of their similar beliefs, similar behaviors, similar religious backgrounds, and similar political leanings.

Human services professionals providing mental health services to fundamentalist families and children face an added set of barriers: (1) a strong "we-they" mentality that involves members seeking help only from the "right" church, (2) a reliance on faith leading to a passive approach to life in general, (3) an insistence on forgiveness that may prolong adjustment and other difficulties because the work ends when the person is perceived to be genuinely sorry, (4) the dominance of men over women, which could complicate the helping relationship if only the mother is available, and (5) a strong prohibition against divorce and remarriage.

Fundamentalist Christian Perceptions of Mental Health Professionals

As previously stated, fundamentalist Christians may distrust mental health professionals and have negative anticipations with regard to engaging in mental health services with secular professionals. Fundamentalists may fear that professionals will ignore their spiritual concerns. Fundamentalist Christians also may fear that mental health professionals will not understand some of their religious beliefs and concerns, and might assume that they share the same standards as many secular clients. Further, fundamentalist Christians may fear that mental health professionals will recommend behaviors or solutions that are immoral or may doubt the usefulness of what is learned through prayer and Bible study.

Recommendations for Providing Mental Health Services to Fundamentalist Christians

Mental health professionals have to exhibit cultural sensitivity, which includes having open conversations determining the role of faith in the lives of fundamentalist Christians. Mental health professionals must differentiate among behaviors that are universal to fundamentalist Christians, those that are transcultural, those that are cultural, and those that are idiosyncratic. Mental health professionals should be able to discriminate between situations where culture has clinical relevance and those where culture is tangential.

Professionals should attain a culturally relativistic framework with regard to assessment and intervention and recognize their own cultural concepts and behaviors that may result in ethnocentric biases. They need to avoid the use of all stereotypes and be aware of any preconceived notions about fundamentalist Christians. Professionals need to be willing to ask questions to increase their understanding of fundamentalist Christians, make the helping relationship collaborative and egalitarian, and give the client's faith full voice in the helping process.

When working with all families and children, mental health professionals should exhibit true transparency. Fundamentalist students or families value honesty and despise deceit or manipulation. Trust could be established if the professionals are up-front regarding their values. Professionals should validate the family's religious experience and its perspective on life. Professionals should recognize that fundamentalists may expect to be ridiculed and challenged because of their religion and that they do not believe that a professional with differing religious values could be of assistance. The validation has to be genuine. Mental health professionals have to be open to honest inquiry with families with regard to thoughts, feelings, and meanings. The helping relationship has to be egalitarian because fundamentalists may be suspicious of nonchurch authority figures. Mental health professionals should not challenge the family's religious authority figure and should make allies with the parents rather than adversaries. Mental health professionals in this setting should recognize that the fundamentalist family may limit access to information divergent from their church. Importantly, professionals could also consider referral if they believe they are not equipped to work with fundamentalist families.

Many Christians prefer to work with mental health professionals who are Christians and practice utilizing a Christian rather than a secular orientation. Fundamentalist Christians may believe that a professional who is Christian will understand their belief system and accept them as individuals. As a result, Christian counseling has emerged as a counseling specialty. Christian counseling has origins in the founding of the Association for Spiritual, Ethical, and Religious Values Issues in Counseling, a division of the American Counseling Association. Christian counseling is a relatively new field and needs more empirical research.

David Julius Ford, Jr.
Kaprea F. Johnson
Old Dominion University

See Also: Mental Health Services, Adult; Religion and Clients; Spirituality/Religion and Diversity.

Further Readings

Carter, R. B. "Christian Counseling: An Emerging Specialty." Counseling and Values, 43/3 (1999).

Cashwell, C. S., P. B. Bentley, and J. P. Yarborough. "The Only Way Out Is Through: The Peril of Spiritual Bypass." Counseling and Values, 51/2 (2007).

Eriksen, K., G. Marston, and T. Korte. "Working With God: Managing Conservative Christian Beliefs That May Interfere With Counseling." Counseling and Values, 47/1 (2002).

Falicov, C. J. "Learning to Think Culturally." In Handbook of Family Therapy Training and Supervision, H. A. Liddle, et al., eds. New York: Guilford, 1998.

G

Gambling Addiction

Compulsive gambling is the only behavioral addiction included in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5) of the American Psychiatric Association. About 2 million Americans, twice as many men as women, meet the criteria for gambling addiction. Blacks and Native Americans have a higher rate of disordered gambling than whites, but gambling patterns do not differ among the races. Addictive disorders are chronic, multifaceted disorders, with physical, social, emotional, and behavioral components. Comprehensive services for the treatment of gambling addiction provide intervention, treatment, and recovery support for compulsive gamblers and their families. All addictions have a high impact on the social system in which they operate; therefore, services for gambling addiction include public awareness and support for treatment providers.

Service Providers

The National Council on Problem Gambling (NCPG) is a tax-exempt organization that offers information about gambling and gambling services and regulates the certification of gambling counselors. Many state lotteries fund gambling addiction intervention and treatment, operating 24-hour help lines, distributing materials for public awareness, and training professionals who treat gambling addiction.

Because gambling addiction is a DSM-5 diagnosis, it is within the scope of practice of psychiatrists, psychologists, counselors, and social workers to treat gambling addicts. Gambling addiction counselors can be certified at two levels. Level I certification requires a bachelor's degree or equivalent; a passing score on the Certification Examination for Gambling Counselors; 30 hours of gambling-specific training; 2,000 hours of clinical experience; and signed statements from two coworkers, a site supervisor, and an NCPG board approved clinical consultant (BACC). Level II certification has the same education and test requirements as Level I plus 60 hours of gambling-specific training; 100 hours of clinical experience; and signed statements from two coworkers, a site supervisor, and an NCPG BACC. BACCs must have Level II certification, a graduate degree, and expertise as evidenced by research, publication, or clinical work.

Gambling addiction treatment takes place at community mental health centers, substance abuse treatment centers, or private residential treatment centers. Comprehensive treatment programs include individual counseling, couples and family therapy, group therapy, and financial management counseling.

Continuum of Gambling Addiction Services

Intervention is a concerted effort by family and friends to convince an addict to enter treatment.

A counselor prepares the participants by instructing them to write a letter to the addict explaining how they have been affected by the gambler's addiction and urging them to go into treatment. The counselor leads the intervention, in which the letters are read to the gambling addict, often followed by an ultimatum to get treatment or face a severed relationship. The interventionist arranges for the addict to go directly from the intervention to treatment if the intervention is successful. This entails assuring that the treatment center has an available bed, confirming insurance coverage or private payment, arranging transportation, and having a packed suitcase ready.

When addicts enter facilities, they are assessed for their gambling addiction, personal background, medical conditions, emotional status, and co-occurring disorders. Based upon the results of the assessment and the available resources, the assessment counselor determines the level of care necessary to achieve the treatment goals. Outpatient treatment allows patients to return to their homes and often to continue to work. Inpatient treatment is 24-hour care with intensive therapy and support. Residential treatment is less intensive than inpatient care and extends the length of treatment. Further residential support may occur in a halfway house after treatment. Treatment facilities provide or arrange aftercare to support recovery. Twelve-step recovery programs and ongoing financial counseling generally extend far beyond treatment and aftercare.

Addressing the Issues

The overarching physical condition with gambling addiction is associated with brain activity that occurs during gambling, which is similar to the brain activity of drug addicts. Serotonin, epinephrine, and dopamine are neurotransmitters associated with pathological gambling. During gambling, the brain produces dopamine, which is associated with pleasure. The threshold in the pleasure center of the brain is raised, and when the gambling stops, cravings ensue. Effective treatment provides education to addicts about their physical cravings, supports addicts through the cravings, and teaches methods to reduce cravings.

Social consequences of gambling are far-reaching. Gamblers may have betrayed their partners; put their families in financial peril; lied to get money; stolen from friends, family, and employers; and incurred unmanageable debts to loan and credit card companies. Effective services provide couple counseling and family counseling to assist in the repair of relationships that will ultimately support the recovering gambler. Financial counseling assists addicts and their families in determining how much debt has been incurred and making a budget. Financial recovery often requires the involvement of consumer credit counseling to contact lenders and credit card companies and manage payments. As a diagnosable emotional disorder, compulsive gambling may be regarded as covered under the Americans with Disabilities Act, requiring employers to retain employees if they are seeking treatment. Legal consequences might also be deferred contingent upon treatment efforts.

The emotional component of gambling addiction requires extensive attention. Many gamblers are the offspring of alcoholics and addicts, and thus may themselves have co-occurring addictions to alcohol or drugs. Addictions often interact to maintain their rhythm of satiation and deprivation, increasing the potential for another addiction to emerge when the gambling subsides. Gambling addiction may also co-occur with depression, bipolar disorder, and anxiety disorders, any of which might exacerbate when the gambling behavior stops. Low serotonin levels are associated with depression, and gamblers in early recovery should be monitored for severe depression. Because of the overwhelming losses of money, relationships, and dignity, gamblers are at high risk for suicide. Trauma-informed treatment is a new standard for all addiction services. The gambling addict in early recovery should also be assessed for post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) from childhood physical or sexual abuse or violent encounters while in the throes of addiction. The onset or increase of PTSD symptoms may occur when the addictive behavior is deterred.

Effective treatment services focus extensively on the behavioral aspects of gambling. Especially in early recovery, gamblers are vulnerable to cravings triggered by people, places, events, and emotions. Many gamblers have rituals associated with payday. Early in recovery, behavioral interventions might include enlisting the help of another to manage money and requesting that paychecks be directly deposited to bank accounts. Some gambling events occur at specific times and days. A gambling addict with a co-occurring anxiety disorder may have reduced anxiety through gambling. Behavioral interventions, such as relaxation training, hypnotherapy, and balanced breathing, are effective in anxiety reduction. If gambling has mediated depression, exercise is an effective intervention that raises levels of serotonin. Positive affirmations and social engagement may help recovering gambling addicts manage their emotional responses. Attending Gamblers Anonymous (GA) meetings during trigger times can provide a distraction as well as emotional support for changing the behavior. Gamblers Anonymous is a 12-step program based on the model used in Alcoholics Anonymous, which is replete with behavioral strategies for recovery and personal growth.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Beacon College

See Also: Family Crisis Intervention Planning; Peer Support and Counseling Services; Twelve-Step Programs.

Further Readings

Custer, Robert and Harry Milt. When Luck Runs Out: Help for Compulsive Gamblers and Their Families. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2012.

Davis, Diane Rae. Taking Back Your Life: Women and Problem Gambling. Center City, MN: Hazelden Addiction Treatment Center, 2009.

Schull, Natasha Dow. Taking Back Your Life: Women and Problem Gambling. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2012.

Gangs: Social Issues and Intervention

The term gang has been in existence for at least several hundred years, as evidenced by the writings of Geoffrey Chaucer in the 14th century and the 16th century penning of William Shakespeare. Named gangs were present in England as far back as the 17th century. The history, emergence, and subsequent development of gangs in the United States also extends back for centuries. Unfortunately, no available written studies provide information on the details related to these gangs. Many people believe that the early birth of gangs in the United States is directly connected to mass immigration, rapid industrialization after the Civil War, and the unbridled urbanization in northeastern and midwestern cities.

People in the United States became familiar with gangs through the onset of ethnic gangs in general and most notably the Italian Mafia in particular. Italian organized crime rose to national prominence during the late 1800s and early 1900s. Infamous gang members and iconic mobsters such as Scar Face Al Capone, Machine Gun Kelly, and Lucky Luciano became household names familiar to the majority of the U.S. population (adults and children alike) during the early 1900s and remain known to many today. In fact, with the help of modern media, young and old gang members today memorialize, worship, and hold these gangsters from the past as heroes and superheroes of the highest esteem. The movie Gangs of New York is a fictional historical drama immortalizing the activities of gangs that ruled New York around the turn of the 20th century.

Despite the fact that gang violence has existed for centuries across the United States, gangs have grown and advanced into the new millennium of the 2000s. Gang members and their families moved around and established gangs in their new neighborhoods and communities. The impact of waves of population migration on the emergence and growth of gangs is reflected in the presence of gangs in new urban and rural communities. Gang members migrated to other locations as the general population moved across the United States seeking the American dream of opportunity and success in business and employment. Traditionally, gangs were located, operated, and flourished in large, urban metropolitan areas.

Gangs and Diversity

Modern media, especially television, continues to present the stereotypical image of gang members as minority males. It is a common misconception that gang members are primarily inner-city, urban African American or Hispanic males. This narrow mythological conceptualization of gangs fosters the development of a simple, yet untrue, generalization about gangs, which in reality are much more complicated and complex. Diversity-competent human services providers understand that gangs comprise a diverse set of individuals not limited to the racial, ethnic, and gender characteristics of African American or Hispanic males. In addition to all-male gangs are female, lesbian, bisexual, gay, and transgender gangs.

Another misconception about gangs is that members are all poor. Gangs have never been exclusively confined to the poor. Gangs cut across the socioeconomic status of the United States, as middle- and upper-class individuals form gangs.

Furthermore, diversity-competent human services professionals recognize that diversity in the geographical settings in which gangs operate plays a significant role in understanding the social issues related to gangs. In the United States, gangs in urban settings have been born out of a completely different set of circumstances and impacted by conditions vastly dissimilar from gangs in small towns and villages. As a direct result, gangs formed in different community settings will often have differing reasons for their existence and sustainability. Diversity in gangs requires human services professionals to take into consideration the many similarities and differences in gangs and among their members.

Defining gangs can be tricky. Some groups that define themselves as gangs include motorcycle gangs and skinheads. Street gangs are typically defined by their geographic territory or streets over which they maintain dominance and control. Each gang has a predesignated, predetermined area that has been won with the hard-fought blood of its members and leadership. In order to maintain control of the streets or to protect their territory, it is often necessary for gangs to kill or be killed. Thus, a great deal of the violence that occurs in the streets is associated with the activities of street gangs. Additionally, nowadays much of the gang operations are conducted in the streets. These facts give new importance and significance to the term street gang.

Social Issues of Gangs

In general, social issues of gangs can be defined as those related to gang activities that negatively impact large numbers of a society or a group in a destructive way. These matters are considered to be problems or serious concerns because they are considered dangerous, life-threatening, harmful, perilous, and often contrary to the moral values, life promotion, life protection, or safety of the larger population or individuals in the society. It should be noted that social issues and social problems are often used synonymously to represent the same concept. Social issues of gangs are subjective in that people's personal perceptions shape their development and construction of what they call a problem or an issue. One can hardly argue against gangs as a social issue.

The single most notable, provocative, inflammatory, and destructive activity of gangs is violence. Over the years, persistent and spreading gang violence has captured the attention of the public and subsequently raised the issue of gangs to the level of a social problem. All too often, gang or gang-related violence in the United States has persisted in being one of the most injurious and harmful acts facing society. Gang violence instills terror, promotes fear, and incites horror, especially when it strikes the family or close to home. Stubborn and gruesome gang violence in the streets and homes of victims and innocent bystanders remain the principal standard operating procedure for gangs.

Financial challenges and adversity often impact children in single-family, female-headed households, creating poverty. Likewise, inner-city urban ghettos, where underprivileged and impoverished minority youth often aimlessly drift without positive male role models, have been prime recruitment zones for gangs. Poverty as a social issue has been closely connected to gangs, as gang activities have prospered and grown in low-income and poverty-riddled neighborhoods. For many young residents of poverty-ravaged communities, gangs offer the only glimmer of hope for a life of prosperity, a way to make money, or an escape from the misery of poverty. The power and influence of older gang members that serve as negative role models, the media, low educational attainment, and the absence of positive male role models often render youth incapable of escaping the lure of gang recruitment efforts. Simply put, youth who crave role models can easily find them readily available in the gangs.

The distribution and sales of illegal drugs in the United States represent a prominent social issue inextricably tied in a network of mutuality with street gangs, motorcycle gangs, and prison gangs. Gangs are responsible at every level of creating, maintaining, and protecting the logistics channels that ensure the distribution of illegal drugs such as marijuana, cocaine, ecstasy, and heroine. Gangs process cocaine into so-called crack to increase and improve marketability on the streets. Gangs also produce PCP and methamphetamine. As a result of drug distribution and sales, gangs accumulate billions of dollars annually and wreak havoc in the lives of individuals, families, and communities.

Another social issue tied to gangs is the lack or absence of strong positive social and cultural opportunities for youth to develop positive identities and behaviors by participating in group, collective, or communal activities.

- Gangs help fill the social and cultural void and isolation created by poverty and the resulting lack of opportunities.
- Gangs offer youth and adults an entire cultural solution.
- Gangs provide an environment to love and be loved by their peers, the fellow gang members.
- Gangs offer opportunities from members and leaders to be protected and respected.
- Gangs offer rules and order.
- Gangs have laws that guide the behavior and clearly spell out the do's and don'ts for gang members to follow.
- Gangs provide members with a sense of order as members have rank and position of power and authority.
- Gangs offer a sense of direction and provide guidance from older, more experienced members serving as mentors to younger and less experienced members.
- Gangs provide members with a common history shared by all of the members.

As a part of the requirement for membership in the gang, members are required to memorize and internalize the gang's history. Furthermore, the cultural motif of the gang is filled with names, symbols, and colors. Even though law enforcement and researchers have learned a great deal about gangs, the significance and meaning of the names, colors, and symbols are sacred and secret. Above all, gangs offer a complete rite-of-passage experience for members, including isolation, education, guidance, testing, initiation, and ultimately membership. Gang members must live and die by the laws of the gang or suffer the consequences.

Gang Intervention

Law enforcement programs, initiatives, and strategies have been dominated by gang suppression efforts. The hallmark of gang intervention efforts utilizing the suppression approach rests upon the assumption (often proven false) that gang leaders, members, and their associates will respond appropriately to suppression by desisting in their criminal activities or learning from the error in their ways. Similarly, it is assumed that gang members will conduct either a profit-and-loss or a cost-benefit analysis and determine that their best move would be to withdraw or cease their criminal behavior, or that still others ensnarled by suppression programs will be removed from the field of action (the streets) and somehow learn from their errant ways. Suppression interventions give very little and often no credence to crime prevention or treatment efforts and consider these methods or approaches as outside of their professional capacity. Suppression initiatives are often closely tied to law-and-order political platforms with the goal of increasing the impacted communities' perception of safety through gang crime reduction.

Community-based gang intervention programs often take the form of prevention programs. These programs conduct community gang assessments and typically address the social conditions that promote and fuel gang involvement. Prevention programs attempt to stop or curtail youth from joining gangs. Recognizing the important relationship between drop-out rates and gang involvement, they attempt to improve student educational attainment levels; teach students interpersonal, problem-solving, and conflict resolution skills; and teach parents and teachers to recognize early youth who are difficult to manage, resistant, and disruptive.

Gang Intervention: Desistence or Extraction

Gang interventionsists in the form of counselors, faith-based ministers, case workers, mentors, teachers, social workers, and community activists who are often former or reformed gang members work in community settings targeting services to gang members. These professionals understand the factors that motivate gang members to abandon their gang membership and involvement. Finally, gang interventionists develop extraction plans, remove barriers, and communicate with gang leaders to gain permission and sanction for the member to leave the gang.

Jerry Watson
University of Mississippi

See Also: Community Corrections; Community-Based Services; Gangs in Schools; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Detention Centers; Juvenile Justice System;

Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention; Peer Pressure; Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners; Rites of Passage; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Atkin, S. Beth. Voices from the Streets: Young Gang Members Tell Their Stories. Boston: Little Brown, 1996.

Delaney, Tim. American Street Gangs. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 2006.

Huff, Clarence Ronald. Gangs in America. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2001.

Gangs in Schools

Gangs are defined as a group of adolescents and/or young adults who have sworn allegiance to each other, have selected a name or a label to represent their allegiance, and seek to enhance their status by engaging in criminal and violent activities. Myths about gangs concern where gangs are located and who is involved in gang activity. First, research on gangs is typically focused on individuals living in urban areas; however, gangs are found in suburban and rural contexts. At the core, gang activity is associated with poverty and social disorganization, factors that span beyond an urban context. Although once a problem exclusively in large inner-city schools, youth gangs have branched out to schools in suburban and rural areas. Gangs are indeed major concerns in urban, suburban, and rural schools. Second, researchers often thought gangs were a male-dominated activity. Over the past 20 years, however, women clearly have been involved in all aspects of gang life that span from informal auxiliary roles (e.g., sex objects) to formal membership (e.g., selling drugs).

Youth gangs frequently engage in violent acts, particularly when they have skirmishes with other youth gangs. Gang activities include bullying and threatening others, receiving and selling stolen goods, and other criminal activities with the purposes of strengthening their reputation and providing members with money and material goods. Although gang behaviors might vary from one community to another, some common gang identifiers include attire, hand signs, colors, and gang graffiti. Media coverage of criminal acts and violence committed by youth gangs on school property has heightened concerns about school violence.

Characteristics and Presence of Gang Problems in School

Gang activity in schools may in part be influenced by engagement in and access to social media. For example, an important aspect of gang activity is claiming territory and intimidating rival gangs. For many years, graffiti served as the so-called billboard of gang violence. However, as society becomes more technologically advanced, so too are gang-related activities.

Recent media reports have highlighted a new trend in which individuals who are perceived to be gang affiliated are using social media sites (e.g., Facebook, Twitter, YouTube) called “Internet banging,” with several key elements: (1) promoting gang affiliation and/or communicating interest in gang activity, (2) gaining notoriety by reporting participation in a violent act or communicating an impending threat, and (3) sharing information about rival gangs or networking with gang members across the country. This is particularly important, as spats that develop on social media sites have the potential to carry over into school and vice versa.

School-Based Prevention and Intervention Services

The percentage of students reporting gang activities in their schools rose from 21 percent in 2003 to 23 percent in 2007. Reports document higher levels of school violence despite a general decline in youth crime rates. Several high-profile cases, such as the Columbine shooting in 1999, have resulted in preventive and security responses. Most frequently, a school’s response to gang-related offenses is suspension or expulsion, which may seem to be necessary for serious violent offenses but is ineffective for other types of youth problems. Regrettably, once gangs have been established, programs designed to reduce gang involvement and gang-related activities have been ineffective and at times counterproductive. Likewise, relatively few rigorous evaluations have been conducted on gang prevention programs in school.

Nevertheless, prevention and intervention programs that involve all aspects of the school and those that facilitate the development of appropriate

For many years, graffiti served as the so-called billboard of gang violence. However, as society becomes more technologically advanced, so too are gang-related activities. Recent media reports have highlighted a new trend in which individuals who are perceived to be gang affiliated are using social media sites (e.g., Facebook, Twitter, YouTube).

behavior and healthy emotional adjustment of youth have demonstrated effectiveness.

Such programs include multicontextual services such as Striving Together to Achieve Rewarding Tomorrows (CASASTART), Gang Avoidance Initiative Now (GAIN), other tertiary programs that involve individual behavioral and skill-building strategies, and wraparound services that address multiple needs.

GAIN is a tertiary program for first-time in-school youth gang offenders and a viable alternative to suspension or expulsion. In response to a gang-related incident in Chicago in 1996 in which a former student shot a current student at a bus stop, GAIN was developed under the auspice of the Title IV Safe and Drug Free Schools and Communities Grant. The program comprises the following nine lessons:

1. Getting off to a good start
2. Second chances
3. Drugs, alcohol, and violence
4. Juvenile law and drugs
5. Juvenile law and bodily injury
6. Conflict resolution
7. Family and peers
8. Getting out
9. Developing a life plan

Youth who participate in the program also participate in a field trip to a rehabilitation hospital and an in-school presentation by correctional officers and prisoners from a correctional institution. These field trips and lessons help illuminate the consequences of gang-related behavior and activities. The GAIN curriculum also includes a team-teaching approach in which several adults, such as police officers, support service personnel, counselors, and former gang members, are involved in teaching the curriculum. Overall, the program has demonstrated effectiveness in improving outcomes for participants.

Suggestions for Prevention and Intervention Services

Conducting a comprehensive assessment of gang activities in and around the school is a necessary prerequisite to responding effectively to gangs. Assessment of gang activities needs to consider a number of factors, such as local demographics (e.g., communities), crime and law enforcement data, perceptions of students and school personnel, social media behavior, and available resources. It is also necessary for school personnel to create a systemic approach to reduction and prevention of gang involvement and membership. There is a critical need for administrators to create a diverse task force consisting of students, staff members, school administrators, law enforcement, and other agencies in order to develop action plans. Such action plans might include gang awareness, classroom management, dress-code policies, and provision of mentors. Prevention programs might also include providing at-risk youth with knowledge and skills to help them avoid gang involvement, implementing after-school activities that facilitate prosocial behavior and positive peer relations, and parental involvement in gang prevention plans.

A number of evidence-based school gang intervention programs for school-aged children (ages 6 to 17 years) include the following components:

- Building a comprehensive framework for integrating youth services programs that link juvenile justice systems with human services and other agencies (e.g., schools, child welfare services).
- Creating a cross-agency client referral and networking protocol.
- Targeting at-risk and serious youth offenders for resources, providing case management.
- Coordinating services for youth offenders and families.
- Offering mentoring services and gang conflict mediation.
- Providing close monitoring and supervision of youth gangs by various agencies.

Jun Sung Hong
Wayne State University
Desmond Upton Patton
University of Michigan

See Also: Community Corrections; Community-Based Services; Gangs: Social Issues and Intervention; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Detention Centers; Juvenile Justice System; Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention; Peer Pressure; Rites of Passage; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System

Further Readings

Arciaga, Michelle, W. Sakamoto, and E. F. Jones. "Responding to Gangs in the School Setting." National Gang Center Bulletin 5. Tallahassee, FL: National Gang Center, 2010.

Decker, S. H. and D. Gurry. "Gangs, Gang Homicides, and Gang Loyalty: Organized Crimes of Disorganized Criminals." Journal of Criminal Justice, v.30 (2002).

Dukes, R. L. and J. A. Stein. "Gender and Gang Membership: A Contrast of Rural and Urban Youth on Attitudes and Behavior." Youth in Society, v.34/4 (2003).

Gogolak, E. "Inside the Weird World of Tracking Gangs on Social Media." The Atlantic, 2012. http://www.theatlanticcities.com/neighborhoods/2012/07/inside-weird-world-tracking-gangs-social-media/2734/ (Accessed December 2013).

Klein, M. W. "Attempting Gang Control by Suppression: The Misuse of Deterrence Principles." Studies on Crime and Crime Prevention, v.2 (1993).

Patton, D. U., R. D. Eschmann, and D. A. Butler. "Internet Banging: New Trends in Social Media, Gang Violence, Masculinity and Hip Hop." Computers in Human Behavior, v.29 (2013).

Struyk, R. "Gangs in Our Schools: Identifying Gang Indicators in Our School Population." Clearing House, v.80 (2006).

Thompkins, D. E. "School Violence: Gangs and a Culture of Fear. ANNALS of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, v.567 (2000).

Gender and Clients

Women's welfare and health issues have significantly gained in international visibility and political commitment in recent decades. Across a range of services from education to health, the majority of clients as well as providers are women. The majority of concerns that women bring to welfare counselors and workers are connected to their relationships with men. Gender-aware, gender-sensitive, or gender-responsive practices, for instance in such areas as reproductive and sexual health, family planning, violence protection, postabortion care, and safe motherhood, will require a dual focus of male and female client groups. More specifically, they will have to take note of constructions of femininity and masculinity, as these inform a range of client, provider, and hence client-provider factors. Moreover, such constructions cannot be productively studied in isolation of those of economic privilege, race, ethnicity, sexuality, and generationality. Gender-aware practices are key, too, to broader transformational objectives proposed at the many intersections of feminism, critical studies on men and masculinities, critical social work, and multiculturalism.

Gendering Clienthood

Since the 1960s, gender has become integral to the conceptualization and study of welfare distribution and social work (the bibliography of F. Ellen Netting's Women and Macro Social Work Practice provides an impression). As Mary Daly recently discussed, neither gender nor welfare is a unitary and unproblematic notion. They are certainly related in complex ways. A recent cross-national European study finds that public attitudes toward gender issues are largely consistent with welfare regimes (e.g., southern European, liberal, continental, and social democratic) and reveal a clear direction of moving away from traditional views of gender, family, and work issues in economic hard times. The subject of gender is fundamental to the human services field in a number of ways.

First, gender informs the basic demographic makeup of the client base, found to be impacting on access to service, service needs, and service pathways, as well as client engagement, response, and satisfaction—all used in determining intervention options such as client-worker matching. Specific client groups face gender-based or strongly gendered needs, with obvious areas including fertility counseling and assisted reproduction, abortion care, pre- and postnatal counseling, first time and teenage motherhood, intimate partner and gender-based violence, sex work and human trafficking, and eating disorders (including body image). Client gender may form an integral or central part of presented problems. The latter is true for gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transsexual (GLBT), as well as intersex, questioning, and asexual client groups.

Second and equally important, assumptions and constructions of gender and gender difference color client-worker relations in many, often imperceptible, ways. Related issues ranging from gender-biased language, pay gaps, stereotypes, and glass ceilings to sexism and sexual harassment in social and care work have been duly highlighted since the 1960s. Gender, cultural, and individual differences in underlying assumptions are well documented, and their ascertainment and tackling in practice situations is often a precondition for successful interventions.

Third, theories of clienthood across the human services field have been historically influenced by the lay women's movement, feminist perspectives on social work, and gay and lesbian advocacy in ways that go well beyond these specific planes of interest. Engagements with feminist citizenship models identify a variety of objectives in mainstreaming gender in the human services delivery sectors. They prominently include recognition of women's diversity; bridging the public/private divide; addressing women's oppression; acknowledging women's agency; and facilitating women's active participation in social, political, and community life.

Including Women and Girls, Engaging Men and Boys

Providers of client-centered services notice how gender impacts on a variety of factors outside and inside facilities. Many women experience gender-related sociocultural, physical, and financial constraints on their ability to seek care. Family planning programs worldwide, for instance, face biocultural beliefs about female anatomy and physiology as much as logistical problems with traveling distance and cost. Within the walls of facilities, issues of privacy, confidentiality, office hours, and availability of gender-matched professionals may be of key importance to many female clients.

Female access is a top concern across health care services. According to Women's Health USA 2012 (http://www.mchb.hrsa.gov/whusa12/index.html), women were more likely than men to report having delayed care due to logistical barriers in the past year. Women were also slightly more likely than men to have forgone needed health care due to cost. Women's expenditures significantly exceeded men's only in the category of office-based medical services. The overall mean health care expense was greater for women due to the greater percentage of women incurring more expensive services.

Of specific note, gender matters across the age spectrum. Studies have found significant gender differences in sources of referral and factors contributing to referral and service utilization among children. For example, girls are more likely to be referred by child welfare workers for sexual abuse victimization and family problems, such as parental substance abuse and poor parenting skills. Boys are more likely to be referred by family court workers for mental health issues, including suicidal ideation and gestures, peer relations, behavioral problems, and delinquency.

Community organizations traditionally attuned to gender include women's hospitals, feminist health centers or women's health resource centers; rape crisis centers; LGBTQ community centers; and domestic violence shelters, transition, or safe houses. Gender is considered of key relevance to service effectiveness across the entire field of human services. For example, the number of women under criminal justice supervision in the United States has risen dramatically in recent decades. Researchers argue that this requires a gender-responsive approach, including comprehensive services taking into account the content and context of women's lives. This means not only their cultural backgrounds, but also the larger social issues of poverty, abuse, and race and gender inequalities, apart from individual factors that impact women in the criminal justice system.

Other areas where gender is becoming a cornerstone parameter for consideration include group work as a therapeutic modality, microfinance, women parolees, women's violence, women veterans, immigrants and refugees, substance abuse and rehabilitation, learning difficulties, genetic counseling for women with intellectual disabilities, career counseling, and (especially men's) health literacy. Gender-sensitive approaches to any of these subjects are needed and are frequently shown to be effective. For instance, data recently collected for the National Treatment Improvement Evaluation Study suggest that for substance abuse treatment services to women, a positive client–provider relationship is related directly to treatment duration and indirectly to reduced post-treatment drug use.

Notwithstanding the generally accepted necessity for gendered approaches, feminist theories of social work and human services have historically been diverse. Accordingly diverse are constructions of gender and clienthood. In a mid-2000s assessment, Vicky White found that among largely United Kingdom social workers, "feminist" principles are predominantly subsumed by larger anti-discriminatory and/or antioppressive frameworks for practice. Moreover, she points especially to the diversity of women's positions on working in and against managerialist contexts. Lena Dominelli also stresses the importance of the recognition of diversity and differences that exist among women as well as among men. Recent collections of essays on counseling psychology edited by Carolyn Zerbe Enns and Elizabeth Nutt Williams, and on mental health and education edited by Marie Miville, stress the rich interfacing of feminist and multicultural approaches to service provision. Differences among women provide challenges and opportunities. A recent two-volume anthology on the psychological health of women of color edited by Lillian Comas-Díaz and Beverly Greene, for instance, aligns challenges in working with lesbians of color, multiracial women, female immigrants of color, and women with disabilities, with the opportunities in working with midcareer women high achievers, leaders, mentors, athletes, and artists among women of color.

An increasingly mainstreamed focus has been securing male involvement in couples services, as well as developing specific models for working with men and understanding masculinities. Bob Pease and Peter Camilleri, prefacing an edited collection on the subject published in 2001, argue that neglecting to name men as men in social work and the human services limits the potential for challenging gender injustice. They call for a critical analysis of men in the human services. Published as of 2011, the Routledge Series on Counseling and Psychotherapy with Boys and Men already includes six specialized titles picking up on this.

Promoting and Standardizing Change

A large number of global, national, federal-level, community-level, and institute-level initiatives facilitate gender visibility and awareness in the human services landscape. In the United States, the following initiatives closely reflect developments within the health sciences in prioritizing sex and gender as a research and policy focus, especially since the early 1990s:

- The International Council on Women's Health Issues (ICOWHI, since 1983; www.icowhi.com) and the Global Alliance for Women's Health (GAWH, since 1994; www.gawh.org) specifically promote collaborations between public and private sectors to enhance women's access to basic health care services.
- The Office on Women's Health (OWH) is an interagency body within the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS). Rolled out from 1991 onward (www.womenshealth.gov), OWH collaborates with consumer groups, government agencies, nonprofit organizations, and associations of health care professionals, providing national leadership and coordination to improve the health of women and girls through policy, education, and model programs. OWH covers agencies including the Health Resources and Services Administration (HRSA), the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), and the Food and Drug Administration (FDA).
- The Maternal and Child Health Bureau (MCHB) of HRSA supports access to comprehensive women's health care to improve their health across the life course through the Title V Maternal and Child Health Serviceds Block Grant, Home Visitation, and Healthy Start programs.

Awareness of gender diversity is firmly established in social work as well. The U.S. National Association of Social Workers' (NASW) Code of Ethics, revised in 2008, repeatedly refers to "sex, sexual orientation, and gender identity or expression" when discussing cultural competence, intercollegial respect, discrimination, and social and political action. Similarly, the Educational Policy and Accreditation Standards (EPAS) of the Council on Social Work Education (CSWE) recognize gender and gender identity and expression as diversity dimensions for both the explicit and implicit curriculum. The Council on Sexual Orientation and Gender Expression (CSOGE), a council of the Commission for Diversity and Social and Economic Justice, was instituted to promote development of social work curriculum materials relevant to the experiences of individuals who are LGBTQ, or two-spirit (a person whose body simultaneously manifests both a masculine and a feminine spirit). A separate Council on the Role and Status of Women in Social Work Education oversees development of educational resources relevant to women's issues within social work education.

Beyond nondiscrimination policies, various practice guidelines, policy statements, service charters, "best practices" toolkits, and councils have been advanced in the context of specific gender-based client groups. In 2011, 21 guidelines for psychological practice with lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender clients (www.apa.org/pi/lgbt/resources/guidelines.aspx) were adopted by the American Psychological Association Council of Representatives, replacing an earlier set of guidelines from 2000. These guidelines comprehensively deal with issues from diversity and economic and workplace issues to training and use of research. The leading clinical guidelines for the care and treatment of people with gender identity disorder are provided by the World Professional Association for Transgender Health Standards of Care (www.wpath.org). Addressing both professionals and clients with their families, the 2011 68-page "Standards of Care" represent the seventh instalment since the original 1979 document. Although detailed, these standards of care are reported to be too narrow and proscriptive by some transgender clients.

Monitoring Outcome

Many international and national agencies actively monitor client-related gender outcomes. The HHS National Health Interview Survey includes a variety of parameters on health care needs including sex; in 2011 it was announced that it would ensure the collection of useful national data on minority groups, including for the first time LGBTQ populations. The Manual to Evaluate Quality of Care from a Gender Perspective, developed in 2000 by International Planned Parenthood Federation/Western Hemisphere, offers an evaluation and quality improvement tool, available in English and Spanish, describing how to conduct an assessment of quality of care from a gender perspective. It recommends observation of client reception and a client exit interview as two of six steps. This manual formed the basis of a system to certify the service delivery and management support of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) as gender-sensitive.

The Interagency Gender Working Group (IGWG), established in 1997, is a network comprising NGOs, the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), cooperating agencies, and the Bureau for Global Health of USAID. Among its tasks is to collect empirical data and identify best practices on gender issues and the interface with reproductive health/HIV care. International examples include the "Gender and Diversity Lens" developed for the Victorian Government Department of Human Services, Australia, and "Positive Women Monitoring Change," published by the International Community of Women Living with HIV/AIDS (ICW), both offering toolkits for monitoring and enhancing female access to care, treatment, and support. Internationally, a "Policy Scorecard for Gender Mainstreaming" has been applied to local and country-specific policies, revealing governments' commitments to women, and how well gender equity goals are embedded into policies and programs.

Diederik F. Janssen
Independent Scholar

See Also: Cisgender; Institute for Women's Policy Research; LGBTQ Clients; Transgender Individuals; Women Minorities.

Further Readings

Cohen, Marcia B. and Audrey Mullender. Gender and Groupwork. London: Routledge, 2003.

Comas-Díaz, Lillian and Beverly Greene, eds. Psychological Health of Women of Color: Intersections, Challenges, and Opportunities. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2013.

Daly, Mary. "Gender and Welfare." In Sage Handbook of Social Work, Mel Gray, James Midgley and Stephen A. Webb, eds. London: Sage, 2012.

Dominelli, Lena. Feminist Social Work Theory and Practice. New York: Palgrave, 2002.

Fawcett, Barbara, Brid Featherstone, Jan Fook, and Amy Rossiter, eds. Practice and Research in Social Work: Postmodern Feminist Perspectives. London: Routledge, 2000.

Featherstone, Brid, Mark Rivett, and Jonathan Scourfield. Working With Men in Health and Social Care. London: Sage, 2007.

Guo, Jing and Neill Gilbert. "Public Attitudes and Gender Policy Regimes: Coherence and Stability in Hard Times." Journal of Sociology and Social Welfare, v.39 (2012).

Kuhlmann, Ellen and Ellen Annandale. The Palgrave Handbook of Gender and Healthcare. Basingstoke, UK: Palgrave Macmillan, 2010.

Landrine, Hope and Nancy Felipe Russo, eds. Handbook of Diversity in Feminist Psychology. New York: Springer, 2010.

Miville, Marie L., ed. Multicultural Gender Roles: Applications for Mental Health and Education. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2013.

Morrow, Deana F. and Lori Messinger. Sexual Orientation and Gender Expression in Social Work Practice: Working with Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, and Transgender People. New York: Columbia University Press, 2006.

Netting, F. Ellen. Women and Macro Social Work Practice. In Oxford Bibliographies Online: Social Work, 2009. http://www.oxfordbibliographies.com/view/document/obo-9780195389678/obo-9780195389678-0101.xml (Accessed November 2013).

Pease, Bob and Peter Camilleri, eds. Working with Men in the Human Services. Crows Nest, Australia: Allen & Unwin, 2001.

Pringle, Keith. Men, Masculinities and Social Welfare. London: UCL Press, 1995.

Ringheim, Karin. "When the Client Is Male: Client-Provider Interaction, From a Gender Perspective." International Family Planning Perspectives, v.28 (2002).

Van Wormer, Katherine S. Working with Female Offenders: A Gender-Sensitive Approach. Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley & Sons, 2010.

Walsh, W. Bruce and Mary J. Heppner, eds. Handbook of Career Counseling for Women, 2nd ed. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum, 2006.

White, Vicky. The State of Feminist Social Work. Abingdon, UK: Routledge, 2006.

Zerbe Enns, Carolyn and Elizabeth Nutt Williams, eds. The Oxford Handbook of Feminist Counseling Psychology. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012.

Gender Issues and Roles in Developing Countries

Gender issues concern the relationship between men and women in society. Concerns about gender in the world center on the positions and roles played by women in both public and private spheres. Women in developing countries are objects of discrimination, oppression, abuse, exploitation, and inequality. The United Nations defined gender issues as issues affecting women simply because they are female. These issues concern fundamental human rights—the civil, political, social, and economic rights of women. Most of the developing countries have witnessed Westernization, modernization, and globalization, but gender affirmative action has not been instituted in these nations. The social gaps between women and men in terms of gender equality in different spheres of life are basically wide. The nature of discrimination, oppression, and domination faced by women in developing countries is different from that in developed nations. The conditions of women in developing countries are more daunting and precarious. Women in developing countries need adequate attention and support from government, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), human rights groups, and women's groups all over the world.

Women in Developing Countries

The global world can be divided into north and south poles, sometimes called the Global North and Global South. Developing countries are in the south pole of the globe (e.g., Pakistan, Iran, Afganistan, Mali, Nigeria, Ghana, Gabon, Indonesia, India, Malaysia, Chile, Venezuela, Brazil, Mexico, Cuba, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Tunisia, Algeria, Guatemala, Congo, and Burundi, among others). Gender issues in different countries of the developing world are the same because most gender issues are attached to culture, tradition, religion, custom, and other forms of patriarchal orientations, which subjugate women to the whims and caprices of men. Women have no voice in public or private affairs. The patriarchy orientation treats women as the property of men. Once a woman gets married to a man, she cannot seek divorce because the institution of marriage allows men to pay a bride price for women and dominate these women for the rest of their lives. Women in developing countries suffer untold social, economic, and political consequences of such male domination. They lack social supports such as care benefits, nursing mother benefits, unemployment benefits, stipends for women with domestic concerns, and other forms of allowance that could provide security and improve living conditions in developing countries. Lisa Anderson conducted an opinion poll on the countries in which it is most dangerous to be a woman, where women face dire consequences of discrimination and even death. Afghanistan tops the poll in terms of dangers to women, followed by Congo, which is plagued by rape as a weapon of war. In addition, Pakistan is blighted by acid attacks and so-called honor killings, India is cited for human trafficking and sexual slavery, and Somalia is seen as having a full gamut of risks.

History of the Gender Movement in Developing Countries

Women's groups have formed different organizations to address gender issues in the world. The gender movement has a long history, dating back to the 18th century in the United States. It started as feminist movements that later became women's movements. The idea of gender identity and division among women as the focus of the women's movements led to the emergence of the gender movement, which incorporates the relationships between men and women in society. Like their counterparts in the developed world, women in the developing world formed various movements and associations, such as KULU–Women and Development; the Caribbean Association for Feminist Research and Action (CAFRA); Development Alternatives with Women for a New Era (DAWN); the Thai Labour Campaign; the Centre of Concern, Gender and Economic Reforms in Africa; African Women's Economic Policy Network (AWEPON); Shirkat Gah in Pakistan; Tanzania Media Women's Association (TAMWA); National Council of Women's Societies (NCWS); International Federation of Women Lawyers (FIDA); and Fiji Women's Rights Network. All of these act to champion various issues affecting women in developing nations. Women's associations and organizations from developing countries participate in the Beijing women's conference and other conventions on women to discuss issues affecting women in general. Consequent to the Beijing declarations, the United Nations (UN) developed treaties and conventions, such as UN Security Council Resolution 1325, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), to protect women's interests across economic, social, and political spectrums.

Issues Affecting Gender in Developing Countries

Different issues affect women in developing countries in modern times. These issues include domestic violence, which is largely unreported to the authorities by the affected women because culture obliges a woman to endure the situation in her husband's home. Rape of young girls, underage girls, and women is also common. Women cannot report cases of rape to the authorities because of the stigma associated with reporting in developing countries. Some countries do not include punishment for rape offenders in the constitution because women's issues are invisible and misrecognized.

Patriarchy is the rule in developing countries; women have no say in social, economic, and political space. Gender equality is an abomination in developing countries because of culture and tradition, which disallow women to participate with men on an equal basis. In some developing countries, girls' education is worrisome, so girls are forbidden from attending a formal school. Some girls are subjected to early marriage and sexual abuse.

Genital mutilation is another issue in developing countries that requires global intervention. Trafficking of women is rampant because of the high level of poverty. Women are trafficking for sex exploitation in Europe and North America. Women's economic empowerment is also an issue of concern in developing countries. Women face economic discrimination, they have no access to land, and they have no capital to establish a cottage industry. Women's participation is not welcome in developing countries; men dominate both elective and appointed positions. The affirmative action approved by the United Nations to ensure gender equality in political positions is merely rhetorical in developing countries.

Gender Roles in Developing Countries

There is no significant change in gender roles in the 21st-century developing world, despite the fact that many of the developing countries approved and domesticated various UN treaties and conventions on gender equality and empowerment in both the private and public sectors. Women in developing countries are still confined to private life. Women are faced with performing unpaid household chores and provision of care services for their children and husbands. Women's economy is an appendix of their husbands' work. They work on their husbands' farms or cottage industries, and the proceeds are garnered by the men, who may use them to marry additional wives. Women are forbidden to participate in politics or engage in public paid work in some developing countries.

Gender and Social Services

To promote gender equality in developing countries, mass educational opportunities for girls is very important. Women in developing countries also need credit facilities to create cottage industries and become economically independent. Women's entrepreneurship, vocational training, and access to land could reduce poverty among women in developing countries, Social supports, such as care benefits, nursing mother benefits, unemployment benefits, stipends for women with domestic concerns, and other forms of allowance could provide security for women and improve their ways of life.

Olakunle Folami
University of Ulster

See Also: Family Violence Prevention and Services; Interpersonal Violence; Women, Battered.

Further Readings

Barkai, Moran. "Addressing Gender Issues in Developing Countries." European Journalism Centre, v.22 (2011).

"The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women." United Nations. http://www.un.org/womenwatch/daw/cedaw/cedaw.htm (Accessed May 2013).

Idyorough, Alamveabee. Gender Concepts and Issues in Nigeria. Markudi, Nigeria: Aboki Publishers, 2005.

Williams, Mariama. "(CGTN) on WTO High Panel." http://www.igtn.org/page/603/1/ (Accessed May 2013).

Gender Issues and Roles in Non-Western Countries

In recent years, gender roles and related issues have been addressed as socially constructed variables. Consequently, according to A. Giddens, gender relations (i.e., "societally patterned interactions between men and women" highly differ from place to place and across time. Knowledge about gender roles and issues in non-Western countries has been developed over many years by the dominant voice of Western women and scholars, often providing essentialist descriptions about both. In fact, women in non-Western cultures have been frequently perceived and portrayed as either oppressed by patriarchal structures and lacking agency to tackle so-called backward and harmful practices, or as exotic, sensual, and mysterious One Thousand and One Nights–type characters. This approach has overlooked relevant differences (e.g., rural/urban, intergenerational struggles, role of education) around the world, as well as the efforts by women to challenge traditional roles and taboo issues. Non-Western postcolonial feminists and other scholars, activists, and individual women who rebelled against oppressive structures have increasingly shed light on gender dynamics, also through the use of social networks. A lesser-explored topic concerns gender roles and issues beyond the gender binary, such as in relation to transgenderism.

International Debate on Gender Roles and Issues in Non-Western Countries

Roles that men and women are expected to play in the family and in society are space- and time-contingent. International interest has focused above all on women's roles in non-Western society, the roles of men being often indirectly addressed as being socially dominant. According to most traditional behavioral expectations, men are breadwinners and should protect their family members from danger. Since the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) was signed in December 1979, and entered into force in September 1981, many items related to gender roles and issues in non-Western countries have been internationally analyzed through the lens of the protection of women's rights from gender-based violence, discriminations and other kinds of abuse in both the private and public spheres. In the field of family relations, for example, even when the roles of women (mothers, sisters, and wives) enjoy respect from the men in the family, women do not easily partake in family decisions, which are made by the males. Patriarchal structures and customary law serve to preserve male hegemony and male privileges. This might result in relegating women to household duties and, in worst cases, in setting lower or no legal age for women to marry (as seen in Afghanistan, India, and Pakistan), in forced or arranged marriages, in dowry-related violence (India), as well as in other abuses. These practices prevent girls from completing their education (or even from accessing it) as well as from entering into or staying in the labor market and gaining economic independence.

Other economic dimensions of these types of family roles concern denying or limiting women's rights to own or manage property. Some legal systems (e.g., sub-Saharan Africa) also deny widows equal rights to inheritance, leaving them economically disadvantaged at their husbands' death. Some cases of sati, the practice according to which a widow voluntarily jumps or is thrown by members of the community into her deceased husband's pyre, are still recorded in some rural communities of India. Beyond family relations, separation of women and men in public spaces, such as the practice in Saudi Arabia, has frequently been justified with the will to protect women from violence and harm.

Moreover, relatives and the local community might play key roles in the perpetuation of ritual practices, such as female genital mutilation, particularly in rural areas. In these and other cases, the control of women's bodies and sexuality is carried out by both men and family or elder women (aunts, grandmothers, and old women in the community).

Voices of Women From Non-Western Countries

In many non-Western countries, women increasingly occupy political and economic ruling positions and have actively promoted better living conditions for women living in rural areas and, more broadly, women's access to education and independent life.

In some cases, political and economic instability continuously put women's rights at risk in several areas, such as in the case of the Taliban regime in Afghanistan. Postcolonial feminists, activists, and many other women from non-Western countries have contributed to deconstructing the stereotyped image of non-Western women as subordinated and slavishly complying with oppressive rules. They have investigated and contrasted power dynamics and gender hierarchies in their societies, at the same time rejecting many gender issues and roles supported by Western women.

Some well-known examples of girls from countries such as Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Yemen portray fighting against forced marriages or striving for education and independence. The use of the Internet (e.g., blogs and social networks) has proven to be a powerful tool for women's activism and resistance. For example, Malala Yousafzai, a young Pakistani blogger and pupil, wrote a diary in a blog for the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC)—under a pseudonym—describing life in her village after the Taliban imposed its rules. After her identity was revealed, she survived a Taliban attack and become a prominent symbol of girls' emancipation. In Saudi Arabia, women launched the October 26th Campaign to lift the ban on women driving their own cars.

At the same time, Muslim women also used the Web to reclaim their own agency in response to the paternalistic approach of Western feminists toward Muslim women. For instance, a Facebook page titled "Muslim Women against Femen" was opened in April 2013 as a reaction to the launch of a so-called topless jihad by Femen's topless activists to support Tunisian activist Amina Tyler, who was imprisoned after posting her topless photos online. In the online discussion that followed, Muslim women contrasted, among other things, the perception spread in Western societies about the veil as a means of Muslim men's oppression on women.

Beyond the Gender Binary (Transgenderism)

Going beyond heteronormativity and binary gender roles might be a sensitive issue in many non-Western countries. In some other cases, different gender identities have been considered sacred, such as the Hijras (eunuchs) in India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh. Hijras belong to a special caste in the Indian culture because of their identification with the Mother Goddess, even if they face discrimination in daily life. They often live in defined Hijras' communities and make their living by dancing and singing at birth ceremonies and weddings. Serena Nanda maintains that this group, born men but adopting female roles, actually become "neither men nor women" and "function as an institutionalized third gender role." Since November 2013, Hijras' gender designation can appear on their passports in Bangladesh, whereas in Pakistan they can opt to identify themselves by E (for eunuch) on their passports and government forms.

Barbara Giovanna Bello
University of Milano

See Also: Female Genital Mutilation; Gender Issues and Roles in Developing Countries; Institute for Women's Policy Research; Multiculturalism; White Privilege; Women Minorities.

Further Readings

al-Hibri, A. "Is Western Patriarchal Feminism Good for Third World/Minority Women?" In Is Multiculturalism Bad for Women?, J. Cohen, M. Howard, and M. C. Nussbaum, eds. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999.

"Discussing Gender and International Cultural Relations. A Collection of Interviews with Women Working in International Cultural Relations, Exploring Perceptions of Gender and Diversity." British Council, 2011. http://www.britishcouncil.org/gender_and_icr.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Haghighat-Sordellini, E. Women in the Middle East and North Africa: Change and Continuity. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2010.

Giddens, A. Sociology, 5th ed. Malden, MA: Polity Press, 2006.

Inglehart, R. and P. Norris. Rising Tide: Gender Equality and Cultural Change Around the World. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Lorde, A. Sister Outsider. Freedom, CA: Crossing Press, 1984.

Nanda, S. Neither Man nor Woman. The Hijras of India, 2nd ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth Publishing Company, 1999.

Okin, S. M. "Gender Inequality and Cultural Differences." Political Theory, v.22/1, 1994.

Saïd, E. W. Orientalism. New York: Vintage Books, 1979.

Genetic Counseling, Cultural Aspects of

The National Society of Genetic Counselors, which was founded in 1979 and is the largest genetic counselor association in the world, defines genetic counseling as the process of helping patients understand the medical, reproductive, familial, and psychological implications of information about their genes. This encompasses the study and interpretation of personal and family medical histories; the determination, according to the most recent data and available genetic information, of the likelihood of a genetic disease occurring; guiding the patient through education about the prevention or management of such a disease; and one-to-one or family counseling when it comes to understanding the choices to be made and their consequences. For example, a couple expecting a child may seek genetic counseling because of a condition or risk discovered through prenatal testing; a couple whose newborn child has a genetic condition may seek counseling; an older child or adult diagnosed with a genetic condition may also seek out counseling. Counseling may help a person with a hereditary condition make decisions pertaining to family planning, as well as understand and come to terms with the condition itself.

Genetic counselors serve a broad variety of needs and people, helping patients to understand the conditions they have inherited or could inherit. In addition, genetic counselors put medical information in context for patients and their families; advocate for patients; provide patients and their families with information about relevant support services, both public and private, including health care services and financial help; conduct research in medical genetics; educate legislators and health care professionals about genetic conditions; and work for genetics firms in the private sector. The role of the genetic counselor has always been one that has evolved in response to changes in technology and the health care industry, and this role is expected to expand and change significantly in the near future in response to the rise of genetic testing services. Such services have increased the demand for professionals to help patients understand or manage these risks.

Not everyone who seeks out a genetic counselor (or is referred to one) does so because of a diagnosis of a genetic condition. Genetic counseling is sometimes recommended for women past age 35 who are or are planning to become pregnant, especially if it is their first pregnancy; for couples who are planning to have another child and already have a child with a genetic disorder or birth defect; women who have suffered more than one miscarriage; or people who have a family history that includes a genetic condition.

Genetic testing, which is conducted on body tissue or fluid, reveals the genes that a patient carries. However, understanding what those genes indicate is constantly in flux. Comparative studies, for instance, have helped show correlations between certain genes or certain combinations of genes and certain conditions. In some cases, the correlations are strong and the mechanism by which the conditions are caused may even be understood. In other cases, the correlations constitute the scientific equivalent of a strong hunch, or research is still in its infancy. This is true even for diseases that are known to be hereditary—the genes associated with them are not confidently identified in all cases.

Genetic counseling has evolved in response to changes in technology and the health care industry, helping patients understand the conditions they have inherited or could inherit, or could pass on to offspring.

Cultural competence is important for all professionals who deal with a diverse clientele, but genetic counselors may find themselves dealing more frequently than some medical professionals with culturally sensitive matters. This is particularly true because of (but not only because of) the role of family planning in genetic counseling. For this reason, cultural competence training is increasingly recommended for genetic counselors; since the 1990s, there has been widespread recognition that linguistic competence—that is, simply employing a translator to liaison between a medical professional and a patient when there is a language barrier—is not sufficient to bridge the gap and inculcate mutual understanding. Further, cultural competence training means recognizing what is culturally specific about one's own beliefs, expectations, norms, behaviors, values, and habits, rather than assuming (as is easy to do) that what one is familiar with is either a universal or the so-called correct version, while competing versions are alternatives to be corrected at worst and tolerated at best.

To this end, genetic counselor Nancy Steinberg Warren developed the Genetic Counseling Toolkit with funds awarded by the 2009 Jane Engelberg Memorial Fellowship. Warren was later awarded the 2013 National Society of Genetic Counselors Cultural Competence Award for her work. This toolkit provides cultural competence tools for genetic counselors, with the goal of facilitating better communication and better work. Warren followed the model used for cultural competence toolkits developed for other professions. The Genetic Counseling Toolkit encourages self-assessments as well as the acquisition of cultural knowledge about the patients and communities the counselor serves and the management of the dynamics of difference.

When genetic counselors are better able to understand their own biases and unspoken assumptions, they are also better equipped to perceive the aspects and nuances of other cultures. They become better communicators and better able to understand their patients, their patients' needs, and how their patients react to the information the counselor is able to give them. Courses in cultural competence for genetic counselors include hypothetical cases such as interacting with a prisoner facing a medical dilemma who also faces the unique cultural conditions of prison; discussing family issues and using appropriate language with gay, lesbian, and transgender couples; deciding when an interpreter is needed; understanding deaf culture; dealing with refugees and understanding the issues they face; and understanding the wide variety of religious cultures and how religious background may impact medical understanding and medical decisions.

Bill Kte'pi
Independent Scholar

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Cultural Competence, Training In; Disabled Clients.

Further Readings

Barlow-Stewart, Kristine, Soo See Yeo, Bettina Meiser, David Goldstein, Kathy Tucker, and Maurice Eisenbruch. "Toward Cultural Competence in Cancer Genetic Counseling and Genetics Education: Lessons Learned from Chinese-Australians." Genetics in Medicine, v.8 (2006).

Bartels, Dianne M., Bonnie J. LeRoy, and Arthur L. Caplan, eds. Genetic Counseling: Ethical Challenges and Consequences. Piscataway, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2010.

Davis, Dena. Genetic Dilemmas: Reproductive Technology, Parental Choices, and Children's Futures. New York: Oxford University Press, 2009.

Stern, Alexandra Minna. Telling Genes: The Story of Genetic Counseling in America. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University, 2012.

Wang, V. O. "Cultural Competency in Genetic Counseling." Journal of Genetic Counseling, v.3/4 (1994).

Genogram

A genogram is a graphical representation of intergenerational familial relationships, primarily biological and legal ones but also those that are fictive kinship in nature. Genograms are similar to family trees, but because they include attention to nonblood relations, and illustrate relationship dynamics, they are more comprehensive "maps" of family histories. Genograms have existed in various forms since the mid-20th century, but it was not until the early 1980s that a generally agreed-upon format for how a genogram should be constructed was established in the human services arena. A working group established by the North American Primary Care Research Group undertook the task of developing a standardized design and core symbols for genograms so that, once created, they could be understood across an array of human services practioners. Since these criteria were generated, they have been revised and expanded several times, as new perspectives on and insights into family structures and interactions have emerged. Computer technology has further faciliated the construction of genograms, especially in enabling various forms of coding the data they document.

Perhaps not surprisingly, early genograms—even those that used the original format customs—were inclined to view families from traditional or hegemonic points of reference; for example, as a nuclear family. As a result, genograms have been limited as tools for charting and interpreting multicultural families, broadly considered on the basis of, for example, race, ethnicity, language use, genographic origin, immigration status, caste, socioeconomic class, employment standing, sex, gender, gender identity and expression, sexual orientation, dis/ability (physical, developmental, and psychological), veteran status, age, generation, religious and secular affiliation, and physical appearance, among other dimensions of identity. Ongoing changes to the layout and icons used in genograms have sought, and continue to seek, greater accuracy in representation as well as in the understanding and analysis of all family configurations.

Use of Genograms Among Human Services Practitioners and Clients

Genograms are generally used in human services work in one of two ways. First, genograms are shared by practioners who work with the same families from different points of entry (e.g., a social worker, counselor, and psychiatrist) and/or with different members of the same family. Second, practioners have clients develop their own genograms to foster (or reveal) awareness of and insight into (or understanding of) genetic and behavioral patterns. Once identified, these patterns can be discussed and corresponding therapeutic service interventions can be recommended. In both ways, genograms generally operate as data-gathering devices and/or assessment tools.

To be used effectively in either way, human service workers and their clients need education and training on how to generate meaningful genograms; for clients, this preparation must also include attention to the range of emotions that may surface for them in the genogram development process as well as strategies for coping with those feelings productively.

Typically, genograms represent, to the extent possible given the clients' ages and access to various types of kinship information, at least three generations in both directions (backward and forward), in which the clients' generation is made the central focus. In other words, the vantage point in the genogram extends backward two generations to the clients' grandparents' generation (even if these individuals are not known), and forward two generations to the clients' real or would-be grandchildren's generation. Accordingly, genograms are said to provide a form of historical voice through a visual expression of previously silenced, faint, and/or unacknowledged nexuses in kinship relations across time. Genograms can convey only a limited amount of information; however, they do so in a way that reveals the larger essence of complex patterns embedded in familial systems, thus enabling hypotheses as to how clients' seemingly immediate life challenges have actually evolved from more distant ancestral origins.

Need for Resource Remediation

The academic bases from which genograms were developed and continue to be developed in human services disciplines, as well as the professional contexts in which genograms are used in human services practice, are largely reflective of contemporary and complex views of family. However, ill-conceived iteration and use of genograms still permeate societal institutions. For example, many high school biology textbooks use genograms to promote—perhaps inadvertently, perhaps intentionally—heterosexist familial norms. A genogram depicting same-sex parents is used to illustrate a so-called incorrect application of genogram gender icons (two circles for females, two squares for males), as well as to reveal so-called erroneous understanding of hereditary progressions. Children of same-sex parents, however, would use two same gender icons to accurately depict their parents. Further, if a child is the biological offspring of one parent and the opposite sex sibling of the other parent, a genogram would also express the child's accurate genetic patterning. Brazilian educator Paulo Freire has argued that erroneous co-optation of popular ideals is inevitable, but such co-optation must still be exposed and corrected. This is especially the case in human services arenas where the consequences of not doing so are more significant because the focus of service is health promotion among already vunerable client populations.

Christine Clark
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

See Also: Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cultural Competence, Training in; Culturally Diverse Practice, Definitions of; Culturally Diverse Practice, Theories of; Families, Nontraditional; Family Structure, Diversity of; Multiracial Individuals and Families; People of Color: Service Delivery, Psychological Assessment, Cultural Issues; School Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for; Social Work, Diversity Practice in.

Further Readings

Kennedy, Vivienne. "Genograms." MAI Review, v.5/3 (2010).
McGoldrick, Monica, Randy Gerson, and Sueli Petry. Genograms: Assessment and Intervention, 3rd ed. New York: W. W. Norton, 2008.
Thomas, Anita Jones. "Understanding Culture and Worldview in Family Systems: Use of the Multicultural Genogram." The Family Journal: Counseling and Therapy for Couples and Families, v.6/1 (1998).

Gentrification

The concept of gentrification refers to a residential development that brings new residents to a deteriorated neighborhood. Typically, the process is described as one in which young, well-educated, salaried and professional people move into an area where poor people live. Gentrification consists of a change in neighborhood character, displacement of older and/or poorer residents, and a physical change or upgrades to housing stock.

The process of gentrification occurs when the newly rich and mobile see an opportunity to remake neighborhoods in a new image, capitalizing on cheaper rents and reconstruction costs. Gentrification begins when a deteriorated and/or partially abandoned neighborhood appeals to housing speculators. Old housing stock is bought, upgraded, and resold at higher prices than originally obtained.

During this period, economic revitalization also takes place, and the pace of gentrification and displacement of original residents increases. The result of gentrification is typically a much-desired, socially vibrant neighborhood that has little of its original residents or character. Some cities welcome gentrification as a means to rejuvenate neighborhood buildings, raise rents, and increase property values; others see gentrification as a means to displace the homeless, the poor, and the vulnerable, along with disrupting neighborhood life.

Gentrification and the Economy

Urban scholars debate the causes of gentrification. Some have stressed the preference toward the social life of the city as one factor that drives the process. Cities usually have a variety of cultural, social, ethnic, and racial components in a concentrated local area (i.e., a neighborhood) that is attractive to a particular demographic. This intergenerational, intercultural mixing produces many outputs, such as museums, art galleries, concerts, libraries, cafes, trendy nightspots, and other cultural institutions that are in short supply in suburban and rural areas. Therefore, when young, urban professionals see an opportunity to move closer to these institutions, they do so in droves.

Other scholars have pointed to job growth as a key indicator or factor leading to gentrification. Young professionals seeking to reverse-commute gentrify neighborhoods so they will be in close proximity to work. Also, many cities in the 1970s and 1980s offered tax breaks to corporations to reinvest in central city districts. Generally, gentrification has occurred in larger, older cities on the U.S. East Coast, moving westward over time.

Gentrification begins when a deteriorated and/or partially abandoned neighborhood appeals to housing speculators. Old housing stock is bought, upgraded, and resold at higher prices than originally obtained. During this period, economic revitalization also takes place, and the pace of gentrification and displacement of original residents increases.

Still others have pointed to the housing market as the primary driver of this type of redevelopment. As the United States grew, the inner cities (primarily the economic engines of the late 1800s and early 1900s) declined, and residents moved to the suburbs. During this period, single-room occupancy hotels, multifamily units, apartments, and townhomes were the primary styles of residence for city dwellers. The growth of the suburbs far outside the city from the early 1900s on, however, changed the economic landscape dramatically. Suburbs provided safety, cheaper single-family housing, land for economic development, and the peace and quiet that cities could not offer. Deindustrialization, or the rapid restructuring of urban economics marked by factories and businesses leaving the inner cities for cheaper rents, increased urban displacement. Once suburbs became the preference of young professionals, city housing stock deteriorated and businesses followed workers to suburbia. This left an abundance of cheap urban housing stock for speculators to renovate.

Changes in housing stock, coupled with public policy, have also been found by scholars to drive gentrification. In the 1960s and 1970s the federal government encouraged the demolition of old public housing units and promoted the construction of condominiums and townhomes in their place. Tax increment financing instruments, such as tax-free bonds given to developers to incentivize relocating in cities, also spurred gentrification. In the late 1960s, President Lyndon B. Johnson encouraged cities to gentrify through his signature Model Cities program, the Urban Renewal program, and the creation of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, which, for the first time, made the economic health of urban centers a part of public policy.

Gentrification: Race and Class

Gentrification's negative connotations have often been portrayed in terms of class or race discrimination. Suburbanization, in its earliest forms, was biased. Redlining, or the practice of denying (or charging more for) credit to residents based on race or ethnicity, was a practice enforced by national policy into the 1970s, beginning with the National Housing Act of 1934. The result of this strategy was to concentrate minorities (and the poor) in central cities. As whites moved out of the cities to capture cheaper rents in the suburbs, the residents of the central city were left to manage on their own.

Changes in redlining practices led to reinvestment in the city. The Urban Renewal program of Johnson's War on Poverty platform provided federal dollars to cities for private entrepreneurs to build highways, parkways, parks, and condominiums. It utilized eminent domain to procure property. The use of these funds to demolish and forcibly remove residents led to a backlash from minority and poor communities across the country. The Community Development Block Grant program, an offshoot of Urban Renewal, used a competitive grant process to provide for redeveloping existing neighborhoods rather than demolishing them.

Gentrification: Displacement and Renewal

The crux of the debate surrounding gentrification is between the issue of displacement at the cost of urban renewal. Displacement occurs in many ways during the gentrification process. Some residents find that, as the values of their homes rise, they cannot afford to pay their property taxes. Renters find that rents increase, or that their buildings become unlivable as they are readied for conversion into luxury apartments. Older, poorer residents may feel a strong pressure to sell because they cannot take advantage of the new market. Finally, many residents who lived in a neighborhood pregentrification move on since the social and economic networks that used to be in place are eliminated or abandoned by new residents.

Cities, bound by economic competitiveness, can benefit from gentrification, namely, in the form of increased property values; the development of new infrastructure, such as road and sewer improvements; increases in collected property tax; and high rents. Local economies benefit from having new residents bring much-needed skills and knowledge to the industries and businesses located in the central city. Tourists and visitors to gentrified neighborhoods feel safer as well.

To ensure negative aspects are minimized, local and state governments have many tools. They can closely monitor evictions, allow existing tenants the right of first refusal, provide emergency assistance to poorer renters, and institute so-called property tax circuit breakers to ensure that residents on fixed incomes are not forced out of their homes. Local governments can require developers to create mixed-income units within buildings and protect single-room occupancy housing by bringing these properties under public control.

Davia Cox Downey
Grand Valley State University

See Also: Social and Economic Justice; Social Darwinism; Socioeconomic Status.

Further Readings

Butler, Tim. "For Gentrification?" Environment and Planning A., v.39/1 (2007).

DeSena, Judith N. and George Ansalone. "Gentrification, Schooling and Social Inequality." Educational Research Quarterly, v.33/1 (2009).

Hackworth, Jason R. The Neoliberal City: Governance, Ideology and Development in American Urbanism. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2007.

Peterson, Paul E. City Limits. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981.

Smith, Neal. "Gentrification and Uneven Development." Economic Geography, v.58/2 (1982).

Global Burden of Disease

In 1663, John Graunt (1620–74) published the first survey of mortality as a result of disease epidemics by analyzing Bills of Mortality in England. His epidemiological research revealed patterns of death by gender, age, and urban versus rural location due to plague and disease. His work demonstrated the importance of gathering facts in a systematic manner and generating vital statistics in order to identify, characterize, and classify health conditions. Graunt's efforts led to an increased awareness of public health issues and patterns of diseases that in the 18th and 19th centuries gave rise to a sanitary revolution, which ushered in better health and extended life opportunity for the majority of the population in the developed world.

In the 20th century, the creation of the World Health Organization (WHO) in 1948 offered visionary goals for global health. Among the founding principles of the WHO is the idea that health is more than the absence of disease or the lack of infirmity; health includes comprehensive physical, mental, and social well-being. Furthermore, every human being has a fundamental right to live a healthy life, and no political, economic, or social conditions should force any persons to live degraded, unhealthy lives. The WHO constitution advocates that advances in scientific, medical, and psychological knowledge benefit all, and it calls for commitment and cooperation on the part of governments and the public to make efforts to improve the health status of all. In 1990, toward these goals, the WHO, in conjunction with the World Bank and Harvard University, launched the Global Burden of Disease (GBD) project aimed at providing a comprehensive evidence-based system for understanding conditions of health, illness, and disability, and projecting the likely outcomes for affected populations.

Because human health, labor productivity, and economic growth are closely connected with the quality of life of individuals as well as national development, understanding how best to support public health and development as well as set priorities for national health agendas is critical for government officials, policy makers, and health and human services professionals. Having accurate national and global data on illness, disability, and death enables these various experts to make informed decisions about creating and implementing national or international health programs. The aim of the original GBD study in 1990 was to create a consistent data set to identify and benchmark the health effects of more than 100 diseases and some 483 sequelae (ill health as a result of a previous disease) across five age groups in eight World Bank regions. The 1990 study, published as part of the 1993 World Development Report, was not without flaws, but it attempted to produce internally consistent estimates of mortality and morbidity by age, sex, and geographic region. The study also attempted to clarify the burden of diseases by quantifying early deaths among populations and the number of years individuals lived in ill health due to injury and sickness. The project's first researchers designed a metric, the disability-adjusted life years (DALYs), to measure both the number of years of life lost (YLL) due to premature deaths and the healthy years of life lost to disability (YLD). DALYs enable policy makers and professionals to assess which diseases, illnesses, or injuries are most significant in creating a gap between the desired outcome of a long life in full health and the reality of disability or early death.

Numerous factors contribute to the health and illness of a population. The economic and social conditions and government policies under which people live have important influences on people's health. The GBD study does not attempt to address or ameliorate the negative conditions that influence individuals' health and life chances. Instead, the study provides data necessary to make likely predictions of mortality and disability based on indicators of health risks such as age, sex, cultural norms, income, social status, education, and awareness of healthy behaviors. The question thus becomes: Can policy makers and other professionals understand and sort out the issues surrounding the validity and reliability of the indicators to improve national health and the quality of life for people around the world?

The GBD project rekindles a century-old public health debate. On one side of the debate is the idea that increased health is necessary to enable people to arise from poverty and despair. On the other side of the debate is the idea that people's health will improve only when their economic and social positions are improved. Critics of the quantitative accounting of the GDB project argue that simply collecting data and making projections does little to improve public health or change the day-to-day lived reality for the world's poor. Instead, it encourages a top-down bureaucratic approach to public health spending that funnels funding to projects that can report success based on achieving certain metrics rather than actually changing the conditions that lead to death, disability, and diminished quality of life. Supporters of the project argue that the data allow researchers to draw causal connections between the environment and disease. Armed with this information, policy makers and health and human services professionals can use the data to compare the costs of allowing the conditions or disease to go unchecked (per DALY of lost productivity) with the costs of using public funds to improve conditions for the poor and design cost-effective remedies for increased health and well-being.

The collection and refinement of data on the global disease burden not only allows but also encourages conversation on issues of health, poverty, and development. The project enables scientists, academics, and development and health and human services professionals to assess the state of global health, identify the critical health problems that confront the developing and the developed world collectively and individually, and access the existing resources to promote health and find ways to mobilize them effectively. Since 1990, the Global Burden of Disease project has collected, analyzed, categorized, and made available the data necessary to improve world health. Since the original 1990 study, the WHO, working with participating organizations, has expanded and updated the GBD project. GBD 2010 was truly an international effort, which involved 488 coauthors from 303 institutions in 50 countries and took five years to complete. Twenty years after the first GBD report, the 2010 report provides estimates on premature death and disability for 291 diseases and injuries, 1,160 sequelae, and 67 risk factors for both males and females in 20 age groups in three time periods, 1990, 2005, and 2010. In total, GBD 2010 produced data for 187 countries, 21 world regions, and generated nearly 1 billion estimates of health outcomes.

The data from the two-decades-long GBD project demonstrate rapid transformations taking place on the global health landscape. The global population is increasing and aging as people are living longer and childhood mortality has been significantly reduced in many countries. The causes of death and disability in adults as a result of noncommunicable diseases are now more significant factors in terms of poor health and mortality than the problem of childhood communicable diseases that once confronted many nations. These increases in life expectancy require a shift in public health policies as many nations face the challenges of aging populations with disease burdens that are a matter of disability rather than premature mortality. The data also indicate clear inequalities between the rich and the poor in terms of health status, life expectancy, burden of disease, and disability conditions. For example, obesity from overeating has replaced malnutrition as a leading risk factor for illness in the developed world. These countries have lowered their rates of mortality, but have increased their rates of disability and ill health. People are living longer but less healthier lives. In peripheral nations in Sub-Saharan Africa, high rates of mortality continue to be attributable to the lack of adequate nutrition and clean water, communicable diseases, and maternal and newborn diseases. In Africa, having the data alone is insufficient to generate the political will or the capital necessary to assure peoples' health. The data also indicate that the shared problems of smoking and mental disorders contribute significantly to worldwide mortality and disability rates. The descriptive epidemiology about changing patterns of disease made available in the GBD project is critical for helping nations design public health and development projects to promote the well-being of their populations.

Lorna Lueker Zukas
National University

See Also: National Healthcare Disparities Reports; Public Health; Quality of Life, Measurement of; Social Determinants of Health; Social Epidemiology.

Further Readings

Gunn, S. William A., P. B. Mansourian, A. M. Davies, A. Piel, and B. McA. Sayers. Understanding the Global Dimensions of Health. New York: Springer, 2005.

Institute for Health Metrics and Evaluation. The Global Burden of Disease: Generating Evidence, Guiding Policy. Seattle, WA: IHME, 2013.

Murray, J. L. and Alan D. Lopez. "Alternative Projections of Mortality and Disability by Cause 1990–2020: Global Burden of Disease Study." The Lancet, v.349/9064 (1997).

Murray, J. L. and Alan D. Lopez. The Global Burden of Disease: A Comprehensive Assessment of Mortality and Disability from Diseases, Injuries, and Risk Factors in 1990 and Projected to 2020. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1996.

World Health Organization. "Constitution of the World Health Organization." Basic Documents (45th ed.), Geneva: WHO, 2006. http://www.who.int/governance/eb/who_constitution_en.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Global South/ Global North

Socioeconomic and political differences among the countries has led to the emergence of new concepts. Global South/Global North is one of these examples that indicates the social, political, and economic division among the countries. This division pertains to both diversity and applications of human services because of the differences in improved services, accessibility, and promotion of well-being between Global South and Global North. Global South is widely considered poorer in terms of its social and economic development.

The regions of the Southern Hemisphere, such as developing Asia, Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America, are generally categorized in this group. In contrast, socioeconomically advanced regions and countries (for instance, North America, Europe, Australia, Japan, and Russia), which are part of the Northern Hemisphere, represent the Global North.

Historical Change in the Definition of the Global South/Global North

The historical background of country categorization commenced shortly after World War II. The ideologies that the countries represent divided the West and East in terms of their political characters, which were the representative powers of liberalism and communism, respectively. The countries of the West (namely, the United States and its allies, mainly in western Europe), and the countries of the East (led by the Soviet Union and China), created a bipolar world during the Cold War period after World War II. The countries of the West, which are ideologically liberal and capitalist, represented the First World, and the communist and socialist countries of the East were defined as the Second World. Additionally, the countries that were nonaligned during the Cold War era were classified as Third World. The Third World countries were mainly postcolonial countries of Africa and Asia, and these countries were overwhelmingly underdeveloped. However, some countries in Europe, such as Switzerland and Finland, also remained neutral. Moreover, Latin American countries were categorized as Third World.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, communism lost its popularity, and the Cold War period ended. Accordingly, this landmark change in the political spectrum influenced the definitions of First, Second, and Third World. Socioeconomic development of the countries has started to play a greater role in the definition of the Global South/Global North division, more than the political ideologies of the countries after the early 1990s. Therefore, some First World countries, such as New Zealand and Australia, are located in the Southern Hemisphere but have taken their places in the Global North. In other words, a developed economy, high-technology industry, and political stability have become the indicators of the country to be classified in the Global North, and the lack of these features has become the main factor to be included in the Global South. The Third World countries came to the fore as underdeveloped countries that have widely had a colonial past, so the politically impartial status of those countries during the Cold War era lost its importance. Developed and postindustrial countries, such as the United Kingdom, Germany, France, Italy, the United States, and Japan, continue to be part of the Global North. However, there is no particular list that categorizes each country either in the Global South or Global North. Instead, there has been a trend in the last decades to identify the Global North with the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), whose members are predominantly from the First World and some countries of the Second World (e.g., Russia).

Social Problems, Diversification, and the Future of Global South/Global North

The Global South/Global North divide has been under the influence of new global trends such as globalization, movement of people, life expectations, environmental pollution, quality of education, and quality of the health system. Hence, the Human Development Index (HDI), which has been devised and measured by the United Nations Development Programme, is used to rank countries through the criteria of life expectancy (index of population health and longevity), education index, and the standard of living (income index).

These indices offer a well-presented panorama for human development comparison among the countries and the diversification around the world. In this context, the Global North has a better score than the Global South in all areas. The main reason behind these differences lies in political instability and poor economic performance, which are related to exporting raw material, not producing a high standard of industrial and manufactured goods, ineffective public policies, and social problems. Furthermore, colonized countries of the Western countries in the Global South suffer from the heritage of incapacity and limited resources. As a result, there is an immigration trend from the Global South to the Global North, with people seeking better life conditions. The positive impact of globalization, however, has decreased the division between the countries through flow of money, transfer of knowledge, new opportunities in telecommunications, and transportation. What is more important is the rapid economic development of the countries that are traditionally in the Global South. For example, it is expected that China, India, and Brazil will be listed in the top five countries that have the highest gross domestic product (GDP) by 2030. Finally, the United Nations has implemented a program called Millenium Development Goals to fight poverty, AIDS, and other diseases; to provide environmental sustainability; to promote obligatory primary education; and to encourage gender equality. Therefore, both national and global policies will fill the gap between the Global South and Global North.

Baris Cayli
University of Stirling

See Also: Colonialism, Lingering Effects of; Critical Race Theory; Diaspora; Displaced Persons; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Food Insecurity; Human Trafficking; Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of; Pluralism; Poverty; Power, Race, Ethnicity and.

Further Reading

Kacowicz, Arie M. "Globalization, Poverty, and the North–South Divide." International Studies Review, v.9/4 (2007).

Prashad, Vijay. The Poorer Nations: A Possible History of the Global South. London: Verso Books, 2013.

Therien, J. P. "Beyond the North–South Divide: The Two Tales of World Poverty." Third World Quarterly, v.20/4 (1999).

Thompson, William R. and Rafael Reuveny. Limits to Globalization: North-South Divergence. New York: Routledge, 2010.

Grassroots Leadership

In the modern digital age, "community" can be defined in geographic terms, cultural terms, as well as virtual terms. Communities exist wherever there are shared interests or a collective identity. From time to time, and for a variety of reasons, communities seek change. The change communities desire can be short-term and goal-specific, such as reducing neighborhood violence, or long-term, such as creating sustainable economic development and growth. When communities seek change, leadership is necessary to organize community members for advocacy and action.

Grassroots leadership is an effective approach to leadership for community change. The term grassroots implies from the ground up, or homegrown leadership from within. Grassroots leaders emerge from disenfranchised communities and give the voiceless a voice and empower their community to reclaim its destiny. Grassroots leaders employ strategies that foster collaboration and use culturally appropriate tools to maximize citizen participation among community members. To ensure leadership continuity, grassroots leaders seek out community members to mentor and develop into future grassroots leaders. The 20th century is rich with examples of grassroots leaders from various communities, such as the suffragettes who won the right to vote for women, Harvey Milk from the gay community in San Francisco, Cesar Chavez from the community of Latino farm workers, and the psychiatric survivor/consumer movement in mental health services. The core concepts of community—shared collective identity and interests—remain, but in the 21st century, communities are becoming more diverse. It is imperative for grassroots leaders to be able to mobilize multicultural communities to action around shared concerns and goals.

Grassroots Leaders Are Members of the Community

Unlike community organizers, who sometimes are outsiders contracted to work with a community to achieve an identified goal, grassroots leaders are members of the community that is seeking change. By virtue of their community membership status, grassroots leaders have a personal stake in the outcome, and their credibility comes from being part of the community and working side by side with the very people who will benefit from the desired change. Their stature within the community may be formal or informal. Grassroots leaders can be church ministers or small business owners, but they can also be students or grandmothers. Although their opinions matter to the rest of the community, grassroots leaders know the expressed goals and outcomes are not about them but rather about the community's enhanced welfare. Grassroots leaders have earned the respect and trust of other community members.

As members of their communities, grassroots leaders are uniquely positioned to be able to measure the scope of the community's identified problem, recognize barriers to community collaboration, and assess the community's capacity to effect change. A key quality that grassroots leaders must possess is the ability to inspire and galvanize other community members to act. The quality of the relationships that grassroots leaders have with other community members influences their ability to motivate others. Grassroots leaders promote the emotional ownership of the identified goal among community members. They are change agents who are able to generate buy-in from other community members to turn the community's vision into reality.

Grassroots Leadership Styles in Diverse Communities

Across cultures, a universal human experience is that all people have a need to belong to a community that wants, needs, and appreciates them. For this reason many grassroots leaders employ a collaborative leadership style and convey an expectation that the talents and contributions of every community member are needed in order to achieve the desired change. This is particularly important for communities that are diverse. Grassroots leaders recognize differences in perspectives that exist within the community, bring community members with multicultural viewpoints together, and lead a process that assures that all the varying points of view are welcomed, honored, validated, and considered. This collaborative process can be time consuming but needs to be done to generate strategies for addressing the shared concerns of the community that all community members can own and visualize themselves taking some action to achieve the collective identified goal. By undertaking this consensus-building process, grassroots leaders create a community of purpose. Power is shared among the community members in decision making and collective action.

Grassroots Leaders Seek to Groom the Next Generation of Community Leaders

For desired community change to be sustainable, there must be continuity in community leadership. Leadership development is an essential function of grassroots leaders. Grassroots leaders see their roles as a combination of mentor and role model. They identify up-and-coming community members whom they can guide and support into the next generation of community leaders and create opportunities for these individuals to step into leadership roles. Grassroots leaders seek out community members who are representative of the community's emerging composition so that these junior community members possess the cultural competencies and community credibility that will ensure future citizen participation among the community.

Tools for Grassroots Leaders

As the Arab Spring has demonstrated, social media can be a powerful tool that grassroots leaders can use to mobilize community members to action, especially for communities that are not geographically based. Forums such as Facebook, Tumblr, and Twitter provide the capacity for grassroots leaders to raise awareness, spread information, organize actions, and manage activists. The exclusive reliance on social media is discouraged, however. The credibility of grassroots leaders fundamentally rests on the strength of their interpersonal relationships with members of their community, so social media should be regarded as a supplement to, rather than a substitute for, face-to-face community organizing.

Christine Limone
Fordham University Graduate School of Social Services

See Also: Community Action Agencies; Community Organizing; Cultural Competence, Model of; Human Capital Development Initiative; Social Capital, Role of.

Further Readings

Bordas, Juana. Salsa, Soul, and Spirit: Leadership for a Multicultural Age, 2nd ed. San Francisco: Berrett-Koehler, 2012.

Rabinowitz, Phil. "Collaborative Leadership." Community Toolbox, 2013. http://ctb.ku.edu/en/tablecontents (Accessed December 2013).

Group Homes for Adults

Group homes for adults are designed to provide assistance to those with mental or physical disabilities, people who are experiencing substance abuse problems, or those who are elderly and no longer able to independently care for themselves. Historically, individuals within these groups were likely to be institutionalized. In the latter decades of the 20th century, however, considerable efforts were made to provide environments wherein such adults could live as independently as possible. For many, group homes provide the necessary support in an environment that reflects typical family and community life. Group homes are often located in residential neighborhoods and look similar to the homes that surround them. They typically house six to eight residents, but more residents may be housed in larger homes. Some group homes are located on campuses made up of a cluster of group homes. While group homes may be private and associated with certain religions or organizations, they must be licensed by individual states. Thus, group homes may require the supervision of human service professionals. Group homes provide benefits not only to adult residents but to their families because of relief from financial, emotional, and physical burdens. Most group homes are located near the families of residents, allowing them to maintain close family ties. Group homes also benefit society because they reduce overall health costs and promote diversity.

Background

Before the mid-20th century, most adults unable to live on their own were placed in institutionalized settings such as hospitals, nursing homes, institutions for the mentally or physically impaired, or rehabilitation centers. In 1963, Congress set up a grant program for group homes through the Community Mental Health Centers Act. Six years later, Bengt Nirje, Sweden's director of the Association of Retarded Children, introduced the concept of normalization, insisting that disabled individuals were best served by providing them with residential services that allowed them to live as closely as possible to the way their peers lived. The concept of normalization became a major influence on the way that human services professionals and governments around the world dealt with both children and adults who required living assistance. In the 1970s, a number of class-action lawsuits were filed concerning the right of such individuals to live outside institutions. In 1990, Congress passed the Americans with Disabilities Act, stipulating that segregating the disabled in institutions was legal discrimination. Subsequently, most large state facilities were closed, and residents were transferred into group homes in local communities. In 1999, the U.S. Supreme Court held in Olmstead v. L.C. that disabled individuals have a legal right to live in group homes in community settings.

By the 1990s, the concept of placing adults requiring living assistance in group homes had become known as supported living. In the case of developmentally impaired adults, this meant providing educational opportunities and job training that allowed such individuals to live independent lives. The move toward independence continued into the 21st century, assisted by new laws at both the federal and state levels, as well as increased professional and financial support. While communities may be supportive of the abstract concept of group homes, individuals may balk when faced with a proposal for a group home in their own neighborhoods. Thus, human services personnel must constantly deal with the "not in my backyard" (NIMBY) syndrome.

Substance Abusers

Adults who have experienced problems with substance abuse often find that living in group home settings provides them with the necessary support to live their lives free of drugs and alcohol. Residents are able to learn from one another, and they generally experience high levels of diversity. One of the best-known examples of group homes for individuals recovering from drug or alcohol abuse is Oxford House, which was founded in 1975 in Sandy Spring, Maryland, as single-sex group homes that allowed residents to govern themselves. Oxford House rents the homes in which residents live in communities throughout the United States, and stays are not limited to any specific period. In order to remain, residents must accept bans on substance abuse and refrain from disruptive behavior, and they are required to pay rent and utilities and purchase their own food. The minor children of female residents are allowed to live with their mothers. By 2008, Oxford House had grown to encompass 1,200 group homes in the United States as well as 30 in Canada and eight in Australia.

Developmentally and Mentally Impaired

Group homes for the mentally and physically impaired are usually supervised by trained nurses who may use behavior modification techniques when working with residents. The level of modification is dependent on the level at which such adults are able to function. Workers in group homes may be called upon to educate residents in such basic skills as personal hygiene or routine housekeeping chores. For others, the focus is on acquiring language and/or social skills or providing job training. The ultimate goal, except in severe cases where individuals will never be autonomous, is to teach those with impairments to live on their own with only as much outside assistance as is necessary.

While group homes have distinct advantages over institutionalized settings, they are not ideal for all developmentally impaired adults. For instance, Jenny Hatch, a 29-year-old female with Down syndrome, went public in 2014 with her frustration about being placed in a group home by her mother. Hatch stated that the home made her feel as if she was imprisoned, and she resented being denied access to her computer, church, and job. Hatch solved her problems by going to court to win the right to live with her employers, Jim Talbert and Kelly Morris, who have a physically disabled daughter.

Experts in the field, including Robert L. Schlalock and Miguel A. Verdugo, insist that in any group home setting, human service professionals must ensure specific elements that allow residents to enjoy quality of life. These elements include recognizing basic rights and acknowledging the need for residents to experience emotional, physical, and material well-being, interpersonal relations, personal development, self-determination, and social inclusion.

The Elderly

It has been estimated that from 10 to 50 percent of nursing home residents are there because they lack assisted living options. At the end of the 20th century, about 75 percent of seniors lived on their own, 19 percent lived in group homes, and 5 percent lived in nursing homes. The 21st century ushered in an increasing need for living assistance for the elderly as the first baby boomers began to reach retirement age. Professionals have discovered that group homes fill a major need for the elderly who do not require long-term care in an institutionalized setting but do need varying levels of assistance that range from providing food, housekeeping, and transportation services to assuaging loneliness or boredom. Building on this idea, William Thomas devised the greenhouse model of group homes that allowed elderly residents to live in their own rooms surrounded by their own belongings with access to assistance only when needed.

Group homes for the elderly have the advantage of being less expensive than nursing homes, but they are not always available in certain communities. The communities that are most likely to provide the option of group homes are located in the northeast and are neighborhoods in which there are high- or medium-cost rents, a large number of physicians, and residents with high per capita earnings and high levels of education. In communities that do not meet these criteria, the number of residents living in long-term facilities may reach only12 percent.

All group homes are licensed by state human service departments and are protected by state and federal laws. Communities vary in their support for group homes. Even though financial support may be forthcoming, group homes continue to battle the NIMBY mentality that increases fear of those that are considered different than the community norm. Thus, it may become the responsibility of human services professionals to combat such fears and protect the rights of those diverse individuals who look to group homes to fulfill their needs.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990; Behavior Support and Management; Disability Services; Group Homes for Children; Mental Health Services, Adult; Nursing Home Care.

Further Readings

Gage, Mary Ann, et al. "In-Service Training for Staffs of Group Homes and Work Activity Centers Serving Developmentally Disabled Adults." Research and Practice for Persons With Severe Disabilities, v.34/2 (2009).

Janicki, Matthew P. and Arthur J. Dalton. Intellectual Disabilities: A Handbook. Philadelphia: Brunner/Mazel, 1999.

Nirje, Bengt. "The Normalization Principle and Its Human Management Implications." In Changing Patterns in Residential Services for the Mentally Retarded, R. Kugel and W. Wolfensberger, eds.

Washington, DC: President's Committee on Mental Retardation, 1969.

O'Brien, J. Supported Living: What's the Difference? Lithonia, GA: Responsive Systems Associates, 1993.

Rah, Kyung Kim and Stacy K. Dymond. "A National Study of Community Living: Impact of Type of Residence and Hours of In-Home Support." Research and Practice for Persons With Severe Disabilities, v.37/2 (2012).

Schlalock, Robert L. and Miguel A. Verdugo. Handbook on Quality of Life for Human Service Practitioners. Washington, DC: American Association on Mental Retardation, 2002.

Steinfeld, Edward and G. Scott Danford, eds. Enabling Environments: Measuring the Impact of Environment on Disability and Rehabilitation. New York: Kluwer Academic/Plenum Publishers, 1999.

Walker, Meta. "Group Housing Offers a Middle Ground of Options for Seniors." Human Ecology, v.27/2 (1999).

Walker, Pam. "Strategies for Organizational Change from Group Homes to Individualized Supports." Intellectual and Development Disabilities, v.50/5 (2012).

Group Homes for Children

Residential group homes represent key components of the systems of care in the child welfare, juvenile justice, and mental health fields. These facilities are designed to provide community-based, congregate residential supports, which promote safety and stability for children and youth who have been removed from their homes because of the family's inability to address their needs. Specifically, children under the age of 12 years are rarely placed in congregate care settings unless they undergo formal psychological and psychiatric evaluations that indicate that they require highly structured, therapeutic environments such as residential treatment centers (RTCs) or psychiatric inpatient facilities. For adolescents, however, parents may voluntarily place them out of the home within a public system of care to obtain scarce and costly mental health services or to ensure the safety of a child who is beyond parental control and is in need of adult supervision. In these instances, the parent may maintain full authority, although the child is physically placed in the care of the professional provider of community-based residential congregate services.

Family courts also remove children from their caregivers because of child maltreatment, physical and/or sexual abuse, neglect, and parental abandonment or failure to supervise. If timely family reunification does not occur after a child has been removed, and the child begins adolescence after extended periods of placement or multiple, failed placements in temporary foster family care, the child often manifests significant symptoms of unresolved postseparation trauma and associated behavioral difficulties that cannot be contained in a normal family setting. On the other hand, juvenile justice systems may place adolescents directly into congregate care because community efforts to divert them from engaging in escalating delinquent behaviors and a negative, dangerous peer culture have failed. In short, group homes target youth who need around-the-clock care and supervision, education, recreation, health services, vocational and employment supports, as well as substance abuse and mental health treatment to successfully adjust in the community.

Characteristics of Group Homes

Group homes are more restrictive than family foster care settings, yet they are less confining and less expensive than residential treatment, psychiatric, or detention centers. These congregate facilities vary by size, characteristics of the population served, location, staffing ratio, licensure and credentials, program design, local/state regulations, and reliance on national standards of accreditation. Group homes are generally underwritten by public state contracts, and providers may receive funding from federal programs passed through the respective state for the provision of foster care or juvenile services. Private contributions may supplement the funding base because many group home facilities are sponsored by nonprofit and charitable organizations. Group homes may be therapeutic, high intensity in their structure, coed, same sex, or specialize in treatment modalities that address substance abuse, sexual offending, homelessness, running away, teen pregnancy, maternity, and parenting.

Typically, children placed in group home settings exhibit high-risk behaviors, are likely to come from low-income, chaotic families with limited access to services, and have previously resided in violent, urban communities. They often possess histories of chronic school failure, multiple foster care or residential placements, and parental rejection, and may be involved in delinquency, including sexual offending, theft, and assault. Many youth present with serious emotional disturbance or aggression (which may be directly related to histories of child maltreatment), behaviorally act out, defy parental authority, use drugs and/or alcohol, engage in inappropriate sexual activity, and fail to conform to family limits. Generally, the mission of a group home environment is to assist the youth to positively adjust to community living, master essential life skills, and establish a sense of safety, well-being, and stability, while learning to manage behaviors that prevent the youth's transition into healthy, productive adulthood. Group homes may also facilitate the effective transition of children and youth from more restrictive, institutional settings back to their families, or to independent living within natural communities and social networks.

Controversies

The utilization of group homes as an out-of-home placement resource for children and youth is controversial for several reasons frequently debated by policy makers and service providers. First, there is a perception that the iatrogenic effects of congregate care outweigh the benefits. In other words, children and youth who present with severe behavioral or emotional problems are viewed as likely to have a negative influence on one another in a group setting. Some advocates believe that group home residents pass on dysfunctional ways of coping with and managing adult authority, limits, and community expectations. Close interactions in the group home setting, it is argued, compound the youth's difficulties presented at the time of initial admission. For younger children, such settings may be deemed unsafe and developmentally inappropriate. Second, there has not been sufficient or rigorous study about the variation of group homes (e.g., respective treatment approaches, length of average placement, age of children served, program size, and location of the setting), and the implications for achieving positive youth outcomes. Although many group care models report anecdotal success for their graduates in terms of educational and employment goals, avoidance of re-arrest or conviction, or family reunification and sustained improvement in family relations, others acknowledge that determining long-term effectiveness is financially prohibitive. In addition, establishing a true control group for research purposes raises ethical issues and methodological challenges (i.e., withholding treatment and keeping track of youth after discharge from the group home). Third, group care is viewed as more restrictive than family-based care and wrap-around community supports. Critics of group homes believe that significant family relationships for the youth may be weakened, even when these relationships must serve as the basis for the youth's successful return to his or her community of origin.

Santa and members of the motorcycle safety group of U.S. Navy Strike Fighter Squadron 143 in a photo with children at St. Mary's Home for Disabled Children in Virginia Beach, Virginia. The group collected clothes and other items for the children as holiday gifts.

Program Elements

Despite the scarcity of program evidence, and the recent movement by numerous states to reduce their reliance on group homes in favor of therapeutic foster homes or wrap-around supports for families who maintain their children, group homes are still considered essential. For youth whose psychosocial and behavioral health issues are best handled by the comprehensive care of a multidisciplinary team, this component of a continuum of services is necessary to ensure that the needs of all children and youth in a community are adequately met, and that they are safe and developmentally thriving. Group homes typically provide structure and resocialization on a 24- hour basis, ensure safety from problematic families and neighborhoods while the youth relearns and unlearns negative behaviors, and with the youth's buy-in, establish an individual, tailored treatment approach, supported by a team of trained youth professionals. Although there is a broad range of group home models, certain program elements are standard and associated with highly reputable and quality service delivery, as follows:

- A shared philosophy that is strength based and assigns personal assets to youth in care program objectives that promote positive youth development, rather than a deficit perspective, policing, or punitive adult responses. Teams who build their approach on such agreement are able to establish constructive relationships with young people who need at least one caring, nonparent adult they can trust as they strive to improve and maintain their life skills and functioning.
- A "learning" organizational culture that relies on a positive behavioral reinforcement system that is flexible, organic, predictable, rewarding, and responds to the changing demographics and needs of the residents.
- An individualized treatment approach that centers on the development of an individual treatment plan (ITP) that is owned by the youth, designed with the resident's input, and engages the family, when possible, as well as other important stakeholders. This plan also addresses the resident's transition from the program and identification of aftercare supports in the community.
- A culturally competent staff development and training model that goes beyond minimal governmental regulations to enhance the team capacity to accurately assess the youth's problems and to facilitate targeted, youth specific strategies for recovery and growth.
- Overall program emphasis on the youth's need to achieve self-sufficiency by age 21. This includes the resident's mastery of basic daily living skills, self-advocacy, and recognition of their expertise regarding their life journey, employment and educational success, and the opportunity to give back to the community through service and contributions. These program elements foster self-worth, confidence and self-esteem in high-risk youth.
- Recognition of the importance of family engagement to access specific cultural knowledge on family as well as cultural resources for both the youth and the program. This minimizes cross-cultural misunderstandings and conflicts and increases the likelihood of family reunification and healthy lifelong adult connections for youth.

Sheryl Brissett Chapman
National Center for Children and Families

See Also: At-Risk Youth Services; Child Welfare Services; Children in Foster Care; Juvenile Delinquents.

Further Readings

Children's Bureau. https://www.childwelfare.gov (Accessed March 2014).

Collins, Mary Elizabeth, Natalie Hill, and Celina Miranda. "Establishing Positive Youth Development Approaches in Group Home Settings: Training Implementation and Evaluation." Child and Adolescent Social Work Journal, v.25 (2008).

Strack, Robert W., Karyn Kai Anderson, Camelia M. Graham, and Naomi Tomoyasu. "Race-Gender Differences in Risk and Protective Factors Among Youth in Residential Group Homes." Child and Adolescent Social Work Journal, v.24 (2007).

Group Therapy

Group therapy is a form of psychotherapy in which one or more therapists conduct psychotherapy with a group of patients. The roots of group therapy are in the practice of medicine. In the early 1900s, internist Joseph Hersey Pratt held educational meetings for patients with tuberculosis. Pratt's method incorporated inspirational messages and testimonials from successful patients in what Pratt called the lecture method. As Pratt and his colleagues recognized the positive effects of emotional support and patient-to-patient interaction, the medical element of the lecture method diminished. Pratt's method was used with patients with a wide array of chronic illnesses, and ultimately with psychiatric patients as part of a movement to promote social, recreational, and creative groups as treatment modalities. A support group, Recovery, Inc., extended benefits of group interaction to discharged psychiatric patients. By the 1940s, group therapists organized their efforts and founded the American Group Psychotherapy Association (AGPA), which defines group psychotherapy and ethical practice. AGPA also generates clinical guidelines and compiles research results that define the best clinical practices. In 2007, AGPA developed formal guidelines for group psychotherapy.

Practitioners

The American Group Psychotherapy Association regulates the practice of group psychotherapy. Psychiatrists, psychologists, counselors, social workers, and psychiatric nurses may conduct group therapy as part of their regular practices. Activity therapists may also do extensive group work with psychiatric patients, but most of the creative and recreational activities, although therapeutic, do not meet the criteria for group therapy. Self-help groups, even though they may be professionally facilitated at times, are also excluded from the definition of group therapy.

Types of Groups

The group format can be open to changes in membership or closed, meaning maintaining the same membership for all sessions. Generally, closed groups also have a set number of sessions, allowing for the development of intense dynamics among members. A typical closed group has eight members and meets for eight sessions. Open groups are usually ongoing, with no limit to the number of sessions that any one member can attend. Due to the fluid membership of open groups, trust levels may fluctuate, and members may be reticent to self-disclose as new members join the group.

Group Process

The first step in the process of group therapy is client selection. Therapists may select group members from their own individual cases. Conjoint therapy occurs when group members are receiving individual therapy from a therapist other than the group therapist, and is most successful when the therapists can freely communicate with each other. Homogenous groups serve a specific population, such as men, women, adolescents, or veterans. Heterogeneous groups are demographically diverse, but often address an issue that group members share, such as depression, anxiety, addiction, grief, or adjustment.

A group therapy session usually meets for 90 minutes. Group process refers to how the group and therapist interact. Task groups carry out goal-driven activities assigned by the therapist and process their experiences when the task is complete. Psychoeducational groups focus on a single factor and begin with the therapist presenting information to the group. After the educational presentation, the therapist facilitates a discussion pertinent to the subject of the presentation. Traditional group therapy, however, has a more open format. The therapist guides the interaction of the group members, whose issues often emerge in the course of the session.

Psychotherapy groups progress in stages. In the initial stage of group therapy, the therapist and participants introduce themselves. The therapist may then review the procedures and ground rules for each group session. Some therapists enlist input about ground rules from the group members. In the first one or two sessions, the therapist may be very active in directing the interactions of the group members.

During this early phase of the group process, the therapist may encourage group members to address any apprehension they have about being in the group, setting the stage for members to begin disclosing their emotional experiences. The second stage of group therapy is the working stage. An effective group therapist often expedites movement to the working stage by exploring resistance to the group process. During the working stage, group members identify and resolve tension in the group, listen to and give feedback on each other's issues, and express emotions openly. In the closing stages of the group process, members are able to articulate what they have gained from their participation and say good-bye to the rest of the group. In a successful group, the therapist's participation decreases as the group progresses. The group members, by the final stage of group therapy, should be interacting with very little input from the therapist.

Inpatient psychotherapy groups do not have a stable membership, so trust may be difficult to establish. In 1983, psychiatrist Irvin Yalom introduced a model for conducting groups in inpatient settings, where group membership changes rapidly. In Yalom's model, each group session is self-contained. Tasks of the beginning, middle, and closing sessions of a traditional group are included in every session. In the initial stage, each patient identifies a problem he or she would like to work on, and states how the group might be of help. A closely facilitated work stage follows. In the final stage of the therapy, members summarize what they are able to take from the session. Within the parameters of Yalom's model, group members may learn basic interpersonal skills, such as how to take turns, how to give support, and how to work with others. Members have an opportunity to feel the support of others as well as the opportunity to develop a sense of purpose and belongingness.

Group therapy is often conducted in institutional settings, such as locked psychiatric facilities, residential programs, and correctional facilities. In some residential and hospital settings, privileges are contingent upon attendance and participation in group therapy. A challenge of correctional therapy groups is to overcome the inherent distrust of both peers and staff. Court-mandated outpatient groups, and groups required for reinstatement to employment, are similar to institutional groups. Participants of such groups may resist therapy by being disruptive, hostile, or insincere. Difficult clients and other group members often benefit from working through this type of resistance.

Environmental factors can also affect the group process. Ideally, group therapy is conducted in an environment that provides privacy and safety from interruptions. Typical therapy groups sit in a circle of chairs that are approximately the same size and height. If a regular group member is not in attendance, the extra chair is removed. The day, time, and location of the group, as well as the furniture, lighting, and noise from surrounding activities, can influence the quality of participation in a therapy group. Each member of a group should be able to see and communicate with all other members. Skilled therapists give advanced notice that food, drink, cell phones, or any other distracting items are not permitted in the circle.

Group Facilitation

Effective group therapists integrate the components of individual dynamics, interpersonal dynamics, diversity, and whole group dynamics to promote therapeutic outcomes. Content and process are essential components of group work. Content includes the stories and issues of the individual group members. Process refers to what occurs within, between, and among group members. Group process is the core of group therapy, and effective group therapists provide process observations that promote insight and change in the group members. Therapists who are excessively active in the group process diminish opportunities for group members to participate. Effective group facilitators are skilled at maintaining therapeutic silence.

Conversely, if a group leader provides too little intervention, group members will often assume the leadership of the group. Some therapy groups have cotherapists who work together to provide process observations and direct interaction. An excellent collegial relationship between cotherapists assures that they can read each other's intentions, build upon each other's interventions, and model open and direct communication. The group therapist monitors individual dynamics, such as emotional responses, insight, and energy. Interpersonal dynamics include patterns of exchanges between and among group members and the therapist. Whole group dynamics are monitored to assess the group's progress through the stages of group development and to assure adherence to therapeutic objectives.

Effective group therapists are skilled at processing the dynamics of diversity. Fundamental attribution errors rooted in a client's experiences of age, gender, sexual orientation, racial, or ethnic differences can be an obstacle to deeper personal work. Minorities generally have less access to health care and may be referred to cost-effective therapy groups rather than individual therapy without consideration of cultural norms regarding disclosure of problems outside of the family unit. From a socioeconomic standpoint, shame may be triggered in a group member who is of a significantly lower socioeconomic status than other group members. Culturally competent therapists mobilize the dynamics of diversity to assist clients in the pursuit of their individual treatment goals as they monitor their own internal processes.

Theories of Group Therapy

A therapist's theoretical orientation structures how the therapist conceptualizes cases and conducts therapy. Psychoanalyst Trigant Burrow conducted the first theory-driven therapy groups. In what he termed "group analysis," Burrow processed group dynamics as they occurred, establishing the interaction of the group as a type of free association. Psychoanalytic therapy groups explore underlying fears, avoidance of conflict, ego defense strategies, and transference. Group analysis leads to insight, catharsis, and personal responsibility. Neo-Freudian Carl Jung initially forbade the use of Jungian techniques in groups, but contemporary Jungian therapists recognize the goodness of fit between group therapy and Jungian creative techniques. Alfred Adler's work focused on the client in a social context, and Adlerian group therapy provides a format amenable to the exploration of clients' relationships with others.

Humanistic theorists base their work on the premise that humans inherently seek to reach their full potential. Carl Rogers, the founder of person-centered therapy, purported that therapy groups recognized the unhealthy aspects of their processes and sought to eliminate those processes so a healthier group could emerge. Gestalt therapy is a directive, phenomenological approach that requires participation in so-called experiments designed by the therapist. Gestalt theory asserts that human suffering emerges from unfinished business of the past and anxiety about the future. Gestalt therapists work in the here and now to assist clients in fully experiencing the present moment. Gestalt techniques of enacting and exaggerating interpersonal dynamics are easily adapted for use in group therapy.

Cognitive behavioral therapy is based upon the premise that patterns of thinking determine emotions. Cognitive restructuring changes thinking patterns that cause or exacerbate anxiety, depression, and distress by disputing the faulty beliefs, guiding clients in developing and practicing new ways of thinking, and assigning behavioral tasks from which the client can develop new ways of responding to difficult situations. Cognitive behavioral therapy is a preferred treatment for mental and emotional disorders, including anxiety, depression, and addiction.

Group therapy is a clinically effective approach that is also cost-effective. Clients and third-party payers incur fewer expenses than they would for individual therapy, and the therapists, with multiple payers for a single session, can earn more than they would for a session of individual psychotherapy. Evidence-based practice refers to treatments that research has proven to be effective. Cognitive and behavioral approaches are widely researched with favorable results. The empirical evidence does not rule out the effectiveness of psychoanalytic and humanistic approaches, which are difficult to study.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Webster University

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Peer Support and Counseling Services.

Further Readings

Corey, Marianne S., Cindy Corey, and Gerald Corey. Groups: Process and Practice. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole Publishing, 2010.

Ettin, M. F. "The Spirit of Jungian Group Psychotherapy: From Taboo to Totem." International Journal of Group Psychotherapy, v.4 (1995).

Perls, Frederick S. Gestalt Therapy Verbatim. Boulder, CO: Real People Press, 1969.

"Practice Guidelines for Group Psychotherapy." American Group Therapy Association. http://www.agpa.org/guidelines (Accessed August 2013).

Roller, B. and V. Nelson. The Art of Co-Therapy: How Therapists Work Together. New York: Guilford, 1991.

Yalom, Irvin D. Inpatient Group Psychotherapy. New York: Perseus, 1983.

Yalom, Irvin D. Theory and Practice of Group Psychotherapy. New York: Perseus, 2005.

H

Habitat for Humanity

Habitat for Humanity International (HFHI, or Habitat) was founded by Millard and Linda Fuller in 1967. It is a nonprofit, Christian housing ministry that believes that every man, woman, and child should have a decent, safe, and affordable place to live. Its operational headquarters are located in Americus, Georgia, and its administrative headquarters are in Atlanta, Georgia. Habitat builds and repairs houses all over the world using volunteer labor and donations. Homeowners invest hundreds of hours of their own labor into building their own Habitat house and the houses of others.

Habitat affiliates are community-level Habitat for Humanity offices that act in partnership with and on behalf of HFHI. Each affiliate coordinates all aspects of Habitat home-building in its local area. Affiliates are formed by a group of concerned citizens who want to address the problem of poverty housing in their community. These citizens research the community's needs and resources, and they evaluate the potential success of Habitat's model in their community. The group then applies to HFHI for formal affiliation.

Affiliates operate within the framework of the Habitat Affiliate Covenant but remain independently run, nonprofit organizations. Habitat affiliates build houses, while HFHI provides a wide range of support services and resources. Some affiliates in developing countries also receive funding grants from HFHI. All Habitat affiliates are asked to tithe a percentage of their contributions to fund house-building work in other nations. These contributions provide much-needed funds for international building and give affiliates the opportunity to demonstrate the spirit of Christian partnership.

As a nonprofit, ecumenical Christian ministry that builds for people in need regardless of race or religion, HFHI welcomes volunteers and supporters from all backgrounds. Habitat includes more than 1,500 local U.S. affiliates and more than 80 national organizations around the world. They are controlled and managed by an ecumenical, international board of directors who are deeply concerned about the problems of poverty housing around the world. Habitat relies on gifts from individuals, corporations, and other groups to fund its house-building mission worldwide. Designated donations are allocated in support of specific affiliates, national organizations, or programs of the donor's choosing. Undesignated gifts are invested through the Global Impact Fund to projects with the greatest impact. Habitat has built or repaired more than 600,000 houses and has served more than 3 million people worldwide. In fiscal year 2012, HFHI served a record 94,618 families worldwide through construction, rehabilitation, and repairs.

The world presently is experiencing a global housing crisis. Globally, nearly 2 billion people live in slum housing, and more than 100 million are homeless. In the United States alone, 48.5 million people are living in poverty. The minimum wage is not keeping up with the rising cost of living, and many workers struggle to afford decent housing. Lack of clean water and sanitation claim the lives of more than 1.8 million young children every year. The percentage of people without access to decent, stable housing is rising. Habitat helps by building or renovating simple, decent houses in partnership with those in need. Families left homeless by natural disasters, war, and civil unrest often face dire housing situations as they struggle to rebuild their lives. HFHI provides shelter and housing assistance to help these families recover. In the United States, Habitat's partner homeowners' no-interest monthly mortgage payments are used to build more Habitat houses. On a global scale, Habitat uses innovative housing finance practices and/or partnerships with microfinance organizations to build and repair homes. Donations to Habitat for Humanity provide vital financial support to help the organization build and repair houses. In addition, more than 1 million people volunteer annually to assist with Habitat's construction projects under trained supervision.

San Antonio-area U.S. Navy sailors volunteer to help build a house for Habitat for Humanity in 2011. Habitat for Humanity builds and repairs houses all over the world using volunteer labor and donations. Homeowners invest hundreds of hours of their own labor into building their own Habitat house and the houses of others.

Habitat's vision is "a world where everyone has a decent place to live." Its mission statement is, "Seeking to put God's love into action, Habitat for Humanity brings people together to build homes, communities and hope." The organization operates under five guiding principles. First is to demonstrate the love of Jesus Christ. Second is to focus on shelter in order to create opportunities for all people to live in decent, durable shelter. Third is to advocate for affordable housing—Habitat supports the global community's commitment to housing as a basic human right and advocates for just and fair housing policies. The fourth principle is to promote dignity and hope. Last, the fifth principle is to support sustainable and transformational development.

Individuals in need of decent, affordable housing can contact their local Habitat for Humanity affiliate to apply. The local affiliate will explain the application process and provide information on the availability, size, and cost of Habitat homes in the area. A list of local affiliates can be obtained by using the online search tool (http://www.habitat.org/local/) or by calling a help line.

Each Habitat affiliate follows a nondiscriminatory partner family selection policy to become Habitat homeowners. Neither race nor religion is a factor. Partner families are always selected based on their level of need, ability to pay, and willingness to partner. Generally, this includes those whose income is 30 to 50 percent of the area's median income. Prospective Habitat homeowner families typically make a $500 down payment and contribute 300 to 500 hours of sweat equity on the construction of their home or someone else's home. Mortgage payments are kept affordable because Habitat houses are built using donations of land, material, and labor.

Habitat works with the government in several ways. First, it asks legislators and housing regulators to increase support for affordable homeownership and eliminate poverty housing. Second, Habitat monitors public policies related to housing, community, and international development. Third, Habitat advocates policy choices that increase access to decent, affordable housing for people around the world. Fourth, Habitat also accepts government funds as long as they have no conditions that would violate the principles or limit its ability to proclaim its Christian identity.

M. Scott Young
University of South Florida

See Also: Grassroots Leadership; Homelessness; Housing Services; Housing Support and Homeless Services; Natural Disasters, Service for.

Further Readings

Habitat for Humanity International. "Annual Report FY2012: Why We Build Homes, Communities, and Hope." http://www.habitat.org/sites/default/files/annual-report-2012.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Habitat for Humanity International. "Program Milestones FY2012: Why We Build Homes, Communities, and Hope." http://www.habitat.org/sites/default/files/how_programmilestones_2012.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Youngs, Bettie B. The House That Love Built: The Story of Linda & Millard Fuller, Founders of Habitat for Humanity and the Fuller Center for Housing. Newburyport, MA: Hampton Roads, 2007.

Haitian Americans

The term Haitian Americans refers to an immigrant, diasporic, and ethnic group composed of individuals who have immigrated from the country of Haiti to the United States and whose children were born in the United States. Like African Americans, Haitian Americans are a people of African ancestry and cultural heritage. Enslaved Africans who were brought by European slave traders to the Americas founded the land of Saint-Domingue-Haiti in 1804. After 13 years of strenuous wars against Spain, Britain, and France from 1791 to 1804, commonly known as the Haitian Revolution, Haiti became the first postcolonial black-ruled state and second independent country, succeeding the United States, in the Western world.

Precisely, the phrase Haitian Americans denotes individuals who have acquired U.S. citizenship either by way of naturalization or natural birth. The history of the Haitian immigration or diaspora in the United States should be studied and understood from the different angles of the social, economic, and political factors that shaped the Haitian experience and forced many native-born Haitians to escape oppression and poverty in hopes of finding a better life in the receiving country. The reality of the diasporic experience played a major role, as Haitians had to learn to forge a new transnational ethnic identity and culture as well as new cross-cultural relationships and alliances in the land of resettlement. Haitians also had to adopt and regroup themselves in large Haitian American ethnic communities across the states in search of survival, hope, opportunity, and political peace, as well as in the pursuit of the American dream. Because of the important place of revolutionary Haiti in world history and its historic contributions to slave abolition, human rights, and freedom, Haitian immigrants came to the United States with a sense of dignity and racial pride of their heritage and history.

Haitian immigration to the United States chiefly came in three peak periods. The earliest presence and settlement of Haitian immigrants in various U.S. cities (e.g., New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Savannah, Charleston, and New Orleans) occurred during the turbulent era of the Haitian Revolution. The brutal period of U.S. occupation of Haiti (1915–34) also drove many Haitians away from their native land to establish a diasporic enclave in New York City and Boston, and to join family members in other northern and northeastern cities in the United States.

The third mass exodus of Haitian immigrants to the United States occurred during the ruthless and oppressive years of the Duvalier regimes of François Duvalier ("Papa Doc") and Jean-Claude Duvalier ("Baby Doc"), in 1960–71 and 1972–86, respectively. In the 1950s and 1960s, the United States received a substantial number of professional and highly skilled Haitians who either had been forced into exile or left the country voluntarily because of the Duvalier totalitarianism. Likewise, in the 1970s and 1980s, South Florida received a significant group from the middle- and lower-middle–class Haitian society. They settled in various communities in Miami, Fort Lauderdale, Pompano Beach, and West Palm Beach. Today, the Haitian ethnic communities constitute a dynamic and visible presence in four major U.S. cities: New York, Miami, Boston, and Chicago, contributing to the cultural mosaic of the United States.

The plight of Haitian immigrants is widely known in the United States. According to Haitian scholar Flore Zephir, an estimate of "between 30,000 and 60,000 people were killed by state terrorism" during Papa Doc's 14-year reign; similarly, political corruption, state violence, and extreme poverty in both urban Haiti and the rural areas intensified under Baby Doc's despotic government. As a result, undocumented immigrants, who the U.S. media called "the Haitian boat people," came to the United States in the second half of the 20th century, especially in the late 1970s and early 1980s, leaving their homeland for socioeconomic and political reasons. During the Carter and Reagan administrations, the Haitian boat people were considered economic refugees and therefore were placed in various U.S. detention camps or prisons in several states, where they experienced hardships, discrimination, isolation, and ultimately deportation.

Grass-roots movements, human rights and humanitarian groups, and sociopolitical activists (e.g., the Congregational Black Caucus, the U.S. Roman Catholic bishops, the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, or AFLCIO; and the Council on Hemispheric Affairs) responded swiftly and criticized the U.S. mistreatment of and racism toward Haitians and the violation of their human rights. Haitian boat people, however, were never granted refugee status by the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service *(*INS; now the Citizenship and Immigration Services, or USCIS, and the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE).

Interestingly, Cuban immigrants who left their country for similar reasons were treated differently as political refugees. The Immigration and Naturalization Service granted political asylum to practically all of them; Cuban immigrants also received financial assistance from the state of Florida and were given free cultural coaching and educational training on how to adapt and assimilate in the host land.

In March 1983, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) accused Haitians along with homosexuals, intravenous drug abusers, and hemophiliacs as being high-risk groups for the acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) and for introducing and spreading this newly discovered disease. Haitians also were labeled as disease-ridden voodoo (Haitian vodou) practitioners and illiterate immigrants. Haitian community leaders and activists in New York, Boston, Miami, Chicago, Washington, and other U.S. communities (both black and white) were outraged and urged the federal government to "fight AIDS, not nationality." Like any other ethnic groups, Haitians are determined to stay in the United States and will not return to their home country. The Haitian American diaspora believes in the U.S. promise and ideals of liberty, equality, and justice for all.

The Haitian Way of Life in America

Haitian Americans are a resilient people, attesting to their ability to survive in mainstream U.S. society. As Zephir puts it, "They have the ability to live through the best of times and the worst of times."

The population of the Haitian American diaspora is estimated at 1 million, commonly viewed as Haiti's so-called tenth department, as the country itself is divided into nine governmental or organizational departments. Michel S. Laguerre argues that the immigrant life of Haitian Americans is marked by "continuity" rather than "disruption," and "rerootedness" rather than "uprootedness." Zephir describes Haitian American ethnic communities as "a heterogeneous group, reflecting the various strata of Haitian society." For example, poor Haitian Americans settle in areas of New York that are distinct from districts settled by the upper classes. Language is also important in establishing class distinction, color discrimination, and social segregation or alienation among Haitian American compatriots. According to J. Michael Dash, because of the social stigma attached to the Creole language, upper-class and light-skinned Haitian Americans insist on using the French language as a vehicle to achieve social mobility in the United States and isolate themselves from the predominantly lower-class Haitians.

The Haitian American diaspora actively engages itself in transnational ethnic practices and border-crossing cultural performances. For example, Little Haiti in Miami, an extension of the homeland, in the words of Laguerre, "represents the rerootedness of a large spectrum of the population of Haiti and constitutes one visible point of insertion of the diaspora in American society"—where different forms and manifestations of transnational practices and cultural traditions are more noticeable. Religion and the Creole language are central to the Haitian American ethnic identity and cultural practice in the United States. Haitian Creole serves distinctively as a cultural marker, as Haitian Americans are the largest Creole-speaking immigrant group. As it is customary in the homeland, Haitian American religious services in Protestant and Catholic churches are conducted almost exclusively in Creole and French. Haitian Vodou temples can be found in various diasporic locations in Miami, Boston, Louisiana, and New York. In her anthropological fieldwork, Zephir observes that adherents to the Vodou faith attend services regularly; Vodou priests (ougans) and priestesses (mambos) conduct their routines privately in their homes, and they are known to the community where word of mouth (*teledyo*l) is always a good source of information. Vodou ministers provide healing to the faithful, comfort in time of distress, and are cultural and spiritual advisors to various Haitian American communities.

Haitian Americans form a vibrant cultural symbol and have a dynamic presence in U.S. life; they intermingle with white Americans and other ethnic groups such as African Americans and other Caribbean immigrants. In highly concentrated Haitian populations, such as in New York, Miami, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago, Haitian Americans have established their own businesses, clubs, music shops, money transfer companies, restaurants, and community and cultural centers. They also have created Haitian media outlets (e.g., Tele Kreyol, Tele Diaspora, Tele Energie, Obri Blag, Piman Bouk, Radio Lakay, Radyo Pa Nou, Radio l'Union), and political and human rights organizations, such as the National Coalition for Haitian Rights, Haitian-Americans United (HAU), Haitian American Community Association of Dade (HACAD), Haitian American Foundation (HAFI), and Haitian Women of Miami (FANM). Haitian Americans have their own multilingual newspapers (the Haitian Times, Boston Haitian Reporter, Creole Connection, Haiti Observateur, Haiti en Marche, and Haiti Progres) and scholarly journals and organizations (the Journal of Haitian Studies, KOSANBA, Haitian Studies Association, Le Club Haitien de St. Louis, Association for Haitian American Development (AHAD), and Haitian-American Professionals and Entrepreneurs (SHAPE)), which publish in Creole, French, and English.

Integration and Assimilation and the Impact on American Life

The ethos of the Haitian American life is full of complexity and paradoxes. Zephir has grouped second-generation Haitian Americans into three broad categories: (1) "those who display a strong form of Haitianess; (2) those who display a weaker form of Haitianess; and (3) those who have absolutely nothing to do with Haiti, the undercovers." Whereas the first Haitian immigrants, who had immigrated to the states in their adolescence, have to some degree managed to isolate themselves from the greater U.S. society, second-generation Haitian Americans, who were born in the United States or had arrived before adolescence, are fully integrated and assimilated in the U.S. culture. Second-generation Haitian

Americans are more heterogeneous in their thinking, cultural practices, and lifestyle than those of the first generation; they possess a native command of the English language and U.S. culture, but they are not fluent in Creole nor are they well versed in the cultural traditions of their parents' homeland. They are more comfortable in the U.S. culture than in the traditional Haitian way of life. Those who have called themselves African Americans rather then Haitian Americans do not exhibit outright Haitianess and do not champion their heritage or history as their parents do.

A large segment of the second-generation Haitian American population, however, has committed itself to the Haitian community and cultural heritage as well as to the U.S. cultural value system and life. The Haitian American impact on U.S. society is substantial, and Haitian Americans have become "a significant component of the fabric of contemporary American society," according to Zephir. As any other ethnic groups in the United States, Haitian Americans have also achieved the American dream.

Among the well-known Haitian Americans are Wyclef Jean, hip-hop artist and composer; Victoria Duval, professional tennis player; Samuel Dalembert, National Basketball Association (NBA) center; Vladimir Ducasse, offensive tackle for the New York Jets; Pierre Thomas, running back for the New Orleans Saints; Jozy Altidore, soccer player for Sunderland; Edwidge Danticat, novelist; Jean-Michel Basquiat, artist and painter; Garcelle Bauvais, actress and model; Ludmya Bourdeau Love, politician and mayor of Saratoga Springs, Utah; Marjorie Judith, former journalist and 1991 Miss America; Marvin Bernard (Tony Yayo), chief executive officer (CEO) of G-Unit Philly and rapper; Marie St. Fleur, former Massachusetts State House representative; Sybil Elias, municipal court judge in East Orange, New Jersey; Rodrigue Mortel, well-known specialist in women's cancer; and Dumarsais Siméus, chairman and CEO of Siméus Foods International, Inc. (SFI). Furthermore, many Haitian Americans are currently serving in U.S. political life, including Massachusetts State senator Linda Dorcena Forry, member of the Florida House of Representatives Ronald Brise, New York City councilman Mathieu Eugene, and Illinois State senator Kwame Raoul. In various degrees and different ways, the Haitian American diaspora has made recognizable contributions to U.S. society.

Haitian Americans continue to contribute to the advancement of U.S. civilization and its democratic experiment—from Haitians fighting for U.S. freedom in the American War of Independence in Savannah, Georgia; to former Haitian slaves inspiring the American Civil War against slavery; to Jean Baptiste Point du Sable, the "Founder of Chicago." Nevertheless, the Haitian American population continues to experience ongoing challenges in 21st-century America. Haitian Americans in Miami, New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia struggle to find employment, to secure suitable housing, and to support their children through school.

The poverty line in the Haitian community, especially in south Florida and New York, surpasses any other ethnic group in the United States. The population does not have adequate educational preparation and training to meet the high demands of today's technological age, nor does it have the financial resources to afford adequate medical services and competent mental health that are culturally and linguistically sensitive. In addition, the U.S. anti-immigrant political climate affects Haitian refugees and their families more than any other ethnic group in south Florida; subsequently, Haitian refugees continue to be subject to an indefinite detention policy. These areas are real challenges to take into account in providing human services to and fulfilling the unmet needs of the Haitian American population in the 21st century.

Celucien L. Joseph
Indian River State College

See Also: Housing Services; Low-Income Housing Tax Credits; Supported Housing.

Further References

Dash, J. Michael. Culture and Customs of Haiti. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2001.

Laguerre, Michel S. American Odyssey: Haitians in New York City. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1984.

Laguerre, Michel S. Diasporic Citizenship: Haitian Americans in Transnational America. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Zephir, Flore. The New Americans: The Haitian Americans. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2004.

Harm Reduction Programs

Harm reduction programs utilize a public health approach to alcohol and substance use that relies on principles and practices designed to reduce the personal, familial, and societal harms of substance use without requiring abstinence. Unlike treatment programs that require abstinence from alcohol and other drugs (AOD), harm reduction practitioners and programs conceptualize abstinence at the end of a larger range of positive outcomes. These outcomes include reduced substance use; safer use of substances (e.g., avoiding sharing needles, using clean needles); the use of safer substance alternatives (e.g., methadone or buprenorphine instead of heroin); the provision of housing and other medical, social, or psychiatric services that are not contingent upon abstinence; and the use of education to help people manage symptoms and develop healthier lifestyles and habits.

The most widely recognized harm reduction programs include needle exchanges in which intravenous drug users exchange used (dirty) needles for clean needles. Another common harm reduction program includes opioid replacement therapy, whereby addicted persons substitute the opioid heroin for supervised use of the synthetic opioids methadone or buprenorphine (e.g., Suboxone). These substances are longer acting, do not require intravenous administration, and produce fewer euphoric effects than heroin, making them less dangerous. Another form of harm reduction treatment is the use of the opioid antagonist naltrexone. This substance blocks the euphoric effects of opioids and alcohol and can assist addicted individuals in managing the cravings associated with addiction. Harm reduction practices in community mental health settings can include providing low-threshold access to desired services and other practical supports without requiring abstinence as well the provision of unconditional support, motivational strategies, and education and practical guidance to reduce the harmful effects of AOD use.

Harm reduction practice requires human service practitioners to respect consumers' decisions to use substances and to be tolerant of substance use behaviors while encouraging open dialogue around substance use in order to develop collaborative partnerships with consumers designed to support them in seeking out healthier and safer alternatives. Harm reduction started in the Netherlands in the early 1980s as a response to the rising prevalence of hepatitis and human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) among intravenous drug users. Street workers would engage in assertive outreach efforts to identify drug users and provide them with access to clean needles, safe housing, and places supervised by medical personnel so that they could use drugs more safely. Other strategies included the provision of educational pamphlets that contain information regarding safe sexual and drug use practices and opportunities to enter into treatment programs. These interventions led to a reduction in the spread of infectious diseases, including hepatitis and HIV. Harm reduction programs soon spread to other parts of northern and western Europe and Australia.

Harm reduction remains a controversial approach in the United States, although less so recently, because it contradicts a U.S. drug policy that has focused mainly on controlling supply through interdiction and punishment of drug users at the expense of reducing demand or providing treatment. In the United States, AOD treatment has also remained focused mainly on abstinence. Critiques of harm reduction have included claims that the approach condones drug use and thereby increases the use of drugs and riskier forms of drug use such as intravenous. Another critique is that harm reduction programs shield drug users from the natural consequences of their actions, thereby enabling drug users to continue their problematic behaviors. These claims have largely gone unsupported. Needle exchange and methadone maintenance programs have been shown to significantly reduce the rates of overdoses and infectious disease transmission without increasing the incidence of drug use. Likewise, the provision of on-demand independent housing and other community-based physical and mental health services have led to higher rates of engagement and retention in services, an increase in stable housing, and higher consumer satisfaction without a corresponding increase in drug and alcohol use. However, practitioners often struggle to practice harm reduction due to the high tolerance of drug-using behaviors the approach requires. Adequate ongoing supervision and training are necessary for the effective implementation of the approach.

Michael A. Mancini
Saint Louis University

See Also: Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services; Medical Necessity; Mental Health Services, Adult.

Further Reading

Ball, J. C. and A. Ross. The Effectiveness of Methadone Maintenance Treatment. New York: Springer Verlag, 1991.

Brocato, J. and E. Wagner. "Harm Reduction: A Social Work Practice Model and Social Justice Agenda." Health and Social Work, v.28/2 (2003).

Denning, P. "Strategies for Implementation of Harm Reduction in Treatment Settings." Journal of Psychoactive Drugs, v.33 (2001).

Des Jarlais, D. C., C. McKnight, C. Goldblatt, and D. Purchase, D. "Doing Harm Reduction Better: Syringe Exchange in the United States." Addiction, v.104 (2009).

MacCoun, R. J. "Toward a Psychology of Harm Reduction." American Psychologist, v.11 (1998).

MacMaster, S. A. "Harm Reduction: A New Perspective on Substance Abuse Services." Social Work, v.49/3 (2004).

Mancini, M.A. and W. Wyrick-Waugh. "Practitioners and Consumers Perspectives on Harm Reduction in a Community Mental Health Setting." Community Mental Health Journal, v.49/1 (2013).

Marlatt, A. G. "Harm Reduction: Come as You Are." Addictive Behaviors, v.21 (1996).

Weingardt, K. R. and G. A. Marlatt. "Harm Reduction and Public Policy." In G. A. Marlatt, ed., Harm Reduction: Pragmatic Strategies for Managing High-Risk Behaviors. New York: Guilford Press, 1998.

Hate Groups

Hate groups are organized bodies that target and denigrate specific individuals and groups, often committing crimes against others based on stereotypes, negative biases, prejudices, bigotry, and hatred. The U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) posits that the major goal of these groups is to promote hatred, hostility, and animosity against people belonging to a specific race, ethnicity, or group that may be different from the members of the hate group's organization. The hate crimes in which these groups engage are defined by the U.S. Congress as criminal offenses against individuals or property motivated by biases against a race, religion, disability, ethnic origin, sexual orientation, gender, or gender identity. These crimes against individuals, groups, or property include vandalism, arson, marches, and murder.

Ideologies

Within the United States, hate organizations have based their philosophical or moral views on the following topics:

1. Nonexistence of the Holocaust and revisionist history that claims or minimizes the eradication of more than 6 million Jews and other ethnicities.
2. White superiority with the position that people of color are inferior.
3. Fundamentalist Christianity.
4. Not giving equal rights to lesbians, gays, bisexual, transgendered, questioning, intersex, or asexual individuals (LGBTQIAA).
5. Immigration policies in the United States, with groups asserting vigilante roles in monitoring U.S. borders, restricting access for immigrants to enter the country through illegal means.
6. Ending the spread of Islam in the United States.
7. Not paying taxes nor adhering to U.S. laws or policies.
8. Opposition to racial integration.

Hate Map

The Internet has helped cultivate hate group movements in the United States by using online access as a vehicle for communicating ideologies, recruiting potential members, and invoking hate against targeted groups. The Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), a prominent U.S.-based organization, has consistently monitored activities of hate groups and movements, and has published a hate map and intelligence reports on their activities. SPLC began monitoring hate group activities in the 1980s and has asserted that, since 2000, hate groups have increased by more than 65 percent, with an alarming rate of 1,018 groups in 2012. The SPLC hate map shows the top four states, with reported activities of more than 50 hate groups based on evidence of numerous activities, as California (82), Texas (62), Florida (59), and Georgia (53). The SPLC asserts that these movements are spurred due to many factors, including the increase of people of color as immigrants, the decline of whites in U.S. census figures, and the symbolic election of the first African American and person of color as president of the United States. Racially motivated incidents have accounted for more than 50 percent of hate crimes reported in the United States.

Westboro Baptist Church pickets a Jewish community center. Hate groups are organized bodies that target and denigrate specific individuals and groups.

Major Hate Groups

Ku Klux Klan. The Knights of the Ku Klux Klan (KKK) is a historical organization founded in 1956 in Louisiana. It advocates white supremacy and dominance, racial hatred, prejudice, and segregation. Historically targeting African Americans, the KKK has expanded its hate propaganda against immigrants, Jewish people, some Christian groups, and the LGBTQIAA community. The KKK boasts of owning the largest number of organized hate groups in the United States. It has also collaborated with other hate groups—skinheads, Neo-Nazis, and White Nationalist movements—in purporting white supremacist propaganda and actions in many U.S. states. These actions include symbolic efforts such as committing hate crimes, encouraging members to distribute flyers in communities and on college campuses, and producing online video games with images of swastikas advocating for white dominance and hatred.

Patriot Movement. The Patriot Movement targets the federal government with the belief that government is the enemy. The group arose in the latter part of the 1990s after a series of antigovernment protests, including the 1993 Waco conflict in Texas and the 1996 Oklahoma City bombings. Mark Potok has asserted that the Patriot Movement's numbers have shifted, with about 858 in 1996, 512 in 2009, and an increase to 1,274 organizations in 2012. These groups are described as militias who are opposed to paying taxes and are concerned that the federal government will take away people's rights regarding gun ownership.

American Family Association. The American Family Association (AFA) was founded by Donald E. Wildmon in 1977. Originally known as the National Federation for Decency, the name changed to American Family Association in 1988. Its advocacy borders around strengthening U.S. moral values with activism directed toward the preservation of marriage and family. The SPLC has labeled the AFA as a hate group based on its biblical antihomosexuality position. The AFA is outspoken about antigay issues and is strongly opposed to equal rights for LGBTQIAA individuals, including denying them marriage equality or the opportunity to serve in the U.S. military.

Hate Group Monitoring Organizations

Southern Poverty Law Center. The Southern Poverty Law Center is the nation's leading organization that monitors and publishes information on hate groups' activities and movements. It was founded by civil rights lawyers Morris Dees and Joseph Levin Jr. in 1971, and is based in Montgomery, Alabama, with offices around the United States. The SPLC is committed to combating hate, prejudice, and bigotry through advocacy work, publications, and filing lawsuits. Its publications include Teaching Tolerance, a reputable magazine full of teaching materials, which is produced and distributed at no cost to educators around the United States. The SPLC is noted as one of the few organizations that have been able to successfully link the Ku Klux Klan to hate crime activities in a U.S. court. In 1995, the SPLC won the largest case ever fought against a hate group.

Anti-Defamation League. The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) is a premier organization noted for fighting against anti-Semitism. In 1913, attorney Sigmund Livingston gathered Jewish leaders together to create a vehicle to combat bigotry and hate within the fabric of society. This collaboration of people created the organization and currently has offices in 27 regional U.S. branches, including New York City, and in Israel. The ADL is a dominant force in lobbying and advocating Congress and the United Nations to take action against anti-Semitism. The ADL is a leading source on comprehensive resources and curriculum on the Holocaust.

The U.S. government has taken a vocal public stance against hate crimes and organizations. Under its jurisdiction, it has empowered the FBI to investigate and prosecute crimes that are considered hate crimes. In 2009, the Matthew Shepard and James Byrd, Jr., Hate Crimes Prevention Act was created to provide funding to state, local, and tribal jurisdictions to more effectively investigate and prosecute hate crimes.

Omobolade Delano-Oriaran
St. Norbert College

See Also: Ethnocentrism; Power, Race/Ethnicity and; Prejudice, Theories of; Racial and Ethnic Categories, U.S. Census; Racial Microaggression.

Further Readings

American Family Association. http://www.afa.net/ (Accessed August 2013).

Anti-Defamation League. "About the Anti-Defamation League." http://www.adl.org/about-adl (Accessed August 2013).

Brower, Autumn. "Hate Groups and Fear." ETC: A Review of General Semantics, v.66/2 (2009).

Federal Bureau of Investigation. "Hate Crime—Overview." http://www.fbi.gov/about-us/investigate/civilrights/hate_crimes/overview (Accessed August 2013).

McNamee, Lacy G., Brittany L. Peterson, and Jorge Pena. "A Call to Educate, Participate, Invoke and Indict: Understanding the Communication of Online Hate Groups." Communication Monographs, v.77/2 (2010).

Potok, Mark. "The 'Patriot' Movement Explodes." http://www.splcenter.org/get-informed/intelligence-report/browse-all-issues/2012/spring/the-year-in-hate-and-extremism (Accessed August 2013).

Southern Poverty Law Center. "Hate Map." http://www.splcenter.org/get-informed/hate-map (Accessed August 2013).

Southern Poverty Law Center. "Teaching Tolerance." http://www.tolerance.org/magazine/archives (Accessed August 2013).

Southern Poverty Law Center. "Who We Are." http://www.splcenter.org/who-we-are (Accessed August 2013).

Tanenbaum Center for Interreligious Understanding. "Hate Groups/Hate Crimes/Bullying/ Harassment." https://www.tanenbaum.org/sites/default/files/Hate%20Groups%20Hate%20Crimes%20Bullying%20Harassment%20Fact%20Sheet%20FORMATTED.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

U.S. Department of Justice. "Matthew Shepard and James Byrd, Jr., Hate Crimes Prevention Act of 2009." http://www.justice.gov/crt/ about/crm/matthewshepard.php (Accessed August 2013).

Hawaiʻian Native Americans

Native Hawaiʻian Americans, the original peoples of Hawaiʻi, are a community included under the broader designation of Native Hawaiʻian Americans and Pacific Islanders (NHPI), as advocated by the Native Hawaiʻian and Pacific Islander Alliance and the Asian and Pacific Islander American Health Forum as the preferred and appropriate reference to the communities of persons having origins in any of the Hawaiʻian islands, Guam (including people of Chamoru living in Guam), Samoa, Tonga, or other Pacific Islands, including the Federated States of Micronesia, Marshall Islands, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana/Mariana Islands, Palau, Papua New Guinea, the Solomon Islands, and Fiji. The NHPI people represent more than 50 ethnic backgrounds and speak more than 100 different languages.

Pacific peoples are one of the fastest-growing groups in the United States. Whereas NHPI composed approximately 4 percent of the U.S. population in 2000, the 2010 U.S. Census reported that the NHPI population in the United States grew by 40 percent since then. More than 50 percent of Native Hawai‘ian Americans and Pacific Islanders live in Hawai‘i and California. The states with the next-largest NHPI populations are Washington, Texas, Florida, Utah, New York, and Nevada.

Health Disparities Among NHPI People

Extensive public health research has recognized that the NHPI, along with American Indians and Alaska Natives, have suffered from considerable inequities in health status compared to other Americans. Native Hawai‘ians, specifically, have the highest rate of deaths due to cancer (229 per 100,000 people) compared to other groups in Hawai‘i, and the third-highest rate in the United States. Native Hawai‘ians are more than five times as likely to experience diabetes between the ages of 19 and 35 years compared to non-Hawai‘ians (11 percent versus 2 percent) and are more likely and at greater risk to experience morbid conditions more often than other ethnicities living in Hawai‘i. Native Hawai‘ian elders experience shorter life expectancies, poorer overall health, disabilities, lower socioeconomic status, and engage in less interaction with health services compared to elders in other ethnic groups. Hawai‘ian Native Americans generally have low participation in cancer screenings. Advanced disease disparities could be related to these factors.

NHPI, broadly speaking, have a higher risk for developing and dying from cancer, heart disease, diabetes, and other diseases, and have the second-highest rate of diagnoses of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection and the second-shortest acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) survival rate of all Americans. NHPI have been identified as having higher rates of suicide and mental illness, cardiovascular disease and related conditions, and communicable diseases such as tuberculosis, HIV, and hepatitis B. Given the increased risk of developing type 2 diabetes mellitus and obesity, public health services need to understand cultural beliefs and differences when providing care. It is especially vital because the age-adjusted prevalence of type 2 diabetes in this population is 18 years or older (23.7 percent), a rate three times higher, for example, than the non-Hispanic white U.S. population. NHPI also have a higher prevalence of complications from diabetes, including the highest age-adjusted rate of incidence of end-stage kidney failure.

Cultural Values in Health Strategies

Health care providers who are unaware of the rich diversity of NHPI languages and cultures contribute to the lower use of health care resources and preventive care among these people. Few physicians and other health care practitioners, particularly those serving clients in the continental United States, speak NHPI languages.

The Center for Native and Pacific Health Disparities Research of the Department of Native Hawai‘ian Health, the Office of Minority Health of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, and others are collaborating to develop culturally appropriate strategies to help lower the risk of diabetes and other diseases and increase health literacy and awareness among NHPI. Guided by the notion of Ulu Hina, Kū Papa (thriving and enduring), these organizations work with community leaders, policy makers, and health care providers to make meaningful decisions and take informed actions to address health inequities.

Community members recommend Native Hawai‘ian cultural values as a basis for a holistic care model that foregrounds respect, concern, adequate open and direct communication, and understanding of Native Hawai‘ian spiritual beliefs and practices. Important factors are mutual respect between patients and providers, and providers' ability to find appropriate intersections between Western medicine and Native Hawai‘ian cultural practices and cultural history, particularly the interrelatedness of individual, ohana (family), community, and kokua (helping one another). Cultural understanding and community and family involvement at all levels of health care may yield more positive health care experiences and improve health outcomes of NHPI.

Stephanie Salerno
Lara Lengel
Bowling Green State University

See Also: Administration for Native Americans; Alaskan Natives; American Indian Movement; Asian Americans; Asian and Pacific Islander Health Forum; Asian Immigrants; Filipino Americans; National Congress of American Indians; Native Americans; Nutritional Services and Assessment; Pacific Islanders.

Further Readings

Ambrose, Adrian et al. "Geographical Maldistribution of Native Hawaiian and Other Pacific Islander Physicians in Hawaii." Hawaii Journal of Medicine and Public Health, v.71 (2012).

Ka'opua, L. S. "Developing a Culturally Responsive Breast Cancer Screening Promotion with Native Hawaiian Women in Churches." Health & Social Work, v.33 (2008).

King G. L., et al. "Understanding and Addressing Unique Needs of Diabetes in Asian Americans, Native Hawaiians, and Pacific Islanders." Diabetes Care, v.35 (2012).

Lassetter J. H. "The Integral Role of Food in Native Hawaiian Migrants' Perceptions of Health and Well-Being." Journal of Transcultural Nursing, v.22 (2011).

Mokuau, N., C. V. Browne, L. B. Choy, and K. L. Braun. "Using Community-Based Participatory Approach to Create a Resource Center for Native Hawaiian Elders." Education for Health: Change in Learning and Practice, v.21 (2008).

Oliveira, Jill M., A. Aukahi Austin, Robin E. S. Miyamoto, Joseph Keawe'aimoku Kaholokula, K. Beth Yano, and Travis Lunasco. "The Rural Hawaii Behavioral Health Program: Increasing Access to Primary Care Behavioral Health for Native Hawaiians in Rural Settings." Professional Psychology: Research and Practice, v.37 (2006).

Palafox, Neal A., L. Lee Buenconsejo-Lum, M. Ka'ano'i, and S. Yamada. "Cultural Competence: A Proposal for Physicians Reaching Out to Native Hawaiian Patients." Pacific Health Dialogue, v.8 (2001).

Rentner, Terry L., Lynda Dee Dixon, and Lara Lengel. "Critiquing Fetal Alcohol Syndrome Health Communication Campaigns Targeted to American Indians, Native Alaskans, Hawaiians and Pacific Islanders." Journal of Health Communication, v.17 (2012).

Vogler, Joyce, Tanya K. Altmann, and Rick Zoucha. "Native Hawaiian Attitudes of Culturally Sensitive Healthcare Provider Traits and Behaviors." Journal of Cultural Diversity, v.17 (2010).

Head Start and Prekindergarten Programs

In his 1964 State of the Union address, President Lyndon B. Johnson declared a War on Poverty. President Johnson's vision for the Great Society produced an array of legislative reforms aimed at combating poverty and social injustice. One of the first pieces of legislation to emerge out of the Great Society was the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964. This act created a variety of social programs including Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA), the Job Corps, and Project Head Start.

Seeing education as a pathway to end poverty, the Johnson administration commissioned a team of academics, pediatricians, and civil rights activists with the task of designing a social program that would address the inequities in early childhood education. Research revealed that children entering kindergarten from low-income families lagged significantly behind their more affluent peers in early language and literacy skills as well as in their overall school preparedness. This deficit had the potential for long-lasting implications on students' future academic performance and eventual economic and work opportunities. Advocates maintained a poor start in early education would contribute to the continuation of the cycle of poverty. As a result of their efforts, the team of experts led by Sargent Shriver proposed Project Head Start, a federally funded program aimed at bridging the kindergarten readiness gap between economically advantaged and disadvantaged 3- and 4-year-old children. The underlying philosophy was to give children living in poverty a head start on their futures.

By design, the Head Start program created a preschool learning environment focused on developing the whole child. In addition to providing an academic curriculum, Head Start was designed to help foster the social, emotional, and physical development of the child. Its goal was to provide children with access to medical, dental, and mental health, nutrition, and social services, in addition to traditional lesson plans. Its structure was also designed to empower the parents of the preschoolers through education, training, and parental involvement in the program. Head Start was intended to meet both short-term and long-term objectives that would benefit children, their parents, and society as a whole. Project Head Start commenced in summer 1965, with an eight-week pilot program that premiered in more than 2,000 child development centers across the country. This first summer Head Start project served approximately a half million children from low-income families who were preparing to enter kindergarten in the fall.

Head Start Today

Today, Head Start programs can be found in all 50 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the U.S. territories. More than 1 million preschool-age children from low-income families attend Head Start programs each year. Since its beginning, Head Start has provided more than 30 million children with the cognitive tools necessary to start school. Head Start also prepares families for success in the real world by encouraging positive parent-child relationships, community involvement, leadership, and advocacy.

Current data show that the majority of students, more than 60 percent, began a Head Start program at the age of 3 years, and the remainder entered the Head Start program at the age of 4 years. The children come from a variety of racial and ethnic backgrounds: more than one-third of the children enrolled in a Head Start program are of Hispanic or Latino origin, more than one-third of the children identify as African American, and approximately one-fifth to one-quarter are white. In addition, more than 25 percent of the children currently enrolled in a Head Start program are dual language learners. Head Start programs focus on early language, literacy, math, general knowledge, and strategies for learning. They provide services for physical, emotional, and social development, and they emphasize the overall health of the child while being attentive to differences in race, ethnicity, culture, and language.

Head Start has evolved over time, expanding from its original eight-week pilot program to a variety of different formats including both half-day and full-day year-round preschool programs. The programs are offered in a variety of locations as well, including school buildings, home-based child care centers, and even in a child's own home through the home visitor option. Head Start's evolution also includes the birth of the Early Head Start program in 1995. This program is designed to address the cognitive, social, and emotional needs of children beginning at birth. As with Head Start, Early Head Start acknowledges the importance of parental involvement and provides services to support families, including offering prenatal education to expectant mothers.

Research Findings

Studies indicate that children from all economic backgrounds benefit from quality preschool and prekindergarten (pre-K) programs. The research suggests both short-term and long-term benefits from improved literacy skills to success in the labor force. Students entering kindergarten from quality preschool and pre-K programs do better academically in language, literacy, math, and other skills, and they are less likely to repeat a grade than children who do not attend a preschool program. Children who attend preschool or pre-K programs also demonstrate more positive social interaction skills than children who do not.

In 1998, the U.S. Congress mandated that the Department of Health and Human Services collect data on the long-term impact of the Head Start program. These longitudinal studies indicate that Head Start has a positive impact on children's success early on, but there is little evidence to suggest that, in comparison to a control group, attending a Head Start program will produce significantly different outcomes by the end of the third grade. Researchers note, however, that the control group included children who attended other preschool programs. A more recent study suggests that even though the impact of Head Start may dissipate over time for children, the influence on parents proves to be more long-lasting as they tend to continue to play active roles in their children's education over time.

The Future

Pre-K and Head Start programs will likely maintain a significant presence in the U.S. education policy. Like President Johnson, President Barack Obama believes early childhood education can have a positive impact not only on the individual child but also on the larger society. In his 2013 State of the Union address, President Obama called for expanding access to high-quality preschool education for all children, whatever their economic backgrounds. President Obama's plan recommends the development of state and federal partnerships focused on producing high-quality preschools. It also includes a plan for increasing investments in the Head Start and Early Head Start programs and advocates for providing greater access to full-day kindergarten.

Michelle Napierski-Prancl
Russell Sage College

See Also: Day Care for Children; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Parenting Skills Training; Poverty; War on Poverty Programs.

Further Readings

Kagan, Josh. "Empowerment and Education: Civil Rights, Expert-Advocates, and Parent Politics in Head Start, 1964–1980." Teachers College Record, v.104/3 (2002).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of Planning, Research and Evaluation. "Head Start Family and Child Experiences Survey (FACES), 1997–2013." http://www.acf.hhs.gov/programs/opre/research/project/head-start-family-and-child-experiences-survey-faces-1997-2013 (Accessed September 2013).

Wat, Albert. "The Case for Pre-K in Education Reform: A Summary of Program Evaluation Findings." PEW Center on the States: Research Series (April 2012). http://www.pewcenteronthestates.org/preknow (Accessed September 2013).

Health and Sickness, Differing Attitudes Toward

According to Professor Philomena Essed of Antioch University's Leadership and Change program: "Homogeneous societies are quickly becoming relics of the past. Continuing migrations, intercultural communications, international agreements, transnational corporations, [and] cross-cultural coalitions all testify to the fact that we have entered the age of diversity." This fact confronts the United States and other modern societies with serious challenges pertaining to health care and other human services organizations, as health and illness are perceived differently by the various social and ethnic groups.

Defining the Core Concepts

The World Health Organization (WHO) defined health in 1946 as a state of complete physical, mental, and social well-being, and not only as the absence of disease. This definition of health was later developed in the Ottawa Charter (1986) to identify personal and social resources as factors that enable people to set and attain goals and satisfy various needs. Although objective criteria are used to measure and determine health, the definition of health is not confined to the medical context. Health is also perceived by individuals within sociocultural contexts defined by family, social networks, and health providers.

Studies report that people define health in multiple ways. As examples, health is viewed in terms of (1) absence of illness, (2) reserve (e.g., recovering from a surgery rather quickly or having good genes), (3) doing (e.g., regular exercise, a healthy diet), (4) physical fitness and vitality, (5) psychological well-being (e.g., being in harmony and experiencing positive emotions), and (6) independent functioning (i.e., being able to fulfill one's daily duties without being too dependent on support from other people). In most cultures, health is a default state that is often taken for granted until illness or pain is experienced.

To understand the concepts related to health, it is important to differentiate the various concepts related to states of nonhealth. Disease is related to diagnosis and treatment and refers to pathological reactions and states in the body. Illness refers to the experience of having a disease and is related to having a particular disease and how to cope with that. Thus, illness refers to the sociocultural context within which disease is experienced. To a great extent, this experience is dependent on gender, ethnicity, and other sociocultural variables. David Mechanic, a pioneer in the study of illness behavior, describes illness behavior as "the varying ways individuals respond to bodily indications, how they monitor internal states, define and interpret symptoms, make attributions, take remedial actions and utilize various sources of formal and informal care." For instance, people ranking low in socioeconomic status have been shown to delay seeking professional health care even when severe symptoms are present.

Disease and illness do not always presuppose each other. In some cases, disease precedes illness; that is, the disease is diagnosed in a medical examination on the basis of bodily states, changes, and symptoms that the individual has not yet conceived and is not aware of. Thus, disease does not always mean that the individual has felt unwell. In other cases, the experience of disease precedes the diagnosis of it, and this feeling of being unwell may not vanish even after the physician has told the patient that no disease exists.

While disease and illness are connected to the body and to the individual's perception, the term sickness is much broader. This is a societal and cultural term in that it refers to the surrounding environment of the ill and the social status and the meanings associated with a certain disease.

Diversity in Health Perceptions

All cultures encompass health beliefs in order to explain what causes illness, how it can be treated, cured, or managed, and what kinds of people should be a part of this process. Modern Western countries such as the United States view disease as a result of natural phenomena that can be explained scientifically. With this approach, illness is treated by medicines that combat microorganisms and the use of sophisticated technology to diagnose and treat diseases.

Various explanations can be given when discussing specific cases of illness. Endogenous or internal explanations place the causes of ill health within the individual (e.g., genetic factors, lifestyle), whereas exogenous or external explanations place the causes of illness in the environment (e.g., germs, pollution, unhealthy work conditions). Notions of personal responsibility and nonresponsibility or whether ill health can be avoided or is inevitable are also of concern. Many cultures explain some states of illness as being caused by mediated or unmediated causes. Mediated causes are of three kinds: causes related to fate (i.e., God's will), causes imposed unintentionally by looks or words (e.g., evil eye), and causes imposed intentionally through magic or witchcraft. Unmediated causes are related to seasonal changes, for instance, cold or heat.

In discussing differing attitudes toward health and sickness, an interesting question that arises is along what dimensions people make decisions about how to act pertaining to health-related issues. A widely used framework is the health belief model, which identifies four such dimensions—perceived susceptibility, perceived severity, perceived benefits, and perceived barriers. A U.S. study revealed that those using health care services the most were individuals who (1) reported high likeliness for developing or being exposed to a certain disease (susceptibility), (2) viewed these diseases as serious (severity), and (3) saw that seeking medical advice and starting a particular treatment would make a difference (benefits).

Each ethnic group brings its own cultural beliefs to the health care system, and many health care beliefs and health practices differ from those of mainstream U.S. health care culture. Cultural beliefs affect patients' attitudes about medical care and their ability to understand, manage, and cope with the course of an illness, the meaning of a diagnosis, and the consequences of medical treatment. In addition, culture-specific values influence patient roles and expectations, how much information about illness and treatment is desired, how death and dying will be managed, bereavement patterns, gender and family roles, and processes for decision making. Cultures can be formed by communities who share religious beliefs, political beliefs, or similar lifestyles; ethnicity does not have to have much to do with health beliefs.

Many Americans do not have access to regular health care, and this very much impacts health and sickness beliefs. Lack of regular access to care may lead to fatalistic thinking—at the very least, it means that health care–provided screenings are not taking place regularly, and that means that chronic problems are likely to go untreated. Lack of coverage can lead to more reliance on self-treatment or over-the-counter medicines that may not address root causes of ill health. This in turn leads to many people living with chronic, untreated illnesses that impact their quality of life.

Implications of Differing Attitudes Toward Health and Sickness

Large-scale global migrations contribute to heterogeneous and diverse societies, implying that health care practitioners must learn more about the distinctiveness of other cultural and ethnic groups. Heterogeneous societies require diversity-integrated organizations. A prerequisite for achieving this is to have human services professionals who come from diverse backgrounds. An effective human services organization places strong demands on educating, recruiting, and retaining competent and diversity-conscious workers. Human services workers can promote self-efficacy by providing knowledge and access to health-promoting activities.

Strategies for working with clients in multiethnic and culturally diverse societies are to a great extent based on knowledge and personal experience. Effective human services workers make a point to learn about the cultural traditions of the client groups with whom they are working; are attentive to the body language, lack of response, or feelings of tension in their clients; ask clients (and family members) open-ended questions to learn about their assumptions and expectations concerning their health status; and remain nonjudgmental, in particular the clients communicate views signaling values that differ from the human services worker's own views.

Research Outlets

Research in this area is published in scientific journals such as Sociology of Health and Illness, Annual Review of Public Health, Journal of Health and Social Behavior, and Social Science and Medicine.

Ali Kazemi
Diana Stark Ekman
Elisabeth Kylberg
University of Skövde

See Also: Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality; Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Public Health; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health; Social Determinants of Health.

Further Readings

Blaxter, M. Health and Lifestyles. London: Tavistock, 1990.
Essed, P. Diversity: Gender, Colour, and Culture. Amherst, MA: University of Massachusetts Press, 1996.
Radley, A. Making Sense of Illness: The Social Psychology of Health and Disease. London: Sage, 1994.

Health as a Human Right

Health and human rights are intimately related, as the World Health Organization (WHO) notes that the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being. Successive scientific investigations and research have shown that people's health is situated in the complex interactions with their structural and contextual environments. Public health specialists and humanitarian figures, such as Michael Marmot and Paul Farmer (with his work in Haiti and other places), have mapped the relationship between achievement of health and fulfillment of human rights. Linking ill health and infections with inequalities and human suffering, findings have unequivocally laid out that ill health is more often than not a symptom of poverty, violence, and inequality; the fight for healthy outcomes in society has to address these entrenched societal and structural conditions that highlight health as a human right.

What Are Human Rights?

The United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, enacted in 1948, defines human rights as universal, indivisible, interrelated, and inalienable rights inherent to all human beings across the globe without discrimination. The declaration holds states responsible to provide for attainment of human rights and fundamental freedoms of all their citizens without regard to political and socioeconomic contexts. Article 25 of the declaration enshrines the social and economic rights of everyone, leading to the health and well-being of people and their families. It further underscores the health, well-being, and social protection of mothers and children. Achievement of human rights in a community thus involves the achievement of health outcomes.

Meanings of Health

Multiple researchers have documented the polysemous nature of health and uncovered the multiple meanings it carries for global communities. Health means having access to work, money, life balance, sound mental health, and social networks, among other benefits; what is manifest in all these local meanings is the connectedness of the concept of health to the achievement of all other social, economic, and political rights. The right to life, liberty, freedom, security, dignity, nondiscrimination, leisure, work, education, and so on makes life meaningful for human beings physically, mentally, and emotionally. The universally accepted WHO definition of health similarly defines health as a state of complete physical, mental, and social well-being. Therefore, health is not only the absence of illness and disease, but symptomatic of the realization of human rights of communities.

Who Ensures Health and Who Ensures Human Rights?

Per the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the United Nations vests the responsibility of ensuring human rights to citizens in the duty bearers, namely, nation states and their representatives who constitute the governance structure. Extending the duty bearers concept, the responsibility also is vested with the civil society structure and its representatives. The question of health is more complex. There is constant dialogue between the large body of health scholars and practitioners, who hold individual human behavior responsible for health, versus those that hold social and government structures responsible for ensuring healthy outcomes for their citizens. Nevertheless, increasing understanding from a rights-based framework purports that access to health care and health outcomes goes beyond individual behaviors and is not only a social and economic right but also critically important as a civil right to be safeguarded by the governments. The governments who are mandated to take care of the health of their populations too often fail in their duties and neglect the health of their most needy, marginalized population.

Marmot states that the failure to meet the fundamental needs of autonomy, empowerment, and freedom of the citizens leads to ill health. Increasingly, these populations, who are minorities, who face abuse and disenfranchisement, and who are denied a voice, are the ones with the worst health outcomes. These very communities—women, the poor, men who have sex with men, people engaged in sex trade, migrants, refugees, prisoners, and drug users—are the ones most affected by diseases and ill health.

Farmer contends that social and economic inequalities based on race, ethnicity, gender, class, religion, and color are the driving forces behind most human rights violations manifesting in unhealthy outcomes, mortality, and morbidity. Thus, addressing human rights violations—the inherent structural violence in the lives of the marginalized and disadvantaged populations—is critical in ensuring their good health. The most serious epidemics and challenges cannot be reasonably addressed unless these fundamental rights in the communities are protected and health interventions factor these needs into their design.

Health and Human Rights Linkages

WHO noted that promoting and protecting health and respecting, protecting, and fulfilling human rights are inextricably linked. They present three excellent illustrations to bear this out. The first outlines that violations or lack of attention to human rights can have serious health consequences. It includes harmful traditional practices such as female genital mutilation, child marriages, slavery and bonded labor, cross-border and in-country human trafficking, and violence against women and children as circumstances that result in serious health problems.

The second illustration outlines that various health policies and program interventions can promote or violate human rights in their design or implementation and further exacerbate the existing health problems. Examples include ensuring or ignoring the rights to participate, express views, and vote; nondisclosure/privacy; inclusion; and nondiscrimination. This is a very important illustration, as research has noted that much of the health problems are either created or facilitated by faulty program policies and design that do not take a human rights–based approach to programming. The third illustration is that the vulnerability to ill health of global populations can be reduced by taking steps to recognize, respect, protect, and fulfill human rights by ensuring the rights to education, food and nutrition, water, sanitation, protection/security, and information.

Conclusion

As Farmer, Gerald M. Oppenheimer, Marmot and others have outlined, health is a fundamental human right, and achieving the human right of health means individuals have to understand how poverty and structural violence seep into and influence every aspect of health and human rights. The question is how to shift the agenda toward the disenfranchised and the poor. The narrative is well established, as Rudolph Virchow articulated when he said that physicians are the natural attorneys of the poor. Thus, a health angle can promote a broader human rights agenda, and a rights-based framework can promote health outcomes. The work of both public health professionals and human rights professionals contributes to each other's struggle for achieving their common goal: the ultimate realization of health and human rights.

Lalatendu Acharya
Purdue University

See Also: Health Disparities, Role of; Poverty; Public Health; Social Determinants of Health.

Further Readings

Farmer, Paul. "Challenging Orthodoxies: The Road Ahead for Health and Human Rights." Health and Human Rights, v.10/1 (2008).
Farmer, Paul. "On Suffering and Structural Violence." In Paul Farmer, Pathologies of Power. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.
Farmer, Paul. "Rethinking Health and Human Rights: Time for a Paradigm Shift. The Journal of Law, Medicine & Ethics, v.30/4 (2002).
"Linkage between Health and Human Rights." World Health Organization. http://www.who.int/hhr/HHR%20linkages.pdf (Accessed December 2013).
Marmot, M. "Health in an Unequal World." Lancet, v.368 (2006).
Oppenheimer, G. M., et al. "Health and Human Rights: Old Wine in New Bottles," The Journal of Law, Medicine & Ethics, v.30/4 (2002).

Health Care, Disparities in

Defining and identifying disparities in health and health care are critical to improving the health status of an overall population. The causes of such disparities, even though they are distinct, are also intertwined and are not fully understood by the research community. Such a lack of understanding has significant implications for improving the health status and health care experience of select as well as overall populations.

Defining Health Disparities

Health disparities are identified when a select population bears a disproportionate burden of disease given the size of the population. Health disparities reflect the difference in health status between populations. For example, African Americans represent about 12 percent of the population of the United States, but in terms of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infections among persons 13 years of age and older in the United States, African Americans represent 44 percent of all new cases, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC).

Generally, health disparities are examined in terms of racial and ethnic populations in the United States. Examining health disparities as they relate to gender or lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, or questioning (LGBTQ) status is also possible. In order to be a disparity, the select population must experience a proportion of the disease that is significantly higher than for the population in general with regard to disease prevalence, incidence, mortality, and morbidity rates.

Disparities in Health Care

Disparities in health care are differences in the quality of health care that populations experience after controlling for factors associated with access to health care services, clinical needs, patient preferences, and appropriateness of the intervention. In other words, select populations, particularly racial and ethnic minorities, do not receive the same level and/or quality of health care as their counterparts, even when controlling for access to health care and other factors that influence the use of health care services. For example, a study by R. C. Maly, B. Leake, and R. A. Silliman found that older and Latina patients with breast carcinoma were less likely to receive interactive informational support from their physicians compared to their counterparts. These differences persisted after controlling for sociodemographic, psychosocial, and physician factors. Numerous other examples from other disease and illness areas are available in the literature.

These disparities in health care then create and perpetuate health disparities. In other words, since select populations do not receive the same level and/or quality of health care, then these populations are more likely to have a poorer health status than their counterparts. As such, the health status of the overall population suffers.

Causes of Disparities in Health Care

In order to improve the health status of the overall population, identifying and understanding the causes of health care and health disparities is critical. An overarching cause of disparities in health care is the historical context and pervasive discrimination that exist in many aspects of U.S. society. The following variables have also been identified as causes of disparities in health care:

- Patient-level variables: Patients bring who they are to the health care system. Patient variables include individual and collective attributes, such as mistrust of the health care system and/or providers, lack of understanding of how to utilize the health care system, and poor interactions with the health care system and/or providers. While such attributes have an impact on the quality of services received, the amount of impact on disparities is speculated to be minimal.
- Health care–level variables: Health care systems are set up and organized in light of various laws, regulations, and standards from a variety of state, local, and federal sources. These laws, regulations, and standards dictate how services should be offered, financed, and made available. As the Affordable Care Act in the United States continues to be defined and implemented, the health care system will continue to evolve with an unknown impact on disparities in health care.
- Care process–level variables: Due to the fast-paced nature of today's health care system, providers are expected to make decisions in a limited amount of time based on the information at hand. Not only patients bring who they are to the health care experience, providers do the same. As such, providers bring their biases and stereotypes to their interactions with patients. These variables can unknowingly impact the interactions with patients and the treatment recommendations that are provided.

Causes of Health Disparities

Disparities in health care and their associated causes can contribute to health disparities, but social determinants of health have also been identified as factors that contribute to the existence of differences in health status. Social determinants of health are those factors in the social and physical environment that influence health status. According to the Office of Health Promotion and Disease Prevention, these determinants and examples of each include:

- Neighborhood/built environment: Access to health foods and quality housing, and exposure to crime and violence.
- Education: High school graduation rates, enrollment in higher education, and school environments conducive to learning.
- Economic stability: Poverty, employment status, access to employment, and housing stability.
- Health and health care: Access to health care, including primary and preventive care, and health technology.
- Social and community context: Family structure, perceptions of discrimination, and incarceration.

The persistence of health disparities and disparities in health care will continue to impact the health status of the overall population. Identifying and understanding the causes of these disparities is increasingly important. Continued work is needed to identify, test, and institutionalize strategies to address these disparities.

Melva Thompson-Robinson
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

See Also: Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality; Diversity and Quality in Health Care; National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities.

Further Readings

"Estimated HIV Incidence Among Adults and Adolescents in the United States, 2007–2010." Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, HIV

Surveillance Supplemental Report, v.17/4 2012. http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/library/reports/surveillance/index.html (Accessed June 2013).

Maly, R. C., B. Leake, and R. A. Silliman. "Health Care Disparities in Older Patients with Breast Carcinoma." Cancer, v.97 (2003).

Smedley, B. D., A. Y. Stith, and A. R. Nelson. Unequal Treatment: Confronting Racial and Ethnic Disparities in Health Care. Washington, DC: The National Academies Press, 2003.

"Social Determinants of Health." Healthy People 2020. Office of Health Promotion and Disease Prevention. http://www.healthypeople.gov/2020/topicsobjectives2020/overview.aspx?topicid=39 (Accessed June 2013).

Health Care Delivery, Models of

The roles of social workers and other providers of health services employed in the health care profession have undergone profound evolutionary changes necessitated by the changing requirements and settings of the entire spectrum of practice settings in health care. Contemporary practice settings and the functions of providers are rapidly changing as care becomes more community based, rather than institutional, as in hospital settings. Because of the fluidity of policy discussions on the American health care system, opportunities for health care services workers to emerge as leaders have developed in health care administration, management, and direct service delivery to patients. Social work is in a unique position, because of the diversity of the functions that social workers provide in the treatment and discharge planning of patients, to creatively craft social work in health care organizations alongside other health care practitioners. The overhaul of the U.S. health care system has broadened the scope of every discipline in the health care field.

Documentation of the first hospital goes back to Egyptian temples, where care was provided in accordance with the person's religion-based healing beliefs. In ancient India (11th century B.C.E.), the movement started to change the health care system from a monastic model to a secular model. Almshouses and hospitals emerged and played prominent roles in social welfare and medical care. For centuries, the care of physically and mentally ill individuals has been the domain of the helping professions. Nurses tended to wounds and acute (urgent and immediate) illnesses. The early role of social workers was to ensure that people received the help that they needed. Sometimes, it was in the role of an advocate—to connect the person to a physician, or broker a connection with a service provider. The assessment skills of the social worker directed care and services in accordance with the person's expressed need. Sometimes, that would be food or shelter. Other times, social workers have been skilled care coordinators, similar to today's case managers.

In the early part of the 20th century, hospitals emerged as the one-stop shop for physical and mental health needs. Institutions were burgeoning and teemed with physicians, nurses, and social workers, who wore a variety of utilitarian hats. Much of the care that the medical team provided became a function of what the patient and insurance company could pay. When health care maintenance organizations (HMOs) emerged under President Richard Nixon's administration (1969–74), utilization reviews were key to budgeting, and still play an important role today.

In a utilization review system, the diagnoses of persons served are grouped according to their health condition (diagnostically related groups, or DRGs), and insurance companies only pay a predetermined amount based on the person's diagnosis. So, for example, people who are admitted for appendicitis can expect their bill to be paid if they fall within the appropriate margins of time in the hospital. If the diagnosis of appendicitis created an average of three days in the hospital, then the maximum reimbursement that the insurance company will pay to have a person's appendix removed is for three days of care.

This model created a significant incentive system for hospitals to provide care faster, better, and cheaper than their competitors. Individuals whose care fell either beneath or above that reimbursable amount were called "outliers." The hospital and patient absorb the cost of patient days that fall outside the upper payment margin, thus creating a management and care delivery system driven by profit. Hospitals make a profit from people whose care can be managed below the lower level of reimbursement. Utilization review managers track patient days for each of the diagnoses, and report the information to the administration.

Contemporary Models

Hospital care delivery systems have changed throughout the years, and there is little alignment between countries—each predominantly uses the following payment/patient care models: The Beveridge model is named for the man who designed Britain's system. In this model, many (but not all) of the facilities are owned by the government. Some doctors collect their fees from the government and can either be government employees or private providers. In Britain, the patient never receives a doctor bill. Per capita costs tend to be lower because the government is the sole payer and dictates what providers do and what they charge. Countries using the Beveridge model include Cuba, England, Spain, most of Scandinavia, New Zealand, and to a lesser extent Hong Kong.

The Bismarck model is named for the German chancellor who invented it in the 19th century. This system closely resembles the American model. It uses an insurance system, where employees manage "sickness funds." This is an insurance system jointly financed by employees and employers, and employees pay through payroll deduction. Unlike the United States, though, Bismarck health insurance plans have to cover everybody, and they do not make a profit. Doctors and hospitals are usually private entities, not managed by the government. Countries that use this model are Germany, Japan, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, and to a small degree, Latin America.

Elements of the Beveridge and Bismarck models are contained in the national health insurance model. Private providers are used, and payment is provided by a group of funds to which everyone contributes. This "single payer" system has enormous leverage to negotiate the most favorable rates. This system operates in Canada, Taiwan, and South Korea. The Canadian system, for example, has negotiated such low rates for pharmaceuticals that some Americans cross the border to have their prescriptions refilled. Because the national health care system rarely has to deal with competition, it can dictate what it will and will not cover. It can also delay patients who are waiting to be treated as a means of cost containment.

In the out-of-pocket model, hundreds of millions of people (approximately 15 percent of the world's population) in less industrialized countries and rural regions have never seen a doctor because they cannot afford to privately pay for care. Oftentimes, service bartering is used as "currency." Some countries trade goat's milk or potatoes, for example, in exchange for medical care. The rich receive medical care, and the poor stay ill or die. In rural regions of Africa, India, China, and South America, millions of people live their whole lives without ever seeing a doctor. Often, "faith healers" using home-brewed remedies are their only treatment option, and they may or may not be effective against disease.

United States

The United States operates a complicated system that contains parcels of each of these four models. The issue of cross-cultural competence and diversity in health care has only recently become an operational challenge for health care delivery systems. U.S. 2010 census data show an increasingly large melting pot of Americans: The number of individuals who are black or Hispanic are growing exponentially larger than the growth rate of Caucasian Americans. In both the patient mix and the evolving picture of diversity in the employee workforce, diversity needs to be embraced. From translation services to hospital cafeteria selections, organizations can increase the diverse profile of their organizations by increasing awareness, providing education, and developing accountability mechanisms and performance indicators that point to how behavioral change is occurring throughout the organization, at all levels. Cross-cultural competence starts with three questions: What are one's personal stereotypes regarding specific cultures and ethnicities? What are the social stereotypes of a given population? What are the evidence-based practices regarding the provision and delivery of services to the specific population?

Patients are increasingly taking charge of their health care, and are heavily influenced by the exposure of disease management via the media. The roles of electronic and social media are changing the face of health care. Patients are becoming aware of new intervention strategies for their disease based on media reports and electronic testimonials by other patients. Partially educated patients march into a physician's office demanding the latest treatment advertised on television or promoted via social media. The pressure is on the health care team to inform the patient how alike or dissimilar a patient is compared to the media portrayal. Physicians who are not used to being challenged now need to provide justification for, and have immediate knowledge of, pharmacological breakthroughs for a growing number of diseases. Treatment providers should consider the patient partnership model proposed by Elois Berlin and William Fowkes, called LEARN. The acronym spells out the following steps: listen to the patient's perception of the problem, explain one's perception of the problem, acknowledge and discuss similarities/differences, recommend treatment, and negotiate treatment.

Despite pressure to address diversity issues from accrediting bodies, such as the Joint Commission, leadership in the vast health care network of the United States is still homogenized and Caucasian. Facilities and programs need to incorporate cross-cultural sensitivity into employee training programs if they are to be good stewards of the populations represented in the communities in which they are located. Migratory patterns of a variety of ethnicities have resulted in Asians being the fastest-growing race or ethnic group in 2012, according to the 2010 U.S. Census. Their population increased by 530,000, or 2.9 percent to a total of 18.9 million citizens. Hispanics were the second-fastest growing minority group, with a growth rate of 2.2 percent, for a total of 1.1 million citizens.

Future of Health Care

The U.S. health care system is fundamentally broken at the patient and payer levels. President Barack Obama proposed and Congress enacted reform measures that should make care more egalitarian and accessible. It is still too early in his plan's administration to measure the plan's effects. It is estimated that by 2020, one in three hospitals will close or reorganize: that is nearly 35 percent of America's 5,754 registered hospitals. Additional factors that contribute to America's health care problem, according to David Howle and Jonathan Fleece, are: the average American worker costs their employee $12,000 per year, and this figure is increasing 10 percent a year; three times as many people die in hospitals than on the highway, and one out of every 370 admissions will die, primarily from medication errors; and the average wait time in an emergency room is four hours.

The emergence of electronic medical records can increasingly put control of care in the patient's hands. This means that consumers can shop around for quality, cost, and service. Social workers and other health care providers can play a significant role, especially in communicating and advocating for the voice of the customer (or patient) in any system redesign. Social workers have a rich history of advocacy and organizing. It is time to return to the very roots of social work, to ensure that social workers and patients have seats at the table of this very crucial policy and implementation issue in social welfare.

Barbara Barton
Western Michigan State University

See Also: Health Care, Disparities in; Health Disparities, Role of; Health Insurance; Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1966; Medicine, Workplace Diversity in.

Further Readings

Berlin, Elois Ann and William C. Fowkes, Jr. "A Teaching Framework for Cross-Cultural Health Care: Application in Family Practice." Western Journal of Medicine, v.139/6 (1983).

Conan, Neal. "Looking Ahead: The Future of Health Care Policy." National Public Radio (April 29, 2013). http://www.npr.org/2013/04/29/179851904/looking-ahead-the-future-of-health-care-policy (Accessed March 2014).

Howle, D. and J. Fleece. The New Health Age: The Future of Health Care in America. Naperville, IL: Sourcebooks, 2011.

Health Disparities, Role of Health disparities occur when overall health status or health outcomes differ between different populations or groups of people—as examples, between people who identify as Hispanic/Latino and those who do not, or between people who are employed and those who are unemployed. This variance can reflect differences in both physical and mental health. A person's ability to achieve good health can be affected by genetics, behavior, education, income, the physical environment, discrimination and racism, and health services.

Worldwide, determinants of health include clean water, clean air, sanitary and safe living conditions, nutritious food, quality education, and affordable health care. Every continent has both large and small differences in the overall physical health and/or the mental health of different groups of people. Health disparities are frequently experienced by vulnerable populations—groups affected by factors such as minority race or ethnicity, gender and sexual identity, socioeconomic status, employment status, geographic locale, or a combination of these.

Social Determinants of Health

Social factors contribute to health disparities or inequalities in the way different groups of people are affected by physical problems (e.g., obesity, diabetes, cancer, cardiovascular disease) and mental problems (e.g., major depression). Social factors that contribute to differences in health are termed social determinants of health. The World Health Organization (WHO) has described social determinants of health as the environment or surroundings in which people are born, as well as the places where they grow up and live, where they work, and where they age or grow older. Social conditions are influenced by the availability of resources at various levels (local, state, national, international), financial resources (e.g., money), and power (the influence that others have on people's circumstances). Major social conditions affecting health include housing, employment status, stress, and social exclusion or social support.

Geographic Locale: Urban and Rural Social Health Disparities

People who live in large urban areas, such as the inner city, and those who live in expansive rural areas, such as agricultural or farming communities and mountainous regions, are more likely to experience health disparities than persons who live in suburban areas. These disparities result not only from differences in access to and utilization of health care and the costs associated with that health care, but also from differences in the environment and public health and differences between urban and rural health behaviors.

Urban areas may have wide gaps in socioeconomic status (e.g., employment, education, health insurance coverage), high rates of violence and crime, and stressed physical environments (e.g., poor air quality, high lead exposure, dense living conditions with compromised sanitation). Rural areas may also have wide gaps in socioeconomic status, as well as challenges in travel to care, lack of primary care physicians, underdeveloped infrastructure, high economic needs, and unhealthy behaviors (e.g., smoking, lack of exercise, unhealthy diets, failure to wear seatbelts). Among urban and rural peoples and among populations living in other geographic locales, clear differences exist in the rates of victimization; lead exposure; and the prevalence of asthma, infectious diseases, cancer, obesity, diabetes, and high blood pressure.

Employment Status: Health Disparities Between the Employed and Unemployed

People who are unemployed have a higher chance of poor health status and outcomes than those who are employed. One significant reason for this is that in some countries, people's benefits, such as private health insurance, sick leave, and vacation time, are directly connected to their jobs. Typically, people who are employed full time will have some level or type of health insurance coverage and sick leave.

People who are unemployed, however, may not have the same amount of preventive services, such as immunizations, well-child checkups, dental and vision care, and prenatal care. Further, health disparities may result from differences in the degree to which populations practice prevention. For those without health insurance, preventive medicine is generally absent.

Differences also exist in medical treatment. The treatment and services available for those accessing health care through government-subsidized or government-provided care or through local urgent or emergency medicine facilities or traveling clinics may differ from the services available to those with private providers.

Gender and Sexual Identity: Differences in Health, Outcomes, and Life Expectancy

Although more boys are born than girls, women generally live five to eight years longer than men. In areas where there are armed conflicts and war, this difference can be greater. Yet women tend to have poorer health outcomes than men as a result of sexually transmitted infections; the impact of poor nutrition and childbearing; violence, abuse, and gender oppression; and rates of internalized mental illness, including depression. For lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) individuals, additional health disparities exist, including increased risk of suicide; homelessness; alcohol, tobacco, and other drug use; HIV/AIDS infection (particularly among gay men, men who have sex with men, and both men and women who exchange sex for drugs or money); and lack of access to health care.

Race/Ethnicity: Health Disparities by Race, Ethnicity, and Culture

Even when factors such as socioeconomic status, employment status, and geographic locale are accounted for, health disparities by race and ethnicity persist. These disparities are evident in the rates of infant mortality, chronic disease and certain health conditions (e.g., obesity, diabetes, hypertension, heart disease, stroke, and asthma), HIV/AIDS, disability, and death. In addition, people of color are often underrepresented in clinical trials.

Addressing Health Disparities

In the United States, Healthy People 2020 defines health disparity as “a particular type of health difference that is closely linked with social, economic, and/or environmental disadvantage.” Health disparities adversely affect groups of people who have systematically experienced greater obstacles to health based on their racial or ethnic group; religion; socioeconomic status; gender; age; mental health; cognitive, sensory, or physical disability; sexual orientation or gender identity; geographic location; or other characteristics historically linked to discrimination or exclusion.” Addressing these obstacles will take concentrated efforts to provide high-quality education, nutritious food, decent and safe housing, affordable and reliable public transportation, clean water, clean air, health insurance, and culturally sensitive health care. This is true not only in the United States, but globally; in some countries, the obstacles, such as lack of public transportation, are much greater.

Suzanne Boyd
Susan McCarter
University of North Carolina at Charlotte

See Also: Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Health Care, Disparities in; LGBTQ Clients;Overweight and Obese Adults and Children; Socioeconomic Status.

Further Readings

“National Healthcare Quality and Disparities Reports.” Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. http://www.ahrq.gov/research/findings/nhqrdr/index.html (Accessed June 2013).

“2020 Topics and Objectives—Objectives A-Z.” Healthy People 2020. http://www.healthypeople.gov/2020//topicsobjectives2020/default.aspx (Accessed June 2013).

Wilkinson, Richard and Michael Marmot, eds. Social Determinants of Health: The Solid Facts 2013, 2nd ed. Denmark: World Health Organization, 2003. http://www.who.int/gho/publications/world_health_statistics/EN_WHS2013_Full.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

Health Insurance

Health insurance pays for medical expenses incurred by the insured, generally including visits to doctors, hospital care (inpatient and outpatient), surgeries, medicines, and other medical treatment. Coverage may be purchased by individuals from private insurance companies, provided through an employer, or provided through government programs. Policies vary widely in costs, the amount of deductibles or copayments, the specifics of coverage, and limitations imposed on treatment and delivery of services. Although the earliest health insurance in the United States was available by the mid-19th century, the term itself dates from the Progressive era. The health insurance policy as it exists in the 21st century evolved from “sickness insurance” of the early 20th century and the prepaid hospital plans of the Depression. The debate over the role of government in health insurance has endured for nearly a century. Although the United States spends a higher percentage of its gross national product on health care than any other developed nation, tens of millions of Americans lack health insurance and thus adequate access to the health care system.

The Evolution of Health Insurance

The U.S. Congress established the Marine Hospital Service in 1798 and required the owners of merchant ships to contribute 20 cents a month into a sickness fund for each seaman in their employ. The earliest private health insurance, however, developed considerably later, in 1850, when the Franklin Health Assurance Company of Massachusetts offered accident insurance to cover injuries suffered by travelers on trains and steamboats. A 15-cent weekly premium paid $200 for an injury, and double that in the case of total disability. Thirteen years later, Travelers Insurance Company offered a policy that became a template for others: a $5 weekly premium paid a $1,000 benefit in case of accidental death. By the end of the 19th century, 47 companies had issued 463,000 disability policies, but those who bought such coverage remained a relatively small group. Before the medical advances of the 20th century, the sick were usually cared for at home and medical expenses were low. Most people—with some justification, given the generally poor quality of health care—were suspicious of hospitals.

Of greater concern to the average American was the loss of wages if the family breadwinner was unable to work due to illness or injury. During the 1870s and 1880s, various companies in such industries as mining, lumber, and railroads provided group industrial clinics to treat the common illnesses and industrial accidents of their employees. More common was industrial sickness insurance. These funds were so popular in Europe in the late 19th and early 20th centuries that many countries, including Germany, Austria, Hungary, Norway, Serbia, Great Britain, Russia, and the Netherlands, made sickness insurance compulsory for many industries. Sweden, Switzerland, and Denmark subsidized voluntary funds that workers formed among themselves. Reform-minded Progressives were eager to see the United States follow Europe's lead, and President Theodore Roosevelt included compulsory sickness insurance in his platform. But life insurance companies and many physicians opposed the plan, and the anti-German feeling that followed the outbreak of World War I effectively destroyed it.

With a rise in the quality of health care that accompanied medical advances, such as antitoxins, vaccines, and new technologies (e.g., x-ray radiography and blood pressure meters), came a greater demand for medical services even as the supply of doctors and hospitals was limited. The result was an increase in medical costs and a growing interest in some form of medical insurance to meet those costs. The first group health insurance plan in the nation was set up by Montgomery Ward for the company's employees in 1910. Weekly premiums assured workers that one-half of their salary (from a minimum of $5 to a maximum of $28.85) would be paid directly to them in the event of their being unable to work. Like the earlier sickness insurance, it established a connection between health insurance and the workplace.

Nearly 20 years later, another step in the evolution of health insurance occurred when Dr. Justin Ford Kimball, an administrator at Baylor University Hospital in Dallas, Texas, grew concerned about the inability of schoolteachers to pay their medical bills. His solution was the Baylor Plan, which allowed teachers to pay 50 cents each month in exchange for the assurance that they were entitled to medical services for as many as 21 days a year. This idea, which eventually developed into Blue Cross, began to look attractive to other hospitals as Depression economics left increasing numbers of people unable to pay medical bills. At the same time, prepaid plans emerged that covered doctors' services, including the California Physicians' Service in 1939. In 1946, these physician-sponsored plans combined into Blue Shield.

Meanwhile, the issue of affordable health care was gaining the attention of leaders in labor and government as well as in medicine as the problem expanded beyond the poor and indigent. Medical costs had replaced lost wages as the central concern. The Committee on the Cost of Medical Care (CCMC), independently funded over its five years of work by private foundations such as the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Corporation, issued its report in 1932. The CCMC's almost 50 members included physicians, public health officials, hospital administrators, dentists, economists, and others. The group published the first reliable estimates of health care expenditures in the United States (about $3.7 billion in 1929, or 4 percent of the national income). It also recommended such controversial ideas as group medical practices, networks of clinics in rural areas, and health insurance, although it stopped short of supporting compulsory insurance because of the large subsidies such a mandate would require from employers, government, or some partnership between the two. The report failed to win wide support at any level, but the Social Security Act of 1935 provided federal grants to the states for public health service programs, one of the CCMC's recommendations, and in 1937 the CCMC's proposal for voluntary group prepayment of hospital costs culminated in the formation of the Blue Cross program. Much of the financial structure of the health care system recommended by the CCMC in 1932 resembles the organization in place more than 80 years later.

The Expansion of the Industry

During the 1930s, life insurance companies began to offer health insurance. Eventually, premiums reflected calculations of relative risks, issuing policies to older people or to people with a history of medical problems. The 1940s and 1950s brought an emphasis on health insurance as part of employee benefits packages, in part as a result of strong union negotiations. The health insurance package was also one way that companies competed for labor during World War II, when wartime wage controls limited incentives employers could offer. In 1940, only 9 percent of Americans had health insurance coverage. A decade later, 50 percent had coverage. By the early 1960s, most full-time workers and their families had health insurance coverage. The disadvantage was that job-related insurance ended when one retired or lost a job.

In 1965, with a Democratic majority in Congress, Medicare and Medicaid programs were introduced. Medicare provided low-cost hospitalization and medical insurance to those 65 or older with no restrictions regarding income or medical history. President Lyndon B. Johnson, who signed the bill into law, was the fourth president to champion health insurance as part of the Social Security system. Medicaid provided health insurance to low-income people. In 2010, Medicare provided assistance for approximately 45 million people, and Medicaid served approximately 58 million.

The 1970s and 1980s saw health care costs escalate rapidly, in part due to the increased use of medical technology and medications. In response, employee benefit plans transformed into managed care plans (networks of health care providers who have been verified for health care quality and have agreements with the insurer about price and related issues), and health maintenance organizations (HMOs) developed. President Richard Nixon signed legislation that provided federal endorsement, certification, and assistance for HMOs. The new law required employers with 25 or more employees who provided traditional health care benefits to offer federally certified HMO options. Managed care slowed the growth of health care costs only briefly. In the 1990s, health care costs rose at double the rate of inflation.

The Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) of 1996 allowed U.S. workers to transfer and continue health coverage for themselves and their families when they changed jobs or when they lost their jobs. The act also required the protection and confidential handling of protected health information. The Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP), which went into effect in 1997, helped provide health insurance to children of low-income families, expanding coverage to nearly 8 million children from families whose incomes were too high to qualify for Medicaid, but who could not afford private coverage. Despite expansions in coverage, by the end of the decade, 44 million Americans had no health insurance. In 2012, the number of nonelderly uninsured was 47 million, a drop from 49 million in 2010.

The Plight of the Uninsured

Most private health insurance in the United States is purchased through employer-based group insurance policies. Such policies make up about 85 percent of all private coverage. By the end of the 20th century, rates of workplace health insurance had already dropped from those in the 1970s. The decline was related to company size. Two-thirds of workers employed by firms with more than 1,000 employees were offered insurance, but that number dropped to 52 percent in firms with 25–99 employees and to less than 30 percent in firms with fewer than 25 employees. Some economists believed that the shift from a manufacturing economy to a service economy was also a factor because many service economy jobs are minimum-wage positions, some are part time, and thus they more likely not to have employer-subsidized health insurance. Some researchers warned that the changing demographics of the workplace signaled the end of the employer-based system of insurance.

The uninsured are predominantly low- and moderate-income adults under age 65, with periods of being uninsured ranging from a month to many years. According to the Medical Expenditure Panel Survey, 26.1 million people were uninsured for the two-year period from 2004 to 2005, and 82 million people—nearly a third of all nonelderly persons—experienced at least one month without health coverage over that two-year period. Contrary to public perception, most of the nation's uninsured come from working families; more than 60 percent are in families with at least one full-time worker, and 16 percent are members of families with part-time workers. Being employed is no guarantee that one can afford insurance. In 2012, 61 percent of uninsured adults cited an inability to pay for coverage as a reason they were uninsured. Racial and ethnic minorities are far more likely than others to be uninsured. In 2012, the uninsured rates decreased as household income increased, from 24.9 percent for those in households with annual incomes less than $25,000 to 7.9 percent in households with annual incomes of $75,000 or more.

Health insurance is related directly to the quality of health care an individual receives. One-fourth of uninsured adults go without the health care they need each year due to costs, and numerous studies confirm that the uninsured are less likely than those with insurance to receive preventive care and services for major health conditions and chronic diseases. They are more likely than the insured to have undiagnosed serious health conditions and less likely to receive follow-up care once a diagnosis is made. It is hardly surprising, then, that the uninsured also have significantly higher mortality rates than those with insurance.

The Debate Over Health Insurance

Yale economist Irving Fisher reminded his audience in a 1916 speech that the United States was the only industrial nation without compulsory health insurance, but Fisher was confident that universal health coverage in the United States would be enacted within a matter of months. He was wrong. Once the United States entered World War I, not even the efforts of such distinguished Americans as Louis Brandeis, Jane Addams, and Woodrow Wilson were sufficient to overcome the plan's association with Germany, where the European plan originated. A century after Fisher's speech, his description of the United States still holds true, and politicians, economists, sociologists, medical professionals, and citizens are still debating health care and the government's role in providing it.

The United States spends $8,233 per person per year for health care, more than 2.5 times that of most developed nations, including European countries such as France, Sweden, and the United Kingdom. Norway, the Netherlands, and Switzerland, the next-highest in health expenditures, spent at least $3,000 less per person than the United States, which spends 17.6 percent of its gross domestic product (GDP) on health care. The Netherlands is the next-highest, at 12 percent of GDP, and the average among Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) countries is almost half that of the United States, at 9.5 percent of GDP. Despite this level of spending, tens of millions of uninsured Americans go without access to the country's high-quality health care. Although the United States leads the world in health care research and cancer treatment, and U.S. survival rates for breast cancer and colorectal cancer are higher than in any of the other 33 OECD countries, the United States falls short on some other key measures. Life expectancy at birth increased by almost nine years between 1960 and 2010 for Americans, but that is less than the increase of more than 15 years in Japan and 11 years on average in OECD countries. The average American lived 78.7 years in 2010, more than one year below the average of 79.8 years. Among OECD countries, only Mexico and Turkey had higher infant mortality rates in 2010 than the United States. The United States also falls below the OECD average in the number of physicians per person and the number of hospital beds per 1,000 population. Most OECD countries have some form of nationalized health care coverage available to 100 percent of their populations.

While partisan battles rage in legislative halls, on talk shows and Internet sites, beside water coolers, and at family dinners over the details and value of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act of 2010 (popularly known as the Affordable Care Act), polls show that a majority of Americans favor fundamental changes or a complete restructuring of the health care system. The economic crisis of the 2000s made many aware for the first time of their vulnerability in a work-based health insurance system. Even as the nation awaited a Supreme Court ruling on the constitutionality of some of the provisions of the Affordable Care Act, 77 percent of those participating in a CBS poll thought that if the law were declared unconstitutional, the president and Congress should immediately begin to work on new health care legislation. Some experts advise that the focus be shifted from extending health insurance to concerns that would do more to improve the health of all Americans, specifically reducing racial and ethnic health disparities, preventing disease and promoting health, developing and regulating pharmaceuticals, and improving consumer information.

Wylene Rholetter
Auburn University

See Also: Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996; Medicaid.

Further Readings

DeNavas-Walt, Carmen, Bernadette D. Proctor, and Jessica C. Smith. "U.S. Census Bureau, Current Population Reports, P60-245." In Income, Poverty, and Health Insurance Coverage in the United States: 2012. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office, 2013. http://www.census.gov/prod/2013pubs/p60-245.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Murray, John E. Origins of American Health Insurance: A History of Industrial Sickness Funds. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2007.

Ross, Joseph S. "The Committee on the Costs of Medical Care and the History of Health Insurance in the United States." The Einstein Quarterly Journal of Biology and Medicine, v.19 (2002). http://www.einstein.yu.edu/uploadedFiles/EJBM/19Ross129.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Rowland, Diane and Adele Shartzer. "America's Uninsured: The Statistics and Back Story." Journal of Law, Medicine & Ethics, v.36/4 (2008).

Scofea, Laura A. "The Development and Growth of Employee-Provided Health Insurance." Monthly Labor Review (March 1994). http://bls.gov/mlr/1994/03/art1full.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Zhou, Katherine. "The History of Medical Insurance in the United States." Yale Journal of Medicine and Law, v.6/1 (2009). http://www.yalemedlaw.com/2009/11/the-history-of-medical-insurance-in-the-united-states (Accessed December 2013).

Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996

Providing equal availability and provision of human services to diverse populations requires a standard of privacy and security for personal health information. The Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) of 1996 was enacted by the U.S. Congress to set this standard. HIPAA protects individuals and their families from prejudices based upon preexisting conditions or other differences evident in personal health information. HIPAA also improves the ability of individuals to take insurance coverage from job to job. Prior to HIPAA, insurance companies as well as health care programs and providers were able to deny coverage, and therefore services, to diverse populations based on their personal health information.

Health information professionals administer HIPAA as a complex compendium of expanding rules and regulations designed to protect health information. The increased regulation of medical records privacy, breach reporting, and electronic information management that HIPAA requires has been introduced in phases, with compliance standards and penalties for noncompliance progressively increasing under the provisions of not only HIPAA but other related legislation, including but not limited to the Health Information Technology for Economic and Clinical Health (HITECH) Act of 2009 and the Omnibus Final Rule in 2013.

Covered entities are required to adhere to privacy and security standards. These entities include health care organizations, hospitals, mental health clinics, health plans, managed care plans, public health authorities, health care payers, health care clearinghouses, and direct care providers (e.g., physicians, dentists, pharmacists, therapists, and psychiatrists, among others). The Office for Civil Rights enforces HIPAA compliance and protects individuals from prejudice and discrimination based on ethnicity, gender, age, ability, and religious preference in addition to any other individually identifying information that may be included in a person's health record.

Privacy

HIPAA privacy and security standards provide recipients of health services with protection from unauthorized persons who want to gain access to their confidential information. HIPAA describes these confidential data as protected health information (PHI). PHI is any information detailing an individual's physical or mental health condition, information regarding health services and treatments received by individuals, and any payments or insurance claims made for those health services. Pregnancies, illnesses, past insurance claims, and past behaviors are all considered confidential data. Genetic information that may indicate future proclivities toward inheritable diseases or conditions is also protected. PHI covers past, present, and future health information for individuals and their dependent family members. The protection of this information limits access to only those providers and authorized persons with a need for data in order to properly serve individual health care needs. The HIPAA Privacy Rule allows disclosure of PHI necessary for patient care and safety. The HIPAA Security Rule requires that disclosure is authorized. Information that could lead to prejudices and denied insurance coverage can be released only on a need-to-know basis.

HIPAA also guarantees that individuals will have new or continuing access to health insurance when they switch jobs. It also imposes limits to the ability of new employers to exclude coverage for preexisting conditions when switching to their health plan. It allows opportunities for individuals to enroll in a group health plan if other coverage is lost or certain life events take place. Although HIPAA protects PHI and guarantees insurance access is provided by new employers, there are limits to its provisions. For example, HIPAA does not require that employers offer health coverage or guarantee that any past or present conditions are covered by the new employer's health plan. An employer is permitted to impose a preexisting condition exclusion period that includes the six months prior to the enrollment date in their plan if medical advice, diagnosis, care, or treatment was recommended or received during that time.

Security

Security and Breach Notification Rules describe the particular ways information can be shared, the specific ways it must be destroyed, and the reporting responsibilities required when a breach of security protocol is discovered. If information is transmitted to unauthorized persons, strict penalties are enforced. HIPAA also provides for substantial penalties for failures to certify or comply with standards and operating rules. Civil penalties for willful neglect range from $250,000 to $1.5 million.

The HIPAA Security Rule sets national standards and specifies the safeguards that must be used to assure the confidentiality, integrity, and availability of electronic protected health information (ePHI). The HIPAA Breach Notification Rule requires all service providers to provide notification following a breach of unsecured PHI or ePHI. These rules, along with the Enforcement Rule and specific rules regarding coding and identifying numbers, are all designed to apply nationally and contribute to administrative simplification.

Enforcement

Legislation related to HIPAA, including HITECH and the HIPAA Omnibus Rule, have expanded protection provisions as the demand for ePHI has increased. New systems require new forms of vigilance. HITECH encourages the adoption of electronic health record (EHR) systems, increases liability for noncompliance, and provides for increased enforcement. The HIPAA Omnibus Rule revises the HIPAA Privacy, Security, Breach Notification, and Enforcement Rules. Covered entities and direct care providers will need to adapt policies and procedures to conform with the changes required by HITECH and the Omnibus Rule.

Under HIPAA, an individual cannot bring a cause of action against a provider, but state attorneys general can bring a cause of action on behalf of their constituents. Civil penalties based on specific violations and the harm resulting from those violations are determined at the discretion of the secretary of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS). Penalties range from $100 to $1.5 million. HHS is also required to conduct periodic audits of covered entities and their business associates. Covered entities are criminally liable if they obtain or disclose PHI; commit offenses under false pretenses; or commit offenses with the intent to sell, transfer, or use PHI for commercial advantage, personal gain, or malicious harm. Fines and maximum sentences are, correspondingly, up to $50,000 and imprisonment for up to 1 year, $100,000 and imprisonment for up to 5 years, and $250,000 and imprisonment for up to 10 years. Responsible individuals may also be found criminally liable under HIPAA. Individuals not directly liable under HIPAA can face criminal charges of conspiracy or aiding and abetting.

HIPAA provides protection to recipients of health services through rules and regulations that control access to PHI and ePHI. Confidential data that cannot be shared with unauthorized persons include ethnic, religious, genetic, and gender identifiers; treatments and diagnoses for physical, mental, and emotional conditions; and previous insurance use and claims history. Limiting access reduces the risk of discrimination based on prejudices that these data may reveal. HIPAA ensures that only entities with an interest in the health and safety of a recipient will have access to their personal health information.

Shell Gosztyla
Independent Scholar

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Health Insurance; Information and Referral; State Children's Health Insurance Program; Workplace Health Services.

Further Readings

Hartley, Carolyn and Edward D. Jones III. HIPAA Plain & Simple: After the Final Rule, 3rd ed. Chicago: American Medical Association, 2013.
Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996, U.S. 104th Congress, Public Law 104-191.
Nicholls, Kathy. Stedman's Guide to the HIPAA Privacy & Security Rules. New York: Lippincott Williams & Wilkins, 2011.

Health Promotion Services

Health promotion is a multidisciplinary and holistic approach that focuses on helping people achieve and maintain good health. The diversity of health-related behaviors and beliefs in different groups makes work in community-based health promotion a challenging but exciting field for human services workers. Health is broadly defined in the health promotion arena, encompassing not only physical well-being but also mental and social well-being. Among the key components of health promotion is empowerment, the ability of the individual and community to take action to promote health. Health promotion focuses on determinants of health, including factors that are related to the physical and social environments of diverse groups. Social inclusion is considered an important aspect of health in this approach, and social capital—interpersonal relationships and social support—is a key factor in promoting health in individuals and communities. Communities can help promote health through education and policy support as well as by financing or otherwise supporting health promotion services.

Health promotion services provide a broad range of activities and programs for individuals and groups. They may promote specific health-related goals, such as immunizations and vaccinations, so that children are protected from specific diseases, or focus on more comprehensive projects and programs that address multiple health determinants, such as day care programs and clubhouses for adults with mental health needs and/or functional disabilities, which help promote social capital and overall well-being.

Health promotion services are preventive in nature; they are meant to help people remain in optimal states of well-being and avoid ill health. For example, services that encourage people to exercise with other family members and friends on a regular basis can be expected not only to help these exercisers strengthen social ties, but also to avoid excess weight, which in turn can prevent the onset of diabetes, high blood pressure, heart disease, and other conditions. Screenings for diseases and related risk factors for overall health are also considered health promotion services because they help identify these conditions before the effects of ill health are felt, which allows people to return to healthier states of being.

Health promotion services are conducted by a number of different groups, including health care providers, mental health professionals, and community volunteers. Human services workers play important roles in the provision of health promotion services, both as liaisons between community members and complex health and social services systems, and as professionals involved in providing these services. A few examples of human services workers who provide health promotion services include life skills instructors, client advocates, adult day care workers, probation and parole officers, family services workers, community organizers, and case managers for health promotion programs.

Health promotion services at the community level focus on empowerment of neighborhoods and groups and on partnerships between service providers and clients. Community members are viewed as experts in terms of being able to identify both supports and barriers to good health. Many human services workers and other health promotion professionals rely on strong support from community members when following the health promotion process of developing, implementing, and evaluating local programs, using various forms of community-based research. In this research approach, community members take the lead in identifying health concerns and in proposing appropriate strategies to address these concerns.

Health promotion workers often state that health promotion services are cost-effective in the long run because it is less expensive to prevent illness than to treat it. This argument makes sense on an intuitive level. Certainly, the long-term costs of a series of classes aimed at promoting better nutrition and exercise habits for several dozen individuals who show risk factors for heart disease are far less than the cost of a single coronary bypass surgery. The cost-effectiveness of individual interventions is not always easy to measure, however. Behaviors such as how much people eat and how often they exercise are not always consistent, so it is difficult to judge how effective some services are in real-life conditions. Problems also arise in quantifying the value of some health determinants. For example, how can the effect of counseling sessions at a family support services clinic be measured over time? Although multiple studies have identified the economic impact of various health promotion services, and many other studies have linked health promotion to a reduction in risk for ill health, it is equally important for human services workers to consider the effect of these services on the quality of life of individuals and communities. The prevention of chronic lung disease for a young mother who successfully completes a smoking cessation program, for example, does not just save her health insurance provider the costs of underwriting many expensive treatments, it also allows her to spend many more years with the people she loves.

The health promotions officer at Naval Health Clinic, Hawai'i, educates service members on the dangers of smoking and tobacco use during the Great American Smokeout. Many human services workers rely on a combination of education and training to help individual clients develop the knowledge and life skills they need to enjoy better physical and mental health.

What is the Most Effective Way to Provide Health Promotion Services?

Many human services workers rely on a combination of education and training to help individual clients develop the knowledge and life skills they need to enjoy better physical and mental health. The Health Belief Model states in part that active approaches, including education and training, lead individuals to feel an increased sense of self-efficacy, which in turn helps people develop consistent habits that lead to better quality of life. At community and national levels, however, it is difficult to promote health at this individual level—such services would need to provide educators and training modules for every person in the country. Health promotion services at state and federal levels are supported through passive approaches, such as through policies and enforcement actions. Passive approaches do not require that a decision for change be made at the individual level; rather, these approaches regulate health behavior through legal and administrative means. For example, no-smoking regulations are now legal requirements for healthy behavior in most communities, and are enforced by fines. Human services workers who want to work with both individuals and communities to promote health will understand the importance of working with both active and passive approaches.

Challenges in Health Promotion Services Today

Human services workers are working with a number of different populations that experience complex needs. Older people, new immigrants, the severely mentally ill, and people with functional disabilities all require health promotion services that are specific to their own life circumstances. Many at-risk groups lack consistent access to good nutrition, adequate housing, and appropriate preventive care, so human services workers are increasingly faced with working with clients who experience multiple needs. In high-risk situations, human services workers must focus on meeting basic and immediate needs, such as food, shelter, and life-saving medical treatments, before focusing on health promotion. The life expectancy in the United States is now upwards of 82 years for both sexes, so Americans also experience increased risks for some health conditions, and social exclusion continues to challenge many groups. The need for health promotion services is thus more important than ever, as is the need for human services workers who are able to partner with community groups to develop, implement, and evaluate these services.

Diana Stark Ekman
Ali Kazemi
Elisabeth Kylberg
University of Skövde

See Also: College and University Health Services; Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Maternal/Infant Health Services; Mental Health Gap Action Program; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health.

Further Readings

Bracht, Neil. Health Promotion at the Community Level, 2nd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 1999.
Green, Jackie and Keith Tones. Health Promotion: Planning and Strategies, 2nd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2010.
Green, Lawrence and Marshall Kreuter. Health Program Planning: An Educational and Environmental Approach, 4th ed. Mountain View, CA : Mayfield Publishing, 2004.
Kline, Michael and Robert Huff. Health Promotion in Multicultural Populations. A Handbook for Practitioners and Students, 2nd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2008.
Naidoo, Jennie and Jane Wills. Foundations for Health Promotion, 3rd ed. Edinburgh, UK: Balliere Tindall, Elsevier, 2009.

Help-Seeking Behavior, Cultural Differences in

Help seeking is an interaction with others that focuses on a specific problem or emotional pain and aims at alleviating distress by means of informal or formal sources of support. It is a process that includes acknowledging a problem, deciding to get help, and determining a source of support. Choosing a source of support depends on an individual's tendency to seek or to resist formal or informal intervention during a time of crisis or following prolonged discomfort. The decision to seek professional help is influenced by individual, interpersonal, and sociocultural factors.

Help seeking is an interpersonal experience influenced by the context in which it takes place. There is evidence that sociocultural norms may exert a direct influence on help seeking, and it has been suggested that professional help seeking is related to a variety of psychosocial and cultural issues. Many scholars believe that attitudes toward help seeking are transmitted by family and social networks. All cultural groups seek help for their distress based on the meaning that culture assigns to the distress.

How Culture Influences Help Seeking

Culture includes the shared values, traditions, norms, customs, religion, arts, history, folklore, language, and/or institutions of a specific group of people. Cultural variability in the tendency to seek professional help has been a focus of empirical interest among researchers. A number of culture-related variables have been tested by researchers in search of explanations for ethnic and racial differences in the willingness to seek counseling and psychotherapy. To date, empirical findings have linked the cultural divergence in help-seeking patterns to extrinsic factors such as institutional biases and barriers, as well as intrinsic, cultural factors including acculturation, ethnic identity, self-construal, individualism-collectivism orientations, spirituality, and culture-based mental health beliefs.

Differences in relational patterns across cultures have implications for seeking help from professionals. In collectivistic cultures, such as in Asia, disclosing one's problems to professionals (an out-group) could be interpreted as dysfunctional by the in-group and viewed as a threat to in-group functioning. Therefore, people from collectivistic cultures might be more reluctant to seek professional help than people from individualistic cultures. Collectivistic cultures emphasize interdependence and social harmony within the group, with each individual viewed as fundamentally interconnected in a larger social unit. In contrast, individualistic cultures, such as in the United States, emphasize independence, distinguishing the individual as autonomous and distinct from others, with personal aims overriding group interests. Thus, seeking help is not viewed as an affront to the in-group.

Racial Differences in Help Seeking

African Americans, Asian Americans, and Latinos tend to underutilize outpatient health services and overutilize emergency health services. Lack of cultural competence, lack of health insurance, and geography have been cited to explain the help-seeking patterns of people of color in the United States. Although lack of health insurance is a valid explanation for observed utilization patterns, African Americans with health insurance are still less likely to use outpatient health services than whites with similar coverage. Some researchers suggest that the tendency of African Americans to rely on informal support and on religious services hinders their access to health services. Although Latino use of specialty services and mental health services is low, their rates of physician use may be equal to that of whites, suggesting reasons other than those provided may be at play. Some researchers have suggested that the underutilization of formal services may be due to differing culturally based help-seeking strategies, and that Latino familial and kinship networks may serve as protective resources and may also act as barriers to seeking formal care.

Gender Differences in Help Seeking

Gender is another factor that influences help seeking. For example, women, across demographic variables, are more likely to seek professional help and have more positive attitudes toward help seeking than men, regardless of culture or ethnicity. This willingness among women in different cultures to seek professional help has been attributed to the tendency of women to have closer friendships and be socialized toward providing help. Women use social networks to a greater degree than men do and are more skilled at using these networks. They may also be more comfortable with seeking out others for help with coping with their problems. In contrast, men across cultures that adhere to dominant masculine gender roles characterized by avoidant coping, aggressiveness, and emotional inexpressiveness have decreased willingness to seek psychological help—they hold more negative attitudes toward seeking help and seem to be less willing to utilize their social support networks.

Social Beliefs as Help-Seeking Determinants

Social beliefs are causal statements about relationships between events and entities and refer to people's understanding or expectations about how their world operates. Research suggests that individuals' willingness to seek counseling is likely to be determined by their culturally conditioned beliefs. In the existing literature, cultural groups have beliefs about the causes of mental disorders. Their beliefs toward mental illness and psychological problems might mediate attitudes toward receiving mental health services. For example, some traditional Mexican folk illness beliefs imply that mental health problems are the result of supernatural influences that may be cured with the help of a folk healer. Adherence to this belief in the Mexican culture might discourage favorable attitudes toward professional help seeking.

Influence of Enculturation and Acculturation

Enculturation is the process of being socialized into and retaining the cultural norms of one's heritage culture, a process whereby cultural values are conceded at a slower rate than behaviors in each successive generation, which influences help seeking. Acculturation, or the process of adaptation to the norms of the majority culture while downplaying the process of retaining one's heritage cultural norms, may influence help seeking as well. The evidence on enculturation and acculturation is inconclusive. Several studies have reported a direct relationship between acculturation and help-seeking attitudes, but others have revealed that less acculturated individuals had a greater willingness to seek counseling.

Lisa D. Hines
Wichita State University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Measuring and Assessing; Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Competence, Training in

Further Readings

Arnault, D. "Cultural Determinants of Help Seeking: A Model for Research and Practice." Research and Theory for Nursing Practice, v.23/4 (2009).

Chen, S. and W. Mak. "Seeking Professional Help: Etiology Beliefs about Mental Illness Across Cultures." Journal of Counseling Psychology, v.55/4 (2008).

Karabenick, S. A. and R. S. Newman, eds. Help Seeking in Academic Settings: Goals, Groups, and Contexts. Mahwah, NJ: Erlbaum, 2006.

Leung, K., et al. "The Search for Universal Dimensions of General Beliefs about How the World Functions." Journal of Cross-Cultural Psychology, v.3 (2002).

Nelson-Le Gall, S. "Help Seeking: An Understudied Problem-Solving Skill in Children." Developmental Review, v.1 (1981).

Nelson-Le Gall, S. "Help Seeking Behavior in Learning." Review of Research in Education, v.12 (1985).

Rickwood, D. and K. Thomas. "Conceptual Measurement Framework for Help Seeking for Mental Health Problems." Psychology Research and Behavior Management. v. 5 (2012). http://dx.doi.org/10.2147/PRBM.S38707 (Accessed December 2013).

Heterosexual Privilege

Initially, the scholarly writings on privilege focused on gender and the unearned benefits that were bestowed upon males. Later, the notion of privilege was expanded to include race, and then sexual orientation as well. Heterosexual privilege involves unearned benefits bestowed upon the heterosexual majority but denied to those who view themselves as sexual-orientation minorities, such as the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ) community. Understanding heterosexual privilege is relevant to understanding diversity. This article provides an overview of privilege, a definition of heterosexual privilege, and examples of heterosexual privilege. It differentiates heterosexual privilege from homophobia, and concludes by offering possible explanations for the existence of heterosexual privilege in society.

Overview of Privilege

To fully comprehend heterosexual privilege, one has to review the scholarly writings on how it was initially applied to gender and subsequently to race. There is an abundance of scholarly writings on gender privilege. Numerous scholars who study privilege often refer to the works of feminist Peggy McIntosh, who coined the term invisible knapsack. McIntosh noted how males have bestowed on themselves a special status because of their gender. She purported that males are oblivious to the privileges and rewards that they receive because they are males, and that they carry this knapsack, which is full of the tools and resources that allow them to succeed easier than someone without the knapsack. The owners of the knapsack, therefore, believe that they have achieved a certain level of success based solely on their own merits; they are not aware that they have unearned privileges that may have contributed to their successful achievements. They are aware that others may not have certain advantages; however, usually they do not acknowledge and understand that many of the privileges that they possess are related to another's lack of privileges.

Scholarly interest expanded beyond an examination of gender privilege as numerous scholars argued that this privilege extends to race, with whites the beneficiaries of this privilege. Unearned privileges that are afforded to white people are called white privileges. Like the male privilege, this privilege is obvious to those who do not have it and yet invisible to those who possess it. As a member of the dominant group, one is afforded certain opportunities and entitlements to which a person who is not a member of the dominant group will not have access. McIntosh created a list of examples of the privileges she enjoyed as a white person—for example, she could easily find an academic institution and courses that give attention to white people.

Definition and Examples of Heterosexual Privilege

"Heterosexual privilege" is a term used to describe privileges that favor heterosexuals as the norm over homosexuals or people who identify as LGBTQ. Heterosexual privilege, or straight privilege, refers to rights and unearned advantages that heterosexuals have in society. Many of these unearned privileges take place in everyday life without any forethought. Heterosexual privilege is similar to white privilege in that the beneficiaries do not have to think about their status or put forth any extra effort to be recipients of the benefits. The following examples are based on McIntosh's article on white privilege: Heterosexuals can pick up a magazine, watch TV, or play music and can be certain that their sexual orientation will be represented. People never ask heterosexuals why they chose their sexual orientation or to think about why they are straight. Also, heterosexuals can easily find a religious community that will not exclude them for being heterosexual.

Distinguishing Homophobia From Heterosexual Privilege

It is important to understand the differences between homophobia and heterosexual privilege. Homophobia can be characterized as acts or thoughts that specifically target gay people in the form of discrimination, gay bashing, and derogatory comments. In the extreme, homophobic actions may be the commission of hate crimes against gay people that may result in death. Heterosexual privileges are benefits that heterosexual people experience daily with no effort on their part and that often occur unconsciously.

Explanations for Heterosexual Privilege

Scholars in the psychological literature have argued that heterosexist beliefs are the products of internal psychological repression of same-sex desires that heterosexual people have; in other words, the negative way in which heterosexuals respond to their own same-sex desires. Other scholars have suggested that heterosexism and heterosexual privilege are related to the need of heterosexual men to maintain a patriarchal structure that benefits men because it maintains the current structure of women being connected to men, masculinity, and the traditional family as ideal.

Conclusion

Heterosexual privilege is a concept that helps one understand inequality directed toward those whose sexual orientation may not be viewed as traditional or the norm in society. Gender studies and the scholarly contributions of McIntosh helped identify the notion of gender and race privilege, which are unearned benefits that are bestowed upon the dominant group in power. Similarly, heterosexual privileges are unearned benefits that benefit the heterosexual majority while excluding groups that identify as sexual-orientation minorities. Overall, heterosexual privilege is an everyday experience that is afforded to the majority and is a phenomenon that often occurs on an unconscious level.

Paul G. Wright
California State University, Monterey Bay

See Also: Bias in Service Delivery; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Implicit Bias; LGBTQ Clients; Monoculturalism; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Heterosexual Privilege Checklist. http://sap.mit.edu/content/pdf/heterosexual_privilege.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Kilmer, Julie J. "Heterosexism and Homophobia." In Marc Stein, ed., Encyclopedia of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender History in America, Vol 2. Detroit: Charles Scribner's Sons, 2004.

McIntosh, Peggy. "White Privilege: Unpacking the Invisible Knapsack." In Working Paper 189. White Privilege and Male Privilege: A Personal Account of Coming to See Correspondence Through Work in Women's Studies, 1988.

Williford, Beth. "Heterosexual Privilege." In Jodi O'Brien, ed., Encyclopedia of Gender and Society, Vol. 1. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2009.

Hispanic Americans

One in every six Americans comes from Hispanic origins, making this population segment the largest ethnic group in the United States. Unfortunately, many human services professionals have minimal exposure to Hispanic Americans, leaving professionals unprepared the first time a Hispanic client walks into the office. Culture influences an individual's behavior; therefore, it is imperative that human services professionals seek to understand the client in the context of his or her own culture.

Hispanic Americans are the fastest-growing minority in the United States with numbers approaching 20 percent of the U.S. population. The Hispanic population is expected to reach 30 percent by the year 2050, making it increasingly likely that human services professionals will encounter Hispanic clients. Although much of the Hispanic American population has immigrated to the United States over the last 100 years, a sizable population is indigenous to the areas in which they live. Examples of states with large indigenous Hispanic American populations include California, Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas.

Many professionals mistakenly assume that all clients of Hispanic origin share the same cultural values, but just as there are many cultures among Anglos and African Americans, there are also numerous cultures in the Hispanic American population. Differences exist based on country of origin as well as on the states or regions within that country. The terms Hispanic or Latino are generally defined as "a person of Cuban, Mexican, Puerto Rican, South or Central American, or other Spanish culture or origin, regardless of race." Some Hispanics take offense to being labeled Hispanic or Latino, believing it is an overgeneralization. These individuals prefer to be associated with their country of origin (e.g. Mexican, Colombian, Cuban).

In Hispanic culture, a common subculture group distinction is skin tone. Hispanics with dark skin are generally believed to be from indigenous origins. Individuals with light skin are considered to be decedents of the Spaniards. To many Hispanics, skin tone represents a social class distinction. Human services professionals should be aware that referring to a light-skinned Hispanic as any race other than white is considered a cultural blunder.

Family Dynamics

Hispanic cultures place heavy emphasis on the family unit. Most families are either highly matriarchal or patriarchal, and the decisions of the elders are typically accepted as law. Respect for the family elders is taught from a young age and is present throughout an individual's life. If a client's family deems a particular treatment as inappropriate, it is unlikely the human services professional will convince the client otherwise. To avoid this from happening, the counselor should include important family members whenever possible. Although a break from common practice, including a Hispanic client's close family members in treatment planning uses the individual's orientation toward family as a resource and creates allies out of the client's family members. When including family members in a client's treatment, special care must be taken to protect the client's confidentiality and to ensure proper releases are signed for each family member involved.

An exception to this inclusion, of course, applies in circumstances related to domestic abuse. Hispanic families are very private and do not like anyone outside the family to become involved in what they consider to be family matters. It is common for immediate family members to try to protect the abuser, sometimes going so far as to pressure the victim to remain silent. When the professional suspects domestic abuse, the client should be discreetly separated from family members before being questioned about possible domestic violence.

Large families are the norm in Hispanic cultures, and it is not uncommon for an individual to have six to 10 siblings. Hispanic culture treats children as assets due to the value they add to the family. Because of the tight family orientation, siblings often serve as a support network to each other. Brothers and sisters are quick to defend one another—to threaten one is to threaten all. Extended family members (aunts, uncles, cousins) often play an integral part in the family dynamics. It is common to refer to close family friends as cousins, aunts, and uncles, even when no blood tie exists.

In Hispanic cultures, a major family event occurs when a girl turns 15—the age when a girl becomes a woman. A large celebration is thrown called a quinceañera. This age-old tradition is one of the major events in a young Latina's life. A culturally sensitive individual counseling a Hispanic adolescent girl should be aware of the importance placed on this event. There is really no equivalent in Anglo cultures.

Family get-togethers and dinners are an integral part of the lives of many Hispanic families. These events may occur weekly, monthly, or annually, and are a time when the entire family comes together; often friends and neighbors also attend. Attendance is expected, and an individual who misses one of these events may fall into family disfavor. As acculturation increases among Hispanic Americans, this tradition is slowly falling by the wayside and it is most likely to be encountered in first- and second-generation families.

Language Barriers

Probably the most obvious cultural barrier encountered when working with Hispanic Americans is language. The primary language spoken in Hispanic countries is Spanish, and for many Hispanic Americans, English is their second language. Although the Spanish language has common features regardless of the country or state of origin, each region has specific differences and nuances. When speaking in Spanish to a client, if the client shows a look of confusion or surprise, it is best to clarify specific word meaning with the individual.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services reports that 35 percent of Hispanics state they are not fluent in English. Individuals who report some English competency may still possess comprehension problems. When working with clients who are not fluent in English, the human services professional should speak in Spanish whenever possible. Spanish is the second-most widely spoken language in the United States, and culturally diverse professionals should make learning this language a high priority. Speaking in English to someone with minimal English comprehension may prevent the individual from properly voicing his or her complaint, or may lead to confusion and misunderstanding concerning the diagnosis. If the professional does not possess fluency in Spanish, the Spanish-speaking client should be referred to someone who does.

Perhaps the most common barrier encountered with Spanish-speaking clients is in regard to forms. It is unethical to have a client sign a document he or she cannot read or comprehend. Unfortunately, even agencies that have a staff member fluent in Spanish rarely have Spanish forms. At a minimum, the professional who treats Hispanic Americans should have Spanish versions of the consent to treat or client rights and release forms.

Acculturation

Working with Hispanic Americans requires that the professional consider the client's acculturation when evaluating cultural values and attitudes. Acculturation refers to the changing of values from a nondominant group to those of the dominant group. Acculturation is a significant factor with both immigrants and Hispanic Americans moving from a predominantly Spanish-speaking neighborhood to a more mainstream neighborhood. Based on the degree of acculturation, the professional receives an idea as to the level of cultural influence the individual experiences.

Numerous acculturation measurement instruments are available for Hispanic Americans. At a minimum, the professional should ask the client questions pertinent to acculturation, such as, "For how many generations has your family lived in the United States?" or "What is the primary language spoken in your home?" By measuring the client's degree of acculturation, the professional gains an idea of the degree of influence of the client's culture.

Psychological testing presents an often-overlooked problem when working with Hispanic clients. Psychological testing compares an individual's test answers to a known group of participants. Based on the client's answers, deviation from the norm can be measured and assessed. The problem is that the vast majority of psychological tests are based on a mainstream participant group, often college students volunteering for the project. Because of the difference in cultural values and attitudes, Hispanic clients are unlikely to respond in the same manner as the participant group, thereby invalidating the test results for clients within this group. The less acculturated a Hispanic client is, the less likely he or she is to answer questions in the same manner as a mainstream client. When the baseline is no longer present, the test values lose their relevance.

Attitudes Toward Human Services Professionals

Traditional Hispanic values place high importance on respect for authority, and these individuals are unlikely to question or challenge a human services professional. These clients view the professional as an authority figure and may therefore believe asking questions is disrespectful to that authority. The professional must realize that the Hispanic American client may not ask questions even when he or she does not understand something. It is the professional's responsibility to explain diagnoses and treatment options until there is no doubt that the client understands.

Likewise, Hispanic American clients may not want to openly disagree with their provider or voice doubts and concerns. Clients may hinder their progress by not following treatment recommendations or not taking prescribed medications, either through lack of understanding or by open defiance. The human services professional should never assume that because the client remains quiet, he or she has no questions. Attitudes toward human services professionals are directly linked to the degree of acculturation of the individual.

Stereotyping

Racial bias and stereotyping are so common for Hispanic Americans that many have come to expect it from non-Hispanics. Non-Hispanic professionals are often guilty of stereotyping simply by not knowing any better. Not all Hispanics are undocumented Americans; most of the clients a professional is likely to encounter are not. Not all Hispanics work as gardeners or maids; Hispanic Americans can be found in every occupation imaginable. The best way for a professional to avoid stereotyping a Hispanic client is never to assume anything, and always ask.

Because traditional Hispanic families see human services professionals as authority figures, if a counselor makes an incorrect assumption, the client may be reluctant to correct him or her. Traditional families typically hold a strong sense of cultural pride; respectfully asking the client to explain something invites the client to disclose more freely and reduces the likelihood of cultural stereotyping.

Health Care and Insurance

The U.S. census reported that 30 percent of Hispanic Americans were uninsured in 2011, making this population segment the largest uninsured ethnic group in the United States. Lack of insurance or inability to pay prevents many Hispanics from seeking health care. Hispanic cultural values further discourage paying for intangible items, such as health insurance and mental health care. The attitude among many Hispanic Americans is that if they can't touch it or see it, it must not be real or necessary.

Mental health practitioners and human services agencies should be aware that lack of insurance presents a huge barrier for this cultural group. Many uninsured individuals spend a great deal of time building up their courage before they come in for help. A provider who immediately focuses on the ability to pay may intimidate the client enough to never come back. Building trust with the client during the first visit is essential if there is to be a second.

Trust Issues

Hispanic Americans are often distrustful of strangers. Family members are trustworthy; all others must prove themselves. These clients are particularly wary of non-Hispanics and frequently reluctant to self-disclose. To help a Hispanic client, a professional must first gain the client's trust. Communicating sensitivity toward the client's culture will go far toward building a trust relationship.

Trust is usually extended slowly but can be lost quickly over any perceived deception. A high value is placed on personal integrity. Breaking a promise or agreement, no matter how slight, can cause any trust extended to be immediately withdrawn. One of the fastest ways to develop a trust bond is through the use of client-centered therapy. When the counselor is transparent and forthright, the client is more likely to view the professional as a trustworthy individual.

Seeking Help

Pride is a very dominant characteristic among Hispanics, sometimes to the degree that it becomes detrimental. Children are taught from a young age to be independent and to trust no one outside of the family. Asking for help is seen as a weakness. Admitting to a mental illness is seen as a bigger weakness. In traditional Hispanic culture, seeking help for a mental disorder is discouraged; the individual is expected to resolve his or her own issues.

As stated previously, the more acculturated an individual is, the more likely he or she is to be open to counseling. A culturally sensitive professional recognizes how difficult it is for traditional Hispanic Americans to seek help, and, beginning with the first session, does everything possible to make the client feel comfortable. Standard practice for most professionals is to conduct an assessment during the first meeting. If the assessment is used strictly for gathering clinical information, the counselor risks never seeing the client again. Sensitivity to the client's cultural needs and empathy toward the difficulty the client had in seeking help will set the stage for building the trust relationship that is essential to the helping process.

Addiction

In recent years, drug use among Hispanic teens has increased at alarming rates, making this group the most likely ethnicity to abuse drugs or alcohol during adolescence. Studies have confirmed that drug use has become a normalized behavior among Hispanic teens. Many Hispanic American parents complain that they are helpless in regard to curbing their teens' illicit drug use.

Among Hispanic adults, drug use has decreased slightly in recent years and alcohol abuse has increased. Generally speaking, U.S.-born Hispanic Americans are significantly more likely to abuse alcohol or drugs than foreign-born Hispanics. Studies have shown that the percentage of Hispanic Americans who abuse alcohol increases in direct proportion to the degree of acculturation.

A significant barrier to treatment for clients who speak only Spanish is the low number of Spanish-speaking residential treatment facilities. These facilities are not proportionate to the demand. Waiting lists are common, and Hispanic Americans often fail to receive appropriate care due to language, distance, or financial barriers. Because of the traditional Hispanic's reluctance to disclose to strangers, professionals often overlook substance abuse problems as they focus on more apparent client needs.

Conclusion

As the percentage of Hispanic Americans continues to increase, human services professionals are increasingly likely to encounter them as clients. The thoughts, attitudes, and belief systems of an individual are closely linked to his or her dominant culture. To work responsibly with Hispanic American clients, professionals are strongly encouraged to become familiar with Hispanic culture. Cultural differences between Hispanic clients and the dominant culture become apparent in the client's behavior. Understanding the attitudes and values of the Hispanic client is essential to providing optimum care.

Ron Fritz
Independent Scholar

See Also: Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey; Hispanic Immigrants; National Alliance for Hispanic Health.

Further Readings

Guzman, M., N. Carrasco, D. Choudhuri, and A. Santiago-Rivera. Counseling & Diversity: Latino Americans. Independence, KY: Cengage Learning, 2011.

Houben, Ligia M. Counseling Hispanics Through Loss, Grief, And Bereavement: A Guide for Mental Health Professionals. New York: Springer, 2011.
Smith, R. and R. Montilla. Counseling and Family Therapy with Latino Populations: Strategies that Work. London: Routledge, 2005.

Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey

The Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (HHANES) was the largest and most comprehensive nationwide health survey of Latinos and Latinas in the United States. Designed and conducted by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's National Center for Health Statistics (NCHS) from July 1982 to December 1984, the HHANES analyzed the health and nutritional status of 16,000 persons, taken from a sampling frame that included approximately 76 percent of the 1980 Latino/a-origin population in the United States. Respondents, ranging from 6 months to 74 years old, were from three Latino/a groups: (1) Mexican Americans residing in Arizona, California, Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas, who were surveyed from July 1982 through November 1983 (9,894 persons sampled, 8,554 interviewed, and 7,462 examined); (2) Cuban Americans residing in Dade County, Florida, who were surveyed from January 1984 through April 1984 (2,244 persons sampled, 1,766 interviewed, and 1,357 examined); and (3) Puerto Ricans residing in the New York City metropolitan area, including parts of Connecticut and New Jersey, surveyed from May 1984 through December 1984 (3,786 persons sampled, 3,369 interviewed, and 2,834 examined). Findings from the HHANES include 24-hour recall, adolescent and adult history questionnaire, alcohol consumption, blood and urine assessments, body measurements, child history questionnaire, dental health, diabetes and oral glucose tolerance test, dietary practices and nutrient intake, drug abuse, gallbladder ultrasound, hearing, electrocardiogram, depression, pesticide data, physician's examination, and vision.

The Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey was developed and implemented as a response to the five population-based national health examination surveys conducted by the NCHS between 1960 and 1980. While Mexican Americans, Cuban Americans, and Puerto Ricans were included in probability samples of the national health surveys conducted between 1960 and 1980, the number of persons in these groups was insufficient to enable adequate estimation of general Latino/a health conditions, and specifically of these groups. Similar to the previous national health examination surveys, data collection for HHANES was conducted through interviews to collect medical histories, surveys, direct physical examinations, and laboratory and clinical tests and measurements (e.g., of blood lead levels and prevalence of specific conditions). De-identified data for HHANES and all National Health and Nutrition Examination Surveys are publicly available and housed in the Epidemiology Data Resource Center. The description of the HHANES sample design and operational plan is available through the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

One compelling set of findings from HHANES related the prevalence of diabetes, which is higher among Mexican Americans than among the non-Latino/a caucasian population. Higher serum levels of organochlorine pesticides in Mexican Americans, discovered through the questionnaire and laboratory data testing to exposure to pesticides and other environmental toxins, led to further research to analyze associations between pesticide exposure and diabetes.

The collection of the HHANES pesticide laboratory data was a collaborative effort by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), in collaboration with the NCHS. During the direct physical examination, urine and blood specimens were obtained from a half sample of persons aged 12 to 19 years and a group aged 20 to 74 years. Blood and urine specimens for each person surveyed in the HNANES subsample were analyzed at the EPA's Environmental Chemistry Laboratory Toxicant Analysis Center. Farm work histories and pesticide exposure data were collected in the HHANES Adult Sample Person Questionnaire implemented in each household in the sample. Additional information on pesticide exposure was collected as part of the Adult Sample Person Supplement survey instrument administered in the mobile examination center. The Environmental Chemistry Laboratory Toxicant Analysis Center analyzed the blood and urine samples for seven pesticides or pesticide metabolites, including p,p'-DDT (dichlorodiphenyltrichloroethane), p,p'-DDE (dichlorodiphenyldichloroethylene), dieldrin, oxychlordane, β-hexachlorocyclohexane, hexachlorobenzene, and transnonachlor. Studies reported a link between higher serum levels of certain organochlorine pesticides and an increased prevalence of diabetes.

Lara Lengel
Stephanie Salerno
Bowling Green State University

See Also: Hispanic Americans; Hispanic Immigrants; Journal of Immigrant and Minority Health; Migrant Workers; National Alliance for Hispanic Health; National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities.

Further Readings

Block, G., J. C. Norris, R. M. Mandel, and C. DiSogra. "Sources of Energy and Six Nutrients in Diets of Low-Income Hispanic-American Women and Their Children: Quantitative Data From HHANES, 1982–1984." Journal of the American Dietetic Association, v.95/2 (1995).

Cox, Shanna, Amanda Sue Niskar, K. M. Venkat Narayan, and Michele Marcus. "Prevalence of Self-Reported Diabetes and Exposure to Organochlorine Pesticides Among Mexican Americans: Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey, 1982–1984." Environmental Health Perspectives, v.115/12 (2007).

Rodriguez, Rudolph A., German T. Hernandez, Ann M. O'Hare, David V. Glidden, and Eliseo J. Pérez-Stable. "Creatinine Levels Among Mexican Americans, Puerto Ricans, and Cuban Americans in the Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey." Kidney International, v.66/6 (2004).

Hispanic Immigrants

Providing human services to Hispanic immigrants involves working with both legal and undocumented individuals, collectively referred to as foreign-born immigrants. In some ways, the needs of these two groups are similar; in many ways, however, they are very different. Hispanic Americans are frequently divided on their feelings toward undocumented immigrants. Hispanic Americans who were born in or who have legally immigrated to the United States may harbor resentment toward individuals who chose to immigrate illegally. In recent years, the resentment felt by legal immigrants has become diluted as feelings of compassion and empathy have increased toward those who immigrate to the United States covertly. Many Hispanic Americans now realize that undocumented immigrants are seeking to escape the deplorable living conditions and corrupt governments that often place seemingly insurmountable barriers in the immigration path, and now look more favorably on both legal and illegal immigration.

This developing acceptance appears to coincide with the growing crime and violence present in many Hispanic countries. Between 1990 and 2010, the estimated population of undocumented immigrants in the United States increased more than threefold, from 3.5 to 11.4 million. This unprecedented growth dramatically increased the likelihood that service professionals will encounter undocumented immigrants in their professional practice.

Mexico is by far the leading source for undocumented Hispanic immigrants, followed by El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras. Hispanic immigrants often gravitate to cities with large Hispanic populations, such as New York City, Los Angeles, Chicago, and Houston. These destinations make it easier to blend in because of the common culture and language. Cultural differences and language barriers may serve to reinforce ethnic stereotypes. Human services professionals are ethically bound to treat all Hispanic clients the same, regardless of immigration status.

Split Families

Human services workers should be aware that split family dynamics are fairly common among immigrants. Immigration to the United States, legal or otherwise, is a very expensive proposition. It is fairly common for one family member to immigrate first in order to work and earn the money necessary to bring additional family members into the United States. Families may be split between two countries for years. Furthermore, in some cases

Mexican immigrants march for more rights in San Jose, California, in 2006. Approximately one out of every 27 people living in the United States is an undocumented immigrant, and the number continues to climb each year. As violence and government corruption in Hispanic countries steadily increases, more of these individuals are seeking refuge in the United States.

a Hispanic family may be split because a family member is deported to the country of origin and thus separated from family and children. Undocumented immigrants may be reluctant to seek help out of fear of deportation.

Language Barriers

Probably the most obvious problem encountered when working with Hispanic immigrants is the language barrier. Hispanic immigrants typically speak Spanish, and therapists and social workers fluent in Spanish are often scarce in remote locations. The language problem is compounded because required forms, such as informed consent and release of information forms, are rarely available in Spanish. It is unethical for clients to sign forms they do not understand.

Human services workers should never make assumptions concerning Hispanic clients based on language fluency. Not speaking English does not automatically label an individual as an undocumented immigrant. Citizenship requires an individual to speak, understand, and write English; however, legal immigration does not. An individual who does not speak English may still be in the United States legally. Furthermore, surveys report that 75 percent of Hispanic households speak Spanish in the home. It is not unusual in a Hispanic household for children to be more fluent in English than their parents and to act as their translators.

Health Insurance

Health insurance among undocumented immigrants is nearly nonexistent. Insurance companies require a valid Social Security number at the time of application, which undocumented immigrants do not have. Some immigrants possess forged identification documents to aid in securing employment; however, in regard to health insurance, most consider the risk of exposure too great. Practitioners may discover that immigrant clients will participate in services only when they can pay cash. These same clients may forgo or postpone services if they are not able to afford them at the time of service.

Trust Issues

Undocumented immigrants have a lot to lose by trusting others. Deportation by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) can change lives, separate families, and forever alter a person's future. Many immigrants were raised in poor and unsafe countries, where unscrupulous and corrupt officials often betrayed their trust. These individuals learned to associate authority with corruption, and human services workers represent authority to them. It should not be surprising that these individuals have difficulty trusting human services workers.

In many Hispanic countries, human services are a luxury afforded by the rich and are not available to the lower classes. A stranger in the United States offering help may seem unusual and even suspicious to many immigrants. Being real with clients and taking a genuine interest in their culture will go a long way toward building the initial trust bond. Immigrant clients need to feel safe before they can disclose.

Confidentiality

Client confidentiality extends to immigration status. Inquiries regarding clients' immigration status may serve to frighten or intimidate clients and prevent them from making full disclosure regarding their need for help. When working with undocumented immigrants, it is best to limit personal identifying information to those questions necessary for the clients' assessments and diagnoses.

Clients may view specific questions regarding contact information as intrusive or disrespectful. When interviewing clients with unknown immigration status, the professional should practice empathy and consider what he or she would personally be comfortable in disclosing. The human services worker should use this insight when selecting the right questions to ask; clients should never be pressured into disclosing anything they feel uncomfortable sharing.

Approximately one out of every 27 people living in the United States is an undocumented immigrant, and the number continues to climb each year. As violence and government corruption in Hispanic countries steadily increases, more and more of these individuals are seeking refuge in the United States, and human services providers are increasingly likely to encounter Hispanic immigrants in professional practice. Professional ethics dictate that practitioners familiarize themselves with the culture and idiosyncrasies relevant to this growing population.

Ron Fritz
Independent Scholar

See Also: Hispanic Americans; Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of; Immigration, Human Services Issues.

Further Reading

Guzman, M., N. Carrasco, D. Choudhuri, and A. Santiago-Rivera. Counseling & Diversity: Latino Americans. Stamford, CT: Cengage Learning, 2011.

Smith, R. and R. Montilla. Counseling and Family Therapy with Latino Populations: Strategies That Work. London: Routledge, 2005.

"U.S. Unauthorized Immigration Population Trends, 1990–2012." Pew Research, 2013. http://www.pewhispanic.org/2013/09/23/unauthorized-trends/ (Accessed December 2013).

Hmong Immigrants

The Hmong (pronounced hmoong or hmawng)—a group identifying strongly as Hmong, Hmong American, or generally Southeast Asian—has language, cultural practices, and traditions that are unique from other Asian groups. Those living in the United States today identify mainly as coming from Laos; they were granted refugee status because of their alignment with the United States during the Vietnam War. Even though the Hmong are a smaller ethnic group, they are cohesive and prolific, characteristics that helped preserve the qualities of a discrete cultural group despite the lack of a true motherland. In balancing their role as a diasporic group, the Hmong are culturally proud while open to growth, building inroads and connections with the larger community. A group in transition, some Hmong have flourished since arriving more than 35 years ago; however, the service needs of the Hmong must not go unnoticed or lumped into a larger category of model minorities.

Background

The early history of the Hmong is challenging to trace, partly due to their multiple migrations. Caution should be used with regard to equating the history of the Hmong with that of the Miao or Meo—terms viewed as derogatory by the Hmong. Hmong groups began a gradual southward migration from China in the 18th century due to political oppression. Historically known for being frequent migrators with a preference for mountain living, the Hmong people's isolation may have contributed to their tight clan structures. The Hmong were agrarian; they cultivated rice, bred fish, and developed irrigation systems for their crops. The Hmong value family and typically have large families. In Laos, the Hmong were mountain-dwelling farmers as well as lowland inhabitants attaining education, working for the government, and conducting commerce. Prior to the Vietnam War, between 300,000 and 400,000 Hmong lived in Laos. Hmong in Laos were mainly White and Green Hmong. The dialects of these two subgroups are mutually intelligible.

Migration of the Hmong to the United States

In Laos, many Hmong fought in the so-called Secret War, serving the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, and resulting in their persecution after the war. Some Hmong are fiercely proud of this service to the United States, which has mostly gone unnoticed. The disproportionately high death toll of more than 100,000 bespeaks a circumstance in which nearly every Hmong family in the United States has a tale of loss and tragedy related to the war.

Between 1976 and 2005, about 100,000 Hmong immigrated to the United States. The lag in migration implies that some Hmong may have spent significant time in Thai refugee camps. The 2010 U.S. census data show that 260,073 Hmong resided in the United States, with the largest communities in California (91,224), Minnesota, (66,181), and Wisconsin (49,240). Hmong individuals live in every state in the United States, and the majority are under 30 years old, representing one of the youngest populations per capita.

Hmong Written Language

Many Hmong are illiterate in their own language. Scholars postulate that the ancient written language of the Hmong was lost after being banned centuries ago. To communicate, Hmong women disguised their alphabet in the intricate patterns of their tribal dress, a tradition passed down from mother to daughter but inevitably lost due to frequent forced migration. The current language is in the romanized popular alphabet developed in the 1950s by Western missionaries in Southeast Asia. The Hmong language has eight distinct tones, which are noted by assigned letters that are not pronounced, a format contrasting with that of the pronunciation-driven letter system in the English language. The Hmong prefer to pass down traditions orally and visually, a tradition that can be seen in Pa Ndau, flower cloths with intricate embroidery patterns communicating well wishes through symbols.

Oral Language

Unlike the written language, there is stronger emphasis by Hmong families to continue speaking Hmong. Most Hmong are bilingual, speaking Hmong and the language of the country. For older Hmong, the second language is likely Laotian and/or Thai, whereas for younger generations it is English. The 2000 U.S. census data show that 34.8 percent of Hmong were linguistically isolated. (This statistic is 4.1 percent of the U.S. population) Sixty percent of Hmong in the United States speak the White Hmong dialect and 40 percent speak the Green Hmong dialect. Green Hmong speakers are more likely to learn White Hmong than vice versa, and younger generations are more likely to speak White Hmong.

Education and Socioeconomic Conditions

Prior to coming to the United States, many Hmong had little or no access to schools. Many Hmong immigrants were adults or young adults upon arrival in the United States. Data from the 2000 U.S. census show that 45.3 percent of the Hmong in the United States have had no formal schooling. (This statistic is 1.4 percent of the U.S. population.) In general, the lack of education, language barrier, and lack of job training contributed to poor socioeconomic conditions for the Hmong, with 29.8 percent in poverty (14.3 percent of the U.S. population), relying on self-employment, menial jobs, or welfare programs for income and health services. As an evolving group, about 13 percent have attained a bachelor's degree or higher, a proportion that has doubled between 2001 and 2010. Data also support that among Hmong women, 80.3 percent were attending college, a slightly higher rate than their male counterparts (78.2 percent).

Religion

About two-thirds of Hmong in the United States continue to practice the traditional animism and shamanism. Visible examples of adherence to this practice can be seen in some Hmong wearing accessories such as red necklaces, white cloth bands, and red or white strings. Hmong traditionally believe that these amulets ward off evil spirits to keep the soul inside. Shamanism continues to play an integral part in Hmong culture in the United States, particularly around life events such as births and deaths. Most of the remaining third are Christians, although the proportion may be higher in some states. Additionally, some Hmong hold a combination of traditional and Christian beliefs.

A People in Transition

Although more is known about general adjustment issues, not much is known about continued growth and assimilation. There is limited information on women and gender equity within the culture. Traditionally paternalistic, Hmong have had to adjust to greater roles for women in U.S. society. While arguably a small percentage, information on success strategies of middle-to-upper-class Hmong professionals is currently lacking. Finally, there is limited information on the persistence of influences of elders in a judicial society. As a group balancing sustaining identity and assimilation, more attention needs to be focused on these and other changing trends.

Mailee O. X. Kue
Melvin Wade
University of Rhode Island

See Also: Acculturation; Asian Immigrants; Refugee Assistance; Southeast Asian.

Further Readings

Allen, M., S. Matthew, and M. J. Boland. "Working With Immigrant and Refugee Populations: Issues and Hmong Case Study." Library Trends, v.53/2 (2004).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "A Practical Guide for Tuberculosis Programs That Provide Services to Hmong Persons From Laos." http://www.cdc.gov/tb/publications/guidestoolkits/ethnographicguides/Hmong/default.htm (Accessed January 2014).

Cha, D. Hmong American Concepts of Health, Healing, and Conventional Medicine. New York: Routledge, 2003.

Lee, G. Y. "Cultural Identity in Post-Modern Society: Reflections on What Is a Hmong?" Hmong Studies Journal, v.1/1 (1996).

Holocaust Survivors

During Word War II, German Nazis and their collaborators murdered some 6 million Jews. Others were forced into ghettos and concentration camps, where they lived under unspeakable conditions. Large numbers starved to death, and those who survived retained the memories of constant hunger for the rest of their lives. While incarcerated, they lost access to proper hygiene and sanitation and had no preventive health care. The Holocaust has been relegated to history by generations born long after World War II, but it remains a vivid and terrifying memory to those who survived it.

World War II ended in 1945, and those in hiding and in concentration camps were freed. This means that most survivors were children during the Holocaust. The trauma experienced by these survivors included the loss of the right to live in safety and develop as normal children. The traumas they suffered have also affected the emotional health of their own children and grandchildren. Human services professionals and members of the medical community have spent decades helping these survivors and their descendants deal with the aftermath of the Holocaust.

In 2013, approximately 500,000 Holocaust survivors were living around the world. That number declined from 687,900 in December 2008. Approximately 120,000 survivors were living in the United States in 2013, and their average age was 80. Three out five were female, and two-thirds lived on their own. Between 2005 and 2013, the number of Holocaust survivors needing home care increased by 450 percent. Nearly one-third of these survivors live in poverty. The poverty status is particularly common among those who came to the United States after the fall of the Soviet Union in the late 1990s and for those living in large cities, such as New York, where more than half of all Holocaust survivors live in poverty. As they have grown older, many Holocaust survivors have experienced recurrences of the traumas associated with the period they spent in concentration camps, hiding from the Nazis, and watching family members and friends die or be taken away never to be seen again. Once labeled victims of the so-called concentration camp syndrome, Holocaust survivors are now considered victims of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). The survivors often look to government agencies for help in meeting their daily needs and in dealing with the continued impact of the Holocaust. Others turn to Jewish organizations, which help with everything from counseling to housekeeping and personal grooming services. In 2013, the current German government acknowledged the sins of the past and agreed to pay a billion dollars over a four-year period to meet the needs of Jewish Holocaust survivors.

Holocaust survivor Rose Schindler shows the prisoner number tattoo on her arm. As they have grown older, many Holocaust survivors have experienced recurrences of the traumas associated with the period they spent in concentration camps, hiding from the Nazis, and watching family members and friends die or be taken away never to be seen again.

Lingering Traumas

Even Holocaust survivors who went on to build successful lives and seemed to have adjusted well emotionally may begin to experience traumas as they age, resulting in a variety of illnesses and feelings of dependency, isolation, institutionalization, a loss of family members, and a constant feeling that death is drawing near. The limitations caused by an increasingly frail human body may bring on recurrences of feelings experienced during the Holocaust, particularly the loss of privacy and the lack of control over their own lives. Aging Holocaust survivors may also experience an ongoing sense of loss. Major illness, such as a cancer diagnosis, can send a Holocaust survivor into a spiral, and trauma may be brought on or worsened through conditions such as dementia. Institutionalization, which may include nursing homes, assisted living quarters, or prolonged hospital stays, has proven to be particularly traumatic for many Holocaust survivors, who equate institutional life with the years spent in hiding or in concentration camps. Because survivors frequently suffer from PTSD, taking showers, having blood tests or surgery, or experiencing smells and sounds similar to those associated with Holocaust experiences can trigger flashbacks to the Holocaust. Survivors living in Israel during the Gulf War of 1990 were hit with an onslaught of memories that led to a recurrence of traumatic symptoms. Emotions common to many Holocaust survivors include anxiety, depression, impaired cognition, impaired memory, nightmares, psychosomatic symptoms, changes in personality, general rigidity, and emotional withdrawal.

Somewhat surprisingly, researchers have learned that those who were children during the Holocaust have often experienced more severe traumas as they age than were experienced by those who were adults at that time. The most traumatic aftermath has been observed in those who were small children and thus were still in their formative years. For the rest of their lives, these survivors may feel abandoned, experience memory loss or fragmentation of memories, and have trouble revealing their emotions to others. Immediately after World War II, researchers found that surviving orphans often clustered together in orphanages and were unable to trust anyone outside their own groups.

By the 1980s, a number of major studies had been conducted on survivors who were children during the Holocaust, generally revealing that children under 4 years of age during the Holocaust tended to exhibit neurotic tendencies as adults. The most common emotion felt by those who were ages 11 to 14 during the Holocaust was anxiety, and children older than 14 experienced reactive depressive symptoms. Symptoms were often more severe among survivors who had been separated from their families during the Holocaust because young children have an intense need to feel safe. As adults, members of this group continued to exhibit feelings of loneliness, bitterness, anger, and grief. Their ingrained fear of abandonment often prevented them from forming healthy relationships with their own children.

More specifically, those aged 5 to 8 years during the Holocaust may be unable to recall their experiences because they have buried them deep within. Even in the absence of conscious memories, they may still experience sadness, loneliness, a lack of belonging, and a feeling of detachment from others. Survivors who were between the ages of 8 and 12 may constantly seek validation, approval, and admiration because these significant elements in building self-esteem were missing when they were forced into ghettos and concentration camps. They may also be unable to concentrate well. Survivors who were between the ages of 12 and 15 were immediately forced out of childhood. This taking on of adult roles too quickly has often led to disillusionment, anger, and bitterness.

Experts do not agree on the therapeutic benefits of disclosure of Holocaust experiences. Trauma victims are generally encouraged to recount their experiences out of the belief that it is cathartic. In Holocaust survivors, however, the recounting of past traumas may be counterproductive, triggering recurrent distress.

Second and Third Generations

Even though many survivors refused to talk about their lives during the Holocaust, even to their own families, the traumas experienced by Holocaust survivors have frequently influenced the lives of their children and grandchildren. In the United States in the 1970s, 250,000 survivors' children entered adulthood at a time when political activism was particularly strong. These descendants used that momentum to find their own voices in addition to speaking for their parents, making sure that the Holocaust was never forgotten.

These activists had been motivated in large part by the publicity surrounding the trial of Adolf Eichmann, the Nazi official responsible for coordinating anti-Jewish activities for the Nazis, who was executed in Israel in 1962, and the Six Day War of June 5–10, 1967, in which Israel faced off against Egypt, Syria, and Jordan. The conscious-raising of the children of survivors led to the creation of a number of Holocaust museums and memorials. The most famous of these is the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. President Jimmy Carter appointed a Commission on the Holocaust, which made recommendations for ways in which Americans could remember the victims, honor the survivors, and become educated about the Holocaust so that such an event could never again take place.

Despite the place of Holocaust survivors in the public consciousness since the 1970s, members of the third generation often suffer from their own traumas. They often experience anxiety, isolation, nightmares, insomnia, and constant fatigue. Those emotions may be triggered by specific events such as the death of the grandparent who was a Holocaust survivor.

Congressional Action

In December 2010, the U.S. House of Representatives unanimously passed a resolution (H.Con. Res. 323) pledging support for Holocaust survivors and promising to assist them through existing federal programs. At that time, more than half of the 127,000 survivors living in the United States were living below the poverty line. The following year, Representative Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-FL) sponsored H.R. 2686, the Holocaust Survivors Assistance Act, with the intention of adding Holocaust survivors as a protected group under the Older Americans Act of 1965, charging the Administration for Aging within the Department of Health and Human Services with responsibility for assisting Holocaust survivors living in the United States, and establishing a grant program to fund transportation services for this vulnerable group. However, the bill did not pass Congress.

On May 21, 2013, Wasserman Schultz introduced the Responding to the Urgent Needs of Survivors of the Holocaust (RUSH) Act in the House of Representatives. Co-sponsors of the bill included Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL), Ted Deutch (D-FL), David Joyce (R-OH), and Henry A. Waxman (D-CA). The RUSH Act was designed to meet the needs of aging Holocaust survivors by funding home care services, including meal delivery, home modifications, and monitoring services; providing transportation assistance; and offering mental health counseling for those who need it.

The RUSH Act would also add Holocaust survivors to the list of priority groups already targeted for assistance by the Older Americans Act, first passed in 1965 as part of President Lyndon B. Johnson's War on Poverty. A similar bill was introduced in the Senate by Ben Cardin (D-MD), Mark Kirk (R-IL), and Barbara Mikulski (D-MD). Jewish organizations, including the Jewish Federations of North America, the Metropolitan Council on Jewish Poverty, Survivor Initiative, Association of Jewish Family and Children Agencies, the Anti-Defamation League, the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, and Self-Help Community Services, Inc., announced their support for the RUSH Act. Despite strong bipartisan support for the bill, however, it stalled in committee.

Conclusion

The needs of Holocaust survivors will continue to be a significant factor in the allotment of human services resources in the 21st century. In addition to the vulnerabilities that affect other aging Americans, Holocaust survivors have needs that are significant to their unique experiences. Even when there are no more surviving witnesses to the Holocaust, second and third generations will look to human service agencies to help them deal with the impacts of being descendants of those survivors. As more is known about PTSD and its effects on family members, it may be possible to tailor human services responses in ways that are most suited to the needs of those descendants.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Aging and Adult Services; Home Care Services; Hospitals; Mental Health Services, Adult; Nursing Home Care.

Further Readings

Ain, Stewart. "Survivors Needs Continue to Grow." The Jewish Week (New York) (November 5, 2013).

Berger, Alan L. Children of Job: American Second-Generation Witness to the Holocaust. New York: State University of New York Press, 1997.

Brom, D., N. Durst, and G. Aghassy. "The Phenomenology of Posttraumatic Distress in Older Adult Holocaust Survivors." Journal of Clinical Geropsychology, v.8 (2002).

Durst, Nathan. "Child-Survivors of the Holocaust: Age-Specific Traumatization and the Consequences for Therapy." American Journal of Psychotherapy, v.57/4 (2003).

Fox, Elaine Saphier, ed.. Out of Chaos: Hidden Children Remember the Holocaust. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 2013.

Harel, Z. "Serving Holocaust Survivors and Survivor Families." Marriage and Family Review, v.21 (1995).

Kimron, Lee and Mili Cohen. "Coping and Emotional Distress During Acute Hospitalization in Older Persons With Earlier Trauma: The Case of Holocaust Survivors." Quality of Life Research, v.21/5 (June 2012).

Langer, Lawrence L. Holocaust Testimonies: The Ruins of Memories. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1991.

Rosenberg, Maxine B. Hiding to Survive: Stories of Jewish Children Rescued From the Holocaust. New York: Clarion Books, 1994.

Rosenthal, Perihan Aral and Stuart Rosenthal. "Holocaust Effect in the Third Generation: Child of Another Time." American Journal of Psychotherapy, v.34/4 (October 1980).

Schwab, Gabriele. Haunting Legacies: Violent Histories and Transgenerational Trauma. New York: Columbia University Press, 2010.

Schmotkin, Dov, Tzvia Blumstein, and Baruch Modan. "Tracing Long-Term Effects of Early Trauma: A Broad-Scope View of Holocaust Survivors in Late Life." Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology, v.7/2 (April 2003).

U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. "Learn About the Holocaust." http://www.ushmm.org/learn (Accessed December 2013).

Home and Community Services

Human services workers who work with clients who experience long-term illnesses or disabilities must be aware that risk factors, health behaviors, and responses of social support networks of clients vary by race, ethnicity, gender, national origin, and geography. To meet the widely ranging needs of their clients and to be effective, service providers need cultural competence and knowledge of diverse populations. Clients who experience long-term illnesses or disabilities often need support to live independently. Home and community services to meet these needs are provided by volunteers or via state and federally funded programs. These services, aimed at supporting clients to live as independently as possible, are client-centered and individualized. As far as possible, clients are involved in decision making regarding which services are provided. These services are usually long term in scope, and are primarily aimed at supporting individuals who might otherwise require care in nursing homes, hospitals, or other institutions due to illnesses, and/or physical, mental, or functional disabilities (including traumatic brain injuries, spinal cord injuries, chronic severe mental illnesses, dementia, and cognitive impairments, among many other conditions).

Many people with needs for assistance with homemaking, personal care, and developing and maintaining good social support networks are given help with these needs from family members, neighbors, and friends. In the United States, the number of informal caregivers who provide this kind of unfunded voluntary support is estimated to be 52 million or more.

Assistance and services are also provided via formally organized needs-based programs, and such programs are usually referred to as home- and community-based services. Financing of these programs is usually provided by pass-through funds, from federal to state governments. The majority of clients receiving state-administered home- and community-based services, often referred to as waiver programs, are qualified for other federally funded assistance programs, including Medicaid, Medicare, those of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, and state insurance programs. States normally determine eligibility criteria for home and community services, and are able, under federal guidelines, to target services to specific illnesses or conditions. To qualify for these state-administered services, clients must meet both medical and financial guidelines.

Human services workers play important roles as advocates, referral sources, and providers of home- and community-based services. Human services workers are often the people who are responsible for the overall case management for clients who often experience complex medical and social disabilities. Human services workers who understand and can help clients and their caregivers navigate the numerous routes to obtaining home- and community-based services can play meaningful roles in helping individuals and their families maintain a good quality of life. An understanding of the diversity of social networks that provide informal support to clients can help human services workers and the client's community better provide personalized support.

Historical Background

The implementation of publicly funded home- and community-based services has undergone many changes in the past decades. Beginning in the 1960s, social reform movements and medical advancements, particularly in the treatment of mental illnesses, resulted in mass discharges of individuals from long-term care, many of whom had spent years living in hospitals and other institutions. Local health care providers often were not equipped to meet the needs of many of these individuals, who not only experienced complex medical needs, but also needed support in being able to live independently. The expansion of federally administered insurance programs, including Medicaid and Medicare, over the following decades was accompanied by a growing realization that local care, including home-based care, was often just as effective as care at a facility—if not more so—in helping clients maintain independence. Many of the programs developed at this time were limited in scope, however. In the early 1980s, new guidelines emerged that allowed states greater flexibility in developing and administering services. Greater emphasis was placed on ensuring that the services provided were at least equal to similar services that would be provided in nursing homes or other long-term care institutions. The increased emphasis on human rights for people with chronic illnesses and other disabilities was also influential in expanding access to these programs. Human services workers have played important roles in advocating for increased access to services for a more diverse group of clients and in helping evaluate the administration of these services at federal, state, and local levels to ensure that requirements for quality and level of services for clients are met.

Examples of Home- and Community-Based Services

Home-based services can include, but are not limited to, homemaker visits, support from home health aides, and help with personal care. Community-based services can encompass a range of activities and programs outside clients' homes, including day care programs for adults. Community-based programs can also benefit informal caregivers, who receive respite from their caregiving responsibilities.

Some human services workers who provide home services are referred to as direct care providers. These professionals work as home care aides and personal attendants for adults who need assistance due to medical issues or other disabilities. When clients' needs are more substantial, human services professionals take on coaching roles, helping clients learn how to manage budgets and maintain homes in good order. Other human services workers are employed with assistive technology services, helping clients find equipment and adapting home environments to their needs.

Human services workers who are employed in community-based services have a variety of job titles and responsibilities; they can work as educational assistants, as clubhouse managers and workers, as adult day care professionals, and as counselors and managers of community clinics. Human services workers with experience in home- and community-based services are also employed as managers and administrative personnel of programs providing these services.

Challenges to Home- and Community-Based Services

The need for human services workers in programs providing home- and community-based services is expected to grow. Aging populations and better availability of medical and technological supports for independent living, among other factors, have resulted in substantial growth within this area of human services. However, home- and community-based services face substantial challenges, including limited funding for programs, limited accessibility to programs, and the need for well-trained professionals to staff these programs. Given the sheer number of volunteers providing informal home and community services, there is also a challenge to develop and implement more formalized support for these caregivers. Human services workers who are engaged in home- and community-based services play important roles in ensuring that these issues are addressed at local, state, and national levels.

Diana Stark Ekman
Ali Kazemi
Elizabeth Kylberg
University of Skövde

See Also: Community Action Agencies; Community Development Block Grants; Community Development Corporations; Community Health, Racial and Ethnic Approaches to; Community-Based Participatory Research; Community-Based Services.

Further Readings

Barton, Phoebe. Understanding the U.S. Health Services System, 4th ed. Chicago: Health Administration Press, 2010.

Brown Wilson, Christine. Caring for Older People: A Shared Approach. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2013.

Caldwell, Joe and Rachel Patterson. "2012 Report to the President on Managed Long-Term Services and Supports." President's Committee for People With Intellectual Disabilities, 2013. http://www.hcbs.org/moreInfo.php/type_tool/136/doc/4098/Managed_Long-Term_Services_and_Supports:_2012 (Accessed December 2013).

Levine, Carol and Thomas Murray. Conflict and Common Ground Among Families, Health Professionals, and Policy Makers. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2007.

"Long-Term Care for Older Adults: A Review of Home and Community-Based Services Versus Institutional Care." Washington, DC: U. S. Department of Health and Human Services, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, 2013. http://effectivehealthcare.ahrq.gov/ehc/products/369/1277/CER81_Long-Term-Care_FinalReport_20121023.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Home Care Services

Home care services are as diverse and individualized as the patients requiring those services. Services include medical, mental health, or behavioral interventions (or a combination thereof), which occur in an individual's immediate living environment. Home care service is becoming an increasingly necessary treatment modality. While home care may be provided to individuals of all ages, races, and socioeconomic backgrounds, population demographic changes imply an increasing global life expectancy, and as such, an aging population as a whole. Policies that have led to deinstutionalization and outpatient mental health services, as well as the increasing cost associated with inpatient health and mental health care, have led to a heightened importance of outpatient health and mental health treatment options that serve as alternatives to limited inpatient bed use.

Services provided may be dependent upon external issues such as insurance type, financial income requirements, and/or geographic factors. Geographic factors, such as whether the patient resides within a rural or urban area, affect both the availability of home care services and the cost of care. Patients living in rural communities face additional challenges, including limited community resources, increased care provision costs (e.g., additional mileage, provider transportation time, and care supply shipping), and lower availability of emergency medical or mental health interventions.

Ideally, prior to service provision, a client's level of functioning on health, mental health, and behavioral health outcomes will be assessed by a comprehensive team of practitioners, which may include physicians, psychiatrists, psychologists, social workers, and home care providers. After thorough assessment of client functioning, the treatment team collaborates with the patient to identify and design an appropriate plan of treatment. Such treatment plans are also referred to as discharge plans, plans of care, aftercare plans, or individual service plans.

Typically, treatment plans are diagnostically driven via medical, psychological, or behavioral health standards, and are considerate of best practice approaches for meeting patient needs. Each treatment plan should be formally written with specific, measurable, and objective goals, as well as a projected time line for the achievement of health or behavioral health landmarks. A patient's treatment plan will include analysis of his or her personal and community resources, and will identify the level of home care services from which the patient will benefit most.

Type and Duration

The type of home care services provided to any given patient are dependent upon his or her forms of disability, severity of disability, and possible resources for fulfilling the patient's needs. Home care services providers may fulfill an array of client needs, including medical care (e.g., medication management and administration, physical therapy, round-the-clock care, vital monitoring, patient mobility services, communication with a medical team, and nutritional consultation), mental health care (e.g., in-home mental health counseling, case management, and ongoing mental health assessment), behavioral health care (e.g., psycho-education, self-care strategies, and psychosocial behavioral modification), or personal care (e.g., personal hygiene such as bathing and grooming, dressing, food preparation, housekeeping, and grocery shopping). In addition to providing services within these three categories, home care service staff may be charged with providing companionship or supervision. Home care service provision can be categorized two ways: long term versus short term, and intensive versus nonintensive.

The duration of home service provision greatly varies by the severity of patient needs, and should be continuously reviewed by the treatment team. Long-term home care is provided to patients whose care needs are permanent or presumably slow-changing (e.g., patients who are deemed terminal, permanently disabled, or elderly) and may transition into end-of-life care, including hospice and palliative care. Short-term home care is provided to patients whose conditions are not permanent and are anticipated to improve (e.g., patients recovering from surgery or physical trauma and who are expected to experience recovery through occupational or other therapeutic services).

Intensity

Intensity of home service provision also greatly varies by the severity of patient needs and the extent to which the patient is able to function in the health, mental health, and behavioral health arenas. Intensity of care should be expected to change over time, depending on a patient's speed of recovery and incidences of readmission or reinjury. Intensive home service provision is often characterized by a treatment plan indicating need for support in multiple arenas of functioning (i.e., medical, mental health, and behavioral health) or life-dependent needs in any one arena. Intensive home services may include a need for specialty medical equipment or provider specialization. Nonintensive home service provision is often characterized by a treatment plan indicating need for support in a few arenas of functioning and by support needs upon which life is not dependent. To ensure that patients receive the most effective and highest quality of care, the accuracy and appropriateness of a patient's treatment plan should be regularly assessed by his or her comprehensive treatment team.

Standard home care services are typically delivered in a stepped-down care approach. Stepping down is generally defined as transitioning a person from an initial level of care down to a lower level of care as health or healing improves. To achieve this, practitioners continually assess patient or client needs and adjust case plans appropriately.

Melissa Bayne
California State University Sacramento
Amber Salazar
Arizona State University

See Also: Aging and Adult Services; Case Management Services; Disability Services; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Nursing, Public Health.

Further Readings

Mayo Foundation for Medical Education and Research. "Healthy Aging" (2011). http://www.mayoclinic.org/home-care-services/ART-20044609?p=1 (Accessed June 2014).

National Association for Home Care and Hospice. http://www.nahc.org (Accessed June 2014).

U.S. National Library of Medicine. "Home Care Services." http://www.nlm.nih.gov/medlineplus/homecareservices.html (Accessed June 2014).

Homelessness

Homelessness is experienced by approximately 700,000 Americans on any given night. People are considered homeless if they lack access to a fixed, regular, and adequate nighttime residence. This problem affects individuals and families across racial, ethnic, geographic, and educational classifications. Agencies serving the homeless and their staffs are required to be familiar with a vast array of social services options in the public, private, and nonprofit sectors. Due to the diversity of homeless clients, agencies must provide expertise in a variety of service areas, including mental health, substance abuse, legal aid, financial counseling, public benefits, job training, and educational opportunities.

Homeless Service Systems

The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) divides the nation's homeless service delivery systems into continuums of care, or CoCs. Each CoC is a specific geographic jurisdiction to which federal homeless services funds are distributed. CoCs also serve as a guideline for cross-agency coordination of services, planning, and data collection. The CoCs range from exclusively rural to urban cores. Moreover, some CoCs comprise entire states (e.g., Delaware), whereas others are single cities (e.g., Nashville). The CoC diversity creates unique challenges in the production, administration, and implementation of homeless services with respect to outreach, housing placement, transportation, and coordination of social service coalitions. As a result, CoC leadership and management must be trained in and have knowledge of program administration as well as the unique federal, state, and local policies governing their respective jurisdictions.

CoCs were developed as part of the McKinney-Vento Act, the first major legislative response to homelessness. Passed in 1987, the act established 15 programs for homeless assistance. In FY 2013, programs covered under the McKinney-Vento Act were allocated $2.03 billion in funding. McKinney-Vento remained the only major legislation targeting homeless relief and assistance until the passage of the Homeless Emergency Assistance and Rapid Transition to Housing Act (HEARTH Act) in 2009. The HEARTH Act changed the administrative, jurisdictional, and operational management of homeless programs and provided clarification on ambiguities (including the official definition of homelessness) across governmental units. The McKinney-Vento and HEARTH acts established rules and programs governing homeless-specific programming, but homeless clients also utilize resources across public programs, including public benefits and the War on Poverty programs.

Service Coordination

Homeless clients face diverse needs; therefore, homeless service systems must create processes to assist clients in accessing a multitude of services to meet those needs. Whereas larger service agencies are often able to provide a number of onsite services, many homeless social services organizations coordinate services to ensure access for clients across the service area. For example, within a CoC, one organization may serve as the primary provider of mental health counseling while another provides bus passes. CoCs work across sectoral and territorial boundaries to identify the best procedures to establish service delivery for clients. Nonprofits and government agencies work together in an increasing number of innovative ways. Moreover, over the last decade, CoCs across the nation have implemented Homeless Management Information Systems (HMISs) to create streamlined service delivery and case management. HMISs use a coordinated database across homeless service agencies, which allows organizations to share basic client and service information to facilitate collaboration and fast-track service delivery. Through HMISs, CoCs have been better able to collect aggregate client data, which, in turn, assists in planning, needs assessment efforts, and gap identification.

Agency Diversity

Homeless citizens seek services from agencies ranging in size from small volunteer-based and faith-based food closets to large affiliates of multinational nonprofit organizations. Agency diversity necessarily results in diversity of staff qualification and training. Volunteers at a faith-based food closet are less likely to have obtained specific training in nonprofit management, social work, or human services. They are also less likely to be fluent in the processes of public benefits administration and eligibility. At the same time, all homeless service agencies are filling a specific need. In addition to the aforementioned agency types, homeless clients seek assistance from a wide variety of social services agencies in both the nonprofit and public sectors. Public mental health, substance abuse, housing, and veterans and human service agencies, as well as nonprofit street outreach, mental health counseling, educational training, and housing agencies all serve homeless citizens. The private sector also participates in homeless service provision in health care, housing, counseling, and employment. This diversity necessitates the enhanced efforts at agency coordination currently taking place in CoCs across the nation. These efforts are aimed at integrating services among all agency types to ensure clients have access to accurate information and pathways toward assistance.

Client Diversity

Homelessness occurs in every population and in every geographic location in the United States. Men, women, and children of every race and religion with a diverse number of health and economic needs face homelessness each day. The previously discussed areas of agency and service diversity have been established and planned to meet the needs of this clientele. These systems are constantly changing as information regarding client needs and demographics is being collected and analyzed. Moreover, professional training is being modified to ensure that staff can better serve clients facing unique challenges through culturally competent and appropriate procedures.

Over the past 20 years, researchers have identified a key factor in homeless client diversity— the homeless type. Clients can usually be identified as transitional, episodic, or chronically homeless.

- Transitional homeless clients are those experiencing homelessness due, most often, to an unforeseen economic or familial event that temporarily displaces them. These clients are best assisted through short-term housing placement with referrals to public aid, employment opportunities, and/or other case-specific needs (e.g., legal services, credit counseling, rental assistance programs).
- Episodic homeless clients face ongoing, short to medium bouts of homelessness due to ongoing economic, health, familial, and/or legal concerns. These clients often require transitional housing placement (six to 12 months) and wraparound supportive services and case management.

Passersby helping a homeless person in New York City by giving him food. People are considered homeless if they lack access to a fixed, regular, and adequate nighttime residence. Individuals and families across racial, ethnic, geographic, and educational classifications can become transitional, episodic, or chronically homeless.

- Chronically homeless clients are those individuals who have experienced one year of homelessness and/or four bouts of homelessness in three years and have an accompanying disability.

Qualifying disabilities include physical and mental disabilities as well as HIV/AIDS and substance abuse addiction. Chronically homeless individuals require long-term, often permanent, housing placement with broad supportive services, medical care, and case management. Single males between the ages of 30 and 60 years constitute the majority of chronically homeless clients. The large majority of the chronically homeless have co-occurring mental health and substance abuse disabilities and have spent years in and out of homeless and housing programs as well as hospitals, treatment centers, and jails.

Since the recession began in 2008, the fastest growing homeless demographic is families with children. These clients usually face transitional homelessness and were specifically targeted by the American Reinvestment and Recovery Act of 2009 through the Homelessness Prevention and Rapid Re-Housing Program (HPRP) administered through HUD. HPRP focused on preventing homelessness before it occurred by providing eligible clients with monies needed for rent, arrears, legal fees, utility fees, and other items contributing to the threat of homelessness. The rapid rehousing portion of the program focused on getting clients into long-term, stable housing right away rather than emergency shelters or transitional options.

Another population facing increasing rates of homelessness is that of veterans. The economic and medical effects of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan created a new subpopulation among veterans. Veterans face unique needs, and collaborative efforts between Veterans Affairs and social service organizations are imperative to ensure that an appropriate plan of action is established for each client.

Caring for the Homeless

As previously indicated, homeless clients face diverse and unique circumstances requiring a cadre of professionals ranging from shelter night staff to medical doctors and psychiatrists. Industries as diverse as pharmaceuticals to higher education are involved in aspects of homeless social services delivery. Therefore, it is vitally important that training on homelessness and competencies related to accessing services and caring for the population are included in training and educational curricula across vocational and academic disciplines.

These competencies include promoting cultural and personal sensitivity to homelessness as an economic, medical, and social phenomenon; understanding public policies impacting homeless services; navigating systems of care; and fostering professionalism in day-to-day management of and interaction with homeless clients.

Cara Robinson
Tennessee State University

See Also: Housing Services; Housing Support and Homeless Services; Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of; Poverty; Veterans Services; War on Poverty Programs; Wraparound Services/Systems of Care

Further Readings

Burt, Martha, Laudan Aron, and Jesse Valente. Helping America's Homeless: Emergency Shelter or Affordable Housing? Washington, DC: Urban Institute Press, 2001.

Finfgeld-Connet, Deborah. "Becoming Homeless, Being Homeless, and Resolving Homelessness Among Women." Issues in Mental Health Nursing, v.31 (2010).

Jencks, Christopher. The Homeless. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Levinson, David and Marcy Ross. Homelessness Handbook. Great Barrington, MA: Berkshire Publishing Group, 2007.

Honor Killings

Honor killings refer to the acts of homicide that generally take place in a family or a closed social group. In such cases, a member of a family or any other radical member of an orthodox culture or community kills another member on the charge of bringing dishonor or shame for that familial or social group by any act generally taken as taboo therein. There may be any number of reasons for making a person the victim of honor killing. Generally, these include a love marriage rather than an arranged marriage, free sexual conduct, a woman's entering into a relationship without the consent of the elders, interreligious/intercaste marriage, adultery, being the victim of rape, dressing unconventionally, and a homosexual relationship. Honor killing is culture-oriented and has emerged as a crime of passion.

Since human services aims at providing direct care services for humankind at large, and it is committed to ameliorate human problems, the information on honor killing requires scrutinizing different stakeholders on this practice. Its implication has greater importance in policy making and executing the policies concerned.

Although religions never dictate such practices, the orthodox lobby therein has always cited the scriptures on the act of honor killing. The Napoleonic Code (1804), prepared in the regime of Napoleon Bonaparte, legislated for honor killing. Under the provisions of the code, the punishment for the murder of a wife by her husband in a situation in which he finds her in the act of adultery could never be treated similarly to that of a premeditated murder; rather, the husband would be charged with other lesser offenses. The wife did not have even the right of defense. Napoleonic Code has been a source of legislation in many countries, and thus for centuries has affected the system in favor of honor killing.

Cases of honor killing have been found in almost all regions of the world; the practice is seen more frequently in the countries of India, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, Morocco, Haiti, Syria, Turkey, Yemen, France, Italy, and Germany, as well as among some communities of the United Kingdom. In these countries, honor killing is a unique form of practice followed by members of various communities despite the forces of modernization, urbanization, and globalization. In a random survey in societies where the practice of honor killing is seen, people argue that it is done in order to save the family from shame and embarrassment. Many times, such deaths are not reported by the family members for obvious reasons. Whatever the argument of the supporters of honor killing, it is quite an unholy tradition that has not only tainted humanity but also human conscious and values. The very basic question that would likely be posed by progenies would be, "What is honorable in honor killing?"

This tradition is surviving on the whims of orthodoxy-ridden power-hungry elders of the culture. Various attempts have been made by social reformers across the globe for doing away with the practice of honor killing, and much has been done in this direction. Some of these efforst include the United Nations (UN) Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), which forces the member countries to put a ban on practices such as honor killings. CEDAW General Recommendation 19 states that "traditional attitudes by which women are regarded as subordinate to men or as having stereotyped roles perpetuate widespread practices involving violence or coercion, such as family violence and abuse, forced marriage, dowry deaths, acid attacks and female circumcision. Such prejudices and practices may justify gender-based violence as a form of protection or control of women. The effect of such violence on the physical and mental integrity of women is to deprive them the equal enjoyment, exercise and knowledge of human rights and fundamental freedoms." The UN General Assembly Resolution working toward the elimination of crimes against women and girls committed in the name of honor is another international effort designed to curb the practice of honor killing. It calls upon the UN member states to do the following:

- Intensify legislative, educational, social, and other efforts to prevent and eliminate honor-based crimes by involving public opinion leaders, educators, religious leaders, chiefs, traditional leaders, and the media in public education
- Encourage, support, and implement measures to increase the understanding of legal and health professionals of the causes and consequences of honor-based violence;
- Establish, strengthen, or facilitate support services, such as appropriate protection, safe shelter, counseling, legal aid, rehabilitation, and reintegration into society, for actual and potential victims

- Create, strengthen, or facilitate institutional mechanisms to assist safe and confidential reporting for victims and others to report honor crimes
- Gather and disseminate data on honor-based crimes.

Both the UN General Assembly Resolution for working toward the elimination of crimes against women committed in the name of honor and the UN General Assembly Resolution for working toward the elimination of crimes against women committed in the name of honor (A/RES/59/165, (2005)) both call upon UN Member States to take similar actions to eliminate honor-based crime and violence. The Human Rights Committee's General Comment No. 28, "Equality of rights between men and women," states that the commission of so-called honor crimes that remain unpunished constitutes a serious violation of the Covenant and in particular of articles 6, 14, and 26. Laws that "impose more severe penalties on women than on men for adultery or other offences, also violate the requirement of equal treatment" (HRC, Article 3, Para 31, general comment no 28). The International Convention on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) entrusts a specific legal obligation upon Member States to adopt effective and appropriate measures to abolish harmful traditional practices affecting the health of children, particularly girls, including female genital mutilation, that may eventually become reasons for honor killings.

Alka Singh
University Lucknow

See Also: Domestic Violence; Domestic Violence, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Domestic Violence, Victims of; Female Genital Mutilation; Subcultures; Women, Battered.

Further Readings

Andersson, Annika. Honor Killings: The Survival of Patriarchy in Different Societies. Lund, Sweden: University of Lund, 2003.

Campbell, J., "Honor and the Devil." In D. D. Gilmore, ed., Honor and Shame and the Unity of the Mediterranean. Washington, DC: American Anthropological Association, 1987.

Peristiany, J. G., ed. Honor and Shame: The Values of Mediterranean Society. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.

Whitman, J. "What Is Wrong With Inflicting Shame Sanctions?" Yale Law Journal, v.107/4 (1998).

Hospice Services

Hospice services are becoming increasingly less stigmatized and more utilized in the United States, especially due to Medicare changes, length-of-stay limits in inpatient hospitalizations, and a changing public dialogue on death and dying. Once viewed as the final option in care for those who were terminally ill, offered only at the point when medical treatments were no longer available or accessible, hospice care is now often represented and understood as a treatment option that includes holistic care, pain control, and a focus on quality of life. In 2011, 1.65 million people in the United States received hospice services, an increase from 1.4 million in 2007. Of the people receiving hospice services, almost 600,000 of them either continued on with services into the next year, or were discharged due to an improvement in condition/prognosis or to continue to seek active treatment.

History of Hospice

Hospice services date back centuries, as they were first provided as a way for ill and dying travelers and crusaders to receive care. In the 1900s, care became more focused on patients with common diagnoses and less on care for travelers. Most hospice services, however, were tied to religious organizations. In the 20th century, two pioneers of the modern hospice movement brought care for terminally ill patients into public acceptance. Dr. Cicely Saunders, who in 1967 founded St. Christopher's, the first modern hospice, conceptualized the three tenets that hospices still use across the world. These specifically addressed the concept of "total pain," including physical, spiritual, and psychological discomfort; the proper use of opioids for patients with physical pain; and attention to the needs of family members and friends who provide care for the dying. During the same time period, Elizabeth Kubler-Ross published On Death and Dying in 1969, which shed light on the end-of life journey of terminal patients. Kubler-Ross even recommended in-home care for the terminally ill in front of the U.S. Senate in 1972. Hospice care provided in the United States shifted in the 1970s to a unique medical specialty and was no longer a service provided on a religious or volunteer basis.

Hospice Eligibility

Hospice services are still often misunderstood as to what, and how, the services are provided. In 1982, Congress passed a Medicare Hospice Benefit in an effort to improve end-of-life care and reduce medical costs associated with terminally ill patients. Private insurance, the Veterans Administration, and Medicaid all have a hospice benefit included in their plans. In 2011, 84 percent of hospice patients were covered under the Medicare Hospice Benefit. Managed care, private insurance, and self-pay patients composed approximately 14 percent of people receiving hospice services. For those who are uninsured or impoverished, hospice services are still available to them. Over 7 percent of hospice patients receive care through either the Medicaid Hospice Benefit, uncompensated or charity care, or through another payment source. This commitment to providing comprehensive end-of-life care to everyone, regardless of payer status or ability to pay, makes hospice services a viable option for every American with a terminal illness.

The Medicare Hospice Benefit covers a set menu of services; most hospices provide these services as a part of their care whether the patient is using the Medicare benefit or not. Hospice services include nursing care to provide intermittent assessment, support, skilled services, treatments, and case management services; social work to provide supportive counseling, coordinate other community services, and assist with planning aspects like health care surrogates and advance directives; chaplain and religious support/counseling; home health aide and homemaker services; speech therapy, nutrition, physical therapy, and ocupational therapy services; bereavement support; a hospice medical director; medications and supplies for management and palliation of the advanced illness; and durable medical equipment including a hospital bed, commode, wheelchair. The hospice benefit also provides for short-term general inpatient care for problems that cannot be managed at home, such as pain, dyspnea, delirium, and other acute skilled needs; short-term respite care to permit family caregivers to take a break; and continuous care at home for short episodes of acute need (crisis care).

Although specific criteria can often vary from agency to agency, there are general guidelines for hospice eligibility. Typically, in order to qualify for hospice services, a patient must have a terminal diagnosis. This is specifically defined as a disease that, if it were to follow its normal course, would not result in a life expectancy greater than six months. Patients agree to no longer be hospitalized or actively treated for their disease and instead use hospice services to provide end-of-life care.

Diversity of Hospice Patients

Hospice services are provided to patients with many different diagnoses. Although over a third of hospice patients (37.7 percent) have some form of cancer, the other half have a wide variety of illnesses, including heart disease, lung disease, liver disease, amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (Lou Gehrig's disease), dementia (including Alzheimer's), and failure to thrive. Any condition that has a physician-certified prognosis of less than six months would qualify for the care hospice provides.

The largest age group receiving hospice services in the United States (almost 40 percent) are people over 85. However, hospice services are not only for elderly patients; services are provided to all ages, including newborn babies who are born with terminal conditions. In fact, almost a quarter of hospice patients are under 65 years of age.

Although the majority of people who utilize hospice services are Caucasian, minority clients still make up a substantial portion of hospice patients. Over 8 percent of patients identify as Black/African American, 2.4 percent Asian, Hawai‘ian, or Other Pacific Islander, 0.2 percent American Indian or Alaskan Native and 6 percent multiracial or other race. Additionally, 6 percent of all patients were identified as being Hispanic or Latino.

Inpatient Hospice Versus In-Home Hospice

Because hospice is a service and not a place, people can receive hospice services in different locations. Forty percent of patients receive hospice care in their home, where they can be in their own surroundings and with no restrictions on visitation. This option often works best when the patient also has a family member or friend who can provide 24-hour care when the hospice staff is not in the home. In fact, many hospice agencies will require, if the patient is receiving hospice care at home, that they have a caregiver prior to admitting them to the service. Hospice services generally include 24-hour care only in times of crisis and when death is imminent.

There are also times when people will receive hospice care in a facility. Hospice services can be provided in hospitals, nursing homes, assisted living facilities, and hospice houses. In all cases, the patient is not to receive any medical treatment that is intended for curative purposes. Receiving hospice care in the hospital is rare, since hospitals are used to provide acute care. Occasionally, a patient will be too ill to transfer to another facility or to their home and hospice will take over care of the patient while they are in the hospital. Hospice care in nursing homes and assisted living facilities is more common. Hospice services can be implemented in these facilities as a supplement to the custodial care the patient already receives and an additional caregiver is not necessary. Many hospices contract with nursing homes and keep several beds as "hospice beds" to accept patients when they are discharged from the hospital on hospice or otherwise started on hospice care. Hospice houses are homes or buildings that are exclusively for hospice patients and are often geared to people who lack a strong support system or financial means. In a hospice house, all hospice services and lodging are provided in the facility.

Palliative Care

The formal World Health Organization description is that palliative care is an approach that improves the quality of life of patients and their families facing the problems associated with life-threatening illness, through the prevention and relief of suffering by means of early identification and impeccable assessment and treatment of pain and other problems, physical, psychosocial, and spiritual. Although the distinction between hospice care and palliative care is sometimes misunderstood or even omitted, there is a primary difference between the two forms of care. While hospice services are provided instead of active, curative treatments, palliative care treatments can be administered along with other active treatment measures.

Kathryn Martinelli Brzozowski
Temple University

See Also: Hospitals; Medicare; Pain Management; Palliative Care.

Further Readings

Lutz, S. "The History of Hospice and Palliative Care." Current Problems in Cancer, v.35/6 (2011).

National Hospice and Palliative Care Organization. "NHPCO Facts and Figures: Hospice Care in America" (2012). http://www.nhpco.org/sites/default/files/public/Statistics_Research/2013_Facts_Figures.pdf (Accessed March 2014).

Noe, K., P. Smith, and M. Younis. "Calls for Reform to the U.S. Hospice System." Ageing International, v.37/2 (2012).

Teitelbaum, H., L. Travis, D. Heilig, S. Neslund, A. Menze, C. Baker, and E. Risner. "The Epidemiology of Hospice and Palliative Care." Disease-A-Month: DM, v.59/9 (2013).

Hospitals

The delivery of medical care, in general, is in a constant state of flux. Postrecession United States has seen higher rates of uninsured Americans, rising health care costs, and a polarization of support for and opposition to the Affordable Care Act. With a population over 317 million, a life expectancy rate of 76 years for men and 81 years for women, and almost 14 percent of Americans age 65 and older, the United States is experiencing health care utilization in steadily increasing numbers. The dilemma of how to most effectively deliver adequate and accessible health care services continues to be a primary focus of private and public sectors and community and political interests. As a result, inpatient medical care in hospitals in the United States has experienced a metamorphosis in recent years, changing the way Americans view and understand hospital care.

Hospitals in the United States

In 1751, Dr. Thomas Bond and Benjamin Franklin founded the first hospital in the United States. Bond, an American who had studied medicine abroad and was exposed to the hospital movement in Paris, conceived the idea of opening a hospital in Philadelphia. Although the idea met resistance at first, the bill to establish a hospital to care for the sick poor of the province was eventually passed by the Pennsylvania Assembly and then signed into law by Lieutenant Governor James Hamilton on May 11, 1751.

Over the next century, many more hospitals were established in the United States. Hospital care, however, continued to primarily serve poor or isolated patients while middle-class and wealthy patients were treated in their homes. As the country became more industrialized, improvements in medical education and scientific advancements began to shift hospitals to highly modern and equipped medical training and research centers that provided cutting-edge medical treatment to paying middle-class and wealthy patients. By the early 1900s, scientific medicine was proving profitable and influential; the hospital had become an institution designed to cure conditions and advance medical knowledge. The period between 1910 and 1973 in scientific medicine has been referred to as a "golden age" of increasing influence, status, and wealth.

It was not until the later part of the 20th century that the effects of commercialized and corporate medical care began to change health care. Cost constraints and resource limitations in the United States changed the way many medical services were delivered. Procedures and treatments that were once typically inpatient hospital services were now provided on an outpatient basis and/or with limited inpatient treatments.

In the early 1980s, Medicare changed the way it provided payment to hospitals. Prior to this time, if a person was hospitalized, their care, treatment, and procedures would be itemized and insurance would pay the bill—a process that made it difficult to contain costs.

Policy makers changed this to a system of diagnosis-related groups (DRG), which categorized reasons for hospitalizations and paid the hospitals a set rate for delivering the services. Every admitting diagnosis, from heart failure to pneumonia to vaginal delivery, has a set price attached to it. If a patient is hospitalized for one of these diagnoses, the hospital receives the set rate for the diagnosis regardless of how long the patient actually stays in the hospital. The longer a patient stays in the hospital under the DRG payment system, the more money the hospital loses.

Hospitals Today

In 2012, according to the American Hospital Association (AHA), there were 5,723 registered hospitals in the United States; 4,999 of these were community hospitals—nonfederal, short-term general, and other special hospitals including academic medical centers or other teaching hospitals. (Registered hospitals that are not considered community hospitals are those not accessible by the general public, such as prison hospitals or college infirmaries.)

Nearly a million staffed hospital beds in the United States accommodated almost 36.2 million admissions in 2012. The total expenses for all U.S. hospitals in 2012 was $829.7 million

In the United States, hospitals are categorized in systems and networks. A "system" is defined by the AHA as "either a multihospital or a diversified single hospital system. A multihospital system is two or more hospitals owned, leased, sponsored, or contract managed by a central organization. Single, freestanding hospitals may be categorized as a system by bringing into membership three or more, and at least 25 percent, of their owned or leased non-hospital preacute or postacute health care organizations. System affiliation does not preclude network participation." Networks are defined as "a group of hospitals, physicians, other providers, insurers and/or community agencies that work together to coordinate and deliver a broad spectrum of services to their community." Network participation does not preclude system affiliation.

Diversity in Hospital Care

In 1986, Congress passed the Emergency Medical Treatment & Labor Act (EMTALA), which requires hospitals to provide medical care to those experiencing a medical emergency, regardless of ability to pay. Because of this law, initial triage and life-saving measures are available to all members of the diverse U.S. population. A myriad of diversity issues arise in hospital care, ranging from cultural competency to treatment of the LGBTQ community. Issues of socioeconomic status, race, and ethnicity are particularly relevant to access and utilization of hospital care; poor and minority Americans are more likely to receive their medical care in a hospital outpatient department or emergency room than an ambulatory center or private physician's office.

In the event of an illness that renders an individual unable to work, the Family Medical Leave

Act (FMLA) ensures that their job is held for them while they are out. However, this coverage is only for 12 weeks, after which time their job is no longer protected and they can easily be terminated, resulting in the loss of both their income and health benefits. An individual may be able to continue insurance coverage under the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act (COBRA); however, without a steady income, these plans are difficult to afford (even if the patient is sick enough to be considered permanently disabled under the Social Security Administration's criteria, they still will not qualify for Medicare for two years).

Because he or she no longer has health insurance, he or she no longer has access to the treatment received prior to being uninsured. If he or she needs an expensive diagnostic test, he or she will have a hard time getting a facility to perform the test without proof of insurance, the copay that is "due at time of service," or a cash down payment. Needed medications are also difficult to afford without insurance, so one may go without medications that one needs, increasing the likelihood that the illness will worsen.

More options are becoming available in the wake of the Affordable Care Act, but they vary greatly by patient. Getting approval for medical assistance is an unlikely possibility for many people as the rigid income, asset, and demographic criteria that vary from state to state prohibit many people from receiving this benefit (i.e., limiting this program to only people who are disabled, pregnant, or over the age of 65). Many people are forced to deplete their savings and/or retirement accounts, sell their homes, and rely on family and friends in order to maintain their health. Access to health care based on socioeconomic status is a critical consideration in working in any human services capacity. It is also important to assess the health care needs and barriers of other diverse clients—immigrants, the LGBTQ community, veterans, and racial and ethnic minorities, among others.

Kathryn Martinelli Brzozowski
Temple University

See Also: Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality; Community Health Centers; Health as Human Right; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Health Disparities, Role of; Health Insurance; Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996.

Further Readings

Bazzoli, G. J. "The Corporatization of American Hospitals." Journal of Health Politics, Policy and Law, v.29 (2004).
Turner, B. S. "Hospital." Theory, Culture & Society, v.23/2–3 (2006).
U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "Healthcare in America: Trends in Utilization." DHHS Pub No 2004-10031. Hyattsvile, MD: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Center for Health Statistics. Hyattsville, MD: 2004.
U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "Summary Health Statistics for U.S. Adults: National Health Interview Survey." Hyattsville, MD: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention-National Center for Health Statistics, 2012.
Wall, B. M. American Catholic Hospitals: A Century of Changing Markets and Missions. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2011.
Wiener, C. L. "Holding American Hospitals Accountable: Rhetoric and Reality." Nursing Inquiry, v.11 (2004).

Housing Services

The crash of the New York Stock Exchange in 1929, and the ensuing economic crisis commonly referred to as the Great Depression, was one of the first times in U.S. history when individuals and families across virtually all socioeconomic levels were economically impacted at an unprecedented level. The New Deal was a package of comprehensive social welfare programs created by the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration in an attempt to create a federal government safety net to meet the needs of economically strapped individuals and families. Housing services were a part of the New Deal programs. The National Housing Act of 1934 resulted in the creation of the Federal Housing Administration, and the Housing Act of 1937 resulted in the formation of the U.S. Housing Authority. Several legislative amendments later established the current Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD), which facilitates and provides oversight to a number of housing-related programs.

Housing assistance can include a broad range of services, including home ownership assistance through low-interest loans, housing counseling, and rental assistance. Government housing assistance is provided for an equally broad range of populations, targeting poverty alleviation, as well as special populations, such as single parents, older adults, the physically and mentally disabled, youth, and so on. Most housing services programs are offered through public-private partnerships, in which HUD programs are provided in coordination with state-funded services, and community-based programs offered through local charities and churches.

"The Projects" and Other Subsidized Housing

One of the largest federal housing programs facilitated by HUD is its subsidized rental program. The predecessor to today's program, popular in the 1950s and 1960s, involved the construction of large public housing apartment complexes or high rises in urban areas (often referred to as "the projects"). These types of housing units were originally available to a range of individuals and families from diverse income brackets and were well maintained. Eventually, age, reduced funding, and outright neglect turned these public-housing communities and complexes into residences of last resort for the communities' poorest members, often housing poor ethnic minorities, who were then segregated (and often completely cut off) from mainstream communities in high-crime pockets within the community.

Critics cited several concerns about the dilapidated state of congregated public housing, including the development of concentrated pockets of poverty and crime, particularly gang activity and drug trafficking, and increased racial segregation. Between the1970s and 1990s, most public housing units were torn down, and many were replaced via revitalization programs, such as HOPE VI, a coordinated project between HUD and private partners developed in 1992. HOPE VI targeted dilapidated HUD public housing projects in need of revitalization, replacing them with new mixed-income communities. These scattered-site housing programs were designed to increase integration and mainstreaming of low-income families into the general population, thus lessening their isolation as well as the crime often associated with the original public housing projects.

Another contemporary example of federally funded housing assistance is HUD's Sections 8 and 811 rent- voucher programs, which provide eligible recipients with more control over their housing choices. Section 8 is designed for the general low-income population, while Section 811 is designed for individuals suffering from disabilities (including mental illness). Eligible individuals and families must apply for these programs during open application periods (which may only be a few short periods throughout the year); after having their benefits determined individuals and families are responsible for finding a landlord who is willing to accept a HUD rent voucher as rental payment. Voucher programs are also designed to integrate lower-income individuals and families throughout a community.

Theoretically, the voucher can be used with any rental unit (house or apartment), but either through bias or because of a competitive rental market, many landlords in more expensive communities will not accept Section 8 or 811 rental vouchers. Thus, even though one intention of this program is to avoid the isolation and segregation created by high-rise congregated public housing, in many communities the result is still much the same; because the landlords who own units scattered throughout the city are less likely to accept a Section 8 or 811 rental voucher than are the owners of large apartment complexes in low-income areas, these vouchers create the same sort of isolated high-crime environments experienced with public housing high rises and complexes. The need for affordable housing has not kept pace with availability, and the recent spike in home foreclosures in response to the Great Recession of 2007 has resulted in an increase in homelessness and a decrease in funding for housing assistance programs. Section 8 and 811 housing programs experienced significant funding cuts in the last decade, and there is limited hope that funding will be replaced in the near future.

Understanding Housing Insecurity and Homelessness

The development of any successful housing program is dependent upon a comprehensive understanding of the problem, including an accurate framing of what risk factors are most commonly associated with housing insecurity and homelessness. A comprehensive problem statement recognizes the transient and hidden nature of the homeless population, as well as identifies key risk factors associated with the cyclical path from housing insecurity to homelessness. For instance, there are many variables associated with housing insecurity, such as a history of domestic violence, a lack of job preparedness and chronic unemployment, a childhood filled with poverty and housing insecurity, chronic and severe mental illness, substance abuse, and a history of trauma (ranging from childhood abuse to post-traumatic stress disorder in the veterans' population).

Any effective housing program is based upon the understanding that homelessness is not a static condition, but for most people involves a cyclical nature of housing attainment, economic crises, temporary housing (such as doubling up, couch surfing, or short-term motel stays), and sometimes living on the streets. Far too often housing programs targeted the latter only—those living on the streets— based upon older demographics of those most in need of housing assistance—middle-aged, substance-abusing men. Yet, research indicates that the new face of homelessness involves a dramatic increase in single-parent families (primarily female head-of-households and their children), who often do not live on the streets or in homeless shelters, but rather double up with friends or relatives, "squat" in abandoned buildings, live in their cars, or stay in motels on a short-term, rotating basis. If homelessness is defined using a federal definition (which tends to be more narrow), there is on average about 636,017 individuals who experienced homelessness (sheltered and unsheltered) on any given night in the United States. But this definition is often criticized because it does not include the hidden homeless, or those experiencing housing vulnerability. When homelessness is defined more inclusively, estimates of the homeless and those experiencing housing insecurity jump to, respectively, 2.5 and 3.5 million individuals nationally.

Housing services for any special population requires services above and beyond rental vouchers and targets risk factors associated with housing insecurity. Since most individuals who have experienced homelessness and housing insecurity have done so on an intermittent basis, in which homelessness occurs in an ongoing cycle of temporary or tenuous housing, it is important that housing services address the underlying issues that can increase an individual's risk of becoming homeless. First, since the funding of housing services is directly tied to accurate estimates of those in need, in 2009 the Obama administration significantly amended a large piece of legislation that dealt with housing and homelessness, the McKinney-Vento Act. Reauthorized as the Homeless Emergency Assistance and Rapid Transition to Housing (HEARTH) Act, this law, among its many significant changes, significantly expands the definition of homelessness. The new definition includes housing insecurity, such as those who are at imminent risk of losing their homes (whether owned or rented), those living with others on a temporary basis, and those living in unsubsidized motels or hotels.

The HEARTH Act also addresses many of the gaps and deficits that existed in the previous act by including many of the hidden homeless previously excluded in the former legislation's definition; and by highlighting some of the underlying risk factors associated with homelessness and housing insecurity beyond poverty, including chronic disability, physical health problems, mental health conditions, substance abuse, domestic violence, and childhood abuse. Housing services targeting special populations, such as single-parent families, unaccompanied youth, and older adults, include specialized services targeting the unique challenges these populations face, which contribute to their housing insecurity. For instance, many housing services targeting single mothers and their children address social problems such as domestic violence and child abuse. This is particularly important when it comes to developing housing services programs, since research indicates that about half of all homeless single mothers in the United States have experienced child abuse, including child sexual abuse, and almost all experienced domestic violence at some point in their lives. Thus, housing services targeting female single parents often include court advocacy, individual and family counseling, support groups focusing on empowerment and self-sufficiency, substance abuse treatment (if necessary), and children's services.

Services for Foster Children and Older Adults

Housing services focusing on unaccompanied youth, including youth aging out of the foster care system, often include services targeting job preparedness and financial responsibility, as well as graduated levels of independent living in order to prepare youth between the ages of 18 to 22 to live independently. Yet, research still indicates that youth who are not a part of a cohesive and supportive family unit are at increased risk of housing insecurity and homelessness.

Housing services also focus on older adults—a growing population due to the aging of the baby boomers (a large cohort representing the post-World War II children born between 1946 and 1964), as well as improved medical technology that is allowing people to live longer lives. Although people are living longer, that doesn't necessarily mean that their quality of life is good, or at least good enough to remain in their homes. Thus, the federal government (partnering with state and local governments) has addressed the problem of housing insecurity among the older adult population through the development of government-subsidized older adult housing communities. Such programs target financially and physically vulnerable older adults by providing a direct subsidy in the form of a tax credit, loan, or rental voucher. Other types of government-sponsored programs provide a subsidy to the housing community, which in turn passes on the benefit to the older adult in the form of a rent discount.

Rental subsidies may not address the problems experienced by older adults if they include only a rent subsidy and no other services, or if the housing unit is older and unsafe for the older adult population, who often need special age-related accommodations such as wheelchair ramps and handicapped-accessible doorways. Effective housing services targeting the older adult population should include an array of services focusing on psychological, social, and physical well-being. However, y research on older adults in transition from independent to age-restricted living found that those who had the financial ability to reside in more expensive communities offering comprehensive wraparound services fared far better than those who lived in government-subsidized housing programs for low-income older adults. These studies also highlighted the long-term and cumulative damaging impact of lifetime poverty, including increased health problems and lower life satisfaction in later years.

Many communities also offer housing services that are provided through government-private partnerships. Many of these programs are facilitated on a community level and provide integrated services by partnering with local social service agencies, as well as banks that offer residents low-interest mortgage loans in association with federal programs such as the Federal Housing Authority. Such programs offer the most promise since they can counter the damaging effects of federal cutbacks while keeping individuals and families connected to their local communities, which can have a mediating effect on many people's struggles with chronic housing insecurity.

Michelle H. Martin
DePaul University

See Also: Homelessness; Housing Support and Homeless Services; McKinney-Vento Homeless Education Assistance Improvements Act of 2001.

Further Readings

Anderson, C. L. "Opening Doors: Preventing Youth Homelessness Through Housing and Education Collaboration." Seattle Journal for Social Justice, v.11 (2012).
Baker, C. K., et al. "Domestic Violence, Housing Instability, and Homelessness." Aggression and Violent Behavior, v.15/6 (2010).
Briggs, M. A. et al. "Providing Care for Children and Adolescents Facing Homelessness and Housing Insecurity." Pediatrics, v.131/6 (2013).
Martone, K. "The Impact of Failed Housing Policy on the Public Behavioral Health System." Psychiatric Services, v.65/3 (2014).
Sard, B. "Most Rental Assistance Recipients Work, Are Elderly, or Have Disabilities." (2013). Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. http://www.cbpp.org/cms/?fa=view&id=3992 (Accessed August 2014).
Van Zandt, S. S. and P. C. Mhatre. "The Effect of Housing Choice Voucher Households on Neighborhood Crime: Longitudinal Evidence From Dallas." Poverty & Public Policy, v.5/3 (2013).

Housing Support and Homeless Services

The homeless were once commingled in the super-category of indigents. During the Great Depression, they became more widely identified by community-coping euphemisms: hoboes hopped railroad cars in search of employment and Dust Bowl refugees crowded into temporary encampments, just like other dislocated people worldwide. The word homelessness entered into common parlance during the 1980s. As always, economics played a major role, but so did more refined human services and a sense of what was missing from them. In the early 21st century, housing support is again at a crossroads. Bound by fiscal restraints, housing support nevertheless encompasses a greater awareness of homeless demographics. This entry functions as a basic introduction to service models and subpopulations, and how the two are likely to converge in the future.

First Wave: Continuum of Care

Homelessness surged in the 1980s for several reasons. First, a strong interdisciplinary social services movement advocated deinstitutionalization, favoring small, community-based care models over large, hospital-type facilities. Without adequate funding for discharge and follow-up, however, special needs clients drifted onto the streets. Second, gender roles had changed; unsupported responsibility for both caregiving and breadwinning left a growing number of female-headed families homeless. Third, disadvantaged populations as well as the country at large were confounded by a rapidly changing economy, from the decline of major industries in the eastern and midwestern Rust Belt to the emergence of the Sunbelt. Small farms also ceased operation and/or were replaced by agribusiness. Population followed these economic shifts to some extent, with unemployed or differently skilled workers entering rising cost-of-living markets. Books such as Rachel and Her Children by Jonathan Kozol verified and explained what Americans were witnessing en masse.

Through the McKinney-Vento Act (1987), the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and other federal agencies implemented a policy-programmatic response to national homelessness. The term continuum of care subsequently assumed two meanings. It still signifies local, regional, state, or multistate areas that share similar socioeconomic characteristics and, within prevailing public policy and funding limits, developing coordinated systems to determine the right mix of homeless interventions for their locales. The continuum of care also evolved into a four-tiered flow of services:

1. Outreach and needs assessment are the first step in housing placement for any population; some nonprofits also provide supportive services only (ranging from telephone access to medical care) for people between living situations, prospective clients for whom no housing is yet available, and/or a small subculture that opts to remain on the streets.
2. Emergency shelter, the first level of supportive housing, is a residential model typically lasting no longer than six months—enough time to build resources for independent living or to consider specialized housing arrangements. Revolving around case management and planning, it also usually benefits from on-site social services and/or finely tuned referral arrangements. (Comparable facilities for chronically homeless single adults are called safe havens.)
3. Also in the supportive category, transitional housing directs clients toward more ambitious personal goals: therapeutic (e.g., sobriety), economic (e.g., job placement, the acquisition of education/training credentials), or other (e.g., family reunification). Two years is considered a long transitional program.
4. All models, then and now, are united in the goal of permanent housing. Such situations might be facilitated through the regular, commercial marketplace and bolstered by subsidies to the tenant (Section 8) or to developers of affordable housing. Permanent supportive housing pertains to those who require ongoing social services. Affordable housing can take many forms, including single room occupancy (SRO) for individuals.

There is no question that the condition of homelessness takes a toll on all of its victims. Practically speaking, however, continuum service models usually are applied to several major populations: special needs individuals or families with a singular challenge (e.g., overcoming family violence, substance abuse); families whose handicap was primarily economic; and singles, both men and women, simultaneously diagnosed with several physical or emotional problems.

A new emphasis on family housing was necessitated by attitudinal change. Orphanages, maternity homes, and related institutions through the mid-20th century sought economic sustainability—for both parents (typically, women) and children—by dissolving problematic family relationships; since the 1980s, bonding and reunification have guided service goals.

Homeless housing, at its best, featured service integration with interventions appropriate to the given population. The physical dimensions of shelters and especially transitional housing evolved, too. The old standard included separate men's and women's dormitories (large rooms lined with cots), which divided families by gender, even separating young adolescents from their parents. Conscientious supportive housing providers in the 1990s and beyond created increasingly private quarters for households to live and heal together; these family-centered environments usually did not accommodate anyone who refused treatment for potentially harmful behaviors. Family and single housing became more segregated.

Today's Challenge: Housing First

Most models remain intact, but best practices are changing due to improved knowledge—and again, the economy. Continuum-of-care communities by the mid-to-late 2000s were gaining a better grasp of local conditions through homeless counts every other year and annual reports via Homeless Management Information Systems (HMIS).

Then the recession hit. Under the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act (ARRA), a rapid rehousing program was instituted nationally. It offered temporary assistance to those made homeless or at risk by economic conditions. ARRA also elevated homelessness prevention, allowing low-income households to remain in place or, if that failed, to quickly transition to other independent living arrangements. Flexibility was key, with customized grants-in-aid packages including rental assistance, back payments, vouchers for brief motel stays, moving expenses, and additional expenses that otherwise would stress reduced budgets.

Some of the practices introduced under ARRA manifested themselves a few months later, more permanently, when the McKinney-Vento Act was reauthorized under the Homeless Emergency Assistance and Rapid Transition to Housing (HEARTH) Act of 2009. This initiative promotes a Housing First strategy. It acknowledges the necessity of permanent supportive housing, but asserts that intermediary placement options are costly and that rapid rehousing can be just as effective over the long term. Generally, Housing First officially seeks to (1) provide affordable housing to people experiencing or at risk of homelessness, and (2) improve permanent supportive housing to prevent and end chronic homelessness.

This evolving policy carves distinctions between homeless housing and homeless services. To end homelessness, at least visibly, a federal Housing First checklist underscores fewer conditions and provisions for admission: no prior incomes are necessary (transitional facilities often require minimal rent, in part to teach budgeting habits), no demands for sobriety or treatment, and no evictions for lapses in program attendance or treatment plans. Emergency shelter grants become emergency solutions grants, incorporating preventive measures.

Some changes already are being felt. While the emergency shelter model endures, for example, continuums of care are limiting the duration of residence, many prescribing a 30-day turnaround. Some transitional housing providers fear their days may be numbered. Several new terms are coming into use, too, that imply, but do not directly state, housing-service boundaries. Rental assistance funding, for example, can be (1) sponsor-based, with units offered under contract by the property owner or lessor; (2) project-based for more dedicated purposes; and (3) tenant-based, considering client needs in a community and/or service context.

Opening Doors

Implementation of the HEARTH Act has been delegated to the U.S. Interagency Council on Homelessness (USICH), a consortium of 19 federal agency heads, originally created along with the McKinney-Vento Act in 1987. Its Opening Doors, Federal Strategic Plan to End Homelessness (2010 and amended or updated annually) contains four ambitious goals:

- Finish the job of ending chronic homelessness in five years.
- Prevent and end homelessness among veterans in five years.
- Prevent and end homelessness for families, youth, and children in 10 years.
- Set a path to ending all types of homelessness.

Opening Doors is useful in several ways. First, it defines four specific homeless subpopulations: chronically homeless, veterans, families (typically with children), and youth. The smallest group numerically, unaccompanied youth, primarily refers to youth newly emancipated from foster care and/or juvenile detention. A distinction also is made between them and teens of comparable age who are homeless with their parents or other household members. Besides family dissolution and the problems rampant in institutional environments, this subpopulation contains a high percentage of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ) youth.

It also appears that in addressing the most immediate (five-year) goals, Opening Doors simultaneously tackles what may be viewed as the easiest and most difficult groups to serve. Chronically homeless people usually bear multiple and diverse health and emotional issues, and some have become acclimated to street life. Veterans are not a homogenous group; age and gender (more women today) notwithstanding, major differences exist between the Vietnam-era contingent and those recently returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. Yet Veterans Affairs (VA) offers more homeless interventions than any other agency, in addition to education, mortgage lending, and hospital benefits, so long a part of the VA system. The system's internal continuum of care is closest to complete.

The Future

Homeless service providers in the future will need to leverage specially targeted housing resources at every level of government, community/social services, and mainstream benefits (e.g., supplemental nutrition and energy assistance, various subsidies, the new Affordable Care Act), generally determined by income. Some continuums are taking a proactive stance, using the homeless count for more in-depth study of their communities, possibly with the goal of applying for large mental health, substance abuse, or other grants.

Finally, the definition of chronic homelessness was revised in 2013 to encompass anyone who "has been homeless and living or residing in a space not meant for human habitation, a safe haven, or in an emergency shelter continuously for at least one year or at least four separate occasions in the last three years where the cumulative total of the four occasions is at least one year." The old, easy dichotomy between families and singles may be diminishing. It is uncertain, however, whether current policy—and the ensuing housing-service models—fully consider the complexities of the varied populations known as homeless.

Lynn C. Kronzek
Independent Scholar

See Also: Case Management; Continuum of Care; Domestic Violence, Victims of; Family Preservation Services; Family Violence Prevention and Services Act; Homelessness; Housing Services.

Further Readings

Kozol, Jonathan. Rachel and Her Children: Homeless Families in America. New York: Crown Publishers, 1988.

U.S. Interagency Council on Homelessness. The Housing First Checklist: A Practical Tool for Assessing Housing First in Practice. Washington, DC: USICH, 2013.

U.S. Interagency Council on Homelessness. Opening Doors: Federal Strategic Plan to Prevent and End Homelessness. Washington, DC: USICH, 2010 (and amended). www.usich.gov/opening doors (Accessed December 2013).

Human Capital Development Initiative

The Human Capital Development Initiative (HCDI), an entity of the National Community Development Initiative (now called Living Cities), was an $8 million demonstration project designed to promote human capital initiatives in local communities. For the most part, the initiative leveraged community development partnerships affiliated with the Local Initiatives Support Corporation (LISC) and the Enterprise Foundation (now called Enterprise Community Partners) at the local level. On a national level, the initiative tapped into more expansive programs sponsored by industry trade associations of community development corporations (CDCs), and the National Congress for Community Economic Development (NCCED).

This initiative emerged to address the need for increased human and organizational capacity in community-based organizations (CBOs). Pablo

Eisenberg noted that numerous community development corporations are “undercapitalized, overextended, and poorly managed.” Many are spread thin, feeling increased pressure from funders, and straining to increase programs and impact without sufficient resources to meet the demands. As a result, CBOs experience high staff turnover, burnout, and loss of senior leaders.

Roland V. Anglin pointed out that many CBOs function outside the standards for effective organizational practice. Accounting practices are unsystematic. Governing boards are weak with insufficient knowledge and skills to guide the organization. Positional leaders who lack organizational and leadership skills are generally unable to effectively guide the organization and cultivate talent. This leads to, among other issues, high staff turnover. Additionally, some individuals in the field perceive a wage disparity between CDCs and other fields. Finally, a criticism of some community organizations was that their staffs did not reflect the demographic composition of the communities they represent. The Human Capital Development Initiative was designed to address human capital issues in four areas. These included human resource management and compensation, recruitment and retention, education and training, and career development.

Human Resource Management and Compensation

The partnerships promoting CDCs’ human resource capacity was through the sponsorship of organizational assessments and human resource audits, compensation studies, diversity training, and other human resource programs. As a result of the assessments, the partnerships created and upgraded state-of the-art personnel systems that aided CDCs in aligning with professional and legal standards with regard to hiring and firing practices and compensation and benefits. Comparative market analyses helped CDCs compare their positions to those in other fields, thereby increasing their ability to hire and retain quality employees. It also resulted in a more diverse workforce that included community residents, and subsequently led to increased political and network capacity of the leaders and overall organizations within their communities. Some CDCs provided human resource training for employees that involved financial systems, board development, volunteer recruitment, executive search processes, and best practice workshops.

Recruitment and Retention

HCDI utilized experiential learning (through internships, work study programs, and AmeriCorps) as well as marketing campaigns to educate and attract talented people to the community development field. Efforts focused on institutions of higher education, related professions, and the CDCs’ surrounding neighborhoods. A specific focus of the HCDI was with the recruitment of women and people of color. On a national level, the NCCED instituted a national recruitment and retention initiative through numerous partnering organizations, universities, and programs.

Education and Training

The HCDI utilized training models from both the nonprofit and for-profit sectors. It tapped into established programs and opportunities to provide ongoing, needs-based training targeted at all staff levels including board members. CDCs determined their unique areas for development, and the HCDI worked with local intermediaries to provide access to existing institutes, programs, and single-topic workshops. Beyond the general topics, some partnerships focused on specific areas of need, including board training and supervisory training. Formal education included certification and degree programs, utilizing traditional classrooms and distance learning. Some partnerships even provided employees with small scholarships to participate in training.

Mentoring was also included by certain partnerships, although this required a substantial time commitment by all involved. While the CDCs valued the training, initially some CDCs feared that increased capacity building might lead staff to depart in order to pursue other jobs. On the contrary, the staff valued the professional development opportunities, and training led to increased job satisfaction.

Career Development

The CDCs offered community development professionals individualized skill assessment strategies and one-on-one career counseling. The career counseling empowered CDC staff to create specific career plans and identify the training and development necessary to prepare them to progress in the field. Participants reported that the career counseling restored their belief in community development as a viable profession. As a result of discovering potential career ladders that fit their interests and goals, community development professionals recognized that they did not have to leave the field to progress professionally and experience job satisfaction. Such an individualized approach increased the number of minority employees moving from entry-level positions to management positions in many of the CDCs.

One aspect of this individualized approach that led to the most success among the CDCs was the integration of the career development programs into the organizational culture. By having supervisors work with the employees participating in the programs to implement their career development plans, participants were more likely to apply and leverage their new knowledge and skills. One partnership supported this process by giving CDCs up to $1,000 of matching funds to support employee training needs, which increased buy-in and support from upper-level management.

Conclusion

The Human Capital Development Iniative was designed to stimulate four areas of human and organizational capital initiatives at local and national levels. Human resource capacity was promoted through organizational assessments and human resource audits, compensation studies, diversity training, human resource training, and best practice workshops. HCDI developed partnerships with professional organizations and universities to increase recruitment and retention, specifically focusing on women and people of color.

Education and training initiatives utilized established formal educational and needs-based training programs in profit and nonprofit sectors, sponsored scholarships, and provided mentoring and professional development activities. HCDI offered individualized career counseling to community development professionals, which aligned the professionals' interests and goals with available career opportunities. Career development programs supporting employee movement into management were successfully incorporated into some organizational cultures. One lesson learned from the HCDI was the importance of researching best practices and models prior to creating new, untested initiatives and approaches.

Terry Morrow
Brianna Kent
Nova Southeastern University

See Also: Community Development Corporations; Educational Services; Educational Support Services; Employment/Career Assistance Services.

Further Readings

Anglin, Roland V. "Stakeholder Community Development." Shelterforce (November/December 2000).

Devance-Manzini, Donita, Norman J. Glickman, and Sean DiGiovanna. Building Capacity in Community Development Corporations: Lessons from the Human Capital Development Initiative. Final report. Washington, DC: National Congress for Community Economic Development, 2002.

Eisenberg, Pablo. "Time to Remove the Rose-Colored Glasses." Shelterforce (March/April 2000).

Seessel,Thomas V. "Building the Community Development Field: Origins and Growth of Intermediary Organizations." Paper prepared for the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.Washington, DC: HUD, 2003.

Human Trafficking

Human service providers now recognize human trafficking, also commonly referred to as modern-day slavery, as a complex and insidious social problem of global proportions. Human trafficking occurs within the United States as well as internationally; the International Labour Organization (ILO) estimates that there are more than 20.9 million victims of human trafficking worldwide. Victims of human trafficking are overrepresented as women and children; however, other marginalized or vulnerable populations, such as runaways and impoverished or disenfranchised individuals, are at risk. Traffickers are diverse and may represent large organized crime rings, small gangs, or predatory individuals. The commonality of traffickers is that they aim to exploit their victims as a commodity, continuously abusing their victims (through forced labor or sexual exploitation) for monetary gain.

Human trafficking is thought to be one of the most lucrative crimes worldwide due to the long-term and continual abuse of victims. Eliminating modern-day slavery is a priority for many domestic and international agencies—the U.S. Department of Justice, U.S. Department of State, Polaris Project (a nongovernmental nonprofit agency), United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), Shared Hope International, Free the Slaves, and ILO—as they work to develop universal educational initiatives, policies, and procedures to respond to and eradicate this worldwide problem.

Human trafficking is often confused with smuggling, but trafficking does not require crossing international borders. Nonetheless, individuals who have been smuggled from one country to another are at high risk for being forced, coerced, or defrauded into labor or the commercial sex industry due to their vulnerability.

Eliminating modern-day slavery requires a three-prong approach: prevention, prosecution of traffickers, and protection of victims. In 2000, the United Nations adopted the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, sometimes referred to as the Palermo Protocol. The same year, President Bill Clinton signed the landmark U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), which set domestic and international standards for these antitrafficking efforts. The TVPA defines human trafficking as "the recruitment, harboring, transporting, provision, or obtaining of a person for labor or services, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion for the purpose of subjection to involuntary servitude, peonage, debt bondage, slavery, or forced commercial sex acts." This act was reauthorized in 2003, 2005, and 2008.

Labor and Sex Trafficking

Both foreign- and U.S.-born victims are trafficked for two purposes, forced labor and sexual exploitation. Victims of sex trafficking may be conscripted as models, dancers, or waitresses, and initially promised glamorous and lucrative careers, but they are then forced into pornography or the sex trade in brothels, cantinas, or prostitution rings. Some sex traffickers are involved in gang-related activities in which victims are objectified and controlled by their trafficker to serve the sex industry through generating revenue or to represent the gang itself (some victims are branded with the gang's logo/symbol). Other times, traffickers appeal to their victims' need for love or protection, developing an abusive and dependent relationship. When the trafficker has groomed and manipulated his victim, he then enlists her in prostitution and serves as her pimp. Minors are recruited or abducted for use in the sex trade. The law prohibits minors from consent and recognizes any activity in which an adult has sexual contact with a child as illegal. The prostitution of children, also known as domestic minor sex trafficking (DMST) or commercial sexual exploitation of children (CSEC), constitutes child sex trafficking.

Labor trafficking occurs in two contexts, forced labor trafficking or domestic servitude. Forced labor typically involves exploitation of victims through industries such as food services and processing, construction, sweat shops, and agriculture. Trafficking in forced labor often involves larger groups; victims may be U.S. or foreign born. Domestic servitude is characteristically manifested in smaller groups of one or two foreign-born victims who are recruited to provide child care or housekeeping services. They usually have established a relationship with their trafficker through a family member or acquaintance from their homeland prior to being trafficked. Victims are lured to the United States with the dream of education, employment, and the capacity to financially provide for their families overseas. In both forced labor and domestic servitude cases, traffickers benefit financially from cheap labor by manipulating their victims through the use of force, fraud, and coercion. Tactics include intimidation, the use of violence or threats of harm to the victims and/or their family members, confiscation of passports and legal documents, instilling fear of deportation, developing and/or exploiting drug or alcohol dependence, rape and sexual assault, and isolation.

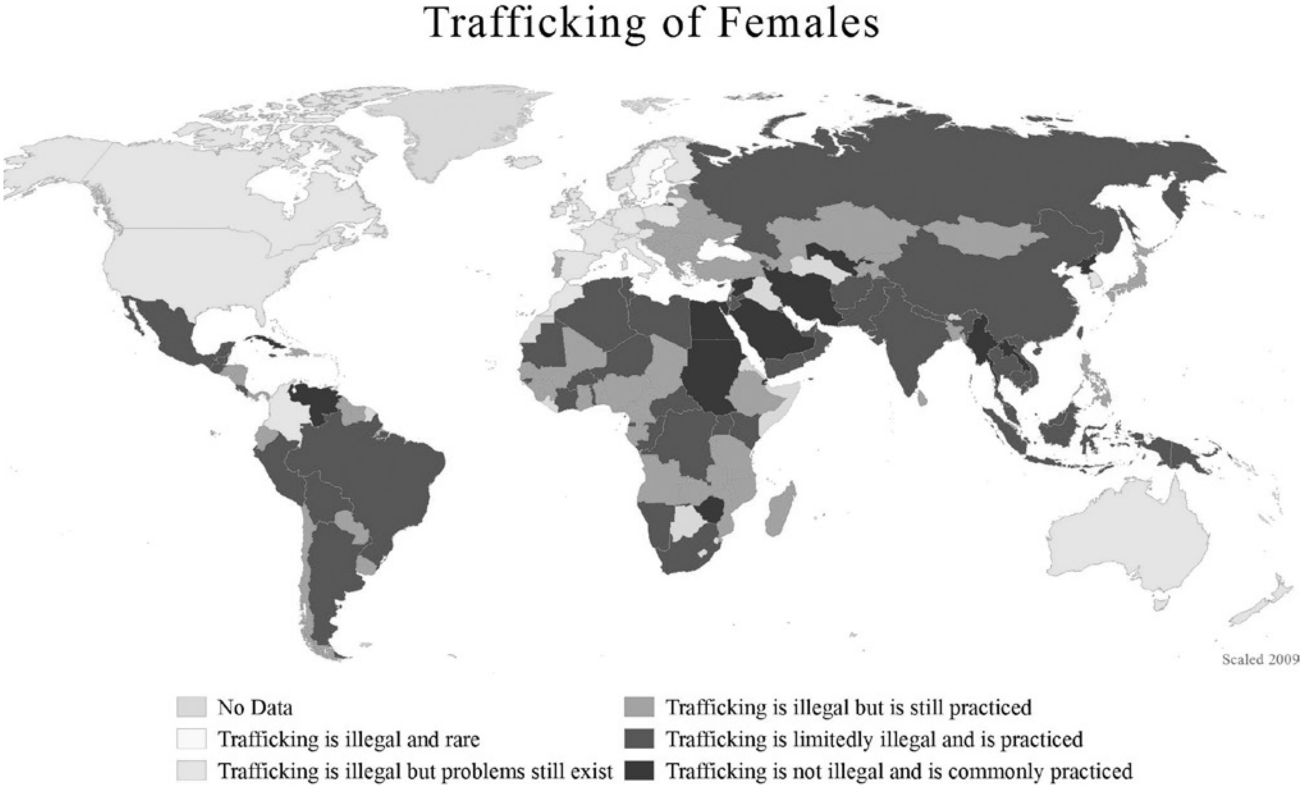
Policy Initiatives and Services

To address the global issue of human trafficking, the U.S. Department of State has developed the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report to identify and categorize each country's response to combating human trafficking. This tier system (Tier 1, 2, Tier 2 watch list, and Tier 3) ranks countries on their antitrafficking policies and offers a forum for diplomatic dialogue and engagement to counter and eradicate human trafficking.

Through the TVPA, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) is the governmental agency designated to help victims obtain benefits and services. HHS developed the Rescue and Restore campaign to disseminate information on human trafficking, create training resources, and develop the National Human Trafficking Resource Center and Hotline (1.888.373.7888 or text BeFree 233733). This hotline, housed at Polaris Project, receives tips on human trafficking, requests for training or technical assistance, and connects callers to antitrafficking services. Additional nonprofit and nongovernmental agencies, such as Coalition Against Trafficking in Women and Free the Slaves, provide resources for educational, advocacy, and policy initiatives.

The TVPA provides funding through the Office of Victims of Crime (OVC) to facilitate service delivery to victims, and calls for specialized services for this vulnerable group. Foreign-born victims who are residing in the United States are eligible through the Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) for social services support and legal assistance that provides them protection from deportation. Although the TVPA also calls for specialized services for domestic victims, most U.S.-born victims today receive services through existing resources in the U.S. social services delivery system, such as the child welfare system, domestic violence programs, and so forth.

Provision of a wide-ranging set of human services to address education, medical, legal, and mental health needs is crucial to begin the process of recovery and to achieve victims' safety, support, well-being, and self-sufficiency. After their initial rescue, victims of human trafficking have basic health needs and services similar to those of victims fleeing domestic violence—attention to physical well-being and safety, shelter, clothing, and food. After these needs are met, victims need to attain self-sufficiency



A world map created by the WomanStats Project shows countries ranked by the prevalence of female trafficking. Victims of sex trafficking may be falsely or legitimately recruited as models, dancers, or waitresses, and initially promised glamorous and lucrative careers, but are then forced into pornography or the sex trade in brothels, cantinas, or prostitution rings.

in employment, transportation, and language, as well as cultural acquisition if they are foreign born. Much like victims of torture, victims of human trafficking require comprehensive, culturally relevant mental health support services to heal from their psychological and emotional trauma. Lastly, foreign-born victims of trafficking who are reunited with their children will require family reunification services to ensure successful cultural integration as well as reintegration of the family.

Maura Nsonwu
North Carolina A&T State University
Noël Busch-Armendariz
Laurie Cook Heffron
University of Texas at Austin

See Also: Domestic Violence, Victims of; Immigration, Human Services Issues; Interpersonal Violence; Mental Health Services, Ethnic Models and Multicultural Service; Migrant Workers; Runaway Youth and Human Trafficking; Sweatshop Laborers; Torture, Survivors of; Trauma-Focused Services; Women, Battered.

Further Readings

Bales, Kevin and Ron Soodalter. The Slave Next Door: Human Trafficking and Slavery in America Today. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2009.

Batstone, David. Not for Sale: The Return of the Global Slave Trade—and How We Can Fight It. New York: HarperCollins, 2010.

Busch-Armendariz, Noël, Maura Nsonwu, and Laurie Cook-Heffron. "Human Trafficking Victims and Their Children: Assessing Needs and Vulnerabilities and Strengths and Survivorhood." Journal of Applied Research on Children: Informing Policy for Children at Risk, v.2 (2011).

Coalition Against Trafficking in Women. http://www.catwinternational.org (Accessed December 2013).

Free the Slaves. http://www.freetheslaves.net (Accessed December 2013).

Kara, Siddarth. Sex Trafficking: Inside the Business of Modern Slavery. New York: Columbia University Press, 2009.

Polaris Project. http://www.polarisproject.org (Accessed December 2013).

"Trafficking in Persons Report 2012." U.S. Department of State, 2012. http://www.state.gov/j/tip/rls/tiprpt/2012 (Accessed December 2013).

I

ICE Detention Centers, Services in

The U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agency is the chief investigative branch of the Department of Homeland Security. In 2003, a merger of the investigative and enforcement divisions of the U.S. Customs Service and the Immigration and Naturalization Service created ICE, which in 2013 had offices in all 50 states and 47 foreign countries. The Department of Homeland Security requested approximately $2 billion in funding for immigration detention for 2014, which would support ICE with funding to maintain a detention capacity of 31,800 people in more than 250 facilities including operational expenses, at an average of $5.05 million per day. ICE detains people in three types of facilities: federal detention centers managed by ICE, privately contracted prison facilities, and state and municipal jails subcontracting bed space for immigrant detainees. Defenders of current laws insist that current detention policies are necessary to ensure that immigrants do not simply disappear after deportation orders, but groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Immigration Forum as well as individual judges, legislators, and human rights activists argue that the documented inhumane treatment in ICE detention centers as well as the costs make policy changes an urgent priority.

Immigration detention significantly increased in the United States after the passage of the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, a response to the attacks of September 11, 2001. Among other provisions, this law directed the increase of the number of detention beds in ICE facilities by 8,000 annually. In 2009, Congress mandated that ICE fill a minimum of 34,000 detainee beds a day. When 2,200 detainees were released from ICE facilities in a February 2013 budget-cutting move by the Obama administration, conservative legislators charged ICE with violating the “bed mandate” statute because the detainee population fell to 30,773. Although the actual number varies daily, at the midpoint of the federal budget year in April 2013, ICE detainees averaged 33,811 a day. Although ICE detains families and women, ICE detainees are overwhelmingly male. The number of Arab, Muslim, and south Asian detainees increased after 2001, but most detainees are Latino. More than half have no criminal record, and another 20 percent are only guilty of traffic or immigration violations.

Service Processing Centers

The federal government was unprepared for the extent of detention that has become the norm. The solution has been to purchase bed space through states and local governments that subcontract their facilities through intergovernmental service agreements. ICE’s Office of Enforcement and Removal

Operations operates six detention facilities called Service Processing Centers (SPCs). In 2013, about 244 state and county jails were contracted to house immigrant detainees on behalf of ICE (nearly 70 percent of the detained immigrant population). Additionally, ICE uses seven Contract Detention Facilities run by private correctional corporations. These contracts have proved lucrative for state and local governments and private companies. Both groups have used political pressure, including hiring professional lobbyists, to keep detention centers open.

Immigrant advocacy groups and investigative journalists have uncovered systemic human and civil rights abuses in ICE detention centers. According to law, ICE detainees are administrative detainees who are held pending immigration cases or orders of removal. Officially, they are not being punished, yet most are forced to wear prison uniforms and are subjected to strip searches, handcuffs, and leg shackles. The constitutional right to legal counsel is not guaranteed in immigration proceedings, and as few as 11 percent of detainees have legal representation. Among those who do, detainees have been denied access to legal representation, and lawyers of detainees have been denied access to their clients. Lawyers sometimes have difficulty locating their clients, who may be moved to another facility without notice. Additional problems stem from limited telephone access, interference with legal mail, and lack of access to a law library.

Conditions

Detainees have been victims of verbal, physical, and sexual abuse. Overcrowding, a common problem, leads to unsanitary conditions in bathrooms and sleeping areas. Many detainees are denied recreation time. Inadequate medical care is a major and persistent problem. Department of Homeland Security auditors found only one facility that complied with the detention standards for documenting initial health screenings, and 40 percent of the centers audited failed to provide even an initial physical examination. The lack of such procedures may compromise the health of those with chronic medical conditions and increase the risk of transmission of communicable or infectious diseases and ongoing nutritional deficiencies. Nongovernmental organizations have documented long delays for medically necessary surgeries and unresponsiveness to requests for medical care. Medical staff turnover is high, and shortages in some facilities are acute. A total of 83 deaths of detainees were reported between 2003 and 2008; 32 of the deaths were detainees under 40 years old. More than 36 percent may be attributable to actions taken or not taken by medical staff members in the facilities.

The U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agency acquired this facility near Phoenix, Arizona, to hold detainees before boarding flights to Central America. ICE detains people in three types of facilities: federal detention centers managed by ICE, privately contracted prison facilities, and state and municipal jails subcontracting bed space for immigrant detainees.

ICE operates under a set of standards specified in the Detentions Operations Manual released in 2000 by the former Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and the U.S. Attorney General. Theoretically, these standards are mandatory for all Service Processing Centers, Contract Detention Facilities, and Intergovernmental Service Agreement facilities holding detainees for more than 72 hours. In practice, they are merely guidelines and are not binding under U.S. law. ICE is strictly self-policing and little has been done when standards are unmet.

In 2009, ICE announced that changes were planned for the immigration detention system over a period of three to five years, changes that would result in improved medical care and more effective ICE oversight of all its centers. Among other things, ICE indicated that a move would be made away from housing detainees in penal facilities. Within four years, ICE reduced the number of detention facilities from 341 to about 250, including closing the San Pedro Processing Center in California, which lost its accreditation from the American Correctional Association, but ICE insisted that the loss was unrelated to the closing. In 2011, Human Rights First investigated ICE's progress in making the announced changes, and reported that 14 percent of ICE detainees were housed in nonpenal facilities as required by United Nations policies, but 86 percent remained in jails and jail-like facilities. Critics of the agency's policy continue to point out that alternative methods to detention would provide more humane treatment and save American taxpayers more than $1.44 billion annually. The Department of Homeland Security's estimates reveal that if only persons guilty of serious crimes were detained at costs of $159 per person per day, the rest of the currently detained population could be monitored by alternative methods costing from $0.70 to $17 per person per day. The second group would include noncriminals and those classified by ICE as low-risk criminals, about 80 percent of the detainee population.

Human Rights Advocacy

Human services organizations ranging from the local to the international advocate for immigrant rights and protest ICE detention quotas and the use of civil immigration facilities to house detainees. Local efforts include the University of California Berkeley's Undocumented Student Program that provides help for the more than 200 undocumented students on that California campus. The program has helped students find resources for tuition, housing, food, textbooks, and medical care, and it provides information about immigration law and places individual cases with pro bono attorneys for representation. It has become a model for other colleges and universities. Local groups also work to apply political pressure. Advocacy groups in Northampton County, Pennsylvania, for example, spearheaded successful protests against the building of an immigration facility in their community.

Among the most vocal and effective national advocacy groups is the Detention Watch Network, a coalition of organizations and individuals that works to expose and challenge the injustices of the U.S. immigration detention and deportation system. In January 2014, the Detention Watch Network joined with the Center for Constitutional Rights (CCR), a nonprofit legal and educational organization founded in 1966 by attorneys who represented civil rights movements in the south, to file a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit seeking immediate release of documents that the U.S. government has refused to provide regarding the detention bed quota, which ICE has interpreted to require detaining 34,000 noncitizens per day. The lawsuit charges the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and ICE with failing to disclose information that the public had the right to know prior to the congressional debate on appropriations begun in March 2014. A CCR spokesperson explained that the refusal to release the information interfered with citizens' understanding of how ICE and the Department of Homeland Security use the detention bed quota and undermined the public's ability to debate the issue and to hold their elected officials responsible for the abuses that stem from the quota.

The Detention Rights Network, along with the immigration rights arms of groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union, Human Rights Watch, and various religious organizations are members of the International Detention Coalition, a nonprofit network organization based in Melbourne, Australia, with a membership base of 300 nongovernmental organizations, faith-based groups, academics, practitioners, and individuals working in 50 countries globally to promote greater protection of and respect for the human rights of those held in detention and to raise awareness of detention policies and practices.

Wylene Rholetter
Auburn University

See Also: Immigrant Populations; Immigration, Human Services Issues; Immigration Law, History of U.S.

Further Readings

Kerwin, Donald and Serena Yi-Ying Lin. "Immigration Detention: Can ICE Meet Its Legal Imperatives and Case Management Responsibilities?" Migration Policy Institute (2009). http://www.migrationpolicy.org/pubs/detentionreportsept1009.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

National Immigration Forum. "The Math of Immigration Detention: Runaway Costs for Immigration Detention Do Not Add Up to Sensible Policies." http://www.immigrationforum.org/images/uploads/mathofimmigrationdetention.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Priest, Dana and Amy Goldstein. "System of Neglect." Washington Post (May 11, 2008).

Immigrant Populations, Human Service Needs of

For centuries, people have migrated to the United States from all parts of the world seeking the privileges and opportunities afforded to them by the country. However, immigrants face challenges such as anti-immigrant publicity, policies, and discrimination as they acculturate into the United States. Human services professionals are often in the frontline and are first responders to the needs of immigrants. However, knowledge gaps persist in the overall human services needs of immigrants. To address these gaps, a panoramic view of the unique needs of immigrants is needed. In addition, specific culturally competent and literacy sensitive interventions are suggested for human services professionals as they provide social service interventions to immigrants in the United States.

The majority of worldwide immigration took place between the 1800s and 1930, when roughly 60 million people migrated across the globe. Although most of the migrants were European, over half migrated to the United States while others settled in Canada, Argentina, Brazil, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. The reasons why people leave their homeland and migrate to a different country are numerous. A primary reason for immigration is economic opportunity, whereby people seek to improve their economic standard via better employment. Others immigrate for political reasons, some to avoid starvation; others leave to flee intolerable family circumstances, reunite with loved ones, and to gain access to public services, whereas others such as Africans were forced to come to the United States as slaves.

The terms immigrant and refugee are often erroneously synonymously used, but they are very different terms. Immigrants are people who voluntarily leave their countries of origin to live in a foreign country. On the other hand, refugees are people who flee their countries because of persecution, war, or disasters such as famines or epidemics. Technically, voluntary migrants and refugees are both regarded as immigrants if they enter the United States legally through air, land, or sea ports. Undocumented immigrant is the term used to describe a migrant who illegally enters the United States and has no formal record of entry at an entry port.

Historical and Current Immigrant Population in the United States

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, the native U.S. population is comprised of all U.S. residents who were born in the United States or a distant area of the United States, such as Puerto Rico, and naturalized citizens of the United States. The native U.S. population also includes those who are foreign born but have at least one parent who is an American citizen. All others who reside in the United States are categorized as foreign born. The earliest record of immigrant census data was the 1850 decennial census. Between 1850 and 1930, the number of foreign-born people in the United States increased from 2.2 to 14.2 million, with the majority coming from Europe.

Foreign-born persons represented 14.4 percent of the total U.S. population in 1870, 14.8 percent in 1890, and 14.7 percent in 1910. From 1930 to 1950, there was a decline from 14.2 to 10.3 million foreign-born persons in the United States, and in 1970, the percentage was at a record low of 4.7 percent because of low levels of immigration. Then, as a result of large-scale immigration, primarily from Latin America and Asia since 1970, the foreign-born population of the United States significantly grew from 9.6 million in 1970, to 14.1 million in 1980, to 19.8 million in 1990, and because of economic expansion of the 1980s and 1990s, to 40 million (13 percent of the total U.S. population) in 2010. According to U.S. census data, between 2000 and 2010, approximately 14 million new immigrants (legal and illegal) inhabited the United States, the largest immigration in American history. Of all foreign-born persons, those from Latin America represented the largest region-of-birth group. A total of 28 percent of the foreign born were born in Asia, 12 percent in Europe, 4 percent in Africa, 2 percent in northern America, and less than 1 percent in Oceania. Of the 21.2 million foreign born from Latin America, 11.7 million, or over half (55 percent), were born in Mexico. Over the past decade, California, Texas, Florida, New York, New Jersey, Georgia, Virginia, North Carolina, Maryland, Washington, Illinois, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts have had the largest numbers of immigrants.

Immigrants' Human Services Needs

Although most people who migrate to the United States do so legally, approximately three-fourths, many immigrants face discrimination because they are often viewed by the public as having entered the country illegally. Laws such as the Alien and Sedition Act of 1798, the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882, the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, the Enhanced Border Security and Visa Entry Reform Act of 2002, and the Arizona Immigration Law (SB 1070) were all aimed at immigration restriction. However, like most people, immigrants are not always capable of meeting their basic human needs.

In the modern world, life has been complicated by a number of factors. Many circumstances, both extraneous and internal to the individual, such as unemployment and underemployment, mental illness, sicknesses of various types, divorce, and homelessness cause people to seek assistance. As a result, many people can no longer count on mutual aid and support from family and friends because people are in constant flux and transition. Immigrants are also faced with many of life's challenging circumstances such as unemployment, mental illness, sickness, and homelessness. The needs of immigrants can be broadly classified into four areas: language, financial, psychosocial, and health care.

Language Needs

The most important need that non-English-speaking immigrants have as they settle in the United States is the challenge of speaking or communicating in the English language. The language needs of immigrants affect the extent of their acculturation and assimilation. An immigrant's inability to fluently communicate can affect job, educational, and other professional opportunities. For example, Latino immigrants who are used to communicating in Spanish may be unable to seek a job opportunity that requires the ability to communicate in English. Other disadvantages faced by non-English-speaking immigrants include: inability to understand the laws and regulations governing the United States, inability to apply for a driver's license or other government-issued identification, the challenges of transacting business in stores or online, and overt or covert discrimination. A recent example of the language barrier is the report in the news media that some Mexican immigrants were involved in car accidents in the state of Arizona because of their inability to understand road signs and traffic laws.

Some immigrants who learn English are not understood when they communicate. Often, immigrants face the challenge of being stereotyped as speaking with an accent and of being misunderstood when they communicate. Consequently, the English language needs of immigrants in the United States affects all other areas of their socioeconomic socialization. Human services professionals can assist non-English-speaking immigrants to overcome these disadvantages in a number of ways. First, human services professionals can refer immigrants to public and nongovernmental agencies that offer English as a Second language (ESL) classes. Second, human services professionals can provide resources for or linkages to interpretation services to assist immigrants. Third, human services professionals can network immigrants who have previously used social services or referrals with newly arrived immigrants. This networking can facilitate faster assimilation, acculturation, and adjustment to the United States.

New Americans Welcome Area (NAWA) provides extensive information and referral to all Montgomery County, Maryland, residents regarding, but not limited to consumer affairs, education issues, employment, English as a Second Language classes, health care, housing issues, legal assistance, recreation programs, and senior services.

Financial Needs

Immigrants face huge financial needs because they are often employed at low-paying jobs and frequently engage in strenuous labor activities that are often not wanted by citizens of this country. Most undocumented immigrants are poorly paid, but they generally accept these circumstances, knowing that they may not easily find alternative employment. An additional reason for not complaining is the fear of being reported to law enforcement agents and the fear of deportation. Undocumented immigrants are commonly paid far below the prevailing minimum wage, and this affects their standard of living and opportunities in the United States.

On the other hand, documented or legal immigrants face a similar financial need as their undocumented counterparts. For documented immigrants, the need to settle quickly and repay the loans they often borrowed to immigrate to the United States frequently puts them at a disadvantage to be educationally and skillfully prepared for the professional requirements of the U.S. workforce. Consequently, many documented immigrants who are well educated abroad but do not have U.S.-based qualifications are usually offered menial jobs just to pay accommodations and living expenses. In addition, the jobs that immigrants are employed at often do not have benefits such as health insurance, vacation, and retirement benefits. Furthermore, the working conditions are often deplorable and unbefitting.

As a result, documented immigrants are caught in the cycle of working for survival instead of reinvesting in educational and professional opportunities that could improve their chances of social and economic mobility in the United States. For example, immigrants who fled their countries because of political persecution or civil war do not have the luxury of time to retrain or have an American education that will enable them to obtain jobs that are commensurate with their education. As a result, most immigrants work in highly labor-intensive jobs that pay poorly. Furthermore, most immigrants are under pressure from their countries of origin to send money back home to their families. Often, families, and friends of immigrants in the United States erroneously assume that immigrants earn enough to share and invest in their countries of origin. For some immigrants who are married and have families abroad, the pressure to sustain the family places additional financial pressure on them. Therefore, many immigrants are forced to share their meager paychecks between their families abroad and meeting their own financial needs in the United States.

Human services professionals can assist immigrants with financial literacy skills such as budgeting, job searches, and career planning, and they can provide referrals to job retraining and newer certification and educational programs that can empower professional mobility and opportunities. Moreover, human services professionals can advocate for better working and pay conditions on behalf of exploited and underpaid immigrants.

Psychosocial Needs

One of the major consequences of migrating to another country is leaving family, social, and cultural ties behind in the country of origin. For those who migrate to the United States, other important needs are psychological and social needs. Psychosocial needs are therefore a combination of emotional and social needs that immigrants have because they do not often immigrate with their immediate family members, friends, or other relatives, which causes them to be emotionally lonely and socially isolated in the United States.

Other factors that increase psychosocial needs are new dietary and food patterns, adjusting to different religious or worship orientations, and the challenges of understanding and respecting the rights that women and children have in the United States. Often, these factors are not concerns in the countries of origin for many immigrants. In addition, the demand of the menial jobs that immigrants undertake makes it almost impossible for them to interact and build new friendship and social ties in the United States. Furthermore, the individualized styles of living in the United States, rather than the communal style and social interactions that many immigrants are used to, accentuate the psychosocial needs of immigrants.

However, immigrants partly meet their psychosocial needs by utilizing the friendship provided by their coworkers and new social interactions offered by their national associations and religious organizations. To address these psychosocial needs, human services professionals can assist immigrants in the steps and processes of registering for and forming national or ethnic associations to improve social and emotional bonding with people. In addition, human services professionals can provide referral services to existing immigrant-friendly and immigrant-oriented resources such as religious and nonprofit organizations.

Human services workers can also help immigrants to assimilate and acculturate into the United States by providing courses or training to immigrants about the history, culture, people, laws, and different institutions of the United States. This training—for example,in the area of child welfare and laws protecting women against domestic violence—can help immigrants avoid encounters with law enforcement agents that could precipitate psychosocial crises for an immigrant. Therefore, human services professionals can assist immigrants who are new to the United States to be well acquainted with their parental responsibilities to children, as well as the acceptable respect accorded to women in the United States.

Health Care Needs

Immigrants face enormous health care needs because of the prohibitive cost of health care insurance in the United States. The 1996 welfare reform excluded immigrants from benefiting from government-sponsored health care assistance such as Medicaid. Therefore, immigrants are often without health care coverage when there is a health problem. The absence of health care coverage in the low-paying jobs that often employ immigrants also exacerbate the health care needs of most immigrants.

Often, preventable or easily treatable diseases that immigrants have become costlier and more complicated to treat because of the lack of health care insurance and their fear of paying huge medical bills. Self-treatment or resigning to fatalistic beliefs are common strategies that immigrants resort to when they are unable to afford health care.

For some immigrants who can afford health care insurance, another major challenge is the discrimination and treatment disparities that they confront in the U.S. health care system. Many immigrants complain of not receiving culturally sensitive communication and treatment within the health care system. For example, Latino or African immigrants who have very strong family and communal ties are often not allowed to involve their family members in health care discussions. For some African immigrants who are Muslims, most health care professionals are viewed as not sensitive to the religious and cultural restrictions that are associated with providing health services to women. Consequently, immigrants who are insured and can afford health care often complain of discriminatory and culturally insensitive health care services in the United States health care system.

Human services professionals are well positioned to help immigrants navigate the health care system in the United States. First, human services workers can provide interpretation and help bridge the complaint of culturally insensitive interactions between immigrants and health care professionals. Second, human services professionals can provide preventive and health literacy training to immigrants in culturally appropriate and religiously sensitive ways that reduce the fear and concerns that some immigrants have toward the U.S. health care system. Third, human services professionals can also provide referral services and information about free to low-cost health services to immigrants. Furthermore, appropriate professionals in the human services sector can provide counseling and assessment to immigrants who have mental health needs associated with the challenges of assimilation, culture shock, and acculturation in the United States.

Approaches to Prepare and Develop Immigrants' Capacity for Assimilation

To address and prevent some of the needs identified with immigrants will require three essential approaches that human services professionals could adopt. The central focus of any such approach is to build capacity for immigrants to actualize their potential. Such an approach requires a fundamental shift of the general perspective that currently dominates human services provision, which places the burden of integration on the individual and family to a more collaborative effort involving all stakeholders.

The first approach is to focus on the individual and family units. Immigrants may share common problems, yet there are numerous issues that are specific to groups and families. For instance, among African immigrants, the need for English as a Second Language (ESL) service may vary depending on country of origin. A person who is from a French-speaking country will need different services than a person who is from an English-speaking country. Also, within a family unit, the literacy levels of different family members and the age and sex demographics will require varied services to address their needs. Also, families that have experienced war will require specific types of mental health services. Therefore, it is important that immigrant-based services be available to meet both the broader and specific needs of immigrant families. This will require periodic assessment of services to meet the needs and availability of resources and expertise to provide the services. Each immigrant's local social services agency can tailor its resources and services to meet the needs of the immigrant population. These services may include direct counseling, social support programs, ESL programs with cultural adjustment content, and parenting classes.

Second, to address some of the needs of immigrants will require a collaborative effort with other local human services and governmental agencies. The needs of immigration will require broad-based initiatives to not be a burden on the immigrant family and immigrant-based organizations. Community capacity building to address the needs of immigrants should involve community education activities and collaboration with stakeholders such as immigrant-based agencies, health care providers, schools, law enforcement, school systems, religious groups, and local government. A collaborative effort between the individual/family and community partners will ease the burden of integration on immigrant/family and make the partnership more communal.

Third, to meet some of the needs of immigrants will require advocacy and support from human services agencies to influence policies at the local, state, and federal levels. Various actions and anti-immigrant publicity have had a disproportionately negative effect on immigrants. Immigrants, because of language barriers, nonreciprocity of foreign education, and lack of employment constitute a large portion of underemployed and low-paid employees in the nation. Immigrants also constitute a large portion of the population who do not have health insurance and underutilize the health care system. These and other related issues will require a broader and comprehensive approach to ameliorate these problems. Suggested preventive measures include comprehensive immigration reform, free or affordable primary health care to all with emphasis on preventive care, educational reforms, and employment laws that create an enabling environment for immigrants to be successful.

The uniqueness that each racial or ethnic group brings to the United States (e.g., values, beliefs, customs, and rituals) has challenged people to appreciate ideas that are different from their own. More importantly, the uniqueness that each racial and ethnic group brings to the United States has taught people to be appreciative and sensitive to differences. Immigrants are a heterogeneous group of people whose intragroup diversity affords human services professionals wonderful opportunities for professional development and personal growth.

A. Christson Adedoyin
East Carolina University, Greenville, North Carolina
Daniel A. Boamah
Sharon E. Moore
University of Louisville, Kentucky

See Also: Acculturation; African Immigrants; Asian Immigrants; Cultural Services; Immigration, Human Services Issues.

Further Readings

Camarota, S. A. "A Record-Setting Decade of Immigration: 2000 to 2010." Center for Immigration Studies (2011). http://www.cis.org/2000-2010-record-setting-decade-of-immigration (Accessed December 2013).

Chang-Muy, Fernando and Elaine P. Congress. Social Work With Immigrants and Refugees: Legal Issues, Clinical Skills, and Advocacy. New York: Springer, 2009.

Hasstedt, Kinsey. "Toward Equity and Access: Removing Legal Barriers to Health Insurance Coverage for Immigrants." Guttmacher Policy Review, v.16/1 (2013).

Kaltman, Stacey, Jennifer Pauk, and Carol L. Alter. "Meeting the Mental Health Needs of Low-Income Immigrants in Primary Care: A Community Adaptation of an Evidence-Based Model." American Journal of Orthopsychiatry, v.81/4 (2011).

Moore, Sharon E., Cynthia A. Moore, Jacquelyn Monroe, and Renee Campbell-Mapp. "Effectively Working With Challenging Clients Who Receive Hunger Service Assistance: Case Examples and Eight Recommended Guidelines." Advances in Social Work, v.7/2 (2008).

Immigration: Human Service Issues

Immigration is considered to be one of the major issues of national and international politics. Immigration is not a new phenomenon; however, its roots trace back into history. Furthermore, contemporary immigration is described as the movement of people from poorer to richer countries and also movements between developed countries. This movement has been continuously rising. According to the Human Development Report from 2013, today, in accordance with 2010 statistics, around 3 percent of people on the globe—or around 215 million—are immigrants, a threefold increase since 1960.

A wide range of factors motivates migration. These motives are described as push and pull factors. The push factor stands for the state of things at the sending country such as the weakness of the economy and political instability; the pull factor is the situation in the immigrant's destination country such as the prospects of finding a decent job and a high standard of living. Inequality in income rates and employment opportunities across and within the countries and particularly economic gradients between developed and developing countries are the main factors of immigration.

Moreover, political instability of the sending countries can lead to immigration. Geographic proximity of the sending country to the receiving country is another factor that explains migration patterns. Countries tend to get immigrants from their zones of influence. Cultural, historical, and linguistic ties along with family relatives' presence at receiving countries may also be considered to be facilitative factors of migration.

World Bank figures from 2010 figures demonstrate that the United States, the Russian Federation, Germany, Saudi Arabia, Canada, and the United Kingdom are the top destination countries pulling the highest stock of immigrants. In contrast, Mexico, India, China, Bangladesh, and Pakistan are the top origin countries pushing the highest number of emigrants to the countries where economic and political opportunities are better off.

So far, the aforementioned issues have been related to pull and push factors of immigration, which are also considered to be the root causes of immigration. Addressing these factors is of utmost importance in terms of determining key human services issues regarding immigration. Thus, in the next section, human services issues related to immigration are discussed.

Some Human Services Issues Concerning Immigration

There are several aspects regarding human services issues of immigrants, thus including economic, social, and political aspects, which are also related to factors of immigration. These aspects, respectively addressed below, shed light on the linkage between human services issues and needs of immigrants.

From the economic aspect, sudden economic emergencies—such as the debt and energy crises of the 1970s and 1980s and the currency crises of the 1990s—resulted in accelerated influxes of immigrants to Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) countries and in large-scale expulsions of immigrants. It is obvious that these crises were economic oriented and immigration emerged as an outcome of them.

The number of foreign-born laborers has increased greatly, with a growth rate of more than 20 percent in nearly all OECD countries. From 1995 to 2005, there was much stronger growth in immigrant employment than in the labor market. This increase, especially after the 1990s, indicates that one of the main components of global economy, labor migration, has become a salient actor in ecopolitics.

Most industrialized countries have green card or highly skilled immigrant programs in order to attract qualified workers. This can be identified as a policy change from restrictive measures to liberal arrangements. Partly, these changes reflect the emerging needs of migrants in labor markets.

From the political aspect, global governance and international viewpoints on immigration have evolved significantly. For example, Article 13 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 states that everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state. The 1990 International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers has provided insights into immigrant rights.

Immigration and government practices always carry the potential of becoming a matter of international relations. Thus, a United Nations (UN) resolution asks member states and the international community to promote a balanced, coherent, and comprehensive approach to international immigration and developmental approaches particularly by building partnerships and ensuring coordinated action to develop capacities, including for the management of immigration. All these international regulations indicate that human services issues regarding immigration are considered as a priority within the international community.

From the social aspect, nation states are having some concerns about the integration of immigrants into society in the sense that they may experience some problems about integrating immigrants into their societies, like questions about assimilation. Assimilation is another problematic area that some countries may use as a part of their integration policies. For example, the riots in France in 1994 resulted from disenfranchisement of African immigrants.

Fears that immigrants will change the identity or historical fabric of receiving countries may cause immigrants to encounter hostility, discrimination, racism, or xenophobia in immigrant-receiving countries. Thus, extreme-right, anti-immigrant parties use immigration issues as a political tool for winning elections and see immigration as a controversial issue. Anti-immigrant parties in immigrant-receiving countries have exploited these concerns for the sake of their popular interests. Therefore, immigration is more likely to be polemic because immigrants are reluctant to be exposed to assimilation owing to wide-ranging language, cultural, and religious differences in relation to their host societies and the ease of access to their countries and cultures of origin. However, the orthodoxy aspect of integration encourages the promotion of diversity and preserving immigrants' customs.

Public concerns over the presence of immigrants and labeling them as outsiders in their societies, to some extent, are linked to perceptions of an increased security threat concentrating on immigrants. Tough security controls against immigrants before entering the destination countries chiefly result from security concerns.

Furthermore, human services issues are also related to education opportunities of immigrants all around the world. There has been an increase in the number of international students who seek to have a better education background. According to the OECD figures, in 1975, it is estimated that there were around 610,000 international students enrolled for courses outside their home countries. By 2005—30 years later—that had more than quadrupled to just over 2.7 million international students, and the number of international students worldwide has increased at more than 8 percent a year.

Moreover, with the impact of new technologies, people increasingly learn that there are others not only unlike themselves but also like themselves. New categories of us and others are made available for political mobilization and movements. The poor are aware of everyday disparities and inequalities, which force them to migrate to places where they can find better opportunities.

To conclude, immigration is vitally important in terms of not only domestic but also international policy and politics. There are several reasons why people are driven to move from their homes. These reasons are described as pull and push factors. These factors have contributed to addressing the key human services issues with regard to immigration. In line with this factorial approach, human services issues are precisely about social, political, and economic opportunities, which should be provided to all immigrants. Therefore, policy makers and anyone who is focusing on immigration issues should bear in mind human services needs of immigrants while shaping and framing policies in the area of immigration.

Ahmet Kaya
Independent Scholar

See Also: Immigrant Populations, Human Services Needs of; Immigration Law, History of U.S.; U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

Further Readings

Bailey, Rayna. Global Issues: Immigration and Migration. New York: Facts on File, 2008.

International Organization for Migration (IOM). "World Migration." http://www.iom.int/cms/en/sites/iom/home/about-migration/world-migration.html (Accessed March 2014).

Keeley, Brian. International Migration: the Human Face of Globalization. Paris: Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, 2009.

Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). The Global Competition for Talent Mobility of the Highly Skilled. Paris: OECD, 2008.

World Bank. Migration and Remittances Fact Book. Washington, DC: World Bank, 2011.

Immigration Law: History of U.S.

Human services professionals often work with immigrants. These professionals meet immigrants at the airport and help them adjust to life in the United States. Immigrants come to the United States with expectations and dreams. Language and culture differences can be barriers to obtaining these dreams. Human services professionals help immigrants navigate through the obstacles and bureaucracy, so immigrants can gain independence and thrive in their new environments. Working for nonprofit agencies, human services professionals have been aiding immigrants in their resettlement efforts for more than a century. As a way of understanding the bureaucracy and context, knowledge of U.S. immigration history and policy is an essential element for successful practice.

In 1790, the first U.S. act addressing naturalization of immigrants stated that residents living in the United States for a minimum of two years could apply for citizenship. These residents along with any children under the age of 21 were granted citizenship if they were white and demonstrated good moral character. In 1795, it changed, stating that the applicant must be a free white person with five years of U.S. residency, good character, lack of service in the army for England, no claims to property in other countries, and renunciation of allegiances to any other country.

As tension rose between the United States and France, the legislature passed the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. The first change included the requirement for citizenship applicants to have 14 years of residency as opposed to the previous requirement of five. The next two changes allowed for deportation of those suspected of threatening the peace and safety of the United States and the incarceration or deportation of any foreigner with allegiances to a country at war with the United States. The final addition made criticism against federal officials illegal.

The Steerage Act (1819) marked the first federal immigration law. This required that all vessels entering U.S. waters give an account of all non-U.S. passengers on board, indicating their country of origin, intentions for citizenship, age, sex, occupation, and intended residence in the United States. It also limited the number of passengers permitted on these ships.

The Passenger Act (1847) further limited the amount of passengers on vessels. It required that captains of larger vessels pay a fee of $5 per non-U.S. passenger, which is equivalent to approximately $143 today. The United States saw a large increase in new arrivals from Ireland and Germany during the 1800s. There were also waves of immigrants from Austria–Hungary, Italy, and Sweden, and many still came from England. Employers such as the railroad company actively recruited foreigners to come to the United States.

In 1857, the Supreme Court heard the famous case Dred Scott v. Sandford. This highly criticized decision did not afford the right of citizenship to free Africans. After the end of the Civil War, the passage of both the Civil Rights Act (1866) and the 14th amendment of the U.S. Constitution (1868) had an impact on immigrants. The amendment repealed the Dred Scott decision and granted citizenship on both a state and federal level to all residents who were either born or naturalized in the United States. This marked the first time people of African descent acquired a pathway to citizenship. Despite the passage of the 14th amendment, the Naturalization Act (1970) discriminated against Chinese immigrants. Tension was high, especially in California, where Chinese men came to work in the gold mines and for the railroad companies.

In 1875, the Supreme Court issued a decision in Henderson v. the Mayor of New York. This decision gave authority over immigration to the federal government and eliminated state regulation and fees. Without the fees, the states would not have the resources to aid these newcomers. State officials lobbied successfully for a federal immigration tax. In 1882, Congress levied an immigration tax of 50 cents (just more than $11 today) on all newcomers. This act also prohibited criminals from entering the country. With the passage of the Page Act (1875), it became illegal for criminals, involuntary Asian laborers, or Asian prostitutes to enter the United States. In 1891, immigrants who may need societal assistance could not legally enter the United States.

Congress passed the Chinese Exclusion Act (1882) for 10 years. It prevented Chinese laborers from coming to the United States and deported those who arrived after November 1880. The Scott Act (1888) prohibited Chinese laborers from entering or returning to the United States. The Geary Act (1892) extended it for another 10 years and added the requirement that all individuals of Chinese origin carry identification. In 1902, this act was renewed indefinitely.

In 1892, Ellis Island was declared an immigration station in the east. Immigrants would arrive first at Ellis Island for an inspection to determine if they would be permitted to enter the United States. Angel Island opened in the west in 1910 as an immigration station.

Twenty-First Century

In 1901, an anarchist, Leon Czolgosz, assassinated President William McKinley. In response to this unexpected and tragic event, Congress enacted the Anarchist Exclusion Act (1903). This allowed immigrants to be deported based on their political beliefs and associations.

The Naturalization Act (1906) enacted the formation of one agency to manage the process of becoming a citizen. It was the first time that an understanding of the English language was a requirement for citizenship. The controversial Expatriation Act of 1907 established that a woman who was a citizen of the United States would lose her citizenship if she married a foreigner and gained her husband's citizenship.

During the years of 1907 and 1908, President Roosevelt was negotiating the famous Gentlemen's Agreement with Japan. This agreement allowed Japanese students to attend San Francisco schools in return for the cessation of the issuance of passports to the United States by the Japanese government.

The Immigration Act (1907) excluded more categories of immigrants and raised the immigration tax to $4, which is $100 today. This act also provided for the establishment of the U.S. Immigration Commission, eventually called the Dillingham Commission. The commission was to investigate the immigrant experience in the United States.

The Dillingham Commission Reports (1910) suggested a literary test to limit the entry of newcomers from southern and eastern Europe because the commission viewed people from these regions as inferior. The commission found that, during the period of 1898 to 1910, immigrants from southern Italy represented the largest migrant group, with Mexicans being ranked as the 28th largest group out of the 31 ethnic groups counted.

In 1910, the Mexican Revolution changed this significantly. Mexican entered the United States in record numbers—most settling in the southwest, which was territory previously settled by Mexico. Some were seasonal workers who returned to Mexico frequently. Mexican immigration continued to increase for the next 20 years.

However, there was little concern over Mexican migration, and the United States continued to show concern about Asians even after the start of World War I. The Immigration Act (1917), also called the Asiatic Barred Zone Act, prohibited Asians from entering the United States. A literary test was instituted as a precursor for immigration. Additional restrictions were imposed that prohibited entry for alcoholics, beggars, and anarchists. The tax was increased to $8 (about $145 today) for all adults over 16 who paid for their own passage. Those who did not pay for their own passage were sent back to their country of origin.

The United States joined the Allies (United Kingdom, France, and the Russian Empire) against the Central Powers (Germany and Austria–Hungary) in World War I. The Allies were victorious in 1918. After the war, the public was particularly nervous about a communist rebellion on American soil. Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer and his staff detained more than 6,000 immigrants on the suspicion of communist ties. This was called the Red Scare. The most restrictive immigration policy to date was enacted in 1921. Congress passed the Emergency Quota Act (1921) and eventually passed the National Origins Quotas Act (1924). The use of quotas restricted immigration pragmatically and reduced some of the racist undertones in previous immigration acts. The quotas established in 1924 were made as permanent in 1929.

The Cable Act (1922) partially repealed the controversial Expatriate Act of 1907. However, Asian prejudice remained in that U.S. American women who were married to Asian men lost their American citizenship. Upon divorce, white American women could reapply for citizenship in the United States. However, Asian American women in the same circumstance were ineligible for citizenship. It was not until 1931 that the Expatriate Act of 1907 was fully repealed.

In the middle of World War II, the United States instituted the Alien Registration Act (1940). This act required that all noncitizens over the age of 14 register yearly and submit to fingerprinting. Additionally, it banned anarchist behavior and speech. It did allow the attorney general to have discretionary authority to suspend deportation proceedings for foreigners with good moral character.

In contrast, after the bombing of Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, the internment of 110,000 Japanese Americans started in 1942 under the executive order of President Franklin Roosevelt. Immediately following the attack on Pearl Harbor, the United States joined forces with China and declared war on Japan. The president repealed the Chinese Exclusion Act in December of 1943. Other Asian countries were still restricted from immigrating until 1952 with the passage of the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act.

The United States started the Mexican bracero program as a way to bring temporary agricultural workers to farm during the war. This program continued long past the war until 1964 as millions of Mexican men worked temporarily in the United States through this program. World War II influenced immigration policy on another level. Military servicemen married both European and Asian women during the war. In 1945, Congress passed a short-term act enabling European-born spouses to gain entry into the United States. Congress passed legislation two years later allowing Asian-born and other ineligible foreign-born wives to immigrate to the United States. In 1950, the legislature passed a law that allowed spouses of servicemen from Korea and Japan entry into the United States. The McCarran-Walter Act (1952) provided an exemption from the quota for all spouses and minor children of U.S. citizens.

Another impact of World War II was the large number of displaced persons. President Truman, against popular U.S. opinion, allotted half of the quotas for Europeans to displaced persons (DPs) in 1945. By 1948, Congress enacted the Displaced Person Act, which allowed 400,000 DPs to come to the United States over a period of four years above the European quota. The Refugee Relief Act (1953) allowed 200,000 DPs above the quota limit to come to the United States.

As the United States became more concerned about the communist movement becoming an international conspiracy, the legislature enacted the McCarran Act (1950), which excluded communists from entering the United States. The Immigration and Nationality Act (1952), also called the McCarran-Walter Act, encompassed both immigration and naturalization. In the interest of national security and fear of communism, more security measures were added, and race was no longer considered a barrier to citizenship. Quotas were given to a number of Asian countries for the first time, and spouses of American women were included as a nonquota class of immigrants. As Mexican illegal border crossings were becoming a concern, border patrol officers were given more authority to investigate and do searches without a warrant.

In 1954, the United States targeted Mexicans who entered the country illegally. They called this concentrated effort Operation Wetback. In the summer of 1954, the U.S. attorney general deported 1 million people that summer, most of whom were Mexicans, but some were citizens.

As the country favored families, relatives of citizens continued to receive preference in immigration matters. The Hart-Cellar Act (1965) added other categories of preference as well—artistic ability and refugee status were two. In addition, this act abolished country quotas but established an overall ceiling of 290,000 new immigrants a year with no more than 20,000 coming from any one particular country.

The United States continued to be concerned with refugees throughout the world, so Congress passed the Refugee Act of 1980 to eliminate refugees from the overall quota established by the Hart-Cellar Act (1965). The Immigration Reform and Control Act (1986) made it illegal for an employer to hire an undocumented immigrant. Additionally, this act provided a pathway to legal citizenship and a new status for seasonal agricultural labor. With this provision, more that 3 million immigrants applied for legal citizenship.

The Immigration Nursing Relief Act (1989 and 1990) sought to aid in the nursing shortage in the United States. The act gave an option for a registered nonimmigrant nurse to gain permanent residence in the United States if he or she had been working in the United States for a minimum of three years and met certification standards. In 1999, the Nursing Relief to Disadvantaged Areas Act provided for vacancies in rural and urban areas.

The Immigration Act (1990) raised the ceiling on immigration to 700,000 for 1995 and 675,000 thereafter. There was also a limit placed on certain visas. The Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigration Responsibility Act of 1996 required new immigrants to have higher standards of self-sufficiency than in the past. Additionally, it provided more resources for officials to prevent illegal immigration. It also made it more difficult for undocumented immigrants to convert their status to legal.

Conclusion

On September 11, 2001, the United States survived three foreign terrorist attacks on American soil. This marked changes in national security that influenced immigration. In 2002, the PATRIOT Act and the Enhanced Border Security and Visa Entry Reform Act made it more difficult to enter the country and gave officials greater authority in detaining and deporting foreigners. Foreigners from a number of countries (most of them predominately Muslim) age 16 and older were required to register, and thousands were forced to start the deportation process. The Homeland Security Act of 2002 abolished the Immigration and Naturalization Service, moving these services from the Department of Justice to the Department of Homeland Security.

Christine K. Fulmer
Cedarville University

See Also: Acculturation; Cross-Cultural Skills; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; DREAM Act, The; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights; Executive Orders; Immigrant Populations, Human Services Needs of; Power, Race/Ethnicity and; Refugee Assistance; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Anderson, S. Immigration. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2010.
Daniels, R. Guarding the Golden Door: American Immigration Policy and Immigrants Since 1882. New York: Hill and Wang, 2004.
Schrag, P. Not Fit for Our Society: Immigration and Nativism in America. Berkley: University of California Press, 2010.
Stephenson, G. M. A History of American Immigration. Boston: Ginn and Company, 1926.

Immunization

Immunization is a process in which people are made immune or resistant to infectious diseases, typically by the administration of vaccines. Vaccination has proven successful as a relatively low-cost, low-risk means of protecting populations from certain diseases, several of which have nearly been eradicated in many parts of the world. Although smallpox was still endemic in Africa and Asia in the 1960s, by 1980, after decades of fighting the disease on a global scale through efforts by the World Health Organization's (WHO) Smallpox Eradication Programme (1966–80), the World Health Assembly endorsed a statement declaring smallpox eradicated. The eradication program rid the world of a disease that once killed up to 35 percent of its victims and left millions others scarred or blind. After the measles vaccine was licensed in the United States in 1963, measles began to decline by 1965, with a record low reported in 1998, with only 89 cases and no measles-associated deaths. Such statistics indicate the benefit of immunization in preventing death of debilitating diseases that are otherwise preventable.

There are two kinds of immunizations, or vaccinations. The first is active immunization, among the greatest achievements in public health. This kind of immunization naturally occurs when a person comes into contact with a microbe. If the person does not come into contact with it, no premade antibodies are made by the body for defense. A healthy immune system creates antibodies against the microbe, so the next time the body comes into contact with it, the person is immune. This frequently happens with childhood infections that a person contracts once then is immune to thereafter. Passive immunization occurs when elements of the immune system are transferred to a person so that the body does not need to produce its own antibodies. While antibodies can be used for passive immunization, this method does not last as long because the body is unable to produce more antibodies to continue the immunization. This kind of immunization physiologically occurs when antibodies are transferred from the mother to the fetus during pregnancy as a measure of protecting the fetus before and immediately after birth. Artificial passive immunization occurs when an injection is given. This is used if there is a recent outbreak of a disease or in emergency situations; for example, in order to treat tetanus.

Proof of immunization is often required by law in order for children to attend school or adults to enroll in college. An immunization registry, or the Immunization Information System, is a private, population-based, computerized system attempting to collect vaccination data about people in a specific geographic area. This is done by collecting immunization records from several sources for every person living in the specific area. It is an important tool because it has the potential to increase and sustain high vaccination coverage; by consolidating vaccination records of both adults and children, health care providers are better able to forecast the timeliness of doses, recall vaccination notices, provide official vaccination forms, and create vaccination coverage assessments. One goal of this system is to work toward more consistency is vaccination of children under 6 years old. Since 1990, great declines in morbidity have been reported for nine diseases that are preventable with vaccination. While different strains continue to challenge standard vaccinations, immunization overall is seen as a way to encourage the body's natural defenses, and research continues to seek out vaccinations for diseases that have been thought of as otherwise incurable and deadly.

The U.S. Center for Disease Control has collaborated with the WHO and Rotary International to work toward eradicating polio, accelerating control of measles, and globally expanding rubella vaccination programs. Still, childhood vaccination programs in particular are in need of development. An article published in The Lancet in 1998 made a link between the measles-mumps-rubella (MMR) vaccine and autism, resulting in parents declining to vaccinate their children as infants or demanding an alternative immunization schedule. While the study was later discredited, it continues to provide justification for some UK and U.S. parents to refrain from vaccinating their children as recommended. Global travel has significantly shrunk the world, making it an increasingly probable danger that a child could pick up a disease from a person of another country through airplane travel.

Immunization and Cultural Differences

Bright Futures, a group associated with the American Academy of Pediatrics, began a project designed to respond to the health needs of infants, children, and adolescents. Sponsored by the Maternal and Child Health Bureau of the U.S. Public Health Service and the Medicaid Bureau of the Health Care Financing Administration, over 100 professionals came together to think about disease prevention and health promotion for children. Bright Futures retains guidelines that support the belief that effective health supervision must be enacted via a partnership between family and health professionals. The organization aims to be sensitive to culturally specific requirements and needs, but also to educate families about vaccination and preventative health care.

A U.S. Navy hospital corpsman affiliated with the Military Sealift Command hospital ship USNS Comfort gives a civilian patient an immunization shot at Angelica Flores School, August 17, 2007. Comfort was on a four-month humanitarian deployment to Latin America and the Caribbean. Vaccination has proven successful as a relatively low-cost means of protection from certain diseases.

Bright Futures is an example of a public organization that seeks to provide health guidelines for a wide range of culturally diverse children. Its guidelines include promoting healthy nutrition, oral health, immunization recommendations, hearing and vision screenings, and psychosocial and behavioral assessments. Measurements, screenings, assessments, and physical examinations are recommended for all the pediatric life stages, from infancy to adolescence.

These recommendations are for pediatric health care providers, but are complicated by culturally specific beliefs about health care. Certain religious belief systems prefer alternative perspectives on vaccination that differ with the majority medical recommendations. These are based on ethical dilemmas caused by the use of human tissue to create vaccines and the belief that the body is sacred and should only be healed by natural means or God. Polio eradication in Pakistan has been thwarted by the Taliban, which in a strategy to oppose U.S. intervention in the region issued fatwas against polio vaccinators, six of whom were shot dead in Karachi and Peshawar in 2012. Opposition to polio vaccination efforts in Nigeria were the result of claims that vaccines were contaminated with HIV. Christian Scientists have no formal antivaccination policy but overwhelmingly rely on prayer for healing. Several major measles outbreaks originating in religious communities opposed to vaccination—in Philadelphia in 1990, in Illinois and Missouri in 1994, and in Indiana in 2005—signal a need for continued communication and collaboration between health officials, religious and cultural organization leaders, and the public regarding acceptable and effective immunization policies and practices.

Global Disparities

Immunization efforts are also complicated by economic disparity. Social resistance to vaccines as a cause of autism is less common in low- and middle-income countries rather than in high-income countries. Vaccine-preventable deaths are visible, increasing the acceptance of immunization. Confusion and fear of new vaccines, such as initial misunderstandings about the polio vaccine, exist in some low- and middle-income countries. The main contributing factor to lack of vaccination in low-income countries is cost of vaccines and their implementation. Although the WHO introduced the Expanded Programme on Immunization during the 1970s, this effective public health intervention is still not accessible to all, particularly those in low-income countries. Immunization plays an important role in achieving the UN Millennium Development Goal of reducing under-5 mortality by two-thirds between 1990 and 2015. While poliomyelitis (polio), for example, was eliminated by widespread vaccination in the Western Hemisphere in 1994, it continues to circulate in several countries, including Afghanistan, Nigeria, and Pakistan. Public health experts report that vaccinations prevent 2.5 million child deaths per year.

However, if existing vaccines were made available to 90 percent of the global under-5 population, an additional 2 million lives would be saved. Initiatives such as the Decade of Vaccines Collaboration and the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunisation (GAVI) continue to bridge health disparities. GAVI, a body of specialists from WHO, UNICEF, government ministries, the pharmaceutical industry, the World Bank, the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, and finance organizations including the International Finance Facility for Immunisation, promotes investment for immunization in low-income countries. By highlighting connections between physical health—via immunization—and enhanced economic health in low-income countries, GAVI encourages investors to help fund closing the gap between children in high-income countries for whom immunization is a given and millions of children worldwide with no access to basic vaccines.

Stephanie Salerno
Lara Lengel
Bowling Green State University

See Also: Immunization Campaigns; Maternal/Infant Health Services; Public Health.

Further Readings

American Academy of Pediatrics. "Reaffirmation: Responding to Parents Who Refuse Immunization for Their Children." Pediatrics, v.131 (2013).

Wenjing, Tao, Max Petzold, and Birger Forsberg. "Routine Vaccination Coverage in Low- and Middle-Income Countries: Further Arguments for Accelerating Support to Child Vaccination Services." Global Health Action, v.6 (2013).

World Health Organization. Global Vaccine Action Plan, 2011–2020. Geneva: WHO, 2013.

Immunization Campaigns

Immunization campaigns are designed to increase awareness and encourage the general public to vaccinate, both adults and children, depending on the illness, as a measure of maintaining public health and preventing otherwise unnecessary illness. Campaigns are designed to encourage education and protect the medical profession by sharing information that will explain benefits of vaccination within the larger public sphere. The medical profession considers immunization awareness an ethical obligation, so patients are aware of protections against preventable diseases.

Vaccination was endorsed in Europe and the United States in the early 19th century. Immunization campaigns first came about as a result of a smallpox outbreak in the United States in the late 19th century. Mass campaigns occurred in the mid-20th century. Since then, most large-scale vaccination campaigns have been found to be very effective, helping eradicate smallpox and nearly eradicate polio. In 1988, the vaccine to prevent Haemophilius influenzae, a major cause of bacterial meningitis, decreased occurance of the disease by more than 99 percent. Full vaccination in children in the United States saves thousands of lives and prevents well over 10 million infections.

While there is widespread support of immunization, anti-vaccination campaigns have countered efforts to encourage immunization. Opponents of vaccination argue that the drop in infections result from improved sanitation and hygienic education or that the natural decline of these diseases are incidental, with studies attempting to prove immunization effectiveness. Another argument suggests vaccines are temporary and require boosters, while those who survive disease become permanently immune. While most parents understand children benefit from early vaccination, often lack of information, including risk assessments, perceptions that diseases children are vaccinated against initially have changed, challenges negotiating complicated immunization schedules for infants and young children, and exposure to anti-vaccine movements that are not countered with pro-vaccine information impact parents' perceptions of immunization, leading to fear, confusion, and large numbers of underimmunized children. This is complicated by herd immunity, a form of immunity occurring when vaccinated populations provide some protection for individuals who have not developed immunity. This leads to skepticism and mistrust of the pharmaceutical industry as well as governmental legislation requiring immunization. This tension makes it difficult for pediatricians to vaccinate as they see fit. Such risks are very personal, and risks of what might happen as a result of vaccination overshadow risks of developing very serious, and mostly preventable, diseases. An example of how anti-vaccine and vaccine campaigns work from both sides of an issue resulted from a 1998 Lancet article reporting autism as a possible side effect of the measles, mumps, and rubella (MMR) vaccine. Studies since then have no conclusive findings linking autism to MMR immunization in young children.

Immunizations for common preventable illnesses, such as measles, mumps, and rubella, for instance, are not the only types of vaccines offered to children. Each year, there are flu shots available to adults that work to prevent or lessen symptoms of the influenza virus and the pneumonia shot, designed to protect against common bacterial pneumonias. The outbreak of swine flu, or H1N1 virus, in 2009 led to a vaccine that treated a specific strain of influenza, which proved severe for children and adults alike. Giving evidence of public sentiment about vaccination at the time, the Pew Research Center reported in its survey of more than 1,000 adults that 47 percent would not get the voluntary H1N1 immunization. The government's response to H1N1 was critiqued for not matching the reality of the situation, arguably because the flu was not as lethal as it originally appeared. However, death is not the only reason to vaccinate; swine flu was highly contagious and problematic in schools and workplaces.

When mass immunization campaigns are enacted, many people are vaccinated in a short amount of time. Such campaigns, frequently used in developing countries but even in the United States, pose safety challenges because, often, vaccinations are implemented outside of typical health care settings, making monitoring safety and health a necessity, so if there is a problem, action can be taken to intervene as soon as possible.

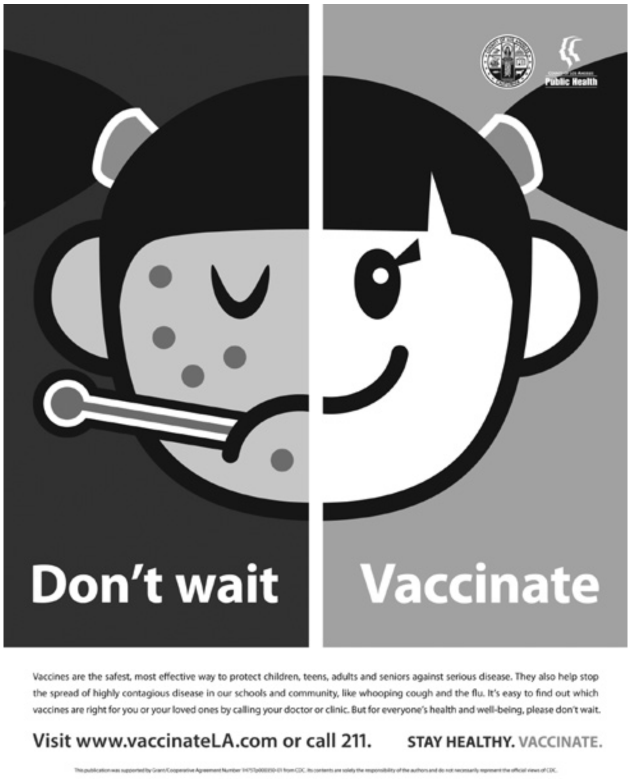
Immunization campaigns are set up so that many, often hundreds, of clinics in a specific area become the site of mass immunization. Seasonal flu vaccines might be offered to older children and adults so long as a guardian accompanies minors. Specially altered vaccines, such as the FluMist nasal spray, are offered to healthy people within a particular age range, or preservative-free vaccines are offered to pregnant women. Pneumonia vaccines might also be offered to adults who are healthy enough, according to criteria set by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). Insurance is often accepted at mass immunization locations.

Campaigns and Cultural Sensitivity

Campaigns must adapt to population differences because not all populations are of the same socioeconomic status or share religious, ethnic, or cultural beliefs. Such health promotion is required in order to fully reach target audiences in a culturally and linguistically competent manner, reflecting understanding and respect toward difference that functions cross-culturally and does not marginalize intended populations. This is done by creating health promotion materials that reflect the health beliefs and practices of specific audiences as well as the values of the health care providers who develop scientific bases for campaigns. Such campaign materials are linguistically competent if they also acknowledge that not all community members have the same literacy skills or ability to take in the materials.

Diversity must be approached in a comprehensive manner to assure that culturally diverse populations not only have different kinds of access to health promotion materials and education but access to health care as well. For example, several studies on ethnicity and socioeconomic status attempt to explain why human papillomavirus (HPV) vaccination rates are lower for African American women, Latinas, and women from Appalachia, concluding education is often a major factor in the decision to vaccinate. Given that cervical cancer is more common and is associated with higher mortality in Latina and African American women than in white women, researchers argue it is especially important to understand barriers to HPV vaccination. Awareness of the federal Vaccines for Children program is key to understanding that the vaccine, which costs $390 to those without insurance, can be covered for uninsured or underinsured children under age 19.

Increasing access of marginalized populations to health care professionals with accurate information can make campaigns more successful; assuming people understand the reason and schedule for a particular vaccine is assuming privilege of socioeconomic status, education, access to public or private health, and regular health care. For example, a study on vaccinations among community pharmacy and noncommunity pharmacy patients reported a greater number of whites (60.9 percent) received influenza vaccination than African Americans (49.1 percent) and Latinos and Latinas (51.7 percent). Vaccination rates were higher among community pharmacy patients, but racial disparities indicate the need for continued and increased education among minority populations. An example of a successful influenza vaccination campaign is that of the Whiteriver Service Unit, a rural Arizona Indian Health Service hospital that implemented a multidisciplinary campaign in collaboration with the White Mountain Apache Tribe Health Board and Tribal Council, disseminating information in the Apache language via the tribal radio station broadcasts and a tribal elder conference, school and home visits, and community health classes.



Vaccines are the safest, most effective way to protect children, teens, adults and seniors against serious disease. They also help stop the spread of highly contagious disease in our schools and community, like whooping cough and the flu. It's easy to find out which vaccines are right for you or your loved ones by calling your doctor or clinic. But for everyone's health and well-being, please don't wait.

Visit www.vaccinateLA.com or call 211. STAY HEALTHY. VACCINATE.

This poster was used in the Los Angeles County Department of Public Health multimedia public education campaign urging parents and caretakers to get their entire families vaccinated.

Another example is the National Hispanic Council on Aging (NHCOA), which trains Latino and Latina community members as promotores de salud (layperson health practitioners) for the national Vacunémonos (Let's Get Vaccinated) immunization education program. Originally sponsored by the CDC, Vacunémonos is a culturally and linguistically sensitive and age-appropriate program raising awareness among Latino and Latina older adults, their families, and caregivers about the importance of vaccinations. Because Latino and Latina seniors get immunized at lower rates than other seniors, promotores de salud, chosen for their leadership roles as trusted and well-known members within their respective communities, promote the importance of lifelong immunizations to prevent infectious diseases among seniors, their families, and their broader communities. Promotores de salud help reduce barriers affecting vaccination rates, including lack of education and social support networks, and advise on and distribute culturally and linguistically appropriate materials such as NHCOA's Vacunémonos brochure, which includes easy-to-read details about infectious diseases for which all adults should get vaccinated, explanations on the importance of immunization, and immunization schedules. Similar to Vacunémonos, the American Indian and Alaska Native Vaccination campaign, Protect the Circle of Life: Immunize Our Nations, contributes to increasing immunization rates among diverse communities through layperson health practitioners who empower their fellow community members to improve their quality of life.

Stephanie Salerno
Lara Lengel
Bowling Green State University

See Also: Communicable Diseases Common in Developing Countries; Fundamentalist Christian Americans; Global Burden of Disease; Global South/Global North; Health as a Human Right; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Disparities, Role of; Maternal/Infant Health Services; Indian Health Service; National Healthcare Disparities Reports; Neonatal Care; Pandemics; Public Health.

Further Readings

Colgrove, James. State of Immunity: The Politics of Vaccination in Twentieth-Century America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2006.

Eblen, Anna L. and Eblen, Martha Jane. Betty Bumpers: Champion of Childhood Immunization and Peace. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2013.

Gelman, Amanda, et al. "Racial Disparities in Human Papillomavirus Vaccination: Does Access Matter?" Journal of Adolescent Health, v.53 (2013).

Perkins, Rebecca, et al. "Correlates of Human Papillomavirus Vaccination Rates in Low-Income, Minority Adolescents: A Multicenter Study." Journal of Women's Health, v.21 (2012).

Reiter, Paul, Katz Mira, and Electra Paskett. "Correlates of HPV Vaccination Among Adolescent Females From Appalachia and Reasons Why Their Parents Do Not Intend to Vaccinate." Vaccine, v.31 (2013).

Traeger, Mark, et al. "Bridging Disparity: A Multidisciplinary Approach for Influenza Vaccination in an American Indian Community." American Journal of Public Health, v.96 (2006).

Wang, Junling, Kiraat Munshi, and Song Hee Hong, "Racial and Ethnic Disparities in Influenza Vaccinations Among Community Pharmacy Patients and Non-Community Pharmacy Respondents." Research in Social and Administrative Pharmacy, v.10 (2014).

Wilson, Rula, et al. "Knowledge and Acceptability of the HPV Vaccine Among Ethnically Diverse Black Women." Journal of Immigrant and Minority Health, v.15 (2013).

Yeganeha, Nava, Donna Curtis, and Alice Kuo. "Factors Influencing HPV Vaccination Status in a Latino Population; and Parental Attitudes Towards Vaccine Mandates." Vaccine, v.28 (2010).

Implicit Bias

An implicit bias is an unconscious preference. In the context of social justice, implicit biases reflect deep-seated preferences against members of a particular group. Unconscious processes may not be reflective of conscious processes. For example, in the civil rights movements of the 1960s, millions of baby boomers made conscious decisions and took decisive action to promote equality of race and gender. The unconscious mind, however, harbors everything to which it is exposed. The baby boom began in 1946, when people overtly expressed racial prejudice and gender roles advantaged males. Despite their social activism, the baby boomers had a high rate of exposure to messages of bias from early childhood. Implicit associations are unconscious cognitions based upon these early messages. The psychological community generally agrees with Freud's topographical model of the mind that estimates more than 90 percent of the mind's processes as unconscious. The content of the unconscious mind is not available for evaluation. It is difficult to determine empirically how much the unconscious mind influences preferences and decisions. Also unknown is whether material held in the unconscious mind is malleable.

Impact on Social Justice

A stereotype is an assumption about a group that is based upon learned associations about that group. It is possible for a person to consciously reject stereotypes and promote social activism while maintaining an implicit bias. Prejudice is an unfavorable evaluation of a group without having any experience with that group. The roots of prejudice are in implicit bias, and discrimination is unfair treatment of a marginalized group that arises out of prejudice. People with implicit biases behave differently toward those against whom they hold biases, even though they are unaware of those biases. Observable, quantifiable behaviors that are associated with implicit biases include differences in eye contact, differences in how verbalizations are directed, and proxemics.

Social injustices that arise from implicit biases are innumerable. In the legal system, bias is evident at every level. A black man striking a white woman draws more negative attention than a white man striking a black woman. Racial profiling relies on stereotypes about race or ethnicity rather than on reasonable suspicion to place an individual under scrutiny. Research shows that white jurors convict darker-skinned defendants at a higher rate than white defendants. Black defendants are also likely to incur longer sentences. Employment discrimination disadvantages women and minorities through unfair hiring practices, failure to mentor, failure to promote, and unfair wages. In the areas of housing, education, service, and health care, implicit bias can override social consciousness.

Micro-Aggression

Implicit bias has been associated with micro-aggression. Micro-aggressions are nonphysical exchanges that demean a person of another race, gender, age, or ability. Micro-aggressions can be verbal, nonverbal, visual, or behavioral and often are carried out unconsciously. Micro-aggressions are categorized as micro-assaults, micro-insults, and micro-invalidation. Micro-assault refers to verbal or nonverbal attacks intended to convey discriminatory and biased sentiment and include using derogatory names for race, gender, or sexual orientation. Micro-insults are unintentional behaviors or comments demonstrating insensitivity or demeaning a person's race, ethnicity, gender identity, or sexual orientation identity. Examples of micro-insults are assuming less capability in a person of color, suggesting that values and communication styles of people of color are abnormal, and racial profiling. Micro-invalidations are comments or behaviors that are dismissive of a group's beliefs or feelings. Assuming that people who appear racially different are foreigners, asserting that a white person does not see race, or diminishing the importance of race and racism are micro-invalidations.

Project Implicit

In 1995, researchers from several universities, including Harvard, hypothesized that memories stored in the unconscious mind do influence actions. Project Implicit was developed to do research and provide training on implicit bias, diversity, and inclusion. The Implicit Association Test (IAT) is a computer-based method for measuring implicit attitudes. The IAT entails a subject looking at images and immediately responding by striking a computer key that indicates the immediate association. For example, if two computer keys represent art and science respectively, the subject strikes the key that represents his or her immediate response to photographs of males and females that are randomly flashed on the screen. The types of associations measured by the IAT can reflect a positive or negative response, a stereotype, or self-esteem (which requires the subject to associate him- or herself with the image.) The IAT has been criticized for a lack of reliability and the effects of cognitive differences in subjects that might affect response times along with comparisons between the IAT results and the subjects' self-reported explicit attitudes, which subjects may be unable or unwilling to accurately articulate. Subsequent studies challenge the assumptions that the unconscious mind has more influence than the conscious mind, and the IAT is openly available on the Internet, not as a study but as a tool for increasing self-awareness.

Decreasing Implicit Bias

Diversity training in schools and workplaces has not been effective at decreasing implicit bias and has been shown to increase difficulties in some settings. In the workplace, creating diverse work teams has proven more effective in creating an inclusive environment. Some health care settings have had success in decreasing provider bias by promoting individuation of patients and deemphasizing categorization. In the legal system, training sessions on implicit bias and administration of the IAT are viable strategies. The overarching strategy for decreasing implicit bias is increasing awareness of the dynamics of implicit bias and its negative effects on social justice.

Nicoletta C. Nance
Beacon College

See Also: Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Conflict Resolution and Diversity Cultural Competence; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Prejudice, Theories of.

Further Readings

Burgess, Diana, Michelle van Ryn, John Dovidio, and Somanth Saha. "Reducing Racial Bias Among Health Care Providers: Lessons From Social-Cognitive Psychology." Journal of Internal Medicine, v.26 (2007).

Robinson-Wood, Tracey L. The Convergence of Race, Ethnicity, and Gender. Princeton, NC: Merrill, 2012.

Wing Sue, Derald. Counseling the Culturally Diverse: Theory and Practice. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2012.

Wittenbrink, Bernd and Norbert Schwarz, eds. Implicit Measures of Attitudes. New York: Guilford, 2007.

Incarceration and Sentencing, Racial Disparities in

The United States has the highest incarceration rate in the world, even higher than Russia and China. Despite the fact that only about 5 percent of the world's population lives in the United States, more than one-quarter of the world's prisoners are incarcerated in U.S. prisons. The U.S. prison population has exploded since the 1980s, increasing from around 300,000 to more than 2.2 million in 2010. This increase represents an over 800 percent increase in approximately 25 years.

This dramatic increase in the prison population is directly linked to the U.S. war on drugs, a set of federal policies passed under the Nixon administration that were instituted based upon the belief that drugs were the root of most serious crimes in the United States. The passage of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986 instituted harsh criminal penalties for drug offenses, including minimum federal sentencing mandates for the possession and sale of certain drugs presumed to be particularly dangerous.

The rate of incarceration in response to the passage of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986 has not increased evenly across all demographics. Rather, the rate of incarceration among ethnic minority populations has increased significantly over other groups, with approximately 60 percent of the U.S. prison population representing racial and minority groups. For instance, although African Americans comprise approximately 13 percent of the U.S. population, they comprise nearly 40 percent of the U.S. prison population. Hispanics are also overrepresented in the prison population.

Overrepresentation of ethnic minority populations in prison does not appear to be caused by an increased number of ethnic minorities committing crimes. Rather, it appears as though institutionalized racism may be to blame where disparity in criminal investigative policies and sentencing guidelines, particularly with drug offenses, frequently leads to a higher number of ethnic minorities being charged and convicted of certain crimes and then receiving longer sentences. Research has consistently supported what social justice advocates have known for years—that Caucasians use and sell drugs at similar rates as ethnic minorities, and yet they are often not the target of law enforcement efforts, do not tend to be criminally charged at the same rates as ethnic minorities, and if they are arrested and charged, they do not tend to receive as harsh of punishments as ethnic minorities arrested for similar offenses. Additionally, drugs that are more frequently used by ethnic minorities often require much harsher sentences than drugs more frequently used by Caucasians. For instance, federal drug sentencing guidelines implemented after the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986 created gross inequities in sentencing between crack cocaine (used more often by ethnic minorities) and powder cocaine (used more frequently by upper-income Caucasians), where five ounces of crack cocaine would be punished at the same level as 500 ounces of powder cocaine. Additionally, five ounces of crack cocaine would automatically trigger a mandatory five-year prison sentence, and 10 ounces would trigger a mandatory 10-year sentence as stipulated by mandated federal sentencing guidelines. Conversely, individuals who possessed the same amounts of powder cocaine were eligible for probation.

Many believe that these sentencing disparities were rooted in racial stereotypes because crack cocaine tends to be used more by ethnic minorities, particularly African Americans, whereas cocaine tends to be used more by Caucasians, particularly those with higher incomes. Other racial stereotypes included perceptions that crack cocaine was more closely connected to gang activity and urban violence and was more addictive than powder cocaine. In essence, it appears as though Congress voted to punish crack cocaine use disproportionately as a part of the war on drugs based on misperceptions that crack cocaine was more dangerous and more closely associated with gang activity—a perception that is not supported by research. In reality, the majority of crack cocaine offenders are black, while the majority of powder cocaine users are Hispanics, followed by Caucasians, and despite research that indicates similarities in personal and social impact of these two drugs, black crack cocaine offenders have consistently received significantly harsher sentences than powder cocaine users.

The Fair Sentencing Act of 2010, signed into law in August of 2013, was President Barack Obama's attempt at rectifying this injustice. This act reduced the disparity between the amounts of similar drugs and also eliminated the automatic five- and 10-year prison sentences for possessing five and 10 ounces of crack cocaine (respectively). While this legislation represents an attempt to confront racial inequities responsible for the overrepresentation of ethnic minorities in the U.S. prison system, further reforms are still needed.

Unfortunately, the populations that have been decimated the most by the disparity in drug sentencing laws are African American male youth and young adults, two already disenfranchised populations. While the war on drugs purported to be targeting drug kingpins, in reality, it appeared to target low-level ethnic minority male youth, who were often targeted by the kingpins as vulnerable to being recruited into the gang and drug culture due to the high rates of poverty in many black urban communities. Thus, rather than targeting and prosecuting leaders of the drug trade, many young black men have been targeted, often during their adolescent years, charged as adults, and sent to federal prison, sometimes for decades. In fact, youth of color are highly overrepresented in the juvenile justice system compared to white youth, a disparity that is not explained in differential rates of delinquency.

Black youth in particular are overrepresented in the juvenile justice system, experiencing higher rates of arrest than white youth who have committed similar offences, are prosecuted at higher rates compared to white youth, are charged more frequently as adults than are white youth having committed similar offenses, and are consistently detained for longer periods of time. Additionally, black youth are more frequently transferred to adult prison, even when charged as juveniles, than white youth who have committed similar offenses. Some of the reasons for this disproportionate treatment relate to the selective enforcement and targeting of certain types of delinquent behavior, racial disparity in treatment options, socioeconomic factors such as poverty, racially biased risk assessment tools, unequal access to effective legal representation, and as referenced earlier, legislative policies that impact offenders of color more harshly.

The impact of the racial disparity in incarceration on communities of color and society as a whole is significant and has resulted in the disenfranchisement of a significant portion of the ethnic minority population, leading many social justice advocates to frame disparities in legislative and sentencing laws as yet another example of institutionalized racism. For instance, almost all states prohibit voting while in prison, and a majority of states prohibit voting while on probation or parole. In Florida, for instance, nearly one in five black men are not able to vote due to their legal status related to drug offenses. Some estimate that nearly 40 percent of black men in the United States will permanently lose their right to vote due to drug offences at nearly 40 percent. In addition to the passage of the Fair Sentencing Act of 2010, several states have passed legislation in an attempt to address issues related to disenfranchisement, but advocates assert that federal and state corrective actions must address racial disparities in retrospect in order to amend the unequal treatment the potentially millions of people of color have experienced in the past three decades, often resulting in being sent to prison for 20 years, or even life, when white offenders, if charged, have received minimal sentences by comparison. Additional areas needing increased focus, particularly by human services professionals, include the extremely negative impact that such disparities in sentencing have on ethnic minority families, particularly youth whose parents are incarcerated.

Michelle Martin
DePaul University

See Also: African Americans; At-Risk Youth Services; Juvenile Justice System; Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention; Power, Race/Ethnicity and; Prisoners and Ex-Prisoners; Racism, Long-Term Effects of.

Further Readings

Alexander, M. The New Jim Crow: Mass Incarceration in the Age of Colorblindness. New York: The New Press, 2012.

Gorton, J. and J. L. Boies. "Sentencing Guidelines and Racial Disparity Across Time: Pennsylvania Prison Sentences in 1977, 1983, 1992, and 1993." Social Science Quarterly, v.80/1 (1999).

Kautt, P. and C. Spohn. "Cracking Down on Black Drug Offenders? Testing for Interactions Among Offenders' Race, Drug Type, and Sentencing Strategy in Federal Drug Sentences." Justice Quarterly, v.19/1 (2002).

Mauer, M. and R. S. King. Uneven Justice: State Rates of Incarceration by Race and Ethnicity. Washington, DC: Sentencing Project, 2007.

Mauer, M. and T. Huling. Young Black Americans and the Criminal Justice System: Five Years Later. Washington, DC: Sentencing Project, 1995.

Mustard, D. B. "Racial, Ethnic, and Gender Disparities in Sentencing: Evidence From the U.S. Federal Courts." Journal of Law and Economics, v.44/1 (2001).

Pettit, B. and B. Western. "Mass Imprisonment and the Life Course: Race and Class Inequality in U.S. Incarceration." American Sociological Review, v.69/2 (2004).

Indian Boarding Schools

During the 19th and 20th centuries, a variety of boarding schools were established to serve Indian children from various tribes across the United States. Some of these boarding schools were national in nature, taking students from a variety of tribes across the country, while others were established specifically to serve children from a specific tribe or region. While the Indian boarding schools were initially established by missionaries, the United States government soon began founding its own schools. Pedagogical methods used in the Indian boarding schools did not meet contemporary standards of practice, as school personnel forcibly cut children's hair, forced them to speak English, and disparaged their home cultures. Although some Indian boarding schools still exist, most Native American children are now educated in schools located near their homes.

Although schools that served Indian children had been extant in the United States since colonial times, after the Civil War, many religious groups organized new schools to serve Native American students. In 1879, Richard Henry Pratt, a captain in the United States Army, founded the Carlisle Indian Industrial School in Carlisle, Pennsylvania. The Carlisle School was the first in the United States and was placed at the site of the Carlisle Barracks, an important army base during the Civil War. Pratt believed that Indian children needed to learn English and adopt European American ways of dress, eating, and work. To that end, Pratt sought to help Indian children distance themselves from traditional ways. Through discussions with tribal elders, Pratt convinced many that they had been cheated in treaties with Caucasians because of their inability to read and write. In order to prevent this from recurring, the elders agreed to send their children to the Carlisle School.

The Carlisle School quickly grew to serve more than 1,000 students. The curriculum emphasized

With the founding of the Carlisle Indian Industrial School in 1879 in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, the U.S. government launched an effort at what is now called cultural genocide where Indian children were taken away from their families and put into boarding schools for three or more years. The school quickly grew to serve more than 1,000 students, although only 158 students ever graduated.

English, mathematics, history, art, and vocational training. Many of the Indian children who arrived at the Carlisle School were unable to speak English, and some students who had been there longer served as interpreters. The methods of the Carlisle School have been questioned as allegations of abuse, punishment for not speaking English, and maltreatment have been made. Indeed, of the more than 12,000 children the Carlisle School served before it closed in 1918, fewer than 8 percent graduated, while twice that number ran away. Children from more than 140 tribes were enrolled at the Carlisle School, and its influence, both positive and negative, was great.

Despite the controversy associated with the Carlisle School, the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) used it as a model for other boarding schools for Native American children. As a result, the BIA formed 26 other boarding schools across the United States. More than 400 religious organizations also founded boarding schools for Indian children, and many of these also adopted practices first used by the Carlisle School, including giving the children English names, cutting their hair, using corporal punishment, forcing conversions to Christianity, and prohibiting the use of native languages or religious practices. In addition to their academic work, Indian children were forced to engage in chores involving the preparation of meals, cleaning, and farming.

During the 1920s, changing mores led the federal government to reassess its practices with educating Indian children. As a result, in 1926, the United States Department of the Interior engaged the Institute for Government Research (later known as the Brookings Institution) to conduct a study of the efficacy of Indian education programs. In 1928, the results of this study, “The Problem of Indian Administration,” (commonly known as the Meriam Report) were issued. The Meriam Report was highly critical of how the Department of the Interior administered Indian schools and issued a call for change. While the Meriam Report applauded the importance placed by the BIA on Indian education, it decried its implementation. Instead of educating Indian children at separate schools, the Meriam Report called for integrating these students into mainstream schools. With regard to the Indian boarding schools, the Meriam Report found their operation to be inadequate and subpar. Specifically, the Meriam Report decried the diet and medical services provided to the Indian children, found them overcrowded and overly reliant upon student labor, and believed that the uniform curriculum did little to raise teacher standards or student performance.

While immediate changes did not take place in Indian boarding schools, the Meriam Report presaged reform of the system. John Collier, who served as the commissioner of the BIA from 1933 until 1945, was instrumental in changing the assimilationist policies favored until that time. Collier, who later taught at the City College of New York and Knox College, was instrumental in assuring the passage of the Indian Reorganization Act of 1934, which restored local self-government to many tribes. The Indian Reorganization Act also ended many of the educational policies that favored assimilation and helped reservations to reacquire lands that had been lost. These changes laid the foundation for many later transformations to the education of Indian children.

Despite the controversy regarding Indian boarding schools and the criticism of them in the Meriam Report, as institutions, they continued to thrive for the next five decades. Indeed, enrollment in Indian boarding schools reached its zenith during the 1970s, when more than 60,000 students attended such institutions. After this, changing tribal demands for appropriate educational experiences resulted in the construction of many more schools located near Indian children's homes, diminishing the need for boarding schools. A variety of Indian boarding schools still exist today, although they enroll fewer than 10,000 children. Such Indian boarding schools that continue to exist are highly regulated to avoid the problems of the past and are intended to provide expanded educational opportunities to Native American children who live in isolated locations.

Special curriculum, focusing on science, technology, engineering, mathematics, the arts, or other combinations are frequently the draw that attracts Indian children to their offerings. Other former boarding schools, such as St. Michael Indian School in St. Michael, Arizona, continue to operate as day schools but have eliminated their residential component.

Stephen T. Schroth
Diana L. Beck
Knox College

See Also: Abuse and Neglect; Educational Services; Indian Child Welfare Act; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; National Congress of American Indians; Native Americans.

Further Reading

Adams, D. W. Education for Extinction: American Indians and the Boarding School Experience, 1875–1928. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1995.
Child, B. J. Boarding School Seasons: American Indian Families, 1900–1940. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2000.
Jacobs, M. D. "A Battle for the Children: American Indian Child Removal—Arizona in the Era of Assimilation." Journal of Arizona History, v.45/1 (2004).

Indian Child Welfare Act

The Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), United States Code Title 25, governs jurisdiction over the removal of Native American children from families and gives tribal governments a voice in child custody cases when a child is a ward of the tribe. This concept of assigning jurisdiction of child custody to tribal governments is a radical and often misunderstood message recognizing that the cultural diversity among Native American tribes is so great that it cannot be judged by nontribal human services. This concept also recognizes that it will take time for tribes to establish or recreate infrastructures without outside interference to address the social challenges that resulted from Indian children being removed from tribal homes. A 1969 survey in 16 states found that about 85 percent of Native American children were placed in nonnative foster homes. While many tribes continue to face poverty that makes delivery of human services difficult, ICWA has provided an opportunity for Native Americans to embrace or reject traditional tribal traditions rather than to be subject to the non-native systems that have sought to alienate Native American children from their own culture.

ICWA came about as a result of the Indian Self Determination and Education Act of 1975. While late-19th-century pro-assimilation reform movements often sought to assimilate Native Americans into mainstream American culture, Congress asserted that preserving Native American traditions trumped assimilation and hoped to protect Native American culture and tribal integrity when state and federal agencies removed children from tribal environments. ICWA recognizes that Native Americans have unique child-rearing practices and traditions that do not fall under the authority of non-Indian values or judgment, and maintaining a child in his or her own home that reflects tribal background is in the best interest of the child and tribe. However, ICWA has been challenged in many states under the non-Indian argument that the 14th Amendment provides equal protection from race-based parental rights. Moreover, the state law implementing ICWA has been found to be constitutionally wanting in California, where many tribes are federally recognized.

The U.S. Supreme Court asserts that federally recognized tribes are domestic dependent nations with a particular relationship to the federal government where the federal government can only exercise plenary authority consistent with that of a guardian toward a ward. State welfare and non-Native American social workers have historically had too much influence on the lives of Native American families: Conflicts of interest arose when parents relied upon social workers for continuing welfare benefits even as the same social workers sought to displace their children. Subsequently, courts rarely consulted with tribal experts on traditional child-rearing practices. A common practice in some Native American communities was to leave a child with extended tribal kin; however, many social workers considered this to be abandonment.

Undoing Violence Against Women and Children

Today, Native Americans living on reservations are challenged to resurrect nurturing cultural traditions destroyed by dominant and aggressive colonizers. In California at the time of the American Revolution, Spanish Franciscans operating missions initiated a system to denaturalize and destabilize the aboriginal sense of self-identity, connectivity, and kinship to the spiritual world, reducing all native people from sophisticated land stewards to children or neophytes. Franciscans established forms of artificial paternal kinship with baptisms of native people, which brought about the demographic collapse of the tribes when Spaniards stood as godparents undermining the authority of tribal headmen within the new political hierarchy. Spanish soldiers further undermined any real potential for kinship when they raped California Indian women, introducing syphilis into mission populations that were unknowingly carried to tribal villages.

Federal Title II funding today for ICWA is insufficient to support even court adoption work without addressing support services to bolster families. Underlying issues threatened Native American families—namely introduction of alcohol into their culture and the destruction of Native American traditions by non-Indians, leading to a catastrophic epidemic of violence against women on reservations. Native American families deal with the same issues of alcohol addiction and methamphetamine use as the dominant American population. However, in many states, up to 35 percent of Native American children have been placed in foster or adoptive homes at some time in their lives. Likewise, Native American children have been removed from homes disproportionate to the dominant population when social workers or judges saw their biological families as unfit by typical cultural standards. Alcohol abuse was cited as the cause for removal in disproportionate numbers to family units with the same challenge in other demographics.

ICWA has been instrumental in educating judges on Native American children and tribal traditions of child rearing, which has promoted multicultural understanding and sensitivity and opened dialogs between state officials and tribal judges. ICWA has strengthened tribal courts and institutions that resolve disputes. It has also proscribed destructive practices that could endanger some tribal societies. More Native American children get placed with extended family members than before the act; however, the rate of Indian children being removed from families remains disproportionately high. While adoption of Native American children into non-Indian homes still occurs, ICWA places conditions on these adoptions that the children get exposure to tribal culture and traditions. Some Native American families are opting to provide foster homes for or to adopt Indian children.

Native American-operated Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) programs provide assistance to needy Native American families so that children can be cared for in their own homes and to promote employment training, job opportunities, and marriage to reduce out-of-wedlock pregnancies. Native TANF's strategy is to encourage the formation of strong families and bolster two-parent families with a total family income at least equal to 125 percent of the federal poverty guidelines for cash assistance, or at risk of welfare dependency, so that they can sustain self-sufficiency.

Meredith Eliassen
San Francisco State University

See Also: Administration for Native Americans; Center for Native American Youth; Indian Boarding Schools; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; Native Americans.

Further Readings

Canby, William C. Jr. American Indian Law in a Nut Shell. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing, 2009.

Jones, B. J., Mark Tilden, and Delley Gaines-Stoner. The Indian Child Welfare Act Handbook: A Legal Guide to the Custody and Adoption of Native American Children. Chicago: American Bar Association, 2008.

Stubben, Jerry D. "Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), United States Code Title 25." In Native Americans and Political Participation: A Reference Handbook. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC Clio, 2006.

U.S. Congress. Hearing Before the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, November 10, 1987. S.Hrg. 100-574. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1987.

Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968

The Indian Civil Rights Act (ICRA) of 1968 was the first piece of legislation from the United States Congress to impose provisions of the United States Bill of Rights on the actions of tribal governments protecting individuals living on reservations. The federal government historically created treaties and initiated negotiations for surrender of tribal lands, but until enactment of ICRA, tribes (due to their extra-constitutional status) were not subject so such constraints. ICRA does not protect tribes or members from federal interests focused on reducing tribal sovereignty or tribal treaty rights. This law provides for due process and other civil liberties in tribal courts. States could no longer assume civil and criminal jurisdiction over Indian land without tribal consent given during special elections, but ICRA limits sentences imposed by tribal courts to misdemeanor jurisdiction in criminal cases. The Native American civil rights struggle coincided with the War on Poverty; it was not just fought for on the reservations but also came out of the trials and tribulations of Native Americans living in urban areas.

Though well intentioned, most significantly, ICRA has created additional challenges for impoverished tribes that do not have funding or resources to secure residents on some reservations facing complexly layered social problems related to alcoholism and substance abuse. As outsiders, federal law enforcement personnel are often too ill prepared and understaffed to operate efficiently on reservations. The Native American per-capita rate for experiencing violence is twice the rate of non-Native Americans in the United States: Adults age 25 to 34 are more than two and a half times more likely to experience violent crime attacks than non-Indian counterparts. One in three Native American women experience sexual violence. The Justice Department found that white Americans committed violent crimes against Native Americans in approximately 60 percent of documented incidents, and alcohol was involved in the vast majority of violent crimes.

The federal government historically wanted to open up tribal lands for settlement. Throughout the 19th century, federal military, state militia, and citizen vigilantes forcibly removed tribes from ancestral lands. The Dawson Act of 1887 allowed for the division of shared community-held reservation lands into 160-acre allotments as a means to get Native Americans to forsake tribal relations and traditional ways in order to become farmers. The black civil rights protests of the late 1950s and 1960s created a model for the American Indian Movement (AIM) to protest the federal government's treatment of native people.

Modern Challenges for Indigenous Women

Women who experience domestic violence, rape, and gang rape have little support and experience retaliation because tribal police are overwhelmed and Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) investigators are not local; they sometimes become triple victims when they report assaults, first by the crime, then by the investigators, and then by tribal males who see them as betraying tribal loyalty. Many tribes operate under constitutions drafted by the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) from the 1930s, providing tribal councils with total executive power over all reservation hiring including judges. A complication in ICRA arose when tribal nations were recognized as corporate and poverty-stricken bodies as a result of becoming separate nations, where tribal councils became sponsoring agencies eligible for federal funding. This recognition mandated councils to provide assistance for all residents of the reservations regardless of race to meet eligibility requirements for federal programs.

Reservations are like large extended families where jobs are offered to family members on the condition that they do not work or speak against the tribe. ICRA attempts to reconcile the need for Western law to the desire of tribes to integrate their tribal traditions into justice systems. It also attempts to reconcile the ability of tribes to govern tribal lands to the rights of non-Indians who cannot hold office or participate in tribal elections. Native Americans have maintained diverse legal systems since prior to European contact. Approximately 20 traditional Native American courts remain that administer unwritten established cultural law where conflicts are resolved. Reservations were perceived as lawless communities without legal systems; the general public sought to impose systems of litigious Western-styled law and order to advance assimilation.

The ICRA guarantees that most but not all sections of the United States Bill of Rights apply to Native American individuals in dealing with their tribal governments, which parallels the protections that U.S. citizens have with state and local governments. ICRA made a significant amount of Constitutional law applicable in tribal courts. In short, it protects the individual rights of all people living on reservations against arbitrary actions by imposing Constitutional norms on tribal government actions to protect the rights of all residents. The United States government under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights covers federally recognized Native American tribes as nations. ICRA protects the free exercise of religion, but tribes can establish their own religious traditions and restrictions.

More than 140 tribes maintain tribal courts, and they are diverse in nature and operation. Each tribe establishes criteria for its judges. Tribal judges are not generally attorneys with Western legal training but receive legal training from the National American Indian Court Judges Association, which is not equal to a JD degree, and they may not be state-licensed attorneys. Tribal courts are not generally courts of record; therefore, many opinions are not recorded. They build legitimacy within the tribe. Tribes are not required to have means for appealing decisions.

Native Americans and the First Amendment

Tribal governments are exempt from the Freedom of Information Act of 1967 that provides guarantees that citizens can inspect unclassified government documents. Tribal journalists traditionally could not use the First Amendment because of tribal sovereignty, but ICRA included a provision for freedom of the press. In practice, tribal governments shape the news for their communities with funding, hiring and firing practices, banning journalists from tribal government meetings, restrictions on press access to tribal government documents, and threats of retaliation. The Native American Journalist Association has made efforts to bridge tribal loyalties to open to the media.

NAGPRA and the Most Fundamental Right of American Indians

The underlying logic of the ICRA has been to restore basic civil rights to indigenous people. Native American Graves Protection and Reparation Act (NAGPRA) enacted in 1990 surfaced a basic issue of Indian civil rights: the right to a decent burial. NAGPRA compelled examination of all Native American and Native Hawai‘ian remains held in museums, universities, and state and federal repositories and bolstered tribal and government laws related to grave desecration and reburial. Having centuries of Native American bodies dug up and moved for academic, commercial, and “progressive” purposes is a human rights issue. American Indians Against Desecration, the National Congress of American Indians, and the Native American Rights Fund led efforts for NAGPRA consultation and reparations with tribes in relation to human remains and sacred objects held by public agencies. The result of these consultations has been an exchange of information and tribal acquisition of cultural traditions and identity from sacred objects that were removed, which has led to tribal preservation of traditional interests that include indigenous languages and dialects, food, culture, and governing structures.

Meredith Eliassen
San Francisco State University

See Also: Administration for Native Americans; Center for Native American Youth; Indian Boarding Schools; Indian Child Welfare Act; Native Americans.

Further Readings

Canby, William C. Jr., American Indian Law in a Nut Shell. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing, 2009.
Perry, Steven W. American Indians and Crime: A BJS Statistical Profile, 1992–2002. Washington, DC: Office of Justice Programs, 2004.
Stubben, Jerry D. Native Americans and Political Participation: A Reference Handbook. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC Clio, 2006.
Van Zeller, Mariana. Vanguard: Rape on the Reservation. http://vimeo.com/54786283 (Accessed July 2013).
Wilkinson, Charles F. Blood Struggle: The Rise of Modern Indian Nations. New York: W. W. Norton, 2005.

Indian Health Service

The Indian Health Service (IHS) is a comprehensive health program specifically for American Indians and Native Alaskans (AI/ANs or Native Americans). It provides services to this limited population due to a unique federal Indian trust relationship between the U.S. government and Native Americans. Funding is by discretionary appropriations authorized by Congress but based on the federal Indian relationship. In 2013, the IHS operated most of its facilities on reservation lands including 320 health centers, 45 hospitals, 115 health stations, and four school health centers.

AI/ANs can be from federally recognized tribes or not, they can live in reservation states or not, or they can live on reservations or in urban centers. They have diverse tribal memberships, cultural norms, and ancestral languages. The IHS provides different services depending upon the sociopolitical and geographic situation of each individual, although all services fail to meet parity with those available to non-Indians. The history, policies, and practices of the IHS demonstrate the disparity of human services available to Native Americans.

Federal Indian Trust Relationship

The IHS was created by the Indian Health Transfer Act during the Termination Era of federal policies toward Native Americans. After World War II, Congress was intent upon ending treaty rights and decreasing services. Because some Native Americans had served in the war as U.S. citizens, Congress determined it was time to assimilate all Native Americans into the general population. But the trust relationship between tribal nations and the U.S. government obligated Congress to provide AI/ANs with health care services equal to those provided to non-Indians. In an effort to both hasten integration and improve health services, Congress passed the Indian Health Transfer Act of 1955, transferring promised services from the Bureau of Indian Affairs into the Public Health Service (PHS).

Meanwhile, on Native American reservations, tuberculosis was the number one killer, infant mortality was high, and illnesses eliminated from non-Indian populations lingered. The remote locations within large reservations and prevalent unsanitary conditions coupled with poor career incentives for physicians meant that IHS services were often provided at great distance and by temporary staff. Congress promised services but did not authorize the appropriations needed to provide services beyond crisis care. Underfunding, understaffing, and a lack of infrastructure were the challenges facing the new IHS. Reducing tuberculosis, reducing infant mortality, and improving sanitation were the priority projects.

Improving Environmental Health

The greatest success of the IHS has been in the area of sanitation. To provide healthier environments and create greater opportunity for improved health, infrastructure needed to be modernized. Congress passed the Indian Sanitation Facilities Construction Act of 1959 to provide IHS the authority to construct sanitary structures and fund home improvements for IHS service recipients. Reducing environmental deficiencies by providing clean water, indoor plumbing, proper ventilation, and solid waste disposal facilities led to improved Native American health. Tuberculosis declined as the leading cause of death, the infant mortality rate decreased, and life expectancy increased. But transportation difficulties for both patients and personnel, high rates of staff turnover, and lack of funding remained as impediments to health parity.

From Objects to Participants

During the 1970s, allegations that the IHS took advantage of service recipients were verified. The least of these allegations were claims that the IHS did not adhere to the concept of dual citizenship and regularly denied services to AI/ANs. State, local, and federal health programs, as well as IHS services, were open to Native Americans. The IHS would refer recipients to local service providers, who in turn would refer them back to IHS service providers. Caught between two systems, many eligible AI/ANs did not receive care.

The worst of the verified allegations were of forced sterilizations and undisclosed medical experiments. Patients were sterilized either without their consent or coerced to accept sterilization with threats of denied federal support if they did not comply. The number of forced sterilizations performed by the IHS through the 1970s is estimated in the thousands for women and the hundreds for men. Children and adults were also given experimental treatments, medications, and placebos. Native American activist groups organized to put pressure on the IHS to end these practices and provide services that recognized traditional beliefs and cultural differences.

As a result, Congress passed the Indian Self-Determination and Educational Assistance Act of 1975 and the Indian Healthcare Improvement Act of 1976. The former was intended to maximize Indian participation and make federal services more responsive to the needs and desires of communities. The latter removed the prohibition of Medicaid and Medicare reimbursement to the IHS, provided for AI/AN educational funding, and set the goal of achieving health care parity within seven years.

These laws enabled AI/ANs to move from objects to participants in the provision of health care at the IHS. The first Native American director, Everett R. Rhoades, was appointed in 1982. Medical aides and paraprofessional health care staff lived and worked in their own communities, qualified members of federally recognized tribes were given preference for employment, tribally controlled hospitals were accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Health Care Organizations, and by 2006, traditional medicine services were available at IHS hospitals and clinics.

The IHS has never been funded to meet the health care needs of Native Americans. The goal of achieving parity has never been met. In 2013, Congress allowed sequestration cuts to reduce already parsimonious budget allocations for the IHS while maintaining budget allocations for programs that benefited the health services provided for non-Indians. The health of AI/ANs remains a generation behind non-Indians, and the IHS remains the only health care provider for approximately one-third of all Native Americans.

Shell Gosztyla
Independent Scholar

See Also: Alaska Natives; Assimilation; Community-Based Participatory Research; Native Americans; Native Americans, Suicide Among; Poverty; Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act; Traditional Medicine.

Further Readings

DeJong, David H. Plagues, Politics, and Policy: A Chronicle of the Indian Health Service, 1955–2008. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 2011.

Indian Health Service. About IHS. http://www.ihs.gov/aboutihs/ (Accessed March 2014).

The New York Times Editorial Board. "The Sequester Hits the Reservation." New York Times (March 20, 2013). http://www.nytimes.com/2013/03/21/opinion/the-sequester-hits-the-indian-health-service.html?_r=0 (Accessed March 2014).

Silliman, Jael, Marlene Gerber Fried, Loretta Ross, and Elena R. Gutiérrez. Undivided Rights: Women of Color Organize for Reproductive Justice. Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 2004.

Individuals with Disabilities Education Act

The Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) is a federal law that was created to ensure educational services are provided to children with disabilities throughout the United States. Enacted in 1975, IDEA originally was called the Education for All Handicapped Children Act (EAHCA) and supported states and local education agencies in providing early intervention, special education, and related services to infants, toddlers, and children with disabilities. Prior to 1975, about half of all children with disabilities were denied educational opportunities in the United States. The IDEA guaranteed a free, appropriate public education (FAPE) to every child with a disability, who due to disability was not benefiting from the available education. In 1990, the EAHCA was renamed the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act. The IDEA has evolved since its origin through court decisions, amendments to the law, and improved knowledge of providing for the educational needs of children with disabilities. It has proven to be an essential law for ensuring that our society provides all diverse children with disabilities the equal opportunity to benefit from their local public schools.

History of Special Education Services and the Origins of IDEA

Education of children in the United States historically has been the responsibility of individual states. While states made publically funded, locally controlled schools available to students, states largely excluded students with disabilities. Some students from wealthier families received an education through charitable institutions such as for deaf

Today, more children with disabilities fully participate in kindergarten through 12th grade education in the United States than at any time previously. More than 6.5 million school children in the United States age 3 to 21 received special education services under the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) in 2011.

and blind students. In the late 1800s, a few publicly funded schools began serving children with disabilities; however, these were mostly residential schools that required students to be separated from their families. Public day-school programs for children with disabilities became more common in the early 1900s in a few large cities, though most students with disabilities attended residential schools or no school at all.

The federal government first began taking steps to support the education of students with disabilities by enacting the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. In addition to providing funding to state institutions, the act created the first federal grant program for local schools educating students with disabilities and created the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped, now known as the Office of Special Education Programs. The Rehabilitation Act of 1973 was the first law to make it unlawful for schools receiving federal funding to exclude children with disabilities. Finally, in 1975, Congress passed the EAHCA, which guaranteed all children with disabilities a FAPE.

Evolution of the IDEA

1973: Rehabilitation Act of 1973. This act provided that schools receiving federal funding could not exclude children with disabilities. Additionally, schools could not deny services for lack of funding or make a child's family pay for necessary educational services. Public education had to be free for all children.

1975: EAHCA. For the first time, the federal government required all public schools to provide a FAPE to all students in the least restrictive environment (LRE) for the students and that is appropriate for the child's needs. Schools were required to evaluate students with disabilities and create an individualized education plan (IEP) with parent input that would provide a beneficial educational experience much like that for students without disabilities.

1982: Supreme Court decision in Board of Education v. Rowley, 458 U.S. 176 (1982). The Supreme Court established a two-part inquiry to determine if the FAPE requirement was satisfied: (1) the school must have complied with the procedures set forth in the act; and (2) the IEP developed must be reasonably calculated to enable the child to receive educational benefits, which in general only included enabling a child to achieve passing marks and advance from grade to grade. The school does not have to maximize each child's potential.

1983: EAHCA amended. These amendments granted federal funding to create parent information centers for parents to learn how to protect their child's rights. Additionally, it created financial incentives for schools to expand preschool services (from birth to age 3) for students with disabilities and services to assist high school students with disabilities in transitioning from school to adult life.

1990: Amended and renamed IDEA. These amendments replaced the term handicapped child with the term child with a disability, required transition services for students by age 16, added distinct disability categories for children with autism and traumatic brain injuries, defined assistive technology devices and services for inclusion in the IEP, and extended the LRE to require, to the maximum extent appropriate, that the child be educated with (in the same class or classes as) children without disabilities.

Implementation of the IDEA

Today, more children with disabilities fully participate in K through 12 education in the United States than at any time previously. More than 6.5 million school children in the United States ages 3 to 21 received special education services under the IDEA in 2011. Educators are better trained to work with children who have disabilities. Children without disabilities today do not know a world where children with disabilities were excluded from education.

However, implementing the IDEA has been at times a highly adversarial task for many parents and schools. In practice, schools sometimes only provide a basic minimum of services due to factors such as insufficient funding, the shortage of appropriately trained teachers, or a lack of institutional will. Disputes about the appropriateness of a child's IEP can lead to administrative hearings and civil suits. Some educators and disability advocates believe that the U.S. legal system, which is an adversarial system, is inconsistent with the intent of the IDEA, that is, to facilitate collaborative planning among school staff and family for a child's educational benefit.

The Future of the IDEA

The United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) is an instrument intended to protect the rights and dignity of people with disabilities internationally. As of August 2013, the United States has signed but not ratified the CRPD. If the United States does ratify the CRPD, the IDEA may require altering or expansion as it currently does not require the full development of human potential as well as the maximization of academic and social development in students with disabilities that Article 24 of the CRPD requires.

William N. Myhill
Stephanie Woodward
Syracuse University

See Also: Children With Special Needs; Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, United Nations; Special Education.

Further Readings

Board of Education of Hendrick Hudson Central School District, Westchester County. v. Rowley, 458 U.S. 176 (1982).

National Center for Learning Disabilities. What Is IDEA? http://www.ncld.org/disability-advocacy/learn-ld-laws/idea/what-is-idea (Accessed March 2014).

U.S. Dept. of Education. "Archived: A 25 Year History of the IDEA." http://www2.ed.gov/policy/speced/leg/idea/history.html (Accessed August 2013).

Infant Mortality/Sudden Infant Death Syndrome

In the United States, the infant mortality rate (IMR) has shown a steady decline, from 26.0 per 1,000 live births in 1960 to 6.14 per 1,000 live births in 2010. The United States' IMR world ranking has also steadily declined, from a ranking of 18 in 1980 to 31 in 2008. When compared to countries with lower IMRs, this ranking is due in large part to higher rates of low birth weight (LBW) and short gestational age births, or premature births, and racial and ethnic disparities. The leading causes of infant death include congenital abnormalities, preterm and LBW, sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS), and newborns affected by maternal complications of pregnancy.

LBW due to shortened gestation or inadequate fetal growth is a major determinant of infant mortality and morbidity. Infants who weigh less than 5.5 pounds are considered to be low birth weight. In 2010, 8.2 percent of infants born in the United States were born with LBW, and 1.4 percent of infants were born with very low birth weight. Compared to infants of normal weight, LBW infants may be more at risk for many health problems. Some babies may become sick in the first six days of life or develop infections. Other babies may even suffer from longer-term problems such as delayed motor and social development or learning disabilities. Exposure to lead, solvents, pesticides, and air pollution during pregnancy has been associated with LBW. A pregnant woman may increase her chances of having an LBW baby if she smokes, drinks alcohol, does not gain weight while pregnant, is younger than 15 years of age or is older than 35 years of age, if she has had a previous preterm birth, or if she is exposed to air pollution (both indoor and outdoor) and drinking water contaminated with lead. Social and economic factors such as low income, low educational level, stress, domestic violence or other abuse, and being unmarried may also contribute to LBW.

While the exact causes of SIDS are unknown, sleep patterns, brain abnormalities, LBW, and respiratory conditions are all factors that are associated with SIDS. In 1994, the Triple-Risk Model for SIDS was proposed, which suggests that SIDS occurs when the following three factors are present simultaneously. The first factor is an underlying vulnerability in the infant; the second, a critical developmental period; and the third, a stressor, such as asphyxia. According to the Triple-Risk Model, SIDS does not cause death in normal infants but, rather, only in vulnerable infants with an underlying abnormality. Therefore, the change to a supine sleep position is effective because, once the stressor (e.g., facedown position) is removed, the vulnerable infant passes unharmed through the critical period. Infants who are born with brain abnormalities may have one of the underlying abnormalities that can contribute to SIDS. In many of these infants, the portion of the brain that controls breathing and arousal from sleep doesn't work properly. Environmental risk factors include poverty, prenatal exposure to alcohol or drugs, and postnatal exposure to smoke and alcohol or illicit drugs. Postnatal exposure to cigarette smoke may trigger intrinsic responses in the vulnerable infants as this exposure may have a direct effect on neurotransmitter systems that are critical to homeostatic control in the developing human brain. Premature birth or being part of a multiple birth increases the likelihood that an infant's brain hasn't matured completely, so he or she has less reliable control over such automatic processes as breathing and heart rate. Many infants who have died of SIDS have recently experienced a cold, which may contribute to breathing problems.

Research suggests that infants who sleep on their backs are less likely to die from SIDS than infants who sleep in a prone position or on their stomachs. Both partial and exclusive breast-feeding may be associated with a reduced risk of SIDS. Infants who are placed on their stomachs or sides to sleep may have more difficulty breathing than those placed on their backs. The risk increases if the infant sleeps in the same bed as his or her parents in part because there are more soft surfaces to impair the infant's breathing. However, women in lower social classes may be less likely to receive this public health information than other women. When they do hear the message, African American mothers are less likely to adhere to the recommendation that an infant sleep on his or her back. Some African American women, as well as other mothers, may perceive that the best preventive measure was for them to be vigilant and watch over their infants. However, it is disconcerting to think that mothers' efforts to be vigilant of their newborns may cause them to sleep with their infants, which actually increases the chances of SIDS. Further, some mothers and health care providers alike perceive that sleeping on his or her back could increase an infant's chances of choking and is therefore more of a risk than an infant sleeping on his or her stomach. Thus, more needs to be done to understand the cultural barriers to adapting this preventive health measure to prevent SIDS. Rather than relying simply on distributing

The Safe to Sleep campaign from the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development, formerly known as the Back to Sleep campaign, focuses on actions that can be taken to help reduce the risk of sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS) and other sleep-related causes of infant death. Research suggests that infants who sleep on their backs are less likely to die from SIDS.

the guidelines, mothers may benefit from detailed explanations of the sleep guidelines.

Infant mortality among African Americans in 2008 was twice the national average. The SIDS death rate among American Indian and Alaska Natives is nearly two times the rate of non-Hispanic white mothers. Racial and ethnic disparities in infant mortality cannot be explained by socioeconomic status alone. Other contributing factors include strenuous working conditions and toxic exposures, neighborhood violent crime, and residential environmental exposures such as air pollution, substances in drinking water, and industrial chemicals. Paternal exposure to pesticides, solvents, and lead in the workplace before conception may affect infant health. Black fathers are more likely than black mothers to be exposed to toxic substances at work.

Within the African American community, maternal education and marital status may ultimately influence infant mortality, mediated by biological and demographic factors, health care, and infant health status at birth. Despite relatively low incomes, low formal education, and lack of access to medical care, everyday pregnancy care may explain why Mexican immigrant women have positive birth outcomes. Although socioeconomic and behavioral factors contribute to adverse birth outcomes, factors such as income, education, prenatal care, marital status, and substance abuse do not fully account for these ethnic disparities. There is now emerging evidence that the disproportionate rates of infant mortality, LBW, and preterm delivery in African Americans may result from group differences in exposure or susceptibility to prenatal stress, including stress related to racism and discrimination as well as physiological differences in physiological responses to stress.

Prevention can do much to reduce infant mortality as a result of SIDS and LBW. Such strategies would include increasing access to health care for women who are pregnant, public health campaigns to increase awareness of ways to prevent SIDS and LBW, and reducing social and environmental stressors that contribute to LBW and SIDS. Prenatal social supports and health education for women and at-risk families along with access to health care and other services holds promise for reducing LBW deliveries among at-risk women and adolescents.

Cathleen A. Lewandowski
George Mason University

See Also: Infant/Toddler Development; Infanticide, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; Pregnancy and Parenting Services.

Further Readings

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). "Reproductive and Birth Outcomes: Low Birth Weight and the Environment." http://ephtracking.cdc.gov/showRbLBWGrowthRetardationEnv.action (Accessed June 2013).

Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). "Response to the Advisory Committee on Childhood Lead Poisoning Prevention Report. Low Level Lead Exposure Harms Children: A Renewed Call for Primary Prevention. Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, v.61/20 (2012).

Giscombé, C. L., and Lobel, M. "Explaining Disproportionately High Rates of Adverse Birth Outcomes Among African Americans: The Impact of Stress, Racism, and Related Factors in Pregnancy." Psychological Bulletin, v.131/5 (2005).

Infanticide, International Variations in Attitudes Toward

> "May you be the mother of a hundred sons." (Hindu wedding day blessing cited in Society for the Protection of the Girl Child, 2011)

Infanticide is deemed to exist primarily within India and China for the simple reason that their respective population sizes create the actual or perceived need to produce children who can best create an economic impact such that the family is better equipped to survive in often financially difficult circumstances. For the most part, the children of choice or priority have been boys. However, it is worth observing that infanticide, albeit perhaps to a lesser degree, has also been observed in Azerbaijan, Armenia, Georgia, Montenegro, Albania, Vietnam, and Pakistan, where the ratio ranges from 109.9 to 117.6 boys per 100 girls, reports C. Hitrova.

It is certainly arguable that female infanticide and sex-selective abortion are two sides of the same coin given that, both individually and collectively, they diminish the number of females in the population in an unnatural manner. However, they are distinct. Sex-selective abortion occurs during gestation and female infanticide within hours or days of an infant's life, and it is the latter that is the focus here. A. Gray has argued that they each form part of what she terms gendercide, that is, the deliberate killing of a person based solely upon his or her gender. Gray maintains that a major driver that sits behind cultural and societal determinants of gendercide is a growing awareness of the goods available in Western democracies.

Thus, television, for example, depicts for the population in India perceptually typical Western small families and provides an array of advertisements that encourage a high level of materialism among the populace. One argued consequence of this world of opportunity has been an increase in female infanticide and sex-selective abortion. The process of dowries (which although illegal are still commonplace), in which the father of the bride bestows relatively great wealth upon her husband and his family, has become yet more onerous given that it sits alongside the costs of the increased materialism driven by exposure to the West. Dowries can place the bride's family into long-term and often crippling financial debt and, given that the daughter is no longer available to look after her own family but must move her allegiances to her husband's, the loss is both financial and personal for her parents. Gray maintains that female infanticide, rather than sex-selective abortion, has become the key vector for reducing the perceived burden of a female child because it costs the family nothing, at least in purely financial terms.

In India, the existence of infanticide is deemed, by Hitrova, for example, to be borne out by the gender ratio of that country. In 2011, the ratio for children under 15 years of age was 117 boys per 100 girls with the average ratio at birth falling between 103 and 108 boys per 100 girls. Poverty in India is a key driver of infanticide, which exacerbates other factors such as cultural norms. The Economist reported in 2010 that, in India, an estimated 100 girls are born for every 124 boys and that the number of female births continues to decline on an annual basis. The Azad India Foundation notes that, in the period of some 15 years, some 5 million girls have "disappeared," that is, presumed to have been killed by their parents. M. Kamdar notes that, for the world in general, the disappeared figure is in the order of 50 to 60 million girls.

There is a cultural imperative operating in India, predominantly exercised by families in poverty, which determines that baby girls should be killed in preference to baby boys who can, perceptually at least, become future economic providers. According to A. Jones, the cumulative cost of a daughter amounts to some $35,000 over her lifetime for a family whose annual income is likely to fall within the $3,500 range. Although illegal in India, the dowry still persists. The economic cost of the dowry can be exacerbated in circumstances in which the family is unable to meet the full cost and subsequently becomes debt bonded to the husband of the daughter. That financial indebtedness appears to be a practical burden that families are unable or unwilling to undertake. Arguably, the determination of the relative worth of boys and girls is driven in part by the position women hold in Indian society. Hinduism is argued to have played a role in this perpetuation of the value divide, given that it provides for male dominance and priority over women.

Similar societal constructs of relative worth are apparent within Chinese society also. Confucianism provides for fathers and sons to be the head of the family, with women required to be passive toward both their parents and their husbands. However, the greatest driver of infanticide lies in China's one-child policy, which prohibits families from having more than one child unless both parents were only children. Although less strictly policed in rural areas, in the increasingly urbanized China, there is denial of public services for those who infringe the policy and rewards for those who do not, in the form, for example, of better education and preferential homes.

While there are rumors of a potential relaxation of the one-child policy (with A. Harjani observing in August 2013 that this might come into being by the end of 2013 with, for example, parents being allowed two children if one of those parents was themselves an only child), there are commentators such as Y. Zhang who maintain that the policy generates huge income for the government through so-called social support fees, which are charged to parents who breach the one-child policy. One investigation discovered that social support fees levied in 2012 in just 17 provinces were in the order of $2.7

billion. So long as the policy remains in place, the propensity for infanticide will continue unabated. In 2009, there were 118 boys to every 100 girls. Equally, without the removal or significant alteration of the policy, the current disproportionality of female to male offspring will continue through the vehicle of infanticide.

In India, unlike China, the driver for change does not require a governmental policy shift but rather an alteration of entrenched cultural norms and attitudes. Poverty may be deemed to be a precursor or facilitator of such attitudes, and it seems as if there is a vital need for the Indian government to recognize the connection between poverty and infanticide, the former driving families to commit the latter because daughters are viewed societally as an economic burden rather than a potential economic asset. The increased use by women of microfinancing activities, which provide them with an opportunity to generate revenue, is a key example of how steadfast attitudes might be overcome by objective proof of a woman's economic power. Equally, the Indian government needs to consider the development of a form of social security for its elderly population; the requirement to care for the elderly falls currently upon their children and invariably leads to the forsaking of female children who are deemed incapable of providing economic support to their parents in later life.

Both China and India could take stock of or heart from the recent experience of South Korea, which through a series of systematic steps has reversed the once disproportionate female-to-male ratio that had resulted from infanticide. The first step involved the establishment of a national family planning campaign to control unwanted births rather than to leave such births to be resolved by means of abortion. Thereafter, there was a systematic promotion of a two-child family plan in which the benefits of two children were extolled and, importantly, the equal status of both male and female children, encapsulated, for example, in an advertisement that stipulated, "Sons or daughters, let's have two and raise them well!" Finally, incentives were introduced for two-child families, which led over time to both urban and rural families shying away from the historical practice of infanticide of young girls.

Rob McCusker
Teesside University Business School

See Also: Family, International Variations in Definitions of; Family Structure, Diversity of; Infant/Toddler Development; National Survey of Family Growth.

Further Readings

Azad India Foundation. "Female Infanticide in India." www.azadaindia.org/social-issues/female infanticideinindia.html (Accessed December 2013).

"Gendercide." Economist (March 4, 2010).

Gray, A. "Sex-Selective Abortion, Female Infanticide and Their Lasting Effects in China and India." Concord Review, v.21/1 (Fall 2010).

Harjani, A. "China Could Ease One-Child Policy by Year End." CNBC. http://cnbc.com/id/100938297 (Accessed August 2013).

Hitrova, C. "The Value of a Girl in the Modern World." http://www.academia.edu/2465030/Female_infanticide_and_gender_biased_sex-selective_foeticide (Accessed December 2013).

Jones, A. Case Study: Female Infanticide. http://www.gendercide.org/case_infanticide.html (Accessed December 2013).

Kamdar, M. Planet India. New York: Scribner Press, 2007.

Society for the Protection of the Girl Child. "An Overview of Gendercide and Daughter Abuse in India" (2011). http://www.protectgirls.org/uploads/Society_for_the_Protection _of_the_Girl_Child_Situation_Overview2.pdf (Accessed July 2014).

Zhang, Y. "How the Chinese Government Profits From the One-Child Policy." The Atlantic (September 4, 2013).

Infant/Toddler Development

Child development refers to the physical, cognitive, and social-emotional growth of the child. Specifically, infancy covers birth to 1 year of age, and toddler development covers 1 to 3 years of age. Development is about the changes that occur as children grow. All areas of development are interconnected; we can talk about specific themes, but progress in one area depends on progression in other areas. Achieving developmental milestones such as sitting up, talking, and problem solving is the mark of one developmental period ending and a new phase beginning. Infants and toddlers progress through a series of milestones that allows their development to be monitored.

Maturation

Maturation is the process by which individuals meet developmental milestones based on their genetic background. Hereditary information passed from parent to child plays an important role in how and when individuals master various skills. Maturation plays a part in why every human being progresses through a similar sequence to reach specific milestones. Maturation is central to development in the infant and toddler stages. While maturation plays a key role in all aspects of development, another crucial factor is experience. Experience or learning builds upon the skills that emerged through maturation and is dependent on the familial environment and the broader culture the child is raised in. For example, humans are born with the ability to learn language, and in every culture, babies speak one word at a time before they can put two words together, but culture determines whether one speaks English, French, or Spanish.

Language Development

Language development follows the same sequence in all infants and toddlers, but it may occur at different rates depending on the child. Babies follow

It has been acknowledged that there is a strong link between play and learning for young children, especially in the areas of problem solving, language acquisition, literacy, numeracy, and social, physical, and emotional skills. Peer interaction begins around 6 months of age, and by 15 to 18 months, toddlers begin interacting and socializing with peers.

similar paths no matter what language they hear and learn. Humans have an innate ability to learn language, but the specific language learned is highly dependent on culture.

While infants do not speak at birth, they can successfully communicate through vocalizations such as crying and are responsive to the language around them. By crying, infants are able to gain attention from caregivers and have their needs, such as being fed, met. Around 2 months of age, infants start cooing or producing vowel sounds. Next, they make sounds that have no meaning, such as ba and da, the stage referred to as babbling.

Before 6 months of age, infants communicate at the same time as the individual who is speaking to them so as to imitate what is being vocalized to them. Later on, they begin to take turns communicating with another person. Western adults tend to speak slower and change the pitch or loudness of their voice while speaking to infants. In other cultures, parents may not adjust their speech, but the infants progress at the same rate as they tend to be exposed to a language-enriched background provided by many adults.

After the first year has passed, toddlers lose the ability to recognize sounds that are not part of their native tongue. The ability to understand language develops faster than the ability to verbally express one's self. By their first birthday, infants have a vocabulary of around three words, but vocabulary acquisition grows rapidly, and toddlers begin to combine two words into sentences as they near their second birthday.

Cognitive Development

Cognitive development focuses on the ability to acquire processes such as decision making, recall and memory, problem solving, and understanding the world—in other words, the development of intellectual skills. Two key theories of cognitive development have played an influential role in understanding how infants and toddlers reach developmental milestones. The most widely known theory is that of Jean Piaget (1896–1980). Piaget believed that children are curious, and this allows infants and toddlers to actively explore their environments. By interacting with the environment, children progress through cognitive milestones.

Piaget argued that cognitive development occurs in a series of four stages, two of which occur before the age of 3. Infants are classified under the sensorimotor stage. Infants in this stage use their senses and motor movements to explore and acquire new knowledge. Three key ways that infants can use their senses to become familiar with their environment are through grasping, sucking, and locomotion. Furthermore, during this stage, infants acquire the concept of object permanence, which is a realization that objects continue to exist in the world, even when the infant is no longer looking at the object. Object permanence is a universal concept seen across all studied cultures.

Toddlers fall in the beginning of the preoperational stage, where they begin to use symbols such as language to extend their current knowledge base, but their thinking is not yet fully logical. During this time, toddlers are considered egocentric; that is, they only see the world through their eyes and cannot take another person's perspective.

Piaget believed that new experiences and information are added to preexisting knowledge through a process he termed assimilation. When information cannot simply be added, knowledge can increase through accommodation; that is, new experiences or information changes previous knowledge to better fit what has just been experienced.

The theorist Lev Vygotsky (1896–1934) has also had a strong influence on the understanding of cognitive development. His sociocultural theory emphasized that children learn through their social interactions with other individuals. For infants and toddlers to progress, they must engage in social interactions; otherwise, they cannot gain appropriate knowledge. Through social interaction, infants watch what others do, imitate those actions, and finally master the modeled skills. Another key part of Vygotsky's theory is that learning and development may differ depending on one's culture. Different cultures have different norms and beliefs, and this may have a profound effect on what children learn through socialization. Vygotsky argued that the social world has a strong influence on cognitive development.

Newer theories tend to focus on the acquisition of information-processing skills such as memory and attention to explain cognitive development.

Social-Emotional Development

Cross-cultural studies suggest that there are striking similarities in social development across ethnic groups. Babies display basic emotions such as happiness, sadness, anger, and fear. More complex or secondary emotions like embarrassment, pride, and guilt develop around 18 to 24 months of age. Facial expressions are a good indication of an infant's emotions. More specifically, around 5 to 6 months, infants show a predictable change in their facial expressions based on a response to an ongoing event. This ability starts to become evident only after infants have developed the ability to differentiate among different facial expressions.

Early on, infants develop the ability to regulate their emotions. At the early stages, this involves simple strategies such as crying or moving away from something that scares them, but as they get older, they are able to improve and use more effective strategies. Between 2 and 3, toddlers begin to use language to help them self-regulate their own emotions.

Around 8 to 9 months of age, infants begin to form strong attachments with familiar adults. The first social-emotional attachment is normally with the mother, who is typically the main caregiver. How attachment is displayed does differ in different cultures; different cultures may value different characteristics, and in so doing, this influences their development. For example, co-sleeping is normative in some ethnic groups such as Asians and African Americans, who believe it promotes a stronger attachment, but it is frowned upon in Western cultures, which believe it is less safe, yet they all have securely attached babies.

Peer interaction begins around 6 months of age. Babies do not play with peers yet, but they start to become more aware of them. By 15 to 18 months, toddlers enjoy interacting and socializing with peers.

Motor Development

Rapid physical growth and maturation take place during the first years of life. Within the first few months of life, birth weight normally doubles, and by an infant's first birthday, weight typically triples. Infant bodies tend to be disproportionate, with larger heads and trunks giving them a top-heavy appearance.

All infants are born with innate reflexes that aid in survival as infants do not have voluntary control over most movements. By 12 months, infants can reach, grasp objects, and walk. This is a result of gradual use of their thumbs, coordination with both of their hands, eye–hand coordination, and muscle growth. In a one-year period, an infant who displayed no voluntary motor movements becomes a toddler who can walk and run independently. Maturation and experience are both crucial for the development of motor skills. While all infants and toddlers follow the same sequential pattern in meeting milestones, practice has a role, and even culture is important. Some ethnic groups limit the amount of gross motor activity via, for example, swaddling or carrying the infant, while others encourage early motor development. Babies of African heritage tend to develop motor skills earlier than other babies, but otherwise, infants in all cultures develop at the same pace and quickly catch up if motor movements were initially restricted.

From birth, newborns have a well-developed sense of smell, touch, taste, and hearing. However, sight is not as mature and becomes more developed during the first year.

Conclusion

In a short period of time, infants develop into toddlers and change from being nonspeaking, nonmoving, trial-and-error problem solvers into talking, walking, thinking little people. Their development follows a maturational schedule provided by their genetic background but also reflects the environment they grew up in and the experiences they had, affected both by family and the broader culture. Culture and ethnic variations have stronger influences on development as children get older, yet those who work with diverse populations should recognize that there are many acceptable variations of bringing up infants and toddlers that will lead to positive outcomes.

Elizabeth Levin
Devon Morrow
Laurentian University

See Also: Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths; Developmental Disabilities, Attitudes and Myths in Services for; Developmental Disabled Individuals; Early Childhood Development.

Further Readings

Arnett, J. Human Development, A Cultural Approach. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Education, 2012.

Feldman, R. S., Child Development, 6th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson, 2011.
Keenan, Thomas. An Introduction to Child Development, 2nd ed. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2009.
Levine, Laura E. Child Development: An Active Learning Approach. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2010.

Information and Referral

Many entries in this volume have a natural affinity for the diversity dimension inherent in their topics where the discussion can address any of several issues such as race, gender, and socioeconomic status. At first glance, information and referral (IR) would not be one of those topics. Perhaps because of that reason, the diversity dimensions of IR go largely unappreciated, and it is that lack of recognition that perhaps has caused some not to realize the full complexity of this topic.

The Alliance of Information and Referral Systems (AIRS), the nation's oldest formalized IR service, defines IR as the "art, science, and practice of bringing people and services together." In practice, a referral may be as straightforward as providing a number to an agency in the community. If someone contacts an IR service, such as 2-1-1, then provisions are also made to assist callers in making that phone call or providing some form of crisis intervention as needed.

The professionalization of IR can be viewed from the AIRS standards, which cover six areas that any agency wishing to portray themselves as an IR service need to address. Those areas include service delivery, database of services, performance measures, relationships with service providers, emergency and disaster preparedness, and organizational effectiveness. AIRS also publishes a journal, Information and Referral, yet no indexing for the journal can be found other than on the AIRS Web site with a note that access is limited to AIRS members and subscribers.

The full diversity of the IR landscape begins to emerge where 2-1-1 systems have been implemented. While 2-1-1 has been able to address the basic information needs of callers, most of these systems have also formally partnered with existing IR call centers already functioning in many communities. Many of these call centers have a specialized function such as mental health; homelessness; domestic violence; aging; lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered, and queer (LGBTQ) youth; and other services. Indeed, each of these specialized call centers represents a diversity dimension in the continuum of human services. Often staffed by personnel with specialized training in their respective fields, the nature of the call and their ability to provide services to a potential client can look different from one call center to another.

Perhaps one of the most significant markers for the professionalization of the IR field lies in its formally developed taxonomy. Originally developed by the AIRS/211 of Los Angeles County and now promulgated nationwide, this taxonomy has more than 9,000 terms that ostensibly cover the complete range of human services. The fact of so many entries alone attests to the diversity of dimensions involved in describing the kinds of human services callers may inquire about. While potentially useful for any number of purposes, access to the taxonomy is fee based, which brings us to the next issue.

The Commons

As noted by N. Shank, the interoperability of IR databases, that is, the ability to compile an integrated database of all the services, both basic and specialized information across a vast array of services in a community, is the future of the IR field. People will always need this information, and agencies will have providers of these services. What remains is how the two will remain linked. Despite its vast taxonomy of more than 9,000 terms, in no way should the AIRS taxonomy be viewed as a one-stop shop for all information needs, and it does not claim to be so. Indeed, as a taxonomic instrument, it only provides the placeholders for the data about services that can only be provided by local agencies in our communities. As such, there have to be database tools developed to provide that linkage, and the notion of a data commons is beginning to emerge to fill that need. Born out of Commons Movement, Open211 seeks to build an open, interoperable resource directory that uses web-based technologies to pull data from a multitude of online databases into a common directory, describes G. Bloom. IR services, such as

2-1-1, could still tap into this directory and offer their unique skill sets, but the information could also be made available to other services to be delivered via smartphones or other devices as the user needs. This latter notion reiterates the diverse nature of the IR process from the perspective of service users, service providers, and managers of the information.

The Future

While the need for IR services will be invariant, how those services are found and delivered will no doubt change largely because of the quickening evolution of technology into any number of devices. A logical next step once these processes become more digital will be the use of electronic referrals to supplement the person-to-person referrals commonly made today, predicts Dale Fitch. Research on all of these processes will be essential, especially research on referral follow-up outcomes. Taken together, the field of IR is much more diverse than commonly perceived, and its diversity will become only more complex as new information technology tools provide accessibility to rich stores of data.

Dale K. Fitch
University of Missouri

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; Adult Education Programs and Services; Service Providers and Diversity.

Further Readings

Alliance of Information and Referral Systems (AIRS). http://www.airs.org/i4a/pages/index.cfm?pageid=3301 (Accessed August 2013).
AIRS Standards. http://www.airs.org/files/public/AIRS_Standards_7_Final.pdf (Accessed August 2013).
AIRS Taxonomy. http://www.airs.org/i4a/pages/index.cfm?pageid=3386 (Accessed August 2013).
Bloom, G. The Community Resource Data Commons. Unpublished manuscript, 2013. Commons. http://onthecommons.org (Accessed August 2013).
Fitch, Dale. "A Shared Point of Access to Facilitate Interagency Collaboration." Administration in Social Work, v.33/2 (2009).
Shank, N. "Database Interoperability: Technology and Process for Sharing Resource Information." Information and Referral, v.26 (2004).

Institute for Women's Policy Research

The Institute for Women's Policy Research (IWPR), a nonprofit organization, was founded in 1987 by Heidi Hartmann and other activists whose purpose it was "to develop comprehensive, women-focused, policy-oriented research." Created in Washington, D.C., the IWPR was crafted in response to "gender-based economic injustice," conducting research and providing testimony before the U.S. Senate "on the costs to American women and taxpayers that result from women's lack of job protection after an absence due to childbirth." Since its founding, IWPR has also served as a knowledge base regarding policies that impact women both in the United States and across the globe. Its Web site defines its current mission as "Informing policy. Inspiring change. Improving lives." The IWPR claims to provide thorough research on the status of women in order to "promote public dialog, and strengthen families, communities, and societies" and appears to be successful toward that end.

According to Stephen Rose and Heidi Hartmann, the IWPR focuses on conducting and utilizing "women-oriented policy research" to create awareness and understanding regarding "economic and social policy issues affecting women and families" for "policy makers, scholars, and public interest groups." In addition, the IWPR collaborates with "the graduate programs in public policy and women's studies at The George Washington University." One of the most significant contributions of the IWPR has been a series of reports, inaugurated in 1996, on The Status of Women, for the purpose of providing dependable and consistent information about women's experiences and issues in the United States to institutions that create policy.

Reports have been generated for all 50 states as well as the District of Columbia. The rationale for this massive project is to assess "the progress of women in their state relative to women in other states, to men, and to the nation as a whole." Resulting from these accounts, additional reports have chronicled trends and compared information about women's lives across states; moreover, research methods have been created and promoted to produce reliable information about the status of women in the United States.

Five Key Program Areas

Five key program areas include: (1) employment, education, and economic change; (2) democracy and society; (3) poverty, welfare, and income security; (4) work and family; and (5) health and safety. In its efforts in employment, education, and economic change, the IWPR conducts research in areas related to "employment and job quality, status of women in the States, pay equity and discrimination, access to higher education, and unemployment and the economy." Largely as a result of work in this area by the IWPR, the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) was passed in 1993. Programming in democracy and society focuses on issues that include immigration, religion, unions, and politics, while the third emphasis on poverty, welfare, and income security examines issues such as retirement, social security, poverty, and welfare reform. Finally, emphasis on work and family investigates matters that include education, family leave, sick days, and flexibility in the workplace, while health and safety investigate how women's health issues are influenced by health insurance, preventative health services, and domestic violence, and to what extent race and ethnicity forecast health care access and concomitant outcomes.

Dissemination of Information

Information from the IWPR is disseminated in four primary ways. First, The Status of Women publications help both to chart progress of women in political, business, health care, child care, and family settings as well as to "identify and measure the remaining barriers to equality." Second, the Women's Policy Research Conference, inaugurated in 1989, was held biennially, and its proceedings were published until it was discontinued in 2005. Since that time, symposiums have been held in 2009 and 2013.

Third, the IWPR produces a quarterly newsletter "to highlight new projects and initiatives." Finally, RNR Online (Research News Reporter) is a monthly newsletter that is produced electronically and features a wealth of materials including a FemChat blog, student–parent success initiative section, additional LISTSERV information, and a forum on resources and toolkits.

Future Aims

The IWPR has a number of goals as it moves past the quarter century mark in 2013. Goals for the next 25 years include exploring the gender wage gap, workplace discrimination, Social Security, child care, and education. Within the organizational structure of the IWPR, internship and fellowship programs will be increased to expand opportunities for young women "to gain career experience while expanding their knowledge of research and policy issues." The impact of the IWPR in its short history has been significant on social, political, and private sectors in the United States, and its future direction appears to be similarly ambitious in scope.

Catherine A. Dobris
Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis
Rachel Davidson
University of Wisconsin–Milwaukee

See Also: Empowerment Research; Legal Services; Single Parents; Women Minorities.

Further Readings

Institute for Women's Policy Research. "About Us." http://www.iwpr.org/about (Accessed June 2013).

Institute for Women's Policy Research. "Accelerating Change for Women of Color Faculty in STEM: Policy, Action, and Collaboration." http://www.iwpr.org/initiatives/women-of-color-in-stem/acceleratingchange (Accessed August 2013).

Institute for Women's Policy Research. "Annual Report 2010." Washington, DC: Author, 2011.

Institute for Women's Policy Research (IWPR). "History." http://www.iwpr.org/about/history (Accessed June 2013).

Institute for Women's Policy Research (IWPR). "IWPR Celebrates 25th Anniversary." http://www.iwpr.org/about/25th-anniversary (Accessed June 2013).

Institute for Women's Policy Research (IWPR). "Second Annual Women's Policy Research Conference." Washington, DC: IWPR, 1991.

Institute for Women's Policy Research (IWPR). "The Status of Women in the States." http://www.iwpr.org/initiatives/states (Accessed June 2013).

Institute for Women's Policy Research (IWPR). The Status of Women in the States: Politics, Economics, Health, Demographics, 2nd ed. Washington, DC: IWPR, 1998.

Rose, Stephen J. and Heidi I. Hartmann. Still a Man's Labor Market: The Long-Term Earnings Gap. Washington, DC: Institute for Women's Policy Research, 2004.

Institute of Education Sciences

The Institute of Education Sciences (IES) is a research agency of the United States Department of Education that provides support for various areas of education practice and assessments, such as education research, special education, and learning assessment and evaluation. The mission of IES is to conduct research that provides evidence on the best practices in education as well as to offer guidance for developing and implementing educational policies and training programs.

The institute identifies which methods yield the best learning outcomes, promote the most effective teaching methods, and assist in educational efforts that serve students who are at risk. IES is a nonpartisan agency, and its activities are not intended to reflect partisan influence. Instead, IES provides teachers, researchers, administrators, and the public with unbiased information about the state of education in the United States. The institute was established under the Education Sciences Reform Act of 2002. IES receives oversight from the National Board for Education Sciences.

IES Operations and Functions

IES operates with a budget of more than $200 million and comprises almost 200 staff members. The institute's work is conducted at four centers throughout the country: the National Center for Education Research, the National Center for Education Statistics, the National Center for Education Evaluation and Regional Assistance, and the National Center for Special Education Research.

John Easton became the director of IES in June 2009. He has been praised for establishing more collaboration among researchers and education practitioners and has placed more emphasis on translating education research into information for public consumption.

In compliance with the Education Sciences Reform Act, the institute is required to give a biannual report on its accomplishments and activities to the president, the education secretary, Congress, and the general public. These reports typically include summaries of grant projects funded, contracts, and ongoing research projects.

Projects Conducted and Supported by the IES

IES conducts peer-reviewed scientific studies that investigate the current quality of education in a variety of settings throughout the United States. The institute collects statistical data from surveys and longitudinal studies examining the current condition and nature of education. Examples of research might include examining the training programs that are most successful in preparing educators or the effectiveness of certain types of textbooks and other educational materials. One of their well-known projects is the annual National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP), often referred to as the Nation's Report Card. The NAEP is the nation's largest assessment of students' competencies in reading, math, writing, science, economics, civics, U.S. history, and geography. In 2014, the NAEP also measured technology and engineering literacy. Other research projects conducted through IES assess federal education reforms fueled by the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act, which has included efforts to improve state-level educational programs. In addition to its own research and outreach endeavors, the institute provides grant funding for education research projects conducted by faculty and educators. These studies investigate educational practices within preschool through postsecondary levels as well as special education settings.

The institute also engages in public service and outreach programs designed to provide information and strategies that help improve education and teaching effectiveness. Some of the technical support systems provided by IES include the Education Resources Information Center (ERIC) database, the What Works Clearinghouse, as well as several national research and development centers. IES conferences, peer-reviewed journals, and training products are also available. Through their outreach programs, IES strives to improve the educational abilities of school districts and statewide organizations in the way they develop and evaluate their own curricular plans as well as to conduct their own education research.

IES Resources

One of the main functions of IES is to enable the public to search for information. One of the resources the institute provides is a database for colleges, schools, and libraries throughout the United States. The public can also search for statistical data collected by IES. With the data analysis system available on the IES Web site, users can conduct their own statistical analyses on one or more of the available data sets. In addition, information seekers can scan and investigate the results of any national assessment conducted by the institute or its collaborating agencies. Education researchers can also take advantage of many online resources such as webinars on research methods, information about the peer review process, and help in searching for funding opportunities with IES.

Praise and Criticism for the IES

IES is widely known for its rigorous, high-quality research. The institute received an effective rating from the U.S. Office of Management and Budget, the highest level earned. This rating receives support from the U.S. Government Accountability Office (GAO) in how IES has contributed to the improved quality of education research. This observation was noted at a late 2013 hearing held by the U.S. House of Representatives Education and Workforce Committee. However, when considering the reauthorization of the Education Sciences Reform Act, House committee members questioned whether this type of rigorous research is still being used or considered relevant by the general public.

The GAO echoes stakeholder complaints that IES has slowed in their ability to produce and disseminate research in a timely manner, partly because their research has spent a great deal of time in peer review. The stated problem with this slowing of information dissemination is the reported inability to implement education interventions when they are most needed. In addition, GAO reports that IES lacks an adequate system for implementing input into the improvement of their research and programs. Another criticism is the need for IES to update its performance measurements and assessments to keep up-to-date with current education programs across the country. The institute has also been scrutinized for its inefficient organization of its funding programs, partly because IES has to coordinate with other agencies. This inefficiency has been argued to hinder how IES conducts important educational evaluations and learning assessments. To begin to address current criticisms and deficiencies in operations, IES has collaborated with the National Science Foundation (NSF) to construct more concrete guidelines to improve the quality of education research.

Juliann C. Scholl
Texas Tech University

See Also: Children With Special Needs; Department of Education, U.S.; Educational Services; Educational Support Services; Special Education.

Further Readings

Institute of Education Sciences. "About IES: Connecting Research, Policy and Practice." http://ies.ed.gov/aboutus/ (Accessed November 2013).

Institute of Education Sciences. "Director's Biennial Report to Congress: Building Partnerships That Produce Relevant, Useful Research." http://ies.ed.gov/pdf/20126002.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Institute of Education Sciences. "National Assessment of Education Progress (NAEP)." http://nces.ed.gov/nationsreportcard/about/ (Accessed November 2013).

Sparks, Sarah D. "Lawmakers Question IES Relevance in Reauthorization Hearing." Education Week (September 10, 2013).

U.S. Government Accountability Office. "Education Research: Preliminary Observations on the Institute of Education Sciences' Research and Evaluation Efforts." http://www.gao.gov/products/GAO-13-852T (Accessed November 2013).

Institutional Oppression

Institutions may inadvertently disadvantage groups in society such as gays and lesbians, people of color, non-English-speaking clients, persons with disabilities, women, the elderly, or the economically disadvantaged. This phenomenon, known as institutional oppression, may result in clients' failure to receive services, inability to benefit from services, or premature termination of services. In some cases, it can even lead clients to decompensate, or get worse, as a result of service provision. This is important to human services workers because clients in these categories are those most likely to Protesters at a 2006 gay pride event in Union Square, San Francisco, California. Institutions may inadvertently disadvantage groups in society such as gays and lesbians, people of color, persons with disabilities, women, the elderly, or the economically disadvantaged. Oppression can be material, resulting in a denial of benefits, or symbolic, resulting in shame or exclusion.

need their assistance. Because it is possible to overlook or contribute to client oppression, even while attempting to be helpful, human services workers are often advised to pay attention to this issue.

Social Services Agencies

Social welfare institutions and their personnel may oppress clients in a number of ways including but not limited to the following: providing services in inaccessible locations, having unrealistic eligibility criteria, failing to understand cultural norms related to services, compromising clients' safety or privacy in exchange for services, engaging in protocols that expose clients to traumatization or victimization, and having unrealistic fee schedules for populations needing the services. For example, a crime victim services agency may be inaccessible by public transportation; a domestic violence shelter may have no ramps or interpreters; a homeless person may not qualify for public assistance without a permanent address; or culturally specific child-rearing practices may be deemed abusive by formal authorities. Social services agencies that do not hire gay people, older workers, minorities, women, or individuals with disabilities (who may reflect the demographics of the population being served) can also be said to practice institutional oppression.

Other Institutions

In the larger society, institutions such as schools, hospitals, police departments, churches, courts, banks, news outlets, real estate agencies, political systems, and military organizations may practice institutional oppression. This is important to human services workers because they may need to collaborate with, or provide referrals to, these services. Oppression can be material, resulting in a denial of benefits or services, or symbolic, resulting in shame or exclusion. For example, schools that celebrate Christian holidays but not Muslim or Jewish ones may make non-Christian children feel stigmatized or ashamed of their faith. The indirect effect of this could be taunting, avoidance, or violence from peers. Thus, institutional oppression can have wide-ranging and indirect consequences even when it takes symbolic forms.

Inaction as Oppression

Institutional oppression can take the form of inactions as well as actions, as for example, in the situation previously described. Schools using history books that portray only white males as important scientists can, for example, be construed as practicing institutional oppression.

Service providers in social agencies, in the course of conducting intake interviews, may fail to ask questions allowing for the possibility of gay relationships. Assisted-living facilities may assume their clients cannot have romantic relationships (and therefore allow them no privacy). Agencies that fail to install accessible bathrooms for their physically disabled clients, realtors who neglect to show nonwhite clients homes in upscale neighborhoods, and policies that discourage doctors from offering Medicaid (but not other) patients pain relief are additional examples of institutional oppression by omission.

Individual Versus Institutional Oppression

While service providers already inclined to be discriminatory may enact oppressive policies, so may those who would not normally be discriminatory. Thus an antiracist, pro-gay, or feminist worker could potentially engage in institutional oppression. This is because oppressive practices are enshrined in the bylaws, written protocols, and informal policies of organizations. In addition, absent insight into the perspectives of the populations being served, institutional oppression may be imperceptible to mainstream service providers.

Language, Labeling, and Stigmatization

One way in which institutions may oppress clients is through the use of labeling. Labels can be psychiatric (e.g., borderline), cognitive (e.g., learning disabled), or criminal justice based (e.g., juvenile delinquent, drug abuser, or prostitute). Labeling can allow professionals a shorthand to discuss cases or may enable clients to qualify for services; however, labeling (especially of younger people) can produce a negative self-image and social stigmatization (devaluation by others). This is especially relevant to cultural minority clients for whom a bad reputation may have negative results for their families and communities. People more likely to be labeled may include ethnic and racial minorities, economically disadvantaged women and men, people who deviate from culturally valued roles (such as those with multiple sexual partners) immigrants, and those having gay or bisexual orientations. Clients required to accept a negative label in exchange for services may prefer to sacrifice the assistance in exchange for dignity and privacy. Labels imply that individuals are static and best defined in terms of their deficiencies; thus, human services workers may refer to a client as a schizophrenic rather than a person who happens to (perhaps intermittently) suffer from schizophrenia. Intake forms, assessments, and other official documents that omit a discussion of client strengths and focus exclusively on deficiencies may fail to identify latent resources a client possesses. These may include his or her spiritual beliefs, extended family members, internal attributes, hobbies or interests, or social networks.

Deviance, Social Control, and Institutional Oppression

Institutions may conflate caregiving with social control functions; indeed, the two purposes frequently overlap in areas such as child protection, rehabilitation programs for the disabled, income maintenance programs, drug treatment clinics, psychiatric hospital wards, and court-ordered batterer intervention programs. In these settings, clients may be sanctioned for failure to follow through on workers' recommendations; as a result, they may lose jobs, housing, or liberty. Clients who do not accept services on terms offered to them may be labeled resistant or unmotivated and forfeit eligibility for future services. Clients who pay cash for services or have more generous insurance plans may have greater latitude in determining what services are provided, by whom, and with what degree of privacy. In this way, institutions may reinforce and replicate class differences among the clients they serve.

This process can disadvantage ethnic or minority clients whose understanding of service provision may be at variance with the worker's. Such clients may be psychiatrically hospitalized for behavior that is normative within their cultures of origin, experience communication impasses that appear to reflect resistance, or have standards for gendered behavior that defy local mores. For example, a client who practices voodoo may be diagnosed with a delusion of mind control; a Chinese client may fail to make eye contact with his or her clinician (in order to show respect); an Orthodox Jewish male client may refuse to shake hands with a female service provider. While these clients may need care, accessing appropriate services may be difficult for them if their actions are interpreted as hostile or pathological. Without cultural awareness training, this risk is highlighted.

Revictimization of Abuse Survivors

People who come to the attention of authorities may have histories of abuse by others. Characteristics of hospitals, police stations, correctional facilities, therapy offices, schools, or other settings may resemble the circumstances under which such clients were abused. This may elicit feelings of extreme distress, noncompliance, withdrawal from services, or behaviors such as self-mutilation or aggression. Institutional policies and protocols may fail to take this into account. For example, substance abuse treatment facilities that incorporate confrontation and breaking down of residents (generally by male authority figures) may remind female survivors of earlier emotional, sexual, or physical abuse.

Asking clients with abuse histories to surrender to a higher power (as is common in Alcohol Anonymous meetings) may undermine their hard-won efforts toward self-determination. Common environmental cues that stimulate intense stress responses include physical restraint, violations of personal space, strobe lights, sounds that resemble explosions, and visible weapons; however, responses are unique based on individual histories. Institutional agents may also label client survival strategies as pathological or criminal. For example, actions taken by a person in captivity may involve criminal behavior (e.g., prostitution or robbery) that would not have occurred under other circumstances. Such inattention to the subjective experiences of client populations can be viewed as an element of institutional oppression. Trauma-informed care protocols, designed to mitigate this problem, have been developed for institutional application. However, these have not been widely disseminated or adopted.

Medication and Institutional Oppression

In difficult fiscal times, when human resources are scarce, providers may rely more heavily on medication and restraint than psychotherapy when addressing agitated clients. A specific form of institutional oppression is overmedication, or forced medication, when used primarily for purposes of restraint. It can be difficult for an outside observer to ascertain whether a prescribed medication is a form of treatment or control. It is possible for institutions to blur the distinction and present an intervention as beneficent when its use serves institutional, rather than client, needs.

Solutions: Empowerment, Cultural Competency, and Inclusion

Human services providers who are aware of institutional oppression have taken steps to address it. Some agencies have developed policies to minimize this problem. A key element is client empowerment, which includes offering as much control as possible to clients and adopting a symmetrical or egalitarian stance. This includes behaviors such as sharing diagnoses with clients, developing shared goals, honoring client perspectives on problems, detailing client strengths in assessments, incorporating clients' cultural values or practices into interventions, helping clients, acting as a liaison between clients and other institutions, and advocacy on behalf of client populations. The latter may include making changes in agency policies that affect clients, developing grants to offer more client-friendly programs, or activism at community, state, or national levels.

Some agencies approach the problem by working with staff members on the assumption that organizational cultures can be changed one employee at a time. Staff may be offered experiential trainings to heighten their awareness of, and empathy for, minority groups. These are for purposes of decreasing tension among diverse staff and increasing success with minority clients, and may include self-exploration, debunking of stereotypes, education, hypothetical case conferences, or role playing. Members of particular groups, or survivors of particular difficulties, may be invited as guest speakers.

Some agencies have attempted to minimize institutional oppression of clients by including members of the client population on boards and as staff. Current or past service recipients may identify issues that would otherwise be overlooked. For example, by hiring people with disabilities and placing them in visible locations, an agency for the disabled may send the message that people with disabilities (1) are valued by the organization,

(2) can become successful, and (3) are included in the development and provision of services.

Controversies

Controversies may emerge in discussions concerning institutional oppression. There are questions about whether anyone can be considered oppressed; for example, Caucasian male workers whose traditional advantages are being eroded by the influx of minorities. Another controversy concerns to what degree institutions should cater to the needs of minority or traumatized groups (as opposed to expecting them to conform to social norms in exchange for services). In a conservative fiscal environment, what expenditures should occur in order to ensure equal access to services by all clients? On an individual level, questions may arise regarding the best way to address clients of different backgrounds without becoming excessively preoccupied with form over content. Given the difficulty of understanding all minority groups and the risk of stereotyping people on the basis of their characteristics, is it worth the effort to become culturally competent and antioppressive? On a broader level, there are those who may question the wisdom of equal access for all people, believing that only the most persistent and normative deserve help. Human services workers may feel overwhelmed with current responsibilities and take issue with attempts to add more expectations to their roles. Despite these ongoing controversies, there is general agreement that the ideal of equal access to effective services has not yet been actualized.

Karen Rich
Marywood University

See Also: Cultural Competence, Human Services Providers and; Providers, Institutional Racism and; Victim Services.

Further Readings

Abers, Rebecca N. Deepening Democracy: Institutional Innovations in Empowered Participatory Governance Vol. 4. New York: Verso, 2003.

Cockerham, William C. The Sociology of Mental Disorder (9th ed.). Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson, 2014.

Vinson, Kevin D. “Oppression, Anti-Oppression, and Citizenship Education.” The Social Studies Curriculum: Purposes, Problems, and Possibilities, v.3 (2006).

Young, Iris Marion. “Five Faces of Oppression.” Geographic Thought. A Praxis Perspective (2009).

Intangible Cultural Heritage

Culture is an abstract and amorphous concept that has plagued many scholars in how to adequately define it. It is generally thought of as an overarching concept that can be broken down into various components in order to serve the purpose of the current conversation in which it is being deployed. Intangible cultural heritage moves beyond this perplexing conceptualization of culture by encapsulating the very essence and numerous tangents that culture, as defined in the past, has been linked to. Intangible cultural heritage is best understood as an accumulation of immaterial aspects of culture and how they represent the living components of that culture while emphasizing a very diverse understanding of culture in general. By employing this definition, intangible cultural heritage suggests a definition of culture that is no longer expository but suggests the ability to engage in activity and create specific processes that define culture and cultures internationally.

Intangible cultural heritage is commonly thought of as a Western concept that originated as a need to explain growing diversity and exchange of cultures all over the world. Basic concepts of culture primarily involve notions of tangible items such as food, clothing, proximity of persons in relation to one another, and so on. Intangible cultural heritage moves beyond this scope to address idiosyncrasies of thought, emotions, language, ideas, and customs. In this sense, intangible cultural heritage is the catalyst that propels tangible forms of culture to be sculpted and manipulated and, more specifically, to be read using a certain lens. In doing this, intangible cultural heritage creates a platform in which access to countless cultures and heritage communities are provided. However, to correctly engage intangible cultural heritage in everyday conversations requires a sensitive awareness of various cultures and the motivation and purpose for why they have chosen the specific set of intangible cultural artifacts to convey meaning and substance about their culture. The assignment of understanding, creating an environment where intangible cultural heritage can thrive, and its historical conception will be further explained so as to understand the value it has in current conversation and scholarship.

Heritage and the passing down of culture is an age-old concept that has morphed into various forms over the centuries. Intangible cultural heritage emerged in the 1950s to assist in creating a platform for the ever-growing conversations, and sometimes conflicts, that arose when various cultures started engaging with one another. Historically, cultures and people all over the world have engaged in knowledge exchange with one another, but the 1950s proved to be a decade that catapulted the world into truly being a multicultural arena in which businesses, lives, and attitudes would be forever altered. One of the more important concepts to understand about intangible cultural heritage is that it is not meant to necessarily replace previous impressions about culture, but rather, it is a supplement that should allow a richer and more nuanced understanding of culture, how it is employed, and the deeper complexities that are often visualized through tangible artifacts; yet these tangible artifacts are not a definitive means in which to understand the process that is intangible cultural heritage. This cautionary note is necessary in understanding intangible cultural heritage and the current prescriptions in place to protect and preserve it. It is unfathomable to restrict intangible cultural heritage solely into concrete tangible items and terms; it is necessary to always concentrate on it as a process and performance that is rooted in the evolution of daily living. Intangible cultural heritage is the performance and presentation of everyday lives and events and more importantly how they interact with one another. Given this circumstance, the major discussion surrounding intangible cultural heritage is how to protect and preserve it.

Various reports articulate the necessity to preserve and protect intangible cultural heritage. A movement that began in the 1950s and is currently in progress is the protection and preservation of intangible cultural heritage. This conversation first emerged in the Hague Convention of 1954 to first address the potential threat that intangible cultural heritage might accrue in cases of armed conflict. It wasn't until the 1960s and 1970s that the movement began to concentrate on adequately defining intangible cultural heritage. The 1980s indicated a shift in not only defining intangible cultural heritage but also in making large strides in creating concrete legal sanctions to protect it. These changes came about during a campaign spearheaded by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). The most recent undertaking in preserving, protecting, and understanding intangible cultural heritage has been the Proclamation of Masterpieces of the Oral and Intangible Heritage of Humanity, which was enacted by the executive board of UNESCO in the 1980s. Current debates that fuel the need to protect intangible cultural heritage stem from the overarching need to label agency and understand how such concepts, which are embodied in intangible cultural heritage, are conveyed. Ownership of intangible cultural heritage, identifying who transmits the concepts associated with intangible cultural heritage, and the ethics surrounding the protection and preservation of intangible cultural heritage lie at the heart of contemporary discourse.

The areas are considered important challenges because of the very nature that intangible cultural heritage is—actually, how it is presented. Speaking to larger concepts again, tangible components of culture require a less myopic view in understanding and employing them because they can oftentimes be physically seen and held, and therefore, ownership and agency can be readily argued and remedied more easily than aspects of culture that are based primarily as concepts. In contemporary dialogues, it is paramount to conclusively define the multifaceted components of intangible cultural heritage because they, just like their tangible counterparts, are no longer encased within physical or social boundaries. With the ever-increasing interaction of cultures on various social stages, it is not only essential to understand how intangible cultural heritage is understood but also the results of its interactions. The importance of understanding the functionality of intangible cultural heritage accurately is primarily associated with fully understanding that the function of immaterial culture is often best understood by the person assigning the meaning; this is particularly useful while engaging in current debates as stated previously. The current debates concentrate on the invariable need to protect and preserve intangible cultural heritage and have sculpted arguments to refined situations due to occurrences that have required the necessity to view intangible cultural heritage through a myopic lens. But many of the arguments are reminiscent of the first convention and purpose for protecting and preserving the culture, which hinged upon potential threat during times of armed conflict. This is important to discuss because at the core of intangible cultural heritage is the concept of the highly theorized notion of tangible and intangible artifacts and the fluidity between the two. It is imperative that intangible cultural heritage concentrates on the psychological process of culture rather than confining it to the tangible artifacts currently used in cultural discourse because this will allow the vague notion of intangible cultural heritage to become easily vocalized and better understood.

If previous events are demonstrative of anything, it is that any future conversations about intangible cultural heritage will be discussed and critiqued in the arena of politics. The way to move forward with intangible cultural heritage, either to protect it, preserve it, or fully understand the idiosyncrasies involved with it, is to dissect the elements of it within the political arena. This is particularly important because heritage, whether tangible or intangible, is equivocal with power in today's conversations. Current debates emphasize the need to protect intangible cultural heritage because it is easily misunderstood and pliable due to its interpretative nature. In this aspect, it becomes imperative to secure the neutrality of intangible cultural heritage while at the same time protecting and preserving it. Intangible cultural heritage, at best, is a process of lived experiences that cannot, and should not, be confined to tangible artifacts. It is an ideology that serves to move beyond the traditional conceptualizations of culture. Therefore, contemporary dialogues concentrate on preserving and protecting intangible cultural heritage, not only for reasons previously mentioned but also so that a more concrete definition can be applied to the idea of intangible cultural heritage, presumably assisting in the preservation process.

Mariah Jade Zimpfer
University of Edinburgh

See Also: Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cross-Cultural Skills; Western Communities and Cultural Competence.

Further Readings

Kearney, Amanda. "Theorising ICH" in Intangible Heritage. London: Routledge, 2009.

Lenzerini, Federico. "Intangible Cultural Heritage: The Living Cultural of Peoples." European Journal of International Law, v.22/1 (2011).

Moghadam, Valentine M. and Manilee Bagheritari. "Cultures, Conventions, and the Human Rights of Women: Examining the Convention for Safeguarding Intangible Cultural Heritage and the Declaration on Cultural Diversity." Museum International, v.59/4 (2007).

Pietrobruno, Sheenagh. "Cultural Research and Intangible Heritage." Cultural Unbound, v.1 (2009).

Vecco, Marilena. "A Definition of Cultural Heritage: From the Tangible to the Intangible." Journal of Cultural Heritage, v.11 (2010).

Intelligence Testing

The field of intelligence testing has had a long and controversial history. Today, intelligence tests are used throughout the world to make important decisions for individuals in education, medicine, vocation, the military, employment, and many other areas needing to answer questions concerning a person's aptitude and ability. Many different definitions of intelligence exist in the scientific literature; therefore, many different techniques and methods have been developed to assess intelligence for various purposes. For example, certain intelligence tests must be given individually in a one-on-one setting, administered and interpreted by a trained professional, while other types of intelligence tests can be given to a group of individuals and provide a screening of cognitive abilities. However, with no cohesive, all-encompassing definition or theory of intelligence, no single test of intelligence can give a full understanding of an individual's cognitive functioning.

Most traditional intelligence tests give a single score of global functioning. However, a low score on an intelligence test may not be an appropriate indicator of intelligence or ability but may instead be affected by other factors such as education quality and opportunities, socioeconomic status, health, and level of acculturation. The trend in the psychological and testing community is moving toward assessing patterns or profiles of various cognitive abilities rather than attempting to interpret an overall general score of intelligence. Most current assessment instruments published today help determine that an individual has adequate functioning in a specific environment such as work, school, or social settings.

Thus, a pattern of certain cognitive abilities of an individual may indicate higher intelligences in some societies or cultures than the same pattern in an individual from other societies or cultures. As a global community, there are many intellectual abilities we share, such as verbal comprehension, speed of cognitive processing, and memory, and different cultures place different values on each of these abilities.

The ability of intelligence tests to make life-altering decisions regarding individuals is questionable in terms of diversity and culture. For example, representations of intelligence scores differ among various ethnicities. In the United States, Asian Americans tend score above average, African Americans tend to score below average, and white Americans tend to score on the average with most major intelligence test published. The reasoning behind such differences is debatable, with cultural bias of the actual intelligence tests being the main topic of discussion. However, with better representation among the major ethnicities, socioeconomic statuses, and education levels during the development of these intelligence tests, these differences among scores are becoming less pronounced.

Attempts have been made to create culture-free tests to reduce the error associated with these differences among individuals. Because there are countless cultures and subcultures in the world, it seems impossible to completely avoid any cultural bias in standardized intelligence testing. Human beings exist in a world where culture and diversity evolve as a result of new social structures. As an example, language is a major part of any culture. Some word usage may be prominent in one area of a country, but it may be unheard or have a different meaning in another part of the country. Therefore, to simply translate an intelligence test word for word into the native language of the test taker, the test would lose its ability to adequately assess the individual in a consistent and reliable manner. Even the most culturally sound standardized intelligence test given today will not be culturally sound in 10 years because culture and social structures are constantly changing.

More questions exist than answers when intelligence testing and its impact on diversity are considered. Also, as there is no unifying and global theory of intelligence, no particular test can adequately measure all the abilities of an individual needed for successful development in this world. Other factors that can affect test scores or intelligence are education quality and opportunities, socioeconomic status, and health. Therefore, intelligence tests must be written and administered with cultural sensitivity in mind to give a test taker the most precise results. If an intelligence test does not accurately measure one's intelligence without sensitivity to his or her background, but is the determinant of his or her future, the results can be detrimental and ruin opportunities.

Kurt T. Choate
Jackie Flaherty
David Porter
Northeastern State University

See Also: Children With Special Needs; Cultural Competence, Human Services Providers and; Education for Diversity in Human Services; Educational Services; Learning Disabilities, Services for Individuals With; Psychiatric; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment; School Psychologists; Special Education.

Further Readings

Flanagan, Dawn P. and Patti L. Harrison, eds. Contemporary Intellectual Assessment: Theories, Tests, and Issues, 3rd ed. New York: Guilford Press, 2012.

Hunt, Earl and Jerry Carlson. "Considerations Relating to the Study of Group Differences in Intelligence." Perspectives on Psychological Science, v.2/2 (2007).

Sternberg, Robert J. and Scott Barry Kaufmann, eds. The Cambridge Handbook of Intelligence. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2011.

Interethnic Adoption Provision

The guiding principle in child welfare practice and policy decision making is the best interest of the child. This principle informs decisions about child abuse substantiations, case planning, and placement decisions. A secondary goal is to achieve permanency for children as all children deserve a secure, caring, and safe environment. Although the majority of children in the public child welfare system reunify with their families than are adopted, adoption and adoption practices have received a fair amount of legislative and policy attention.

This secondary goal has been a source of controversy in child welfare practice and policy in relation to the role of race and ethnicity in placement decisions. Race and ethnicity are sometimes used interchangeably, but there is a distinction. Race is used as a category to group persons who have shared physical and genetic characteristics. Ethnicity as a category is based on common ancestry, culture, language, customs, beliefs, nationality, or a combination of these aspects. The United States Congress passed a pair of laws in the 1990s to address race-based preference in placement decisions in foster care and adoption. The Removal of Barriers to Interethnic Adoption (Interethnic Adoption Provisions), the second law, reinforced race-based preferences and permanency for children in the public child welfare system.

Outcomes and Racial Preferences

The outcomes for children involved in the public child welfare system or foster care have been scrutinized over time. Particular attention has been given to minority children. Minority children in foster care have disproportionately more disparate outcomes compared to white children in foster care. The role of race in child abuse reporting, abuse substantiations, and placement decisions has a long and complicated history in the public child welfare system in the United States. Historically, minority children have comprised the largest amount of children in out-of-home care. African American children are disproportionately represented in out-of-home care and within foster care in general. State and local statistics report similar disparities for children of color. Moreover, children of color face a number of barriers to permanency, particularly in the area of adoption. Minority children are adopted at lower rates and remain in the foster care system longer compared to white children.

Historically, race-based matching was the standard practice for foster and adoptive placements. Although this was not the only factor considered, race, ethnicity, and national origin were important factors. Proponents of this practice suggested that children needed racially matched but safe homes to promote racial socialization and develop a positive self-identity. On the other hand, critics argued that racial matching contributed to the high numbers of children of color, particularly African American children, remaining in foster care for too long. Moreover, critics suggested appropriate homes for these children could be found if was race were not a key factor in placement decision making. In short, if was race was not a primary determining factor, children could be placed in stable homes with foster or adoptive parents of a different race.

Predecessor to the Interethnic Adoption Provisions

To address the concerns about permanency for youth and racial matching in placement decision making, in 1994, the United States Congress passed the Multiethnic Placement Act (MEPA, P.L. 103-382). Prior to the passage of MEPA, standard practice within child welfare agencies regarding adoptive placements was to consider the race and ethnicity of adoptive parents along with the ability to meet the child's needs when evaluating potential placement. MEPA attempted to address these barriers but prohibited federally funded agencies from preventing adoptive or foster care placement solely on the basis of race, color, or national origin of the adoptive or foster child and the adoptive or foster parent. Moreover, MEPA required agencies to actively identify and recruit foster and adoptive families that reflected the racial and ethnic diversity of children in the foster care system. Race and ethnicity remained one factor for placement consideration, but this was one of several factors used to evaluate placements.

Interethnic Adoption Provisions

The Removal of Barriers to Interethnic Adoption (Interethnic Adoption Provisions) was inserted into an omnibus bill, the Small Business Protection

Act, and became law in August 1996. The law is now a part of the Social Security Act under the Title IV-E Foster Care and Adoption Assistance. This legislation was introduced and passed because Congress believed the original intent of MEPA was not being followed. Moreover, the Interethnic Adoption Provisions remove any existing ambiguity about whether race, color, or national origin could be deciding factors in foster or adoptive placements. The Interethnic Adoption Provisions rescinded and changed portions of MEPA.

Specifically, the Interethnic Adoption Provisions reinforced the prohibition of race and ethnicity as the primary factor for consideration in placement decisions. Furthermore, similar to MEPA, the Interethnic Adoption Provisions explicitly stated that any person or government entity involved in public agency adoption and foster care placement could not deny a prospective adoptive or foster parent placement consideration on the basis of race, color, or national origin. Additionally, the legislation prohibited persons or government entities from delaying placement based on race, color, or national origin. Lastly, the Interethnic Adoption Provisions removed language found in MEPA that allowed consideration of race, color, or national origin when assessing the best interest of the child and the prospective parents' abilities to meet those needs. If an agency placed children based on these considerations, the legislation called for the agency to provide a compelling reason for making this decision.

The legislation's language included rules for enforcement. Agencies in violation of the requirements that failed to implement a corrective action plan within six months received a reduction in their Title IV-E payments of 2 percent for each quarter of the fiscal year for the first violation, increasing to 3 percent for the second violation and 5 percent for the third. Moreover, other entities in the state receiving Title IV-E funds that violate the Interethnic Adoption Provisions must return all Title IV-E funds.

Similar to MEPA, the passage of the Interethnic Adoption Provisions was controversial and difficult to implement. Prior to the passage of these laws, child welfare professionals and researchers emphasized racial matching in placement decisions as a matter of solid social work practice and law. Professionals in favor of some race matching suggested these placements. Under these new regulations, agencies and practitioners were expected to change practices that were institutionalized.

Felicia Law Murray
Texas Woman's University

See Also: Adoption and Safe Families Act; Child Welfare Services; Multiethnic Placement Act of 1994.

Further Readings

42 U.S.C. § 471a(3)(A)(B). Removal of Barriers to Interethnic Adoption (Interethnic Adoption Provisions) (P.L. 104-188).

42 U.S.C. § 5115a. Howard M. Metzenbaum Multiethnic Placement Act of 1994 (MEPA). (P.L. 103-382).

Barth, R. "Child Welfare and Race: Models of Disproportionality." In D. M. Derezotes, J. Poertner, and M. F. Testa, eds., Race Matters in Child Welfare: The Overrepresentation of African American Children in the System. Washington, DC: CWLA Press, 2005.

Bartholet, E. "Where Do the Black Children Belong? The Politics of Race Matching in Adoption." University of Pennsylvania Law Review, v.139 (1991).

Brooks, D., R. P. Barth, A. Bussiere, and G. Patterson. "Adoption and Race: Implementing the Multiethnic Placement Act and the Interethnic Adoption Provisions." Social Work, v.44/2 (1999).

Brooks, D. and D. Webster. "Child Welfare in the United States: Policy, Practice, and Innovations in Service Delivery." International Journal of Social Welfare, v.8 (1999).

McRoy, R., M. Mica, M. Freundlich, and J. Kroll. "Making MEPA–IEP Work: Tools for Professionals." Child Welfare, v.86/2 (2007).

Interfaith Couples

Difficulties and problems are regular occurrences with any couple; however, interfaith couples, a term used to describe partnerships between two people of differing faiths, which may or may not include religious affiliations, present unique and complex trials in addition to typical challenges. It is rare to find couples that have not, to an extent, overlooked important issues during the dating or courtship stage of the relationship. Many issues are important to discuss for any couple, but for interfaith couples, those issues can become magnified when they include sociological, historical, and existential factors. Often, interfaith couples face a lack of acceptance from their parents and religious communities. Dilemmas arise that include decisions about life events, holidays, and raising children. Dynamics of interfaith couples are complex and multilayered culturally and psychologically.

Sociological, Historical, and Existential Factors

Historically, research has indicated interreligious relationships between individuals from major religious influences have higher divorce rates than couples who differ in faith but share the same religion. A common experience interreligious couples face is the lack of acceptance by religious institutions and parents. Many parents affiliated with traditional religions are not supportive in their children's attempt to integrate different customs and traditions into the traditional religion. Some religious institutions may view it as a significant threat to their religious existence, enacting religious laws against such acts. Interfaith couples may also experience significant guilt from parents, who may insinuate the child is destroying the history of the religious tradition by integrating faiths.

During the courtship experience, couples are often so overcome by the excitement of the new relationship that they miss out on the opportunity to discuss important dynamics of the potential long-term relationship. This phenomenon is not unique to interfaith couples. Later, interfaith couples may experience emotionally charged conversations or disagreements that may stem from fundamental differences in the manner in which each partner views existential aspects of the world or his or her existence. On the surface, the disagreements may not be obvious, but underlying differences were developed from the way in which each views themes of life, death, mortality, inferences on the nature of man, meaning and purpose of existence, and the relationship between self and community in a broad sense. The result is a much more complicated discussion than those that all couples tend to experience; interfaith couples may end up arguing over issues involving the nature of their existence and identities.

Decisions and Dilemmas

Even if each partner is not particularly religious, it is not uncommon for partners of interfaith couples to realize they care more about their respective faith traditions than they had originally thought when the relationship began. With this comes the meanings and celebrations of religious holidays, the value of raising their children as a specific religious follower, or the desire to integrate certain aspects of his or her faith into their offspring. As the couple continues to progress through their lives, common decisions inevitably arise and often become very emotional. A short list of decisions regarding the interfaith couple's life cycle include but are not limited to the wedding ceremony and officiate, holiday plans and choosing which holidays to celebrate, how thoroughly to celebrate specific holidays based on religious traditions and ties, joining religious congregations, baptism, circumcision, formal religious schooling, and religious rituals or rites of passage into symbolic adulthood. In addition, the way the couple goes about making decisions will impact their child's identity and security because decision making will elicit dynamics within the couple's interpersonal relationship, which may display underlying power battles or control needs.

Dynamics of the Relationship

In couples, it is common to not share the same faith despite sharing the same religion. An individual's faith mirrors his or her ultimate concerns for existence. The way in which an individual goes about his or her daily life is, most likely, directly correlated to his or her faith in the way life works or the general purpose of life. All marriages experience problems, but interfaith marriages are complicated by differences within existential and sociological factors. It is absolutely possible for an interfaith couple to maintain a successful relationship. It requires tremendous amounts of authenticity, communication, and intentionality. Partners can meet the difficulties head-on by communicating and learning to listen and understand their own, and their partner's, religious and faith backgrounds. Learning to articulate theologies, as well as listen with an open mind to their partner's theologies, builds trust and vulnerability within the relationship. Techniques used in counseling to assist in strengthening communication include role-playing the other's view, as well as reading books or taking classes together in order to discuss each other's traditions, and to provide the vocabulary to open verbal dialogue.

Differences must be transformed from a battle of power into a valuable opportunity to engage in problem solving as a unit. Finding solutions, rather than avoiding the problems, will inevitably provide structure and solidify identities for the couple and their children. Religion is essentially utilized to cope with and improve the quality of one's life. Faiths and religions utilize rituals and traditions that work to provide inspiration and comfort as well as enhance the lives of those who partake in them. Interfaith couples and families would do well to embrace this view as an introduction to integration.

Greg A. Meyer
Northeastern State University

See Also: Biracial Couples; Divorce; Fundamentalist Christian Americans; Interfaith Couples; Jewish Americans; Marriage Counseling; Mormons; Muslims; Native Americans; Pacific Islanders; Religion and Clients; Spirituality/Religion and Diversity.

Further Readings

Caffaro, John. "Fundamentalism and the Search for Divinity: The Varied Role of Religion in Interfaith Couples." Journal of Family Psychotherapy, v.22 (2013).

Greenstein, Daniel, Jon Carlson, and Candace W. Howell. "Counseling With Interfaith Couples." Individual Psychology, v.49 (1993).

Horowitz, June A. "Negotiating Couplehood: The Process of Resolving the December Dilemma Among Interfaith Couples." Family Process, v.38 (1999).

Internal Revenue Service's Migration Data Files

The Statistics of Income (SOI) Division of the United States Internal Revenue Service (IRS) annually publishes data, based on individual tax returns, providing data about migration within the United States, in the form of the IRS Migration Files. One set of files provides information about in-migration and out-migration from one state to another (state-to-state migration), and the second provides information about in-migration and out-migration from one county to another (county-to-county migration). Although these files are based on tax records and are therefore not a complete census of population movement within the United States, as discussed below, they can provide valuable information about patterns of migration within the country.

The IRS Migration Files are produced by the U.S. Census Bureau from the IRS Master File (IMF) for each year, which includes administrative data from all individual returns filed by late September (95 to 98 percent of all individual tax returns for a given year). The IMF provided to the Census Bureau includes the following information: tax filing units, that is, the filer, filer's spouse, and exemptions claimed; mailing address; age classification (under or over age 65); income data, including wages and salaries, interest income, dividends, royalties, and gross rents; adjusted gross income; and a Protective Identification Number (PIK) to identify the return without jeopardizing confidentiality (names and Social Security numbers are stripped from the returns before they are sent to the Census Bureau). Note that the year of the IMFs is the tax year, which is the calendar year following that in which the income was earned—for instance, income earned in 2012 would be reported on an individual's 2013 tax return—and migration is always reported in two-year increments, such as the 2012 to 2013 migration data.

The Census Bureau assigns geocodes (geographic codes) for state and county to the IMF data, with county-equivalent codes assigned to the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, military addresses (AFO/FPO), and similar regions. Migration status is assigned by the Census Bureau by comparing the current year's returns with those of the previous year: If the geocodes for both state and country are the same, the individual is classed as a nonmigrant, while if they differ, he or she is a migrant. For those classified as migrants, they are in-migrants to the locations identified on the current year's tax return and out-migrants from the location of the previous year's return.

After the data are geocoded and the migration status calculated, the data are returned to the IRS, who checks them for outliers and formats and prepares the files for public release. The data are made available to the public as comma-separated values files (.csv), which can be opened and analyzed using a spreadsheet program such as Microsoft Excel, and as generic ASCII files (.dat), which can be opened and analyzed in a statistical program such as SAS or SPSS but require the use of a record layout, which is available on the same Web page as the data files. As of December 2013, IRS Migration File data for 1990 through 2010 are available for free download.

For each state, inflow and outflow files provide the number of returns (used to estimate the number of households), the number of exemptions (used to estimate the number of individuals), and aggregate adjusted gross income. Migrants and nonmigrants are listed separately, and migrants are further broken down into those who migrated to or from foreign countries, other states in the United States, and total migrants (either another state or country). Similar information is provided in the county-to-county migration files, with the addition of a category for those who migrated to or from a different county within the same state.

Limitations

The IMFs are not a perfect record of internal migration for several reasons. First of all, not everyone is required to or does file an income tax return, and those individuals (and members of their households) who do not file are not present in the IMFs; this makes the files not only incomplete but also biased because the poor and elderly are less likely to file a return and thus be included in the data. Second, persons who file after September are excluded, as noted above, and this also introduces bias into the data because very late filers are disproportionately those who have complex returns and high income. For these two reasons, the IMFs are likely to underrepresent both the very poor and the very rich. Regions with only a few filers may also be underrepresented because some data is removed from the public files for reasons of confidentiality—in state data tables, cells with fewer than three returns are suppressed, and in county data tables, cells with fewer than 10 returns are suppressed

Some returns are excluded because of matching problems; for instance, if a married couple files jointly one year, then divorces and files separately the next year, only the primary taxpayer will be matched over the two years. If a married couple files jointly one year and separately the next, this also will result in only the primary taxpayer being matched across the two years. Migration can be over- or undercounted because it is based on the filing address, which might not represent the person's true residence; for instance, it might be a place of business, a post office box, or a tax preparer's office. In addition, the address might be that of a college student who files from his or her home address one year and college address the other or a person with dual residences who files one year from one address and the second year from another address. Finally, a person could have moved during the period under study and still be classified as a nonmigrant; for instance, if they moved to a different address within the same county.

Sarah Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University

See Also: Acculturation; Assimilation; Border Communities; Isolated Communities and Cultural Competence; Rural Communities; Southern Communities and Cultural Competence; Urban Communities and Human Services; Western Communities and Cultural Competence.

Further Readings

Internal Revenue Service. SOI Tax Stats—County to County Migration Data Files. http://www.irs.gov/uac/SOI-Tax-Stats-County-to-County-Migration-Data-Files (Accessed December 2013).

Internal Revenue Service. SOI Tax Stats—Migration Data Users Guide. http://www.irs.gov/uac/SOI-Tax-Stats-Migration-Data-Users-Guide (Accessed December 2013).

Internal Revenue Service. SOI Tax Stats—State to State Migration Data Files. http://www.irs.gov/uac/SOI-Tax-Stats-State-to-State-Migration-Database-Files (Accessed December 2013).

Lindo, Jason M. "Aggregation and the Estimated Effects of Local Economic Conditions on Health." NBER Working Paper No. 19042 (May 2013). http://www.nber.org/papers/w19042 (Accessed December 2013).

Molloy, Raven, Christopher L. Smith, and Abigail K. Wozniak. "Internal Migration in the United States." NBER Working Paper No. 17307 (August 2011). http://www.nber.org/papers/w17307 (Accessed December 2013).

Sharma, Andy. "The Chain Is Only as Strong as the Weakest Link: Older Adult Migration and the First Move." Research on Aging, v.35/5 (2013).

International Adoptions and Families

International or intercountry adoption is a process of legal transfer of parental rights and responsibilities for a child from a different country of one's citizenship. Through this process, the child gains the citizenship of the parent(s). In the United States, international adoptions can either be completed with the help of a nonprofit adoption agency that is licensed in the state of operation, or independently (also known as parent initiated or direct 31 adoption). Both types of international adoption use a third party, such as an adoption agency or lawyer, to help reduce bureaucracy. From 1999 to 2012, American families completed over 242,000 international adoptions. Over 172,000 of these adoptions were of children ages 3 and under. China, Ethiopia, and South Korea are the top countries for international adoption. In 2008, Guatemala was number one, but it has since closed to international adoptions with the United States. International adoption can be a long and difficult process because it involves the governments of two countries. Adoptive parents often need support and services pre- and post-adoption.

Pre-adoption services that families may require include home study or assessment conducted by a state-licensed social worker. Families beginning the process of adopting internationally will be required to meet state, federal, and foreign government regulations. Families build an adoption dossier filled with complete paperwork such as a home study, letter of intent to adopt, photographs of family and home, and an application for adoption, among many other forms. Families benefit from meeting with a social worker to assess their readiness for adoption. Perspective adoptive parents are usually required to complete parent training before completion of the dossier. Social workers track perspective adoptive parents' progress through the training. Families often seek out the support of adoption groups to assist with not only the emotions and uncertainty that are common during the process, but also to learn more about what to expect in country and once home. Along with the joys of anticipation, families can feel the sadness of lost referrals or delays. Families may benefit from counseling to cope with issues such as anxiety, sense of loss over lost referral, and grief over delays.

There are several services that families may require post-adoption. The most common services that families with children internationally adopted require include therapy and counseling, support groups, heritage activities, respite care, and educational resources.

Therapy and Counseling

International adoptions vary, and the needs of families and children are equally diverse. International adoptions are a result in loss of birth rights of birth parents. Children are usually placed in an orphanage or with a foster family. Children who endure such loss and/or neglect may require therapy or counseling. Common issues that internationally adopted children may face include attachment, trust, or behavioral problems. Parents may face unexpected effects of the adoption, including strain on relationships like marriage or with other children in the home. Families become accustomed to waiting for and dreaming of the adoptive child. Families may face what is commonly referred to as the "adoption blues" after returning home with the child. Because international adoption is a long and often challenging process, the completed adoption may not match expectations. The services of a professional therapist or counselor may help a family with any of these issues before they become a serious problem.

Support Groups

Families often choose to continue participation in face-to-face support groups and/or online groups once the child is home. In a support group, families with internally adopted children find a sense of belonging not often found among family and friends. Adoptive families gain from interacting with others who experience similar events, challenges, and joys. In addition to families, the adopted children may benefit from participating in support groups. Many communities offer international playgroups organized by adoptive agencies, social workers, or adoptive parents. As they grow, the children will have questions and gain from hearing from other children who may share a similar perspective. Children adopted internationally often feel a sense of loss and confusion of identity. Interacting with peers who share a similar beginning in life may help with feeling "normal." Families created through international adoption share a unique perspective.

Heritage Activities

Ethnic heritage camps provide families and children an opportunity to form significant friendships. Families spend time together in a camp setting doing both traditional camp activities and ethnic-focused activities. Families need a chance to be among similar families, especially transracial families, creating a positive environment for children. It is common that international adopted families encounter intrusive questions from others. Ethnic heritage or adoption camps provide a safe environment for children to interact without the intrusive questions and feeling that they are on display. Adoptive families may participate in adoptive parent-led groups that often offer group and recreational events. Children benefit from learning about their birth countries. Research shows that a healthy identity begins with understanding one's ethnic heritage.

Respite Care

The international adoption process is often overwhelming. Children who are adopted internationally can have a bumpy transition into their new homes. Many of what a person encounters in his or her everyday life can be dramatically overstimulating for the child. Children often face attachment and trust issues that can be draining. Parents may need temporary relief and time to refuel during the time when the child is transitioning and the family is establishing a new normal. Respite care provides parents with a skilled social worker to assist with childcare for a temporary period of time. Such care provided through a respite care program is more skilled in adoption issues than a regular babysitter. State and county agencies provide respite care for adoptive families.

Educational Resources

Social workers and other adoption professionals provide adoptive families with information about the transitioning process as well as other issues they may face. These professionals provide referrals to services. Families often benefit from attending workshops on relevant topics. The international adoptive family is ever changing, as is the need for support services. Children grow and needs change over time. It is important that families receive ongoing access to support services, not just during the time when the child enters the family. Services are provided by many different organizations including public state and county adoption agencies and health and mental health providers.

Diane M. Monahan
Saint Leo University

See Also: Adoption Agencies and Services; Adoptions, Infants, International and Older/Special Needs Children; Adoption, Special Needs.

Further Readings

Cogen, Patty. Parenting Your Internationally Adopted Child: From Your First Hours Together Through the Teen Years. Cambridge, MA: Harvard Common Press, 2008.

Davenport, D. The Complete Book of International Adoption: A Step-by-Step Guide to Finding Your Child. New York: Harmony, 2006.

Marre, D. and L. Briggs. International Adoption: Global Inequalities and the Circulation of Children. New York: New York University Press, 2009.

International Federation of Social Workers

The International Federation of Social Workers (IFSW) is the global body for professional social work. As an international organization, the IFSW works in cooperation with the world regional social work bodies, national organizations, and other related associations in representing the interest of social workers around the world. The purpose of the organization is to contribute to achieving social work through professional social work activities. The IFSW is a global federation of national organizations of social workers endeavoring for social justice, human rights, and social development. The organization and its partners seek to promote social work as a profession, review and set the international standards for social work, and provide the definition of social work and policies that promote best practice outcome.

History

At the 1950 International Conference of Social Work in Paris, an agreement was reached to create the IFSW, an international organization (federation) of professional social workers. The federation was to be a successor to the International Permanent Secretariat of Social Workers (IPSSW), which was founded in 1928 at the first International Conference on Social Work in Paris, France. A part of the 1950 decision was that the IFSW would come into existence when seven national organizations at that time agreed to become members. Meanwhile, the IPSSW operated form offices in Berlin, Geneva, and Prague until the formation of IFSW. It was not until 1956, at the time of the meeting of the International Conference on Social Welfare in Munich, Germany, that the IFSW was finally founded. Thereafter, a new secretariat was established in New York in the United States, sharing office space with the National Association of Social Workers.

With a joint effort with its partner organizations, the International Association of Schools of Social Work (IASSW) and the International Council on Social Welfare (ICSW), IFSW published the journal International Social Work in 1958. In 1959, IFSW was granted consultative status with the United Nations Office of Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC). The participation and contribution of IFSW at the 1960 10th World Conference Special Session in Rome, Italy, expanded the organization's recognition and prestige in a policy development role. Further, IFSW gained more international respect in 1963 when it asked and was accorded the opportunity to contribute to the United Nation survey on international training for social workers.

During the later years of the 1960s, the organization began decentralization efforts based on regional formations. Litsa Alexandraki was elected for three terms as president of IFSW, a position she administered from 1962 to 1968. Also, she was a founding member of the Hellenic Association of Social Workers and served as its president from 1961 to 1963. She (1918–1986) was highly regarded for her work in Greece on child welfare and the protection of migrants and refugees. During her presidency, she expanded the IFSW membership to Asia, Africa, and Latin America. A few other key founders and leaders of IFSW include Jane Hoey, Chauncey A. Alexander, Eileen McGowan Kelly, Celia B. Weisman, Andrew Mouravieff-Apostol, and Professor Gary Bailey. Recent secretary generals and chief executive officers include Tom Johannesen and Dr. Rory Truell. The first region was formed in Europe in 1965 and followed a regional conference for Asia in 1967. In a historical context, the South African IFSW membership was suspended in 1970 due to its Apartheid regime involvement. In 1971, the executive committee located a permanent and compensated secretariat in Basel, Switzerland, which was later moved to Geneva in 1975.

The IFSW had successful operational initiatives during the 1980s and 1990s. It developed the global definition of social work and was declared a peace messenger by the United Nations in 1985. In the 1990s, IFSW significantly increased its membership to more than 80 member associations. With a strengthened secretariat and expanded activity levels, the secretariat was moved to Oslo, Norway, in 1992 and later to Berne, Switzerland, in 1999. From the year 2000, IFSW has made significant growth and accomplishments.

Operational Organization

The IFSW is governed through an international executive committee that is democratically elected every two years at a general meeting of members. This governing committee consists of a president, treasurer, regional president, and member at large for each region. The five geographical regions of the IFSW are Africa, Asia-Pacific, Europe, Latin America, and the Caribbean and North America. Each of the regional memberships is represented by a regional president. A general meeting is convened every two years at the same time as an international conference. An elected global president and secretary general along with an elected executive committee steer the IFSW meetings and conferences. Regional seminars and conferences are held regularly in most regions and are presided over by each regional president. There is a program link called Friends of IFSW connecting associating social workers, social work students, and organizations to the international community.

Currently, the IFSW is comprised of 90 member associations representing more than 750,000 social workers worldwide. New members to the IFSW are recruited by reaching out and offering membership to emerging social work groups in nonmember nations. Retention of existing members is maintained by effectively and efficiently representing the diverse interests of social work associations and organizations around the globe. All regional and national members maintain membership status through membership dues based on the number of members. The IFSW provides member organizations in developing nations with discount membership fees.

Operations of the IFSW

The IFSW represents its members by providing a global stage for the issues of interest to the profession. IFSW has special consultative status with the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), and works with the World Health Organization (WHO), the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR). IFSW also maintains partnership with Amnesty International. Activities covered in the policy papers of IFSW include displaced persons, global climate change and the environment, health, human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) and acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), indigenous people, women, older persons, peace and social justice, poverty issues, and many more.

In 2004, the IFSW, in cooperation with the IASSW, adopted the Statement of Ethics in Social Work, Statement of Principles of Social Work, and the Global Standards for the Education and Training of the Social Work Profession. In 2005, IFSW consultative status was extended. These accomplishments are in addition to the global definition of social work, which IFSW and IASSW adopted in 2001. Noteworthy publications by the IFSW include Human Rights and Social Work: A Manual for Schools of Social Work and the Social Work Profession (1994), Social Work and the Rights of the Child (2002), Human Rights Manual (2010), and Standards in Social Work Practice Meeting Human Rights (2010). Recently, the IFSW, the IASSW, and the ICSW have collaborated in the production of the global agenda for social work and social development commitment to action. This agenda commits these three organizations to working collaboratively for the foreseeable future to improve the life chances of all of the world's people. The agenda also works to increase the articulation of the social work profession in realizing social justice for all in the international arena.

Felix O. Chima
Prairie View A&M University

See Also: American Academy of Social Work and Social Welfare; Social Work, Diversity Practice in; Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Further Readings

Hall, N. Encyclopedia of Social Work (20th ed.). Washington, DC: National Association of Social Workers Press, 2008.

Healy, L. M., Y. A. Asamoah, and M. C. Hokenstad. Models of International Collaboration in Social Work Education. Alexandria, VA: Council on Social Education, 2003.

International Association of Schools of Social Work. The Global Agenda for Social Work and Social Development Commitment to Action. http://www.cswe.org/File.aspx?id=60880 (Accessed July 2013).

International Federation of Social Workers. "Standards in Social Work Practice Meeting Human Rights." http://ifsw.org/resources/publications/standards-in-social-work-practice-meeting-human-rights (Accessed July 2013).

International Mental Health Research Organization

The International Mental Health Research Organization (IMHRO), established in 2008 as a nonprofit organization, is "committed to raising awareness and finding neuropsychiatric research to find preventions and cures for severe mental illnesses, focusing on schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, and major depressive disorder, within a generation," according to the organization's Web site. The Staglin family's personal experience with their son's 1990 diagnosis of schizophrenia influenced their decision to take steps to not only bring attention to mental health needs of persons with mental illness but also the need for additional research funds to forward the prevention and treatment of mental illness. To that end, they launched an annual music event, called the Music Festival for Mental Health, as a response to their personal experience and to raise both awareness and financial support for mental health research.

IMHRO's total revenue as of December 2011 was $4,487,185, with total expenses of $3,579,289, reported GuideStar. During the 2011 17th Annual Music Festival for Mental Health, IMHRO raised a total of $3.3 million to support their research mission, according to Idealist. This festival has emerged to be one of the most significant fund-raisers for mental health research in the United States, according to the Office of Congressman Fattah Chaka. Since the organization's early beginnings, IMHRO has raised $150 million to support research programs for both the prevention and treatment for mental health disorders.

This organization has reached beyond its original mission and been part of developing two additional nonprofit organizations. For example, IMHRO was instrumental in helping found Bring Change 2 Mind in 2009, along with Fountain House, Glenn Close, and the Balanced Mind Foundation. This foundation's mission "is to emerge as the world's most effective organization working to erase the stigma and discrimination around mental illness by creating carefully targeted and powerful messaging, informed and measured for effectiveness by an Advisory Council of the leading scientists in the field" (Staglin Family Vineyard, 2013). Garen Staglin also played a significant role in serving as co-chair of the launch of ONE MIND for Research, alongside former Congressman Patrick Kennedy. The aim of this campaign is "to dramatically reduce the global burden of brain disorder disability in the next 10 years," states the Staglin Family Vineyard, via partnering on an international level with scientists, advocacy groups, policy makers, and industry.

In July 2010, the Staglin IMHRO Center for Cognitive Neuroscience opened at the University of California Los Angeles (UCLA). The center's cross-disciplinary collaborative research teams (e.g., psychiatrists, neurologists, electrical engineers, physicists, and psychologists) study emotional and cognitive processes with respect to their impact on decision making and mental health, reports S. Wolpert. Garen and Sharalyn Staglin have donated a total of $4 million over 10 years through IMHRO and their annual Staglin Family Music Festival for Mental Health.

In 2008, Johnson and Johnson Corporate Office of Science and Technology entered into a collaborative effort with IMHRO to provide a $250,000 grant to support the establishment of the Rising Star Awards. IMHRO matched this grant and funded the first awards in 2010, reported Enhanced Online News. The research section on IMHRO's Web site features a description of the two different Rising Star Awards. The first award, the Janssen/IMHRO Rising Star Translational Research Award, was established to "advance the translation of scientific knowledge of underlying disease mechanisms in bipolar disorder, schizophrenia, and major depression toward benefits to patients and the health care system." Two researchers are awarded $150,000 in direct costs to support their programs of research. The second award, the IMHRO Rising Star Basic Research Award, is geared toward "the best and brightest young brain scientists" to conduct basic research into the nature of bipolar disorder, depression, and schizophrenia. The $250,000 award supports a project for a maximum of three years.

Web Site Resources

One of the most interesting resources available on the IMHRO Web site is called "Brain Waves," where registered viewers may watch videos interviewing real, professional brain scientists providing information on recent, cutting-edge topics such as "Understanding Dopamine's Role in Schizophrenia" by Dr. Vikaas Sohal and "Finding the Roots of Mood Disorders" by Dr. Jun Li. Registered users may also have their questions answered by these experts. The education resources section provides three separate tabs for information about schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, and depression. The research section highlights current research conducted by the Rising Star Award recipients—for example, "Advances in Autism Prevention, Consciousness Detection, and Bipolar Disorder Diagnosis" by Dr. Susan Bookheimer and "Early Detection and Intervention for Psychosis" by Dr. Carrie Bearden.

The news tab provides timely updates around IMHRO-sponsored upcoming events, board of director assignments, and research updates. Under the “Get Involved” tab, users find information about upcoming events, volunteer opportunities, and donation opportunities. The online community provides registered Web site users opportunities to sign up for e-newsletters about events and recent scientific advances. Interested parties may sign up for the IMHRO Facebook page.

A. Suzanne Boyd
University of North Carolina at Charlotte

See Also: Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Cultural Responsiveness of; Mental Health Services, Adult; Mental Health Services, Children; Mental Health, International Variations in Attitudes Toward; National Center for Minority Health and Health Disparities; National Institute of Mental Health; National Mental Health Association.

Further Readings

GuideStar. “About Us.” http://www.guidestar.org/organizations/68-0359707/international-mental-health-research-organization.aspx (Accessed September 2013).
Idealist. “International Mental Health Research Organization.” http://www.idealist.org/view/nonprofit/35ChStCtJXMJd (Accessed September 2013).
International Mental Health Research Organization. “About Us.” https://www.imhro.org/about (Accessed September 2013).
National Alliance on Mental Illness. “Mental Illnesses: What Is Mental Illness.” http://www.nami.org/Template.cfm?Section=By_Illness (Accessed September 2013).
National Institute of Mental Health. “Statistics.” http://www.nimh.nih.gov/statistics/index.shtml (Accessed September 2013).
Office of Congressman Chaka Fattah. “Fattah to Deliver Address at California Mental Health Symposium.” http://www.okcfox.com/story/23363508/fattah-to-deliver-address-at-california-mental-health-symposium (Accessed September 2013).
Staglin Family Vineyard. “Philanthropy.” http://www.staglinfamily.com/philanthropy.html (Accessed September 2013).
Wolpert, S. “UCLA to Open New Staglin IMHRO Center for Cognitive Neuroscience.” UCLA Newsroom http://newsroom.ucla.edu/portal/ucla/ucla-to-open-new-staglin-imhro-159655.aspx (Accessed September 2013).
World Health Organization. “Mental Health.” http://www.who.int/mental_health/en (Accessed September 2013).

Interpersonal Violence

Interpersonal violence is frequent among human beings because of differences and diversities in human nature. The enormity and consequences of interpersonal violence on victims necessitate the close examination of actors in interpersonal violence and different types and forms of interpersonal violence such as sexual assault, abusive relationships, and stalking. Services and support available for victims of interpersonal violence include advocacy, therapy, and medical and legal action. Interpersonal violence occurs between two individuals who are always in close contact such as members of a family, husband and wife, co-wives, workmates, colleagues in school, and neighbors.

This form of violence is spontaneous; it is unplanned for but happens regularly. Interpersonal violence is defined by the World Health Organization as any behavior within an intimate relationship that causes physical, psychological, or sexual harm to those in the relationship. Violence is considered the intentional use of physical force or power, threatened or actually, against another person that results in a high likelihood of resulting in injury, psychological harm, or death.

Interpersonal violence can be perpetrated by a partner or ex-partner, an acquaintance, or a stranger, though the latter do not occur most frequently. Most cases of interpersonal violence involve men perpetrating violence against women; it is understandable that interpersonal violence occurs in same-sex relationships and that women can perpetrate violence in heterosexual relationships as well.

Nature of Interpersonal Violence

Interpersonal violence could be categorized into three types. Interpersonal violence can be in the form of sexual violence, abusive relationships, and stalking. Sexual violence is when a victim is pressured to act against his or her will to allow sexual advance from a perpetrator. Victim free will is absent, but physical force, persuasion, and acts of threats such as physical, verbal or emotional, coercion, or alcohol or drug injection are used. Sexual violence includes rape, which involves penetration of any body opening by any object without consent. Consent here means verbal permission, which either implies yes or no. Rape victims may not be able to resist sexual penetration because they might be injected with date rape drugs by the perpetrators. In addition, they might not be aware until eight to 12 hours after it occurs as a result of lapses. To prove a rape case, an evidence kit or rape kit is needed by the victim. Sexual harassment is another form of sexual violence, which involves the misuse of power, involving two people of perceived unequal authority and status. It is sexual advances to solicit support, gratification, and gains.

An abusive relationship is in the form of domestic violence, dating violence, intimate partner violence, elderly abuse, child abuse, and family abuse or relationship entered into by two partners, which could result in verbal, physical, psychological, emotional, or sexual abuse.

Stalking is frequent harassment of or by another person or course of conduct directly, indirectly, or by a third party with willful and without legal purpose. Three important evidences are tenable in stalking: (1) frequent occurrence, (2) deliberation, and (3) an actor with a particular aim to institute fear or cause substantial emotional distress such as death, bodily injury, and continued harassment.

Perpetrators and Victims of Interpersonal Violence

A perpetrator or abuser is someone who uses violence and other abusive behaviors to control and dominate in relationships. A survivor or victim is someone who has experienced the crime and trauma of interpersonal violence. The term survival is often used instead of victim, particularly when survival is healing or empowered after the violence. A secondary survivor is someone who knows a friend or family member's story of interpersonal violence.

A sign states that "North Hampton Is a Domestic Violence-Free Zone" in North Hampton, Massachussetts, 2008. Community organizations work to prevent interpersonal violence by offering safe shelter, crisis intervention, advocacy, and education and prevention programs. Screening for violence take place in health care settings, emergency departments, behavioral health settings, and court systems.

Most people are secondary survivors who know a survivor who has experienced sexual assault, abusive relationships, or stalking. Sadness, confusion, anger, helplessness, fear, guilt, disappointment, shock, anxiety, desperation, and compassion are all common reactions for survivors and their loved ones. Being aware of these emotions will ultimately help a victim better understand the survivor's experience and be more supportive.

Services Available to Victims of Interpersonal Violence

There are different services available for victims of interpersonal violence. The services range from reporting, counseling, and advocacy to prosecution of perpetrators. Advocates or companions are specially trained volunteers and staff who provide 24-hour crisis line services for the victims of interpersonal violence. Advocates can follow the victim to the hospital, police station, court, or media house. Advocates can provide the victim with professional counseling, but they cannot work as therapists.

There are also forensic nurse examiners and sexual assault nurse examiners (SANEs) who are trained nurses; they provide information on available medical care options and reporting. They collect evidence with physical or sexual assault evidence collection kits and prescribe medications for prevention of infections and pregnancy, such as human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) prophylaxis medication and the pregnancy morning-after pill or Plan B.

A victim of interpersonal violence can also ask for safe housing if she or he feels a sense of lack of security or revictimization at the hands of the abuser. A victim or secondary survivor may also file an anonymous report, blind report, or full report through nongovernmental organizations, women's organizations, or Crime Stoppers International. Victims may also call a 24-hour hotline manned by specialists. Survivors or secondary survivors can call to advocate about experiences in an anonymous way. These services are available in the United States and the United Kingdom, where people can call 911 and 999, respectively.

Survivors of sexual violence can suffer a significant degree of physical and emotional trauma during, immediately after, and over a considerable time period after the rape. They can experience nightmares, fear of being alone, fear of physical contact and sex, and possibly eating, sleeping, and menstrual pattern disruption. To heal, survivors of interpersonal violence could seek support from family, friends, counselors, and support groups.

Olakunle Folami
University of Ulster

See Also: Family Violence Prevention and Services; Family Violence Prevention and Services Act; Women, Battered.

Further Readings

Safe at UNC. "Interpersonal Violence Awareness and Prevention." http://safe.unc.edu/get-involved/prevention-risk-reduction (Accessed May 2013).

Timothy, Cavell and Kenya Malcolm Anger. Aggression and Interventions for Interpersonal Violence. Hillsdale, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Association, 2007.

World Health Organization. "Intimate Partner Violence and Alcoholic Fact Sheet" http://www.who.int/violence_injury_prevention/violence/world_report/factsheets/ft_intimate.pdf (Accessed May 2013).

Interprofessional and Interdisciplinary Practice

Human services organizations are being entreated to create sustainable impact and changes in the lives of individuals and families accessing social services. With the growing diversity in the U.S. population and complexity of social issues experienced by individuals and families, comprehensive approaches for addressing these challenges often necessitates interprofessional collaboration and practice. Interprofessional practices not only improve quality of services delivered but also enhance the work lives of practitioners. The importance of interprofessional practice has led to the development of interprofessional competencies by the Interprofessional Education Collaborative

Expert Panel and the Center for the Advancement of Interprofessional Education (CAIPE). Several disciplines—for example, nursing, education, and gerontology—are at the cutting edge of implementing interprofessional educational models where students from different professional programs learn with and from each other. The purpose of this entry is to define and postulate rationale for growth of interprofessional practice, illuminate the skills needed for interprofessional practice, provide illustrations of interprofessional practice, and elucidate interprofessional education.

Interprofessional care and practice entails that two or more individuals from different professions integrate their respective assessments, perspectives, and interventions for understanding and solving problems whose solutions are beyond the scope of a single field. Such an integrated approach greatly enhances the quality of services delivered to service beneficiaries.

Rationale and Skills

Complex and dynamic challenges experienced by individuals accessing human services cross social, economic, physical, spiritual, and emotional health boundaries; these challenges are further compounded by the growing diversity of the U.S. population. Providing a comprehensive, culturally proficient, seamless system of services necessitates invoking the expertise of several professionals. Often, solving complex problems transcends the knowledge and skills of any one profession (e.g., teachers, human services professionals, nurses, physical therapists, etc.). Moreover, shrinking public funding, devolution of social services to state and local levels, and demands of managed care are compelling an integrated approach to delivering human services in a more cost-effective fashion.

Human services professionals exchange information and coordinate the services—with other professionals—they deliver to ensure an integrated approach to clients' challenges. Interprofessionality is a process in which professionals develop integrated ways of practicing and providing cohesive responses to clients' needs and problems. For practicing in an interprofessional fashion, human services professionals require excellent communication and group process skills to maintain continuous interactions with participating professionals, sharing knowledge, negotiating, resolving conflicts, and participating in teamwork. For interprofessionality to succeed, collaborative practice skills, openness to alter one's perspectives while interacting with other professionals, and the ability to implement discipline-specific interventions are vital. Knowledge of the community and context, ability to work across different systems, and cultural proficiency are also essential to interprofessionality.

Interprofessional Practice

Practitioners in mental health, education, health care, child welfare, domestic violence, and several other fields that require the expertise of various professionals and disciplines are currently delivering interprofessional care. Comprehensive interprofessional understanding of issues occurs when practitioners are able to view situations from the perspectives of each participating profession. For example, in community-based mental health organizations, mental health practitioners interface with professionals from several different fields—often from several different organizations—to provide comprehensive and seamless service delivery. Often, these clients experience several social and economic challenges as well. Collaboratively with psychiatrists, nurse practitioners, social workers, client advocates, and family members, mental health practitioners are assessing clients and developing integrated care plans.

Similarly, in schools serving children with special needs, teachers, counselors, social workers, psychologists, psychiatrists, and family members collaboratively assess students and their circumstances to develop integrated interprofessional action plans. Illustrations also exist in the health care and long-term care arena, where professionals and paraprofessionals—for example, doctors, nurses, nurse practitioners, patient advocates, physical and occupational therapists, social workers, human services workers, and certified nursing assistants—work on interprofessional teams to provide care and services to clients in institutional and community-based settings. For reasons already mentioned, interprofessional interventions are quintessential for addressing the multidimensional needs of a diverse client population.

Interprofessional Education and Training

Interprofessional practice cannot occur by accident, it needs to be intentional, requiring unique competencies and skills. Implementation of interprofessional practice today has largely occurred based on the in-service training and on-the-job experiences of practitioners. Ideally, graduates of professional programs should possess the knowledge and skills—for example, teamwork, conflict resolution, group process, and so on—for interprofessional practice prior to entering human services, health care, and educational arenas. Owing to the limited focus on interprofessionality in most professional education programs, graduates are often ill prepared for interprofessional practice. Many encounter conflicts and role ambiguities when serving on interprofessional teams. Often, adhering to ethical standards of the various participating professionals becomes challenging in such settings unless prior interprofessional training and practice has occurred.

Professional programs can integrate interprofessional practice—what, why, and how—into their curricula and enable graduating students to effectively address their clients' complex and dynamically changing circumstances. These programs must utilize appropriate teaching methodology (e.g., experiential and transformative learning opportunities), resources, and topics to impart the knowledge and skills to graduating students. More specifically, human services programs can invite faculty from related fields to design an interprofessional capstone courses and internships for their students. Institutions of higher learning will need to transform their educational models for building a true interprofessional educational environment. Community-based human services organizations can assist these institutions by providing interprofessional internship opportunities to students.

Monica Nandan
Kennesaw State University

See Also: Children With Special Needs; Deinstitutionalization; Domestic Violence; Mental Health Services Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of; Social Innovation.

Further Readings

Center for the Advancement of Interprofessional Education (CAIPE). "Practice Articles." http://www.caipe.org.uk/resources/articles/practice-articles (Accessed April 2013).

Interprofessional Education Collaborative Expert Panel. Core Competencies for Interprofessional Collaborative Practice: Report of an Expert Panel. Washington, DC: Interprofessional Education Collaborative, 2011.

Jones, Peter. "Teaching for Change in Social Work: A Discipline-Based Argument for the Use of Transformative Approaches to Teaching and Learning." Journal of Transformative Education, v.7/1(2010).

Nandan, Monica. "Commitment of Social Service Staff Members: An Exploration." Social Work Research, v.21/4 (1997).

Shor, Ron. "Interdisciplinary Collaboration Between Social Workers and Dieticians in Nutrition Education Programs for Children-at-Risk." Social Work in Health Care, v.49/4 (2010).

Interstate Compact for Juveniles

The Interstate Compact for Juveniles (ICJ) offers statutory contractual authority and guidelines for the movement of juveniles across state lines. The aim of the ICJ is to protect communities while also holding juveniles who may have broken the law accountable. Today, more than 20,000 juveniles are apprehended in states other than the one in which they were adjudicated, taken into custody, or where they reside. ICJ serves as a mechanism for returning juvenile nonoffenders (minors in need of supervision) and offenders, whether status offenders or delinquents who may have been on parole, probation, or other correctional supervision but who have left their states often by running away, escaping, or absconding. Status offenders are minors who have committed an offense that, had it been done by an adult, would not be a crime (e.g., juvenile curfew violation, truancy, or underage smoking); delinquency refers to an offense by a minor that, if done by an adult would be a crime; for example, robbery. At times, the need for a juvenile to leave a state in which he or she was adjudicated is a legitimate one, such as a need for the juvenile's family to relocate. ICJ serves as a means for shifting the supervisory responsibility to another state or U.S. territory that has adopted the ICJ by documented permission routed through the receiving state's office of ICJ.

The agreement requires that a receiving state fulfill the judicial orders of the sending state; see to it that persons are not at risk from the juvenile in the sending and the receiving states; return offenders who have run away from their states if their return is requested; contract with compact states for special services for juveniles as needed; assist other states in locating juveniles and equitably sharing the cost of serving juveniles; data collection; compliance monitoring; and training and education. Compacts have been used in the United States since the 18th century. They are agreements to resolve boundary issues between states, to establish procedures when these issues arise, and to define administrative responsibilities associated with the ICJ.

The current ICJ was preceded by a 1955 compact that was in effect in Washington D.C., all 50 states, Guam, and the Virgin Islands. This compact was problematic to utilize. The problems included different terms and definitions across states, rules that were difficult to follow, a lack of compliance, and a lack of timely exchange of information. An advisory group, the National Interstate Commission for Juveniles, was formed in 2000, which included persons from different states and the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention to draft the existing compact. In 2003, a draft of the compact was circulated to stakeholders for input. These persons included juvenile and family court judges, defense and prosecuting attorneys, legislators, the American Probation and Parole Association, and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. North Dakota was the first state to enact ICJ in 2003, followed by 11 other states that year (Arizona, Connecticut, Delaware, Louisiana, Maine, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, New Mexico, Rhode Island, and Washington). Ten more states enacted in 2004 (Alabama, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, New Jersey, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, West Virginia, and Wyoming) and seven more in 2005 (Arkansas, Florida, Kentucky, Nevada, North Carolina, Texas, and Utah). In 2006, South Carolina and Wisconsin adopted; in 2007, Maryland and Virginia; and in 2008, Illinois and Tennessee. Each of these states has a commissioner or voting member on the Interstate Compact for Juveniles Commission. This person is appointed by a governor or a state council. The commission has rule-making authority. The National Center for Interstate Compacts serves as a center point for various compacts. The Association of Juvenile Compact Administrators (AJCA) collects data on compact operations. By March 2012, the only states or territories that were not a part of ICJ were Georgia, Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, and Northern Marina Islands.

Juveniles in detention in a receiving state may not be held longer than 90 days pending a requisition. The juvenile's home or sending state has 60 days to prepare the requisition after being notified about the juvenile's location and unwillingness to return voluntarily. The sending state holds the authority to terminate or discharge a juvenile's case. Such action may be in response to such a request from a receiving state. Sending states bear the responsibility for victim notification, and receiving states have five days to supply details requested for this purpose. A juvenile's willingness to return to his or her sending state should be honored expediently (normally within five days). A state that demands the return of its juvenile shall be responsible for the transportation costs. The ICJ is to be coordinated with the Compact for the Placement of Children. The latter is an agreement among the 50 states to coordinate the movement of minors across state lines for treatment, adoption, foster care, group homes, or trial placement with potential adoptive parents. It includes the need to move juvenile offenders across state lines for placement in private facilities. Common to public interest are juvenile sex offenders. In 2013, 16 percent of parole cases and 10 percent of probation cases transferred according to the ICJ were sex offenders.

States outside of the ICJ have little guarantee of prompt or safe return of its juveniles. Without adequate supervision, juveniles can eventually become missing again or engage in further lawbreaking activities. Member states of the ICJ have the advantage of uniformity in the transfer operations, communication, and information sharing, which is increasingly electronically efficient. Information that is shared between states may include treatment plans, school records, medical records, commitment orders, and orders of adjudication. Compact state judges follow an advisory bench book for handling transfer cases. The response to member states' noncompliance with the ICJ may include remedial training, fines, legal enforcement, or suspension from the ICJ.

Camille Gibson
Prairie View A & M University

See Also: Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children; Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention; Probation and Parole Officers.

Further Readings

Council of State Governments. Interstate Compact for Juvenile Resource Kit. Lexington, KY: Interstate Commission for Juveniles, 2002.

Holloway, Christopher. Interstate Compact on Juveniles. OJJDP Fact Sheet September 2000 #12. Washington, DC: Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, 2000.

Interstate Commission for Juveniles. Bench Book for Judges and Court Personnel, Version 3.01. Lexington, KY: Author, 2013.

Interstate Commission for Juveniles. ICJ Annual Report FY 2013. Lexington, KY: Author, 2013.

Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children

The Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children (ICPC) is a statutory agreement delineating legal responsibilities in cross-state placement of children for adoption. With a history dating back to 1960, today, the ICPC is operational in all 50 states, the District of Columbia, and the U.S. Virgin Islands. In 1974, the Association of Administrators of the ICPC (AAICPC) evolved, with the charge to support member groups. The American Public Human Services Association (APHSA), a nonprofit entity representing the health and human services needs of states, has since served as secretariat to the association.With forecasts predicting an increase in adoption needs comes the added need to streamline a process that can take up to two years.

The overriding objective of the ICPC, of course, is the safety of all children—to that end, the ICPC has established procedural guidelines spanning specifics such as child care itself and financial obligations of related agencies and states. As part of that expressed mandate, policy requires the careful screening of receiving homes, which includes a thorough social history and specifics such as employment history, financial screening, criminal background checks, training for parents in some cases, and in others, an investigation of parenting style. Timely provision of necessary support for adopting parents is critical to successful and desired permanent placements and is particularly pointed in special needs children, who evidence more cases of interrupted adoptions. Perhaps expectedly, placement is far from being an easy undertaking; navigating related agencies across state lines and achieving associated checks and balances is challenging. Adding to the inherent complexity of matching children with adopting parents is the court dynamics—any movement of a child from one home to another (foster care, birth parents, agency care, etc.) must meet with its approval. Other layers of complexity point to the welfare system of individual states where resources can prove a debilitating factor to a child's transition.

The initiating state creates a portfolio on the child's case, which includes medical, educational, and social histories and information on the prospective placement. A completed portfolio is forwarded to that state's central ICPC office. Once vetted, the portfolio is then forwarded to the central office of the planned recipient state. That agency conducts its own review of the portfolio and then forwards the same to its local entity. They are charged with screening the planned recipient home. Once home study is completed, a report is sent to the recipient state's central ICPC office for approval. The portfolio then is sent to the central office of the ICPC initiating state and then to that state's local office.

Compacts: The Binding Nature

Support and, thus, legitimacy for interstate compacts are rooted in the U.S. Constitution. The clear advantage of ICPC is the increased likelihood for placement. The contractual nature of such compacts, which provide for a range of services in the United States, serve to not only guide the internal operations of each party to an agreement but aim to carefully establish guidelines and regulatory responsibilities of all entities. By their very nature, partnerships through compacts present one way by which states can solve problems. The United States has used interstate compacts for decades—the ICPC is just one such where the charge is the careful placement of children in foster homes. Further, the binding nature of interstate compacts mirrors that of any other legal contractual arrangements entered into by willing parties—in this case states having entered into arrangements or agreements with the purpose of legally guiding how they will relate to each other across geographic boundaries on the specifics of the compact. In the case of children and their placement across state lines in foster homes, or other configurations of cross-state adoptions, funding is backed by Title IV-E funds requiring a state license, related training for parents, careful pre-investigation, and ultimate recommendation of case workers.

Case Diversity

A close look at the children in need of services reveals that these placements go beyond traditional foster care; for example, expectant mothers participating in adoption procedures out of state, foster parents who are blood relatives, agencies, children in treatment facilities, and parents hoping to regain lost custody. The significance of longer time frames in interstate arrangements can impact older children in more negative ways; historically, older children experience longer wait periods in successful adoptions. Lengthy delays translate to aging in the system and older children in need. The literature attests to the fact that prospective parents are more likely to adopt younger children—another reason to streamline the process. The need is further made clear when one examines the numbers involved—an estimated 399,546 children are in foster care, and on any given day, possibly 8,000 children need placement.

Title IV-E

The intent of the federal government under Title IV-E is the provision of support for children in the public foster care program—specifically, financial support for the adopting parents. The assistance is for domestic adoptions—those originating and terminating within the United States. Questions have arisen as to the support, if any, available in adoption cases involving countries outside of the United States. The Social Security Act does not expressly address this dynamic. There are special conditions under which financial support for parents involving out-of-country adoptions may be tapped; these guidelines are addressed in 45 CFR 1356.41.

Issues in the Process

Expectedly, in-state adoptions take less time to complete than cases necessitating two or more states. Navigating the bureaucracy of related agencies is time-consuming. For this express reason, the APHSA, in efforts to save time, moved to study the issues—their approach was bifurcated, taking aim at short-term as well as long-term reforms for ICPC. A uniform approach (preceding adoptions) across state lines was undertaken. To facilitate this, the implementation of a uniform template was proposed. The issue surrounds the delay in completion of home studies. Once the actual home study is completed, the process is delayed further by the standard practice of mailing sizable documents across states. Florida resolved to implement an electronic filing system. Completed home studies are uploaded and made electronically available through the state's Interstate Compact System central office, where receiving states' assigned personnel have access. Other sources of delay pinpointed by bodies such as the American Bar Association (ABA) and the National Court Appointed Special Advocates organization (National CASA) surround slow returns on criminal background checks, judicial orders, and incomplete or poorly prepared ICPC documents.

The Future

Future success of the ICPC is heavily contingent on a number of factors: its own incremental successes as a body and successes in joint efforts with the many associated agencies—all part of the machinery to effect speed, safety, and appropriate placements for all children. Some associated agencies in this consortium of sorts include the AAICPC, the American Association of Public Welfare Attorneys (AAPWA), and APHSA. Resources will always be an issue, and what is certain is that the need for oversight will increase, not decrease.

Lorraine A. Samuels
Huston-Tillotson University

See Also: Adoption Agencies and Services; Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System; Association of Administrators of the Interstate Compact on Child Placement; Interstate Compact for Juveniles.

Further Readings

"Adopting a New Compact by Robin Arnold-Williams and Elizabeth Oppenheim." Policy and Practice (September 2004).

Child Welfare Policy Manual. acf.hhs.gov/cwpm/prorams/cb/laws_policies/laws/cwpm (Accessed December 2013).
Pennypacker, Stephen H. Electronic ICPC Processing. Policy and Practice of Public Human Service, 2010.
The Council of State Governments. Capitol Research: Special Edition—Interstate Compacts, March 2011.

Isolated Communities and Cultural Competence

The definitions of isolated community vary significantly due to differences in local governments', humanitarian agencies', and international organizations' policies and objectives in categorizing certain groups of people or communities as isolated communities. In general, isolated communities may be a result of the geographical location of the community (e.g., mountain terrains or distant and small islands), the lack of social infrastructure (e.g., transportation, electricity, and telecommunications), their demographic composition, and the historical, religious, political, and socioeconomic backgrounds of the region or community. Isolated communities can vary in their degrees of isolation and can exist in underdeveloped regions as well as developed countries. For example, as of 2007, Brazil's National Foundation of the Indian (FUNAI) has documented 67 uncontacted tribes that live in isolation from the rest of the modern world. In Canada, there are fly-in communities that have scheduled flights and telephone services but rely solely on bush aviation to connect to the outside world.

Communities can become isolated through unintentional or purposeful separation. For example, geographical disparities can significantly impact communities' access to government infrastructure or health care. On the other hand, resistance to other cultures may encourage certain communities to voluntarily hide or withdraw from the outside world, resulting in cultural inclusivity. For example, the Amish in the United States form isolated faith communities, reject the use of most modern technology (e.g., automobiles and electricity), and wear distinctively conservative clothing. Some communities choose to avoid or resist further contact with outsiders due to tragic or unpleasant experiences in the past. Many Indian tribes in the Amazon rainforest in Brazil remain secluded from the outside world but currently face extinction from land loss and disease. The Brazilian government has established policies to prohibit contact with these tribes, with the exception of a few selected workers from FUNAI, to prevent the invasion of their land and to preserve their autonomy.

Impacts of Globalization and Modernization

Many isolated communities have their own histories, cultures, social structures and institutions, modes of social interactions, and languages. Some isolated communities have existed as a cloister for thousands of years, similar to the ancient people of Brazil and Venezuela who have been separate populations for about 2,000 years. Today, isolated communities are up against the influences of the impeding outside world due to globalization and modernization that may challenge their sustainability and destabilize their indigenous cultures. Foreign investments, modern industries, tourism, and technological and ecological changes have all threatened the survival of isolated communities' cultures, ways of life, and territories.

While outsiders may believe that changes will bring prosperity and development to isolated communities, the "progress" often comes at a price of transforming, reducing, and even rejecting local beliefs, traditions, and cultural values, which are essential to the identities and survival of these communities. Promoting and acknowledging the presence of isolated communities and their cultural differences in the modern world requires behaviors, attitudes, and policies that suit the isolated communities' situations.

Bridging Cultural Gaps

Culture is a system of shared meanings. Culture can be expressed in various ways such as customs, rituals, food, religious practices, or taboos. It is transmitted from generation to generation through many different ways such as languages, performances, plays, and art. Culture provides a way of thinking and interacting and generally involves specific customs, worldviews, ideas, values, methods of communication, and behavior. Cultural groups are shaped by, among others, race, ethnicity, religion, language, region, gender, sexual orientation, and background.

Cultural diversity brings together positive and negative influences of a society. On one hand, it creates a colorful and vibrant community that allows an exchange of cultural products and lifestyles. On the other hand, it creates fragmentation and conflict, which can evolve into discrimination, oppression, and violence. The literature suggests that diversity is never problematic in and of itself. It is individual and institutional responses to diversity that can be problematic. The challenge of today's cross-cultural interactions lies within individuals and group behaviors that hinder the ability to promote equality and equity among different groups, resulting in prejudice, discrimination, and stereotyping. Cultural competence in this context requires a complex processing and understanding of other cultures' values, worldviews, and practices, which are attributable to a variety of factors (e.g., race, ethnicity, gender, and sociopolitical contexts, among others).

Serving Isolated Communities

Any policy or effort aimed at strengthening and empowering isolated communities needs to be conducted with cultural sensitivity. Miscommunication may occur when one party views their actions as offering a solution to poverty condition or opening up access for the flow of resources, while the other party views this action as a form of invasion on their beliefs, values, and traditions. From this perspective, cultural competence requires one to understand cultural differences in normative practices and worldviews, employ cross-cultural knowledge and skills, and honor and celebrate cultural diversity.

Addressing the needs of isolated communities through community engagement and participatory action requires careful attention to avoid problematic social control over isolated or disadvantaged groups. Community-based action has the potential to encourage and motivate community members to actively participate in the process of change. By incorporating local, direct involvement and interactive communication, individuals from the outside world can avoid miscommunication and maintain effective, meaningful interactions with community members.

Dyah Pitaloka
Elaine Hsieh
University of Oklahoma

See Also: Community-Based Services; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cross-Cultural Skills; Empowerment Research; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Service Providers and Cultural Diversity.

Further Readings

Crate, Susan A. Cows, Kin and Globalization: An Ethnography of Sustainability. Lanham, MD: AltaMira, 2006.

Debebe, Gelaye. Navigating Power: Cross-Cultural Competence in Navajoland. Plymouth, UK: Lexington Books, 2012.

Hancock, Tina U. "Cultural Competence in the Assessment of Poor Mexican Families in the Rural Southeastern United States." Child Welfare, v.84/5 (2005).

University of California Davis Center for Reducing Health Disparities. Building Partnerships: Conversation With the Hmong About Mental Health Needs and Community Strengths, Author, 2009.

J

Jail Diversion Programs for Children and Adolescents

Diversion is a term that refers to keeping children and adolescents outside the formal juvenile justice system or minimizing their penetration into the system. Programs designed to achieve these objectives are called diversion programs.

The beginning of the diversion movement in the United States is often attributed to the 1967 President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice Report, which called for the establishment of community-based youth service bureaus as an alternative to encapsulating troubled youth in the formal juvenile justice system. During the late 1960s and early 1970s, these bureaus and other diversion programs sprouted up across the nation.

Examples of early diversion programs include runaway houses where young runaways could avoid secure confinement and receive individual and family counseling, college students and other volunteers serving as mentors with troubled youth, and informal probation programs for young offenders who admitted to their offenses and agreed to certain conditions (e.g., restitution).

Reasons for Jail Diversion Programs

In the early 1970s, two noteworthy events focused attention to developing alternatives to the secure confinement of young offenders. First, in 1972, Jerome Miller, superintendent of juvenile corrections in Massachusetts, closed virtually all the state's secure juvenile institutions and transferred confined youth to community-based residential alternatives. Second, in 1974, Congress passed the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act, which encouraged states to develop alternatives to confining young offenders in detention centers, secure institutions, and adult jails. Several reasons spurred these noteworthy events and currently provide support for diverting of young offenders from confinement in secure public and private institutions. First, most secure juvenile facilities are dangerous—typically overcrowded, antiquated, poorly staffed, and often subjecting wards to violence, abuse, and other types of maltreatment such as solitary confinement often for prolonged periods. Second, they are ineffective; youth often emerge from these institutions worse off than they were before being confined. Youth housed in adult jails, for example, are typically supervised by staff ill prepared to meet their needs and who often fail to provide even basic attention to their care and rehabilitation. Post-confinement recidivism rates for these youth are typically high, and their employment and educational prospects are diminished. Third, they are unnecessary; most institutionalized youth pose minimal risk to public safety. Many youth are confined for committing noncriminal status offenses such as truancy and disobedience. Others are incarcerated for noncriminal probation or aftercare (i.e., juvenile parole) violations, failing to admit to or express remorse for their actions, and low-level property and public order offenses. Fourth, they are obsolete; contemporary delinquency research has distinguished several interventions that appear to consistently reduce future offending. These strategies are inconsistent with confinement and effective when applied in nonsecure, community-based settings. Fifth, they are wasteful; institutionalizing young offenders is extremely costly, particularly considering its poor results. Programs that divert children and adolescents from secure confinement can produce equal or better outcomes for considerably less cost.

Jail Diversion Programs

There are several effective alternatives to the secure detention of juveniles waiting juvenile court processing. For example, home detention has become a widely used alternative. With small caseloads, home detention supervisors provide random, frequent, unannounced, face-to-face home visits with youth. Behavior contracts signed by youth and their parent or guardian are often used to establish clear behavioral goals. Some programs also employ community supervisors or advocates to support and participate with youth in educational and recreational activities. For more serious young offenders, electronic monitoring can be used to enhance, not replace, personal contacts.

Day reporting centers are also popular as an alternative to secure detention. In these nonsecure, community-based centers, youth participate in structured educational and recreational activities until their cases are resolved. Some jurisdictions also utilize evening reporting centers that provide youth with structure and attention during high crime after-school and evening hours. Another alternative is time-limited residential housing in which youth receive around-the-clock supervision. In these residential attention centers, youth participate in structured educational and recreational activities. Some jurisdictions also contract with foster homes to house younger children and lower-risk cases waiting juvenile court processing. Foster parents receive special training to help them supervise these youth and are backed up by juvenile court personnel. Another detention alternative gaining in popularity combines case advocacy with intensive case management. For young offenders who volunteer to participate, personalized case plans are developed followed by multiple daily contacts with case managers who handle small caseloads and respond to crises on a 24-hour basis.

Institution and Jail Diversion

Meta-analyses of hundreds of studies have helped delinquency scholars distinguish several characteristics of effective nonsecure alternatives to institutionalizing or jailing young offenders. Effective alternatives are those that teach troubled youth new personal and social skills, to recognize and correct for unhealthy thinking, to better manage anger, to improve self-control, and to address personal challenges and risk factors. Ineffective interventions are those based on custody, confinement, surveillance, deterrence, and discipline (e.g., scared straight).

Several evidence-based institution diversion programs treat troubled youth and their families in their own communities. For example, several forms of intensive family therapy (e.g., Multidimensional Therapy and Functional Family Therapy) have demonstrated effectiveness with serious juvenile offenders. Cognitive-behavioral and social learning skills training programs have shown considerable success with high-risk young offenders. Other alternatives include intensive vocational training programs offering career-focused education, on-the-job experience, and ongoing counseling; intensive advocacy and mentoring programs; and high-quality mental health and substance abuse treatment programs. Wilderness programs are also effective alternatives to secure confinement. Outward Bound programs, for example, teach young offenders survival skills during long hiking expeditions or canoe trips in wilderness settings. Group counseling sessions occur each evening around a campfire. Associated Marine Institutes offers an incarceration diversion program in which serious young offenders live in military-style barracks and carry out work assignments such as clearing land, hauling logs, and caring for plants and animals in the Florida Everglades.

The restorative justice model has spawned several new forms of detention and institution diversion. This three-pronged model emphasizes victims' rights, community protection, and offender responsibility and rehabilitation. Diversion approaches based on the restorative justice philosophy include community courts, gun courts, and drug courts. Juvenile drug courts, for example, grew out of the adult drug court movement. Compared to traditional juvenile court processing, drug courts provide earlier and more thorough intake assessments of drug-dependent young offenders; rapid involvement of youth and their families in treatment; coordination of the school, family, juvenile court, and community agencies in assessing and responding to youths' needs and risk factors; more intensive supervision; and rewards for progress and immediate sanctions for noncompliance.

Special Groups

Clearly, some youth need secure confinement for their own protection or the protection of the community. However, considerable research shows that detention is not an equal opportunity experience. For example, while African American and Latino youth make up about 41 percent of the overall youth population in the United States, these youth account for more than two-thirds of youth placed in secure detention. Also, compared to Caucasian youth, youth of color are more likely to face institutionalization for given offenses. These differences are not explained by differences in delinquency and appear to have more to do with biases and subjective decision-making practices within the juvenile justice system.

Also, there has been a dramatic rise in secure detention for girls—an increase of about 50 percent from 1992 to 2009. There has also been an increase in the detention of lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ) girls. Compared to detained male juveniles, girls are detained for less-serious offenses, are more likely to have experienced trauma (e.g., sexual abuse or domestic violence), and are more likely to have mental health and human services needs (e.g., trauma treatment or pregnancy care). Based on these differences, detention can be particularly counterproductive for girls.

Thus, it is important for juvenile justice systems to prioritize the reduction of racial, ethnic, and gender disparities in secure detention; to utilize objective risk-assessment detention decision tools; and to develop detention alternatives that focus on the particular needs of these groups.

Conclusion

Significant advances have been made in specifying the causes of delinquency and developing evidence-based alternatives to confining troubled youth in juvenile detention centers, secure juvenile institutions, and adult jails. It appears reasonable to conclude that, if states move funds currently applied to the secure confinement of young offenders to evidence-based diversion programs that focus on the needs and risks of troubled young offenders, the result will likely be less crime and healthier, more productive young men and women.

Thomas M. Kelley
Wayne State University

See Also: Deinstitutionalization; Group Homes for Children; Mental Health Services, Children.

Further Readings

Fader, J. J. Falling Back: Incarceration and Transitions to Adulthood among Urban Youth (Critical Issues in Crime and Society). New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2013.

Holman, B. and J. Ziedenberg. The Dangers of Detention: The Impact of Incarcerating Youth in Detention and Other Secure Facilities. Washington, DC: Justice Policy Institute, 2006.

Steinhart, David. The Juvenile Detention Alternatives Initiative. Baltimore, MD: Annie E. Casey Foundation, 2006.

Jewish Americans

There are three main categories of Jews that fall within the broad term of Jewish Americans. This includes Reform, Conservative, and Orthodox Jews. The fundamental commonality among these groups is a monotheistic belief in the God of Abraham. The Torah is the historic holy book of the Jewish faith for all factions within Judaism. However, over time, Conservative and Reform Judaism developed as a modified approach to traditional Jewish observance. Of the three sects, Orthodox Judaism bears the greatest resemblance to traditional Judaism, with strict adherence to commandments of the Torah and adherence to halachot (the Hebrew term for laws that govern daily life). Orthodox Jews continue to maintain the greatest separation from mainstream secular American culture. This results in Orthodox Jewish Americans as culturally different clients. Across sects within Orthodox Judaism, there is an emphasis on being a member of the community. Thus, marriage, which is at the core of a religious community lifestyle, is arguably the most essential practice of Orthodox Judaism. Interestingly, social science research often studies categories of Orthodox Jews, such as Modern Orthodox and Ultra Orthodox Jews, separately. This is due to the great diversity of religious practice and customs among these groups of Orthodox Jews. Therefore, Orthodox customs related to dating and marriages are vastly different between Modern Orthodox and Ultra Orthodox Jews. The Orthodox approach to marriage highlights their status as culturally different clients.

Introducing the Spectrum of Orthodox Judaism

Orthodox Jewry is often perceived as a religious sect shrouded in mystery. Therefore, to understand Orthodoxy's diversity, it may be helpful to consider Orthodox Judaism as a spectrum of religious observance with Modern Orthodox and Ultra Orthodox Jews representing opposite ends of the religious spectrum. It is not that one group keeps more or less religious practices; rather, Ultra Orthodox Jews keep more traditional interpretations of religious decrees than Modern Orthodox Jews. Modern Orthodox rabbis (Jewish spiritual leaders) attempt to consider the secular world in their computations and understandings of halachot. This can be further understood by realizing the role the rabbi plays in Orthodox communities. In Ultra Orthodox circles, the rabbi or rebbe is the community authority on religious law and often influences personal and family decisions as well. Hassidic communities are a type of Ultra Orthodox sect that heavily relies on the opinion of the rabbi in all matters. The Modern Orthodox position also attributes great respect to rabbinic leaders, but this community has been noted to involve greater degrees of personal choice and less reliance on rabbinic opinion. It is vital to understand that many Orthodox neighborhoods appear and function differently because of different interpretations of God's commandments, but practices generally stem from divine scripture and historical traditions.

An Orthodox Jewish wedding takes place using a traditional chupah. The juxtaposition of tradition and modernity in Modern Orthodox practice is evident and seen in dating and marriage customs. This division of Judaism follows modern dating practices, but the dating process involves using a traditional approach and couples are required to follow these restrictions.

Ultra Orthodox Dating and Marriage Practices

In Ultra Orthodox communities, men and women are kept separate from a young age. Boys and girls attend different schools and are not allowed to mingle with one another; therefore, for many individuals, the dating process is their first encounter with nonrelative members of the opposite sex. In Ultra Orthodox communities, men and women are introduced, with the purpose of marriage, by their parents or through *Shadchanim (*matchmakers). Individuals rely on their family members to seek assistance from these special matchmakers and consider potential matches on their behalf. If the family approves of the shidduch (match), only then will the couple meet. Depending on the Ultra Orthodox community and family, the couple may meet once or twice at a quiet home with parents in the next room before agreeing to or rejecting the marriage. This mainly occurs in Hassidic communities in which engagements are announced after one sit-in date. In non-Hassidic, Ultra Orthodox households, the couple meets first in a quiet home but then continues their courtship for about three to eight more dates in public locations like a hotel lobby or park. Ultra Orthodox communities consider it imperative that the couple meet in public so that the couple does not violate the prohibition of yichud (the prohibition against any man and woman who are not married to each other being alone in a room). Moreover, the couple is expected to uphold the laws of shomer negiah, literally translated as "guarding from touch." Orthodox law dictates that individuals of different genders may not touch each other until after the wedding ceremony. This restricts individuals from acting on their sexual attraction for one another.

Once a couple is married, they may experience unique stressors as culturally different clients. One such struggle is financial instability. The emphasis on Torah learning in Orthodox communities influences the family structure. Husbands often learn in yeshivahs (schools of Jewish study) for several years, while their wives serve as the financial providers, often performing specialized jobs following a short vocational course. The issue of being a one-salary household is compounded by the community's value of having many children. Another unique stressor faced by the Ultra Orthodox community is sexual difficulties. Men and women must be sexually inexperienced upon their first marriage. In some cases, this leads to sexual ignorance or a lack of comfort with sexual communication. These issues have obvious ramifications. Furthermore, Orthodox Jews are expected to keep the laws of taharat hamishpacha (family purity), which stipulate that a husband and wife may not engage in sexual relations or even touch one another while the woman is in niddah (ritual impurity). The woman is in niddah while menstruating and for seven full days after the cessation of her menstruation. During this time, the couple may not share a bed but can sleep in beds separated from one another.

Modern Orthodox Dating and Marriage Practices

Modern Orthodox Jews experience the pull between opposing factors, tradition, and modernity to a much greater degree than the Ultra Orthodox because of their engagement with secular American society. The juxtaposition of tradition and modernity in Modern Orthodox practice can clearly be seen in dating and marriage customs. These Jews follow modern dating practices by meeting potential mates via dating Web sites, events, or at universities in contrast to the more traditional approach of arranged marriage. However, the dating process includes a traditional approach as the Modern Orthodox community is also bound by the restrictions of yichud, shomer negiah, and taharat hamishpacha. Thus, the purpose of marriage is generally clearly identified between couples during their courtship.

Furthermore, modern ideals, such as feminism, influence the structure of Modern Orthodox unions. Some women adapt the traditional Orthodox marriage ceremony because they believe that it places them in a subservient role to their husbands. More offensive to their feminist ideals is the Jewish divorce process. When Orthodox Jews marry, they marry both under civil law and religious law with two separate marriage documents. In the case of divorce, civil divorces are obtained in accord with standard secular practices. However, according to Jewish law, the husband holds the power to divorce his wife. He must release his wife from marriage by giving his wife a get (Jewish divorce); without it, she may not remarry within Orthodoxy and is labeled an agunah (chained wife). The Modern Orthodox community has taken action to limit this possibility but has not abandoned the traditional Jewish process of divorce. This is very representative of Modern Orthodoxy, maintaining the traditional while attempting to account for modern and secular ideals.

It is beneficial for practitioners to display a heightened sensitivity to the unique stressors facing some of their Jewish American clients such as community pressure to marry and financial instability. An awareness of these factors is necessary for culturally competent practice. Furthermore, traditional customs have significant implications for human services delivery to Jewish American clients. Human services personnel are advised to refrain from touching clients of the opposite gender. Even extending a handshake may make a Jewish Orthodox client uncomfortable because of the aforementioned religious prohibition of shomer negiah. It is difficult to learn all the traditional customs of Jewish Americans, so when in doubt, practitioners should politely ask a client about his or her faith in order to gauge appropriate behavior.

Miriam Rollhaus
Hunter College

See Also: Acculturation; Anti-Semitism; Assimilation; Holocaust Survivors; Religion and Clients.

Further Readings

Heilman, Samuel C. Sliding to the Right: The Contest for the Future of American Jewish Orthodoxy. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 2006.

Milevsky, Avidan, Deborah Shifra Niman, Atara Raab, and Ruchie Gross. "A Phenomenological Examination of Dating Attitudes in Ultra-Orthodox Jewish Emerging Adult Women." Mental Health, Religion and Culture, v.14/4 (2011).

Schnall, Eliezer. "Multicultural Counseling and the Orthodox Jew." Journal of Counseling and Development, v.84/3 (2006).

John H. Chafee Foster Care Independence Program

Public child welfare agencies encounter numerous challenges in their missions to protect children and assist families. While recent child welfare legislation has focused on quick reunification, adoption, and relative placement as permanency options, some young people remain in the foster care system until their emancipation. Each year, approximately 30,000 young adults emancipate from foster care. Although this population has historically received minimal attention at the practice and policy levels, recent efforts have been made to provide more support for aging out youth to transition into adulthood. Most notably, the Chafee Foster Care Independence Act (CFCIA) was signed into law in 1999 to offer assistance in the areas of education, employment, housing, financial management, and emotional support by nearly doubling the allotment for independent living programs.

The most notable of the provisions included in the CFCIA include: (1) increasing funds to states to assist youth making the transition from foster care to independent living, (2) recognizing the need to further assist youth ages 18 to 21 who have left foster care, and (3) offering states greater flexibility in developing their independent living programs. As a result of the sweeping reforms included in this act, as well as the fact that racial and sexual minority youth are disproportionately over-represented in the aging-out population, CFCIA has had a significant_impact on issues of diversity in the child welfare and human services fields.

Increased Funding for Youth Transitioning to Independent Living

When compared to young adults in the general population, youth who age out of foster care have significantly higher rates of homelessness, unplanned pregnancies, health and mental health conditions, and criminal justice involvement. Similarly, these young adults have lower rates of employment, college attendance, and social support. A long-standing concern of many child welfare advocates has been that the system lacks the resources necessary to adequately prepare foster youth for the challenges of adulthood. The passage of the CFCIA doubled the amount of federal funding for independent living programs from $70 million to $140 million. In addition, to be eligible for federal funds, states must contribute a 20 percent match for independent living funds.

Expansion of Services for Youth Ages 18 to 21

In addition to the increased funding for independent living programs, the CFCIA also expanded the population of youth eligible to receive independent living services, including youth who have left care through the age of 21. Many child welfare advocates have argued that a youth's need for a family and assistance does not end at age 18, often citing the fact that most young Americans rely on certain levels of emotional and financial support from their parents long past their 18th birthdays. Two of the most prominent provisions impacting youth ages 18 to 21 include increased funds to cover room and board for youth who have left foster care as well as the expansion of Medicaid services to cover youth ages 18, 19, and 20 who have emancipated from foster care.

Greater Flexibility in Designing Independent Living Programs

Independent living programs are designed to assist in preparing youth for adulthood, usually providing assistance in career exploration, budgeting and financial management, preventative health measures, high school or general education development (GED) completion, and higher educational enrollment and retention. One of the provisions included in the CFCIA that has generated the most excitement from foster care advocates and professionals is its emphasis on including youth in all aspects of their own independent living plans. A consistent theme in numerous qualitative studies on foster care alumni has been that youth feel that they have very little voice and involvement in their care and service planning. Language in the CFCIA requires states to ensure that youth are active in designing their own program activities that prepare them for independent living. Historically, child welfare practice has viewed clients in terms of need rather than strengths; therefore, children and youth have largely been excluded from key decisions about their futures. In many ways, the CFCIA facilitates a youth development perspective by empowering youth to increase their involvement and responsibility in planning for adulthood.

Analysis of the CFCIA

Since its passage in 1999, numerous studies have evaluated the effectiveness of the CFCIA. This data suggests that young adults who have aged out of foster care are faring much better today than they had prior to the passage of the CFCIA. Rates of employment, higher education enrollment, and income are up significantly, while rates of homelessness, unplanned pregnancy, and criminal justice involvement have declined steadily.

One of the provisions that seems to have had the most profound impact is the expansion of the population of youth eligible for independent living services. Findings from the Midwest Evaluation of Former Foster Youth suggests that youth who remain in care as late as age 21 tend to experience an easier transition into adulthood than youth who emancipate at age 18. This study found that young adults who remained in care were about twice as likely to attend college, had significantly higher earnings, and were much less likely to experience an unplanned pregnancy.

Several analyses have been conducted assessing the impact of the CFCIA's increased emphasis on the involvement of youth in their case planning. While findings have recognized a number of strengths that have resulted from this emphasis, a number of barriers to effective youth services have also been identified, most notably, a lack of placement options for youth ages 18 to 21 as well as significant gaps in youth-specific training for foster parents and other child welfare professionals.

Adam McCormick
University of Texas at El Paso

See Also: Adoption and Safe Families Act; Aftercare Services for Children Aging Out of Foster Care; Child Welfare Services; Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act of 2008; Indian Child Welfare Act; Protective Services for Children.

Further Readings

Child Welfare League of America. “The Foster Care Independence Act of 1999.” http://www.cwla.org/advocacy/indlivhr3443.htm (Accessed December 2013).

Collins, M. E. “Enhancing Services to Youths Leaving Foster Care: Analysis of Recent Legislation and Its Potential Impact.” Children and Youth Services Review, v.26 (2004).

Courtney, M., A. Dworsky., A. Brown, C. Cary, K. Love, V. Vorhies, J. Lee. Midwest Evaluation of the Adult Functioning of Former Foster Youth: Outcomes at Age 26. Chicago: Chapin Hall at the University of Chicago, 2011.

Joint Commission, The

The Joint Commission is an accreditor of health care organizations in the United States and other countries. The commission evaluates the quality of health care provided by an organization. The accreditation or certification offered by the Joint Commission is similar to a grade of quality. Health care organizations voluntarily seek accreditation by following preset standards for care delivery. Compliance with standards is measured through self-report of performance and through visits by trained personnel, called surveyors. The quality of care offered by the health care organization is measured through these methods, and final determinations are reported to the public. Joint Commission accreditation is sought to improve care, improve management practices, and meet expectations of patients, insurers, and government health programs. Health care organizations pay to have their performance and outcomes evaluated by The Joint Commission.

History

The original idea for what became The Joint Commission was developed in 1910 by a surgeon, Ernest A. Codman, who had noticed a difference in patient death rates and other outcomes between various surgeons and hospitals. He worked with other interested surgeons to develop a method to track care delivery and surgical outcomes. Based on this work, in 1917 a group from the American College of Surgeons (ACS) developed Minimum Standards for Hospitals. In 1951, ACS partnered with many other health care organizations to develop the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals (JCAH). Over time, other types of health care organizations were accredited by JCAH and the name was changed to Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations (JCAHO) in 1987. This name was shortened to The Joint Commission in 2007.

As stated on its Web site, www.jointcommission.org, the current mission of the Joint Commission is, “To continuously improve health care for the public, in collaboration with other stakeholders, by evaluating health care organizations and inspiring them to excel in providing safe and effective care of the highest quality and value.” The Joint Commission is governed by a board of commissioners with representatives from the American Hospital Association, American Medical Association, American College of Physicians, American College of Surgeons, and American Dental Association. Additional members represent the fields of behavioral health care, home care, long-term care, and nursing.

Types of Standards

Quality can be evaluated by monitoring processes or by measuring the results of processes, called outcomes. Until 1997, all Joint Commission standards and expectations addressed care processes; that is, they provided and measured compliance with guidelines on the way health care organizations should operate. Now the commission measures care outcomes as well as care processes. The performance measurement system is called ORYX. Hospitals report data related to specific measures and the results are available publicly at The Joint Commission’s Quality Check Web site.

To earn and maintain The Joint Commission’s Gold Seal of Approval, an organization must undergo an on-site survey by a commission team at least every three years, except for laboratories, which are surveyed every two years. These survey visits are unannounced.

Emphasis on Diversity and Cultural Competence

The Joint Commission’s resources division offers publications and a video about communication, cultural competence, and patient- and family-centered care. These include the books Advancing Effective Communication, Cultural Competence, and Patient- and Family-Centered Care for the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender (LGBT) Community: A Field Guide; Patient-Centered Communication Standards for Hospitals; Advancing Effective Communication, Cultural Competence, and Patient- and Family-Centered Care: A Roadmap for Hospitals; and the video Promoting Health Equity and Patient-Centered Care. In addition, many required commission accreditation standards highlight the need for patient- and family-centered communication and care.

Accredited Organizations

In the United States, The Joint Commission accredits or certifies about 20,000 hospitals; facilities providing behavioral health, home care and hospice, and ambulatory care; nursing and rehabilitation centers; and laboratory service organizations. It provides certifications for disease-specific care for chronic diseases and conditions such as asthma, diabetes, and heart failure. Providers of health care staffing services can also earn Joint Commission certification. Approximately 82 percent of U.S. hospitals are currently accredited by the commission.

Internationally, Joint Commission International (JCI), a subsidiary of The Joint Commission's resources division, has a presence in more than 90 countries and seeks to help organizations improve health care quality. Staff from JCI evaluate quality in health care organizations worldwide and provide educational and advisory services. The World Health Organization (WHO) partnered with JCI and The Joint Commission to establish the first WHO Collaborating Centre for Patient Safety Solutions.

Deemed Status

The Joint Commission's accreditation can qualify hospitals and other organizations to receive reimbursement from the U.S. Medicare and Medicaid programs; this is called "deemed status." In order for a health care organization to participate in and receive payment from the Medicare or Medicaid programs, it must meet the eligibility requirements for program participation, including a certification of compliance with the conditions of participation found in federal regulations. Usually, this certification is based on a survey conducted by a state agency on behalf of the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMS). However, The Joint Commission is one of the organizations that have been determined to enforce standards that meet or exceed Medicare's requirements. Therefore, CMS will not conduct its own survey if the organization is accredited by The Joint Commission.

Janet S. Hahn
Western Michigan University

See Also: Home Care Services; Hospitals; Medicaid; Medicare; Outpatient Medical Care.

Further Readings

The Joint Commission. 2013 Comprehensive Accreditation Manual for Behavioral Health Care. Oakbrook Terrace, IL: Joint Commission Resources, 2012.
The Joint Commission. 2013 Comprehensive Accreditation Manual for Hospitals. Oakbrook Terrace, IL: Joint Commission Resources, 2012.
The Joint Commission. Cultural Sensitivity: A Pocket Guide for Health Care Professionals. 2d ed. Oakbrook Terrace, IL: Joint Commission Resources, 2012.
The Joint Commission. http://www.jointcommission.org (Accessed November 2013).

Journal of Ethnic and Cultural Diversity in Social Work

The international Journal of Ethnic and Cultural Diversity in Social Work (http://www.ingentaconnect.com/content/rmp/dehc) can trace its origins to a pilot 2004 special fifth issue of the well-known journal Health and Social Care in the Community coedited by professors Paula McGee and Mark Johnson. The well-known publishers Radcliffe Medical of Abingdon offered these editors the opportunity to create their own journal that would join the publisher's stable of world-class medical journals, including Education for Primary Care, The London Journal of Primary Care, Mental Health in Family Medicine, and Quality in Primary Care. The journal adheres to the standards of the International Committee of Medical Journal Editors (ICMJE) and the Committee on Publication Ethics (COPE), and all papers are peer-reviewed.

Originally published as Diversity in Health and Social Care (ISSN 1743-1913, e-ISSN 1743-4904), the first volume appeared in late 2004, with a major focus on migration, ethnicity, and health, and also health inequality in general. Over time, the journal increasingly attracted papers that also examined issues of gender, disability, and sexual orientation. Starting in volume six of January 2009, the title was revised to Diversity in Health and Care (ISSN 1759-1422, e-ISSN 1759-1430) following a refocusing of the publisher's interest on health service delivery. In 2012, after the purchase of the publishers by Electric Word, the title was finally revised to reflect the increased focus on inequality and diversity, including attention to intersecting inequalities across more than one strand of disadvantage, to the present Diversity and Equality in Health and Care (ISSN 2049-5471, e-ISSN 2049-548X). Earlier issues are indexed in the same sequence but may be identified using older ISSN numbers.

Diversity and Equality in Health and Care dedicates space for the publication of research and debate papers that address issues relating to the equitable provision of health care and services for members of diverse social groups and settings in all countries in the world. It recognizes that many such papers find it difficult to gain acceptance in mainstream, discipline-led journals, where such issues are seen as marginal or contentious and therefore are not always acceptable to conventional reviewers. This journal welcomes papers relating to all aspects of diversity in health and care and the inequalities experienced as a result of ill health, marginalization, prejudice, stigma, and issues in service provision. Papers may report on qualitative or quantitative research, describe and evaluate good practice, put forward arguments for debate, or discuss educational matters. Diversity and Equality in Health and Care particularly encourages multiprofessional perspectives, attention to the views of service users and caregivers, and papers exploring the international dimensions of diversity and equality across and within cultures.

Diversity and equality are seen as very broad concepts, embracing areas that include but are not limited to race, culture, and ethnicity; sexual orientation; gender; migrants; caregivers; physical, communication, and learning disabilities; spirituality; and underserved or marginalized populations. Diversity also extends to the wide variety of settings in which care takes place and in the multidisciplinary nature of professional practice. The journal carries theoretical papers but also insists that materials published should contribute to the improvement of practice and professional development. All issues also carry a section titled "Knowledgeshare," which carries a mixture of good practice studies, book reviews, and reports of meetings. A recent initiative has been the inclusion of a regular continuing professional development feature in each issue, highlighting new knowledge in a specific field of practice. Selected papers may be offered on open access terms, and the journal is hosted online by IngentaConnect.

As of September 2013, the editorial board of Diversity and Equality in Health and Care included 20 individuals representing the United Kingdom, South Africa, Switzerland, Jordan, the United States, Saudi Arabia, and New Zealand. The editors welcome research papers that address any aspect of diversity including evaluative studies and methodological debates; practice papers that provide examples of culturally competent practice or that address the practicalities, policy, or managerial aspects of delivering services to members of diverse groups; debate papers that address key issues in diversity or that focus on under-researched topics; and knowledge-sharing reports that may include book, Web site, video, and other resource reviews and papers about specific initiatives to improve practice.

The journal receives submissions from, and is read by, individuals from all around the world including Australasia, North America, Europe, the Middle East, and Asia. While nearly all submissions are initially returned to the authors with the comments of two independent, blinded reviewers, approximately one-third are subsequently accepted for publication following revision.

Diversity and Equality in Health and Care is indexed in the following:

- CINAHL
- Health Policy Reference Centre
- SocIndex (FT)

- Family and Society Studies Worldwide
- Gender Studies Database
- Race Relations Abstracts
- Social Care Online
- British Nursing Index
- Health and Social Care Abstracts
- CSA Sociological Abstracts
- CSA Social Services Abstracts
- DH-Data
- Ulrich's International Periodicals Directory
- SCOPUS (SciVerse)
- NHS Evidence

Subscriptions to Diversity and Equality in Health and Care include the printed issues, access to online current content, the full text archive, Internet reference linking with search facilities, and an e-mail contents alert service. Individuals can also purchase online-only access to the journal for a reduced rate. This includes online current content, the full text archive, Internet reference linking with search facilities, and an e-mail contents alert service.

M. Scott Young
University of South Florida

See Also: Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development; Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Disabilities, International Variation in Attitudes Toward; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Health Care, Disparities in.

Further Readings

Johnson, Mark and Paula McGee. "Dual Jeopardy or Double Pride? Disability, Difference, Diversity and the Gentle Art of Handicapping." Diversity and Equality in Health and Care, v.9/4 (2012).

Joseph, Alfred L., Karen Slovak, C. Anne Broussard, Paula Sunanon Webster. "School Social Workers and Multiculturalism: Changing the Environment for Success." Journal of Ethnic and Cultural Diversity in Social Work, v.21(2) (2012).

McGee, Paula Mark and Johnson. "Issues in Minority Ethnic Health." Health and Social Care in the Community, v.12/5 (2004).

Journal of Human Services

The Journal of Human Services (JHS), formerly Human Service Education, is the flagship journal of the National Organization for Human Services (NOHS). JHS is a national, refereed scholarly publication; therefore, every article is reviewed by experts in the field prior to acceptance. Reviews are double-blind so that both the authors' and the reviewers' identities are concealed from one another. The principal audiences of JHS are human services faculty members, administrators, practitioners, and undergraduate and graduate students. Sample areas of interest include teaching methods, models of internships, faculty development, career paths of graduates, credentialing, accreditation, models of undergraduate and graduate study, clinical issues in human services treatment, and supervision of human services practitioners. The journal is published annually and has recently printed its 33rd volume. Members of NOHS obtain a copy of the journal as part of their membership benefits. Typically, new volumes are published during fall of each year. Individuals, libraries, institutions, and agencies can purchase subscriptions to the journal.

The journal was first published in 1979 as Human Service Education. In 2010, the journal officially changed its name to the Journal of Human Services to reflect the broader readership that it had and to better signify to the public the kinds of articles found in the journal. The journal can be found through the Gale database, the Elton B. Stephens Company (EBSCO) database, and through the Web site for NOHS (www.nationalhumanservices.org). At the NOHS Web site, all issues since the journal's inception can be found in PDF format and are accessible to all members of the organization. The most recent journal is accessible to the public.

The Journal of Human Services publishes three types of submissions: (1) articles, (2) brief notes, and (3) critical reviews. Manuscripts for articles are approximately 18 typed pages. Articles primarily address contemporary issues in human services, innovative approaches to human services education and practice, and both qualitative and quantitative research on topics related to the field of human services. Brief notes include succinct reports of research projects or program innovations. Manuscripts for brief notes do not exceed four pages. The results and implications occupy at least half of a brief note. Critical reviews of textbooks, other instructional materials, and scholarly books of interest to human service educators and practitioners are also published by JHS. Manuscripts of critical reviews are approximately three pages unless two or more related books are included in one review, in which case manuscripts may be five pages. Publications in JHS conform to the style of the sixth edition of the Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association (APA). A typical volume of the journal includes up to eight articles, three brief notes, and three book reviews.

The journal has two coeditors, Drs. Ed Neukrug and Tammi Milliken, who manage most details of the review and publication process. Two associate editors, Drs. Jill Dustin and Laurie Craigen, secure advertising for the journal and subscriptions to libraries and work with copyrights. An assistant editor, Brett Gleason, manages the day-to-day functioning of the journal and ensures that all proposals are sent to the coeditors and editorial board without identifying information.

Once the assistant editor receives a manuscript, he or she sends it to one of the coeditors, who reads it to ensure that the content is appropriate for the journal and that it follows APA format. If not, it is sent back to the authors with an explanation as to why it is not appropriate for the journal. If it is deemed suitable, the article is sent back to the assistant editor, who then sends it to two or three editorial board members for review. Editorial board members who review a manuscript complete a manuscript evaluation form, which asks for feedback about the format of the article (e.g., does it follow APA format, etc.), whether the content of the article is of interest to the readership, the presentation (e.g., clarity and organization) of the article, and a series of ratings concerning article components (e.g., clarity of the problem statement, the literature review, research design, limitations, etc.).

Then, the editorial board member makes a recommendation as to whether the manuscript should be accepted as is; accepted with minor revisions; returned for rewrite and resubmit, rewrite as a brief note, or submit as an article for The Link (NOHS's newsletter); rejected; or suggested to submit elsewhere. The manuscript is then sent back to the assistant editor. Once the assistant editor receives all reviews, they are sent, blind, to one of the coeditors, who examines them and makes a decision about publication. Authors receive a letter from the editor explaining the decision.

Tammi F. Milliken
Ed S. Neukrug
Jill C. Dustin
Laurie M. Craigen
Old Dominion University

See Also: Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; National Organization for Human Services; Urban Communities and Human Services.

Further Readings

International Journal of Social Work and Human Services Practice. http://www.hrpub.org/journals/jour_info.php?id=92 (Accessed March 2014).
Journal of Progressive Human Services. http://www.tandfonline.com/loi/wphs20 (Accessed March 2014).
National Organization for Human Services. Journal of Human Services. http://www.nationalhumanservices.org/journal-of-human-services (Accessed December 2013).

Journal of Immigrant and Minority Health

The Journal of Immigrant and Minority Health (JIMH), formerly the Journal of Immigrant Health (JIH), is a quarterly journal published by Springer, a part of Springer Science+Business Media. Its ISSNs are 1557-1912 (Print) and 1557-1920 (Online). JIMH serves as a forum where scholars and practitioners present critical issues related to immigrant and minority health and explore possible solutions. Various disciplines are represented in JIMH including public health, epidemiology, medicine and nursing, communication, anthropology, sociology, population research, immigration law, and ethics, among others.

Concerned with health disparities experienced by immigrant populations, scholars have explored these issues from their disciplinary perspectives. However, due to its interdisciplinary nature and context-specific characteristics, researchers and practitioners have urged the necessity and importance of generating an interdisciplinary and international forum to facilitate exchanges of the latest findings and information. Launched in 1999 by Kluwer Academic/Plenum Publishers, JIH was the first scholarly journal featuring immigrant health. As a quarterly journal, JIH published articles on health issues and social welfare related to immigrants and refugees. On average, 26 articles were published annually. Sana Loue, founding editor of JIH, noted, "The launching of this journal signifies a recognition of both immigrant health as a field in its own right and a growing consensus that immigrants have unique health needs that require further study." Along with the merger with Springer Science+Business Media in October 2004, JIH changed its name to the Journal of Immigrant and Minority Health in January 2006. Since then, there has been a steady increase on the coverage of minority health in addition to the original focus on immigrant health. From 2008, JIMH began to publish bimonthly. On average, 110 articles have been published annually. The journal now features online-first articles, allowing manuscripts accepted for publication to be distributed promptly and electronically prior to the official publication via hard copies.

JIMH publishes peer-reviewed, original research that contributes to the theories of and practices for immigrant and minority health. The journal also publishes review articles, theoretical and policy papers, short communications, letters to the editor, and notes from the field. Publications in JIMH include both macro- and micro-level examinations of immigrant and minority health. Both qualitative and quantitative approaches are welcomed. While some explore broad-based, fundamental research questions (e.g., social determinants of immigrant health and population-specific health disparities), others focus on community-based or individual-level health topics (e.g., cultural-specific illness ideology or behaviors and population-specific health interventions and outcomes). Since 2009, each issue often includes a special thematic focus. Some of the themes include communicable disease, global migration and health, language and acculturation, mental health and substance abuse, occupational and environmental health, and health care utilization and access to care. Although the editorial office is based in the United States, many of the publications include immigrant and minority populations outside of the United States and explore issues relevant to international audiences.

Editorial Board

JIMH's editorial board reflects its interdisciplinary and scholarly emphasis. Sana Loue has served as the founding editor and the editor in chief since 1999. She is a professor and director in the Department of Epidemiology and Biostatistics and the director of the Center for Minority Public Health of the School of Medicine at Case Western Reserve University. She holds three doctoral degrees with a J.D. in law and two Ph.Ds. in epidemiology and medical anthropology. Four associate editors represent different topic areas of JIMH. Declan Barry (assistant professor of psychiatry, Yale University) serves as an addiction and behavioral medicine editor. He has a Ph.D. in psychiatry, and his work involves issues related to addictions, psychotherapy, and culture. Susan Hatters-Friedman (associate professor of psychiatry and pediatrics, Case Western Reserve University) serves as a behavioral and mental health editor. She holds an M.D. in forensic psychiatry. Her research primarily focuses on the interface of women's mental health and forensic psychiatry. Douglas M. Brugge (professor of public health and community medicine, Tufts University) serves as the environmental and occupational health editor. He has a Ph.D. in cellular and developmental biology. His research largely employs the model of community-collaborative research. Elaine Hsieh (associate professor of communication, University of Oklahoma) serves as the health care communication and relations editor. She holds a Ph.D. in health communication. Her research centers on language barriers and health disparities among immigrant populations. There are also many prominent scholars included in the JIMH editorial board.

With contributions from these leading scholars, JIH and JIMH have provided a vision for where both scholars and practitioners must go in the future in order to address the health needs of immigrant populations. All submitted articles go through double-blind review by two anonymous scholars in order to ensure the quality in original research.

JIMH was first indexed in Journal Citation Reports in 2010. In 2012, JIMH had an impact factor of 1.007 and a cited half-life of 3.5 years. Cited half-life refers to the median number of years being cited by other journals within a specific year. JIMH is also widely indexed in major scholarly databases including the Social Science Citation Index, Journal Citation Reports/Social Sciences Edition, Social SciSearch, PubMed/Medline, SCOPUS, PsycINFO, EMBASE, Google Scholar, Elton B. Stephens Company (EBSCO), CSA, ProQuest, Academic OneFile, Academic Search, AGRICOLA, Cumulative Index of Nursing and Allied Health Literature (CINAHL), CSA Environmental Sciences, Current Contents/Social and Behavioral Sciences, EMCare, Gale, Health Reference Center Academic, Online Computer Library Catalog (OCLC), SCImago, and Summon by Serial Solutions.

Sachiko Terui
Elaine Hsieh
University of Oklahoma

See Also: Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Diversity and Quality in Health Care; Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey; Mental Health Services, Ethnic Models and Multicultural; National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health; Social Determinants of Health.

Further Readings

Loue, Sana. "Introductory Statement." Journal of Immigrant Health, v.1/1 (1999).

Springer. "International Journal of Public Health." http://www.springer.com/public+health/journal/38 (Accessed March 2014).

Springer. "Journal of Immigrant and Minority Health." http://www.springer.com/public+health/journal/10903 (Accessed November 2013).

Juvenile Delinquents

A juvenile delinquent, or a juvenile offender, is a person under the age of 18 who commits an act that would otherwise have been charged as a crime if he or she were an adult. Juvenile delinquency has been recognized as a serious public concern. In 2009, approximately 1.9 million juveniles were arrested, which represented a 17 percent decrease from 2000. However, according to the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, about 15 percent of violent crimes and 24 percent of all proper crimes have been committed by juveniles.

Considering that delinquency is a major public health concern, understanding individual (e.g., race or ethnicity, sex, or socioeconomic status) and contextual factors (e.g., family, peer, or school) associated with delinquency is imperative as research suggests that overlooking multiple factors and imposing punitive measures increase recidivism and reduce academic and employment opportunities.

Individual-Level Risk Factors

The juvenile justice system has long struggled to understand and address the overrepresentation of African American youth involved with the courts. Significant differences in the rate of delinquency among racial groups in the United States have been observed for decades. In 2010, African American youth accounted for 41 percent of detained youth, compared to 32 percent white and 22 percent Hispanic youth. However, to date, most conclusions about the development of juvenile delinquency have focused on individual-level factors rather than multilevel analyses that include contextual and system-level factors. If social work is to help address disparities at the front end of the juvenile justice system, policies and practices must consider important domains of risk at both the micro and macro level.

At the micro level, gender and income are critical factors. Males engage in more delinquent and criminal acts than do females. Yet, the rate of female delinquency is increasing, and the gap between the rate of delinquency among boys and girls has narrowed. In 1980, males were four times as likely as females to be arrested; in recent years, they are only twice as likely to be arrested. This demographic shift has important implications for gender-specific approaches to juvenile crime. Research also reveals an overrepresentation of low-income children in the juvenile justice system, particularly those living in persistent poverty and those who reside in urban areas where weak neighborhood social organization and social bonds are prevalent. Both direct and indirect associations between economic hardship and delinquent behavior have been examined. Adolescents living in impoverished neighborhoods, environments where deviant peer influence and criminal activities are frequently observed, are at an increased risk of engaging in delinquent behaviors.

Contextual-Level Risk Factors

Considering that an individual socialization begins in the home, family-level factors, such as family functioning, social bonds between the parent and the child, and family structure are critical to the upbringing of a child, which could lead to or mitigate delinquent behaviors. Children's aggressive and antisocial behaviors are reinforced when there is a lack of positive parenting practices, poor parental monitoring, and abuse in the family. Additionally, children growing up in a home where a father figure is absent are significantly more likely to engage in delinquency than children from two-parent households.

Coercion theorists purport that family influences an adolescent's interpersonal style, which in turn influences peer group affiliation. Social control theory proposes that weak social bonds in the family can increase self-interested behavior (e.g., delinquency). Studies largely lend support for the hypothesis that deviant and antisocial peer affiliation significantly increases the likelihood of delinquent behavior. Moreover, peer-level factors, such as peer delinquency, peer approval of delinquent behavior, attachment or allegiance to peers, time spent with peers, and peer pressure, are all significantly related to antisocial and delinquent behaviors during adolescence.

In addition to the context of peer groups, social work professionals need to address the problem of delinquency from a systems perspective. Adolescents spend a significant amount of time in school, and the relationship between school factors, such as poor academic achievement, academic failure, and delinquency, is well documented. Classroom observations also indicate that delinquent youth spend less time in school and report fewer academic survival skills (e.g., attendance and answering questions)—all of which are necessary for effective learning and grade attainment. These findings are informed by social control and social bond theorists, who assert that negative consequences of weak bonds to school, poor grades, low educational expectations, and poor motivation can heighten youth involvement in delinquency. In contrast, youth who develop strong bonds to school are more likely to conform to the norms and values that schools promote and are less likely to engage in delinquent behaviors. A recent focus on the relationship between child welfare and juvenile justice further supports the need for a systems approach to delinquency—especially if the field is interested in addressing the issue of disproportionate minority contact (DMC). Child welfare is a significant source for DMC in juvenile justice. Although the overrepresentation of racial minorities has been a focus of interest for juvenile justice practitioners and researchers for more than 20 years, there is virtually no mention of child welfare or allied service systems as a possible contributing mechanism or pathway that could be targeted for prevention. Understanding the role of the child welfare system in both the development and process of delinquent cases should not be interpreted as blaming the child welfare system but rather as an opportunity for social workers to develop prevention efforts at the systems level.

Prevention and Intervention Programs

Characteristics of adolescents are commonly used as a basis for development of delinquency prevention and intervention programs. Delinquency prevention and intervention efforts seek to redirect youth at risk for delinquency or those who engage in delinquency from further involvement in the juvenile justice system. Many of the intervention efforts have focused on education and behavior management for youth in middle and high schools rather than on children in elementary schools. Other interventions seek to remediate disruptive and violent behaviors and delinquency after these behaviors have emerged.

However, researchers and practitioners have argued that prevention—particularly early prevention—is a more effective approach that can reduce the risk of future offense. In response, a number of prevention and early intervention programs, such as the First Step to Success, Linking the Interests of Families and Teachers, Perry Preschool Project, Promoting Alternative THinking Strategies (PATHS), Strong African American Families, and the Incredible Years have all been recognized as effective programs.

In addition, given the complexity and interrelatedness of the risk factors, it is also critical that intervention efforts should not focus exclusively on individual behavior but should target conditions at the systems level (e.g., family, school, and neighborhood). A number of multiple-level programs have also emerged in recent years such as the Adolescent Transition Program, Families and Schools Together, Multisystemic Therapy, and Triple P—Positive Parenting Programs. In other words, a multifaceted approach, which targets the risk factors at various levels of the social ecology, is crucial, especially as it relates to African American youth and those living in poverty.

Jun Sung Hong
Wayne State University
Joseph P. Ryan
University of Michigan

See Also: Interstate Compact for Juveniles; Juvenile Detention Centers; Juvenile Justice System; Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention.

Further Readings

Cauffman, E. "Understanding the Female Offender." The Future of Children, v.18 (2008).
Chung, H. L. and L. Steinberg. "Relations Between Neighborhood Factors, Parenting Behaviors, Peer Deviance and Delinquency Among Serious Juvenile Offenders." Developmental Psychology, v.42 (2006).
Loeber, R., D. P. Farrington, and D. Petechuk. Child Delinquency: Early Intervention and Prevention. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, 2003.
McCord, J., C. S. Widom, and N. A. Crowell, eds. Juvenile Crime, Juvenile Justice. Panel on Juvenile Crime: Prevention, Treatment, and Control. Washington, DC: National Academy Press, 2001.
Office of Justice Programs. Juveniles: Delinquency Prevention. http://www.crimesolutions.gov/TopicDetails.aspx?ID=62 (Accessed August 2013).
Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. Highlights From Pathways to Desistance: A Longitudinal Study of Serious Adolescent Offenders. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. http://www.ojjdp.gov/pubs/236477.pdf (Accessed December 2013).
Piquero, A. R. "Disproportionate Minority Contact." The Future of Children, v.18 (2008).
Ryan, J. P., A. B. Williams, and M. E. Courtney. "Adolescent Neglect, Juvenile Delinquency and the Risk of Recidivism." Journal of Youth and Adolescence, v.42 (2013).

Juvenile Detention Centers

Early laws and responses to delinquent behavior demonstrated no consideration for age as seen in contemporary law. In the 19th century, the American legal system treated adjudicated youth offenses with the same penalties as adult offenders. With the overwhelming growth of the population, American cities experienced increases in impoverished youth engaging in delinquency. In response, laws were established to grant states the authority to remove children from the care of "unfit" parents. Reform schools were built as residential facilities to provide education and training. Placement of youth in adult facilities was discouraged, yet reform schools still maintained strict environments where physical punishment and discrimination were commonplace.

The child-saving movement influenced the formation of the first juvenile courts. This group emphasized the need for government intervention among families with wayward children. Juvenile courts echoed these sentiments as youth were confined for noncriminal status offenses, such as disobedience. This practice persisted into the 1970s, when laws prohibited youth with status offenses from being confined to secure detention facilities. Other changes to juvenile law came later, including the separation of youth and adults during detainment, no longer allowing delinquent youth to be housed among adults when awaiting sentencing. Current trends in juvenile correctional facilities vary between get-tough attitudes and stronger focuses on treatment and rehabilitation.

Characteristics and Prevalence

A juvenile detention center, also known as a youth detention center, juvenile hall, or correctional facility, is a residential facility with construction fixtures or staffing models for youth, often termed juvenile delinquents. Detention centers are utilized for the placement of any youth adjudicated of having committed a crime or any other individual convicted of a criminal offense; of these, 52 percent are youth younger than age 16, 28 percent are female, and 64 percent are white.

According to the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, there were 4,857 arrests for every 100,000 youth (ages 10–17) for all offenses in 2010; 1,084 arrests for every 100,000 for property crimes; and 225 arrests for every 100,000 for violent offenses. In 2009, 1,504,100 youth were involved in the juvenile court. Although delinquency rates declined from 1996 to 2009, the number of caseloads rose nearly 300 percent between 1960 and 2009; cases involving detention centers increased from 246,300 to 318,000 from 1985 to 2009. In 2010, 70,792 youth were held in detention or residential facilities, of which 61,358 were males and 9,434 were females.

The Cook County Juvenile Detention Facility and Court in Chicago, Illinois. Detention centers are utilized for the placement of youth adjudicated of having committed a crime.

Racial and ethnic minority youth are disproportionately represented at all levels of the juvenile justice system. More than 62 percent of detained youth in 2010 were black, Hispanic, or Latino, which made up almost double their percentage of the juvenile population. Additionally, correctional placements are influenced by systemic gender and racial biases rather than rehabilitative or behavioral health needs. This demonstrates the need for appropriate and culturally sensitive services and staff in juvenile correctional facilities to meet the diverse treatment needs of delinquent youth in detention center settings.

An Overview of Services

Effective services are necessary given that detained youth with minimal or no treatment are likely to recidivate or engage in crimes during adulthood. In particular, educational and mental health needs of detained youth are special considerations. There have been recent attempts at developing alternative programs such as the Juvenile Detention Alternatives Initiative (JDAI). Established in 1992, the JDAI aims to reduce the number of youth in detention centers and the number of youth who fail to appear in court; to redirect public funds toward successful reform strategies; and to improve the conditions of detention centers. JDAI seeks to create services without compromising public safety.

Special educational needs of detained youth warrant serious attention; however, many centers do not comply with the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act, which mandates that detained youth are entitled to "free and appropriate education in the least restrictive environment." However, the Ohio Community Collaboration Model, which includes strategic connections with family and community resources, has been effective in improving school performance and reducing behaviors that might lead to arrest. Communities nationwide also developed mental health programs for detained youth, such as the Bernalillo County Juvenile Detention Center, which developed an intake process to identify youth's mental health needs and divert them to community mental health centers.

Several residential treatment programs, from therapeutic interventions to punitive correctional systems, have been established to provide housing for youth with mental health or substance-use problems who are incompatible with nonsecure environments but whose cases do not merit commitment to psychiatric hospitals or correctional facilities.

Jun Sung Hong
Shantel West
Wayne State University

See Also: Interstate Compact for Juveniles; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Justice System, The; Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention.

Further Readings

Hong, J. S., J. P. Ryan, Y. L. Chiu, and B. Sabri. "Re-Arrest Among Juvenile Justice-Involved Youth: An Examination of the Static and Dynamic Risk Factors." Residential Treatment for Children and Youth, v.30 (2013).

Lawrence, R. and M. Hesse. Juvenile Justice: The Essentials. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2010.

National Center for Mental Health and Juvenile Justice. “Blueprint for Change: A Comprehensive Model for the Identification and Treatment of Youth With Mental Health Needs in Contact With the Juvenile Justice System.” http://www.ncmhjj.com/Blueprint/intervention/detention.shtml (Accessed March 2014).

Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Juvenile Court Statistics 2009. http://www.ojjdp.gov/pubs/239114.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Ohio Coalition for the Education of Children with Disabilities. Special Education and Juvenile Justice: An Overview and Analysis of Prevention and Intervention Policy and Program Developments. http://www.ocecd.org/ocecd/h_docs/061220_JJSpEdRept.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Shelley-Tremblay, J., N. O’Brien, and J. Langhinrichsen-Rohling. “Reading Disability in Adjudicated Youth: Prevalence Rates, Current Models, Traditional and Innovative Treatments.” Aggression and Violent Behavior, v.12 (2007).

Sickmund, M., T. J. Sladky, W. Kang, and C. Puzzanchera. Easy Access to the Census of Juveniles in Residential Placement. http://www.ojjdp.gov/ojstatbb/ezacjrp/ (Accessed December 2013).

Juvenile Justice System

The American juvenile justice system has faced an unprecedented period of transition in recent years. Juvenile crime in the United States followed a downward trend since the early 1990s, and the juvenile crime rate in 2010 was 24 percent below the rate in 1980 and 55 percent below the peak year of 1994. After a period of decreasing rates of juvenile crimes, the moral panic that fueled the get-tough approaches of the 1990s and early 2000s, which exposed juvenile offenders to harsh punishments (e.g., placing juvenile offenders in adult prisons), has waned. In recent years, state legislatures have reconsidered the harsh punishments they had enacted as politicians and the public have questioned the high economic costs, the ineffectiveness of the so-called reforms, and the harshness and negative outcomes of the punishments.

Evolution of the Juvenile Justice System

The juvenile justice system and public perceptions of juvenile offenders in the United States are marked by major changes over the last 100 years. Following the trend of English laws, youth who were accused of crimes were imprisoned with adults, and there was no legal term for juvenile delinquency. In the early 19th century, the idea of reforming juvenile offenders took root in the United States. The House of Refuge in New York, the first juvenile house of reform, was established by the Society for the Prevention of Juvenile Delinquency and opened in 1824 with the idea of housing juvenile offenders in a separate facility. Other states subsequently followed suit. The idea of reform was vigorously supported in the 18th and 19th centuries by emerging research and science regarding child development, and reformers across the country supported the idea of rehabilitating juvenile offenders rather than punishing them as adults.

The Chicago Reform School opened in 1855 to protect juvenile offenders by separating them from adult criminals and to advocate for rehabilitation. However, it was not until 1899, when the juvenile court was created in Cook County with the goal of reforming policies with regards to juvenile offenders, and within 30 years, that most states followed suit and established juvenile courts. The early juvenile courts shared the ideas of rehabilitation with reform schools, based on the legal doctrine of parens patriae (giving the state the power to serve as the guardian). The goal was to guide juvenile offenders toward life as law-abiding adults, and the courts had the power to order juvenile offenders to be removed from their homes and be placed in institutions as part of their rehabilitative process. However, hard labor, strict regimentation, whippings, physical and sexual abuse, and discriminatory treatment against racial and ethnic minority and poor white children were common problems. Discipline in the juvenile reform schools was extremely brutal, which demonstrated a significant disparity between theory and practice.

Nevertheless, by 1945, all states had juvenile courts, and for the first half of the century, the juvenile justice system in which juvenile cases were processed went largely unchallenged. Although there were some differences among states and jurisdictions, there was a general agreement with regards to the goals and objectives of juvenile justice systems and how those systems should be similar to and different from the adult criminal justice systems with the universally accepted goal being treatment rather than punishment.

In the 1960s, however, there were a number of court cases where juvenile offenders were being sentenced to institutions that were similar to adult prisons or transferred to criminal court but without due process protections common to criminal court. Criticisms of juvenile courts were highlighted in a number of Supreme Court cases, such as Kent v. United States, In re Gault, In re Winship, McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, and Breed v. Jones. The U.S. Supreme Court case In re Gault maintained that juvenile offenders were entitled to the same constitutional due process rights as adults, which began a nationwide reform in the juvenile justice system, granting juveniles many of the same rights that adults have in court. Many of the distinctions between juvenile and adult laws have begun to fade, and there have been discussions about the possibility of merging the juvenile and adult criminal justice systems, which were based upon beliefs about juvenile crime and whether juvenile offenders should be held accountable similar to adult offenders. Some of these changes can be understood as negative unintended consequences of the In re Gault decision.

In the 1970s, community-based programs, diversion, and deinstitutionalization had a profound impact on the juvenile justice policy. A number of lawsuits challenged the conditions and policies of juvenile institutions, which alleged cruel and unusual punishment. In 1974, Congress enacted the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act, which mandated separation of juvenile offenders from adult offenders. As stipulated by the act, the deinstitutionalization of status offenders and nonoffenders requirement mandated that juvenile offenders who were not charged with acts that would be crimes for adults would not be placed in detention facilities or correctional facilities. Moreover, the act also stipulated that juvenile and adult inmates cannot have contact with each other. Juvenile courts also considered the individual and social problems that likely influenced the offender's behavior, and sentences were based on the nature of the crime as well as the offender's treatment needs.

In the 1980s, the rate of juvenile violent offenses increased, and there were growing public safety concerns that continue to this day. As a result, many state legislatures responded by passing punitive measures such as removing juvenile offenders charged with violent crimes from the juvenile system, mandating the juvenile justice system to resemble the criminal justice system, and treating more serious juvenile offenders as criminals but in the juvenile court. In the 1990s, state lawmakers began to pass measures to crack down on juvenile offenses as the public voiced growing concern over highly publicized offenses such as school shootings.

Consequently, every state enacted measures that made it easier to expand eligibility for adult criminal court processing, sentence juvenile offenders to adult correctional facilities, and reduce confidentiality protections. These legal reforms resulted in the transfer of juvenile offenders into the adult criminal system, thus changing the status of an estimated 250,000 juveniles per year. Juvenile justice experts differ in their opinions regarding the outcomes and consequences of the statutory changes in the juvenile justice system. Research findings have been also mixed as to whether tougher laws are indeed associated with reductions in juvenile crime. Nevertheless, the laws have resulted in more number of juveniles being waived to criminal court prosecution and serving time in adult correctional facilities.

Recent Juvenile Justice System

Death penalty sentences for juvenile offenders convicted of murder have been a major controversy. From 1973 through 2004, a total of 228 juvenile death sentences were imposed, of which 22 (14 percent) resulted in execution and 134 (86 percent) were commuted to prison sentences (usually life terms). The number of states that allow the death penalty for juveniles under 18 was declining when, on March 1, 2005, the Supreme Court ruled in Roper v. Simmons that the death penalty for individuals under age 18 at the time of the offense violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution and was thus unconstitutional. The Supreme Court's decision was based on the idea that juveniles are susceptible to immature and irresponsible behavior; even a heinous crime committed by a juvenile offender is not evidence of depraved character, and juveniles' diminished culpability would not adequately justify imposing the death penalty.

In 2010, the Supreme Court also ruled that life sentences without parole for youth under 18 years of age who had not committed murder at the time of offense were unconstitutional. Until then, the United States stood alone worldwide in imposing life-without-parole sentences on such juveniles. Life sentences without parole were limited to offenders who committed murder. The issue of life without parole for juveniles received considerable international attention, and the case of Graham v. Florida paved the way for review of the imposition of life sentences that bar any possibility of parole for all juvenile offenses.

In 2012, the Supreme Court decided that juveniles convicted of a criminal offense cannot be automatically punished the same way as adult criminals without considering their ages and other factors. Specifically, the Supreme Court ruled that youth who are convicted of murder may not receive mandatory life sentences without any possibility of parole. The judge and the jury are required to take into account the offender's age and other factors before handing down a sentence.

Suggestions

The future direction of the juvenile justice system is unclear. On the one hand, research documenting the relative immaturity of adolescent thinking and emotional regulation and their susceptibility to peer influence has moved research-based advocates to push for more rather than less separation of the juvenile justice system from the adult criminal justice system. On the other hand, a general public perception that juvenile justice programs are ineffective, coupled with the dominance of ultraconservative ideology, creates a continuing demand for get-tough policies and practices. Research has demonstrated that the try-and-sentence-juveniles-as-adult ideology has resulted in more, not less, recidivism.

Some of the more innovative approaches to juvenile offenders focus on the need to offer simultaneously cognitive restructuring (changing ideas about aggression and antisocial behavior) and behavioral rehearsal (offering concrete opportunities to practice prosocial and cooperative, nonaggressive behaviors as an alternative to patterns that have brought the juvenile to police attention). Cognitive-behavioral therapy for children as a way to prevent childhood conduct disorder from escalating into serious delinquency in adolescence is a prime preventive strategy. Moreover, a large number of states that house juvenile justice involved youth in secure confinement have been faced with situations in which the majority of inmates consist of racial and ethnic minority populations, most notably African Americans and Chicanos or Latinos.

Disproportionate representation of racial and ethnic minority youth in the juvenile justice system necessitates an array of culturally relevant services that are designed to reduce disproportionate minority contacts in the juvenile justice system. And finally, providing mental health services should be the standard response to juvenile delinquency in addition to the obvious need for effective policing to protect the community and the juvenile from his or her own ultimately self-defeating and self-destructive behavior.

Jun Sung Hong
Wayne State University
James Garbarino
Loyola University, Chicago

See Also: Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention; Juvenile Delinquents; Juvenile Detention Centers.

Further Readings

American Bar Association. "Part 1: The History of Juvenile Justice." http://www.americanbar.org/content/dam/aba/migrated/publiced/features/DYJpart1.authcheckdam.pdf (Accessed July 2013).

Ayepong, T. "Children Left Behind Bars: Sullivan, Graham, and Juvenile Life Without Parole Sentences." Northwestern University School of Law's Journal on International Human Rights, v.9 (2010).

Elrod, P. and R. S. Ryder. Juvenile Justice: A Social, Historical, and Legal Perspective, 3rd ed. Sudbury, MA: Jones and Bartlett, 2009.

Lawrence, R. and C. Hemmens. Juvenile Justice: A Text/Reader. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2008.

Maryland Department of Juvenile Services. History of Juvenile Justice in the United States. http://www.djs.state.md.us/history-us.asp (Accessed July 2013).

Nellis, A. "The Life of Juvenile Lifers: Findings From a National Survey." The Sentencing Project: Research and Advocacy for Reform. http:// sentencingproject.org/doc/publications/jj_The_Lives_of_Juvenile_Lifers.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Ng, I. Y. H., X. Shen, H. Sim, R. C. Sarri, E. Stoffregen, and J. J. Shook. "Incarcerating Juveniles in Adult Prisons as a Factor in Depression." Criminal Behaviour and Mental Health, v.21 (2011).

Scott, E. S. and L. Steinberg. "Adolescent Development and the Regulation of Youth Crime." The Future of Children, v.18 (2008).

K

KIDS COUNT

KIDS COUNT is a project funded by the Annie E. Casey Foundation with the primary focus of monitoring and promoting the educational, social, economic, and physical well-being of children in the United States. Over the past 23 years, KIDS COUNT has served as a catalyst for various initiatives, all of which are aimed at improving the lives of children in the country.

One of the program's first projects was the KIDS COUNT data book. This book, which has continued to be an annual publication, presents data for the nation and all 50 states on key indicators of child well-being. KIDS COUNT operates on both the state and national levels and utilizes data collection and trend analysis that has informed policies and programs that enhance the experiences and quality of life for all children. The organization is concerned with making data available to community leaders, policy makers, service providers, parents, and others who want to take a closer look at the local factors that affect the lives of children and families. KIDS COUNT has also paid particular attention to the needs of vulnerable populations, including children who are growing up in poverty, involved in the child welfare system (e.g., foster care or kinship care placements), involved with the juvenile justice system, or who are members of racial or ethnic minority groups. Since its inception, KIDS COUNT has written and disseminated numerous publications about the condition of children in the United States.

At the national level, KIDS COUNT operates a data center that compiles information on the educational, social, economic, and physical well-being of children using more than 4 million data points. The data center brings together information from numerous sources including the Decennial Census, the American Community Service, the National Child Abuse and Neglect Data Systems, and the National Survey on Drug Use and Health. The center offers statistical information for a variety of geographic areas including the nation as a whole, states, counties, cities, school districts, and congressional districts, much of which is available to the general public online. The data center also produces a series of publications that report on what is available in particular topic areas and makes recommendations on specific issues at the national and state level. Recent data center reports, for example, have focused on issues such as youth incarceration, kinship care, and high-poverty communities. These reports highlight the challenges of economically disadvantaged children who are African American, Native American, and Latino. KIDS COUNT works with numerous national outreach partners to disseminate the data and their reports to policy makers, nonprofit and philanthropic organizations, advocacy groups, and researchers. These outreach partners help promote KIDS COUNT research through partnerships with stakeholders.

The KIDS COUNT data book is one of the most significant contributions of the organization. The book, which is now available in hard copy and electronic formats, has been published for 23 years. It provides an overview of key statistical indicators related to child well-being in the United States. It has recently expanded to include 23 child-level indicators across four domains: (1) economic well-being, (2) education, (3) health, and (4) family and community. This shift to a domain-based approach is the most significant change to the KIDS COUNT data book since it began tracking child well-being more than two decades ago. In addition to providing background information on demographic and family income trends in the United States and each state, the data book now addresses a variety of social issues impacting children and families. These include low birth-weight babies, infant mortality rates, child mortality (including deaths related to accident, homicide, and suicide), teen pregnancy and parenting, underemployment and unemployment among parents and youth not attending school, high school graduation and dropout rates, children in poverty, and families with children headed by single parents.

As part of the data analysis process, the KIDS COUNT data book ranks states on the well-being of children. The data book provides an overall ranking as well as ranking in each of the four domain areas (economic well-being, education, health, and family and community). The online data book also offers interactive, customizable options. Individuals can create customized reports on the condition of children in a specific state using the 23 key indicators. There is also an option to compare the report for one state to that of another state.

KIDS COUNT has developed organizations in all of the 50 states, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands, and the District of Columbia. KIDS COUNT state organizations receive grants from the Annie E. Casey Foundation to promote initiatives that focus on conditions of children who reside in their state. These organizations identify their own priority areas and employ KIDS COUNT resources to develop and promote programs that address state-specific needs. Recent efforts in states have addressed a range of topics including early reading proficiency (South Carolina and West Virginia), youth unemployment (Montana), and racial and ethnic disparities relating to school readiness (Rhode Island and Colorado). State organizations also provide input and advocacy on state-level legislative and budget decisions regarding children and families.

Since its inception, KIDS COUNT has had a significant impact on the condition of children in the United States. The program's efforts to compile and disseminate data on children and families have helped make issues pertaining to children more visible. Programming at both the state and national level has helped promote discussions and encourage action, thereby increasing an understanding of the needs of children nationwide. KIDS COUNT efforts have raised awareness and worked toward eliminating disparities along racial, ethnic, and socioeconomic lines.

Stella M. Resko
Wayne State University

See Also: Child Welfare Services; Children in Foster Care; Children of Incarcerated Parents; ChildStats; Early Childhood Development; Kinship Care; National Center for Children in Poverty; Quality of Life, Measurement of.

Further Readings

Annie E. Casey Foundation. "KIDS COUNT Data Book 2012." http://datacenter.kidscount.org/DataBook/2012/OnlineBooks/KIDSCOUNT2012DataBookFullReport.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Ben-Arieh, A. "The Child Indicators Movement: Past, Present, and Future." Child Indicators Research, v.1/1 (2008).

Kinship Care

Kinship care is the full-time care, nurturing, and protection of children by relatives, members of their tribes or clans, godparents, stepparents, or any adult who has a kinship bond with a child. The kinship care relationship may be permanent or temporary as well as formal (established legally) or informal. Kinship caregivers are more likely to be poor, single, older, less educated, and unemployed than families where at least one parent is present.

Grandparents provide the majority of kinship care, with the number of children living with grandparents increasing 50 percent between 2000 and 2010. Recent census data indicate that 5 percent of all children in the United States are living in a household headed by grandparents, and the majority of these children are under the age of 18. Most of these caregivers are female and unmarried and are disproportionately, in comparison to their proportions in the population, black and Hispanic.

Children enter kinship care for a variety of reasons including parental substance abuse, neglect, abandonment, parental physical and mental illness, incarceration, and domestic violence. The 2008 Fostering Connections to Success and Increasing Adoptions Act recognized the important role of kinship care through its provision of federal resources to support kinship care families and instructions that states ensure that relatives are identified and involved when children are removed from the parent's home.

However, only one-fourth of children in kinship care are in the formal child welfare system. The majority of the children live in informal kinship care arrangements that have not gone through a legal system. Informal care is often preferred due to concerns about terminating parental rights or further stressing relationships with the child's parent. In addition, grandparents often do not want to submit to the licensing requirements associated with the foster care system. To ease this situation, many states have made it easier for kinship families to become licensed and thus able to receive foster care benefits.

Kinship care benefits children as it maintains familial bonds and provides children with a sense of security. It helps minimize trauma and loss associated with separation from parents. In comparison to those in nonkin foster care, children in kinship care change schools less frequently, have fewer behavioral problems, and if reunited with their birth parents, are less likely to enter foster care again. They are also more likely to report feeling loved and to want their placement to be their permanent home.

Needs of Kinship Caregivers

Families who provide kinship care have many needs themselves. With the majority of the care provided by grandparents, the needs of these caregivers have been given the most attention. Grandparent caregivers are more likely to be living in poverty and experience financial strain than their peers who are not raising grandchildren. They also report greater stress and poorer physical and mental health.

A man with his granddaughter in New Orleans, Louisiana. The number of U.S. grandparents providing kinship care increased 50 percent between 2000 and 2010, with an estimated 5 percent of children living in a household headed by a grandparent.

Having adequate housing is a challenge for many grandparents, particularly for those who are renters. Those living in public housing may face occupancy restrictions that force them to move when the grandchildren become part of the household. Restrictions are often greater when persons have been residing in senior housing that does not permit children. To meet the housing needs, specialized grandparent housing has been developed in several cities, although funding for these projects is limited.

Dealing with legal issues presents a further challenge to caregivers. They frequently have had little experience with the legal system and find themselves having to deal with custody arrangements, medical consent, educational consent, as well as assuring the future of their grandchildren. Finding affordable legal assistance can be difficult, particularly for those with incomes above the poverty line but with limited resources.

Contributing to the stress experienced by the grandparents are the grandchildren themselves. In comparison to children in the general U.S. population, children being raised by grandparents have a higher prevalence of behavioral and emotional disturbances. These children are prone to both physical and emotional problems due to the fact that many were born addicted or were abused and neglected before moving to the grandparent's home. The special needs of these children can further tax the skills and resources of these caregivers.

Resources for Kinship Caregivers

Under the 2008 Fostering Connections Act, states may provide subsidized guardianship funds for kinship caregivers. These programs are available for children who have been in kinship care for at least six months and for whom reunification with the parents and adoption are not possible.

Kinship care families may be eligible for Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) if their income falls within state eligibility guidelines. However, these grants are limited to 60 months and may have employment requirements attached. TANF "Child Only" grants provide financial assistance to children based only on their resources. However, less than 12 percent of kinship families receive any TANF funds, although almost all would be eligible. Little information about the program, feelings of stigma, and a lack of needed documents act as barriers to participation. Without participating in TANF, families are also failing to receive benefits such as Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP), Medicaid, and child-care assistance.

Kinship care is a vital, positive resource for many children. Policies and services are recognizing the role that these families play, but they must be strengthened to assure that supports are available and accessible. Increasing resources is critical for the well-being of both caregivers and the children they are raising.

Carole B. Cox
Fordham University

See Also: Aging and Adult Services; Child Support Agencies and Services; Children in Foster Care.

Further Readings

Association of American Retired Persons (AARP) Lean on Me: Support and Minority Outreach for Grandparents Raising Grandchildren. Washington DC: AARP, 2005.

Baker, L. and M. Silverstein. "Depressive Symptoms Among Grandparents Raising Grandchildren: The Impact of Participation in Multiple Roles." Journal of Intergenerational Relationships, v.6/3 (2008).

Bavier, R. "Children Residing With No Parent Present." Children and Youth Services Review, v.33/10 (2011).

U.S. Census Bureau. Households and Families 2010, April 2012.

Kinship Care, Cultural Aspects of

Kinship care is a temporary or permanent living arrangement for children who cannot live with their biological parents and live with a relative or nonrelative that is part of their community and to whom they have formed a close bond, often called fictive kin. This arrangement can be for any number of reasons, such as parental illness or death, parental drug or alcohol abuse, physical or emotional abuse and neglect, poverty, and more benign issues, including parental work obligations that take them away from their children.

Kinship care can be formal or informal and either sanctioned by local social services agencies through a foster care arrangement or decided privately among individual families. Kinship care has cultural issues that pertain to its structure and is more often seen in marginalized populations. Historically, kinship care was born out of racist and oppressive practices that have forced different subjugated racial and ethnic groups to form more communal cultures and bonds where children are the responsibility of the larger family and greater community.

In a U.S. context, the history of the racist institution of slavery, and specifically the slave trade, forced the separation of families and necessitated that the children be raised in kinship models. While these kinship relationships were required, they ultimately strengthened the communal nature and history of the African American family. Nevertheless, the eugenics era soon followed, which perpetuated the discourse that African Americans among the immigrating populations were intellectually inferior and not fit to raise children. White social movements soon developed with perceived well-intentioned plans designed to acculturate and civilize communities of African Americans in providing education in the trades and teaching them white norms of child care. While these early social workers believed they were providing a service, their philosophy denigrated the history of the African American family in its belief that they were in need of such charity. This served to further reinforce kinship systems in African Americans working together against continuing pernicious and pervasive forms of racism.

Globally and due to a similar history of atrocities, there now exists a trend in developed and developing countries toward kinship care in other subjugated cultures. This was only after a similar toxic history developed between racially and ethnically oppressed groups and human and social services agencies that believed falsely that their original child-in-out-of-home placement policies were in the best interests of the children. In Canada, for instance, First Nations' children were taken from their homes and placed in residential facilities in hopes of assimilating them into mainstream Canadian culture. Despite Canada's attempts at reparations to First Nations' families, the legacy of trauma still haunts the individuals who were affected. Canada's policy trends for First Nations children now seek to preserve the cultural heritage, but the system, like that of other countries, still has problems and continues to evolve.

In a United States context, kinship care is more often utilized by African American families. A collective sense of mistrust developed, understandably so, between African Americans and the very agencies that were designed to help them. Currently, there exists a disproportionate amount of African American children in out-of-home placements and specifically in residential care facilities. Due to this and historical factors, African American families have been more fervent than other racially marginalized groups to utilize kinship models when children cannot be cared for by their biological parents.

Individual states have varying policies that govern kinship care models, and there exists no uniform standards. In the case of Alaska Native Children and Native American children, however, the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA), P.L. 95-608, states that tribes have the right to input regarding the placement of native children. Otherwise, individual states make the decision on issues such as the rate of pay for kinship versus foster families, and it should be noted that kinship families more often fall below the poverty level than traditional foster family homes. Kinship homes that do not fall under the jurisdiction of the foster care system, as many do not when the prevailing issue is not abuse or neglect, must rely only on state entitlements to make ends meet rather than a substantial monthly check that those who are foster parents receive to have a child in their home. Further, individual states define who counts as a relative and often do not recognize the relationship of fictive kin, and this is detrimental in the case of African American families where there exists a long tradition of the family unit extending outside blood relatives.

Kinship care has benefits over more traditional foster care arrangements where the children get placed with virtual strangers. Children can experience great trauma in the initial removal from their home even when heinous abuses are happening. The unknown is equally as scary. It is further traumatizing to move into the home of people with very different values, customs, religious practices, and rules. Foster care is important for children with no safe options, but even most foster care workers will agree that it remains very difficult for the innocent child. Kinship placements provide a more familiar environment that often preserves family customs, rituals, religion, and a greater familiar support network for the individual child. Children in kinship care have fewer placement changes when in the care of relatives and are less apt to reenter the foster care system after reunifying with their birth parents.

Elizabeth E. Metcalf
Syracuse University

See Also: Children in Foster Care; Children in Special Living Arrangements; Family Services; Family

Structure, Diversity of; Foster Care Agencies; Kinship Care; Parenting Skills Training.

Further Readings

Hegar, R. L. and J. A. Rosenthal. "Kinship Care and Sibling Placement: Child Behavior, Family Relationships, and School Outcomes." Children and Youth Services Review, v.31/6 (2009).

Hong, Jun Sung, et al. "An Ecological Understanding of Kinship Foster Care in the United States." Journal of Child and Family Studies, v.20/6 (2011).

Knott, T. and K. Donovan. "Disproportionate Representation of African-American Children in Foster Care: Secondary Analysis of the National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System." Children and Youth Services Review, v.32/5 (2005).

L

Language Assistance

Language assistance refers to the provisions made for speakers who have difficulty with the dominant language of a country because it is their second language. In the United States, the National Center on Immigrant Integration Policy estimates that there are up to 25 million people who have limited English proficiency. As such, according to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, language assistance must be provided for individuals who have limited English proficiency. The settings in which language assistance is provided include federal and state offices of health and human services, courthouses, and any other departments and offices in which limited proficiency English speakers may seek out services. Examples include the National Institutes of Health, the Internal Revenue Service, and the U.S. Welfare System. In addition, many private companies such as insurance and medical providers contribute language assistance services. The types of language assistance offered can vary but usually include a range of translated documents and/or computer programs. Language assistance can also include having an interpreter on hand to help with language barrier issues.

Limited English proficiency (LEP) is the name given to individuals who are second-language learners of English and who do not have proficiency in English. In the United States, a series of laws have provided the framework for ways in which language-limited individuals can still reliably access federal services, regardless of their English proficiency. The first relevant law is Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It states that individuals in the United States cannot be discriminated against on the basis of national origin regarding services provided by any agency that receives federal funding. Title VI was the first step toward addressing the growing needs of LEP individuals in the United States and instances of discrimination based on language barriers.

In 2000, President Clinton signed Executive Order 13166, called the LEP Executive Order, which required language assistance to be provided to LEP individuals engaging in federally funded programs and agencies. The purpose of the order was to improve the accessibility of federal services so that they could be rightfully rendered to LEP individuals. The LEP Executive Order was designed to enable full compliance with Title VI. According to the order, relevant agencies must take steps provided by the federal government to dissolve language barriers in order to deliver equal services to all individuals, regardless of their proficiency in English. Sections of the U.S. Department of Justice enforce the policies set forth by Executive Order 13166.

In addition to translated documents and informational materials, many agencies employ bilingual staff members and interpreters who help carry out the requirements of the LEP Executive Order. When LEP individuals have questions or need to speak with a person regarding specific details of the services provided, an individual is needed who can fluently speak both English and the language of the LEP individual. Interpreters, also called translators, are individuals who are utilized in such settings. Interpreting is a challenging task because it involves both the understanding of what the LEP individual says in his or her native language, and the ability to translate the information into English for other individuals within the interaction (e.g., a doctor, nurse, or agent), and back again. Medical interpreters, for example, are very useful and important because small details lost in conversation because of a language barrier can be detrimental to the health of the LEP patient.

Bilingual staff members carry out similar interpretation duties; however, they are also regular employees of the agency or business. Interpreters may be used on a consulting basis and may not work in a particular office or location for the entire workday. Conversely, a bilingual staff member is hired on the premise that he or she is an employee with the skills needed to carry out a job beyond interpretation. For example, a receptionist at a doctor's office may be hired as a bilingual staff member, but his or her duties include both receptionist duties and interpretation, when needed. Although it may be feasible to have a bilingual staff member who speaks a common second language in a region (e.g., Spanish), it is often not possible to have several staff members who speak different languages because of funding and space issues.

Since the implementation of the LEP Executive Order in 2000, methods of language assistance have continued to evolve. At a basic level, agencies are required to have pamphlets printed in multiple languages. For example, the Office of Veterans Affairs (VA) has implemented the use of wallet-sized cards that say, "I Speak _____." Individuals seeking VA services can write in their native languages, and the card can be easily used to express the need for language assistance. Such methods are used to minimize language barriers in order to more efficiently deliver services to individuals in need.

Technological advances have enabled more sophisticated methods of language assistance. For example, one-way handheld electronic devices can be preprogrammed with common phrases, and when an English-speaking individual selects a particular phrase, it is translated aloud in another target language to facilitate communication with an LEP individual. More recent technology through the use of the World Wide Web has enabled almost instantaneous, free translation for real-time conversation between individuals. As the use and availability of wireless technology expands, this type of language assistance will become highly utilized in order to easily and quickly facilitate the rendering of federal services.

Rachel H. Messer
Oklahoma State University

See Also: Biculturalism; Border Communities; Children of Undocumented Aliens; Department of Education, U.S.; Education Support Services; Immigrant Populations, Human Services Needs of.

Further Readings

Mátir, Javier F. and Deanna R. Willis. "Using Bilingual Staff Members." Family Practice Management, v.11/7 (2004).

Shah, Susan. "Breaking Through the Language Barrier: Promising Practices from the Field." CALEA Update Magazine, v.64 (2010).

U.S. Department of Justice. "Executive Order on Limited English Proficiency." http://www.justice.gov/crt/about/cor/Pubs/eolep.php (Accessed May 2014).

Learning Disabilities, Services for Individuals With

Learning disabilities describe a cluster of disorders related to brain functioning that impedes the individual's ability to receive, process, store, and respond to information from the environment. Typically identified in childhood due to the large amount of information needed to learn in the school setting, these disabilities vary from person to person and affect various aspects of the curriculum. These disabilities are lifelong and never cured. However, most individuals who receive treatment can learn skills to compensate for these weaknesses in their learning that can allow them to be successful in their goals. It is important to note that a learning disability is a separate classification from other types of disabilities typically identified in children such as intellectual disability (formerly known as mental retardation), visual disability, hearing disability, or an autism spectrum disability. In addition, a learning disability is ruled out if environmental, cultural, and economic factors, or limited English proficiency, are the primary reasons for the symptoms. More often than not, children with a learning disability have average to above-average intellectual ability, yet they have difficulty receiving, processing, storing, and responding to information from a particular set of curriculum such as reading, mathematics, or writing.

Educational Interventions

In the United States, schools that are federally funded must provide a free and appropriate education to all students within their districts. Before the enactment of Public Law 94-142 in the 1970s, students who had disabilities did not have access to the same educational opportunities as their peers who did not have disabilities. Since Public Law 94-142 and its revisions, known as the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act (IDEA), all students now have the chance to receive an education in the least-restrictive environment and in the same environment as their peers.

Several general steps are involved in the identification of a child with a learning disability in the public school system. First, the child's classroom teacher notices that the student is struggling with his or her academics. At this point, the classroom teacher should attempt to make adjustments to the way information is presented to the student and provide more individual assistance. After a period of time, if the student continues to struggle and not make gains in the curriculum, the teacher refers the student to a teacher assistance team, which is made up of master-level teachers and administrators. The team meets and discusses the situation with the referring teacher. After conferring with the teacher, the team creates an intervention plan for the teacher to take back to the classroom and implement with the student. During the implementation of the intervention plan, the teacher collects data concerning the student's progress while utilizing the strategies discussed with the teacher assistance team. After a period of time, typically six weeks, the teacher returns to the teacher assistance team and presents the data collected during the intervention phase. The team evaluates this data and, if the student is adequately progressing in the classroom, recommends that the teacher continue implementing the interventions in the classroom. However, if the data reveal that the student is not progressing, the teacher assistance team recommends a multidisciplinary evaluation. Multidisciplinary team members always include the child and the parent as a part of the assessment process. The results of this evaluation determine if a learning disability exists, and the team decides if special education is appropriate for the student.

For adults with learning disabilities, there are less-standardized procedures for identification and diagnosis. Typically, adults with learning disabilities, if they have not been identified in childhood, are assessed by a psychologist specializing in educational disabilities. However, colleges and universities are not required by law to provide special education services like those in elementary and secondary education. Most postsecondary institutions have provisions in place to allow accommodations in the classroom; however, these accommodations only change the presentation of material, not the curriculum level required of the other students in the classroom. Some examples of accommodations include extended time on tests, providing textbooks on tape, and a copy of the teacher's notes covering each lecture. For many individuals with learning disabilities, this transition from secondary to postsecondary education can be overwhelming, and many students with this disability drop out before completing a degree.

Federal Laws Affecting Individuals With a Learning Disability

For any adult or student diagnosed as having a learning disability, there are four federally mandated laws aimed at protecting their rights and providing for services and education. The first law, IDEA guarantees a free and appropriate education for any student between the ages of 3 and 21. This act provides information to schools on how students are identified, how they are diagnosed, and how interventions are to proceed. In addition, this act outlines the rights provided to children and their parents or guardians, including the right to a timely evaluation, access to paperwork and meetings, and transition planning.

The Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) and No Child Left Behind (NCLB) affect all students in kindergarten through the 12th grade. It requires schools to meet tough standards for student achievement and educational content. It requires schools to make adequate yearly progress for all students, including those diagnosed with a learning disability.

The Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and the Americans With Disabilities Act make it illegal to discriminate against a person in federally funded programs and activities based on disability. These laws do not provide funding but can remove funding from those entities failing to comply with the law.

Cultural Implications

Research has indicated that approximately 15 percent of the U.S. population has some form of a learning disability. Approximately 80 percent of those identified as having a disability have problems with reading. In the public schools, students with learning disabilities make up approximately 5 percent of the population in this setting. Approximately two-thirds of those with a learning disability are male, with more males than females across all age categories. The most discrepancy between sexes occurs within the 7- to 18-year-old age range, with 3.9 percent males and 2.0 percent females identified as having a learning disability. In all age ranges, whites tend to be more identified than other ethnicities. Hispanic, Latinos, and African American students, however, follow closely behind white students identified as having a learning disability. Asian Americans, Hawaiians, and Pacific Americans are the least identified. In the adult population, those living in poverty are more likely to report having a learning disability than the rest of the population. Families with children living below the poverty rate reported 4.1 percent of their children had a learning disability, while those living above the poverty line reported 2.7 percent of their children had a learning disability. The same is true for working adults. Adults who have a learning disability are more likely to be living below the poverty line (3.1 percent) than those living above the poverty line (1.5 percent).

Kurt T. Choate
Alisa Lobaugh
Northeastern State University

See Also: ADHD, Services for Individuals With; Children With Special Needs; Cultural Competence, Human Services Providers and; Educational Services; Educational Support Services; Intelligence Testing; Psychiatric/Psychological Assessment; School Mental Health Project; Special Education.

Further Readings

Harry, Beth and Janette K. Klingner. Why Are So Many Minority Students in Special Education?: Understanding Race and Disability in Schools. New York: Teacher's College Press, 2006.

National Center for Learning Disabilities. http://www.ncld.org (Accessed August 2013).

Shifrer, Dara, Chandra Muller, and Rebecca Callahan. "Disproportionality and Learning Disabilities: Parsing Apart Race, Socioeconomic Status, and Language." Journal of Learning Disabilities, v.44/3 (2010).

Legal Services

Human services workers help transform human rights (as set forth in the Declaration of Independence and by the Constitution) into civil rights, protected and enforced by law. Human services workers help define such rights through litigation, legislation, and daily practice, ensuring their application through agencies, communities, schools, or workplaces. Such legal services are critical to a diverse population and workforce in no small part because of the historically unequal distribution of resources; decades of studies by the American Bar Association have found that most low-income individuals and more than half of middle-class individuals fail to have their legal needs met. Further, access to legal services is unequally distributed to whites, as is consistently shown in comparative studies of criminal trials. Immigrants with poor English skills and the rural poor are also chronically underserved. The Department of Justice recently opened the Access to Justice Office in recognition of these long-lived and ongoing problems.

Laws at the federal, state, and local levels regulate, guide, and advance all areas of human services practice. Many issues, such as placement of children or commitment of the mentally ill, employment and all conditions, privileges, and immunities of the workplace for older workers, the disabled and individuals of every race, religion, color, or national origin, and both genders, are protected by laws and implemented by human services professionals. Collaboration with lawyers in aiding a battered woman, a brutalized child, an abused or neglected parent or homeless person is essential, for example, to get an order of protection, a placement, or commitment. Attorneys often call upon human services professionals to assess family dynamics and evaluate the capacity of their clients in diverse forums such as criminal court, family court, and special courts such as those for the commitment of the mentally or developmentally disabled or users of illegal drugs.

Human Services Personnel Key to Employment Rights

Human services personnel are the gatekeepers to most complaints of discrimination, harassment, or retaliation and calls for fair dealing, workers compensation, collective bargaining, or occupational health and safety.

They meet with all parties in labor or personal disputes, try to resolve problems, and oversee the processing of grievances as provided in law. Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 as amended (barring bias against anyone on the basis of race, gender, religion, color, or national origin) and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA, protecting those 45 and older) have similar threshold requirements. The defendant must either be a labor union, an employment agency, or an employer who employs at least 15 persons. The complainant must initiate a claim of discrimination with an office of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission or a state agency delegated with similar powers within 360 days of the incident (or of the employee's first learning) of alleged discrimination. In addition, the ADEA contains the Older Workers Benefit Protection Act, which establishes special rules and procedures in the retirement or separation of older workers.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) or state agency may investigate and mediate the claim or file suit on behalf of the charging party. Alternatively, once he or she has exhausted the administrative requirement of filing with the EEOC or state agency, the complainant may be granted a notice of right to sue. Federal employees must first have their cases reviewed by an administrative law judge who can issue a judgment.

Most large employers have their own offices where human services personnel investigate and seek resolution of the complaint. They will examine any direct evidence where there is an open admission by the employer of intentional discrimination. Far more common, however, is the examination of inference. The McDonnell Douglas case sets the guidelines to establish a prima facie case of job discrimination: (1) A job opportunity was posted. (2) The complainant was qualified for the opportunity and was a member of a protected class. (3) The plaintiff applied and was rejected or denied the opportunity. (4) The opportunity either went to another not in the protected class of complainant or remained unfilled.

The employer may disprove discriminatory motive by providing nondiscriminatory rationale for its employment decision. The complainant may prove that defendant's rationale was mere pretext for discrimination.

The complainant may also allege retaliation where employer undertakes an adverse employment action against an employee because the employee engaged in an act protected by the laws against employment discrimination. Such reprisal may be proven by direct evidence or inferred by timing or other workplace patterns. This is a cause of action independent of the merit of the employee's initial act.

Another theory of job bias is defined in Griggs v. Duke Power, where an employment decision, neutral on its face, has a discriminatory impact on a protected class, and there is an alternative way to do the job with less discriminatory impact.

Harassment on the job violates Title VII. Human services personnel are key in reviewing complaints by employees based on the conduct of employers, supervisors, customers, contractors, or any party in frequent contact with the employer. There are two kinds of harassment: (1) quid pro quo, where a benefit or favorable employment action is made contingent on granting the employer a sexual favor, and (2) a hostile work environment, where unwelcome advances, obscenity, touching, feeling, posting signs, or innuendo take place in the work environment.

The Americans With Disabilities Act (ADA) protects qualified individuals with a disability (QIDs) who, with or without a reasonable accommodation, can perform the essential tasks of the job. Administrative prerequisites are the same as those summarized for EEOC complaints, except that the number of employees required for the employer to be subject to a complaint is 25, and the law does not protect employees of the state.

A disability is defined as the impairment of a major life function. A reasonable accommodation may consist of special equipment; modifying spaces, access, or schedules; or any adjustment that is not an undue burden to the employer. The accommodation applies to the workplace and to any and all spaces in which his co-employees gather, even if off-site. The law applies to those (1) with a disability, (2) with a history of a disability, (3) whom the employer believes has a disability, or (4) is associated with persons with a disability.

In reviewing the applicant for a job, the employer cannot inquire about a disability, and the applicant cannot be required to submit to a physical examination prior to being accepted for the job. The employee's medical records and any references to his or her health must be kept confidential, stored in files separate from his or her standard personnel documents, and his or her condition shared only with those on a need-to-know basis.

Personal Responsibility and Ethical Mandates

Human services professionals are liable for maintaining a standard of care in their practice, one which may be subject to judicial review and sanctions. Some of these standards are summarized in codes adopted by each of the specific human services occupations. The National Association of Social Workers (NASW) Code of Ethics is illustrative. All social workers are mandated by the NASW Code to address the causes of their client's or community's presenting distress (see Section 6, Social Workers' Ethical Responsibilities to the Broader Society). Specifically,

> Social workers should promote the general welfare of society, from local to global levels, and the development of people, their communities, and their environments. Social workers should advocate for living conditions conducive to the fulfillment of basic human needs and should promote social, economic, political, and cultural values and institutions that are compatible with the realization of social justice.

Often, this requires legislation or litigation in which collaboration with attorneys who practice, make, and defend the law would prove beneficial.

Guidelines for social programs using public funds or set by public policies evolve through public procedures that routinely invite public comment in the process and before finalizing the rules. Attorneys assist human services professionals in their presentations to public bodies. For example, Congress established the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act, which included Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF), which set a lifetime limit of payments to 60 months. But it took more than three years of hearings, including widespread comments and studies from social agencies for the federal government to define assistance. The final product, the result of intense negotiation and compromise of lawyers and human services professionals, confined coverage to food, shelter, and clothing and excluded items such as short-term cash in cases of family crisis, subsidies to employers to cover wages for TANF recipients, or supportive services like child care, transportation, counseling, and programs to find work. A human services worker may represent his or her client in many federal and state administrative tribunals such as appealing a denial of benefits or advancing a complaint of discrimination or harassment based on race, gender, religion, national origin, color, age, or disability.

Professional Duty: Standard of Care and Liability

Human services professionals help implement the law and work with lawyers in child abuse cases, adoptions, custody disputes, marital mediation, parole, and commitment procedures, and their work is subject to challenges in courts.

Virtually every jurisdiction now legally regulates practice through licensing laws. The legal regulation of social work practice includes professional licensing and provisions for public accountability. A social worker, psychotherapist, psychologist, psychiatrist, or other human services worker may be found liable for a breach of professional duty in not maintaining standards of care as articulated in the National Association of Social Workers Code of Ethics or as otherwise established by practice of comparable practitioners in the local community. Sanctions and damages may be levied for mishandling of client's funds, improper sexual conduct, violation of confidentiality, or other improper conduct. Laws regarding professional practice have changed dramatically in recent years, especially regarding confidentiality and the legal requirements to control one's clients. The once-inviolate standard of confidentiality, however, now bears an exception where the safety of others are involved. Workers may be held legally accountable for failing to accurately predict violent behavior in their clients, warning a threatened third party, and reporting to the police. In Tarasoff v. Regents of the University of California, the California Supreme Court ruled that, despite the value and importance of protecting the therapist–client relationship, the clinician's duty to society as a citizen of that society places certain limitations on the clinician's loyalty to a client's secrets, divulged in the context of the therapeutic relationship. That position has been adopted by other states and is codified as Tarasoff statutes throughout the nation.

The Law of Civil Commitment

Consent to voluntary treatment must be competent. If incompetent, as in developmentally disabled persons or infants, the court may appoint a guardian who voluntarily admits the individual. Human services workers are often petitioners or advocates providing information to the court, preparing reports, or serving as administrative hearing officers.

Involuntary Commitment

Commitment includes compulsory treatment, hospitalization, confinement, or other restrictions of liberty based on a mental disability or temporary mental condition. Generally, commitment will only apply to one if he or she has a mental illness and, as a result thereof, is a danger to him- or herself or others, or he or she is so gravely disabled that he or she is unable to care for him- or herself.

The following case is illustrative: Billie Boggs was involuntarily confined at Belleview Hospital. She had been homeless, living and panhandling on the streets. Hospital doctors diagnosed her as delusional, paranoid schizophrenic, incapable of caring for herself, hostile, obscene, and dangerous. But New York Civil Liberties Union (NYCLU) psychiatrists found no delusional or psychotic behavior. She was coherent and logical, and her recollection

A legal class at Palacký University of Olomouc Faculty of Law. Legal clinics originated as a method of teaching law school students, but today they encompass free legal aid with no academic links. In the academic context, these law school clinics provide hands-on experience to law school students and services to various (typically indigent) clients.

was good with her judgment slightly impaired. Her defecation on the streets was not nice but not delusional, and she was not suicidal. On the stand, she was coherent and spoke clearly, but even if mentally ill, the city must prove her acts were likely to result in serious harm to self or others. There was no evidence that she ever caused any harm. She was able to care for herself and get food; her lack of shelter was due to us, not her. Absent documentation of having a mental illness that poses a danger to oneself or others, the party must be released unless either a court order or voluntary and informed consent is secured. Public intolerance or animosity cannot justify deprivation of one's physical liberty. It can occur with or without court involvement, depending on state law, which may, for example, authorize commitment by a mental health professional.

The process of involuntary commitment to a state institution is controlled by state law. When one's behavior poses a threat to self or others, an emergency detention of a limited duration of 48 to 72 hours may be invoked. It may be initiated by anyone filing a petition naming the respondent, citing facts with reports by mental health professionals in affidavits to certify need.

Rights of the Person Charged

The court may appoint a human services worker as a visitor or guardian ad litem to represent the best interests of the respondent and to (1) explain the proceedings and inform the respondent of his or her rights and to ascertain his or her wishes as to guardianship; (2) investigate the need for guardianship and interview family members or professionals; (3) investigate the proposed guardian or the availability of a possible guardian; (4) investigate alternative arrangements; and (5) present a report to the court that describes nature, cause, and degree of incapacity; advises the court on need for counsel; evaluates the appropriateness of the proposed guardian; informs the court if an alternative may be appropriate; advises the court if a limited guardianship is appropriate and, if so, what limits and disabilities should be placed on the incapacitated person; tells the court of any expression of approval or disapproval made by the respondent on the proposed guard or guardianship and recommends to the court who is in the best position to serve as guardian and what limits, if any, should be placed on the guardian.

If a guardian is appointed, the ward should have periodic reviews to determine if there is a continuing necessity of guardianship. A person in need may file a petition requesting guardianship; he or she is more likely to get the guardian of choice, especially where he or she is frail or has a degenerative disease but is alert. While still of sound mind, one can state, should it ever be necessary, that he or she wants a designated person to be appointed as guardian.

Working With the Court for Commitment

Restrictions of civil confinement are balanced by certain due process rights, including the right to notice of the hearing and all papers on which the court is asked to rely in a language understandable to the respondent at a time when he or she is not overly agitated, confused, or medicated. The respondent must be advised that he or she has the right to be present, to be represented by counsel, and to trial by a jury of less than 12, who may render a decision that need not be unanimous.

The petitioner—that is, the party seeking to confine the respondent—must prove by clear and convincing evidence that commitment is required. The individual should not be asked to share equally with society the risk of error when the possible injury to the individual is far greater than any possible harm to the state. The petitioner needs proof more substantial than a mere preponderance of the evidence. Moreover, the respondent has a right to the names of examining mental health professionals and all who might testify for commitment along with a summary of their proposed testimony.

The court considers if (1) the respondent is a danger to self or others because of a mental illness, (2) he or she is likely to benefit from treatment, and (3) he is confined in the least restrictive setting and is receiving the least restrictive method of containment available. And these considerations are balanced by (1) the respondent's right to be free from harm, (2) his or her right to habilitation, (3) his or her right to have treatment provided to reduce or eliminate the mental health problem that necessitated confinement, and (4) his or her Fourteenth Amendment liberty interest in refusing medicine. However, the court may allow the state to administer psychotropic medicine if it can show that the respondent is a danger to him- or herself or others and treatment is necessary to reduce the danger.

Community Placement

State-employed treatment professionals determine that community placement is appropriate and when such placement is reasonable, taking into account the resources available to the state. It is required for the person to not oppose living in the community. Moreover, under the Americans With Disabilities (ADA) Act, the individual cannot be excluded from qualified federally funded programs because of his or her mental illness or other disability.

Community placement requires that the previously confined person be regularly supervised to assure that he or she takes prescribed meds and otherwise accords to the treatment program.

Right to Treatment

The Mental Health Patient's Bill of Rights mandates each state to review its laws to ensure that mental patients receive the protection and services they require and, if institutionalized, are afforded rights including the right to appropriate treatment. Personal security is a historic liberty interest protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, not extinguished by lawful confinement, even for penal purposes.

The developmentally disabled have a right to habilitation; that is, training and development of needed skills appropriate to their capabilities. The state is under no obligation to provide substantive services for those in its border, but a duty to provide certain services and care does exist when a person is institutionalized and wholly dependent on the state, and training may be necessary to avoid unconstitutional infringement of the liberty interest but may need certain restraints to avoid a danger of violence. Courts do not second-guess professionals or make their own decisions about treatment. Courts only make certain that professional judgment was in fact exercised. To get reimbursement from Medicaid, a facility for care of the developmentally disabled must provide individual treatment plans. Treatment must be provided in the least restrictive manner. The Mental Health Patient's Bill of Rights advocates freedom from restraints and seclusion.

Mental institutions routinely require patients to work for institutional rewards (e.g., TV privileges), for therapeutic reasons, for minimal monetary rewards, or to maintain the institution with minimally paid staff. Although some courts have found that mandatory employment violates the Thirteenth Amendment, institutions defend it as part of therapeutic process. But claims against minimum wage laws are sustained where patients can show that the agency derives monetary benefits from enforced employment.

Rights of Committed Patients

Patients have the right to refuse treatment. Any informed consent must be voluntary, competent, and given with knowledge of the risks of and alternatives to a specific treatment. They have First Amendment rights of speech, religion, and assembly, but such rights may be restricted because of therapeutic concerns or institutional needs. They have an unqualified right to petition for redress of grievances. Although it may be qualified or limited at times, patients have a right to privacy. Patients have due process protections when transferred from one institution to another, especially if the new facility is far from their family. Attorneys are obligated to maintain confidentiality, no matter what home conditions are like. Human services workers in all states, however, are mandated to report child abuse and neglect. However, if one is employed by a lawyer, he or she is covered by the attorney–client privilege and may not have to report neglect or abuse.

Ralph D. Fertig
University of Southern California

See Also: Mental Health Services, Adult; National Institute of Mental Health; National Mental Health Association.

Further Readings

17 Cal.3d 425, 131 Cal.Rptr. 14, 551 P.2d 334 (1976).
Mac Donald, Heather. "A Victory Over 'Homeless' Hooey." New York Post (October 2, 2003).
McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green. 411 U.S. 792 (1973).
National Association of Social Workers Code of Ethics. http://www.socialworkers.org/pubs/code/default.asp (Accessed December 2013).

Levels of Intervention

This entry defines the levels of intervention in human services. This is a complex concept.

Practitioners using these levels may be employed in many types of agencies, may have that level as a main focus, or may have several levels as the foci of work. Curricula of human service, educational institutions may be organized by level or in other ways. This entry analyzes how these levels may be further defined, how the concept of systems is employed in this analysis, and how the existence of diversity in our society and in client populations is important at all levels of practice.

Definition of Levels

A level of intervention means the size of the system (which is defined later) that is the focus of the practitioner's attention. These systems are typically referred to as micro level, meso level, or macro level. Micro level refers to practice with individuals, families, or groups; meso level refers to practice with communities; and macro level means practice with organizations (often the practitioner's employing agency) or political levels, namely a city, state, region, national government, or even worldwide entity. This latter is sometimes referred to as policy practice.

Practice Levels and Systems

In order to clarify these categories further, we find it helpful to use systems terminology to discuss the various systems that practitioner's take into consideration in planning their activities. Systems are defined as follows: (1) something consisting of a set of entities, (2) among which a set of relations is specified (e.g., cell organization, human interaction, or grammar, or culture (3) so that deductions are possible from some relations to others.

The entities could be cells, people, words, or beliefs, and the relations could be an organization, human interaction, grammar, social structure, or culture. A system is a set of components directly or indirectly related in a causal network such that each component is related to at least some others in a more or less stable way within a particular period of time.

Systems can be thought about as entities, some of which deal with matter or energy, some of which deal with information, and some of which deal with all three. Seen in this light, systems could be families, individuals, organizations, communities, or the history of these. The units in the human services have a history, and what happens today or tomorrow depends in part on what has happened in the past. Systems have complex interconnections of smaller systems with them and, at their own level, function as wholes.

A social system is an organized entity that possesses a distinctive total unit beyond its component parts that is distinguished from its environment by a boundary and whose subunits are at least partially interrelated within fairly stable patterns of interactions. Put even more simply, a social system is a set of interrelated activities that together constitute a single entity. This entity has defined boundaries. Thus, the boundary of a family may be those who live in the same household or are related to each other (e.g., mother, father, offspring, and grandparents). The boundaries of a city are often designated in state legislation.

Having defined the concept of system, we return to discuss the way the systems of concern to the social practitioner are conceptualized. One such system is the client system, defined as persons who ask for professional help to deal with a problem or seek a change, are expected to benefit from it, and contract to receive it. The term client system is used here rather than simply client as this may consist of an individual, family, group, community, organization, or larger entity.

The target system refers to the focus of change efforts. When client systems seek changes in themselves, the client system and target system are identical. More often, an individual seeks change in an organization; an organization may seek changes in individuals, or a community may seek change in a political policy. In these situations, the client and target systems are different.

A third system of concern is the action system, which refers to those formal or informal resources and persons that the practitioner needs to cooperate with to accomplish a purpose. For example, a practitioner may have a client system that consists of a child with school difficulties. The work plan may require the practitioner to help the teacher to better meet the needs of the child; when the practitioner discusses this with a teacher, the teacher becomes an action system. The teacher may also be a target system if the aim is to change the actions of the teacher with respect to the child (e.g., of the macro client).

Another example is a practitioner assigned to a school to help the staff develop relationships with other staff of varied genders, ethnicities, ability or disability statuses, and sexual orientations. The reason for this was the extent of the existence of cliques whose members were reluctant to work with other staff members because of animosities related to these social categories. The practitioner viewed the school as his or her client system. One major goal that evolved was to change the policies of the larger school system that discriminated against specified groups. Thus, the school system became a target system, and a committee selected to develop strategies was an action system.

Another system is conceptualized as the agency system, which is a subset of an action system that includes the practitioners and formal service systems involved in work on the target problems. As the practitioner in the previous example was employed by the school system, we see that system as the agency system.

This set of categories makes the question of defining a level of practice a less than clear-cut question. The organization of a school's curricula can be seen as defining a level as will be discussed shortly. On the other hand, how the agency system defines itself at least communicates what type of expertise with regard to levels the agency seeks to hire—although even that is unclear as agencies may hire a person who specialized in a level of practice that varies from the definition of a position because of the broad nature of education in human services and the kinds of experience the person has had. A common example is the micro-level educated practitioner who advances to a management position; that is, a position that requires a focus on the organizational level.

A level of practice is largely related to what the nature of the client system is. Thus, when the client system is the individual, the practice level is often defined as micro level; when the client system is the community, the practice level is often defined as meso level.

The complication here is that, whatever or whoever the client system is, the solution of client system problems may require the target or even action systems to be any or all of the practice levels. For example, the client system may be the agency or an organization. The action system may be an individual or the executive whose support is needed for a policy change. The action system may be a group such as an executive committee whose decisions may help achieve the policy change. The action system may be representatives of the agency as a whole such as a meeting of the entire staff whose desires regarding the policy will be determined. The action system may be the city council as the passing of legislation is required because the policy change will require resources that the city can supply.

Thus, as the standards of many human services professional organizations indicate, the human services practitioner should have competencies at all levels. The differences in how these competencies are utilized relate to the purposes desired by the client system and are accomplished through the action system. When the client system is an individual with a behavioral problem, the work with that client system may well utilize the application of psychological treatment methods. When the client system is the organization or community, work with individuals as action systems will not involve psychological change as a primary purpose; instead the work with individual action systems is more likely to entail helping the individual to accomplish tasks related to the goals of the organization or community. The knowledge bases drawn upon come from organizational and community change theory as well as theories of policy creation, analysis, and implementation.

Practice Levels and Curricula

Many schools in the human services divide their curricula concentrations and specializations into at least a micro track and a macro track as sometimes the meso or community level is contained in the macro track. Other schools have separate tracks for individual, group, and sometimes family practice. The curricula for these tracks vary. Often, the individual track contains courses or course content on relevant behavioral approaches and theories (e.g., psychodynamic, behavioral, and ecological), stages of the work, and applications to different populations (e.g., people with mental illness, children in the child welfare system, and people in the correctional systems).

A macro policy track may contain courses on policy development, policy implementation, and policy analysis. The meso community track may contain courses on social action, grassroots organizing, and the creation of interagency coordination mechanisms, approaches to community needs assessment, and the analysis of community structures, processes, cultural dynamics, and power structures.

The professional organizations in the human services, however, are likely to condone a broad education of social practitioners that may involve concentration or specialization, but all practitioners should be able to engage, assess, intervene, and evaluate with individuals, families, groups, organizations, and communities.

The Human Services Practitioner as Generalist

The previous discussion may imply that we favor the concept of the human services practitioner as a generalist or a jack of all trades, so to speak. While there are undoubtedly some practitioners who, by virtue of experience and training, may see themselves in this light, some educational institutions may seek to educate such practitioners. This may not be a desirable educational goal as there is a great deal of specialized knowledge about practice models, behavioral science theories, relevant policies, and practice settings, and it may not be feasible to include all of these in a limited-year program including both classroom and education in the field (such as internships). Some students desire, however, dual sets of competencies, and the educational program may allow and encourage this, such as specializations in both micro practice and management. In addition, some programs require a specialization in a field of practice such as mental health, child welfare, or community-focused organizations, and this may require competency in more than one level of practice. The human services fields are in flux on these issues, and it is difficult to predict how it will all come out.

Levels of Problems and Relevant Target and Action Systems

In reviewing this material, one can envision a matrix in which the column headings are the system levels experiencing a problem or issue: biological, individual, family, group, organization, community, society, and the world. Row headings refer to where the causes of difficulties lie and the same set of systems is used as the labels. Thus, an individual may be experiencing a problem whose cause may lie in one or more of the systems.

For example, an individual may be experiencing a drug use problem (biological level), an individual problem such as a lack of knowledge to fulfill a role requirement (individual level), a family problem such as a lack of adequate family resources (family level), an organizational problem such as the organization is discriminating against the individual because of his or her sexual orientation (organizational level), a community experiencing conflict that affects the individual negatively (community level), the national government failing to supply adequate medical coverage needed by the individual (societal level), or the individual losing his or her job due to a shift of employment in the industry to other countries (world level). Given this analysis, the practitioners have to utilize action systems (i.e., the level of intervention chosen by the client and practitioner systems) to work to ameliorate the problem.

This may sound as if the practitioner is a master manipulator orchestrating all sorts of change. This is not intended. Modern empowerment-oriented practice sees the practitioner operating more as an educator, cognizant that all parties share this educational function and have unique ways of viewing and understanding the world. Any and all interventions should be planned with as well as on behalf of the client system. In addition, this discussion may imply that one practitioner can or might do it all. Rather, the practitioner is part of the whole human services system and can and should collaborate with practitioners who specialize at levels of intervention required by the situation.

Diversity and Social Justice

An understanding of diversity and an application of this understanding to practice are essential for all social work practice. Many of the sources of diversity such as ethnicity, national origin, sexual orientation, gender, age, physical ability, and acculturation to the society are and have been sources of oppression, and all of us have multiple identities that are composed of these and other social designations. Thus, the idea of social justice becomes important. The goal of social justice is to ensure that every individual has an equal opportunity to be a contributing member of society and has access to health care, education, employment, and other needed resources. A socially just society is one that makes this possible for all citizens.

This means, therefore, that human services practice at all levels must be committed to meeting the needs of diverse client systems and that all choices of systems for service and ways of offering service conform to principles of social justice. To this end, a set of assumptions has been developed about socially just practice (one that fully examines the implications of having socially diverse client systems). These assumptions include the following:

1. Socially just practice requires visioning how the achievement of the purposes of the service can make a contribution to a more just world. The practitioner and the stakeholders in the situation will be evolving their own concepts of such a world.
2. Practice occurs within a broad array of social contexts. Terms that are used to refer to these contexts include the political, social, cultural, structural, organizational, community, family, and group circumstances surrounding the practice. These contexts may serve to either enhance or constrain the attainment of social justice goals; both enhancing and constraining forces may be present in the same situation and operate in complex ways.
3. Collectivism is an important concept in that people are social beings who depend on one another for the satisfaction of most of their primary and social needs. Because of this, groups are a major resource for client systems to utilize to accomplish their purposes and attain their goals. There are important differences, however, in the ways in which people in different cultures view the individual in relationship to various groups and collectivities, and this has major implications for how and when practitioners and client systems seek to work through groups to attain socially just goals.
4. Problem conception varies among social groups. Problems that the practice situation seeks to address are brought about by a complex array of forces. One of the most significant of such forces ensues from the structural circumstances surrounding the practice situation. An important question in the identification of such forces is who benefits by the way the problem is defined as well as if the problem is reduced or eliminated. This analysis is enhanced by a recognition that the personal is political, that personal problems are reflections of structural conditions, and that structural conditions are reflected in the problems of people individually and collectively.
5. The interests of the client system are the primary consideration rather than the interests of practitioners, the service agency, and other entities in the environment.
6. Processes and outcomes are inextricably linked. Thus, the practitioner should use processes and actions that promote social justice and challenge and reduce mechanisms that sustain injustice.
7. The practitioner should engage in multiple kinds of theorizing and analyses alone and with others at all phases and levels of practice.
8. The practitioner should attend to interconnections across and within levels.
9. The practitioner should examine how issues and problems are defined, conceptualized, and framed by external bodies and the service system, and determine whether these definitions benefit or disadvantage service users and are sources of oppression or sources of empowerment.
10. Practitioners should assess their own positionalities on multiple dimensions and should take these into account in terms of their impact on practitioner–client system interactions.
11. The levels of intervention that are chosen as action systems should be chosen by what will achieve client goals and social justice goals rather than chosen by professional preferences and experiences.
12. Client systems should regularly leave time to uncover and learn from conflict. They are likely to learn about power and injustice by dialoguing in conflict situations how to act in the face of conflict and how to resolve conflicts in ways that are peaceful and just, and that reduce or eliminate unjust and unequal uses of power.

13. Practitioners should regularly work with others including client and action systems to determine whether goals, and especially social justice goals, were identified initially and developed further over time—this is a requirement in general for an evaluation process that also considers the attainment of social justice goals.

Charles Garvin
University of Michigan

See Also: Changing the Client Versus Changing the Environment; Community Organizing; Conflict Resolution and Diversity; Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Group Therapy; Marriage and Family Therapy.

Further Readings

Garvin, Charles D. and John Tropman, Social Work in Contemporary Society, 2nd ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 1998.

Gladding, S. T. Group Work: A Counseling Specialty, 5th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 2008.

Green, Roberta and Nancy Kropf. Human Behavior Theory: A Diversity Framework. New Brunswick, NJ: Aldine Transaction, 2009.

Hepworth, Dean H., Ronald H. Rooney, Glenda Dewberry Rooney, and Kimberly Strom-Gottfried. Direct Social Work Practice: Theory and Skills (9th ed.). Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 2013.

Pincus, Allen and Anne Minahan. Social Work Practice: Model and Method. Itaska, IL: Peacock, 1973.

Rapoport, Anatole. "General Systems Theory." In D. Sills, ed., International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, Vol 15. New York: Free Press, 1968.

Singh, Anneliese and Carmen F. Salazar, eds. Social Justice in Group Work: Practical Interventions for Change. London: Routledge, 2011.

Sue, D. W. "Multicultural Organizational Consultation: A Social Justice Perspective." Consulting Psychology Journal: Practice and Research, v.60 (2008).

Toseland, Ronald W. and Robert F. Rivas. An Introduction to Group Work Practice, 7th ed. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2012.

LGBTQ Clients

Living in America as a lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered, or queer and/or questioning (LGBTQ) individual can bring about many challenges. The unique needs of this population have resulted from the challenges they face. Support during various stages of development of individual identity is an important need of LGBTQ individuals. Commonly, support is needed during the acceptance of self, coming-out process, and transitioning process. However, the primary barrier many have to overcome is self-acknowledgement and acceptance of being an LGBTQ individual. The coming-out process happens once self-awareness has been reached. Frank Floyd and Roger Bakeman describe the coming-out process of sexual orientation development as a standard set of life experiences that take place prior to and after self-identification as lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender. Furthermore, Arlene Noriega concludes that this process includes the time in which LGBTQ individuals disclose their sexual orientation to others. LGBTQ individuals come out in a number of ways and to many different groups of people. Natalie Hill notes that, as LGBTQ individuals are not a dominant group, they face unique challenges such as the coming-out process in which they have to explain their sexual orientation, and heterosexuals do not. They often find themselves coming out continually as they meet new people, acquire new jobs, or find themselves on different paths in their lives.

The coming-out process can be an exhilarating yet difficult process to navigate. Many LGBTQ individuals face extreme challenges as a result of the disclosure of their sexual orientation. The needs of this population include support and assistance in navigating the coming-out process. Some may need assistance processing their disclosure to various populations in various social contexts. Nicole Legate, Richard Ryan, and Netta Weinstein concluded that LGBTQ individuals are more likely to disclose their sexual orientation in contexts that are supportive and that LGBTQ individuals experience more positive well-being. In contrast, disclosure and positive well-being in more controlling contexts are less likely to occur.

Although there are benefits associated with coming out as an LGBTQ individual, there are also some risks to the process. Natalie Hill contends that risks consist of the lack of understanding or acceptance of everyone; the loss of support system and relationships with friends, family members, or coworkers that could be negatively impacted permanently; individuals that may be thrown out of their homes and experience homelessness, cut off from any financial support; and discrimination or harassment based on sexual orientation or gender identity, which in many cases, provide no recourse to legal protection. Lack of legal protection can put LGBTQ individuals at risk of losing their employment, denied housing, or even denied access to health care or insurance. These risks contribute to the special needs of LGBTQ populations and the coming-out process.

The coming-out process can be much more difficult for individuals who identify as transgender. Just as lesbians, gays, and bisexuals come out, transgender individuals come out during all stages and times in their lives. The National Center for Transgender Equality contends that this population may come out when they are adolescents, adults, or seniors; married or single and when they have children or even when they do not. LGBTQ individuals face many of the same challenges during and after the coming-out process, ranging from strained relationships to verbal and physical attacks. However, transgender individuals experience some different challenges.

Navigating the world daily as a transgender individual presents many challenges. It can be overwhelming for those whose gender identity, or internal feelings about their sense of gender, differs from the one they were given at birth. Making the decision to transition, living in one gender to living in another, can put the transgender individual into a more public light. The National Center for

The Los Angeles Gay and Lesbian Center is a clinic serving lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ) people. Its clinic and on-site pharmacy offer free and low-cost health care, mental health care, HIV/AIDS medical care and HIV/STD testing and prevention. It also offers legal, social, cultural, mental health, and educational services, including a 24-bed transitional program for homeless LGBTQ youth.

Transgender Equality contends that transitioning can bring on increased ridicule and the continuous disclosure to family, friends, employment, and medical professionals. At this stage, it becomes more important for individuals transitioning to surround themselves by individuals and communities that will support them through the process.

Narketta M. Sparkman
Quenika Boston
Old Dominion University

See Also: Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Children With Special Needs; Heterosexual Privilege; Legal Services; National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities; Prejudice, Theories of; Same-Sex Couples/Marriage; Sexual Reassignment Surgery.

Further Readings

Floyd, F. J. and R. Bakeman. "Coming-Out Across the Life Course: Implications of Age and Historical Context." Archives of Sexual Behavior, v.35/3 (2006).

Hill, N. "Affirmative Practice and Alternative Sexual Orientations: Helping Clients Navigate the Coming Out Process." Clinical Social Work Journal, v.37/4 (2009).

Legate, N., R. M. Ryan, and N. Weinstein. "Is Coming Out Always a 'Good Thing'? Exploring the Relations of Autonomy Support, Outness, and Wellness for Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual Individuals." Social Psychological and Personality Science, v.3/2 (2012).

The National Center for Transgender Equality. "Coming Out as Transgender". http://lgbt.wisc.edu/documents/HRC_Coming_Out_as_Transgender.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Noriega, A. "Psychological Treatment of LGB Individuals: Understanding Practice Guidelines. http://students.laverne.edu/studentsofpride/files/2012/03/Psy-Treatment-of-LGB-Individuals-LaVerne-Presentation111.pdf (Accessed November 2013).

Life Book

Life Book is a tool to chronicle the origins of an adopted child for generating a stable self-concept and identity. As a tool in therapy or case work, Life Book is a critical tool for the client and practitioner starting mental health and well-being discussions with foster and adopted children and to maintain and nurture the links between the adopted child's family of origin and life after adoption. The overall format of Life Book varies. It is constructed to give space for the child, the child's lost family, the adopted family, and the professional supports such as the therapist, and to make obvious and subtle linkages among them while maintaining a distinct identity for the adoptee. The Life Book has limitations but is a way for the child to share and make sense of his or her story for him- or herself and for others through engagement with the therapist, family members, and other professionals in its creation. It is aimed at creating a sense of self and relationships, both lost ones and new ones. It encourages imagination and reality to come together for a positive perspective.

There is no exact record of the origins of Life Book in the literature, but it is traced to Mary Horn of the Los Angeles Children's Bureau in the 1960s. Although there was a wide range of acknowledgment of its clinical use, there is limited research on the Life Book. K. A. Backhaus conducted an exploratory study of the use of the Life Book. She conducted open-ended interviews of 15 social workers working with foster and adopted children placed in private and public welfare agencies in Connecticut. Most of the respondents reported positive outcomes of the Life Book in allowing children to experience more control in their lives by integrating their feelings, organizing their experiences, and reframing their memories. The respondents also viewed it as a helpful tool for practitioners in understanding children's experiences. The Life Book has helped the child and others (e.g., the workers or adopted parents) realize the uniqueness of adoptees' lives and value their identities as people. Furthermore, it helped the adoptees understand the reasons for separation and adoption in their lives, which contributed to resolving anger about separation and placement in foster care or adoption.

There is no predefined format, but a loose-leaf structure is encouraged, as suggested by professionals, as it allows for the flexibility of adding and removing information in different types of adoption histories and varying sources of information and the adoptee child's knowledge about it. The Life Book is a collection of images and stories, which are valued because they can give a structure to life and the experiences of the child. The process could entail gathering a whole gamut or some of the following pieces of information: workers collecting photos and personal documents; identifying support and involvement of people in this process; preparing photo albums, scrapbooks, or built-in books; organizing contents such as photos, drawings, letters, or cards from family members or friends; child and worker narratives created through dialogue of the adoptee's history; other things the child might wish to include; and information and photos of travels or places that can be helpful for the adoptee to deal with his or her history.

The Life Book is organized to include the following categories: child's birth name; birth information, birth home, birth family tree; medical, immunization record; biological siblings or parent information; exploring the reasons of separation from birth parents; information of religion and other activities; information of the foster family; exploring the first day in foster family; adopted family tree; exploring the first day in adopted family; exploring birthdays from birth to current; school information; and exploring special people in the child's life. The format of the Life Book has different approaches ranging from albums to videotapes. For instance, a creative videotaped Life Book is used as a vehicle for biological parents to communicate their understandings of the child's family of origin and information of the child's genetic, medical, and developmental history. It also contains childhood stories with details such as favorite foods, first words, familial significance, and other memorable information. This videotaped Life Book can be later used by adopted families to share with their adopted child at appropriate developmental stages. A Life Book initiated by R. Holody and S. Maher proposes the here-and now model with a traditional Life Book that also has a social worker play an active role in placing the child's experience. The limitation of this proposed approach is that it is only preferable for older children because it requires cognitive ability to process their experiences.

There are some limitations of the Life Book in practice. It requires considerable time to gather a child's information and photos from previous foster and adopted families and previous workers. A trusted relationship between caregivers and a child needs to be established in order to begin this process. Third, the memories of adoptees can range from absence of information to negative perceptions of birth parents. To address this issue, the therapist or social worker asks the teenager or child to think of the birth parents' conditions at that time to create a self- and parent identity that is realistic but enabling. Fourth, the Life Book might be a difficult task if the cognitive and chronological age of the adopted child is not a good fit with undertaking the creation of a Life Book. Finally, caregivers need to believe the Life Book process, follow guidelines, and avoid asking premature questions about painful experiences in building a narrative.

Even with the limitations, the Life Book is a document of a life story that functions to help the child resculpt his or her life. The child's scattered memories during separation and transition are interwoven and integrated through the process of developing his or her life story. The integration of memories and restructured perspectives of life lead to a better adjusted one with his or her new family.

Shweta Singh
Rana P. Hong
Loyola University Chicago

See Also: Adoption, Infants, International and Older/Special Needs Children; Adoption, Special Needs; Adoption Agencies and Services; Adoption and Foster Care Analysis and Reporting System; International Adoptions and Families.

Further Readings

Backhaus, K. A. "Life Books: Tool for Working With Children in Placement." Social Work, v.62 (1984).
Holody, R. and S. Maher. "Using Lifebooks With Children in Family Foster Care: A Here-and-Now Process Model." Child Welfare, v.75/4 (1996).

Life Course Approach

Academic studies of aging date to 1907, when Leo Ignatius Nascher coined geriatrics as the medical study of the aged. Gerontology, on the other hand, can be defined as the sociological study of aging. The life course approach to studies of aging is a relatively recent phenomenon in gerontology, although it can be traced back a century in anthropology to Arnold van Gennep's seminal book The Rites of Passage (Les Rites de Passage). Both geriatrics and gerontology traditionally have concentrated on the aged such as the Kansas City Study of Adult Life in the 1950s. Although the Kansas City researchers accomplished a breakthrough with their belief that it was necessary to understand older people in naturalistic settings, Elaine Cumming and W. E. Henry mistakenly argued that disengagement from society was an inevitable developmental event of the life course. However, David L. Gutmann's research among the highland Druze led him to argue that disengagement is not inevitable in traditional cultures. Rather, it results in social rebirth through the mastery of religious roles.

In the 1970s, continuity theorists argued that psychological well-being in old age is the product of enduring patterns of activity over the entire life course. Linda George tested this on 380 people between the ages of 50 and 75 to predict continuity over the life course. She found that personality characteristics predicted psychological health better than did social status or activity. Psychological health is not an outgrowth of activity, contrapose disengagement, in later years. Both are the result of an individual's continuing character or social developments. In other words, the aged have high or low levels of activity because this has been the case over their life courses.

A Shift in Perspective

As people apparently began to live longer in the late 20th century than they did in previous times, it was assumed that the life span had increased due to the shift from rural to urban living, increasing industrialization, and modern medical practices in the north (industrialized countries). However, Peter Coleman, John Bond, and Sheila Peace argue that the greater numbers of older people is the product of a descending trend in birth rates. With lower birth rates, there are fewer infants proportional to the rest of the population; thus, when the infant mortality rate is averaged into the death rate for the entire population, it appears that people are living much longer (after they have reached adulthood) because the average life span has increased. Actually, this means that fewer infant deaths have been included in the calculations. Indeed, aging is not just something that happens in the third trimester of the life course; rather, aging is a lifelong process that begins at birth. Thus, Peter Coleman contends that aging should be studied over the entire life course.

The Longitudinal Argument

In the 1970s, Matilda White Riley observed the life course connection between age and social structure. People in the same age cohorts experience many things as a group, and they will experience them differently than will people in other age cohorts, even when they experience the same incidents. This is to say, adults will have a different experience from a war or an economic recession than will children, and older adults will experience those events differently than will younger adults. These different reactions to how events are experienced result in different courses for different age groups.

In the 1990s, a major change in aging studies eschewed theories in favor of experiential analyses. Vern L. Bengtson, Cara J. Rice, and Malcolm Johnson argued in 1999 that 72 percent of all publications between 1990 and 1994 ignored theory in aging literature as irrelevant to their findings in real-world situations. Katherine R. Allen, Rosemary Blieszner, and Karen A. Roberto established that aging studies began to move into family gerontology. Of the 938 publications at which they looked, the plurality was on caregiving (32.6 percent), followed by social support networks at only 13.7 percent. Aging researchers began to realize the importance of pluralism and life course approaches.

As aging researchers began to appreciate the life course approach, a new methodology began to be required that shifted to the collection of longitudinal data, often placing the individual within a familial environment that necessitated chronological considerations in lieu of definitions of age cohorts and the employment of unpredictable life experiences. Aging individuals may choose what they consider to be their families from a group of possible members: nieces, nephews, friends, or neighbors.

The Life History Method

Life course research should be conducted longitudinally, as it has been conducted in the English Longitudinal Study of Aging (ELSA). The longitudinal argument for life course studies is reinforced by The Irish Longitudinal Study on Aging (TILDA), which began tracking 10,000 Irish people age 55 and older over 10 years, beginning in 2006. Longitudinal research has its problems as methodology and research foci may evolve away from the original hypotheses, or tragically subjects die.

Peter Coleman makes the point that longitudinal research over the life course necessitates accounting for early, formative experiences, not just those extant in the subjects' lives, as much previous static research had done. Bengtson, Rice, and Johnson observed that a life course is a developmental process that requires a longitudinal dimension. Michael J. Simonton overcame the issue of static, cross-sectional research by practicing participant observation on the same subjects over 30 years, with the empirical data reinforced with autobiographical narratives, called life histories in anthropology, where they have constituted an important research tool for more than a century. Narratives allow subjects to reconstitute their life courses, and by gathering multiple life histories, the researcher can begin to understand what constitutes meaning within lives, according to Ricca Edmondson.

It is by utilizing life history data that meaning is given to the life course within a historical context, according to Chris Phillipson. Allen, Blieszner, and Roberto call the use of the life course in the study of aging as the foremost methodological development of the last several decades. They argue that the life course perspective links macro and micro levels by focusing on individuals within society and historical processes to discover how subjects develop chronologically and longitudinally as they construct their lives within a kin (or fictive kin) matrix. Subjects reveal how they constructed meaning within their lives by narratively reconstructing them over the life course, in effect seeing where they have come from to where they are by looking in the rear-view mirror of narratives.

Michael J. Simonton
Northern Kentucky University

See Also: Longitudinal Studies of Aging; National Institute on Aging.

Further Readings

Allen, Katherine R., Rosemary Blieszner, and Karen A. Roberto. "Families in the Middle and Later Years: A Review and Critique of Research in the 1990s." Journal of Marriage and the Family, v.62 (2000).

Bengtson, Vern L., Cara J. Rice, and Malcolm Johnson. "Are Theories of Ageing Important? Models and Explanations at the Turn of the Century." In V. L. Bengtson and K. Warner Schaie, eds., Handbook of Theories of Ageing. New York: Springer Publishing Company, 1999.

Coleman, Peter. "Psychological Ageing." In Peter Coleman, John Bond, and Sheila Peace, eds., Ageing in Society: An Introduction to Social Gerontology. London: Sage, 1999.

Coleman, Peter, John Bond, and Sheila Peace. "Ageing in the Twentieth Century." In Peter Coleman, John Bond, and Sheila Peace, eds., Ageing in Society: An Introduction to Social Gerontology. London: Sage, 1999.

Edmondson, Ricca. "Health Promotion and the Study of Cultural Practices." In Ricca Edmondson and Cecily Kelleher, eds., Health Promotion: New Discipline or Multi-Discipline? Dublin, Ireland: Irish Academic Press, 2000.

George, Linda. "The Impact of Personality and Social Status Factors Upon Levels of Activity and Psychological Well-Being." Journal of Gerontology, v.33/6 (1978).

Loustaunau, Martha. Ageing in Society. National Social Science Press. http://www.nsspress.com/Lousta/htm/TOC.htm (Accessed December 2013).

Simonton, Michael J. "Gerontology." In Encyclopedia of Time. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2009.

Simonton, Michael J. Sailing a Life Course: A Longitudinal Study of Aging in Western Ireland. Dubuque, IA: Kendall Hunt Publishing Company, 2013.

Van Gennep, Arnold. The Rites of Passage. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960.

Life Skills Training

Life Skills Training (LST) has been designed to address key risk and protective factors associated with the initiation and escalation of problematic behaviors and unhealthy lifestyle choices. LST has been designed to target social and intrapersonal factors by providing the knowledge, attitudes, and skills necessary to actively resist social influences promoting engagement in unhealthy living practices. LST is typically taught in a logical sequence in which particular material is covered and broken down into three major components: (1) a personal competence component that teaches self-management skills; (2) a social competence component that teaches a set of social skills; and (3) a drug-resistance component that teaches health-related content, resistance skills, and prohealth attitudes.

Crew members from the USS Forrest Sherman (DDG 98), based in Norfolk, Virginia, and the U.S. Coast Guard Cutter Tahoma (WMEC 908), based in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, build a garden area that provides life skills training to mentally disabled students at the Victory Living Programs care facility in Fort Lauderdale, Florida.

The personal-competence component consists of sessions that teach problem-solving and decision-making skills; critical-thinking skills to identify, analyze, and resist common media appeals; skills for coping with anxiety and stress; emotional self-regulation skills (e.g., reframing negative thoughts and increasing positive self-talk) in order to manage feelings of anger/frustration; and skills for facilitating personal development (e.g., self-assessment, goal-setting, self-monitoring, and self-reinforcement).

The social competence component consists of sessions that teach skills aimed toward more clear communication (i.e., maintaining congruent verbal and nonverbal ways of communication, specificity in giving instructions or making arrangements, and paraphrasing or simplifying statements for increased clarity); and skills for overcoming bashfulness (e.g., initiating and sustaining social interactions), meeting new people, making new friends, and developing healthy relationships. Individuals are also taught complimenting skills (i.e., giving and receiving compliments); general conversational skills (including terminating a conversation); and general assertiveness skills (e.g., making requests, refusing unreasonable requests, and standing up for one's rights).

The drug-resistance component consists of sessions that expand knowledge and teach the skills needed to increase individuals' ability to resist social pressures to smoke cigarettes, drink alcohol, and use illicit drugs. Included are divisions that focus on the unfavorable consequences of tobacco, alcohol, and illicit drug use; the current prevalence of drug use among both youth and adult populations in efforts to correct or modify normative expectations about drug use; and the immediate physiological effects of cigarette smoking. Additionally, lessons related to substance use and other health matters are integrated into several divisions of the program to further demonstrate the effectiveness of implementing the skills learned.

Methods of Training

Some material in the program is taught using didactic methods; however, a major emphasis is placed on the use of interactive teaching techniques such as facilitation and group discussion, classroom demonstrations, and cognitive-behavioral skills training. Thus, in addition to targeting proximal etiologic factors specific to drug use and resistance, LST addresses more distal etiologic factors grounded in positive development and general competence enhancement. While many skills taught in the program are derived from cognitive-behavioral therapy, the environment is not a therapeutic setting. Instead, the structure and environment are more conducive to instructional learning and continue to focus on remediating existing problems, increasing resilience, and facilitating healthy psychosocial development.

Testing of the LST curriculum has primarily been used with white middle-class individuals; however, several studies have tested the program with inner-city minority individuals. More specifically, the program has been consistently implemented with the youth population. Research with minority youth shows that LST can prevent cigarette smoking with Hispanic and African American youth. Several studies with minority youth from multiple racial/ethnic groups indicate that LST is effective in reducing the frequency and amount of alcohol use. Additional research with multiethnic minority youth demonstrates that it is effective in preventing the use of tobacco, alcohol, and marijuana, as well as the use of multiple drugs. Taken together, these studies show that LST works well with multiple populations, including white, African American, and Hispanic youth.

Additionally, LST has been tested within the university population. There has been an increase in the number of students seeking counseling centers, and this may reflect their sociocultural growth and mental maturation in the ability to request support from others; yet it can also highlight the sophisticated problems they face, leading them to educational decline. The importance of the above issues have led researchers to investigate the efficacy of life skills training on general health in students to reduce their physical and psychological problems and to promote their general health through education of life skills in a new environment (i.e., the university setting).

Not only has LST training been taught within general educational settings, it has also been taught within medical settings. Nurses are exposed to patient illness and critical conditions of death daily, which can often lead to insomnia, lack of assurance, and disturbances in their interpersonal communications, which often leads to an increase in physical problems. Studies on the effectiveness of LST with this population has demonstrated that level of communication skills, self-awareness, and stress management among nurses and midwives can be promoted through education of life skills to prevent the problems and/or lower the level of problems. Research findings suggest implementing life-skill education, along with other educational programs in the curriculum, in order to increase the level of the individual's general health, lower the incidence of depression, anxiety, physical problems, and to amend low social function to prevent physical and mental disorders.

Minority Communities

Several programs have been developed that teach LST, but the traditional LST-named programs do not place a particular emphasis on working with diverse populations and the experience of learning life skills within a nonmainstream framework. Most programs that teach life skills in minority communities are focused more on the personal and social competence arenas. Most of those programs also include a heavy focus on mentoring and collectivist ideologies in order to cope with the experience of "-isms" and discrimination. A significant portion of the program is also spent exploring the history of the minority group and the implications of the "-isms" on their competence levels. As the development of LST training programs and the diversity of the world increase, it is imperative that educators, researchers, and other professionals understand the importance of diversifying the curriculum to be more inclusive of various background experiences and implementing material that reaches wider populations of people and characteristics.

Social learning theory indicates that learning occurs within a social context as a result of a process of observation, imitation, and modeling. Social factors and the modeling of behaviors are powerful influences that shape the lives of children and adolescents, as well as adults. Intrapersonal factors (such as knowledge, attitudes, skills, and personality traits) affect motivation to engage in negative behaviors and interact with social factors to increase risk by affecting vulnerability to those influences. Vast changes in living conditions, social and familial problems, and numerous advances in information technology and communications reveal the necessity of taking individuals' health into close consideration more than before. More recently, psychologists' investigation of behavioral disorders and social corruption concluded that most of the health damages are a result of individuals' inability to analyze personal problems, sustain personal control, and face difficult situations, and they ultimately lack the preparation required to solve problems in an appropriate way. Therefore, preparation of youth, or adults who did not acquire such skills during their youth, to cope with such difficult situations is essential.

Kayla Harris
Pennsylvania State University

See Also: At-Risk Youth Services; Drug and Alcohol Screening; Life Course Approach; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Botvin, G. and K. Griffin. "Life Skills Training: Preventing Substance Misuse by Enhancing Individual and Social Competence." New Directions for Youth Development, v.141 (2014).

Gorman, D. "Does the Life Skills Training Program Reduce Use of Marijuana?" Addiction Research and Theory, v.19/5 (2011).

Shayan, N. and T. AhmadiGatab. "The Effectiveness of Social Skills Training on Students' Levels of Happiness." Procedia Social and Behavioral Sciences, v.46 (2012).

Linguicism

Linguicism (also called linguistic discrimination or languagism) is understood as treating someone unfairly or worse than others due to one's linguistic skills and performance. Linguicism may be connected with violating linguistic rights (human rights connected with language and communication) and infringing on one's freedom of using his or her mother tongue, dialect, or register in social interactions. Taking into account the scope of languagism, it may concern different levels of linguistic representation. Analyzing the macro dimension, it may involve languages, dialects, or registers. Linguistic discrimination is also connected with communication styles. Thus, some communicative behaviors may be viewed as improper or worse by others and, consequently, the users of some interactional practices as inferior. Linguicism may also be observed on a micro level as it may concern words and phrases. Thus, because linguicism involves social linguistic representation (language) and personal communication style (word), it can be viewed on both individual and group levels. It may concern both verbal and paraverbal elements of communication; one's choice of linguistic repertoire and pitch may be viewed as more prestigious than the phrases or accent in the piece of communication produced by someone else.

Apart from the mentioned issues, linguicism may also concern situations when someone has limited or no access to information due to some impairments or health problems. For example, linguicism may take the form of making information unavailable in Braille or sign language. In addition, linguicism is connected with the juxtaposition of linguistic inclusion and exclusion. It is often represented by the opposition of language or dialect and lingua franca or vernacular. As far as the background of linguistic discrimination is examined, there are various reasons for linguicism. One of them is stereotyping that is connected with thinking that speakers of some languages, or dialects, as well as the users of some styles or nonstandard phrases, lack certain skills or are inferior to others in some way.

In addition, the speakers possessing different verbal and paraverbal features may be perceived as less educated or coming from disadvantaged social backgrounds. Another reason for linguicism may be the lack of financial resources to conduct efficient multilingual policies. For example, the costs of translating some materials into many dialects or minority languages may be too high for some organizations. Consequently, some speakers do not have the possibility to access data in their mother tongues on, for example, corporate Web sites. In addition, linguistic issues do not take place in a vacuum; political, financial, and cultural dimensions influence linguistic attitudes and policies. Thus, linguistic discrimination is often caused by the improper allocation of power, money, and human resources in a given setting. Consequently, historic, monetary, or cultural factors influence the treatment of linguistic communities in a given territory.

Types of Linguicism

One typology may involve the issue of voluntarism and consciousness. Consequently, conscious and unconscious linguicism can be distinguished. Conscious linguicism denotes a situation when the performer of actions is conscious that his or her actions tamper with linguistic rights and cause prejudice. On the other hand, unconscious linguicism encompasses instances when a person is not aware that his or her linguistic attitude violates linguistic rights and freedom of expression. Another classification regarding linguicism may concern a type of language affected. Figurative linguicism encompasses linguistic attitudes toward nonliteral language. For example, metaphors or idioms may lead to problems in understanding because they involve connotations with issues that are culture specific. In addition, even if the source domain is recognized in a given metaphor, it may cause different associations among the target audience. Thus, metaphors in multicultural or multilingual settings have to be chosen with great care because, although they often rely on well-known domains and concepts, they may sometimes impede the process of intercultural communication.

Literal linguicism involves using linguistic tools with defined meaning in a way that limits the processes of understanding. It may be represented by, for example, relying on lesser-known meanings, archaic denotation, or very specialized terminology in expert–laymen communication. Linguicism can be divided according to its consequences. Social linguicism is the type of linguicism that is caused by social attitudes and leads to social isolation. A person who has to face social linguicism does not have the possibility to participate in social life, or his or her participation is infringed. One type of social linguicism is gender linguicism that encompasses all the actions related to treating one gender inferior to another one.

Another type is informational linguicism, which is connected with limited access to information caused by linguistic imbalance in a given setting. As language determines knowledge flows in all directions, both the processes of encoding and decoding data suffer from informational linguicism. As a result, a person is not able to create or understand a message. Social and informational linguicism are interrelated and determine information flow and social contacts. In addition, linguistic discrimination can be categorized by taking into account the sphere of life it concerns. Thus, the following classification can be provided, showing the role of linguicism in both private and social life: educational linguicism, workplace linguicism, and media linguicism (including online linguicism).

Educational Linguicism

Linguicism may be caused and simultaneously affected by education. It may be represented by the lack of access to educational services being prompted by using a minority language or a dialect of indigenous community. As far as learners are concerned, linguicism may be connected with the lack of books, scripts, and other materials in their tongue. When the level of language of instruction is not satisfactory among the pupils, the learning process may be difficult. Moreover, linguicism may concern the instructors as well. As far as the group of teachers is concerned, teachers having a mother tongue other than the language of instruction may find it difficult to get a job. The reasons for this issue may be connected with lower linguistic skills of the teachers as far as the language of instruction is concerned or the aptitude of employing only native speakers. Another issue is native speakerism, which stresses the fact that native speakers are the authorities on the language and the best teachers of a language. In consequence, the teachers of foreign languages who teach a language that is not the mother tongue may not be offered equal job possibilities as native speakers. Linguicism is also related to creating and distributing knowledge. In some scientific writing, researchers draw attention to the issue of global language, with English being the lingua franca of the modern. The benefits of using one common language in science are very visible—access to publications and the possibility to read the works created by researchers from various countries. On the other hand, some discuss the phenomenon of English linguistic imperialism. In the case of education, it is connected with lower possibilities of publishing research in languages other than English because some journals accept only contributions written in English.

Workplace Linguicism

As far as the professional life is concerned, linguicism is connected with prestige or higher status of some languages. In this case, being the speaker of a desired language gives the possibilities of promotion and offers the access and comprehension of corporate documents. Another corporate linguistic issue is organizational linguistic policy, being visible in the attitude to corporate lingo, and the approach to using mother tongues at work. In some organizations, the violation of linguistic rights takes place as employees may not use their native languages even during situations outside the organizational setting such as private chats in canteens. Linguicism may also be connected with the usage of professional varieties and the issue of understanding. In that case, relying on languages for specific purposes on one hand facilitates communication among experts, but on the other, it limits the possibilities for cross-domain discussion and professional–laymen interactions. Relying exclusively on specialized knowledge in contacts with individuals representing different levels of proficiency may hinder data flows and discussions.

Consumer Linguicism

Consumer linguicism may be visible in the following ways. One is related to the availability of information on products or services only in some languages. Thus, linguistic minorities in a given country may have difficulties in having access to the desired information on merchandise they want to purchase. Linguicism can also be related to the way one selects products. It can be visible, for example, in linguistic branding of products. For example, products having foreign names may be associated with some features such as quality, rich taste, reliability, and so on. Thus, some products may be perceived as worse just because of the name they have and the cultural connotations it leads to. Consequently, some companies change the names of their brands because rebranding guarantees a better image of a company in the eyes of stakeholders.

Media Linguicism

Media linguicism is related to the tendency of using one or some languages in modern media. Taking into account the growing role of the Internet in the reality of the 21st century, online linguicism can be observed. It denotes situations when only one or a group of languages are used in online communication, thus the speakers of other languages cannot take part in online discourse. In this case, language works as a barrier to participating in online communities. Language is also crucial for homophily and heterophily in online networks. In the case of homophily in online networks, language serves as a tool of creating such networks. Heterophily in online communication is connected with the participation of diversified individuals in web communities. In this case, participation in such networks is open to people regardless of the language they use. Heterophily can be connected with the participation of people speaking different languages or dialects, or it can be linked with the type of language for specific purposes used. In the second case, it may involve the usage of a professional lingo, understood exclusively by specialists representing the same job.

Methods to Overcome Linguicism

There are various ways of limiting the power of linguicism. Taking into account the cultural dimension, it involves education about culture and training in intercultural communication. Analyzing the linguistic level, attention should be paid to the selection of linguistic tools, in private and social life, including all types of linguistic representation. In addition, proper linguistic policy at different levels (individual, organizational, and national) is required to overcome linguicism and foster communication in a linguistically and culturally diverse setting. Efficient linguistic strategies should concern different spheres of life and involve both offline and online communication.

Magdalena Bielenia-Grajewska
University of Gdansk

See Also: Accommodation; Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in; Cultural and Linguistically Appropriate Services Standards; Language Assistance; Learning Disabilities, Services for Individuals With.

Further Readings

Bielenia-Grajewska, Magdalena. "Linguistic Aspects of Informal Learning in Corporate Online Social Networks." In V. P. Dennen and J. B. Myers, eds., Virtual Professional Development and Informal Learning Via Social Networks. Hershey, PA: IGI Publishing, 2012.

Bielenia-Grajewska, Magdalena. "Corporate Linguistic Rights Through the Prism of Company Linguistic Identity Capital." In Ch. Akrivopoulou, ed., Human Rights and Risks in the Digital Era. Hershey, PA: IGI Publishing, 2013.

Canagarajah, Suresh and Selim Ben Said. Linguistic Imperialism. In James Simpson, ed., The Routledge Handbook of Applied Linguistics. Abingdon, UK: Routledge, 2011.

Holliday, Adrian. "Key Concepts in ELT. Native-Speakerism." ELT Journal, v.60/4 (2006).

Phillipson, Robert. Linguistic Imperialism. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Literacy Testing

Voting is one of the most important ways in which individuals engage in a participatory democracy. However, the right has not always been equitably applied among America's diverse populations. Over the course of the 20th century, unfettered access to the ballot became a key issue in the struggle for African American civil rights. Literacy testing and other restrictive measures were part of a concerted effort to disenfranchise African American voters.

Historically, literacy testing refers to the government practice of administering a test to potential voters in order to determine their literacy and authenticate their understanding of the civic process. Theoretically, the registration practice of literacy testing was to be applied to both white and black voters who could not prove a certain level of education. However, the tests were disproportionately given to black voters, many of whom were unable to read. Indeed, during the 1890s—when the use of literacy testing became more widespread—40 to 60 percent of African Americans were illiterate, compared to only 8 to 18 percent of whites. When used this way, the practice of literacy testing became an integral part of the larger process of voter disenfranchisement and sociopolitical exclusion that occurred after the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment that gave African American men the right to vote. Although literacy testing has its roots in the 19th century, the practice had a long life span and was not outlawed until the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Victory and Violence

The Emancipation Proclamation and the Union victory in the Civil War marked a period of intense optimism for African Americans. The hopes of freedom were made tangible in 1867 and 1868, when African American men were among the many delegates in attendance at the constitutional conventions in the southern states. Each of the former Confederate states held conventions to create new state constitutions. The African American delegates included former slaves, Union Army veterans, and skilled laborers. Some of these delegates went on to serve in political offices in the following years. All of the delegates, both black and white, were united in their hopes of creating new state constitutions. A key provision in these new constitutions was universal suffrage, which granted all men the right to vote. The elections to ratify the new state constitutions began in 1867, and each state elected an African American to political office.

The African American presence in politics was short-lived. During their tenure, African American Reconstruction-era politicians had an impact on a range of issues, including education and industry. However, because they were often in the minority, they were therefore unable to enact large-scale civil rights initiatives. African American politicians and voters faced a rising tide of white supremacy tactics designed to scare them from political discourse and discourage any attempt at social equality. The Ku Klux Klan was founded in 1866 and immediately began a program of extreme violence and voter intimidation. In an effort to protect voter rights, the federal government passed the Fifteenth Amendment in 1869. The Fifteenth Amendment guaranteed voting rights for all African American men with the following words: "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The amendment was ratified in 1870 and was viewed as a hard-earned victory in the struggle for citizenship and civil rights.

Testing the Limits of the Fifteenth Amendment

The ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment did little to discourage white Democrats who wanted to debilitate African American voting rights, and by the 1890s, southern states had perfected their use of exclusionary practices. In most cases, county clerks and election registrars applied the rules in a way that privileged white voters. The use of literacy tests, poll taxes, and convoluted registration processes could indeed have an impact on illiterate white voters; however, the targeted application of these rules to African American voters made clear that the intent was to obstruct African Americans' civic participation.

Consider, for example, Mississippi's response to the new legislation. Mississippi law required that all voters be literate. However, illiterate men could still qualify to vote if they indicated their understanding of sections of the constitution if it were read to them. Given the nature of southern social relations, it was also understood that election officials would accept white voters' understanding of the passages. Louisiana officials also found a way to protect white voters from the literacy test through the use of the grandfather clause. The grandfather clause stated that only men who had been eligible to vote prior to 1867—or whose father or grandfather had been eligible—were able to vote. Given that almost no African American men would have been eligible to vote, the grandfather clause, in conjunction with literacy tests, was successful in diminishing the African American vote.

The composition of the literacy test often varied from state to state; however, there were some key components that the tests had in common. For example, all literacy tests were designed so that the test taker would fail. In many cases, the questions were unanswerable (e.g., how many bubbles are there in a bar of soap, etc.). Some questions were so abstract that only a scholar or lawyer would be capable of providing a sufficient answer, as was the case in tests that required the taker to explain complex sections of the Constitution. Other questions were intentionally ambiguous and could be answered any number of ways, thereby guaranteeing that any answer could be considered wrong. Some of the tests had to be completed in as little as 10 minutes despite the fact that many were four pages long. Any single wrong answer would constitute a failing grade.

The Struggle Continues

Despite the persistence of Jim Crow laws, African American civil rights activists continued to protest voter suppression and inequality. The battle for the ballot exemplified the extreme lengths to which southerners would go in order to maintain their power. Civil rights organizations such as the National Association of Colored People and the National Urban League, founded in 1909 and 1910, respectively, helped lead the struggle for equality. In 1920, the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment served as a watershed moment in American history. The Nineteenth Amendment gave women the right to vote, and as a result, African American women joined in the struggle to protect their rights to suffrage.

The Southern resistance to African American voting rights intensified during the early decades of the 20th century. The 19th-century exclusionary practices were still in place, but throughout the Deep South, officials began a more active campaign of economic harassment. The creation of White Citizens' Councils throughout the south added to the existing resistance to African American civic participation. These organizations were comprised of local businessmen—landlords, employers, and bank officials—who would exact economic revenge against African Americans who attempted to vote or achieve some semblance of equality. As a result, potential voters could be fired from their jobs or evicted from their homes if they registered to vote. The Ku Klux Klan also participated in a range of violent activities that was meant to deter African Americans from registering to vote.

Some states' voter registration policies were more egregious than others. For example, the registration and literacy testing in Alabama was particularly onerous. The Alabama Registrar's office was only open for a few hours every other Monday of the month, thus requiring potential voters to leave work in order to register. In the event a white employer approved the time off, they would likely suffer some form of punishment from the Citizens' Council. This particular state test included a section that required the applicant to read aloud from the Constitution. The test also included a set of general questions about state and national politics. In an effort to counter the ever-changing rules of engagement, civil rights activists began to collect different versions of the test in order to help potential voters. Activists opened citizenship schools to prepare registrants to pass the test. These schools were also committed to teaching the adult students about the meaning of citizenship, justice, and freedom.

The abolition of the literacy test and other discriminatory voting practices was a signature feature of the civil rights movement. After a series of court cases that called into question the validity of the literacy tests, Congress abolished literacy tests in the south with the Voting Rights of 1965 and nationwide in 1970.

Michelle Taylor Watts
Independent Scholar

See Also: African Americans; National Urban League; Race, Social Definitions of; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; Slavery and Lasting Cultural Effects of Social Biology/Biological Determinism; Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Further Readings

Fox, Cybelle. Three Worlds of Relief: Race, Immigration, and the American Welfare State From the Progressive Era to the New Deal. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2012.

Hahn, Steven. A Nation Under Our Feet: Black Political Struggles in the Rural South From Slavery to the Great Migration. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2005.

Keyssar, Alexander. The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States. New York: Basic Books, 2009.

May, Gary. Bending Toward Justice: The Voting Rights Act and the Transformation of American Democracy. New York: Basic Books, 2013.

Locus of Control, Cultural Differences in

Locus of control is a theory proposed by psychologist Julian B. Rotter in 1954 and has become an important aspect of social psychology. Locus of control was derived from the social learning theory that says an individual learns based on the history of reinforcement. The word locus is Latin and means "place" or "location." Locus of control refers to the extent to which individuals believe they can control the events in their lives. A person's locus can either be internal or external, and someone who is able to maintain a balance between the two is often reported as being happier in life. When individuals are able to acknowledge what is within their control and what is not, they are more able to maintain a balance between the internal and external locus of control. A large amount of research dealing with locus of control has summarized the different variables that have been linked to this personality theory. Ultimately, this theory focuses on the extent to which individuals believe that events that impact their lives are reinforced by their own behavior.

Internal Versus External Locus of Control

As a part of a social learning theory, Julian B. Rotter believed that an internal or external locus of control is an important part of who you are as an individual—a part of your individual personality. As a person develops from infancy through childhood, behaviors are learned by receiving reinforcement from his or her caregiver. Throughout development, children will learn that their behavior influences reinforcement or reinforcement influences behavior. This experience influences the development of future behavior in almost all situations and creates an expectancy of whether reinforcement is internally or externally controlled.

Individuals with a high internal locus of control believe that they influence or control the events in their lives. They have better control of their behavior, tend to exhibit more political behaviors, and are more likely to attempt to influence other people than those with a low internal locus of control. Individuals with a high internal locus of control are also more likely to assume that their efforts will be successful and are more active in seeking information and knowledge concerning their situation. They also tend to be more self-reliant and take pride in their victories while feeling shamed when defeated.

On the other hand, people with a high external locus of control believe that outside factors (i.e., luck, fate, or other people) influence or control their decisions and events in their lives. They are more likely to lower their goals and expectations, whereas an individual with a low external locus of control would work for achievements and set long-term goals for him- or herself. As part of his theory of locus of control, Julian Rotter proposed that individuals with a high internal locus of control tend to be higher in achievement motivation than those with a high external locus of control.

Some research attention has been directed toward whether people from different cultures vary in locus of control. For example, Asian Americans, African Americans, and Native Americans from upper and lower socioeconomic classes do not have identical world views. Moreover, research in the area suggests that locus of control has been a useful concept for researchers in a cross-cultural field of human services. Ethnic groups within the United States have been compared on levels of locus of control, and African Americans are more external than Caucasians—even within a controlled socioeconomic status. Rotter proposed three potential sources for the development of an internal or external locus of control: cultural differences, socioeconomic differences, and variations in styles of parenting. Finally, he affirmed that those with a high internal locus of control are more likely than externals to (1) learn information about their lives based on their behaviors and make better decisions in the future, (2) commit to change and improvements in their lives, (3) place value on inner achievement, and (4) are less likely to be manipulated by others.

Locus of Control and Cultural Oppression

The field of human services encompasses meeting human needs across cultures and acknowledging cultural differences. These expectations seem especially applicable when various racial and ethnic minorities are discussed within the context of community mental health, counseling, and social work. The issue with understanding an individual's worldview in the field of human services has not been adequately discussed. Furthermore, research fails to address differences in worldview that individuals within a minority group may hold. A worldview can be defined as how a person perceives his or her relationship to the world. In addition to racial and ethnic minorities, economic and social class, religion, and sex are also components of a worldview.

Maintaining a commitment to improving the overall quality of life in individuals within diverse populations includes but is not limited to a critical analysis and understanding of cultural differences. While cultural upbringing and life experiences are highly correlated with worldviews, it is important to recognize the effect culture has on how an individual thinks, makes decisions, and experiences events in his or her life. Overall, human services professionals without awareness of their own cultural biases, and that of the people they serve, may be engaging in cultural oppression—when an individual imposes a particular worldview upon people of different cultures. On the contrary, culturally effective personnel are able to contribute a range of knowledge that is consistent with lifestyles and values of a culturally different population.

Monique N. Mercado
St. Mary's University

See Also: Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Life Skills Training; Multiculturalism.

Further Readings

Liang, B. and G. Bogat. "Culture, Control and Coping: New Perspectives on Social Support." American Journal of Community Psychology, v.22/1 (1994).

McGinnies, E., L. A. Nordholm, C. D. Ward, and D. L. Bhanthumnavin. "Sex and Cultural Differences in Perceived Locus of Control Among Students in Five Countries." Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology, v.42/3 (1974).

Sue, D. W. "Eliminating Cultural Oppression in Counseling: Toward a General Theory." Journal of Counseling Psychology, v.25/5 (1978).

Longitudinal Studies on Aging

Longitudinal studies on aging involve repeated observations of the same variables over long periods of time, usually at regular intervals (two to three years), and they study trends, life events, and general life experiences across the life span. Although they do not have the strength of experimental designs in terms of building a case for causality (they observe; they do not manipulate situations to study the effect), they are stronger than cross-sectional studies as, in following the same people over time, they may track incidence as well as prevalence of events; rely on current reported rather than recalled information; offer more opportunity to control for, or at least identify where there may be, unobserved individual differences; and consider a time dimension to observations of how differences in people's resources (financial and personal), lives, and experiences translate into different outcomes in older age. A particular focus of many longitudinal studies on aging is identifying the predictors of both onset of disease and types of disease progression. There is also an opportunity to understand if phenomena (e.g., impact of life events) are of short- or long-term duration.

The type of information gathered in longitudinal studies, therefore, is of interest to human services, often helping identify the most salient modifiable factors in disease and disadvantage that human services may then target, including those that are most relevant to diverse populations.

Longitudinal studies are usually either cohort studies or panel studies. Cohort studies sample a cohort, defined as a group experiencing some event (e.g., persons who have experienced a heart attack or a particular age group) within a particular time band and then gather related data (e.g., variables potentially associated with onset of additional heart attacks or success in return to normal functioning) at intervals over time. Panel studies sample a cross-section of a population (a random sample, a particular geographic or sociocultural group, or a professional group such as nurses) and then have members of the panel (who present a range of circumstances and experiences) complete questionnaires and other measures at regular intervals. The target population for a longitudinal study may be individuals or may be households. There are also retrospective longitudinal studies, for example, studies using medical records that look back in time trying to understand trends or to identify common markers in people's histories that may explain outcomes, particularly medical outcomes, in their later lives.

Examples of such studies include the oldest longitudinal study on aging (www.blsa.nih.gov), focused on understanding changes due to normal aging and those due to disease or other causes, and the Health and Retirement Study (HRS, hrsonline.isr.umich.edu). In HRS, data on physical and mental health and health care utilization, on living situations, and on financial and social support resources are available and are being collected over regular intervals. Other studies target more specific health concerns; for example, the Framingham Heart Study (http://www.framinghamheartstudy.org) is focused primarily on cardiovascular disease and the Nun Study on Alzheimer's disease (http://www.mc.uky.edu/nunnet); or particular populations, for example, the Nurses' Health Study looking at women's health over time (http://www.channing.harvard.edu/nhs/history/index.shtml). Several studies have included the collection of biomarker material and informed the development of subsequent longitudinal studies in the United States and other countries. In particular, there has been a more prominent featuring of anthropometric measurement (e.g., http://www.ifs.org.uk/elsa), collection of genetic materials (e.g., www.tilda.ie), and the inclusion of unique populations such as in P. McCallion's Intellectual Disability Supplement to the Irish Longitudinal Study of Aging.

Findings

A recent review by D. C. Stanziano and colleagues of 51 longitudinal studies on aging held in a National Institute of Aging database found that such studies fell into six categories.

Cognitive function. Work to date by K. J. Anstey and colleagues reflects strong interest in relationships between age and mortality, but linkages to cognitive decline to changes in health care utilization and to changing social and economic roles remain to be systematically investigated, according to Stanziano.

Socioeconomic status. Here, the interest has been to understand the link between socioeconomic factors and mortality, morbidity, and functional status outcomes. But few definitive answers have been arrived at, and findings of linkages to health disparities, describe S. S. Bassuk and colleagues, have been challenged as not taking cultural differences between participants and their providers sufficiently into account.

Health and physical performance. Physical performance measures have become a key mechanism to gather critical information in ways that do not rely on self-report. However, their use raises concerns as they add significantly to the cost of studies, report H. H. Atkinson and colleagues along with A. B. Newman. A concern that no one measure has emerged as the definitive predictor of ill health and mortality remains a challenge.

Morbidity and mortality predictors. In studies to date, contrary to expectations, measured morbidity appears to be a poor predictor of mortality with little agreement on markers to be studied. There are also calls for greater consideration of the influence of individual behavior, environmental access, and genetic effects on the emerging predictors.

Health care costs. The relationship between morbidity, treatments, positive health outcomes, and costs is proving to be complex, states D. C. Stanziano and colleagues, but many longitudinal studies do not collect sufficient data to be able to understand both the direct (actual costs) and indirect (e.g., consequences of expending resources on treatment services for chronic conditions among older adults rather than targeting the same resources on preventive steps at younger ages) health care costs.

Genetics. Although the collection of blood and tissue samples has been a feature of many longitudinal studies, genetic investigation of causes of aging is a more recent science. Nevertheless, there are promising longitudinal findings (see, e.g., studies by S. Tyas and colleagues on links between the presence of specific alleles and onset of dementia).

Despite limitations in findings, a number of insights have emerged: (1) Longitudinal studies have helped demonstrate that rates of decline vary among older adults, thereby offering the potential for strategies to prevent or slow such decline; (2) the temporal aspect of longitudinal studies has allowed for testing of whether risk factors in wave-one findings (or in other studies) predict later incidence of disease or changes in independence; (3) tracking of biological, socioeconomic, and psychological factors and highlighting their association with subsequent chronic disease has provided insights into risk factors that might be modifiable; (4) mechanisms that are associated with disease progression have been separated from those that predict onset of disease, and both have been tracked over time; (5) disease and disability pathways have been identified; and (6) the contribution of one condition to the emergence or the more rapid advancement of another or multiple conditions has been established. This has led, as J. M. Guralnick and S. B. Kritchevsky, along with A. B. Newman, to common conditions and characteristics being identified that predict both disease and disability as have commonalities in contributors to different chronic diseases.

Key Design Concerns

In the design of longitudinal studies, consideration must be given to the target population, variables that are likely to increase exposure to the phenomena of interest, data that will track outcomes, and variables that are potential confounds. There are five critical questions.

First, how narrow will the focus on outcomes be? A narrow focus will mean fewer questions and measures and therefore fewer burden on participants, but too narrow a focus may mean giving up opportunities to find unexpected outcomes.

Second, how likely are phenomena of interest to occur? This includes consideration of both the time element and frequency of incidence at each time period with resultant implications for sample size (low incidence at each time point may mean larger sample) and duration of the study (long period to occurrence may mean decades rather a decade of follow-up).

Third, how will missing data be handled? In the early days of longitudinal analysis, the loss of participants or incomplete data meant reliance on complete case analysis only, the carrying forward of prior data or reliance on traditional imputation techniques, which all carry costs in terms of the value of the data set and its findings over time. More recently, there has been consideration of missingness (completely at random, at random, and not at random), reliance on modeling frameworks and inferential paradigms, consideration of situations where missing data may be ignored, and greater reliance on sensitivity analysis; all of which are more possible with advances in statistical software, according to J. G. Ibrahim and G. Molensberghs.

Fourth, how will dropouts and deaths be handled? A longitudinal study of aging is necessarily of a vulnerable population over time, meaning that deaths are likely. Indeed, the occurrence of deaths is an outcome measure of interest. At some point, there is a risk for other outcomes of interest or that there will be too few members of a subgroup of interest, and in extreme cases as the time period advances for the sample overall, the same risk exists for the analyses contemplated. Most importantly, the loss of subjects introduces the potential of biased inferences. There are a range of statistical techniques to at least monitor if not manage such bias, and it may be necessary to replace missing subjects if the study is to continue. Often, replacement subjects are selected using the same techniques as the original sample, and again, report Y. Deng and colleagues, there are statistical techniques to identify and manage any potential resulting biases.

Fifth, what are the ethics of measurement? Normal expectations for the obtaining of informed consent for participants apply, but there are additional concerns over time in longitudinal studies of the aging that capacity to give consent may change. Another concern is that data gathering, whether by questionnaire or physical measure, may identify issues of concern (e.g., scoring as depressed on a standardized screening measure or having an extremely elevated blood pressure reading). Protocols are usually available in longitudinal studies for both monitoring of safety during interviews and for reporting clinically significant findings to the participant.

Limitations of Longitudinal Designs

The broad range of variables gathered in longitudinal studies is often important to gaining an understanding of both predictors and risk factors and of potential confounding factors, whether for the onset of disease conditions or for advancement of quality of life. Risk factors for disease in particular may lead to greater mortality or dropout for those at risk over time and greater representation of the risk factor in those lost to follow-up, resulting in the potential for bias in findings. Also, the contribution to the understanding of confounding factors is only as good as the variables included. Indeed, the unintended absence or poor measurement of what turns out to be a major confounding factor may instead mean that research is encouraged around the wrong factor or the strength of a confound is misunderstood. Finally, the experience of illness over time may have a direct or indirect effect on the risk factor, further influencing bias in findings about that risk factor.

Next Steps in Longitudinal Research Are Emerging

Probably one of the most significant aspects of longitudinal studies on aging has been their evolution. From a focus on understanding of predictors of ill health and challenged quality of life, they have moved to understanding exceptionalism, describe P. McCallion, R. Tappan, and J. G. Auslander: What is different about the person who lives to advanced old age without ill health? Does living longer equate with having quality in longer life? What is the aging experience of diverse groups? Are there steps we can take that may be demonstrated as resulting in changed health behaviors, which in turn result in improved health? What is the impact of new phenomena in older adult lives such as grandparent caregiving, intergenerational exchanges of resources, absence of children able to provide family caregiving supports? What are the contributors to and the significance of increased longevity among adults with lifelong disabilities or with multiple chronic conditions? What do we need to know about the interrelationship between health status, health care access, use and abuse of health interventions, hospitalizations, and health care costs.

These questions are influencing the development of supplemental and alternative questions in existing studies and influencing the establishment of new cohort and panel studies.

Philip McCallion
State University of New York, Albany

See Also: Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality; Aging and Adult Services; National Institute on Aging.

Further Readings

Anstey, K. J., et al. “Demographic, Health, Cognitive, and Sensory Variables as Predictors of Mortality in Very Old Adults.” Psychological Aging, v.16 (2001).

Atkinson, H. H., et al. “Cognitive Function, Gait Speed Decline, and Comorbidities: The Health, Aging, and Body Composition Study.” Journals of Gerontology Series: A Biological Sciences and Medical Sciences, v.62 (2007).

Bassuk, S. S., L. F. Berkman, and B. C. Amick III. “Socioeconomic Status and Mortality Among the Elderly: Findings From Four U.S. Communities.” American Journal of Epidemiology, v.155 (2002).

Deng, Y., D. S. Hillygus, J. P. Reiter, Y. Si, and S. Zheng. "Handling Attrition in Longitudinal Studies: The Case for Refreshment Samples." Statistical Science, v.28/2 (2013).

Guralnick, J. M. and S. B. Kritchevsky. "Translating Research to Promote Healthy Aging: The Complimentary Role of Longitudinal Studies and Clinical Trials." Journal of the American Geriatrics Society, v.58/2 (2010).

Ibrahim, J. G. and G. Molensberghs. "Missing Data Methods in Longitudinal Studies: A Review." Test, v.18/1 (2009).

McCallion, P. "Social Work Research and Ageing." In I. Shaw, K. Briar-Lawson, J. Orme, and R. Ruckdeschel, eds., Sage Handbook of Social Work Research. London. UK: Sage, 2009.

Newman, A. B. "An Overview of the Design, Implementation and Analyses of Longitudinal Studies on Aging." Journal of the American Geriatrics Society, v.58/2 (2010).

Stanziano, D. C., M. Whitehurst, P. Graham, and B. A. Roos. "A Review of Selected Longitudinal Studies on Aging: Past Findings and Future Directions." Journal of the American Geriatrics Society, v.58/2 (2010).

Tappan, R. and J. G. Auslander. "State of the Art in Longitudinal Studies on Aging: An Overview of the Supplement. Journal of the American Geriatrics Society, v.58/2 (2010).

Tyas, S., et al. "Healthy Ageing in the Nun Study: Definition and Neuropathological Correlates." Age Ageing, v.36 (2007).

Long-Term Residential Care

Long-term care (LTC) integrates a variety of services, both custodial and medical, to meet the needs of people suffering from disability or chronic illness. Most LTC patients are not able to care for themselves over long periods of time, sometimes temporarily, but most often permanently. Although most LTC is provided in the home or community day programs, residential programs such as assisted living facilities or nursing homes continue to grow. According to the Centers for Disease Control, life expectancy continues to increase in the United States as birth rates fall. With the aging of the U.S. population, both the demand and cost for LTC will continue to accelerate.

Although numerous factors impact the overall cost and various types of programs and services are available to assist with LTC services, the critical concerns to the LTC experience are the communication among patients, informal caregivers (often family), and health care providers. The following presents a description of (1) two types of LTC, (2) three delivery categories for LTC, (3) LTC costs, and (4) the role of communication studies in LTC.

The most common form of LTC is custodial care or help with the basic activities of daily life (ADL). Custodial care includes nonmedical activities such as bathing, grooming, using the toilet, preparing meals, housekeeping, and eating. Most custodial care is provided at no fee by family members, friends, or volunteers. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (USDHHS) estimates that 80 percent of caregivers are unpaid, and more than half have extensive or intensive care responsibilities. Community groups and service organizations offer entertainment, transportation, and meals for no, or a small, fee. All types of custodial care can also be provided by paid caregivers, both in the home and in residential facilities.

Medical LTC is generally provided by a skilled health care professional and can include functions such as skilled nursing, drug administration, and occupational and physical therapies. Skilled professional health care services such as oxygen, feeding tubes, or serial injections are often prescribed by a doctor or nurse practitioner and administered by trained caregivers. However, more and more frequently, unpaid caregivers, such as family members, provide such care as well. Additionally, home health care service companies and community organizations frequently offer various forms of medical LTC. Most residential facilities also provide some level of medical LTC ranging from 24-hour supervision to minor medical care.

Delivery of LTC is based on any combination of three methods: home based, community based, or facility based. Home-based care includes support services allowing the patient to remain as independent as possible while staying safe and healthy in a home. Most home-based care is provided by unpaid caregivers such as family members, friends, or volunteers; however, professional home-based services

A commonly recognized, facilities-based, long-term residential care option is a nursing home. Nursing homes provide skilled nursing and professional medical services as well as long-term, advanced custodial care. Nursing home residents may have private or shared rooms, and Medicare may provide some coverage based on a resident's income eligibility.

are available. Home health care providers offer medical LTC such as skilled nursing and drug administration. Homemaker services offer custodial care such as housekeeping, meal preparation, bathing and grooming, and other household labors. For those patients who live alone or have little human interaction, companion services offer short social visits. Finally, emergency response services offer professional response to medical emergencies like a fall.

Community-based care can be provided by local government, social services agencies, or privately funded companies. Senior centers, adult day care, transportation and meal services are typically offered on weekdays. Most community-based services are available at low cost, while others are free. Although some community-based services are restricted to those with low incomes, specific disabilities, or other limiting factors, many are available to all. Those needing these services can find help through the local Area Agency on Aging, the USDHHS, or primary care health providers.

Four primary types of facilities-based options are available. First, public housing is available to low- and moderate-income persons who are elderly or disabled. This subsidized housing option is available by applying to federal or state government programs. According to the USDHHS, most eligible persons have annual incomes of less than $46,000, while married couples have an annual income of less than $53,000. Services can include custodial and medical care. Second, assisted living is an available and growing option for those who need limited help with daily activities but desire to remain somewhat independent. Both custodial and limited medical care are included in this context. Select basic services are included in monthly rent, while supplementary services are available at additional fees. Residents generally live in individual units but often share meals and social activities.

A commonly recognized facilities-based option is the nursing home. Nursing homes provide skilled nursing and professional medical services as well as long-term, advanced custodial care. Nursing home residents may have private or shared rooms, and Medicare provides some coverage based on the resident's income eligibility. When entering a nursing home, persons can feel the loss of basic rights, privacy, and dignity; therefore, the Nursing Home Bill of Rights is mandated for all Medicare- and Medicaid-funded facilities. Notorious for institutional-style care, nursing homes are undergoing a recent culture change, stressing patient-centered care, hospitality, and customer service directed toward patients and their families.

Finally, continued care retirement communities (CCRCs) offer a tiered approach to long-term care that often provides great comfort to elderly or disabled persons and their families. Care is planned out for the long-term, from independent apartment living to skilled professional medical services, depending on the client's ability to care for him- or herself. Healthy persons may live independently in a single-family home or apartment then move to assisted living and, finally, to skilled nursing as their care dictates. CCRCs are the most expensive form of long-term care, with costs varying based on the general health and cognitive ability of the person, type of unit desired, and care needed. According to the American Association of Retired Persons (AARP), CCRC residents generally have three contract options: life-care contract, modified contract, and fee-for-service contract. Although the most expensive option, the life-care contracts offer unlimited services without additional charges. The modified contract offers specific services for a set fee for a particular time. After that specified length of time, fees are renegotiated. Fee-for-services contracts offer custodial and medical services at variable market rates.

Beyond the structure and administration of long-term care, human diversity and multicultural approaches to long-term care services have received heightened attention in recent years. Recipients of long-term care are growing in diversity as the same population expands. Health and social services workforces related to long-term care are also growing in numbers and becoming heterogeneous. Medical practitioners and program administrators are now challenged with assessing the cultural appropriateness of their organizations, both in the workforce and in those they serve.

Culturally sensitive care demonstrates respect for all participants and takes into account traits such as ethnicity, religious beliefs, education, and socioeconomic status. These traits all influence one's approach to health concerns and the types of services desired. Long-term care providers are increasingly striving to position a diverse workforce as a strength and offer useful products and services to multiple market segments regardless of ethnicity, religion, or education.

It is important for patients and families to consider the costs and funding of long-term care. According to the USDHHS, consumer surveys prove there are scores of misunderstandings regarding who pays for long-term care. Medicare only pays for skilled medical long-term care for a limited period of time. It does not pay for any custodial care. Medicaid pays for much of medical and custodial long-term care; however, persons must meet income maximums and other state and federal eligibility requirements. Multiple other federal- and state-funded programs exist, all with eligibility and population membership requirements. Private insurance companies' health insurance plans pay for those services generally covered by Medicare for short periods of time. Long-term care insurance is also available from private insurance companies and covers many types of custodial and medical care in a variety of delivery facilities. Such policies are subject to eligibility requirements such as general health at the time of application and preexisting conditions. Care providers can direct patients and families to a variety of models and examples of long-term health care plans at agencies including the USDHHS and AARP.

Communications

Several communication theories have been applied to study the communication challenges embedded in long-term health care communication. Social constructionism, detailed by Peter Berger and Thomas Luckmann, explores the objective, scientific voice of medicine and the subjective, humanistic voice of patients and families. Leslie Baxter's dialectical theory provides a framework for investigating fluctuation and tension within relationships during a health care crisis. Dale Brasher's uncertainty management theory allows for exploration of uncertainty around prognosis, treatment, identity, and social support issues for the patient, family, and health care providers. Sandra Petronio's communication privacy management theory furthers understanding about how patients and family members manage collective boundaries as a means to manage uncertainty, especially about prognosis and terminal illness. Finally, narrative approaches to health care communication can provide in-depth perspectives of patient, caregiver, and clinician experiences.

Effective communication is a vital component of quality LTC services, making it a likely setting for the study of health communication. Vital to all patient populations, decision making and ongoing activity surrounding LTC create an environment for critical communication about patient's desires, goals, and wishes for care central to quality of life. Communication challenges among patients, family members, friends, and health care providers are inherent in the LTC process from beginning to end.

Joy Goldsmith
Christine Platt
University of Memphis

See Also: Aging and Adult Services; Longitudinal Studies of Aging; National Institute on Aging.

Further Readings

American Association of Retired Persons (AARP). "Caregiver Resource Center: Resources and Assistance for Senior Care, Home Care, and Elderly Caregiving Needs." http://www.aarp.org/home-family/caregiving/planning-and-resources (Accessed October 2013).

Fowler, C. and C. L. Fisher. "Attitudes Toward Decision Making and Aging, and Preparation for Future Care Needs." Health Communication, v.24/7 (2009).

Gill, E. A. and M. Morgan. "Home Sweet Home: Conceptualizing and Coping With the Challenges of Aging and the Move to a Care Facility." Health Communication, v.26/4 (2011).

Huang, Y. and S. K. Garrett. "Defining Characteristics of Communication Quality in Culture-Changed Long-Term Healthcare Facilities." Journal of Communication in Healthcare, v.5/4 (2012).

Low-Income Housing Tax Credits

As cities are revitalized and professionals return to the urban housing market, low-income families are increasingly priced out. To help generate affordable housing stock, the federal government provides the Low-Income Housing Tax Credit (LIHTC) as an incentive. Often pronounced lie-tech, it is administered by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and ultimately deployed to for-profit and nonprofit housing developers. Initially intended as a replacement for lost rental housing incentives as part of the U.S. Tax Reform Act of 1986 (TRA86), it has also helped offset the loss of public housing units under HOPE VI (another HUD program). As large-scale housing projects are demolished and replaced by mixed-income developments, LIHTCs are often used by developers to set aside a portion of rental units for low-income households. Without this incentive, these units would be rented at fair-market rates rather than to those with housing vouchers or families in need of below-market housing costs. In the case of mixed-income development, the remainder of the units are rented or sold at fair-market value. This housing model encourages socioeconomic diversity among residents and is viewed as an intervention to high concentrations of poverty.

In 1937, federal housing programs began with the construction of the first public housing project. Designed to create jobs and temporarily house families facing economic hardship, these eventually became multigenerational communities for the poorest citizens, particularly African Americans. Due to underfunding, the infrastructure declined, crime increased, and much-needed human services programs and commerce left. In the 1980s, poverty researchers revealed that public housing was merely warehousing, and people were less likely to become economically self-sufficient. Federal housing policies shifted, and Congress responded. The LIHTC provision encourages the creation of affordable housing by the private sector. Investors receive dollar-for-dollar credit against their federal tax liability for up to 10 years, provided the property remains in compliance.

LIHTC Eligibility and Occupancy Requirements

To receive a tax credit, projects must meet qualification standards. Foremost, it must be a residential rental property. Most often, rental properties are eligible for LIHTC if they also meet HOME eligibility. HOME, another HUD program, provides grants to state and local governments for the sole purpose of increasing housing opportunities for low-income populations and is more flexible than LIHTC. Oftentimes, LIHTC and HOME funds are combined in the same loan package to allow for greater financial leveraging. Once approved, many developers sell the LIHTC credits to investors in exchange for capital or equity. With lower debt, housing units can then be offered at below-market prices.

The project must also meet one of the two low-income occupancy thresholds. These thresholds set the minimum number of units that must be rent and utility cost restricted. They also establish the household average median income rule for occupancy. It is noteworthy that only the affordable housing units within the project receive tax credits. Thus, nonprofit developers are more likely to designate higher portions, often 100 percent, as affordable housing. By comparison, for-profit developers will often comply with the minimal percentage in order to offset debt but allow for maximal profit. In order to claim or sell tax credits on a project, the developer must work closely with the allocating agency to assure the eligible basis is calculated correctly.

LIHTC Allocation and Administration

While HUD is the federal agency responsible for implementation and oversight, the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) deploys LIHTC to designated state agencies. This tax credit allocation is determined by the number of state residents rather than poverty levels, cost of living, and demand for quality affordable housing. As such, this has resulted in housing disparities among different geographies throughout the United States. This is a function of economy rather than poor planning on the part of the state or local urban planning agencies. HUD oversight requires each state allocating agency have an approved plan for tax credit utilization. These credits must be deployed within two years of the allocation, or they revert back to the federal pool for reallocation.

The receiving agency is often a quasi-governmental housing finance agency created by the state and granted authority to conduct business of the state. In the case of housing agencies, they undertake various programs to assist with financing of low- and moderate-income housing needs. With a nongovernmental structure, they can more readily work with federal, state, and local government units as well as establish partnerships with banks and lending institutions and for-profit and nonprofit developers. IRS rules require that 10 percent of the tax credit allocation be set aside for nonprofit housing development projects. These nonprofit developers are often community development corporations that use the tax credits to leverage additional funding sources.

LIHTC Impact

As public policy increasingly shifts low-income housing from the government sector to the private sector, LIHTC is crucial for generating affordable housing stock. As much as 90 percent of affordable housing is currently created as a result of this incentive, and since its inception, the LIHTC has helped stimulate almost 2.4 million affordable housing units throughout the United States. This tax incentive not only counteracted the loss of rental housing tax incentives, but it has also helped replace lost public housing units. Although many community development corporations and housing agencies have developed programs to promote low-income home ownership, this population segment is more likely to rent than own. Hence, this incentive is essential for meeting the housing needs of those who fall below the economic norm of an area.

Denese M. Neu
National Louis University

See Also: Community Development Corporations; Housing Services; Poverty; Quality of Life, Measurement of; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; Social and Economic Justice; Socioeconomic Status; Urban Communities and Human Services.

Further Readings

Khadduri, J. and David Rodda. Making the Best Use of Your LIHTC Dollars: A Planning Paper for State Policy Makers. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, 2004.

Wardrip, K., Laura Williams, and Suzanne Hague. The Role of Affordable Housing in Creating Jobs and Stimulating Local Economic Development: A Review of the Literature. Washington, DC: Center for Housing Policy, 2011.

M

Marriage and Family Therapists

Marriage and family therapists provide services in all segments of the mental health care and human services arena, according to the American Association for Marriage and Family Therapy (AAMFT). Included in this entry is (1) a description of a marriage and family therapist, (2) a brief historical context of marriage and family therapists, (3) an explanation of the qualifications needed to become a marriage and family therapist, (4) a discussion of whom marriage and family therapists work with, (5) a description of the type of mental health and behavioral issues that marriage and family therapists often address and treat, and (6) a summary of the settings where marriage and family therapists typically work.

What Is a Marriage and Family Therapist?

While individual therapists focus on the individual and the intrapsychic influences on behavior, the Bureau of Labor Statistics indicates that marriage and family therapists assess, diagnose, and treat behavioral dysfunction, mental illness, and psychological distress within the context of the marriage and family system. Marriage and family therapists have an extensive knowledge of family systems and ascribe to a systems perspective. A systems perspective suggests that families are systems of interrelated and interdependent individuals that cannot be viewed in isolation.

What Is the Historical Context of Marriage and Family Therapists?

The field of marriage and family therapy is relatively new when compared to other health disciplines. M. P. Nichols and R. C. Schartz, two prominent researchers in the field, have written extensively about the history of family therapy and family therapists. They note that, in the 1950s, researchers and clinicians began to make claims that the family and family interactions had an impact on individuals' behavior and mental health. For example, Gregory Bateson, who is often referred to as the founder of family therapy, formed the Palo Alto group in 1956. This group introduced concepts and theories to suggest that the symptoms of schizophrenia could be understood within the context of families. While much of these findings have been disproven over time, the group is credited for their early research into the impact of families on an individual's well-being. Other pioneers of marriage and family therapy include Murray Bowen for his work at the Menninger Clinic and the National Institute of Mental Health. Additionally, pioneer marriage and family therapists, like Virginia Satir, Carl Whitaker, and Salvador Minuchin, are often credited for their early work in the field.

Since the birth of marriage and family therapists, professional organizations have supported and substantiated their work. A. Carr, a well-recognized researcher in the field, writes that the American Association of Marriage Counselors was founded in 1942, later becoming the American Association of Marriage and Family Therapists (AAMFT) in 1978. Currently, the AAMFT continues to be the primary professional association for marriage and family therapists, facilitating research, theory development, and education.

What Types of Qualifications Are Needed?

Historically, marriage and family therapists have come from diverse educational backgrounds including psychology, social work, nursing, psychiatry, counseling, and education. Educational qualifications include either a master's degree (typically two to three years) or a doctoral degree (typically three to five years). Some marriage and family therapists choose to enroll in postgraduate clinical training programs (typically three to four years). After graduation from an accredited program, a period of post-degree supervised clinical experience is necessary before licensure or certification. This is typically two to three years in length. When the supervision period is completed, the therapist is approved to take a state licensing exam or the national examination for marriage and family therapists conducted by the AAMFT Regulatory Boards. This exam is used as a licensure requirement in the majority of states. In fact, currently a total of 50 states have a requirement for marriage and family licensure. However, requirements vary by state. Typically, therapists who are licensed are referred to as licensed marriage family therapists (LMFTs). In order to be eligible for licensure, some states require that the therapist graduate from a program that is accredited by the Commission on Accreditation for Marriage and Family Education (COAMFTE) or a program accredited by Council for Accreditation of Counseling and Related Educational Programs (CACREP). Marriage and family therapists can also practice if they are certified as a national certified counselor (NCC), a licensed professional counselor (LPC), a licensed clinical social worker (LCSW), or a licensed psychologist.

Who Do They Work With?

While marriage and family therapists understand their clients' symptoms and behavioral patterns in a familial and social context, they work not only with the entire family, but with individuals, couples, and groups. The AAMFT indicates that marriage and family therapists can also provide premarital counseling, relationship counseling, child counseling, and separation and divorce counseling.

Marriage and family therapists work with a diverse clientele (i.e., race, ethnicity, gender, age, socioeconomic status, religion, sexual orientation, and disability, etc.). Thus, educational programs are obligated to provide training that facilitates the development of multiculturally competent marriage and family therapists. When working with clients, marriage and family therapists are ethically obligated to employ cultural sensitivity when working with clients. Cultural sensitivity refers to the knowledge, personal awareness, and interpersonal skills that allow providers to work with individuals from cultures other than their own. In addition to cultural sensitivity, marriage and family therapists integrate and incorporate social context into the therapeutic process with all clients. Further, clinicians are encouraged to deliver interventions and integrate helping theories that are sensitive to the unique needs of their clients.

What Issues Are Treated?

There are some struggles that are particularly suitable for a marriage and family therapist. Nichols and Schwartz write that marriage and family therapists are trained specifically to work with issues relating to marriage and other intimate relationships, divorce, and family transitions. Commonly, families with an adolescent will seek family therapy to address the shifts in developmental needs of the adolescent. In addition to these specific issues, marriage and family therapists can also evaluate and treat various mental health disorders and behavioral problems. For example, on a routine basis, marriage and family therapists may work with different client issues such as self-esteem, self-harm, depression, anxiety, grief, anger, and relationship problems.

Where Do They Work?

Marriage and family therapists work in a wide variety of employment areas, with the majority of practitioners providing direct services with clients. For example, marriage and family therapists may work in outpatient care centers, individual and family services, community mental health centers, social service agencies, and the offices of other health care providers. Other common work settings include private practices, inpatient mental health facilities, courts and prisons, schools, Head Start centers, universities, research centers, and health clinics. Further, some marriage and family therapists may work for health maintenance organizations, employee assistance programs, and business and consulting companies. While most segments of the health care arena have been mentioned, approximately half of all marriage and family therapists work in private practice. One-quarter of marriage and family therapists are located in institutional or organizational settings, and the remaining clinicians practice in both.

Laurie M. Craigen
Tammi E. Milliken
Old Dominion University

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Family Services; Marriage and Family Therapy.

Further Readings

American Association for Marriage and Family Therapy (AAMFT). http://www.aamft.org/iMIS15/AAMFT/Home/AAMFT/Default.aspx?hkey=ee4a9da3-cfca-40b49a91-40448976ac25 (Accessed December 2013).

Bureau of Labor and Statistics. "Marriage and Family Therapists." Occupational Outlook Handbook, 2012–2013. http://www.bls.gov/oes/current/oes211013.htm (Accessed December 2013).

Carr, A. Family Therapy: Concepts, Process, and Practice, 3rd ed. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell, 2012.

Gehart, D., and A.R. Tuttle. Theory-Based Treatment Planning for Marriage and Family Therapists: Integrating Theory and Practice. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Cengage Learning, 2002.

Neukrug, E. A Brief Orientation to Counseling: Professional Identity, History, and Standards. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 2013.

Nichols, M. P. and R. C. Schartz. The Essentials of Family Therapy, 2nd ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson, 2005.

Smith-Acuna, S. Systems Theory in Action: Applications to Individual, Couple, and Family Therapy. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2010.

Wilcoxon, S. A., T. P. Remley, and S. T. Gladding. Ethical, Legal, and Professional Issues in the Practice of Marriage and Family Therapy, 5th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson, 2012.

Marriage and Family Therapy

Marriage and family therapy, also known as couples and family therapy, is a specialty field of psychotherapy that works to achieve a diverse range of therapeutic goals involving individuals, couples, groups, and families. This branch of therapy focuses on intimate and family relationship dysfunction, emphasizing and promoting healthy dynamics, frequently from a systems perspective. The systems perspective sees couples and families as interconnected parts of a system that cannot be treated in isolation from each other. While marriage and family therapists are trained to deal with many mental health concerns, such as depression, anxiety, or substance abuse, the focus of this specialty is on relationship counseling, premarital counseling, separation and divorce counseling, and child counseling.

Whether the problems identified in sessions focus on one individual or the entire family, marriage and family therapy generally operates from the perspective that family involvement contributes to the development of solutions and healing. The models and theories common to marriage and family therapy, such as Salvador Minuchin's Structural Family Therapy, have had wide-reaching influence on the field of human services for adults and children and can be found in practice in many clinical settings such as outpatient counseling, in-home services, juvenile justice programming, and inpatient care. There are wide ranges of clients interested in receiving couples or family counseling, which requires therapists to be competent in multicultural and diversity counseling skills. For example, clients for marriage and family counseling can come from broad socioeconomic backgrounds or diverse ethnic heritage, sexual orientations, or ability statuses. In addition, the definition of family within the field has expanded beyond the traditional concept of parents and their biological offspring. Today, families can be defined by supportive, caring, and committed roles and relationships among individuals who may or may not be connected through biology or a legally binding commitment.

Professional Training of Marriage and Family Therapists

Most professional mental health clinicians have some basic training in marriage and family counseling; however, specific training is needed to become a certified or licensed marriage and family therapist. Specialty training for marriage and family therapy usually includes a master's degree focused in this area or additional coursework beyond a master's degree in fields such as counseling, psychology, or social work. While states differ on the qualifications needed for certification and licensure, in general, one must have a master's degree in counseling (or a closely related field), receive specific training in couples and family counseling, complete 3,000 hours of internship under a licensed professional in the field, and pass an approved state exam to qualify as a Marriage and Family Therapist (MFT) or a Licensed Marriage and Family Therapist (LMFT). A key component of quality marriage and family training programs is the emphasis on working with multiculturally diverse populations. Marriage, couple, and family makeup displays a broad range of diversity within society, and it is essential for marriage and family therapists to accept all clients with dignity and respect and have the training necessary to work with diverse populations.

There are two main professional organizations devoted to marriage and family therapy: the American Association of Marriage and Family Therapy (AAMFT), with more than 25,000 members in the United States, and the smaller International Association of Marriage and Family Counselors (IAMFC), a division of the American Counseling Association (ACA). Both associations are committed to supporting the work of marriage and family therapists via research, training and education, standards setting, and advocacy efforts on the local, regional, national, and international levels.

The Practice of Marriage and Family Therapy

Marriage and family therapy shares many of the core psychotherapy and counseling techniques basic to master's and doctoral-level training in counseling, psychology, social work, and related fields. These core techniques include skills like unconditional positive regard, usage of summarizing and paraphrasing, empathy, and developing a strong rapport or therapeutic bond with clients. Family therapy in many ways looks like other forms of therapy and shares similar time limits (45, 60, or 90 minutes) and duration (generally five to 20 sessions). Family therapy is regularly conducted in the same clinic, office, or agency as individual and group therapy. Additional techniques specific to marriage and family therapy are often incorporated into the counseling process; these approaches encourage family member interactions, highlight connections between family members, and promote input from each member present. The primary distinguishing feature of marriage and family therapy is the emphasis on problems being interrelated with others rather than within the individual independent of others. However, marriage and family therapists from certain theoretical perspectives, such as psychodynamic, may also emphasize the compounding impact of internal individual client dynamics on family systems. Regardless of the theoretical orientation of the counselor, marriage and family therapists focus their work on the dynamics among individuals.

Some couples and families may enter this form of therapy expecting to focus on one problem individual, often called the identified patient or scapegoat. Marriage and family therapy works to generalize problems and solutions to the couple or family group rather than just this identified patient. Thus, marriage and family therapists align with the systems viewpoint, understanding problems do not happen in isolation in families and require work within the entire couple or family system to achieve solutions.

Marriage and family therapy can occur in many different settings beyond the traditional outpatient clinic. The approach has been frequently used for in-home services, where the family counseling sessions are provided in the naturalistic environment of the family's home. This approach to family therapy allows for the viewing of problems and solutions through the lens of the environment in which they occur. However, providing in-home family counseling can present unique challenges to therapy. For instance, distractions are more difficult to anticipate and control in a home setting as opposed to the confines of an outpatient office. Depending on the theoretical background of the therapist, these challenges may be worth confronting in order to develop the most appropriate treatment to complex relational problems. Other therapists prefer to focus their work in the traditional outpatient office environment.

Family and couples therapy is often incorporated as a component to inpatient counseling, either for psychiatric hospitalizations or for substance abuse treatment. Families, spouses, children, or significant others may be invited to family days or to special couples and family sessions in these therapy settings. Understanding the client individually through one-on-one counseling, interpersonally through group counseling, and as part of a family unit through marriage and family counseling allows for a holistic approach to treatment in these settings.

Marriage and family counseling is also incorporated into pastoral or spiritual counseling, especially when connected to premarital, separation, or divorce counseling. Whatever the setting or the focus of treatment, marriage and family therapy works to resolve dysfunctional symptoms and problems occurring within the context of intimate and familial relationships.

Marriage and family therapists are encouraged to embrace diverse populations regarding race, ethnicity, gender, sexual orientation, religious or spiritual beliefs, ability status, socioeconomic status, veteran status, and other diversity categories. Couple, marriage, and family definitions are diverse within society, and marriage and family therapists need to be appropriately prepared to provide quality services to all clients, regardless of diversity or multicultural differences. This includes self-awareness about conceptions of marriage, families, and couples; understanding of the multiplicity of diverse families; and culturally competent skills to work with that diversity.

Key Theorists and Ideas

Several key therapists and theorists have had broad influence on the field of marriage and family therapy. Some of these individuals include Virginia Satir, Salvador Minuchin, Gregory Bateson, Murray Bowen, and Carl Whitaker. The models, principles, and techniques these pioneers developed stretch beyond marriage and family therapy to influence the larger field of psychotherapy as well as the fields of human services, education, communication, coaching, and even business management.

For example, Structural Family Therapy, developed by Salvador Minuchin, looks at important concepts such as disengaged (or disconnected) family members versus enmeshed (or overly entangled) family members. His model of therapy charts the relationships among family members emphasizing boundary issues and power dynamics. Structural family therapists attempt to alter family dysfunction and aim to create healthier patterns of interaction.

Murray Bowen, a main contributor to systemic therapy, also emphasized key components of dysfunction that occur in family relationships. He used the term triangulation to describe the process where two family members who have problems with each other will pull in a third family member in an attempt to resolve their problems by shifting focus or blame. This unhealthy triangle places two people on the inside of the problem and one on the outside, thus two individuals experience conflict as the third individual can step outside the triangle and observe. Family members caught in this triangle may unconsciously work to become the member on the outside, shifting back and forth depending on perceived benefit of the position. Rather than dealing directly with problems, this process permits family members to reduce anxiety and avoid confrontation or resolution of the real problem.

There are many other important pioneers like Satir, Bateson, and Whitaker, who contributed to the field of marriage and family therapy by considering factors such as the influence of low self-esteem on relationships and the contribution of families on individual well-being. Each theorist left a distinct mark that influences newer models of therapy, such as Multisystemic Therapy, an approach that incorporates systems theory and in-home family therapy to work with teens at risk of out-of-home placement due to delinquency or family problems (i.e., neglect or truancy). Many other models exist that incorporate ideas from marriage and family therapy theorists and techniques.

Kevin C. Snow
Tammi Milliken
Laurie Craigen
Old Dominion University

See Also: Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development; Family Therapy; Marriage and Family Therapists.

Further Readings

American Association for Marriage and Family Therapy. http://www.aamft.org/iMIS15/AAMFT (Accessed October 2013).

International Association of Marriage and Family Counselors. http://www.iamfconline.org (Accessed October 2013).
Nichols, M. P. and R. C. Schartz. The Essentials of Family Therapy, 2nd ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson, 2005.
Smith-Acuna, S. Systems Theory in Action: Applications to Individual, Couple, and Family Therapy. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley, 2010.

Marriage Counseling

Historically, marriage counseling in the United States was an outgrowth and extension of individual psychotherapy and occurred at the approximate time of the advent of family therapy. Like individual psychotherapy, models of marriage counseling traditionally favored Eurocentric and Caucasian worldviews. Although this has changed considerably—with modern marriage counselors employing a diverse range of theories and taking multicultural course work and continuing education addressing characteristics such as race, ethnicity, gender, and sexual orientation—marriage counselors must strive and are expected to become multiculturally competent. This is true whether they operate in either private practice or within agencies, centers, or institutes devoted to better understanding of communication and interactional patterns between married spouses or partners.

Private practitioners generally operate out of offices and counsel those who have the means to pay for counseling treatment out of pocket or are reimbursed by third-party private health insurers. Marriage counselors working within agencies, centers, or institutes often provide counseling to underserved populations and those with fewer means to pay for services based upon what is termed a sliding-fee scale. This takes into account the number of household members and income, which results in low or no fees whatsoever to the clients themselves offset by state or federal grants to meet the needs of the underinsured and those traditionally requiring supportive assistance. Those operating in the public sector may be more apt to encounter marriages with multiple problems exacerbated by the lack of community or familial support. Those marriage counselors operating in private practice may well encounter similar situations; however, counseling emphasis may be placed upon the primary problem rather than secondary supportive functions. Regardless of whether one serves in a private or public practice capacity, he or she will encounter myriad presenting problems and marital issues in need of resolve.

Marriage counseling may be performed by many different mental health professionals, be they a clinical social worker, psychologist, or counselor.

Professional Training of Marriage Counselors

Marriage counseling may in effect be performed by many different mental health professionals, be they a clinical social worker, psychologist, or counselor. The major difference is the focus of services, theory adhered, and educational background. Regardless, each respective professional may offer formalized marital counseling and psychological assistance. Although some universities offer specialized tracks or degrees in marriage and family counseling particularly at the doctoral level, generally a master's degree with supervised practicum or internship in clinical mental health counseling or marriage and family therapy is all that is required. Both mental health counselors and marriage and family therapists post-degree must be subsequently clinically supervised for a specified period of time and number of client hours, pass a state-recognized national examination, and complete annual continuing education requirements in order to become licensed, which is a requirement to practice. Further, in order to receive third-party reimbursement from health care providers, practitioners must be fully or provisionally licensed (i.e., undergoing required supervision). Noteworthy, at present, is the fact that licensed professional counselors and marriage and family therapists are unable to be reimbursed by Medicare, whereas licensed psychologists and clinical social workers are covered by current legislation. While marriage counseling may appear to be less emotionally demanding than providing family therapy itself, marriage counselors enter into a unique counseling relationship with the spouses and as such are aware of certain intimate marital aspects of their clients' lives perhaps unknown to others, which may necessitate utmost care and concern as well as mandate ethical and professional practice.

Of particular note is that marriage counseling and marital therapy are relatively newer fields, thus other disciplines such as social work and psychology may be better known to potential clients or consumers. Therefore, it appears omni-important for marriage counselors to become advocates for their specialty as well as align themselves with professional organizations such as the American Counseling Association (ACA) and American Association for Marriage and Family Therapy (AAMFT) as well as respective core social and cultural diversity competencies such as utilizing culturally sensitive approaches and delivering interventions that address special needs of clients (e.g., culture, gender, age, socioeconomic status, disability, and couple and family makeup). By maintaining professional linkages, becoming apprised of relevant competencies, and staying connected, marriage counselors and therapists may contribute to the ongoing dialogue and take part in the evolution of the fields, which are ever transforming.

More than ever, with the purported high divorce rates, it is vital that marriage counselors also advertise services by varying means available to effectively compete with other service providers. Furthermore, although marriage counseling and marriage therapy is at times used interchangeably, some construe marital therapy to be more intensive versus marital counseling. This would seemingly appear dependent upon the theoretical orientation and methods and techniques employed by the practitioner him- or herself. By way of example, a marriage counselor or therapist for that matter might choose to examine the long-term origins of the marital discord by focusing upon historical family systems and generational dynamics, whereas another may be inclined to focus on shorter-term spousal patterns in the here and now and prospective future via solution rather than problem focus.

Practicing Marriage Counseling

Many marriage counselors working in private practices maintain a full-time caseload, averaging approximately 20 clients or more per week or, conversely, keep a small part-time practice in addition to another job (e.g., counselor educator seeing a limited caseload). Consideration for private practitioners include acquiring or sharing office space, personnel, and overhead costs in addition to maintaining malpractice insurance, securing accounting and legal advisors to assist in forming a limited liability corporation business entity, as well as innumerable other important details that should not be overlooked. Marriage counselors working in the public sphere, such as agencies, centers, or institutes, often maintain a more extensive caseload with clients scheduled, at times, back to back for 50 minute sessions with 10 minutes between sessions utilized for case notes and record purposes, leaving little time in the average day for personal needs beyond the occasional break, scheduled-in supervisory session, in-service training, or responses to the inevitable crises and immediate client needs posed when dealing with real-world, daily marital and human problems.

Quite often, private practitioners may seek out consultation on a particularly challenging case, and provisional licensees (i.e., supervisees) may seek out their direct supervisor or clinic supervisor on call, which often occurs on a rotating basis, for particularly difficult cases that require a more highly trained and experienced seasoned professional counselor's guidance. Even supervisors themselves are required to undergo a period of sup-of-sup, or supervision of supervision, in order to hone their supervisory as well as administrative and clinical mental health case management skills. While marriage counselors and agency or clinic supervisors experience varied daily schedules often perceived by most to be a reward of the job in terms of workplace flexibility, increasing paperwork and bureaucratic constraints as well as managed care cost containment, and utilization review practices call for what some perceive as extraordinary practices, which must be rendered in order to validate treatment effectiveness and account for reimbursement of service provision.

Marriage or Couples Counseling?

When the term marriage counseling was coined and brought into the United States' public consciousness, it represented an era of traditionally married husband and wife as spouses seeking services in the 1950s. Since that time, there have been, for some, a recognition and revelation of sorts that the term couples counseling better encompasses the modern conception of extending marital counseling to include premarital, relationship, and same-sex marriage counseling. It should also be noted that there remains debate within the field among practitioners and theorists as to whether marriage or couples counseling can be conducted solely with one spouse or partner, as it were, coming in for treatment. Irrespective of one's stance, marriage counseling is normatively viewed as exclusionary by a number of professional organizations, with couples counseling gaining growth and momentum among practitioners and clients alike for its inclusion of gay and lesbian couples unable to be married in certain states as well as those in committed cohabiting relationships. Although the future of marriage counseling is bright in terms of job outlook, the terminology undoubtedly will continue to provoke controversy.

Todd Gomez
Northeastern State University

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Family Therapy; Marriage and Family Therapy; Marriage and Family Therapists; Same-Sex Couples/Marriage; Social Workers.

Further Readings

Lewis, Carolyn Herbst. "Making Marriage Work: A History of Marriage and Divorce in the Twentieth-Century United States." Journal of the History of Sexuality, v.22 (2013).

Long, Lynn L. and Mark E. Young. Counseling and Therapy for Couples. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 2007.

Neukrug, Ed. The World of the Counselor: An Introduction to the Counseling Profession. Belmont, CA: Brooks/Cole, 2012.

U.S. Department of Labor, "Occupational Outlook Handbook (OOH)." http://www.bls.gov/ooh/community-and-social-service/mental-health-counselors-and-marriage-and-family-therapists.htm (Accessed August 2013).

Maternal/Infant Health Services

Maternal and infant health services are part of U.S. public health with a focus on keeping women healthy while pregnant and caring for infants after birth. This kind of public health service also works to determine the future health of new generations and predict possible challenges for families, communities, and the health care system. Maternal and infant health are concerned with a wide range of health conditions, behaviors, and systems that affect health, wellness, and the quality of life of women, children, and families. Pregnancy provides a useful opportunity to identify existing health issues and risks in women to acknowledge future health problems for them and their children. Such risks might include hypertension and heart disease, diabetes, depression, genetic conditions, sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), substance abuse, poor nutrition, and unhealthy weight. Pregnancy-related complications might be reduced by identifying them early and increasing access to preconception, interconception, and gestative care. Healthy births and early identification and treatment of health conditions in infants could prevent death or disability, allowing children to grow up healthy, strong, and to their full potential.

There are many conditions that impact maternal and infant health care, especially factors that affect pregnancy and childbirth. Such factors include preconception health status, age, access to health care, poverty and class status, stress levels at home and work, and exposure to environmental toxins. Women who find themselves in lower income brackets or held back by racial or ethnic socioeconomic boundaries are at a disadvantage for early and regular health care for themselves before, during, and after pregnancy. Their children, likewise, are affected by the differences in care across race, ethnic, and class boundaries.

Certain populations in the United States are at a lesser advantage for maternal and infant health care due to their marginalization within society and differences of cultural practices and beliefs. Immigrant women, for example, are often at a disadvantage due to the language barrier; not being fluent in English is one way nonnative speakers are at a disadvantage because they may not get accurately translated information. Additionally, nonnative speakers are at a disadvantage because they might not have suitable transportation to clinics offering public health services. Immigrant woman are largely disadvantaged economically, and this is reflected in their health status, general living conditions, and less access to health care services. Maternal and infant public health services, therefore, are great assets within culturally diverse populations because of the access to varied types of health care across class, race, ethnicity, and religious affiliation.

Maternal Health Programs in the United States

Individual states in the United States have particular programs designed to care for women and children regionally. Such health programs are administered in rural, urban, and native communities through federally qualified health centers, hospitals, or clinics. Such services do not only treat the body but provide psychosocial assessments, coordinate services with Medicaid, arrange transportation services, and refer patients to local community services for things like mental health, substance abuse, domestic violence, other basic needs, and local childbirth education or parenting classes. Children's cognitive and physical development is influenced by the health, nutrition, and behaviors of their mothers. Breast milk is generally known to be the best form of nutrition for infants because it provides several benefits essential for health, growth, and immunity. Stable, safe, and nurturing families and communities are better for children's development.

The Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, part of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, administers community-based programs designed to assure adequate and quality prenatal and pediatric care. Additionally, it offers support services to ensure access to care and provide family planning services. These services are designed to assist pregnant women, infants, and children with special accommodations, from medical to environmental to social needs. The bureau's main focus is on reducing infant mortality.

Such programs are made possible because of the 1935 program Title V Maternal and Child Health Program, part of the Social Security Act. Title V was converted to a block grant program in 1981 and has continued to assure access to and assist in providing quality health care for low-income families or those with limited availability of care. This program is funded by a grant that is applied for every year by state maternal and child health agencies. Every five years, each state must also conduct a statewide, comprehensive needs assessment in order to identify state priorities, a way of evaluating how to best address the needs of the maternal and child health population. The Maternal and Child Health Bureau has worked with state programs to build a data capacity at the federal and state levels to identify population-based services.

Some specific services that focus on maternal and infant health include prenatal care of the mother, which is often overlooked, by a perinatologist, an obstetrician, or gynecologist with complete specialty training of complex medical problems relating to pregnancy; a perinatologist is also known as a maternal–fetal medicine specialist. These problems might be obstetrical, medical, surgical, or pertaining to genetic complications and may occur during pregnancy, childbirth, or postnatal or postpartum. This type of doctor diagnoses and treats women with pregnancy complications, manages a woman's medical condition as related to pregnancy, and manages a pregnancy as it relates to a woman's preexisting conditions. A perinatologist treats a patient when referred to by the primary obstetrician and works with him or her throughout the pregnancy; he or she might also be an educator and researcher of cutting-edge methods for diagnosing and treating problems and therefore is often sought after to lecture and share information.

Maternal and infant care, both prior to and after birth, must be closely evaluated and continued throughout the course of a pregnancy and neonatal care. Its tie to public health services is an important step in intervening in some of the difficulties women of color in America experience. Without the same opportunities of white women in the middle and upper classes, women who are in racial and ethnic minorities and the lower working class or below the poverty line rely on public health services to assist them in having healthy pregnancies, birthing healthy infants, and raising them in stable, supportive, and health-conscious environments.

Stephanie Salerno
Lara Lengel
Bowling Green State University

See Also: Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development; Behavioral Health Disparities for Racial and Ethnic Minority Populations; Border Communities; Business Incubator; Dominican Americans; Hispanic Americans; Hispanic Immigrants; Mexican Americans; Public Health; Puerto Ricans.

Further Readings

Bryant, Alison S., Ayaba Worjoloh, Aaron B. Caughey, and A. Eugene Washington. "Racial/Ethnic Disparities in Obstetric Outcomes and Care: Prevalence and Determinants." American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology, v.202 (2010).

Fraser, Michael. "Bringing It All Together: Effective Maternal and Child Health Practice as a Means to Improve Public Health." Maternal and Child Health Journal, v.17 (2013).

Larson, Kandyce and Neal Halfon. "Family Income Gradients in the Health and Health Care Access of U.S. Children." Maternity and Child Health Journal, v.14 (2010).

Leiss, Jack K. and Jonathan B. Kotch. "The Importance of Children's Environmental Health for the Field of Maternal and Child Health: A Wake-Up Call." Maternal and Child Health Journal, v.14 (2010).

Thomsen, Sarah, et al. "Promoting Equity to Achieve Maternal and Child Health." Reproductive Health Matters, v.19 (2011).

Tucker, Myra J., Cynthia J. Berg, William M. Callaghan, and Jason Hsia. "The Black–White Disparity in Pregnancy Related Mortality From 5 Conditions: Differences in Prevalence and Case-Fatality Rates." American Journal of Public Health, v.97 (2007).

Williams, David R. and Michelle Sternthal. "Understanding Racial/Ethnic Disparities in Health: Sociological Contribution." Journal of Health and Social Behavior, v.51 (2010).

Maternity Homes

Maternity homes are homes for unwed expectant mothers. There were approximately 300 maternity homes in the United States in the 1960s. That number has dramatically declined since then because social attitudes toward single pregnant women have moderated. Approximately 95 percent of unmarried women now choose to keep their babies. In addition, both abortion and reliable birth control have reduced the number of women with unwanted pregnancies. During the 1800s, Victorian ladies of goodwill created shelters for unwed pregnant women. The first maternity home was founded by the Salvation Army in 1886. The early homes were usually run by religious orders. The purpose was to prepare "fallen" white women for lives on the fringe of society; the illegitimate status of the offspring made them unsuitable for adoption. Unwed pregnant black women were largely excluded from maternity housing, relying on their families for support.

Following World War II, children changed from economic necessities to social necessities, which created a desire in infertile couples to adopt white babies. The number of illegitimate children increased with the return of the servicemen. Even today, it costs less to adopt a minority child than a white baby. Maternity housing peaked in the 1960s, offering women a place where they could go in order to escape the stigma associated with unplanned and unwed pregnancies. Maternity homes were now run by professional social workers, and the clients were seen as redeemable, although they remained overwhelmingly white. Society decided that unmarried mothers could be rehabilitated or married off after being pregnant and giving birth. Maternity homes and policies that had been devised to help mothers and children stay together became the means to separate them as adopting out the baby meant that the mother was redeemed and she returned to society to fulfill her proper role as wife and mother.

However, with the decriminalization of abortion, the widespread availability of birth control, as well as changing attitudes toward single parenting, the number of maternity homes dramatically dropped. Currently, many maternity homes are publicly funded social services programs that provide much-needed housing to homeless pregnant minors. Others are small private facilities that may have religious affiliations. Some group homes are allied with adoption agencies.

In the past, a maternity home was a place of secrecy and seclusion, where pregnant women and teens could hide until their babies were born. The young women typically assumed false identities to conceal their shame along with their pregnancies.

The Salvation Army Women's Home and Hospital, now The Salvation Army's Booth Brown House, is a 1912 brick Tudor Revival-style building designed by Clarence H. Johnston, Sr., in Saint Paul, Minnesota, and listed on the U.S. National Register of Historic Places. The Salvation Army originally used it to provide housing and hospital care for unwed mothers and their children.

They worked at the home to pay for their stay. Rules were generally strict. The girls were not prepared for childbirth. Their babies were then placed for adoption, and the girls returned to their regular lives after their extended "vacation."

According to C. Edwards and E. Williams, the typical resident of a maternity home was white because unmarried racial/ethnic minority women were more likely to keep their babies, and they did not have to hide out at a maternity home. This was partly because the babies were less adoptable, but also because the girls' families were more accepting. The typical resident of today's maternity home is a single adolescent who has probably faced some serious challenges in her life. Many come from chaotic family backgrounds and have been abused, often sexually. Their time in the maternity home may be the most stable period in their lives. The challenge for maternity homes is to help these women transition to parenting and independent living because most keep their babies.

Today's typical maternity home is independent. The bulk of funding usually comes from one major government source (e.g., child welfare or Medicaid), which is supplemented by other sources (e.g., state funds or private contributions). Those who live in the home usually pay no fee for the services that they receive including receiving help in applying for public assistance programs (e.g., food stamps and Medicaid), advice on nutrition, and assistance in determining the next steps in a career or education. Homes tend to offer heavily structured programs that may include life skills, high school coursework, and childbirth classes.

When most people think of maternity homes, they envision the large institutions that held 30 to 50 women, where young women would go to have their babies in secret and give them up for adoption.

Maternity homes now are typically small, dormlike residences that shelter between six and 10 clients at a time. Some just house women for the duration of the pregnancy; others allow mothers to continue living in the home after the baby is born. Maternity homes typically offer a wide range of services for women in need ranging from counseling services and parenting classes to adoption-related guidance and job training.

The antiabortion movement has remained involved with maternity homes as part of its philosophy to support women who choose to carry their pregnancies to term. Many maternity homes had to close after abortion was legalized. Whereas maternity homes in the past were geared toward adoption, today's homes cater to women who have chosen to keep their babies. Maternity homes were affected by the welfare reforms of the 1990s. Under the new rules, pregnant teens ceased to be eligible for welfare benefits unless they were living with their families. Maternity housing rebounded as "second chance" homes were created to provide an alternative stable living environment for pregnant minors who could no longer live at home. Maternity homes provide badly needed assistance to a vulnerable population. Even today, young women may need to live in maternity homes for the duration of their pregnancies.

Elizabeth Levin
Laurentian University

See Also: Adoption Agencies and Services; Group Homes for Adults; Maternal/Infant Health Services.

Further Readings

Edwards, C. and E. Williams. "Adopting Change: Birth Mothers in Maternity Homes Today." Gender and Society, v.14/1 (2000).

Fessler, A. The Girls Who Went Away: The Hidden History of Women Who Surrendered Children for Adoption in the Decades Before Roe v. Wade. New York: Penguin, 2007.

Kunzel, R. G. Fallen Women, Problem Girls: Unmarried Mothers and the Professionalization of Social Work, 1890-1945 (Yale Historical Publications Series). New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995.

Petrie, A. Gone to an Aunt's: Remembering Canada's Homes for Unwed Mothers. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 1998.

McKinney-Vento Homeless Education Assistance Improvements Act of 2001

Approximately 1.6 million children in the United States are homeless. These children are more likely than their peers to miss educational opportunities and perform more poorly in school. The McKinney-Vento Homeless Education Assistance Improvements Act of 2001 is a federal act issued through the Department of Education that ensures that homeless children have the same access to free and public schooling as those children with stable housing. It is designed to help these students succeed in school and meet the same academic standards as other children. The act mandates that local educational agencies (LEA), otherwise known as school districts, immediately enroll homeless children in schools and take the necessary steps to maintain retention of these children in the school system. The act defines the term homeless and sets provisions for school districts to adhere to when working with homeless children including the assignment of children to a certain school and the enrollment process.

The original McKinney Act, which included 15 programs designed to provide various services for the homeless, was passed into law in 1987 and amended in 1988, 1990, 1992, and 1994. Amendments generally expanded upon programs and services available to the homeless in the United States. In 1994, Congress amended the Education of the Homeless Children and Youth program. This amendment granted schools greater flexibility when utilizing funds, provided children and families with a voice in terms of school placement, required that schools coordinate with housing authorities, and specified a child's right to receive an education. In 2001, Congress reauthorized this program as the McKinney-Vento Homeless Education Assistance Improvements Act as a part of the No Child Left Behind Act, signed into law by President George W. Bush.

Defining Homelessness

The act defines homeless children as those without a stable, fixed, or adequate nighttime residence.

This includes children of families who are sharing or have lost housing due to lack of financial resources; children who live in public places not designated as a form of housing such as a park, train station, or abandoned building; children who are living in hotels, motels, or trailer parks; and children who are living in transitional housing such as a shelter. Additionally, the act distinguishes between children who are in foster care and those who are awaiting foster care. The act defines awaiting foster care as the time between the placement of a child in state care and the 30-day shelter care hearing, when a judge determines whether or not a child is in danger and needs to be removed from his or her home. Those awaiting foster care are recognized as homeless and are protected under the provisions of the act.

Specifications: School Placement, Enrollment, and Transportation

According to the McKinney-Vento Act, school districts must immediately enroll homeless children in school even in cases in which students lack necessary documentation for the enrollment process such as medical forms, previous academic records, or proof of residency. In fact, children must be in attendance the day after attempting to enroll. Furthermore, the act states that school districts must continually improve and revise policies to combat barriers preventing children from obtaining free education in efforts to increase enrollment and retention rates.

LEAs are responsible for school placement and must make decisions in the best interests of the child. A child is typically placed in his or her school of origin unless the child does not wish to remain there. A child's school of origin refers to the school the child was last enrolled in or attended when permanently housed. This is particularly important, as disruptions in the stability of a child's education may lead to stress and impede academic success. Under the act, schools are not allowed to segregate homeless children and place them in separate schools. Additionally, school districts are not allowed to hold classes in shelters or off-site school facilities for homeless children. The act requires that children are enrolled in and physically attend an operating school.

Furthermore, the McKinney-Vento Act states that LEAs guarantee transportation of homeless children to and from the child's school of origin at the request of the child's parent, guardian, or liaison. Thus, the school district in which a child lives must cover the cost of transportation to and from school. If a child begins living in a different school district but still attends the school of origin, the new school district must work with the district of origin to determine how costs will be divided. Both districts then share the responsibility of guaranteeing transportation for the child to and from school.

School districts are required to designate a local liaison that acts as the primary form of communication between schools and homeless families. These individuals are responsible for helping children obtain immunizations and medical records. Furthermore, the liaison must ensure that children and their families are well-informed about their rights such as their ability to dispute enrollment decisions. Most importantly, the liaison continually works to identify homeless children in need of enrollment by closely working with shelters, soup kitchens, and other agencies that provide services to homeless families in efforts to prevent homeless children from going unnoticed.

Funding

The federal government provides grant funding to states that are consequently bound to the terms of the act. Funding from the government is intended to carry out the provisions of the act, which includes providing activities for and services to homeless children in efforts to help them enroll and excel in school. The minimum amount allocated to each state annually is $150,000. States are granted money based on a proportional formula as well as the amount of funding received by the Department of Education through the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

A portion of funding is designated to appoint a State Coordinator for Education of Homeless Children and Youth in each state and to develop programs that raise awareness about the education of homeless children and address current issues. The responsibilities of the coordinator include supervising the state's adherence to the act, compiling and communicating information on issues faced by homeless children and the school system, analyzing the manner in which the act provides solutions to problems, providing technical assistance to school districts to ensure compliance with the act, and submitting reports requested by the Department of Education. Coordinators must also facilitate communication between various agencies providing assistance to the homeless, including those that offer mental health services, and the State Educational Agency.

The McKinney-Vento Homeless Education Assistance Improvements Act of 2001 is fundamentally designed to ensure that homeless children have equal opportunity to receive an education and excel in school. Though more adequate funding would aid in the execution of its goals, the McKinney-Vento Act remains a landmark piece of legislation that has helped create and implement concrete plans that provide access to education for all children in the United States.

Maribel Plasencia
Alexis Avery Adams-Clark
Butler Hospital and Brown University
Gregory L. Stuart
University of Tennessee-Knoxville

See Also: Department of Education, U.S.; Homelessness; Housing Support and Homeless Services.

Further Readings

Bassuk, Ellen L., et al. America's Youngest Outcasts 2010. Waltham, MA: National Center on Family Homelessness, 2011.

Coalition for the Homeless. http://www.coalitionforthehomeless.org/programs/camp-homeward-bound (Accessed April 2014).

U.S. Department of Education. http://www2.ed.gov/programs/homeless/guidance.pdf (Accessed September 2010).

Meaningful Access

Care providers and duty bearers providing social and health services need to ensure that the populations have meaningful access to these support mechanisms. Meaningful access can be measured in terms of equity of access, quality of care, timely availability of service, affordability of the service, and participation of the population group or beneficiary in management of these services. This entry explains the various aspects that ensure meaningful access of services to populations. Some of the key principles in meaningful access to services follow, and it is important that service providers and other duty bearers regularly assess them and evaluate their services against these.

Equity of access to different population groups is a critical element defining meaningful access. Different population groups irrespective of their age, sex, or cultural, social, racial, ethnic, economic, or occupational background must receive equitable treatment and care by the service provider without any preference or bias. Similarly, persons with certain medical conditions such as human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) must not be stigmatized against. Language barriers, as well as lack of awareness of various procedures and processes, may lead initial service seekers to feel nervous and apprehensive about the support available. Care has to be taken therefore to bring in language interpreters where necessary as well as to simplify procedures and explain the same to beneficiaries.

Physical access to the services is an important parameter. Service provisions must be within a reasonable distance from the beneficiary to ensure effective utilization. Similarly, working hours at these facilities need to be set in such a way so as to enable populations to use them. For example, commercial sex workers are more likely to access a facility that provides health checkups as well as counseling or treatment if it opens during the night. The facilities also need to ensure access to persons with disabilities (e.g., provision of ramps and wheelchair-accessible toilets). Economic access to the services can be explained in terms of cost for services and ability of the populations to pay for them. In certain countries, government social support systems provide for free or subsidized health care. However, this is not the case in most of the developing and underdeveloped countries, and even if available, support is limited to a basic level (e.g., primary health, primary education, etc.). In such circumstances, it is important that service providers develop and implement support provisions that the majority of the population can pay for and access.

Social support is an important aspect to ensure meaningful access of beneficiaries to services. Stigma or ridicule associated with some of the issues leads to poor utilization of these services. Some of the examples are persons with HIV or acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), social norms against rape survivors, and children with learning disabilities. To ensure that these individuals or their families proactively seek support from the social or health services, the service providers could help in different ways: sensitization of the populations on these issues and creating awareness how to accept these persons and support them; maintaining confidentiality regarding beneficiaries; and empathy while dealing with these persons at the facilities so that they feel supported and, therefore, continue seeking support and also inform others with similar conditions to seek support. Regarding rights orientation for service delivery, it is important for service providers to recognize that people seeking services within their institutions have a right to quality services. Many of these rights are enshrined within constitutional frameworks of many countries as well as within various other regulatory guidelines for social services systems. The rights framework therefore provides a strong foundation to enable providers to work toward meeting these rights as well as ask for necessary support from the government (if necessary) to help them deliver quality to the expected standards.

To adhere to the above principles, it is important for service providers to undertake the following strategies that will contribute to meaningful access to services: (1) setting long-term visioning, communicating the same widely to all stakeholders and putting in place measures to achieve these—regular reporting on progress against these visions is equally important; (2) establishing standard service provision benchmarks in line with the government and institutional guidelines; (3) making sure that these are well understood among all the stakeholders and necessary resource provisions (finance, human resource, time, technology, etc.) are allocated for the same; (4) setting up a clear monitoring mechanism against set benchmarks to assess meaningful access service provisions; (5) and explaining all the stakeholders within the relevant continuum of care regarding these benchmarks and measures to monitor and review them at periodic intervals.

Community participation in setting the quality standards within the agreed quality parameters is important to enhance partnership and reporting of issues. This also means communicating and discussing issues of concern in a transparent and regular manner. The following measures will strengthen accountability mechanisms as well:

- Assess and understand contextual challenges and opportunities, and ensure that these are factored into strategies for support and response, leading to enhanced access to services.
- Identify barriers and wastage within the service setup, and remove them.

Creating a learning environment is important to make sure that the professionals involved with the service provision embrace it as a value system and are willing to question and challenge protocols, systems, and roles as well as report any mistakes and challenges without the fear of reprisals from senior management. Technology adoption is another critical need for continual improvement in services and, therefore, ensuring a meaningful access experience for the beneficiaries. New technology application could be in the areas of treatments, documentation and information management, staff training, and so on.

Prafulla K. Mishra
HelpAge International

See Also: Continuum of Care; Health as a Human Right; Health Promotion Services.

Further Reading

Allard, Scott W. Access to Social Services: The Changing Urban Geography of Poverty and Service Provision. Brookings Institution, 2004. http://www.brookings.edu/research/reports/2004/08/metropolitanpolicy-allard (Accessed April 2014).

Chiriacescu, Diana. Ensuring Access of People with Disabilities to Social Services: The Need for Regulatory Mechanisms in South East Europe, The Disability Monitoring Initiative. Belgrade, Serbia: Handicap International South East Europe, 2006.

Robert M. Mayberry. "Improving Quality and Reducing Inequities: A Challenge in Achieving Best Care." Proceedings of the Baylor University Medical Center, v.19 (2006).

Medicaid

Medicaid was created in 1965 and is an entitlement program administered at the state level under rules set by the federal government that provides payment for medical expenses for individuals and families that are low income who meet certain criteria. Approximately one out of every five Americans is a Medicaid beneficiary, with 62 million people receiving assistance from the program as of March 2013.

As of fiscal year 2010, Medicaid cost $414 billion per year and rises with each fiscal year. The Affordable Care Act (ACA) expanded coverage in 2014 to adults who make up to 133 percent of the federal poverty level, but the Supreme Court ruled that states can choose whether or not to participate in this large expansion of the Medicaid program. Medicaid is one of the largest and fastest-growing parts of state budgets, and in recent years, state finances, already strained by the 2007 to 2009 economic downturn, struggled to support the program. It remains one of the largest programs available to low-income people in the United States.

Creation of Medicaid

Medicaid was created as a result of legislation signed by President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1965. Created in tandem with the Medicare program that provides health care for the elderly, Medicaid was designed to pay for health care expenses for people who are low income. The program provides federal grants to states for medical expenses. States are not required to participate in the Medicaid program. Medicaid is one of the most enduring legacies of President Johnson's Great Society program. While the impact of Medicaid has varied across states, overall, it has improved many health care outcomes for beneficiary groups.

Organization and Coverage of Medicaid

Medicaid has several core eligibility groups including pregnant women, children, adults who have dependent children, people with disabilities, and senior citizens. In some states, there is expanded Medicaid coverage that is generally targeted toward children. In order to receive Medicaid, potential recipients often have to prove that their income is below the federal poverty level. In addition, the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005 added a controversial provision to the process for obtaining Medicaid. That act required proof of citizenship for recipients to access Medicaid services.

Medicaid covers more than 30 million children and approximately 11 million nondisabled adults and finances 40 percent of all births in the United States, nearly 9 million disabled adults, and approximately 4.6 million low-income seniors. Elderly Medicaid beneficiaries are generally also participants in the Medicare program. In addition, many 3.7 million disabled Medicare beneficiaries also received Medicaid. The composition of Medicaid beneficiaries changed substantially in 2014, when many adults in participating states became eligible for the first time.

Medicaid differentiates between mandatory benefits and optional benefits. States are required to offer mandatory benefits, while they can choose whether or not to offer optional benefits. Examples of mandatory benefits include inpatient and outpatient hospital services, nursing facility services, family planning services, and nurse midwife services. Examples of optional services include clinic services, physical therapy, prescription drug services, optometry services, dentures, eyeglasses, and chiropractic services.

As of fiscal year 2010, expenditures for Medicaid services totaled $413.9 billion including state and federal contributions. States also have the option to require out-of-pocket costs and copayments in certain circumstances. A large proportion of Medicaid funding is directed toward nursing home care, with 12.5 percent of service expenditures being devoted toward nursing facilities in fiscal year 2011. By some estimates, two-thirds of nursing home care is financed through the Medicaid program. Many recipients of the Medicare program for senior citizens also receive benefits from Medicaid.

For children, Medicaid is supplemented by the Child Health Insurance Program (SCHIP), created in 1997 and renewed most recently in 2009 by one of the first pieces of legislation to be signed by President Barack Obama. SCHIP provides funding for health insurance for children for families who earn slightly more than those who qualify for Medicaid. SCHIP provides some interesting examples for cost efficiencies in the Medicaid program.

One concern Medicaid has faced from the inception of the program in the 1960s is doctors refusing to accept Medicaid. The variance of Medicaid reimbursements and the relatively low level of payment makes many doctors wary of accepting Medicaid. Ensuring both adequate funding and access to care has been a concern of Medicaid since the program began.

Medicaid and Federalism

Unlike Social Security, Medicare, and the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP), Medicaid is organized in a way that provides states with a great deal of autonomy, although not as extensive as that of the Temporary Aid to Needy Families (TANF) program. States have a large variance in access and coverage. This has sometimes prevented the program from being uniformly effective but has given states the leeway to experiment.

Arizona was for many years the only state to opt out of the Medicaid program, not joining until the 1980s. States determine their specific eligibility standards for the Medicaid program. In addition, the funding structure for Medicaid has a federal medical assistance percentage, which is determined by state per-capita income. There is a federal spending floor of 50 percent; each state receives at least 50 percent of Medicaid funding from the federal government. Mississippi, traditionally the poorest state in the union, receives the largest proportion from the federal government, 73.4 percent of their Medicaid funding.

In addition to varying amounts of federal funding, states may also provide coverage for certain areas. For example, New York has traditionally offered many option benefits, while Mississippi has offered minimal coverage. The variance in optional benefits by states is one of the ways in which Medicaid costs are differentiated across the nation. New York Governor Andrew Cuomo appointed a commission to look into methods of controlling Medicaid costs.

Many conservatives, concerned about the ever-increasing cost of the Medicaid program support converting the program into a block grant. The United States Congress replaced the Aid to Families

A rally to support the expansion of Medicaid in Jackson, Mississippi, June 28, 2013. Medicaid expansion has profound implications for federalism and for access to health care. The way different states implement or choose not to implement the Medicaid expansion will create a disparity of policies and of access to medical care throughout various states.

With Dependent Children (AFDC) program, colloquially known as welfare, to the Temporary Aid to Needy Families (TANF) block grant program. A block grant program gives states substantially more leeway, which could potentially result in cost savings but also raises the possibility of a race to the bottom, where states offer minimal services and use leeway to transfer block grant funds to other aspects of their budgets.

Medicaid and the Affordable Care Act

One of the key aspects of the Affordable Care and Patient Protection Act of 2010, colloquially referred to Obamacare, is an expansion of Medicaid coverage to adults who earn up to 133 percent of the poverty line. Beginning in 2014, Medicaid will for the first time be available to adults who are not disabled, elderly, or who do not have children. The Supreme Court, in National Federation of independent Business v. Sebelius, allowed states to opt out of the Medicaid expansion.

As of June 2013, 26 states were committed to participating, 13 were on record as not participating, and 11 states were considering the issue or instituting alternative options. In Arizona, Republican Governor Jan Brewer, who gained national recognition for strong stances on the immigration restriction bill SB 1070, supported and fought with the state legislature for Medicaid expansion participation. Brewer gained passage of the program in June 2013 despite opposition. In contrast, Texas Governor Rick Perry strongly opposed Medicaid expansion despite the fact that Texas leads the nation in the percentage of uninsured people, with approximately one-fourth of the population lacking health insurance. Other states such as Arkansas are working with the federal government on their own variations.

The Medicaid expansion has profound implications for federalism and for access to health care. The way different states implement or choose not to implement the Medicaid expansion created a disparity of policies and of access to medical care throughout various states.

Conclusion

The Medicaid program was created in 1965 and has become an increasingly costly entitlement program that also provides interesting insights into ideas of federalism. Created in 1965 as part of Lyndon Johnson's Great Society, the program has become one of the largest expenditures of federal and state governments. Providing health care for the poor, particularly children, the disabled, and the elderly, beginning in 2014, Medicaid expanded significantly to other adults as well. The program provides a safety net for approximately one out of five Americans but also faces concern over organization and cost. In the next decades, debates over entitlement reform, state budgets, policy innovation, and cost efficiency will continue to involve the Medicaid program.

Matthew Gritter
Angelo State University

See Also: Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Health Care, Disparities in.

Further Reading

Hoffman, Beatrix. Health Care for Some: Rights and Rationing in the United States Since 1930. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2012.

Medicaid. "Affordable Care Act." http://www.medicaid.gov/AffordableCareAct/Affordable-Care-Act.html (Accessed April 2014).

Wolters Kluwer Law & Business Attorney Editors. Medicare & Medicaid Benefits, 2013 Edition. Alphen aan den Rign, Holland: Wolters Kluwer, 2013.

Medical Necessity

Though the function of medical necessity in the current health care system as a determinant of claims reimbursement is understood, consensus is lacking when it comes to defining and, thus, setting an agreed-upon criteria for this construct. Various government and medical institutions have proffered definitions, while local plans continue to advance and maintain their own, incorporating financial conditions into what was formerly a clinical determination. Denial of claim reimbursement based on failure to meet medical necessity specifications is a substantial problem, though it can be reduced through proactive measures such as proper coding and billing.

Role of Medical Necessity in Health Care

There is no standard definition of medical necessity despite the critical role it plays in health care, and a notable degree of confusion and controversy surround this concept. A cost-control measure that surfaced in the 1940s with the development of insurance, medical necessity serves as a determining factor in whether health services or supplies are reimbursed by insurance or government programs and is intended to exclude unnecessary, elective, experimental, and cosmetic procedures. Unlike coverage, which refers to a benefits package of services and procedures a plan will generally pay for, medical necessity involves what a plan will pay for with an individual patient in a particular case. Medical necessity claim decisions are typically made by reviewing staff or medical directors not involved in the care of the patient in question. Historically, determination of medical necessity was left to the judgment of treating physicians. In the 1960s, however, insurance providers began specifying the criteria for medical necessity in their contracts in an attempt to help contain the rising expense of health care. A key issue of debate has since been the shifting of medical necessity from a clinical decision to a business decision.

Definitional Issues

Section 1862 (a) (1) of the Social Security Act specifies that Medicare will pay for that which is "reasonable and necessary for the diagnosis or treatment of an illness or injury or to improve the functioning of a malformed body member." The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services has issued national coverage determinations (NCDs) that address what products and services are covered and medically necessary under Medicare; however, when an NCD does not address a particular product, service, or procedure, local coverage determination (LCD) on the part of local carriers dictates medical necessity guidelines along with local medical review policies.

As is widely quoted, the American Medical Association defines medical necessity as "health care services or products that a prudent physician would provide to a patient for the purpose of preventing, diagnosing, or treating an illness, injury, disease or its symptoms in a manner that is: (1) in accordance with generally accepted standards of medical practice; (2) clinically appropriate in terms of type, frequency, extent, site, and duration; and (3) not primarily for the economic benefit of the health plans and purchasers or for the convenience of the patient, treating physician, or other health care provider." This definition was established in 1998 in response to the increasing number of health plans using questionable definitions of medical necessity in their managed care contracts. The AMA offers physicians a sample care contract, the Model Managed Care Contract, developed to assist in negotiating contracts with health plans; the AMA's definition of medical necessity is provided in this document as is a discussion of the role of medical necessity and how to appeal denials based on medical necessity criteria. One major concern of the AMA has been that inclusion of language about lowest-cost or least-intensive care as criteria for medical necessity is detrimental to the integrity of the provider–patient relationship and the quality of care patients are eligible to receive. A substantial number of insurance plans do currently have such language in their medical necessity requirements. Medical necessity guidelines vary from plan to plan—they can be found in the medical policies on carrier Web sites, under local coverage determinations, or in private carriers' utilization guidelines. Medical necessity criteria and determination processes are not always made public by insurers and insurance organizations, however, and may remain located in confidential contracts and internal documents such as provider manuals.

Medical Necessity Denials and Appeals

Services that were formerly accepted as medically necessary are increasingly subject to scrutiny under stricter regulation by insurers and governing bodies. The Office of the Inspector General (OIG) is charged with maintaining the integrity of the Department of Health and Human Services' (HHS's) programs via audits, inspections, and investigations—one of the areas they focus on is medical necessity. Furthermore, recovery audit contractors (RACs) at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services identify past payouts to hospitals that are deemed undeserved and recover the funds; often, the reason stated for recovery is the provision of services that do not fit the criteria for medical necessity. The American Hospital Association RACTrac quarterly reports, which explore the impact of RACs on hospitals nationwide, have found medical necessity denials to be the most common reason that claims are denied by RACs.

The Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act of 2010 charges the secretary of the HHS with overseeing the process by which medical necessity determinations are made; the HHS defers the responsibility of establishing and overseeing medical necessity criteria to state governments and insurance providers. Because of such decentralization, there is variation in medical necessity identification, review, and appeals, with some states specifying cost as a factor in determination of medical necessity and others more liberally covering procedures considered elective under other plans. For example, a study by the General Accounting Office found that patients in Illinois filing Medicare claims for chest X-rays were 451 times more likely to be denied than patients in South Carolina. After a health plan has denied a claim based on medical necessity, patients and providers have the opportunity to appeal denials—first with the plan internally and then via external review—though the procedure for internal review varies by plan, and the process for external review varies by state. Should the dispute progress to litigation, the courts have been inconsistent in their interpretation of medical necessity, with some maintaining that a patient's physician is responsible for determining medical necessity and others maintaining that the concept is contractual and physicians are obligated to prove that the care provided fits the established plan criteria for medical necessity.

Denial Prevention

To maximize reimbursement and negate the need to appeal, health care providers and staff are encouraged to increase their vigilance regarding the correct coding and billing of claims and to be current and detailed in their understanding of coding and compliance rules, which are known to change frequently. New technology now allows claims, prior to billing, to be run through software and online programs that detect potential errors that could result in medical necessity denials. Proper coding and documentation have been recognized as a preventative strategy highly effective in reducing claim denials.

However, even the most conscientious coding and billing will not quiet the ongoing debate about controlling costs at the expense of quality care and will not alleviate concerns that fiscal criteria is gaining increasing clout in medical necessity determinations that were once the domain of the physician caring for his or her patient.

Stacey A. Passalacqua
Rollins College

See Also: Code of Ethics of the National Association of Social Workers; Health Insurance; Outpatient Medical Care.

Further Readings

American Medical Association. "Statement of the American Medical Association to the Institute of Medicine's Committee on Determination of Essential Health Benefits." (January 14, 2011). http://www.iom.edu/~/media/Files/Activity%20Files/HealthServices/EssentialHealthBenefits/2011-JAN-13%20and%2014/Gerald%20Harmon%20Statement.pdf (Accessed March 2014).
Bergthold, Linda A. "Medical Necessity: Do We Need It?" Health Affairs, v.14 (1995).
Bosenbark, Linda and Anne Vincenti. "Teaming Up for Medical Necessity Compliance." Healthcare Financial Management, v.60 (2006).
Freedman, Skip. "Meeting the Medical Necessity Requirement." Case Manager, v.17 (2006).
Skinner, Daniel. "Defining Medical Necessity Under the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act." Public Administration Review, v.73 (2013).

Medical Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for Medical social workers are professional social workers (typically individuals with master's degrees) who help people cope with chronic, acute, or terminal illnesses. Medical social workers provide a variety of services to individuals, families, and groups, including advising family care givers, providing patient education and counseling, making referrals for other services, and providing care and case management. They also perform interventions to promote health, prevent disease, and remove barriers to access to health care. Medical social workers have a very specialized skill set that is utilized as they work as part of an interdisciplinary team of doctors, nurses, nurses' aides, therapists (physical, occupational, speech, and respiratory), and management and administration. Medical social workers are often seen as the experts in the areas of psychosocial concerns, community services and referrals, family issues, and mental health diagnoses.

Medical social work is a field with a long-standing history. The first medical social worker was Ida Cannon at Massachusetts General Hospital in 1905. According to an address made in 1930, Cannon characterized the Medical Social Service movement as recognizing that there should be a specific person within the hospital who represents the patient's point of view; the person in this role should be able to work with the physician on a treatment plan for the patient that takes into consideration the patient's psychosocial needs. Medical social work is still filling that same need today and is flourishing as a profession. According to the 2012 Bureau of Labor Statistics, there are now 140,000 medical social workers employed in the United States in settings that vary from hospitals to nursing homes to in-home hospice and home health care.

Diversity in Medical Social Work

Because medical social workers provide services to people who are ill, they see a large cross-section of the population. Illness and disease can affect all people, regardless of race, ethnicity, age, sexual orientation, or class. In this way, social workers are challenged with providing culturally competent services to a wide variety of people. While other social work settings may have a more targeted population—perhaps a counseling center for immigrants or a shelter for single mothers—health care provides service to every population. This requires that social workers have a working knowledge and the capacity to accept and understand the full range of diverse clients.

One of the issues that often arises in medical social work is that of ethnic diversity. People of all nationalities and backgrounds can come in through the hospitals or health clinic's doors. Patients and their family members may not speak English, which can be frustrating for the members of the medical team. Social workers hold dignity and the worth of a person as a core value in their profession. Abiding by this means that social workers are ethically responsible for making sure that the patient still has access to care, is included in treatment decisions, and is treated in a respectful way, even if he or she does not speak English or is unfamiliar with American cultural norms. There are resources that the social workers can help patients access, including interpreters, language telephone lines, and even health care clinics or offices that offer services geared toward a particular population. Additionally, social workers can advocate for patients and families that may be misunderstood, marginalized, or even discriminated against in the medical setting. Cultural differences are not tolerated appropriately by all staff members at all times; sometimes, education and open dialogue is needed to ensure proper treatment of all patients.

Racial issues come into play frequently in medical social work, especially with regard to social justice and access to care. People of color who are often oppressed and discriminated against have barriers to health care that privileged members of society do not, including lack of health insurance or prescription coverage, unsafe living situations, and inability to afford proper nutrition. Conversely, medical staff need to be cognizant of their own potential for racial prejudice and not assume that a person of color will automatically have these issues. There are also issues of blatant racism that occur in medical settings that social workers are called to speak out against; social workers are integral in creating a safe and tolerant environment.

In addition to the issues of discrimination and prejudice that many people of color will face when receiving or trying to access medical care, people of color often have an inherent mistrust or skepticism of the medical system. Studies like the Tuskegee Syphilis Experiment served to exemplify the ways the majority culture exploited and harmed African Americans in this country. In medical social work, professionals can help people of color express their concerns, legitimize their fears, and assist them in getting the care they need.

Another group that is often marginalized and oppressed, the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered, queer or questioning (LGBTQ) population has unique challenges that social workers can assist with; issues of sexual orientation have an important impact on medical social workers. Partners of patients may be excluded from treatment planning, end-of-life care, power-of-attorney decisions, or general medical updates if the staff is not aware of, or not acknowledging, the patient's sexual orientation.

Diseases such as human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) may be disproportionately expected or assumed by medical staff, which can lead to discrimination, isolation, and even harassment. Discrimination and bias can also occur by those who are unfamiliar or judgmental of these clients. Social workers must be aware of these issues and provide support to patients and families and education to staff.

Class is an omnipresent type of diversity that can polarize staff and discriminate against patients more powerfully than many other types of differences. The health system in the United States is fraught with problems. The high cost of medical care and the high rate of uninsured and underinsured people make receiving adequate health care a problem for many Americans. People who do not have adequate access to health care are often treated poorly by the medical staff or denied care or medications due to inability to pay. Social workers have a responsibility to advocate for these patients and help them explore and access resources that may help them maintain their health and receive treatment for medical problems.

Kathryn Martinelli Brzozowski
Temple University

See Also: Case Management; Global Burden of Disease; Health and Sickness, Different Attitudes Toward; Health as a Human Right; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Disparities, Role of; Health Insurance; Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996; Public Health.

Further Readings

Allen, H. "Is There a Social Worker in the House? Health Care Reform and the Future of Medical Social Work." Health and Social Work, v.37/3 (2012).

Bureau of Labor Statistics. "2012–2013 Occupational Outlook Handbook." Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Labor, 2013.

Jansson, B. S. and S. Dodd. "Ethical Activism." Social Work in Health Care, v.36/1 (2002).

Min, J. "Cultural Competency: A Key to Effective Future Social Work With Racially and Ethnically Diverse Elders." Families in Society, v.86/3 (2005).

Reisch, M. "From Melting Pot to Multiculturalism: The Impact of Racial and Ethnic Diversity on Social Work and Social Justice in the USA." British Journal of Social Work, v.38/4 (2008).

Medical Supplies, Access to

Medical supplies and equipment are essential for maintaining health and mobility for millions; however, disenfranchised groups have difficulty accessing necessary items. The elderly, poor, minorities, and those with disabilities may not get the mobility devices and diabetic testing supplies they need. Positive health outcomes are associated with adequate access, while underutilization of medical supplies and equipment increases morbidity and mortality. Government and privately funded programs help offset costs, but restrictive policies leave many patients with unmet needs.

The category of medical supplies covers a wide range of items, assistive devices, equipment, and supplies used to manage disabilities or treat health conditions in a patient's home. Private insurers and the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) group medical supplies into the broader category of durable medical equipment, prosthetics, orthotics, and supplies (DMEPOS), but the acronym is commonly shortened to DME. DME includes artificial limbs, air purifiers, breast prostheses, continuous positive airway pressure machines, diabetic shoes, enteral nutrition devices (i.e., feeding tubes), lift chairs, walkers, portable oxygen systems, crutches, hospital beds, canes, wheelchairs, and scooters. Diabetic testing supplies, incontinence aids, and ostomy supplies (i.e., colostomy bags) are usually included, but expendable supplies, like bandages or rubber gloves, are not. In order for Medicare, Medicaid, and most insurance plans to cover supplies and equipment, a doctor's prescription is needed. Medicare Part B covers a portion of DME expenses for adults age 65 and over after their deductibles are met. Medicaid, the government health plan for the poor, usually covers all DME costs, although plans and eligibility vary by state. For patients with insurance, high copayments, deductibles, and coverage limits can impede access to needed supplies and equipment.

Access to medical supplies and equipment improves health outcomes for patients with disabilities and chronic conditions. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 19 percent of the population is disabled, and 3 million people use wheelchairs. Studies show patients who use assistive devices are more satisfied performing daily activities and have an improved sense of accomplishment, while their caregivers report feeling less burdened. Nearly a third of patients with disabilities, however, cannot afford needed equipment. Inadequate access to equipment like mobility devices has detrimental effects; activity restriction because of limited mobility is associated with depression, feelings of social isolation, malnutrition, reduced quality of life, increased reliance on home health services, and higher morbidity and mortality.

For many patients, access to the right equipment is a factor. CMS pays for the least expensive wheelchair that allows a patient to function at home; about three-quarters of Medicare enrollees with limited mobility have manual wheelchairs, although they may actually need and benefit from lightweight or power chairs. Studies show that prolonged use of manual chairs causes injuries in shoulders, elbows, and wrists and ultimately increases health care costs. Medicaid will only consider claims for new chairs every five years, so it's important to get the right chair the first time. Patients with private insurance also have difficulty acquiring the right equipment; coverage limits mean patients pay more out of pocket for lightweight and power chairs, which can cost up to $13,000. Protection and Advocacy for Assistive Technology (PART) and Protection and Advocacy for Individual Rights (PAIR) programs operate nationwide, providing limited financial support for acquiring equipment and free legal services for patients contesting claims denied by Medicaid, Medicare, or private insurance.

The elderly, poor, certain minorities, and those living in rural communities have the most difficulty accessing equipment and supplies; for those with diabetes, the consequences can be deadly. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), the death rate is two to four times higher for the 26 million Americans with diabetes. Untreated, it can lead to stroke, heart disease, blindness, kidney failure, and loss of limbs. Blacks, Hispanics, and Native Americans suffer disproportionately; minorities represent the majority of new diagnoses, while only 7 percent of whites have diabetes. Diabetes must be checked on a regular basis, requiring a blood glucose monitor, test strips, and lancets. Testing supplies can cost as much $150 a month. While Medicaid covers most costs, traditional Medicare covers 80 percent; Part B covers testing supplies, and Part D covers needles and syringes for administering insulin. Medicare Advantage plans vary. The Affordable Care Act (ACA) launched a national mail order program in 2013 making it cheaper to have supplies delivered, but the program is limited to traditional Medicare enrollees, and items must be purchased through approved providers. While online vendors offer competitive prices, patients must have computer access to take advantage of savings (computer literacy is a problem, particularly among minority groups and the poor). Research suggests that many forgo routine monitoring, and elderly patients often lack the necessary equipment.

Government and privately funded assistance programs help improve access to medical equipment and supplies. The Federal Assistive Technology Act funds programs in every state. Most programs refurbish used equipment and sell it at deeply discounted prices as well as lend DME free of charge from a few weeks to several months. The American Elder Care Research Organization maintains a comprehensive list of state programs (www.payingforseniorcare.com). Organizations like Area Agency on Living and Independent Living Centers also have assistance programs. The Morgan Project is a nonprofit helping children with disabilities and their families gain access to items like adaptive bath chairs not covered by Medicaid. It also runs a used equipment exchange program. As noted previously, online services limit support to those with computer and Internet access.

Barbara Cook Overton
Louisiana State University

See Also: Aging and Adult Services; Assistive Technology; Children With Special Needs; Disability Services; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Medicaid; Medicare.

Further Readings

Medicare Rights Center. "Forcing Isolation: Medicare's 'In the Home' Coverage Standard for Wheelchairs." Case Management Journals, v.6/1 (2005).

National Institute of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases. "Financial Help for Diabetes Care." http://diabetes.niddk.nih.gov/dm/pubs/financialhelp (Accessed November 2013).

Medical Transportation

In much of the United States, personal automobiles are the most common means of transportation for individuals and families, particularly when the distance to be traveled is too great for walking to be a feasible alternative. However, relying exclusively on automobiles has many disadvantages, including harm to the environment, time expended in lengthy commutes and in congested traffic, and discrimination against individuals who do not own a car or cannot drive for a multitude of reasons including age (including both those too young to hold a driver's license and those too elderly to drive safely), disability, and poverty. A variety of transportation services are available in many areas that provide an alternative to automobile travel and improve the quality of life in a region while also enabling each resident to fully participate in life.

Transportation services are particularly critical in areas of poverty and high concentrations of minority populations and for the elderly and disabled. For instance, in the United States, members of minority groups are less likely than white Americans to own automobiles, women are less likely than men to have a car registered in their names, and members of poor households generally pay a higher percentage of their incomes on transportation than do middle-class households. In the United States, Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 forbids discrimination in public accommodations, including public transportation, and this has been interpreted broadly by the courts to include the adequate provision of services and consideration of the needs of all residents. Following this interpretation, when service changes or fare increases are scheduled, they must be examined to see that minority or disadvantaged residents are being treated fairly; particularly in large cities, public hearings are often scheduled to allow residents to provide input into proposed changes.

Because of the key role that adequate transportation can play in an individual's daily life, some organizations, such as the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and Human Rights, believe that adequate transportation should be considered a civil right. They define transportation equity as a key value in local and regional planning because affordable, reliable transportation provides individuals and families with access to social benefits such as health care, education, and employment. However, in the United States, transportation services often fall short of this goal, and sometimes transportation services are arranged to favor the needs of the more-prosperous residents of a region, while those in greatest need may receive fewer services, although their need is greater. A wide range of resources may be needed to improve access to affordable transportation, and effectiveness depends in part on local circumstances. For instance, an evaluation of the Lifeline Transportation Program in California, meant to increase access to transportation for the poor and underserved, showed that a variety of approaches were useful including increasing public transit services, subsidizing fares, improving bicycle and pedestrian infrastructure, and demand-responsive transportation (flexible, shared transportation that may respond to individual needs).

Even the basic design of transportation services in a region may favor some individuals over others. For instance, city transit systems laid out on a rectangular grid system are often the most useful for individuals who do not own an automobile because no point in a region is too far from a transit line and making connections between different lines in a rectangular grid system is generally relatively intuitive and quick. In addition, grid systems do not need to favor one part of a city over another and provide relatively equitable coverage to all areas of the grid. In contrast, a radial grid system designates one area as central, with transit lines radiating out from this area. This type of design is often used when the focus of the transit system is bringing suburban residents into a central city during the workday and taking them home again in the evening. Such a system may operate only during limited hours, and the transit lines may become widely separated, without connecting services, as they become more distant from the central area. While a radial grid can provide regional benefits in terms of reducing traffic congestion and air pollution, it favors suburban commuters who tend to be more prosperous and probably own automobiles to use for their personal transportation in the evenings and for trips where the transit lines do not reach, over urban residents, who may have lower incomes and lower rates of car ownership and hence depend on the transit system for most or all of their transportation.

An MTA Access-A-Ride van transports residents in New York City. A variety of transportation services are available in many areas that provide an alternative to automobile travel.

Although transportation services are often associated with urban areas, they play a vital role in rural areas as well. Rural residents have the same need to access education, health care, employment, and other services, as well as the ability to travel longer distances (e.g., between cities), and it cannot be assumed that all individuals in rural areas have access to automobile transportation. In addition, rural residents need to access long-distance transportation services such as bus, rail, and air travel. In the United States, according to the Bureau of Transportation Services, intercity rural transportation services have declined in recent years. As of September 2010, 11 percent of rural residents had access to intercity transportation (by air, bus, ferry, or rail transportation), although 3.5 million rural residents lost access to intercity transportation between 2005 and 2010. The primary decline was in bus transportation, followed by rail transportation, and access was lowest among residents of North Dakota, where fewer than 60 percent of rural residents had access to intercity transportation.

Transportation for elderly and disabled residents who require special services is typically organized at the local level. Many handicapped and elderly residents can be accommodated on regularly scheduled services—for instance, through buses with accommodations for wheelchairs and that have kneeling entry platforms that can be lowered to street level and then raised to the level of the bus aisle. Subway and rail networks can be made accessible by similar means such as providing elevators and gates to accommodate wheelchairs at the stations. Often, handicapped and elderly residents are eligible for free or reduced-price transportation on regularly scheduled transit services. In addition, special on-call transportation services are provided in many areas for rural and handicapped residents by specially equipped vans that can accommodate riders with special need, and provide point-to-point transportation similar to a taxicab service but at a much-reduced fare.

Sarah E. Boslaugh
Kennesaw State University

See Also: Age and Clients; Poverty; Rural Communities; Urban Communities and Human Services.

Further Readings

American Public Transportation Association. http://www.apta.com/Pages/default.aspx (Accessed December 2013).

Bullard, Robert D., ed. Growing Smarter: Achieving Livable Communities, Environmental Justice, and Regional Equity. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2007.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and Human Rights. "Transportation Equity." http://www.civilrights.org/transportation/ (Accessed December 2013).

Metropolitan Transportation Commission. Lifeline Transportation Program Evaluation: Final Report. http://www.mtc.ca.gov/planning/lifeline/LifelineEvalFinal.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Rodrigue, Jean-Paul. The Geography of Transport Systems. New York: Routledge, 2013.

Thompson, G., and T. Matoff. "Keeping Up With the Joneses: Radial vs. Multidestinational Transit in Decentralizing Regions." Journal of the American Planning Association, v. 69 (2003).

U.S. Department of Transportation, Federal Transit Administration. "Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964." http://www.fta.dot.gov/civilrights/12328.html (Accessed December 2013).

U.S. Department of Transportation, Research and Innovative Technology Administration. “The U.S. Rural Population and Scheduled Intercity Transportation in 2010: A Five-Year Decline in Transportation Access.” http://www.rita.dot.gov/bts/sites/rita.dot.gov.bts/files/publications/scheduled_intercity_transportation_and_the_us_rural_population/index.html (Accessed December 2013).

Victoria Transport Policy Institute. Transportation Cost and Benefit Analysis: Techniques, Estimates and Implications, 2nd ed. Victoria, Canada: Victoria Transport Policy Institute, 2009.

Medicare

Medicare (Title XVIII of the Social Security Act) is America’s federal health insurance program for individuals age 65 and older as well as certain younger, disabled former workers. The topic of Medicare is worthy of inclusion in this volume because the elderly and the disabled utilize a variety of human services agencies. Social workers, case managers, and other human services practitioners benefit from resources to better provide services to diverse populations. The aged and disabled constitute two such groups. Knowledge of how the Medicare program operates and an understanding of the challenges facing it are essential for those working with seniors and the disabled. Among these challenges is the uncertain future of this pay-as-you-go intergenerational transfer system that depends on workers paying into its reserve fund. Even if costs to run this very expensive program could be cut, the aging of the U.S. population is a demographic reality to contend with. By 2030, approximately 20 percent of the U.S. population will be elderly. Not only will these individuals stop paying into the system upon retirement, but they will also likely experience costly health problems at a greater rate than their younger counterparts.

Approximately 50 million individuals were covered in 2012 by Medicare. Originally begun in 1965 as a social insurance program for those age 65 and older who had paid a payroll deduction tax into the Social Security system, Medicare expanded in 1972 to include two other groups of beneficiaries (disabled former workers under age 65 receiving Social Security Disability Insurance benefits for more than 24 consecutive months and end-stage renal patients of any age). The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) has oversight of the program, although initial application to receive benefits is made through the Social Security Administration.

Medicare consists of four parts. Part A covers hospitalization, skilled nursing facilities (posthospital rehabilitative short stays), and hospice care. Everyone who paid into the system is entitled to Part A, but a deductible and coinsurance are involved. Noticeably absent from Medicare’s inpatient categories is long-term care (e.g., nursing homes). Medicare does not cover the cost of custodial nursing home care. Part B covers physician office visits, hospital outpatient care and diagnostic services, home health care, and other medical services and supplies. Part B is optional and has an annual premium in addition to a deductible and co-=payment. The premium can be deducted from the individual’s monthly Social Security or Railroad Retirement check. Part C is a private plan option called Medicare Advantage (covering Part A and B services), which can be chosen instead of traditional Medicare (also known as original Medicare).

The government pays a fee to the company for enrolling each patient, and no CMS reimbursement claims are filed for services. From mid-October to early December each year, Part C beneficiaries can choose from a variety of commercial companies during this open enrollment period. In addition to private fee-for-service plans, the choices include preferred provider organizations (PPOs) and health maintenance organizations (HMOs), which are known for managed care practices involving cost containment. It can be an overwhelming experience for individuals to read the mailings they receive from competing companies trying to convince them that one company’s plan will save them more money than the others. Medicare Advantage originated with the passage of the Balanced Budget Act of 1997 as an attempt to reform a system in trouble. By 2013, about 28 percent of Medicare beneficiaries chose Advantage plans rather than traditional Medicare. Part D (implemented in 2006) covers outpatient prescription medications. It is optional and has a premium, deductible, and copayment. There is a coverage gap (referred to as the donut hole) after expenses reach a certain amount (and benefits stop) and before expenses reach another level (and benefits resume at a more generous rate). Supplemental coverage to Parts A and B combined (Medigap insurance) is available from private companies. These insurance plans have monthly premiums and can cover copayments, coinsurance, and deductibles. About 20 percent of Medicare beneficiaries choose this type of coverage. Others have similar supplemental coverage offered to them through their employers upon retirement.

During one's working years, the individual pays a health insurance payroll tax of 1.45 percent of his or her annual salary, while one's employer pays an additional 1.45 percent. Receipts collected through this mandatory contribution cover approximately 38 percent of the costs to operate the Medicare program (and only apply to Part A). Premiums paid by enrollees in Part B and Part D cover an additional 13 percent of the costs to run the program. Federal income tax revenue covers most of the remaining expenditures of the Medicare program. Under the 2010 Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (ACA), the wealthy pay an additional tax on earned income as well as on investment income to further finance Medicare. Typically, a beneficiary receives substantially more in benefits than his or her lifetime payroll tax contribution (which for the average worker is $60,000).

Medicare Program Costs

In 2008, Medicare's annual outlays began to exceed its yearly income. In their May 2013 annual report, Medicare trustees listed 2012's expenditures at more than $574 billion and income at almost $537 billion. They predicted the depletion date for the Part A trust fund (reserves) to occur in the year 2026. Part B's trust fund is not facing the same threat of running out of money as premiums paid by beneficiaries can be reset each year to offset costs. With Medicare expenditures surpassing revenues annually, the government cannot pay its Medicare bills and must borrow money. Because such borrowing adds to the national debt, the topic of Medicare reform has become part of a contentious political debate.

Several factors are contributing to the rising costs to run the Medicare program. These include the growth of the aging population, the inflated cost of health care in the United States, waste in Medicare spending, and fraudulent reimbursement claims. Seventy-six million baby boomers (Americans born between 1946 and 1964) will become eligible for Medicare during the next two decades, with the last of them turning age 65 in the year 2029. Health care in the United States accounts for 18 percent of the gross domestic product (the total value of goods and services produced). When it comes to health care, we spend more than twice the average of Germany, Britain, Canada, or Japan. In addition to the United States having an expensive health care system, unnecessary procedures are performed on patients, partly due to the fact that for-profit hospitals, hospices, and dialysis treatment centers depend on Medicare reimbursements. With regard to waste, improper Medicare payments (e.g., errors in billing, coding, etc.), mismanagement, and other inefficiencies account for $48 billion per year. Fraud accounts for $60 billion per year (approximately 10 percent of Medicare's annual expenditures). While the ACA has allocated a sizeable amount of resources to improve efforts to combat fraud, organized crime gangs have infiltrated the durable medical equipment industry setting up bogus companies to obtain fraudulent reimbursements from an overworked, massive bureaucracy. Additionally, sophisticated networks of criminals steal Medicare patient identification numbers to file for reimbursement for care never received.

In an effort to save the Medicare trust fund, several changes have been suggested. The possibility of raising the eligibility age to 67 has received bipartisan support in Congress and could result in a savings of $15 billion per year. Reducing payments to providers is a provision of the ACA. Bundling payments to providers is a three-year experiment begun in 2012. In this model (also known as episode-based payment), a reimbursement covers all services surrounding a single hospital stay. Another suggestion to reform Medicare is to eliminate Medicare's financial contribution to graduate medical education. In 2010, this contribution amounted to $9.5 billion given to teaching hospitals involved in the education of approximately 100,000 residents. A major restructuring of Medicare has been suggested that would gradually phase out traditional Medicare. Some are asking for a system where seniors would receive a voucher each year to choose a private health insurance plan. Others favor premium support, with the individual receiving a subsidy to pay the premium of a private plan and then paying the difference between the cost of insurance and this subsidy. Whatever changes occur to Medicare, it is likely that beneficiaries and providers will both have to sacrifice and compromise. It will likely take a combination of strategies to ensure sustainability of the Medicare system for future generations.

Joan Luxenburg
University of Central Oklahoma

See Also: Aging and Adult Services; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Health Insurance; Hospice Services; Hospitals; Outpatient Medical Care; Social Security Administration.

Further Readings

Antos, Joseph R. "The Wyden-Ryan Proposal: A Foundation for Realistic Medicare Reform." New England Journal of Medicine, v.366/10 (2012).
Cassel, Christine K. Medicare Matters: What Geriatric Medicine Can Teach American Health Care. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007.
Gibson, Rosemary and Janardan Prasad Singh. Medicare Meltdown: How Wall Street and Washington Are Ruining Medicare and How to Fix It. Lanham, MD.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2013.
Oberlander, Jonathan. The Political Life of Medicare. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.

Medicine, Workplace Diversity in

Workforce diversity includes but is not limited to race, ethnicity, age, gender, disability, educational level, geographic origin, religion, sexual orientation, and socioeconomic class. The importance of diversity in the health professions workforce is clear as strong support exists within the medical profession for increasing racial, ethnic, and sexual diversity among physicians. In fact, achieving a health care workforce that reflects the diversity of the U.S. population is an explicit goal supported by the American Medical Association (AMA), according to J. J. Cohen, B. A. Gabriel, and C. Terrell. Diversifying the physician workforce is a national and global priority.

The majority (72.4 percent) of the U.S. population is white; minorities include 12.6 percent black or African American, 4.8 percent Asian, 0.9 percent American Indian and Alaska Native, 0.2 percent Native Hawaiian and other Pacific Islander, 3 percent two or more races, and 6.2 percent other. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, the U.S. population is becoming increasingly diverse as minority populations are increasing at a faster pace than the majority population. Minorities are expected to compose 40 percent of the U.S. population by 2050, predicts the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, which, according to P. Gonzalez and B. Stoll, will help improve their representation in the physician workforce.

The profile of health care professionals does not match the racial and ethnic profile of the country, K. Grumbach and R. Mendoza have found, particularly for physicians, who disproportionately serve minority and other medically underserved populations. Minorities composed only 22 percent of physicians in 2008. Currently, 54.5 percent of physicians in the United States are white, 12.2 percent Asian, 4.9 percent Hispanic, 3.5 percent black, 0.16 percent American Native or Alaska Native, 1.3 percent other, and 23.4 percent unknown, reports the AMA.

U.S. Census Bureau data show that 24.9 percent of the U.S. population is age 55 or older; however, 40 percent of active physicians in the United States were age 55 or older in the year 2010, actually overrepresenting this age group.

The population is 50.8 percent female and 49.2 percent male; however, the 2008 active physician workforce was composed primarily of males (71.1 percent), with only 28.9 percent being female. The number of female physicians, however, has been rising steadily, according to the AMA. Despite increasing, females still composed only 30.4 percent of this workforce in 2010. This number is expected to continue to grow because women made up 46 percent of residents and fellows in 2010 and will soon be entering the medical workforce.

Promoting racial, ethnic, and linguistic diversity across physicians will produce a culturally competent workforce associated with better access to and quality of care for disadvantaged populations. These medically underserved populations typically include the poor, minorities, and rural residents. When minority patients see physicians with whom they share a common race, ethnicity, or language, they experience higher-quality interpersonal care, particularly in primary care and mental health settings. Patients experience better medical comprehension and show a greater likelihood of keeping follow-up appointments when practitioners speak the same language. Thus, physician diversity leads to improved public health. If the medical workforce does not reflect the anticipated demographics, then the delivery of quality care could be compromised with broader public health implications, hypothesize Gonzalez and Stoll.

The diversity sought in the workforce needs to be reflected in medical school admission policies. Health profession schools select and educate the health workforce of the future and therefore must be mindful of protecting the public. If students from all sectors of the population had equal opportunities for and access to high-quality education, the composition of medical school classes and, eventually, of the physician workforce would then correspond more closely with that of the greater population, explain Cohen, Gabriel, and Terrell.

Minority enrollments in medical school are currently rising in the United States, although the majority of all graduates practicing medicine continue to be white. All other racial and ethnic groups have shown steady increases and collectively tripled their number of graduating physicians, with Asians composing the largest group. In general, prior to the late 1960s, the racial and gender profile of medical students, and hence of the medical profession, was a white male. On average, one minority student was admitted every other year by medical schools of the time, which provides evidence of the racial discrimination that existed. Compared with medical school applicants in 1977, in 2011, the number of Hispanic or Latino applicants more than tripled, and the number of black or African American applicants grew 36 percent. However, since 1977, the percentage of American Indian or Alaska Native applicants declined by 19 percent, reports the Association of American Medical Colleges (AAMC).

In 1982, the gender composition of U.S. medical schools was primarily male; 67.3 percent of applicants were men, and the number of male graduates was more than three times that of female graduates. Women now enter medical school and the physician workforce in greater numbers. The year 2003 marked the first year that more women than men applied to medical school. Women comprised 50.4 percent of all applicants in 2004 and 47.3 percent in 2010. By 2011, women medical school graduates had nearly reached parity with men.

Increasing diversity in medical schools and among physicians to ensure cultural competency has been cited as a key strategy in addressing health care disparities. Further information is needed on sexual orientation and disability as measures of diversity. Some of the benefits of diversity, both in medical education and the physician workforce, include enhanced access to care and higher levels of perceived patient satisfaction. Although the numbers of both female and racial or ethnic minority physicians have increased gradually over the years, there is a continued need for physicians whose varied backgrounds, experiences, and training can directly meet the medical requirements of a diverse population.

Elizabeth Levin
Laurentian University
Hillary Bohler
Northern Ontario School of Medicine

See Also: Alternative Medical Systems; Emergency Medical Care; Medical Social Workers, Racial and Ethnic Issues for; Medical Supplies, Access to; Outpatient Medical Care.

Further Readings

American Medical Association. “Physician Statistics.” http://www.ama-assn.org//ama/pub/about-ama/our-people/member-groups-sections/minority-affairs-section/physician-statistics.page (Accessed December 2013).

Association of American Medical Colleges (AAMC). Diversity in Medical Education: Facts and Figures 2012. Washington, DC: Association of American Medical Colleges, 2012.

Cohen, J. J., B. A. Gabriel, and C. Terrell. “The Case for Diversity in the Health Care Workforce.” Health Affairs, v.21/5 (2002).

Gonzalez, P. and B. Stoll. The Color of Medicine: Strategies for Increasing Diversity in the U.S. Physician Workforce. Boston: Community Catalyst, 2002.

Grumbach, K. and R. Mendoza. “Disparities in Human Resources: Addressing the Lack of Diversity in the Health Professions.” Health Affairs, v.27/2 (2008).

U.S. Census Bureau. “Resident Population by Sex, Race, and Hispanic-Origin Status: 2000 to 2009.” The 2012

Statistical Abstract (Table 6). http://www.census.gov/compendia/statab/2012/tables/12s0006.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. "The Rationale for Diversity in the Health Professions: A Review of the Evidence." Health Resources and Services Administration, Bureau of Health Professions. http://bhpr.hrsa.gov/healthworkforce/reports/diversityreviewevidence.pdf (Accessed December 2013).

Meditation/Yoga

Meditation and yoga, both considered mindfulness or contemplative practices, aim to cultivate heightened awareness or single-focused attention through breathing exercises, movement, visualization, chanting, reading, writing, or other creative practices, having grown alongside world religions such as Buddhism and Hinduism and also having gained popularity in secular settings such as hospitals, higher education, and the military. Currently, human services providers are employing contemplative practices with a variety of studies illustrating the power of meditation and yoga to vastly improve personal relationships and work experiences among a diverse group of individuals. For instance, the Center for Mindfulness in Medicine, Health Care, and Society, founded by Jon Kabat-Zinn, has been training practitioners in mindfulness-based stress reduction (MBSR) techniques, combining mindful movement, gentle yoga, and meditation, for more than 30 years. MBSR is one of the many growing mindfulness-based interventions (MBIs) studied for its impact on conditions such as insomnia, eating disorders, depression, anxiety, and cancer, among a wide range of physical and mental illnesses.

Furthermore, meditation and yoga can be experienced individually or in groups and, when practiced daily, can assist individuals to improve focus and attention, reduce stress and anxiety, and enhance empathy, communication, and creativity as well as extend an individual's compassionate awareness of the interconnectedness of life. The transformative potential of contemplative practices such as meditation and yoga for human services is the process of self-inquiry these practices inspire, which can result in both personal transformation and social transformation through a recognition of shared suffering. Moreover, practicing meditation and yoga is said to expand one's awareness and appreciation of diversity by cultivating an understanding that everyone is connected by seeking to deepen connections among people by fostering love and reminding individuals of the sacredness of all life. In the United States, yoga popularity continues to rise, touted as a cure-all for almost every spiritual, physical, mental, and emotional ailment. The Yoga Journal's 2012 American Market Study reported that nearly 20.4 million Americans practice yoga, spending around $10.3 billion a year on classes and products, with the five top motivations for practice being improved flexibility, conditioning, stress relief, overall health enhancement, and fitness.

Yoga and meditation in contemporary America is a mostly modern invention, dating back to the late 19th century with a short but extremely important lineage of teachers including Swami Vivekananda, Paramahansa Yogananda, and Sri Krishnamacharya, among others. Yoga popularity in the United States grew exponentially in the 1960s and 1970s with major contributors such as Yogi Bhajan, Swami Sivananda, Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, Richard Hittleman, B. K. S. Iyengar, T. K. V. Desikachar, Pattabhi Jois, Indra Devi, and others. This lineage of teachers revolutionized yoga by democratizing asana (physical postures) and meditation by making these practices accessible to all and also highlighting the complementary relationships between the sciences and spirituality. Thus, these practices fuse ideas from East and West, although their contemporary origin is generally traced to the 1893 Parliament of Religions in Chicago, where Swami Vivekananda introduced yoga to the American public for the first time, resulting in a national speaking tour and a series of books. Even so, Swami Vivekananda's approach to yoga was not based in contemporary asana practice; rather, it focused primarily on sitting meditation. What is remarkable about Swami Vivekananda's influence on American yoga is that he transformed what was traditionally a closely guarded, initiation-based process involving a guru–disciple relationship into a spiritual technology open to anyone, moving yoga into a new dawn of practice.

Most often, Sri Krishnamacharya is cited as the greatest exponent of modern hatha yoga, revolutionizing yoga traditions by continuing to Meditating atop a hill in Sedona, Arizona. Meditation and yoga can be experienced individually or in groups and, when practiced daily, can assist individuals to improve focus and attention, reduce stress and anxiety, and enhance empathy, communication, and creativity as well as extend an individual's compassionate awareness of the interconnectedness of life.

democratize the practice through radical inclusion. Not only did he open up space for women to practice yoga, but he also tailored yoga to special-needs populations, insisting that yoga could benefit all people. Krishnamacharya's primary students, who carried his teaching to thousands of Westerners, include his son, T. K. V. Desikachar, who continues his work today; B. K. S. Iyengar, the founder of Iyengar yoga; and Pattabhi Jois, the father of Ashtanga yoga. Hence, modern hatha yoga is an amalgam of traditions, blending wrestling, gymnastics, and a variety of movement arts that merged with a growing renaissance in physical activity in India, wherein ancient traditions were revived with more physically active asanas. While asana is often the most common way in which many Americans are introduced to yoga, asana is only one small part of the practice of yoga. Yoga philosophy and practice also contain seven additional limbs referred to as astanga, with asta meaning eight and anga referring to the limbs or path of yoga practice, composed of the yamas—nonviolence, truthfulness, nonstealing, nonexcess, and nonpossessiveness—which firmly ground one in ethical practices of everyday life.

The niyamas include the principles of purity, contentment, self-discipline, self-study, and surrender. The asanas include a wide range of physical postures that prepare the body for sitting meditation. The fourth limb, pranayama, or the science of breath, teaches practitioners to link body and breath, enabling one to become ready to practice and understand pratyahara, or the development of sensual awareness, which further teaches one not to be attached to the many distractions that one encounters, achieving single-focused attention. Next, through dhyana, one develops a more single-pointed or focused concentration, which results from pratyahara. As such, meditation is a process of developing a type of witness consciousness, so one can learn to observe one's thoughts, feelings, and sensations as they occur, not placing judgment on the experience, thus enhancing awareness of one's relatedness with others. Dhyana, or meditation, can lead to samadhi, which represents the merging or union of individual consciousness with divine consciousness (e.g., a recognition of our interconnectedness) through an unfolding or complete integration of and dissolution of the boundaries that separate all beings.

Much of contemporary yoga and meditation practices endeavor to make our daily lives more livable versus transcending our human existence through reincarnation, more specific to Hinduism and Buddhism tradition. As a result, meditation and yoga are practiced by people with diverse spirituality or faith systems, emphasizing embracing our humanity to foster a greater sense of compassion and connection. Because the emphasis for many has shifted to improving one's life now, both practices can complement diverse religious or spiritual belief systems. Most significantly perhaps, these practices offer individuals an opportunity to reconnect with the body and something beyond themselves, whatever that may be for each person. For some, yoga will be highly spiritual. For others, the practice may remain mostly physical. In the end, there is no right path or one true practice of yoga or meditation; thus, these practices have much potential for expanding diversity awareness, aiding stress reduction and relaxation, improving concentration and communication, and enhancing relationships across a wide range of human services professions.

Kristen C. Blinne
University of South Florida

See Also: Cultural Paradigms; Health and Sickness, Differing Attitudes Toward; Religion and Clients.

Further Readings

Bush, Mirabi, ed. Contemplation Nation: How Ancient Practices Are Changing the Way We Live. Kalamazoo, MI: Fetzer Institute, 2011.

McCown, Donald, Diane Reibel, and Marc Micozzi. Teaching Mindfulness: A Practical Guide for Clinicians and Educators. New York: Springer, 2010.

Stone, Michael. Yoga for a World Out of Balance: Teachings on Ethics and Social Action. Boston: Shambhala, 2009.

Melting Pot Theory

Addressing the needs of diverse populations continues to perplex human service professionals. U.S. society reflects the push and pull of conservative melting pot ideologies that propose conformity to a national culture while often denying service recipients the promised benefits of equitable inclusion. Despite social scientific efforts to discredit melting pot ideologies, the metaphor of a smoldering alloy of races and cultures continues to have substantial influence on service recipients. Melting pot ideologies ignore cultural differences and are reenergized in the minds of young human service apprentices by Eurocentric middle-class policies that guide their professions.

Origins of the Melting Pot and the Establishment of White Privilege

The notion of the melting pot originated in 1782 in J. Hector St. John de Crevecoeur's Letters From an American Farmer. It was not until Israel Zangwill's 1908 play—The Melting Pot—that it took on full force. Large waves of southern and eastern European immigrant groups were resisted by older and more established British, German, and Irish descendants known as nativists. There was an aggressive call for assimilation, intermarriage, and acculturation to decrease the perceived threat of immigrants from Poland, Italy, and Russia. The Chinese, often defined as illegal, were restricted, relegating them to isolated ethnic enclaves. The melding of European identities forged under ideologies of whiteness came to be understood as the norm to be followed. In this way, the foundation of white privilege, within the purview of the protestant ethic, was cemented.

The Melting Pot Versus Cultural Pluralism and the Social Sciences

Early academics such as Randolph Bourne with his 1916 essay Trans-National America and Horace Kallen in his 1915 Democracy Versus the Melting

Pot article, argued for cultural pluralism: a respect for diversity that would strengthen the nation. However, as most social scientists of the time, they accepted the racial stock or types promoted by contemporary anthropologists. Dr. Ales Hrdlicka, curator of the Division of Physical Anthropology, used racial classifications to argue against the melting pot with respect to American settler descendants. Franz Boas, the father of modern anthropology, however, argued against ideas of racial purity and superiority while advocating for cultural distinctiveness. He realized that there was greater biological variability within the so-called races than between them. He opposed the eugenics movement that sought to rid the world of "weaker races." Ahead of his time, he noted that the repression of cultural differences would delay rather than hasten the acculturation process desired by Nativists.

During the 1940s, John Dewey promoted the idea of cultural pluralism further. Social work and other human service professions, however, have fallen short. Historian Michael Reisch, in his discussion of the melting pot, explains that social work has perpetuated numerous injustices by enforcing political policies that maintain its professional status while contradicting its values of social justice. Individualist values sponsored by political and social service's initiatives have clashed with the collectivist ideals of marginalized groups in self-help ventures.

During the early 20th century, for example, most social workers saw immigrant waves as an obstacle to the politically supported melting pot interventions. African Americans, Latinos, and Native Americans became the targets of aggressive civilizing projects. Jane Addams's work with African Americans in the settlement houses was the most notable exception. For the most part, even after the Depression and New Deal, African Americans and Latinos were denied the protection against discrimination of the Social Security and the National Labor Relations Acts. During World War II, social workers began to focus on universal social welfare programs and intergroup relationships due to the contradictions between military segregation and the struggle against fascism. The ideal of the melting pot remained intact; however, due to the profession's neglect of a systemic policy analysis, they espoused melting pot and professional practices of cultural exclusion that prioritized those of European descent.

From the 1960s to the Present

Although the emphasis in human services has continued to be on professionalization, the 1960s marked a greater move toward diversity. Daniel Glazer's and Nathan Moynihan's sociological study Beyond the Melting Pot provided reasons for the continued debate. Alejandro Portes, in his critique of their work, discovered that complete assimilation depended on the immigrant group's mode of incorporation into the nation. Some Euro-American groups assimilated with ease, losing all identifiable ethnic markers; others had to work harder to be accepted but managed to climb beyond the glass ceiling.

Cultural pluralism became a reality for groups who were excluded from the ideal of nation and for those who chose to maintain their culture while making use of the benefits of American citizenship. Other studies, however, have revealed the existence of more complicated dynamics pointing to context-specific cultural allegiances. Ann Rynearson's 1980 doctoral dissertation discusses greater adaptive heterogeneity within specific ethnic groups, thus contradicting the melting pot theory even further. She explores how a particular Mexican American enclave in St. Louis practiced strong ethnic ties within group-specific celebrations but refrained to do so in the wider society.

The metaphor of the melting pot continues to be energized within anti-immigration political discourses while also maintaining a diversity of meanings. It is often used to refer to groups who have lost touch with their ethnic origins depicted as solely American. However, it is also used to portray diversity within a common institutional or situational context. A major difference between the idea of the melting pot and that of cultural pluralism lies in the perspective of those in the positions to observe and judge others. In the melting pot, there is an external view of internal group dynamics where the members are devalued as mechanical components of a dominant cultural system. In cultural pluralism, however, there is a more complex engagement between external and internal cultural dynamics, thus providing a greater validation of its members.

It behooves human service professionals to become aware of the sociopolitical forces at play in the cultural depictions of diverse populations that affect intervention decisions. A promising way to explore adaptive cultural strategies that oppose melting pot homogenization is to employ the paradigms of cultural humility and transformative complicity. By defining service seekers as experts of their own experience and remaining open to difference, cultural humility promotes greater understanding and validation between service providers and recipients. Transformative complicity involves a critical reflection of provider participation in oppressive institutional dynamics while engaging in calculated risk sharing to increase positive transformative agency. Together, cultural humility and transformative complicity promote responsive interventions that validate recipient-defined cultural adaptations and human service social justice values.

Roxanna Duntley-Matos
Western Michigan University

See Also: Acculturation; Assimilation; Cultural Determinism; Cultural Humility, Model of; Cultural Paradigms; Culturally Diverse Practice, Definition of; Culturally Specific Services; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Ethnocentrism; Multicultural Education; Race, Social Definitions of.

Further Readings

Duntley-Matos, R. and I. Way. "Cultural Genograms: Promoting Cultural Humility, Awareness of Intersecting Identities, and Transformative Complicity as Prerequisites to Culturally Responsive Health Services. First Interdisciplinary Conference." In Diversity and Inclusion: Preparing Ourselves to Advance Health Equity. Western Michigan University, 2013.

Ortega, R. M. and K. C. Faller. "Training Child Welfare Workers From an Intersectional Cultural Humility Perspective: A Paradigm Shift." Child Welfare, v.90/5 (2011).

Portes, Alejandro. "'An Enduring Vision: The Melting Pot That Did Happen' in Beyond the Melting Pot 35 Years Later: On the Relevance of a Sociological Classic for the Immigration Metropolis of Today." International Migration Review, v.34/1 (2000).

Reisch, Michael. "From Melting Pot to Multiculturalism: The Impact of Racial and Cultural Diversity on Social Work and Social Justice in the USA." The British Journal of Social Work, v.38/4 (2008).

Rynearson, Ann Manry. "Hiding Within the Melting Pot: Mexican Americans in St. Louis." Washington University, ProQuest, UMI Dissertations Publishing, 1980.

Mental Health, International Variations in Attitudes Toward

Attitudes toward mental health are reflected in knowledge about, discrimination of, and advocacy for individuals with mental disorders. Globally, mental health conditions have been regarded with considerable discrimination, lack of knowledge, and limited advocacy, which have a great impact at individual and systemic levels. For instance, worldwide, significant numbers of individuals with severe mental illnesses experience discrimination, which encourages concealment of the disorder and discourages seeking treatment. At the systemic level, negative attitudes toward psychopathology curb resources dedicated to mental health services and reduce accessibility of such services.

Although mental health problems have typically been viewed negatively, attitudes toward mental illness differ among and within nations, depending on factors such as the countries' developmental stage, cultures, and subcultures. For example, various ethnic groups with differing attitudes toward mental illness exist within the United States. Compared to Caucasians, Hispanic and Asian Americans tend to believe that individuals with mental illness are more dangerous. Additionally, African Americans report more positive attitudes toward seeking treatment than Caucasians, but these attitudes become more negative subsequent to seeking such treatment.

These changes in attitudes may result from limited cultural sensitivity of available mental health assessments, diagnoses, and treatments. Furthermore, subcultures exist even within the various ethnic and racial groups of countries. This entry focuses primarily on differences in attitudes as a function of a country's developmental stage. Understanding international variations in attitudes toward mental illness is important as these attitudes impact global responses to mental health and treatment of individuals with mental disorders.

Attitudinal Variations Among Developed Countries

Developed countries are defined by advanced economies, industrialization, and infrastructure and tend to manifest less stigmatization of mental illness compared to developing countries. This may be due to mental health advocacy increasing over the past 30 years in developed nations such as Australia, Canada, and the United States. However, attitudes toward mental illness vary across developed countries. For example, citizens of Japan show greater negative attitudes toward persons with mental illness when compared to citizens of the United States. Similarly, citizens of Hong Kong, China, tend to strongly oppose the development of rehabilitation centers near their living quarters due to beliefs that community violence would increase. This is despite their moderate levels of knowledge and concern about mental health. This stigma may be a result of several modern mental health services originating in the United States, which may limit the efficacy of these treatments for citizens of nations with cultures vastly different from the United States such as China and Japan.

Citizens of European nations, such as Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, and Spain, have also shown considerable negative attitudes toward mental illness, particularly regarding those seeking help. More than one-third of European citizens reportedly believe that seeking help for mental illness will result in outcomes worse than or equal to not seeking help. However, these beliefs do not always predict behavior as a majority of European, particularly Spanish, individuals report feeling comfortable seeking mental health treatment. German citizens exhibit the least positive attitudes, while citizens of Spain exhibit the most positive attitudes toward mental health treatment compared to other European countries.

Across countries in the Middle East, it appears that citizens of Israel, one of the most developed Middle Eastern nations, display less stigma toward mental illness compared to lesser-developed countries in the Middle East. Citizens of Israel practice greater self-disclosure, are confident in mental health services, and show greater openness to seeking help for mental disorders. These attitudes may be a result of Israel's adoption of a universal health care system and, thus, greater allocation of resources to mental health services in this region. However, variations in attitudes toward mental health exist within Israel, as Jewish and Arabic individuals place different emphases on mental health. Qatar is another highly developed country in the Middle East; however, citizens of Qatar exhibit poor knowledge and negative beliefs about mental illness. The people of Qatar, particularly women, tend to believe that mental disorders are caused by spiritual forces rather than biopsychosocial causes and that mental illness increases violence. Similarly, despite economic development, citizens of Kuwait show greater stigma toward mental health disorders and less confidence in the utility of mental health services, which may be due to Kuwait's limited accessibility to mental health resources.

Attitudinal Variations Among Developing Countries

Developing countries, which are defined by a lack of industrialization, limited economy, and limited infrastructure, have been shown to have twice as much stigma toward mental illness as developed countries. For instance, citizens of the developing nation of India exhibit greater stigma toward mental illness than the developed nation of the United States. Specifically, citizens of India tend to believe that mental illness is controllable by the afflicted individual and place greater confidence in traditional forms of treating mental illness such as social support and spiritual practices.

There appears to be significant variation in attitudes toward mental illness among developing countries within the Middle East. For instance, the state of Palestine holds positive attitudes toward mental health that are comparable to the developed nation of Israel. Palestinian citizens exhibit greater self-disclosure, help-seeking behaviors, and confidence in mental health services compared to other developing nations in the Middle East. However, systemic (e.g., multiple systems of delivery) and physical barriers (e.g., road blocks) increase difficulties accessing mental health services in Palestine. Citizens of Egypt, however, tend to exhibit more negative attitudes, possibly due to the limited availability of services and greater reported need for these services. The lower confidence in modern mental health services exhibited by developing Middle Eastern nations may be a consequence of limited availability and accessibility of these services. Furthermore, because many mental health services originate from developed nations, their efficacy and utility in developing nations may be limited.

Similar negative attitudes toward mental illness exist in developing African nations. For example, in Ethiopia, citizens prefer traditional practices for treating mental illness rather than modern mental health services. Citizens of African nations also may attribute mental illness to supernatural causes, which thwarts the development of mental health services in these nations. In developing Latin and Caribbean countries (e.g., Mexico or Dominica), there appears to be more similarities than differences when compared to developed countries. Citizens of Latin and Caribbean nations generally have more confidence in modern mental health treatments than traditional or spiritual practices used to combat mental illness.

Caitlin Wolford-Clevenger
Jeniimarie Febres
Gregory L. Stuart
University of Tennessee, Knoxville

See Also: Disabilities, International Variation in Attitudes Toward; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Help-Seeking Behavior, Cultural Differences in; Role Flexibility, International Differences in.

Further Readings

Alonso, Jordi, et al. "Association of Perceived Stigma and Mood and Anxiety Disorders: Results From the World Mental Health Surveys." Acta Psychiatrica Scandinavica, v.118/4 (2008).

Angermeyer, Matthias C. and Sandra Dietrich. "Public Beliefs About and Attitudes Towards People With Mental Illness: A Review of Population Studies." Acta Psychiatrica Scandinavica, v.113/3 (2006).

Mental Health Gap Action Program

The World Health Organization (WHO), the directing and coordinating authority on international health within the United Nations' system, launched its flagship program on mental health, the Mental Health Gap Action Program (mhGAP), in 2008. Grounded on the best available scientific and epidemiological evidence related to mental, neurological, and substance use (MNS) disorders, the program has been developed to facilitate the integration of prevention and treatment services into health care systems across the globe. The mhGAP aims to scale up mental health services, especially in resource-constrained settings, for the purpose of bridging the extant gap between population needs and available resources. Through the mhGAP, WHO calls on governments, donors, and mental health stakeholders to expand and improve mental health services worldwide for the purpose of reducing both individual and societal burdens associated with MNS disorders.

Developed to enhance the capacity of member states to respond to the treatment gap challenge, the mhGAP provides a framework for scaling up MNS disorder interventions. However, it is only intended as a guide, one that aims to provide health planners, policy makers, and donors with a clear and coherent set of activities and programs for scaling up care for MNS disorders. Designed to account for contextual variables, feasibility, and barriers, the mhGAP presents a template for intervention packages and provides the flexibility necessary for requisite adjustments and adaptations relative to the context-specific needs of diverse cultures and populations that exist among countries as well as within countries.

Scaling up mental health care is a social, political, and institutional process that engages a range of contributors, interest groups, and organizations. Successful scaling up requires collective action and the collaborative efforts of governments, health professionals, civil society, communities, and families, with support from the international community. In collaboration with partners, WHO will provide technical support to countries in order to implement guidelines for scaling up care.

The Need and the Challenge

MNS disorders are prevalent across all cultures and contribute significantly to morbidity and premature mortality. Although the efficacy of treatment is well documented, population studies indicate that more than two-thirds of the individuals experiencing mental illness receive no treatment. Worldwide, the average portion of those who do not receive treatment lies between 50 and 60 percent; however, that number increases to nearly 80 percent in low- and middle low-income countries. Subsequently, 13 percent of the global burden of disease has been attributed to neuropsychiatric disorders.

However, despite the prevalence of MNS disorders, approximately one-third of the world's countries lack a mental health budget, and of the countries that do allocate funds, many assign disproportionately small percentages of their budgets to mental health services. The disparity between needs and services, defined as the treatment gap, leaves a large unserved population. Exacerbating the problems attendant to insufficient resources are the inequitable and inefficient uses of available resources. Misapplication of funds, in turn, limits treatment efficacy for those individuals who are able to access services.

Mental Health Is Fundamental to Overall Well-Being

Characterized from a holistic perspective, WHO's constitution defines health as "a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease and infirmity." Implicit in the description is the assertion that mental health is essential to overall health. However, not only is mental health crucial to the optimal development and overall well-being of individuals, it is also essential to the healthy development of societies and countries.

Multiple social, psychological, and biological factors influence an individual's level of mental health at any point in time across the life span. Mental health is adversely affected by chronic social conditions such as poverty, community violence, racism, and discrimination and is linked in complex ways with other health conditions including both communicable and noncommunicable diseases as well as with injuries. Compounding the suffering accompanying MNS disorders are stigma and human rights violations.

While the mhGAP does not address every MNS disorder, it has identified several priority conditions. These conditions were selected on the basis of the large burden they represent in terms of mortality, morbidity, or disability, the high economic costs they incur, and their association with violations of human rights. The priority conditions identified are as follows: depression, psychosis, bipolar disorders, epilepsy, developmental and behavioral disorders in children and adolescents, dementia, alcohol use disorders, drug use disorders, and self-harm and suicide.

Mental Health Gap Action Program Intervention Guide

In a majority of countries, scaling up services for MNS disorders means expanding services beyond mental health specialist settings into first- and second-level facilities. Therefore, to assist health professionals, WHO presented the Mental Health Gap Action Program Intervention Guide (mhGAP-IG) in 2010 for use in nonspecialist health settings. The mhGAP-IG places competent MNS disorders diagnoses and management into the hands of nonmental health professionals including doctors, nurses, and other health care providers.

The mhGAP-IG provides a full range of recommendations for delivering high-quality care at first- and second-level facilities located in resource-poor settings. Utilizing protocols for clinical decision making, it presents integrated management of priority conditions. The mhGAP-IG evidence-based guidelines are formatted as flowcharts in order to simplify the diagnostic and intervention process while enabling health care professionals to tailor services to meet the needs of each individual client.

While the mhGAP-IG is a model guide, WHO strongly recommends that it be adapted to national and local situations. Adaptation is necessary to ensure that the conditions that contribute most to the burden in a specific country are included in the mhGAP-IG and that the mhGAP-IG is appropriate for and compatible with the local conditions that affect the care of individuals presenting with MNS disorders in a particular health facility. Adaptation should include language translation as well as necessary adjustments to ensure that the interventions are acceptable in the sociocultural context and suitable for the local health system.

Moving Forward

On May 27, 2010, the 66th World Health Assembly adopted the Comprehensive Mental Health Action Plan for 2013 through 2020. The plan does not duplicate the mhGAP; rather, it both complements and builds upon it. Emphasizing the need to develop a strong civil society and to empower individuals experiencing mental disabilities, this action plan sets important new directions for mental health by highlighting the importance of protecting and promoting human rights as well as advocates for a central role in the provision of community-based care and support. It also addresses a number of social determinants related to mental health including, but not limited to, income and occupational concerns, educational opportunities, housing, and social services.

About WHO

Following the inception of the United Nations in 1945, WHO was founded on April 7, 1948, a date now celebrated annually as World Health Day. WHO is currently comprised of 193 countries and two associate members and presently employs nearly 8,000 people in 147 country offices and six regional offices; and their headquarters are located in Geneva, Switzerland. The organization's goal and subsequent corresponding actions have been and continue to be directed toward ensuring the world's population access to quality health care.

Karmen K. Boehlke
Larry L. Ashely
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

See Also: Chronic Diseases Common in Developing Countries; Global Burden of Disease; Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Further Readings

Kohn, Robert, Saxena Shekhar, Itzhak Levav, and Benedetto Saraceno. "The Treatment Gap in Mental Health Care." Bulletin of the World Health Organization, v.82 (2004).

Saraceno, Benedetto and Tarun Dua. "Global Mental Health: The Role of Psychiatry." European Archive Psychiatry Clinical Neuroscience, v.259/2 (2009).

World Health Organization. "MhGAP Intervention Guide for Mental, Neurological, and Substance Use Disorders in Non-Specialized Settings." http://www.who.int/mental_health/evidence/mhgap_intervention_guide/en/index.html (Accessed September 2013).

World Health Organization. "Scaling Up for Mental, Neurological, and Substance Use Disorders." http://www.who.int/mental_health/mhgap_final_english.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of

Mental health refers not just to the presence or absence of mental illness but to the ability to cope with life stressors in a manner that does not severely impact daily life functioning. A variety of cultural characteristics can impact a person's ability to seek, afford, and access mental health services and resources. Culture, when defined broadly, includes the beliefs, values, and norms of a specific group. With a vast range of cultural groups, subgroups, and individual variations, cultural characteristics are important because they influence what both seekers of mental health treatment and service providers (clinicians, medical providers, social workers, etc.) bring to the treatment setting. Specifically, cultural characteristics impact three major aspects of mental health service delivery including (1) how and when symptoms are communicated and reported (dependent upon the culture's meaning of symptoms and the amount of stigma of mental illness), (2) the ability of mental health consumers to understand and navigate the system of care and resources offered, and (3) the course of treatment sought and recommended (dependent upon the training and beliefs of both the individual seeking treatment and the delivery service providers).

A shift in the model of mental health service delivery from a more institutionalized delivery of care (pre-1970s) to largely community and outpatient mental health settings (1970s to present) has also impacted the ability to access appropriate mental health care within various U.S. cultural groups.

Stereotyping cultural groups and how they use mental health services can be misleading when focusing on an individual's mental health needs and symptoms; however, an awareness of cultural influences and beliefs can provide service providers with a greater understanding and sensitivity to the diverse needs of their clients. For example, racism, discrimination, and poverty are very real cultural elements that affect the use and access of mental health services. An understanding of the impact of these elements may alter the current model of mental health service delivery to be more responsive to the needs of those cultural groups who have historically underutilized mental health services.

Communication and Reporting of Mental Health Symptoms

Cultural beliefs of what constitutes a sign and symptom of mental illness, the meanings attributed to them, and where their origins lie all impact whether an individual believes that his or her mental health is affected and, if so, how and when they communicate these symptoms. According to the U.S. National Institute of Mental Health, differing cultural interpretations of mental health symptoms include (1) the beliefs that a cultural group holds about whether a mental illness is of the body, of the mind, or both, (2) whether it is a real or an imagined illness, (3) whether it is shameful or stigmatized within the culture, and (4) whether it warrants treatment (and if so, what kind of provider would be most appropriate).

In general, patients tend to communicate or report mental health symptoms to service providers in ways that are culturally acceptable and meaningful to them. For example, Native American populations may believe that certain mental health symptoms are caused or correlated with a spiritual deity; as such, they may be less likely to seek out treatment, and if they do, they may be more likely to use traditional healers than the mental health services found in U.S. professional settings. Similarly, individuals from cultural groups who do not emphasize a mind–body distinction may believe an upset stomach is a natural outgrowth of a negative emotional experience and may describe this symptom as an emotional one. Their expectations of how the symptom would be treated would differ dramatically from what they may receive from Western medical service providers, who may treat an upset stomach as having a physical or biological cause. Similarly, if an individual's culture attaches a great stigma to mental illness, the likelihood of communicating and reporting symptoms of mental illness may be greatly reduced. In some cultures, the individual may be viewed as unmarriagable or may be shunned from society.

Because serious mental illness is disabling to individuals regardless of cultural interpretation, the underreporting or misinterpretation of mental health symptoms may prolong symptoms and hinder the ability to provide adequate medical care. If left untreated, mental illness may also lead to more serious consequences for the individual (e.g., extreme distress or suicide). Mental health service providers that are aware and sensitive to cultural interpretations of mental health symptoms may be better able to address their clients' needs in a manner that navigates the client toward effective mental health treatment.

Navigation of Mental Health Resources and System of Care

Individuals within cultural groups differ in their ability to understand and navigate the systems of care available to them. Traditionally, mental health services are delivered via both the private sector (fee-for-service psychiatrists, psychologists, and clinicians) and public sector (federal- and state-funded case managers, social workers, and clinicians). As there remains a high correlation between one's cultural group and socioeconomic status, individuals from historically underrepresented cultural groups in the United States (e.g., African American, Hispanic, and Native American) often lack medical insurance or the financial resources to pay for private-sector mental health services. As such, in many cities in the United States, these individuals remain largely underserved by private medical professionals and therapists, and their choices for mental health treatment possibilities are often limited to the public sector.

Moreover, individuals who have little experience, funding, or education in navigating large, public institutional systems of care can be at a significant disadvantage when advocating for their mental health needs. The cultural elements associated with poverty and racial discrimination (e.g., lack of insurance, cultural stereotyping, etc.) can affect the amount of information individuals receive about their diagnoses and treatment options as well as the amount of positive interactions they receive from service providers. These elements can significantly impact the quality of treatment they receive.

Course of Treatment Sought and Recommended

Both the cultural characteristics of the mental health consumer and the service provider impact what course of treatment is sought and recommended. Historically, service providers in the United States that are covered by Medicare and private insurance companies were trained to practice traditional Western medicine, which emphasizes scientific inquiry and the use of prescription drugs and clinical therapy to lead to a possible cure of mental illness. These cultural beliefs share wide acceptability within the United States and can impact how providers diagnose and treat mental health issues. For example, many psychiatrists trained in the 1940s and 1950s in the United States were trained to be clinicians and therapists and to operate within a psychoanalytic framework (although theoretical training models varied by U.S. region). The field of U.S. psychiatry training has recently focused on diagnosis and medication of a patient's mental health needs through psychopharmacology and the dissemination of prescription drugs and has focused less on therapy training. Instead, many psychiatrists now refer patients to outside therapy rather than to deliver the therapy themselves. The advent of managed care has reinforced this shift in training and service delivery, creating a culture in which psychopharmacology is more widely accepted than ever before in the United States for the treatment of mental disorders.

Recent Trends in Delivery of Mental Health Services

As the U.S. mental health service delivery model has shifted in recent years from a more institutionalized delivery of care (pre-1970s) to largely community and outpatient mental health settings (1970s-present), the mental health services offered to seekers of mental health treatment have become more fragmented, often occuring within multiple settings away from the treatment seeker's home (e.g., outpatient clinic, regional center, etc.) and often with varying financial obligations and fees. This more-fragmented model of service delivery has impacted individuals within various U.S. cultural groups, making it more difficult for those without adequate tranportation, with limited funds, and with conflicting school or work schedules.

Recent trends in service delivery have sought to address the cultural characteristics that serve as barriers to effective treatment. Cross-system collaboration of mental health services (e.g., mental health community clinics coordinating with existing child welfare and domestic violence systems) and wraparound services (mental health resources and clinical services provided directly within larger institutions such as schools, juvenile justice facilities, and nursing and foster homes) are examples of demonstrated efforts designed to make service delivery easier to access for the mental health consumer. As these recent changes in how and where mental health services are delivered take effect, they may dramatically increase service delivery and usage, particularly among cultural groups who have historically underutilized traditional clinical mental health treatment.

Sheri A. Castro-Atwater
California State University, Los Angeles

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Mental Health Services, Adult; Mental Health Services, Children; Mental Health Services, Ethnic Models and Multicultural Services, Cross Cultural Service Models.

Further Readings

Lee, Courtland, ed. Multicultural Issues in Counseling: New Approaches to Diversity (4th ed.). American Counseling Association, 2013.

Office of the Surgeon General (U.S.). Center for Mental Health Services (U.S.), and National Institute of Mental Health (U.S.). Mental Health: Culture, Race, and Ethnicity: A Supplement to Mental Health: A Report of the Surgeon General. http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/books/NBK44243 (Accessed August 2013).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Administration for Children and Families. "Cross-System Collaboration." https://www.childwelfare.gov/systemwide/mentalhealth/issues/cross.cfm (Accessed August 2013).

Mental Health Services, Adult

The mental health service system in the United States is a patchwork quilt of a variety of both public and private mental health services provided by an array of mental health professionals in different settings and through different formats. Like child and adolescent mental health services, adult mental health services include the prevention, diagnosis of mental disorders, their treatment (including the use of medications to help control the disorder), and follow-up services. The ultimate goal of adult mental health services is to address the symptoms associated with mental disorders and thus to improve the adult's quality of life, with a focus on providing resources to help them sustain this higher quality of life. Mental health services are financed by private service providers including insurance companies such as Blue Cross Blue Shield and by public insurance providers. Medicaid, which provides physical and mental health services for poor persons, and Medicare provide mental health services for adults age 62 and above. Mental health insurance benefits are usually not as significant as benefits for physical health, although mental health service coverage has increased in recent years.

As with child and adolescent mental health services, human diversity is important to adult mental health services because prevention efforts and treatment responses to the needs of adults with mental disorders will vary depending on their cultural background, race, gender, age, and research advances to help understand the influence of genetic factors on the prevalence and development of mental disorders, among other factors.

Common adult mental health diagnoses include major depression, schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD).

Mental Health Assessment and Diagnosis

Accessing and using mental health services may be conceptualized as a traditional linear or step-by-step process or as a nonlinear process in which persons experience setbacks but, ultimately, change or transform their lives into new ones. The nonlinear process is often referred to as the recovery perspective.

In the traditional step-by-step process, the first step in mental health services for adults is recognition of a change in normal behavior through the observation of symptoms. Then, an adult is referred to a mental health professional for an assessment. Adults with mental disorders are diagnosed using the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5). This manual provides a list of symptoms and the severity and frequency with which an adult must have experienced them over a certain period of time in order to be assigned the diagnosis. Common adult mental health diagnoses include major depression, schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, and posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD). An adult's diagnosis may change over time, and frequently adults may have more than one diagnosis.

Adults receive mental health services from a variety of professionals and paraprofessionals. Professionals include psychiatrists and general medical practitioners, who prescribe psychiatric medications when needed. Other professionals include clinical psychologists, licensed clinical social workers, psychiatric nurses, licensed practical counselors, and marriage and family therapists. Paraprofessionals include persons with various levels of training and education such as case management aides, case managers, hospital technicians, and community-based workers. They provide important support services to round out a care plan and follow-up plan.

Crisis Intervention Services

When adults with a mental disorder experience a psychiatric crisis, they may receive crisis intervention services via a community-based psychiatric emergency program or in a hospital emergency room. In either location, the mental health assessment process includes taking a history of mental health needs, assigning a diagnosis, and referring the person to a provider for long-term services that may include inpatient or outpatient mental health services. Outpatient services usually include a follow-up visit with a psychiatrist to monitor medication levels, a therapist or counselor, job training or other skills training, and support groups.

Many adults, like children and adolescents, are prescribed psychotropic medication to help manage the symptoms associated with their mental disorder. While medications alone cannot cure the disorder, they can help the person function better and thus experience a better quality of life. Medications may be used alone or in combination with other interventions or treatments such as cognitive behavioral therapy or individual or family counseling. Medication side effects range from weight gain to blurred vision.

Inpatient Services

Persons diagnosed with a mental disorder may be admitted as inpatients on a voluntary or involuntary basis. When persons are admitted on a voluntary basis, they agree to receive inpatient services. When they are admitted involuntarily, they do not agree to be hospitalized and are admitted because they may be a threat to themselves or someone else. Most persons receive inpatient services from a private or public provider (e.g., state psychiatric hospital) for a short period of time (e.g., one week). Once persons with mental disorders are stabilized, they are discharged from the hospital and referred to outpatient services, which may include individual or group therapy, medication follow-up with a psychiatrist, job training programs, and residential care programs, for example.

Mental Health Recovery Perspective

As with a physical health diagnosis, persons diagnosed with a mental disorder have the capacity to recover from their mental disorders. The Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, a government organization, has defined mental health recovery as "a journey of healing and transformation enabling a person with a mental health problem to live a meaningful life in a community of his or her choice while striving to achieve his or her potential." This perspective is based on self-direction; individual and person-centered care; empowerment; holistic, nonlinear, strengths-based care; peer support; and respect, responsibility, and hope.

Community Support

Advocacy organizations such as the National Alliance on Mental Illness hold local support groups for both persons with mental disorders and their family members. During the last decade, alternative approaches to mental health treatment, such as peer support, have also gained recognition. In peer support services, a current or former consumer of mental health services provides support to someone currently receiving services. Some peer support services are consumer operated, including consumer case management aids and consumer-operated drop-in centers. The International Association of Peer Supporters defines peer supporters are persons who have maintained their own mental health recovery over time through personal commitments to their own recoveries. Through a motivating approach, they share lessons learned about recovery and have completed organized training and workshops in preparation for working with other persons.

Mental Health Services for Special Population Groups: Criminal Justice Settings and Military Veterans

Adults with mental disorders may end up in jails, state prisons, or federal penitentiaries. Many adults in such settings have diagnosed mental disorders. Often, they receive no mental health treatment or a lower intensity of mental health treatment, though they have high behavioral and mental health needs.

The Iraq and Afghanistan wars highlighted the importance of providing mental health services for the up to 20 percent of returning veterans who experience PTSD. Some veterans may not reveal their need or access mental health services for PTSD due to the stigma attached to mental illness. Many veterans have a choice of using a civilian, employer-provided health plan or military mental health providers, and they may choose to use their employer-provided plan or receive mental health services through hospital or community-based providers or clinics. Sometimes, veterans are referred to an outpatient clinic in the community for care, or they may participate in a service program especially developed for veterans with PTSD. President Obama signed an Executive Order in August 2012 to both increase the number of mental health providers in the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) and to build partnerships between community service providers and VA providers to enhance access to mental health care for veterans and fill the gaps in mental health services for veterans.

A. Suzanne Boyd
University of North Carolina at Charlotte

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Cultural Responsiveness of; Group Therapy; Mental Health Services, Child; National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities; National Institute of Mental Health; Self-Harm, Cultural Aspects of; Trauma-Focused Services; Veterans Services.

Further Readings

Arbuckle, Margaret Bourdeaux, et al. Child and Adolescent Mental Health: Interdisciplinary Systems of Care. Sudbury, MA: Jones and Bartlett Publishers, 2006.

Burman, M. Audrey, et al. Mental Health Care for Iraq and Afghanistan War Veterans. Health Affairs, v.32/6. http://content.healthaffairs.org/content/28/3/771.full (Accessed July 2013).

International Association of Peer Supporters. "Definition: Peer Supporter." http://na4ps.wordpress.com/definition-peer-specialist (Accessed July 2013).

Mechanic, David, et al. Mental Health and Social Policy: Beyond Managed Care, 6th ed. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Education, 2014.

National Alliance on Mental Illness. "Mental Illnesses: What Is Mental Illness." http://www.nami.org/Template.cfm?Section=By_Illness (Accessed December 2013).

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration News. "Consensus Statement Defines Mental Health Recovery." http://www.samhsa.gov/samhsa_news/volumexiv_2/article4.htm (Accessed July 2013).

U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs. "Public Section: Information on Trauma and PTSD, Veterans, General Public and Family." http://www.ptsd.va.gov/public/index.asp (Accessed July 2013).

U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, National Center for PTSD. "PTSD Research." http://www.ptsd.va.gov/public/pages/ptsd_research.asp (Accessed December 2013).

Mental Health Services, Children

Child mental health services include the prevention, diagnosis, and assessment of mental disorders, their treatment (including the use of medications to help control the symptoms associated with the mental disorder), and follow-up services. The ultimate goal of the provision of child mental health services is to address the symptoms associated with the mental disorder and thus to improve the child's quality of life. Children receive a variety of mental health services from an array of mental health professionals in different settings and through different formats. Human diversity is important to child mental health services because prevention efforts and responses to the needs of children with mental disorders will vary depending on their cultural background, race, gender, age, and other variables.

Mental Health Assessment and Diagnosis

The first step in mental health services for children is recognition of a change in normal behavior through the observation of symptoms. Then, a child is referred to a mental health professional. Children with mental disorders are diagnosed using the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5). This manual provides a list of symptoms and frequency with which a child or adolescent must have experienced them over a certain amount of time in order to be assigned the diagnosis. Common child mental health diagnoses include attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, autism spectrum disorders, oppositional defiant disorder, and conduct disorder. Sometimes, children may have more than one diagnosis, and their diagnoses may change over a short period of time. Children and adolescents frequently convey their mental health needs through their behaviors: withdrawal, problems sleeping, disruptiveness, lying, bed wetting, physical aggressiveness, poor attention span, suicide attempts, poor peer relations, irritability or complaining, defiance, depressive symptoms, or poor social skills. A mental health professional must often figure out which symptoms are the most prominent because what is considered normal varies for children. Recent advances in understanding how genetic components, like the brain, influence behavior, along with a child or youth's environment, have helped further understand child mental disorders.

Medication Intervention

Increasingly, children are prescribed psychotropic medication to help manage the symptoms associated with their mental disorders. While medications alone cannot cure the disorder, they can help the child function better and experience a better quality of life by controlling their symptoms. Medications may be used alone as a single intervention or in combination with other interventions or treatments such as individual or family counseling, play therapy or cognitive therapy. Children and youth may experience side effects from these medications, ranging from drowsiness to weight gain. Medical professionals such as psychiatrists or general practitioners monitor the medication side effects. Medication may have different possible side effects alone or when combined with other medications. Another medication may be prescribed to respond to the side effect, and children may be prescribed more than one medication.

Childhood Trauma

Children who have experienced some type of trauma, such as child abuse or neglect, may experience post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). This occurs when children or youth experience some level of anxiety after they have witnessed or experienced, either directly or indirectly, a traumatic event. Children who are witnesses to domestic violence may experience PTSD. Children who have experienced physical or sexual abuse or neglect may also experience PTSD. They may experience different types of symptoms such as difficulty sleeping, flashbacks of the event, bed wetting, refusing to engage in activities or interests that they enjoyed before the event, worry, or depression. The symptoms vary depending on the child and the traumatic event experienced.

Mental Health Service Settings for Children

After a child is diagnosed, treatment goals and objectives (a treatment plan) are developed, outlining the types of service to be provided for each goal. Common interventions include individual or group counseling or medications to help control symptoms associated with the mental health condition. These interventions may be provided in schools or residential care settings. Children also receive mental health services in a variety of mental health settings, both public and private. Mental health services are defined as interventions or solutions that will help children to improve their quality of life and return to their normal standard.

The majority of children and youth attend public or private school, and a smaller percentage of children are homeschooled. As noted, children and adolescents convey their mental health needs through their behaviors. Teachers often first notice a change in a child's usual behaviors. Youth may be referred to a mental health counselor or school social worker or outside mental health services if needed.

Residential Care Services for Children and Youth With Mental Health Needs

Residential care settings are common treatment venue for children and youth. Sometimes, children and adolescents may need a higher level of behavioral and mental health care than their parents can provide due to the severity of their behaviors or symptoms. When this happens, parents may place their child in a residential setting with staff who are more able to address the child's mental health symptoms. Residential child care settings include foster care, group care, and residential treatment. Therapeutic foster services are provided by foster parents who receive training and skills in helping youth with behavioral and mental health needs live successfully in their environment and provide them with needed supports. Children and youth with similar levels of behavioral and mental health needs may live in a group home or on a campus where intensive mental health services are provided.

Children and youth with the highest or most severe level of mental health challenges may be placed in a residential treatment facility, which involves inpatient, 24-hour-per-day, locked, psychiatric care. Residential child-care settings are staffed with trained mental health professionals from various disciplines to help children improve their quality of life and meet their treatment goals. Of special note, children who reside in juvenile justice settings (e.g., boot camps or juvenile justice centers) may receive mental health services while detained.

Telepsychiatry

Telepsychiatry is an alternative treatment method to face-to-face services; this approach uses cameras, computers, special software, and microphones for children and adolescents, parents, and mental health professionals to videoconference as if they were in the same room together. Telepsychiatry is especially useful for children and adolescents who live in rural or underserved areas. Services such as individual or group counseling, mental health assessment and diagnosis, and medication prescription and management may be delivered through this method.

Mental Health Professionals

Children and youth receive mental health services from a variety of professionals including licensed clinical social workers, clinical psychologists, licensed practical counselors, and psychiatric professionals (e.g., psychiatric nurses, psychiatrists, and general medical practitioners). General practitioners prescribe the majority of medications for psychiatric needs. Generally, psychiatrists are the only professionals other than general medical practitioners who can write prescriptions for medications. Over time, the number of qualified psychiatrists in the United States has markedly declined, especially in rural areas. The dearth of psychiatrists has contributed to an increasing gap in addressing the mental health needs of all populations, including children and adolescents. To address the shortage of qualified mental health professionals, some states, like Louisiana and New Mexico, have granted limited prescription privileges for psychiatric medications to doctoral-level licensed psychologists.

A. Suzanne Boyd
University of North Carolina at Charlotte

See Also: Counseling and Psychotherapy Services; Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Cultural Responsiveness of; Group Homes for Children; Group Therapy; National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System; National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities; National Institute of Mental Health.

Further Readings

Arbuckle, Margaret Bourdeaux, et al. Child and Adolescent Mental Health: Interdisciplinary Systems of Care. Sudbury, MA: Jones & Bartlett, 2006.
National Center for PTSD. "PTSD in Children and Teens." http://www.ptsd.va.gov/public/pages/ptsd-children-adolescents.asp (Accessed June 2013).
National Institute on Mental Health. "Health Topics." http://www.nimh.nih.gov/index.shtml (Accessed June 2013).

Mental Health Services, Ethnic Models and Multicultural

For as long as there has been human society, culture has provided prescriptions for living. Broadly defined, culture refers to a common heritage or set of beliefs, norms, and values. Culture is not static, however; instead, it is fluid and emergent. While culture shapes people, people shape culture.

Mental illness is considered the product of complex interactions between biological, psychological, social, and cultural factors. Culture and society play pivotal roles in mental health, mental illness, and mental health services. Not only does it bear upon what each individual brings into the clinical setting, but it also influences how the clinician interprets and responds to the presenting concerns. For instance, culture accounts for variations in how clients view and communicate their symptoms, which ones they report, whether they even seek help in the first place, what types of help they seek, treatment expectations and treatment responses, what sorts of coping styles and social supports they utilize, and the amount of stigma they attach to mental disorders. From the clinician's perspective, culture bears upon assessment, diagnosis, and the types of interventions utilized.

From Homogeneity to Heterogeneity

For much of the country's history, the dominant culture in the United States focused on western European beliefs, norms, and values. However, America today is unmistakably a culturally pluralistic nation; consequently, mental health professionals increasingly encounter clients whose customs, traditions, values, and worldviews differ from their own. Therefore, in order to effectively traverse the diverse realities of the 21st century, it is helpful to conceptualize and practice within a multicultural framework.

Multicultural Theory and Therapy

Multicultural theory and therapy make culture central to the counseling process and facilitate the delivery of mental health services that are culturally and developmentally appropriate. By virtue of its broad lens, the multicultural perspective is nonreductionistic in nature. Enabling a wide-screen view, multicultural theory provides more inclusive identification of the multiple variables related to human development as well as facilitates a more comprehensive understanding of the myriad of complex outcomes that occur as a result of the dynamics among these variables.

The field of therapy is characterized by multiple theories and diverse systems of practice. While there are many variations of multicultural theory, a generic theory of multiculturalism, or "cross-cultural counseling," a term by which it is also referred, has been recognized as the fourth theoretical force in the mental health profession. It joins the other three major traditions—psychodynamic theory, cognitive-behavioral theory, and existential-humanistic theory—as a primary explanation of human development.

Broadly defined, multicultural counseling addresses the personality dynamics and cultural backgrounds of both the client and the counselor in order to create a therapeutic environment conducive to purposeful interaction. Fundamental to the theory of multiculturalism is the idea that both client and counselor bring a variety of variables to the therapeutic dyad, variables related to factors such as age, gender, sexual orientation, education, ability status, religion, ethnicity, and socioeconomic status. Clinical environments that fail to consider and respect these individual differences or utilize interventions that are incompatible with particular cultures risk doing harm.

Developing Multicultural Competence

Culture is not a concept limited solely to clients. It also applies to individual treatment professionals and the treatment profession as a whole. Therapeutic practice is a cultural system itself. Every group of professionals embodies its own culture in the sense that they too have a shared set of beliefs, norms, and values. The culture of the clinician and the larger health care system influences multiple aspects related to the delivery of care.

The counseling profession has responded to changing demographics by emphasizing the need for practitioners to develop multicultural competencies. Developing counseling competence across cultural boundaries requires both specialized didactic and experiential training as part of the professional development process. Consequently, multicultural theory and therapy have become a major focus in counselor education and are recognized and endorsed by leading counselor education-accrediting agencies and professional associations.

Based on the reality of individual differences, no two humans are alike. Essentially, then, cultural diversity is a characteristic of all counseling relationships. However, despite the inherent multicultural essence of counseling relationships in general, multicultural competency is not an innate counselor characteristic. Rather, developing multicultural competence requires deliberate, conscious effort. In order to function effectively in a pluralistic environment, counseling professionals must achieve self-awareness relevant to their own cultural values and biases, acquire cultural awareness or knowledge with respect to the client's worldview, and develop culturally appropriate intervention strategies and techniques.

Competent multicultural counseling is multifaceted. Responsive multicultural counselors take on multiple roles. In addition to the role of mental health specialist, clinicians also serve as advocates, change agents, consultants, advisers, facilitators of indigenous support systems, and facilitators of indigenous healing systems.

Ethical Considerations in a Diverse Society

Ethics are rules of conduct or moral principles that guide the practices of clinical professionals. Ethically conscientious counselors strive to provide the best possible services to their clients and practice in a manner that reflects the profession's highest standards. The nature of the counseling process—that is, the close alliance between counselor and client—makes ethical standards a crucial aspect of the counseling process.

Recognizing diversity in our society and developing multicultural competence are fundamental to ethical counseling practice. Ethical practice requires counselors to be aware of cultural differences so that they can modify their approaches when working with clients of differing cultural backgrounds. Competent cross-cultural counseling recognizes that homogeneity is simply an allusion. In addition to acknowledging between-group differences, it is also essential to understand within-group differences in order to tailor services to each individual client. Tailoring services has the capacity to enhance the therapeutic alliance, improve treatment outcomes, and reduce premature termination.

A mental health professional is first and foremost called on to protect and foster the welfare of his or her client. As such, the psychological perspective cannot be allowed to overshadow the ecological. This is important because psychotherapy is limited in its ability to address issues that require social and political solutions. Unfortunately, discrimination against individuals based on their differences with respect to race, ethnic origin, gender, disability, religion, political affiliation, or sexual orientation is a fact of life in U.S. society. Professional counselors who fail to recognize this and do not assist their clients in coping with this reality do a tremendous disservice to their clients.

Karmen K. Boehlke
Larry L. Ashley
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

See Also: Cross-Cultural Skills; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of; Mental Health Services, Ethnic Models and Multicultural Service; Pluralism.

Further Readings

Baruth, Leroy G. and M. Lee Manning. Multicultural Counseling and Psychotherapy: A Lifespan Perspective. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Education, 2007.

Courtland, Lee C. Multicultural Issues in Counseling: New Approaches to Diversity. Alexandria, VA: American Counseling Association, 2006.

Hoshmand, Lisa Tsoi, ed. Culture, Psychotherapy, and Counseling: Critical and Integrative Perspectives. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2006.

Monk, Gerald, John Winslade, and Stacey Sinclair. New Horizons in Multicultural Counseling. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2008.

Mexican Americans

Mexican Americans are the largest Latino group and are expected to number approximately 59 million by 2050. Although the majority of Mexican Americans in the United States are here as a result of immigration, Mexicans were native to what is now the southwestern United States. As such, they are the only other minority group similar to Native Americans in that they were annexed by conquest and have their rights "safeguarded" by a treaty. Despite the longtime presence of Mexican Americans in the United States, there continue to be many barriers to access of human services as well as a continued lack of culturally competent services. These barriers to access as well as Mexican American history and culture are described, thus providing human service professionals with necessary knowledge in order to provide culturally competent services.

Contact and Conflict

Mexican Americans have a 150-year presence in the United States. The annexation of Mexicans through conquest set the stage for the difficult adjustment and continued exploitation still seen today. Prior to the U.S. westward expansion, Mexico extended north to include an area now known as Texas, California, New Mexico, Arizona, Oregon, Nevada, and part of Utah and Wyoming. Already concerned about U.S. encroachment, the Mexican government offered American settlers tracts of land on the condition that they obey Mexican law and become Mexican citizens. By 1835, American settlers outnumbered Mexicans in northern Mexico, and tensions grew. Settlers resented both being governed by a people they viewed as inferior and Mexican policies such as antislavery laws. Conflict erupted when Texas declared itself an independent republic in 1836. When Mexican General Antonio Lopez Santa Anna resumed control of the San Antonio area, the U.S. government responded by sending aid into Texas, resulting in the capture of Santa Anna and the signing away of Texas. Conflict continued, partly due to a difference regarding the boundary between Texas and Mexico; Texas regarded the Rio Grande River as the boundary, while Mexico regarded the Nueces River as the boundary.

After the annexation of Texas in 1846, U.S. President James Polk ordered General Taylor into the disputed land between the Rio Grande and Nueces Rivers, provoking Mexico to battle over what was perceived as an invasion. International war ensued, resulting in Mexico's surrender in 1848 under the terms of the Treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, in which approximately half of Mexico's territory was ceded to the United States. Mexicans who remained in this region became U.S. citizens by default, creating a new minority group within the United States. While the Treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo guaranteed Mexicans full rights of citizenship, Anglos considered them an inferior people and did not take their rights seriously. For example, Mexicans were dispossessed of substantial land holdings, leaving both elite and peasant Mexicans as landless laborers located in the bottom of the U.S. stratification system.

The Immigration Context

Mexican immigration to the United States has been shaped by push and pull factors. Political upheaval and economic conditions in Mexico have provided the push factor, while the need for unskilled labor in the U.S. provided the pull factor. The historical trend of immigration has been that of exploiting Mexican labor during labor shortages and then abusing Mexican civil rights during times of economic recession. For example, in the 1910s, immigration restrictions were waived in order to fill labor shortages in agriculture. When the Great Depression hit in 1929, efforts to deport Mexicans regardless of immigration or citizenship status were initiated. This pattern occurs again during the World War II labor shortages with the initiation of the Bracero Program. Bracero is a loose translation of a farmhand. This policy, however, stimulated a stream of undocumented workers to fill positions with employers wishing to avoid the bureaucratic red tape of the Bracero Program. The Bracero Program was halted in 1964 due to complaints of mistreatment of Mexican laborers; however, Mexicans continue to be essential to the agriculture industry in many parts of the United States.

Today, Mexicans make up more than two-thirds of the immigrant population. More than one in two Mexican immigrants are undocumented. Destinations for Mexican immigrants have historically been California, Texas, Illinois, and Arizona. However, Mexican migration to new areas such as the southern United States has increased dramatically, posing challenges to human services providers unaccustomed to servicing this group. While Mexican migration flows have diminished due to the economic recession and increased border enforcement, it is estimated that migration flows will continue due to the demand for labor.

Mexican American Cultural Context

Keeping in mind that cultural differences occur within Mexican Americans due to gender, acculturation levels, education, class, and so on, the following section discusses cultural values and characteristics associated with Mexican Americans. Family is highly valued and considered more important than the individual. Extended family members such as aunts, uncles, grandparents, and godparents may be involved in an individual's life. Given this value, human service providers must consider the stress that may result from choosing to go outside the family to solve personal problems. Other concepts commonly associated with Mexican American culture are machismo and marianismo, which describe gender role expectations for men and women. Men are considered the provider and protector, while the woman must represent purity and selfless love. Spiritualism and religion also tend to be very important among Mexican Americans. Thus, faith-based organizations can play an important role in service provision. Other cultural values include interdependence, respect for those in a position of authority, and personalismo, or the value on personal relationships over the task or presenting problem.

Acculturation and Adaptation

While previous acculturation theories of the 1950s assumed that maintaining the culture of the country of origin posed mental health risks, recent acculturation theories suggest that Mexican Americans who try to assimilate have more psychological difficulties than those who remain connected to their culture. The ability to move between cultures creates a psychological flexibility known as a borderlands identity or navigational capital. This model is particularly suited to Mexican Americans who tend to maintain family, social, and economic ties to Mexico.

The predominant form of adaptation for Mexican Americans continues to be that of segregation. Mexican Americans have faced segregation in public facilities such as schools, restaurants, movie theaters, swimming pools, and housing. For example Mexican schools were instituted in Texas in 1902. Current segregation patterns in the schools have resulted in Latino children now being more segregated than black children. Thus, human service professionals should be sensitive not only to the cultural differences with their Mexican clients but also the consequences of discrimination. It is important to note that it is the later generations of Mexican Americans who experience more serious social ills compared to the immigrant generation due to the loss of protective factors associated with Mexican culture combined with continued experiences of discrimination.

Human Service Provision

Undocumented Mexican immigrants face the most challenges, lacking access to human services due to their immigration status and fearing deportation when using services. Providers and agencies should work to develop trusting relationships within the Mexican immigrant community so that, through word of mouth, they become known as a safe place for undocumented immigrants. In regards to acculturation, more acculturated individuals display more familiarity and knowledge about available resources. Thus, those with lower levels of acculturation may need additional information from providers about existing services. Providers should also consider incorporating the use of cultural practices such as personalismo. By considering Mexican American history, patterns of immigration, and culture, the human service professional will be more likely to develop trusting and respectful relationships with clients and increase the likelihood of successful outcomes.

Leticia Villarreal Sosa
Dominican University

See Also: Assimilation; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Hispanic Americans; Immigration Law, History of U.S.; Undocumented Immigrants.

Further Readings

Acuña, Rodolgo. Occupied America: A History of Chicanos. New York: HarperCollins, 1988.

Hurtado, Aida and Patricia Gurin. Chicana/o Identity in a Changing U.S. Society. ¿Quién soy? ¿Quiénes somos? Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 2004.

Organista, Kurt. Solving Latino Psychosocial and Health Problems. Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley & Sons, 2007.

Microlending Programs

Microlending programs are one form of microfinance that includes savings, insurance, and other financial services for people considered too enmeshed in poverty to be served by traditional banking systems. Most microlending programs began as nongovernmental organizations in developing nations that relied on government grants and charitable support to sustain operations, and accordingly, the goals of microlending programs go beyond the financial. Advocates of these programs consider microlending to be a new way of looking at poverty alleviation and social change. By providing access to small loans at modest interest rates, microlending programs intend to unlock the entrepreneurial energies of the poor to increase human capital among the poor and improve civic engagement by the poor.

The contemporary form of microlending is attributed to the pioneering efforts of the 2006 Nobel Prize-winning Muhammad Yunus and the institution he founded in Bangladesh, Grameen Bank. Microlending programs have grown exponentially since the first personal loans Yunus offered to local villagers in the 1970s. The Microfinance Information Exchange, Inc. (MIX), a U.S. nonprofit organization that collects and analyzes global microfinance data, claims to collect data from 80 percent of microfinance institutions in the world. In 2011, MIX reported 95.1 million borrowers at 1,365 microfinance institutions. The outstanding loans totaled $87 billion with significant regional variation from a low average of $153 per borrower in south Asia to a high average of $1,862 per borrower in eastern Europe and central Asia.

Group Lending

Conventional bank lending to low income individuals without stable incomes or assets to use for collateral are rarely available to the clientele who are the focus of microlending programs. The classical method of overcoming individual credit risk deficiencies in microlending is group lending. In the Grameen Bank approach, five individuals self-organize into a group in which individual loans are staged over time. Repayments are scheduled at frequent intervals and processed in public meetings. Using this methodology has been highly effective, with more than 98 percent of loans being repaid in a timely manner in many countries. Economists note that self-organizing into groups makes use of local knowledge about borrower intent to repay; that modest degrees of joint liability among group members promote peer monitoring that helps prevent default; and that public repayment enhances social cohesion and can lead to effective social sanctions that promote repayment.

A loan officer from the GiveWell visits the nongovernmental organization the Small Enterprise Foundation in Tzaneen, South Africa, in 2010. The financial empowerment of women in poverty is perceived by many microlenders as the best means of achieving the social objectives associated with microfinance.

Gender Diversity

Women are overrepresented among the poorest of the poor in almost every nation, are frequently more focused on within-household financial needs than their male counterparts, and are generally considered to be exceptionally committed to the health and education of their children. The financial empowerment of women in poverty is perceived by many microlenders as the best means of achieving the social objectives associated with microfinance. No organization more strongly demonstrates the focus on gender diversity than the Microcredit Summit Campaign, with the goal of extending credit to 175 million of the world's poorest households by 2015. More than 78 percent of the loans reported through 2011 by the 720 cooperating microfinance institutions were made to women borrowers.

Future Challenges for Microlending

The goals of microlending—poverty alleviation and social change—require evidence of efficacious outcomes to sustain the governmental and charitable funding streams upon which the expansion of microlending has relied. To date, the more rigorous outcomes suggest mixed results, with the majority of borrowers experiencing little economic improvement. In many national studies, those who find the loans an additional financial burden match those who gained. Measuring outcomes has become more complex as nonbank financial institutions and even commercial banks have entered the microfinance marketplace and siphoned off the more profitable borrowers.

As microlending has expanded, classical group lending has proven inadequate to address lending in sparsely settled rural areas and highly mobile and socially disconnected urban centers. Many borrowers who succeed financially chafe at the limitations of group lending, and the proliferation of microlending programs creates more competition among lenders. Accordingly, micro lenders have experimented with traditional forms of individual lending, have expanded financial services to enable savings, and have provided access to insurance. Some have questioned the degree of mission drift that is associated with the expansion as microlenders seek to achieve financial sustainability without governmental or charitable subsidies.

To cope with the escalating costs associated with these new services and the increased risk of individual loans, some microlending programs increase interest rates and pursue commercial capital access. When microlending programs charge interest rates as high as 100 percent and begin to prescreen loan applicants so that the poorest of the poor no longer qualify, it becomes difficult to distinguish these programs from the predatory alternative financial services available in developed countries that include payday loans, rent-to-own stores, and pawn shops.

Sustainability of microlending programs as originally focused on poverty and social change depends primarily on how well these programs navigate the inherent contradictions between profitability and mission. Subsidies to support microlending programs may elevate the focus on mission but do so at the cost of enabling management inefficiencies. Management inefficiencies will not be sustainable by programs that forsake subsidies, but these programs may be unable to continue serving the poorest of the poor. The future of microlending programs is most likely to be determined one program at a time.

Peter A. Kindle
University of South Dakota

See Also: Economic Support and Services; Financial Literacy Programs; Social and Economic Justice; Social Capital, Role of.

Further Readings

Armendáriz, Beatriz and Jonathan Morduch. The Economics of Microfinance, 2nd ed. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2010.

Khandker, Shahidur, R. and Hussain A. Samad. “Are Microcredit Participants in Bangladesh Trapped in Poverty and Debt?” World Bank Policy Research Working Paper No. 6404 (2013).

Ledgerwook, Joanna with Julie Earne and Candace Nelson, eds. The New Microfinance Handbook: A Financial Market System Perspective. Washington, DC: World Bank, 2013.

Yunus, Muhammad. Banker to the Poor: Micro-Lending and the Battle Against World Poverty. New York: PublicAffairs, 1999.

Midwifery

Unlike modern medical approaches to child care and childbirth, rooted in scientific and technological framework, the early traditions of midwifery have their origins in familial and societal realms. Historically, midwives were celebrated in their communities and relied upon to deliver the next generation. In the late 18th and early 19th centuries, most midwives learned their trade by apprenticing with other midwives; thus, their skills varied considerably from those who were highly competent to others with limited expertise.

In the latter part of the 1800s, the choice of male physicians to orchestrate the birthing process was made increasingly by middle-income women, particularly in metropolitan areas, in response to growing critiques of midwifery and an emerging emphasis in science and medicine as a safer way to give birth. Although midwifery continued to play a vital role in reassuring women through the birth process and in the mechanics of delivering the baby, cutting the cord, and delivering the placenta, the role of male physicians began to occupy more of a central position in the process by the end of the 19th century. By the early 20th century, the use of midwives was associated more often with women who were impoverished, immigrants, or living in rural areas, which enhanced the status of physician-assisted births for women who could afford this standard of care.

In the 21st century, CNMs (certified nurse midwives), CPMs (certified professional midwives), and CMs (certified midwives) are increasingly functioning as independent health and welfare managers of women and focusing on pregnancy, the childbirth process, and women's reproductive health. By 2010, 1,828 midwives had earned CPM certification.

Major Changes in the American Profession

A significant change in the public acknowledgement and professionalization of midwives occurred in 1925, when the concept of nurse-midwives was introduced, thus attaching more formalized training as well as an official nomenclature to the occupation. The concept of nurse-midwives was developed in the United States in an effort to create subspecialties in nursing that focused on maternal care and childbirth. During this same period (1925–30), however, births attended to solely by midwives dropped from approximately 50 percent in the early 20th century to roughly 15 percent. Significant efforts were made on the part of physicians, nurses, and other public health reformers to medicalize women's health care. For many involved in the public efforts to eliminate traditional midwifery and replace convention with science, their objectives were to decrease maternal and infant mortality, according to Katy Dawley, by providing training and education for nurse-midwives who could better attend to the needs of patients. Women leading this campaign included Carolyn Conant van Blarcom, Lillian Wald, Mary Beard, and Mary Breckinridge, who founded the Frontier Nursing Service (FNS) in Kentucky for the purpose of caring for mothers and their newborns in rural areas with limited access to health care. Unlike traditional midwives who learned their professions as apprentices or through trial and error, and who operated unsupervised in their duties, nurse-midwives were trained and then presided over by physicians.

The mid to late 1950s marked important changes for nurse-midwifery. For example, the national move toward hospital births found nurse-midwives increasingly in hospital settings and focused on "the physical and emotional aspects of a new mother's birth experience," found Laura Ettinger, also showcasing the "first demonstrations in natural childbirth." Educational programs were inaugurated in medical centers connected to teaching hospitals at Columbia, Johns Hopkins, and Yale. In 1954, the Committee on Organization offered definitions of nurse-midwifery that enhanced the role of fathers and put the family unit at the center of labor and childbirth; in 1955, they founded the American College of Nurse-Midwifery (ACNM). Education of both parents became paramount.

By 1970, the Accreditation Commission for Midwifery Education (ACME) was created and a national certification exam was constructed and overseen by the American Midwifery Certification Board (AMCB). A shortage in obstetrical physicians in the 1970s prompted some nurse-midwives to form private practices, offering their services to women who could afford them. Some women sought alternatives to medicalized births through the natural assistance of nurse-midwives. In the 1980s, although the number of obstetricians increased substantially, nurse-midwives continued to practice in clinics, federally funded programs, health maintenance organizations (HMOs), and hospitals even though doctors did not always see their value, reports Laura Ettinger. During this period, nurse-midwives expanded their purview by including menopause as an area of specialty. Over the next couple of decades, this trend continued, resulting in almost doubling nationwide educational programs from 28 to 50 in a 12-year period in the development of programs such as the Frontier Nursing Service's distance learning program, which allowed more women to train for the profession and more women to avail themselves of the service.

Practicing Midwifery in the 21st Century

At the start of the 21st century, three different paths for the midwifery profession are clear: (1) certified nurse-midwifery (CNM)—more closely tied to the nursing profession, (2) certified midwife (CM), and (3) certified professional midwife (CPM). The primary distinctions among the three professional tracks include education, certification requirements, and affiliating associations. According to ACMN, both CNMs and CMs are required to complete a graduate degree, whereas CPMs must graduate from a midwifery education program but do not need to obtain a graduate degree. In addition to the graduate degree, the AMCB requires CNMs to have an active registered nurse (RN) license. In contrast, CMs do not need the RN license. The American Midwifery Certification Board (AMCB) serves as the certifying organization for CNMs and CMs, and the North American Registry of Midwives (NARM) serves as the certifying organization for CPMs. As of 2008, Peter Johnson found "nearly 6,000 certified nurse-midwives in practices throughout the nation." As of 2010, 1,828 midwives had earned CPM certification. While both CNMs and CMs can practice in medical and nonmedical settings, most practice occurs in a hospital setting. In contrast, CPMs typically practice outside of a hospital setting.

Conclusion

In the 21st century, CNMs, CPMs, and CMs continue to function as independent managers of women's health care and focus on pregnancy, the childbirth process, and women's reproductive health. Once considered an anachronism is an increasingly medicalized world, midwives continue to make meaningful contributions to women's health both independently and in cooperation with the established medical community.

Catherine A. Dobris
Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis
Rachel Davidson
University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee

See Also: Continuum of Care; Family Services; Health Promotion Services; aternal/Infant Health Services; Nursing, Public Health; Parenting Skills Training; Prenatal Care; Pregnancy and Parenting Services.

Further Readings

American College of Nurse-Midwives. "Comparison of Certified Nurse-Midwives, Certified Midwives, and Certified Professional Midwives: Clarifying the Distinctions Among Professional Midwifery Credentials in the U.S." http://www.midwife.org/

ACNM/files/ccLibraryFiles/Filename/000000001385/CNM%20CM%20CPM%20ComparisonChart%20082511.pdf (Accessed September 2013).

American College of Nurse-Midwives. "History of ACNM." http://www.midwife.org/History-of-ACNM (Accessed August 2013).

American College of Nurse-Midwives. "Midwifery Education Trends Report 2011." http://www.midwife.org/ACNM/files/ccLibraryFiles/FILENAME/000000001457/ACNM%20MidwiferyEdTrend2011%20Report%20011112.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

American College of Nurse-Midwives. "Midwifery in the United States and the Consensus Model for APRN Regulation." http://midwife.org/ACNM/files/ccLibraryFiles/Filename/000000001458/LACE_White_Paper_2011.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Dawley, Katy. "Origins of Nurse-Midwifery in the United States and Its Expansion in the 1940s." Journal of Midwifery and Women's Health, v.48/2 (2003).

Ettinger, Laura Elizabeth. Nurse-Midwifery: The Birth of a New American Profession. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2006.

Hay, Carla. H. "Childbirth in America: A Historical Perspective." Who's Having this Baby?: Perspectives on Birthing. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 2002.

Johnson, Peter. "Nurse Midwifery." http://www.nsna.org/Portals/0/Skins/NSNA/pdf/Imprint_Jan04_Johnson.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

North American Registry for Midwives. "Information for CPMs." http://narm.org/cpms (Accessed August 2013).

North American Registry of Midwives. "What Is a CPM." http://narm.org (Accessed August 2013).

Stone, Susan E. "The Evolving Scope of Nurse–Midwifery Practice in the United States." Journal of Midwifery and Women's Health, v.45/6 (2000).

Migrant Workers

Migrant workers are a globalized species existing in many cultures across the world in developed and developing countries. These workers differ not only by the tasks they perform, but they are cut from a common fabric having to endure the same kind of social injustices in regard to services encompassing compensation, health issues, substandard living conditions, limited access to the legal and health care systems, and underrepresentation by migrant worker advocate groups. The bulk of migrant workers in the Western Hemisphere are seasonal farmworkers in the United States, which include both internal and foreign migrant workers. It is estimated that there are more than 3 million migrant (42 percent) and seasonal (58 percent) farmworkers in the United States, and 72 percent are foreign-born, with the greater portion, 68 percent, from Mexico, followed by Latin America and the Caribbean. These workers are identified as a tremendous national resource, yet they may not be receiving the services they need to improve and sustain quality of life. Much of the dialogue here will refer to the plight of the United States farmworkers who are underserved with respect to the infrastructure and organizational framework needed to adequately address the aforementioned adversities faced by its vast migrant worker population.

Compensation and the Law

Compensation for migrant workers, most of whom do mundane jobs, has seldom reached parity with the society in which they work and at best may reach minimum wage status. They face many obstacles that prevent them from obtaining needed compensation benefits. These include but are not limited to lack of coverage, a growing trend for states to deny benefits to undocumented workers, and workers reluctance to file claims for fear of employer retaliation. In many societies, migrant workers are required to pay taxes even though many states do not require employers to provide them with workers' compensation. Evidently, while they are eligible for programs such as Medicaid, Aid to Families With Dependent Children, and Social Security insurance, the majority cannot obtain these benefits. For example, only about 27 percent of farmworkers receive Social Security payments. They may fail eligibility standards because their income is not stable and because of the need for them to move frequently to find jobs. The American farmworker is a typical example of underpaid migrant workers whose annual income reflects an average of $12,000 to $13,999, and 23 percent of farmworker families are generally below the American poverty line.

American labor laws have not adequately addressed the economic plight of their migrant

Migrant workers weed sugar beets from dawn to dusk for $2.00 an hour in 1972. The bulk of migrant workers in the Western Hemisphere are seasonal farmworkers in the United States and include both internal and foreign migrant workers. It is estimated that there are more than 3 million migrant and seasonal farmworkers in the United States.

farmworkers who are rooted to the base of the economic pyramid. Some labor and immigration laws have served to erode the rights of the migrant workers. This existed under the Bracero Program established in 1942 and continues under the present H2A program created by the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, which allowed contractual arrangements with foreign countries, thereby excluding the United States from worker liabilities incurred in that country.

Legal temporary foreign workers who are hired under the H2A visa program must be provided with workers' compensation insurance or equivalent benefits by their employers. However, it should be noted that migrant workers in the H2A program are excluded from the benefits of the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act of 1983, which is designated to the regulation of American farm workers. The nonexistence of the right to unionize and collectively bargain are believed to be drivers for the perceived expansion of the H2A program. It is safe to say that until effective implementation of legislation to address migrant worker compensation is universally negotiated, the exploitation of these individuals will continue.

Heath Coverage and Care

Migrant farmworkers work under hazardous conditions in the United States. They are more likely to die from job-related illnesses and typically have shorter-than-the-average American life expectancy. The very nature of the tasks of migrant workers exposes them to various types of occupational hazards. Overexposure to various adverse health situations accompanied by long working hours to maximize earnings have led to accidents, physical breakdowns, stress, exposure to various social diseases, and mental breakdowns. The Migrant Health Act of 1962 authorized delivery of primary and supplemental health services to migrant farmworkers. Also, the United States Public Health Service provides funding for health centers in a number of states to help provide care to farmworkers. A 2011 report shows that health center programs provided services to approximately 804,000 farmworkers through 156 migrant health centers. These centers serve as models for creative delivery to a hard-to-reach population. However, while migrant workers may have access to primary and supplemental care, including health insurance, these are generally lacking in coverage. Likewise, the difficulty they face in obtaining sick leave often leads to injured farmworkers not seeking needed treatment. Additionally, American hospitals have been known to deport patients (migrants) from whom they are unable to collect fees for services rendered. This cannot be the solution to health problems incurred as a result of the tasks one performs in the development of a society in which they chose to work.

Housing and Living Conditions and Education

Housing solutions for migrant are inadequate. They live in substandard housing conditions including structural defects, close proximity to pesticides, and poor sanitation. The inadequately maintained facilities predispose the migrant worker to adverse social health issues. Common and often overcrowded sleeping and showering quarters for both males and females are the order of the day in certain migrant professions, most notably farmworkers. They face additional risks from exposure to chemicals and other social diseases associated with communal living. Still other migrant workers face issues of sexual harassment and discrimination at varying levels including general state failure to effectively implement federal legislation governing these conditions. It should be noted that those who seek to live in private housing are barred because they cannot provide deposits, do not qualify for credit checks, and cannot make long-term commitments. The generally low education level (on average eighth-grade completion) of migrant workers in America is manifested in their apparent lack of knowledge about and the ability to successfully access these services where they exist. Migrant workers therefore are unaware of the provisions for their compensation, safety, and health. These ignorances are exploited to the benefit of the farmers in many cases.

Human Services for Migrant Workers

Human services are those services designed to enhance the quality of life of humans all over. In the United States, professionals working with agencies and organizations with interest in health, education, employment, and other social services work together to build service networks to improve the quality of life for migrant workers. For example, the National Center for Farmworkers Health focuses on providing services, information, and technical assistance for the population it serves. However, migrant workers have challenges with compensation, health and living conditions, and access to social amenities. In many instances, these are provided but are not reachable or denied for various reasons.

Nelseta Walters
University of Maryland Eastern Shore

See Also: Boarder Babies; Caribbean Immigrants; Internal Revenue Service's Migration Data Files.

Further Readings

Ahn, Christine, Melissa Moore, and Nick Parker. "Migrant Workers: America's New Plantation Workers." Backgrounder, v.19 (2004).
Bechtel, Gregory A, Ruth Davidhizar, and Wanda R. Spurlock. "Migrant Farm Workers and Their Families: Cultural Patterns and Delivery of Care in the United States." International Journal of Nursing Practice, v.6/6 (2002).
Nesse, Lori A. "Disposable Workers: Applying a Human Rights Framework to Analyze Duties Owed to Seriously Injured or Ill Immigrants." Indiana Journal of Global and Legal Studies, v.19/1 (2012).
Pogue, Allan. "National Center for Farmworker Health: About America's Farmworkers." National Center for Farmworker Health, Inc. http://www.ncfh.org/?pid (Accessed January 2014).

Military Families

Military are a unique population with distinctive and diverse requirements for social services. Since the implementation of an all-volunteer force (AFV) 40 years ago, the requirements for social services to meet the needs of military members expanded dramatically. As the AFV force continued, the need for family services continued to grow and become more diverse. With the advent of conflicts during the previous decade, reliance on these services increased, and the services provided expanded and transformed based upon need. Many of these services should continue into the foreseeable future but may be the victim of necessary reductions of military spending. Overall, these services provide a resilient and ready force and continue to help integrate military families into almost all of our communities.

Through the enormous drawdown following the end of the Cold War and since the first Gulf War, the number social services provided to military members evolved. Larger numbers of military members came with families, and more were stationed in the continental United States. Another military demographic change is that more families were composed of dual military members. These changes occurred along with the advent of two major conflicts after the attacks of 9/11.

Military families require unique social services based upon issues of separation, time away from home, and reunions, all of which increase possible negative short-term and long-term effects for the family. The United States military provides an extensive social services menu of military family-oriented services. These services are unique to the specific living and moving conditions families are exposed to during military service. Military service, especially over the past 12 years, provides significant stressors that families are required to endure and mitigate. More and more military members are married. There are also increases in the number of dual-family members, single-parent households, and more women in combat roles within the military. The breadth and depth of social services were tested extensively over the past decade due to the two conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan and the deployments to other points around the globe.

Community-Based Social Services

Since the inception of the AVF within the U.S. military some 40 years ago, military communities slowly changed from homogenous societies on bases into being included in almost all local communities. With the operational usage of the National Guard, more and more rural communities experienced the difficulties and challenges associated with deployments and casualties. More than two-thirds of military families reside in civilian communities and the remainder on military bases. This parallels the increased use of local resources to provide services to military families. Communities provide resources and services for supporting military families and helping them cope with adversity and positive challenges. Community-based capacity building strategy provides a number of opportunities for military families. Relationships with community organizations can be formal or informal in nature. Examples include the Family Readiness and Ombudsman Groups and Family and Community Support Centers. In 1995, the Army Child and Youth Services began working with the National 4-H Headquarters in improving youth development at all Army installations. Later in 2004, 4-H/Army Youth Development Project started Operation: Military Kids (OMK). OMK focuses on supporting military-affiliated children, youth, and families wherever they may live, both on military installations and off. They concentrate on community connections to promote formal and informal networks for National Guard and Reserve families experiencing deployments.

Family support is a very small percentage of the overall defense budget. The reliance on local resources is not only a function of lower fiscal resources but the merging of military families into local communities. However, other federal organizations are involved in providing military families essential social services. Under a grant from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and the Administration for Children and Families, new curriculum specifically focuses on strengthening the needs of Reserve Component families. This instruction is titled "Essential Life Skills for Military Families (ELSMF)." This instruction provides relational and practical skills that families of Reserve Component service members may need to help cope with the uncertainties and challenges related to military life. The ELSMF program intends to create a unique local partnership between key community support organization (cooperative extension) and military families who may come from a variety of military branches within the National Guard and Military Reserve. This program offers military families social services on learned skills but also how to connect to other services they may need in the future. These services are provided hands-on, but a number of other services are provided through the Internet.

Expanded Online Resources

Online services for dealing with suicides, sexual harassment, and homelessness are increasingly provided through initial contact with online resources. Active, reserve, veteran populations and their families continue to be provided a number of additional counseling services and crisis hotlines. Based upon the need for these online resources, the military leveraged the Internet to supplement face-to-face services and counseling. Military One Source (www.militaryonesource.mil) provides a variety of services both online and to schedule for face-to-face meetings. Counseling services include financial, health and wellness, spouse education, and career opportunities (SECO). There are a myriad of products that are also available, from Adobe brochures to CDs covering a range of topics including casualty assistance, deployment, management, and transition assistance. The Web site also has a rotating monthly list of educational topics that include cyberbullying, peer pressure for children, recognizing the signs of combat stress, special needs children, and relationships and family wellness. This resource provides wide-ranging types of services delivered through a variety of modes.

Recently, the U.S. Army Comprehensive Soldier and Family Fitness (CSF2) Program was changed to include family fitness. This program provides resources for emotional, social, physical, spiritual, and family fitness through a variety of assessment and educational tools. This program is designed to enhance overall soldier and family resilience.

O. Shawn Cupp
United States Army Command and General Staff College

See Also: Family Services; Home and Community Services; Mental Health Services, Adult.

Further Readings

Hoshmand, Lisa T. and Andrea L. Hoshmand. "Support for Military Families and Communities." Journal of Community Psychology, v.35 (2007).
Military One Source. http://militaryonesource.mil (Accessed August 2013).
U.S. Department of Defense. "Military Family Support." http://www.defense.gov/home/features/2012/0212_familysupport (Accessed August 2013).

Military Personnel

"To care for him (or her) who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan." With these words, President Abraham Lincoln, in his second inaugural address in March 1865, affirmed the government's obligations to care for those wounded while in military service and to provide for their families. Lincoln's words became the motto of the Veterans Health Administration (VA) in 1959. The Department of Defense (DoD), in collaboration with the VA, is the federal agency responsible for serving the diverse needs of veterans and active duty service members (a generic term referring to all who serve in the military regardless of division, i.e., Army, Air Force, Navy, or Marines) by providing health care, disability compensation and rehabilitation, education assistance, home loans, burial in a national cemetery, and other benefits and services to our service member population. The system consists of more than 1,700 sites, serving 8.3 million veterans each year. The DoD and VA operate one of the largest health care organizations in the nation serving active duty military, retirees, survivors, and their dependents. The care system is divided into several integrated components designed to address a broad range of needs. Services are provided to all who have served irrespective of race, gender, ethnicity, or rank.

For Those Wounded in Battle or Active Duty Service

The initiation of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan has resulted in a cohort of service members who have sustained serious injury and requiring long-term care through the DoD and VA system. If injured in Iraq or Afghanistan, typically, the service member is airlifted to a government medical facility in Germany and returned to the United States, where, depending on the type and severity of injury, he or she may be sent to one of four poly-trauma clinics or a military treatment facility in the United States that provides specialized levels of rehabilitation. If this level of care is not required, the service members may be treated at a DoD medical facility and, if able, return to active duty when care is completed. If the service member's injuries are such that he or she cannot return to active duty, care will be transitioned to the VA system.

The DoD system also cares for military retirees who have not qualified for VA care. In order to be treated in the VA, one has to qualify for care by having served in the military and been honorably discharged, received an injury, or have an illness that is service related and the service member is unable to perform in an active duty role. For veterans who have not received a disabling injury, a means test and financial assessment are necessary to receive VA benefits. At each level of care, a multidisciplinary medical, social work, and behavioral health care team works with the patient and family to address the multiplicity of needs that might occur during treatment.

All severely ill or injured service members receiving care at a VA facility are provided with a case manager, with the patient and family as integral partners in the assessment and treatment care plan. For those cared for at the VA who do not have complex medical needs, case managers are assigned as needed.

Beyond Injury and Illness

Numerous other behavioral health services are offered through the VA system including caregiver support, suicide prevention programs, family counseling, military sexual assault counseling, substance abuse counseling, services of homeless veterans, and Vet Center support.

Caregiver support: In recognition of the emotional and physical toll that caring for an injured service member may extract, there are a range of services that support family caregivers including respite care, in-home care, specialized education and training, equipment, home and auto modification, and financial assistance. In 2010, President Barack Obama signed the Veterans Omnibus Health Services Act enhancing current benefits and developing more comprehensive support offerings for caregivers.

- Suicide prevention programs: Numerous outreach and behavioral health programs are in place to address the needs of the suicidal service member. Every VA facility has trained behavioral health professionals (social workers and psychologists) in suicide care and prevention. In 2007, the Veterans Crisis Line was launched, which is a 24/7 toll-free confidential hotline staffed by specially trained and experienced professionals. Veterans and family members can access the crisis line by calling 1-800-273-8255 and pressing 1.
- Military sexual assault counseling: The DoD's Sexual Assault Prevention and Response Office has established victim advocacy programs that provide support and information to sexual assault survivors. The DoD allows sexual assault victims seeking help to file restricted or unrestricted reports. The restricted reports are designed to protect victims' confidentiality. Victims can receive treatment and counseling for the assault.
- Substance abuse services: The VA offers a variety of counseling and rehabilitation services for substance abusers including outpatient counseling, inpatient hospitalization and rehabilitation, continuing care, relapse prevention, and self-help groups.
- Services for homeless veterans: Through the Supportive Services for Veteran Families (SSVF) program, homeless vets receive help obtaining temporary housing, health care benefits, transportation services, legal services, and housing counseling services. Homeless vets can call 1-877-424-3838 for 24/7 support and direction.
- Vet centers: The Vet Center program began in 1979 to address the needs of Vietnam veterans. Vet Centers are located in local communities, not in the VA hospital facility. There are 282 community Vet Centers across the United States. The Vet Centers are venues where veterans and veterans' families can socialize with other vets and receive individual and group counseling service in a safe and confidential setting. In 2009, the mobile Vet Center program was established. The mobile center, literally a mobile vehicle, provides counseling services to veterans in rural areas. The Vet Center programs also have a 24/7 phone system so members can access a counselor or other veteran in times of need.

The needs of our veterans and their family members may be extensive. The DoD and VA systems of care are designed to address as many of these needs as they can. New programming is constantly being developed for "those who shall have borne the battle."

Joan Beder
Yeshiva University

See Also: Military Families; Military Veterans; Veterans Services.

Further Readings

Beder, J., ed. Advances in Social Work Practice With the Military. New York: Routledge, 2012.
Kelly, D. C., S. Howe-Barksdale, and D. Gitelson, eds. Treating Young Veterans. New York: Springer, 2011.
Laurence, J. and M. Matthews, eds. The Oxford Handbook of Military Psychology. New York: Oxford University Press, 2012.

Military Veterans

Service members, even in the best of circumstances, can face multiple challenges as they navigate their transition into civilian life. Social services can facilitate veterans' successful reintegration with their communities and, in the case of overseas deployments, with their families as well. Approximately 2.4 million U.S. service members have deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan since 2001, and many have experienced multiple deployments. As we focus on successful integration of these veterans, we must also assure that veterans of prior conflicts are equally supported.

The U.S. Department of Veteran's Affairs (VA) is the primary organization whose mission is to meet veteran's needs by fulfilling President Abraham Lincoln's promise "to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan." One of the limitations of the VA is that it is not designed to serve veterans' families. Readjustment Counseling Services or Vet Centers are a part of the VA and were established after the Vietnam War to provide readjustment services for both veterans and their families. Eligible veterans and their families can receive individual and group counseling, family counseling, bereavement counseling, military sexual trauma (MST) counseling, outreach, substance abuse assessment and referral, employment referral, and referral to other VA services, including more specialized treatment and interventions offered by the VA.

Veterans with special needs can benefit from targeted social services to address their unique concerns. Some of these special needs veterans include catastrophically and severely disabled veterans; veterans with posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) who are at risk for suicide and may experience other mental health concerns, women veterans, veterans who are at risk of being homeless or are homeless, those who are involved with the justice system, and veterans who are unemployed or underemployed.

Veterans who are catastrophically and severely disabled, including those who have experienced multiple traumas, injuries involving amputations of one or more limbs, severe traumatic brain injuries, or pelvic, abdominal, or uro-genital wounding will require a lifetime of care. Veterans who have experienced poly-trauma can benefit from care coordination, ongoing case management, accredited residential living programs to meet their housing needs, transportation, and social support of their families and caregivers. Caregivers can also benefit from education training, health coverage, and a living stipend when caring for a family member precludes employment outside the home.

Call services, crisis lines, outreach, peer support, tele-health, mobile vans, and mobile apps for smart phones are all useful approaches to increase veterans' access to mental health and social services. These services are being increasingly provided by the VA, Vet Centers, and community agencies alike.

Programs to meet veterans' housing, employment, and sense of community are important social services and support that can facilitate reintegration and reduce some of the more debilitating effects of PTSD and other mental health concerns. In addition to low-cost loans, the VA offers a range of housing and employment programs. Some federal housing programs are for the most vulnerable veterans including women veterans, those recently returning from combat zones, and veterans with disabilities.

Women veterans are more likely than their male counterparts to feel out of sync with their families and their communities. Female veterans are also more likely to experience domestic violence, have difficulties reestablishing bonds with partners and children upon redeployment, have increased difficulties overall in readjustment, and are more likely to experience depression. Women are also more likely to experience military sexual trauma than men. Gender-specific programs such as targeted outreach, transitional housing for female veterans and their families, women's retreats, and support programs for victims of MST can be useful in addressing the unique needs of women veterans.

As a result of combat-related trauma and other service-related experiences, some veterans may turn to alcohol or drugs and may become entangled with the justice system. About 60 percent of the 140,000 veterans in federal and state prisons were struggling with a substance use disorder, while approximately 25 percent reported being under the influence of drugs at the time of their offenses. In response, some jurisdictions have established veterans' treatment courts, designed to treat veterans suffering from a substance abuse or mental health disorder while helping to ensure public safety. These courts promote sobriety, recovery, and stability through a coordinated response involving community partners.

Recognizing the importance of the Serviceman's Readjustment Act, or the G.I. Bill, in promoting reintegration through education, Congress recently approved an expansion of benefits beyond the current G.I. Bill program for veterans serving since September 11, 2001. Known as the Post-9/11 G.I. Bill, this program provides financial support for veterans to receive a college degree as well as support for noncollege degrees, apprenticeships, and on-the-job training. For those attending college, veterans may receive payments for tuition and fees, housing, books and supplies, and relocation or transportation support for those living in rural areas to attend school. Under certain circumstances, benefits may be passed on to dependents.

Many organizations offer supportive, recreational, social, and athletic activities to strengthen social connections. The VA offers a fairly comprehensive directory of these organizations as an information service. Online social support is also available, such as the Make the Connection Web site, where veterans can connect with other veterans, get resources and support to manage the issues they may be facing, and find solutions for improving their lives. Of note, veterans can meet their needs for social support through participation in commemoration events such as those celebrated on Memorial Day and Veterans Day. Through such ceremonies, veterans can experience a sense of kinship with other veterans, living and dead, acting to reaffirm veterans as honored people in American life.

In summary, while many social services resources are available, veterans can still find themselves feeling isolated and not knowing how to connect. At times, the sheer volume of resources may feel overwhelming, especially in crisis situations. The plethora of social services available can suggest that there are unlimited resources to meet the needs of all veterans, for example, that there is a home for every homeless veteran.

In actuality, veterans' social services needs continue to go unmet as many programs are filled to capacity. Though the number of women veterans has increased, not every Vet Center has female counselors.

There are also limited services for veterans with severe and complex problems including inpatient programs for veterans diagnosed with PTSD, substance abuse, and severe mental health concerns. Thus, more needs to be done to increase access to services for all veterans across the life span.

Cathleen A Lewandowski
George Mason University

See Also: Military Families; Military Personnel; Veterans Services.

Further Readings

Office of Justice Programs/Bureau of Justice Statistics, Veterans in State and Federal Prison. U.S. Department of Justice. http://www.bjs.gov/content/pub/pdf/vsfp04.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

Office of National Drug Control Policy, Executive Office of the President. "Fact Sheet: Veterans Treatment Courts." http://www.whitehouse.gov/sites/default/files/ondcp/Fact_Sheets/veterans_treatment_courts_fact_sheet_12-13-10.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

The Independent Budget. "A Comprehensive Budget and Policy Document Created by Veterans for the Department of Veterans Affairs. Critical Issues." http://www.independentbudget.org/2013/CI_2013.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

Tanielian, T. and L. H. Jaycox, eds. "Invisible Wounds of War Psychological and Cognitive Injuries, Their Consequences, and Services to Assist Recovery." The Rand Center for Military Health Policy Research. U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs. "Homeless Veterans." http://www.va.gov/homeless/housing.asp (Accessed June 2013).

U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs. "The Post-9/11 GI Bill." http://www.gibill.va.gov/benefits/post_911_gibill/index.html (Accessed June 2013).

U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs. "Shared Experiences and Supports for Military Veterans."

http://maketheconnection.net/veterans (Accessed June 2013).
U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs. "Vet Center." http://www.vetcenter.va.gov (Accessed June 2013).

Missionary Work and Workers

A plethora of organizations throughout the world deliver human services. Among these organizations are both nongovernmental and governmental associations. Nongovernmental organizations can be in both the profit-making sector and the noprofit sector. Among these are both faith-based and secular institutions. Within the realm of faith-based agencies are those with a Christian worldview. Some of these Christian institutions are nonprofit missionary agencies. The goal of these agencies is to bring Christianity to the world, with some focusing solely on the spiritual needs of people and others being concerned with a mix of the spiritual, physical, and emotional needs. Having a concern for a variety of needs, missionaries find themselves delivering human services to the people with whom they are sharing Christ.

History of Human Services Delivery in the Church

Human services delivery started with the church. Historically, church members served the less financially stable and ill members of their congregations and communities by providing food, medical supplies, child care, and prayer. In the 1800s, faith-based organizations such as the Salvation Army and the YMCA formed in England to meet both the human and spiritual needs of people, some of whom did not feel welcome in church. Missionaries aware of the Salvation Army and the YMCA developed affiliates in the United States and eventually in other countries.

In the early 1900s, after these affiliates were organized, a theological view called the social gospel started to infiltrate the churches. The social gospel placed an emphasis on meeting human needs as a way of expressing Christianity. Not all of Christendom agreed with this perspective, and a group of conservative theologians calling themselves fundamentalists formed. The fundamentalists were concerned that the social gospel view neglected spiritual needs such as regeneration in favor of social concerns. These points of view were antithetical to one another.

Recognizing the divisive nature of the two views, seeing a need for the church to emphasize evangelism and regeneration while meeting human needs and addressing social concerns, a group of theologians started the evangelical movement. The leaders of this movement were concerned with the individual's relationship with God as well as the individual's relationship to others and society.

With this understanding of church history, it is clear that the majority of missionary work including human services delivery comes from missionaries that are from either the social gospel view or the evangelical view. However, some fundamentalist missionaries find themselves involved with social and physical concerns. With a holistic view of humanity, it is difficult to separate the physical from the spiritual.

Examples of Specialized Human Services Delivery by Missionaries

Today missionaries deliver human services throughout the world. There are medical missionaries providing preventative, curative, and palliative care. The preventative health care takes the form of vaccinations, education on topics such as hygiene and sexuality, and exercise programs, just to name a few. Curative health care is treatment for existing conditions including the administering of antibiotics, surgery, and wound care. Palliative care can be in the form of pain reduction. Additionally, medical missionaries may provide wheelchairs and eyeglasses to help people cope more effectively with medical conditions.

In addition to medical missionaries, there are missionaries serving food and providing shelter to the under-resourced populations. There are gospel missions throughout the United States and other areas of the world. Some missions provide sermons for the population they serve prior to meals. In addition to food, shelter, and spiritual guidance, some provide other services such as education and job training.

Missionaries who manage orphanages also provide food, shelter, and often education to children.

As orphanages do not formally exist in the United States, these are located in other countries. Missionaries in war-torn or acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS)-invested countries find many children without homes, food, or clothing. These orphanages form in response to an obvious need. Some missionaries are administrators, nurses, and child-care providers in these settings.

In these countries devastated by war and disease, other needs arise that are both spiritual and emotional in nature. As a response to these needs, missionaries who are trained social workers and counselors help people adjust to life after trauma through counseling. Additionally in these countries, when the infrastructure and industry is destroyed, missionaries help with community organization and building sustainable businesses. These businesses come in many forms, but most are agricultural in nature. However, missionaries have started to give microloans to individuals, families, and communities as a way of helping them start sustainable businesses.

The social aspects of missionary work also continue today. Many faith-based missionary organizations have after-school programs helping children with homework and social skills and providing a safe place to gather. These organizations, staffed by both volunteers and professionals, often have gymnasiums and provide organized activities. These programs often offer snacks or meals.

Missionaries also help those with disabilities. In some countries, a disability such as blindness or deafness is viewed as a curse, so those with these impairments are marginalized. Missionaries develop programs to help people with disabilities develop marketable skills while providing food and shelter. In other countries, people with learning disabilities or people from a nondominate culture are ostracized. Missionaries in these countries develop programs and offer human services to these populations.

Examples of Missionary Agencies Delivering Human Services

A Mennonite agency provides mediation, peace and justice advocacy, community development, and health care in various continents throughout the world. Mediation services are provided in conflict-laden areas such as Columbia and Ireland to encourage peace and reconciliation without violence. Community development may come in the form of leadership development, education, program development, and so on. This development may be comprehensive, providing food, clothing, education, and health care, or it may be specific to one particular area of human services.

An international sports ministry based in Slovakia and Hungary emphasizes human services for the body, mind, and spirit. They provide recreational activities such as baseball and softball, with Christian coaches encouraging under-resourced youth, specifically the Roma population, in their physical development. For the mind, they provide English classes for those marginalized by society, with low incomes, free of charge. For the spirit, they provide spiritual guidance and discipleship.

A Baptist mission agency provides holistic ministry in the Dominican Republic. There is a traditional Hispanic church with numerous ministries. They have a home for young girls managed by an indigenous couple providing nurturing, food, clothing, and education. They have a Christian school focusing on education including teaching English and Christian values, a youth baseball ministry focusing on physical and spiritual well-being, and a youth ministry with a focus on spiritual and social development.

In recent years, this agency has started to do prevention work with children at risk and intervention work with women who are in the sex trade. This intervention includes health care, alternative vocational training, and a safe house for women and children who would like to change vocations. The vocational training offered is in jewelry design, tailoring, sales, or hairdressing. They also offer microloans to women with other creative, sustainable ideas.

Christine K. Fulmer
Julie Furj-Kuhn
Cedarville University

See Also: After School Services; AIDS/HIV Programs; At-Risk Youth Services; Blindness and Low Vision; Childhood Trauma; Children and War; Community Organizing; Deaf/Hard of Hearing; Disability Services; Disabled Clients; Food Insecurity; Human Trafficking; Microlending Programs; Spirituality/Religion and Diversity.

Further Readings

Cnaan, R. A., R. J. Wineburg, and S. C. Boddie. The Newer Deal. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.

DiNitto, D. M. Social Welfare: Politics and Public Policy (7th ed.). Boston, MA: Allyn and Bacon, 2011.

Keith-Lucas, A., ed. So You Want to Be a Social Worker: A Primer for the Christian Student. St. David's, PA: North American Christians in Social Work, 1985.

Mobility-Impaired Individuals

The terms impairment and disability are synonymously used. However, these terms are different. Impairment is used to define a deviation from normal, such as not being able to make a muscle movement or not being able to control an unwanted movement. Disability is the term used to define a restriction in the ability to perform a normal activity of daily living that others of the same age are able to perform. This entry explains mobility impairment, its types and causes, and the human services needs of mobility-impaired individuals. The theme is more relevant in the context of human services and diversity.

Mobility-impaired individual means any person, regardless of age, who is subject to a physiological defect or deficiency regardless of its cause, nature, or extent that renders the person unable to move about without the aid of crutches, a wheelchair, or any other form of support, or that limits the person's functional ability to ambulate, climb, descend, sit, or rise, or to perform any related function. Mobility impairments are physical limitations that limit mobility. There are many types of orthopedic or neuromuscular impairments that can restrict mobility. Cerebral palsy, multiple sclerosis, muscular dystrophy, hemiplegia, polio, arthritis, and spinal cord injury are some of the causes of mobility impairments. Multiple sclerosis is a disorder of the nervous system that attacks the brain and spinal cord and causes deterioration of the nerve tissue. Hemiplegia is caused as a result of a stroke or traumatic brain injury. In polio, the muscles in arms and legs become weak and do not function normally to help a person move freely. Mobility impairments can stem from neurological causes, like paralysis and palsy, or physical causes like amputation or birth defects. A mobility-impaired individual may also have audio, cognitive, and visual impairments. The impairment can also be caused either by lack of coordination, weakness, or poor circulation. Due to increase in lifestyle diseases such as, for example, diabetes or cardiovascular diseases, the incidence of mobility impairments are on the rise.

Human Services Needs

Mobility-impaired individuals become disabled by a lack of resources to meet their needs. They have various service needs: physical, human, social, and economic. Individuals with mobility disabilities often experience stigma concerning their physical competence and bodily appearance, leading to impairment in social interactions. They also demonstrate a wide range of physical abilities and need assistive technology devices. They require assistive devices such as a wheelchair, crutches, a cane (auxiliary, T-shaped, or Lofstrand), walker or braces to help them overcome mobility obstacles and become mobile. Slopes, stairs, and steps are some navigation barriers that wheelchair users may face. They therefore need assistive technologies such as ramps, power or automatic door openers, and wheelchair button doors. The impairment varies widely from individual to individual with the part of the body affected. The needs of mobility-impaired individuals vary widely. They may need clean and dry floor surface areas, wide pathways, and environments free of hazards.

Case management is performed by health professionals such as a nurse, social worker, counselor, or support worker. The support workers, known as direct support professionals (DSP) in the United States, assist the impaired individuals. Individuals need therapeutic services such as physical therapy, massage, and movement therapy. Case managers are intimately connected to their clients and provide them emotional support. Individuals with mobility impairments also need an array of software to facilitate computer access and information technology. They may encounter a variety of access barriers. Time-limited actions, such as timed tests and time-responsive Web sites, are particularly problematic for individuals who have little control over their arms or hands. Larger icons and hypertext links can assist individuals who have difficulty controlling their hand movements. Mobility-impaired students have special needs that vary widely by individual and academic activity.

Mobility impairments are physical limitations that limit mobility. There are many variations of orthopedic or neuromuscular impairments that can restrict mobility.

Residential and Independent Living Services

Some mobility-impaired individuals need residential services and quality care. Adult day services are required for supporting individual needs. Many impaired individuals are unable to maintain themselves at their homes and thus need adult placement services. These services are needed when their health and safety can no longer be maintained at home. Many are vulnerable to abuse, neglect, and exploitation and thus need protective services. Risk management services need to be provided. Family and informal care are also needed by mobility-impaired individuals. Personal care such as, for example, bathing, dressing, toileting, and feeding, are most essential. In-home aide services help assist impaired individuals. Independent living services are required to assist them in developing skills to manage their daily living activities. These services maximize independence of impaired persons in their daily living such as meal preparation, laundry, banking, physical therapy, and transportation. Social workers provide a variety of independent living services. Vocational rehabilitation services are also needed for employment. Employment services support individuals to find work and train in specific job skills.

Emergency Services

Safe evacuation of mobility-impaired individuals during emergency is of critical importance. Mobility-impaired persons need coworkers who will accompany and assist in their evacuation during an emergency. A guide dog or assistance dog provides support to an orthopedic- or mobility-impaired person. Human services are required to provide proper training for the assistance dogs. The mobility-impaired individual needs recognition, moral support, collaborative initiatives, and human services from every individual in the society.

Manoranjan Mohanty
University of the South Pacific

See Also: Americans with Disabilities Act; Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, United Nations; Developmental Disabilities, Attitudes and Myths in Services for; Developmental Disabled Individuals; Disabilities, International Variation in Attitudes Toward; Disability Services; Disabled Clients; Service Providers and Diversity.

Further Readings

Masala, Carmelo, Donatella Rita Petretto. “From Disablement to Enablement: Conceptual Models of Disability in the 20th Century.” Disability and Rehabilitation, v.30/17 (2008).

Olsheki, Jerry and Linda L. Leech. “Programmatic Interventions and Treatment of Impaired Professionals.” Journal of Humanistic Education and Development, v.34/3 (1996).

Thompson, Neil. Theory and Practice in Human Services, Buckingham, UK: Open University Press, 2000.

Whittaker, James K. and James Garbarino. Social Support Networks: Informal Helping in Human Services. New York: Aldine de Gruyter, 1983.

Model Minority Stereotype

The model minority stereotype is a socially constructed image of a minority group in what may be perceived as a positive light but that has negative consequences. The stereotype, when applied to members of a minority group that has achieved what appears to be high levels of success within a society, suggests that each individual member of the group should excel academically or financially or have other positive cultural attributes based on his or her group membership. The model minority, as opposed to other minority groups, typically is seen as possessing more cultural capital, thus propelling them to success. Comparatively, other minority groups who face disproportionate struggles are often seen as culturally deficient, with assimilation to white American culture sometimes offered as a solution.

Origin

The first known mention of the model minority stereotype was in a New York Times article in 1966 by sociologist William Petersen. Although the model minority stereotype can be applied to other groups in other countries, its most common affiliation is with the Asian American community in the United States. The model minority stereotype grew in popularity in the United States in the 1980s. Specifically, Asian Americans are pointed to in comparison to Latin American immigrants and African Americans as academically inclined (with high levels of educational attainment overall), socioeconomically stable, and with comparatively lower crime rates. In the realm of education, Asian Americans are often expected to have an aptitude toward math, science, and technology-related fields. The Asian American community is credited with possessing greater cultural capital than other minority groups in the United States.

There are several potential causes of the stereotype for Asian Americans. Immigration policies that restrict entry to the United States to only more affluent Asian immigrants or those possessing more highly valued skills would certainly impact Asian American economic well-being. Cultural differences are often cited when comparing Asian Americans to other minority communities and could indeed play a role. Finally, government policies like affirmative action could benefit some Asian Americans in education and employment, providing them opportunities to succeed.

Impacts

The diverse group that constitutes the construct of Asian American is recognized for having a (homogeneous) culture that values education. Some speculate that this becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy in some instances (e.g., an expectation of high performance in mathematics and technological fields is responsible for the propensity of many Asian Americans to choose those fields). Some Asian Americans internalize the model minority stereotype and believe themselves to be better performers than whites and other minority groups as well. So the impact of the stereotype on the identity of Asian Americans and their performance in the United States can be positive.

On the other hand, the impacts of the model minority stereotype can be quite harmful. Expectations on Asian Americans include being hardworking, docile, submissive, and obedient, not complaining, not needing assistance, and possessing both intelligence and wealth.

The model minority stereotype generates resentment from other minority groups. By attributing the perceived success of the Asian American conglomerate to culture, inferiority in the cultures of other minority groups is implied. African Americans and Latino and Latina Americans, whose academic and financial achievement on average is substantially lower than Asian Americans, are compared unfavorably by those who would attribute racial inequality to cultural deficiencies. Even if one understands that this view neglects the unique histories and social positions of members of the differing racial groups, the resentment that the model minority stereotype generates is not surprising. By stereotyping Asian Americans as not needing assistance, other groups with different experiences and challenges who seek assistance are looked down upon. The stereotype generates a sense of satisfaction in the current function of the U.S. meritocracy, which in actuality is more mythical than real. Reinforcing the idea of the correctly operating meritocracy in the United States works against other minority groups, suggesting that they are getting what they deserve and ignoring inequalities produced by social structures.

Thus, the model minority stereotype can be used to argue against social welfare and human service policies, affirmative action, or other governmental policies meant to address issues disproportionately faced by communities of color. In fact, only recently have institutions serving Asian American Pacific Islander been federally designated minority-serving institutions and afforded federal funding.

Interestingly, the model minority stereotype in the United States incorporates attributes of submissiveness and obedience. Model minorities, thus, do not challenge the status quo operation of society. In this way, and through the justification of color-blind social policies, the current racial hierarchy is preserved, with white Americans on top.

Even within the amalgamation that constitutes the U.S. census category Asian American, the model minority stereotype can be harmful. The stereotype neglects to differentiate between Asian immigrant groups that have come to the United States and thrived and those who have faced notable obstacles and may require different human services. The Asian American community is diverse, and the problems faced by its members reflect that level of diversity. While some communities are doing well overall, others are faring much more poorly. In fact, even within Asian communities that have achieved academic and financial "success" in the United States, there are individuals and geographic communities that have been devastated by poverty, crime, and other issues. The faith in the meritocracy that the stereotype engenders and the additional pressure of being a member of the model minority (and thus not requiring human services or needing assistance) puts Asian Americans who struggle in the United States in a strange, often-overlooked position.

Conclusion

In summary, the model minority stereotype applies positive perceived cultural attributes of a minority group to its success in a given nation. As a result, it leads one to question why other minority groups do not achieve the same levels of success as the model minority. In the United States, it is an overgeneralization based on a socially constructed category that is used to advocate color-blind policies and victim-blaming for non-Asian American people of color, generating resentment for Asian Americans as well as neglecting those Asian American communities that disproportionately face social problems not reflected in the stereotype.

David J. Luke
University of Kentucky

See Also: Asian Americans; Assimilation; Cultural Capital, Role of; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Immigrant Populations; Pacific Islanders; Power, Race, Ethnicity and; Racial Identity Development, Models of.

Further Readings

Cheryan, Sapna and Galen V. Bodenhausen. "When Positive Stereotypes Threaten Intellectual Performance: The Psychological Hazards of 'Model Minority' Status." Psychological Science, v.11/5 (2000).

Lee, Stacy J. Unraveling the "Model Minority" Stereotype: Listening to Asian American Youth, 2nd ed. New York: Teachers College Press, 2009.

Wong, Paul, Chienping Faith Lai, Richard Nagasawa, and Tieming Lin. "Asian Americans as a Model Minority: Self-Perceptions and Perceptions by Other Racial Groups." Sociological Perspectives, v.41/1 (1998).

Monitoring the Future

Monitoring the Future (MTF) is an ongoing study that measures longitudinal changes in the beliefs, attitudes, and behaviors of secondary school students, college students, and young adults in the United States. Since 1975, the study has been conducted annually by the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research. With financial support from the National Institute on Drug Abuse, the study has addressed a range of topics related to substance use among young people. Substance use among youth is a rapidly changing phenomenon, and the study was designed to understand shifts in the patterns of drug and alcohol use among youth. The study also monitors attitudes toward drugs and alcohol held by this population as that data can be significant in mapping current and future substance use trends.

A core feature of MTF is an annual survey of the senior class for high schools in the United States, which began in 1975. In 1991, the school-based surveys were expanded to also include nationally representative samples of students in the eighth and 10th grades. The most recent MTF sample (2012) included about 45,400 students from grades eight, 10, or 12 in nearly 400 public or private schools. Schools are selected to provide an accurate, representative cross-section of high school students within the contiguous United States. Within each school, 350 students are randomly selected for participation. For schools with enrollment under this threshold, all students are included in the sample. Data are collected in the classroom using standardized procedures (e.g., closed-ended surveys administered by university staff). To track changes over time, follow-up surveys are mailed to a randomly selected subset of each graduating class for several years.

MTF data can be used to examine trends in the overall proportions of students at each grade level (1) using a particular drug, (2) seeing a great risk associated with its use, (3) disapproving of its use, and (4) saying they could get it fairly easily or very easily if they wanted to. Surveys contain questions on a range of substances including cigarettes, smokeless tobacco, alcohol, marijuana, inhalants, LSD, ecstasy, cocaine (powder and crack cocaine), heroin, other narcotics (e.g., codeine, Vicodin, or OxyContin), amphetamines (e.g., Ritalin, Adderall, or methamphetamine), sedatives (e.g., phenobarbital or Ambien), tranquilizers (e.g., Valium or Xanax), and other emerging drugs. More recently, the survey has provided some of the earliest national estimates on the emerging use of other drugs such as synthetic marijuana (commonly referred to as Spice or K-2) and synthetic stimulants (bath salts). Since its inception, MTF has periodically addressed other topics relevant to youth, including delinquency and victimization, changing roles for women, confidence in social institutions, concerns about the environment, and general social and ethical attitudes.

The longitudinal nature of the data allows users to examine changes in substance-use trends related to age, time period, and birth cohort. Age effects relate behaviors to the particular developmental time period of the participant, while period effects include changes in particular years that show up consistently in all age groups. Cohort or birth group effects are lasting differences between different cohorts entering secondary school. Such cohort effects, for example, have been found for cigarette smoking throughout most of the MTF study. The follow-up data also allow researchers to examine how changes in substance use are linked to different environments (e.g., high school, college, or employment) and developmental transitions (e.g., leaving the parental home, marriage, or parenthood).

MTF data can be used to separately examine attitudes and patterns of drug use in different demographic groups based on gender, race or ethnicity, region of the country, community size, parent's level of education (an indicator of socioeconomic status), and plans following high school graduation. Since MTF began, for example, rates of substance use have varied by race, ethnicity, and gender. Substantial differences have been found among the three largest racial and ethnic groups in the survey: whites, African Americans, and Hispanics. Across all three grade levels, African Americans have generally had lower rates of use for most licit and illicit drugs (e.g., alcohol, cigarettes, prescription drugs, hallucinogens, and ecstasy). Although there are some discrepancies among older youth, Hispanic students generally have rates of drug use that fall in the middle between the rates for whites and African Americans. While the gender gap is narrowing, MTF data have also generally shown that males have higher rates of illicit drug use, and particularly frequent use, compared to females. Understanding these types of subgroup variations in substance use among youth is important for understanding and addressing problems related to drug and alcohol use among young people.

Although MTF provides valuable information on substance use among youth, notable limitations of the survey are that it relies on self-report data and uses a school-based sample. The extent to which youth will answer honestly is a concern for MTF and other self-report surveys addressing sensitive behaviors that are often illegal as well. Another limitation to the school-based sampling approach is that MTF does not include higher-risk youth who are no longer enrolled in school (e.g., high school dropouts) and those whose school attendance is sporadic. Because relatively fewer adolescents drop out before the end of 10th grade, this bias is likely to be smaller for the eighth- and 10th-grade samples.

Data from MTF have been used to inform policy discussions and has helped inform the work of organizations and agencies providing drug and alcohol prevention and treatment services. Reports detailing the annual and cumulative findings from the MTF survey, including those that examine trends by gender, age, and race or ethnicity, are readily available online through the MTF Web site, www.monitoringthefuture.org, listed under Publications.

Stella M. Resko
Wayne State University

See Also: Adolescent/Youth Services: Overview; At-Risk Youth Services; Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths; Substance Abuse Treatment for Children and Adolescents; Youth Risk Behavior Surveillance System.

Further Readings

Johnston, L. D., P. M. O'Malley, J. G. Bachman, and J. E. Schulenberg. Demographic Subgroup Trends Among Adolescents for Forty-Six Classes of Licit and Illicit Drugs, 1975–2012 Monitoring the Future Occasional Paper No. 79. Ann Arbor: Institute for Social Research, the University of Michigan, 2013.

Johnston, L. D., P. M. O'Malley, J. G. Bachman, and J. E. Schulenberg. Monitoring the Future National Survey Results on Drug Use, 1975–2012: Volume I, Secondary School Students. Ann Arbor: Institute for Social Research, the University of Michigan, 2013.

Johnston, L. D., P. M. O'Malley, J. G. Bachman, and J. E. Schulenberg. Monitoring the Future National Survey Results on Drug Use, 1975–2012: Volume 2, College Students and Adults Ages19–50. Ann Arbor: Institute for Social Research, the University of Michigan, 2013.

Monoculturalism

Monoculturalism refers to the circumstance in which the defining features and views of one group dominate the other groups within the culture to the point of mass homogeneity.

Five key concepts underpin the practice of monoculturalism. First, there must be a strong belief in the superiority of one group's cultural heritage, including its history, traditions, and values. At the same time, there must be a parallel belief in the inferiority of the cultural heritage of other groups. While both may be true in any culture, in order for monoculturalism to become a reality, it is also essential that the group perceived as the dominant cultural force have the power to impose its beliefs or will on the groups perceived to be culturally inferior. In so doing, the dominant group's values then become institutionalized within the culture, influencing everything from policies and practices to recreation and architectural design. Finally, all of the preceding factors must occur outside of concerted effort and awareness in order for the phenomenon of true monoculturalism to take root.

Bias and Marginalization

In monoculturalism there tends to be a feeling of entitlement among the dominating group based on its perceived superiority. This belief often leads to conflict and exploitation of the submissive groups. In the United States, for example, consider how the early British colonists looked upon the Native American populations as culturally inferior to their own civilized society because the native reality was so different from their own mainstream culture. With that mind-set, the European settlers embarked on a vigorous campaign of fighting and mistreatment designed to rid their new world of the inferior culture through destruction and forced assimilation.

In contemporary times, monoculturalism is illustrated in the form of institutionalized bias that serves to reinforce the dominant culture's values by imposing and perpetuating uniformity across all aspects of society. Individuals who function according to the institutionally biased values are often rewarded with greater success than those who operate outside the monocultural mainstream. Their success reinforces their belief that the dominant cultural values shaping their society are the right ones, creating a cycle of cultural imposition and validation. Individuals generally are not aware of this cyclical cultural conditioning, which emerges as a result of a subconscious reality in which events are interpreted and prejudices are formed based on a singular worldview—that held by the dominant culture.

Those who do not fully subscribe to the monoculture's paradigm tend to find themselves marginalized in society or forced to distance themselves from their true beliefs and character in order to function in a world of someone else's making.

Implications in Human Services

Monoculturalism within human services involves viewing policy making and the implementation of services from the perspective of a single set of dominant ideas about the way things should be, how to get things done, and who should lead the way. That means that human services programs, practices, and interactions are approached from a common, one-size-fits-all point of view—to the detriment or outright exclusion of those whose beliefs and notions fall outside of the established norm. This is especially true in melting pot cultures such as the United States and many western European nations, where immigration policies are more open and resident populations are more ethnically and culturally diverse.

In these types of diverse environments, social services professionals tend to focus narrowly on the standards set by the dominant monoculture and fail to adequately take into account the beliefs, customs, and goals held by individuals who are deeply rooted in their home cultures. In other words, social services professionals are themselves a product of the institutionalization of bias inherent in creating a monoculture environment in the first place. As an institutionalized force, social services practitioners in a monoculture society are accustomed to using the same theories, tools, and approaches to address the same types of situations, regardless of factors such as the ethnicity and social customs of the recipient of the service. While the tactic provides a degree of consistency in service delivery, it may not provide the best approach toward solutions for the party in need.

One reason for this type of potential shortcoming in human services care is that, despite living in a monoculture, most ethnically diverse societies retain some deeply embedded elements of their own culture within their daily lives. Those cultural elements may conflict with the dominant culture's ideas about how to approach a given situation, such as asking for help outside of the family, for instance. In many cases, the disparity in values means the individual's tightly held beliefs are ignored in favor of tradition and the presumed greater good. Individuals in this circumstance have two main options: to give up one's personal beliefs to fit the dominant norm or to become marginalized by failing to conform. It is unlikely that either outcome would be the conscious intent of social services professionals, but the reality should be a conscious consideration for those involved in human services fields.

Shari Parsons Miller
Independent Scholar

See Also: Acculturation; Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development; Bias in Service Delivery; Biculturalism; Communication Styles, Ethnic and Cultural Differences in; Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cultural Appropriation; Cultural Paradigms; Ethnic Diversity and Values; Immigrant Populations, Human Services Needs of; Implicit Bias; Multiculturalism; United States, Demographics of; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Harris, Dean A. Multiculturalism From the Margins: Non-Dominant Voices on Difference and Diversity. Westport, CT: Greenwood Publishing, 1995.

Sue, Derald Wing. Multicultural Social Work Practice. Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley and Sons, 2006.

Mormons

When clients are culturally different, in order to be successful, the health professional should approach these differences with respect. They should educate themselves on the differences and ask respectful questions to clarify and reduce misconceptions.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (LDS or Mormon) was founded by Joseph Smith (known as the Prophet Joseph Smith), who received a vision from God at the age of 14 upon petitioning God for an answer as to which church to become a member. Smith believed he was divinely chosen to restore the Church of Jesus Christ to the Earth as he felt the heavenly host had spoken this plan for him. He was given revelations by a host of heavenly messengers and wrote the Book of Mormon. The LDS church was born in 1830 under Smith's leadership. It is reported there are more than 80,000 missionaries in the church and more than 12 million members worldwide.

Family

To understand Mormons as culturally different clients, it is important to have a basic knowledge of the LDS. For family counseling, knowing the LDS's view of the family is critical. David O. McKay, the ninth president of LDS, is quoted as saying, "No other success can compensate for failure in the home." LDS members derive strength from family—believing that children who are raised in loving, supportive homes are given a clear advantage in life. Life lessons are best learned at home with the backing of a united parental unit—consisting of a married father and mother. Families are intended to be guideposts and safe harbors for one another. LDS members hold in great reverence families and their ability to teach love so that each family member may learn to love others outside the family just as their Heavenly Father loves them. LDS members exist to serve God and one day go to live with Him in heaven along with their families. This is their purpose for following Him—to know this eternal blessing.

The Salt Lake Temple in Salt Lake City, Utah. The temple is considered sacred by the church and its members, and a "temple recommend" is required to enter. There are no public tours.

Marriage and Divorce

The church officially disapproves of divorce but does permit divorce, annulment, and the cancellation of sealing of a marriage made in the temple. The belief is that marriages are intended by God to be an eternal union between a man and a woman. Mental health professionals need to understand the church's view on marriage and divorce and allow those guidelines to be used. A civil marriage is one that is for "a time," meaning that it ends with divorce or death. A temple marriage is sealed, and the two will remain married for all eternity—husband and wife in heaven. Second marriages are for a time only, unless the sealing is approved by the first president. The promise of celestial marriage is held sacred by the church.

Misconceptions

Brothers and sisters of the church feel and know that the amount of misinformation about the church is vast, and clients may be put on the defensive quickly if the counselor conveys misconceptions. The church understands these misconceptions—ignorance is fine; wrong is a problem. Primary among these misconceptions is the idea that members of LDS are not Christian. This misconception is extremely offensive to members of the church, as a belief in Christ as their savior and redeemer is central to their faith.

LDS members believe in the Bible and also use the Book of Mormon. If the counselor is not a member of the LDS, odds are high that the counselor has at least some misconceptions about the church. Counselors need to be open to this idea—they probably have misconceptions.

Free Agency

The church embraces the idea that people can control their circumstances. This is called the doctrine of agency (also known as the free agency), and it is central to the faith. The belief that each person has the freedom to choose for themselves is foundational because it is a choice to belong to the church, it is a choice to follow commandments, and it is a choice to break these commandments. Understanding free agency helps health care professionals put issues into perspective for members of the church who are seeking treatment. If a therapist is seeing a member of the church that is in an abusive relationship, the client will understand if the therapist alludes to the fact that the controlling partner is depriving him or her of free agency.

Family and Social Services

In the church, there is no paid clergy, so the ecclesiastical leader may not be well versed in marriage and family issues. The church has a social services department called family services that offers limited services to members. These services include counseling, adoption, and addiction recovery. Services of professionals in the family and social services community may be sought out for their expertise and therefore should take the time to familiarize themselves with the doctrine and rules of the church.

Articles of Faith

The church has 13 Articles of Faith that summarize the fundamental beliefs of the church. The Prophet Joseph Smith gave these to John Wentworth, editor of the Chicago Democrat, for printing. These 13 are a succinct summarization of the church's beliefs. Health care professionals would do well to read and familiarize themselves with these before seeing any LDS members. The 13 Articles of Faith are as follows:

1. Mormons believe in the Father, the Son, and in the Holy Ghost.
2. They believe that each human will be punished for his or her own sins and no one else's.
3. It is believed that Christ atoned for all humankind's sins and requires obedience to all laws of the Bible.
4. It is believed that faith in the Lord Jesus Christ comes first; repentance second; baptism by immersion for the remission of sins third; and the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost fourth.
5. Being given the gift of prophecy comes by calling and the laying on of hands to go forth and preach.
6. Those positions in the early church exist in the church today—for example, apostles, prophets, pastors, and so on.
7. The same gifts of the early church continue in the church today—gifts of prophecy, revelation, visions, healing, and so on.
8. The Bible and the Book of Mormon are the word of God and are followed as such.
9. The church believes all the revelations past, present, and future of God.
10. The church believes in restoration of Israel and of the 10 tribes, the New Jerusalem being built in America, and Christ's return to reign on the renewed earth.
11. Mormons and all of humankind have the right to worship God as they see fit.
12. The church believes in being subject to those in power and obeying the laws of the land.
13. The church believes in following the admonitions of the Apostle Paul, such as those in Philippians 4:8.

Homosexuality

The church regards homosexuality as a sinful inclination. The church upholds a moral standard, and homosexuality is a violation of this moral standard. The church loves everyone and treats everyone as children of God. The church believes most people have sinful inclinations they must work to control—alcoholism, gambling, and so on. Mental health professionals need to understand the moral standards of the church and gear their treatment accordingly. Encouraging a Mormon to embrace his or her homosexual inclinations would be against his or her beliefs if he or she follows the LDS doctrine.

Acts of Service

The church is not one of self-centeredness. Their philosophy is one of daily service—at home, at work, at school, in the community, and globally. The Prophet Joseph Smith wrote in Times and Seasons in 1842 that the church is "to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to provide for the widow, to dry up the tear of the orphan, to comfort the afflicted, whether in this church, or in any other, or in no church at all, wherever he finds them." The impact of the church's acts of service, including monetary, can be seen at http://mormon.org/values/humanitarian-aid. The best source for accurate information regarding LDS can be found at http://mormon.org.

Mary Burkhead Spencer
Walden University

See Also: Religion and Clients; Spirituality/Religion and Diversity.

Further Readings

Smith, Joseph The Book of Mormon: Another Testament of Jesus Christ. New York: Doubleday, 2004.
Smith, Joseph. Doctrines and Covenants. Salt Lake City, UT: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.
Smith, Joseph. The Pearl of Great Price. Salt Lake City, UT: Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1921.

Multicultural Education

Multicultural education is a body of knowledge, pedagogies, and polices that emerged during the 1960s in the United States in response to concerns about engaging with differences of culture, race, nationality, and ethnicity. Through curricular, extracurricular, as well as teacher education programs and approaches, multicultural education seeks to enhance the appreciation of cultural diversity in students and teachers. It sees formal and informal educational institutions, at all levels, as its site of operation.

Over the past couple of decades, the theoretical complexity and nuance of multicultural education has increased significantly. While earlier formulations of multicultural education were concerned with demonstrating to students the contribution of people from different cultures to the American social and public life, in its current formulations, it endeavors to achieve a more complicated engagement with difference.

The critical strands of multicultural education, for instance, direct attention to the social construction of difference, highlight the interplay of knowledge and power, center the positionality of students and teachers, and analyze the ways in which differences of race and ethnicity intersect with other differences such as those based on gender, sexuality, religion, and ability. Drawing on critical, poststructuralist, affect, and feminist theories, these recent approaches attempt to make apparent the institutional, communal, and individual practices that naturalize and normalize particular differences, marking others as deviations.

Historical Development

While the concerns, values, and ideals that inform multicultural education have been emphasized by educational movements across the world, as a formal movement, multicultural education traces its origins in the United States.

During the early decades of the 20th century, increased migration from southern, central, and eastern European countries to the United States, and later the migration of African Americans from the south to north during the mid-20th century, heightened concerns about the integration of those who had different races, religions, and socioeconomic backgrounds. The earliest educational efforts to engage with these differences are found in the work of the intercultural and intergroup educational movements. These movements advocated for and designed curricular interventions, models of schooling, and teacher training programs that sought to engender an appreciation and understanding of incoming cultures as well as produce a sense of pride in the immigrants about their own heritage. Their approaches, however, were later criticized for advocating an assimilationist approach. It was argued that the normative, middle-class, white American culture formed the invisible background against which all incoming cultures were tolerated or appreciated and that these movements simply sought to integrate the immigrants into a predefined norm, thereby reproducing power asymmetries.

The passing of the Immigration Reform Act and the Civil Rights Act during the 1960s created another impetus for migration to the United States. Large numbers of immigrants from Asia, Africa, and South America provoked similar fears around racial purity and normative American values. This time around, however, a different movement called multicultural education sought to address these issues through a multidimensional and multidisciplinary perspective.

Dimensions of Multicultural Education

Multicultural education emerged in response to the limited engagement of earlier educational movements with a difference. It was positioned, according to James Banks, as a more complex and nuanced approach to difference and proposed at least five distinct dimensions: a critical analysis of how knowledge is constructed to investigate implicit cultural and racial assumptions and biases; an evaluation of students' own attitudes toward those of other races and cultures; an effort to integrate examples from various cultural groups across all subject areas; a commitment by teachers to employ a pedagogy that facilitates learning and achievement of students from diverse backgrounds; and establishment of a school culture that empowers diverse students. Multicultural education, thus, sought to transform not only the experiences of students and teachers but the entire schooling environment.

The movement, however, was not unified. Banks has identified at least three strands of knowledge within the movement: the Western traditionalists, the multiculturalists, and the Afrocentrists. These groups differ in their understanding of what constitutes knowledge and the purpose of schooling. The Western traditionalists seek to maintain the dominance of Western civilization in the curriculum; the multiculturalists emphasize the inclusion of the cultures and experiences of people of color and women in the curricula; and the Afrocentrists propose a centering of African culture and history. Instead of viewing these as distinct spheres of knowledge, however, it would be more appropriate to conceive of them as overlapping areas of focus, which influence educational institutions to varying degrees across different contexts.

In addition to highlighting their own approaches and pedagogies, proponents of multicultural education have also undertaken significant analysis of the different ways in which educational institutions in the United States engage with difference. Banks has highlighted four approaches that seem to be dominant: the contributions approach, which focuses on culture as an object to be displayed during one-time events such as international days or a celebration of national heroes; the additive approach, which incorporates themes and examples from diverse cultures into the curricula but does not seek to promote any structural change; the transformative approach, which changes the paradigms that students employ to engage with the present, with an emphasis on understanding how others might view the same present from a different perspective; and finally, the social action approach, which seeks to enhance not only knowledge about different cultures but also provides students with the skills to take personal and social actions to address issues of social injustice. Advocates hope that a larger number of schools will adopt the transformative and social action approaches toward multicultural education.

Like the intercultural and intergroup movements, multicultural education too has been criticized, especially for the ways in which it is implemented in schools. It is argued that, in practice, multicultural education models often follow the contributions and additive approaches, which simply affirm diversity by including representations of marginalized groups in the curricula but do not engage with the structural and ideological factors that lead to marginalization or oppression in the first place. In addition, it is also argued that multicultural education's focus on issues of race sometimes leads to a de-prioritization of considerations of gender, sexuality, religion, nationality, and to some extent also social class. Educators and theorists have, therefore, attempted to reconceptualize the field to produce a deeper engagement with difference. Two recent approaches attempt to address some of these concerns: multicultural social reconstructionist education and critical multicultural education.

Emerging Theoretical Dimensions

Grounded in critical and feminist theories, multicultural social reconstructionist education pays particular attention to power relations, conceptualizes identities as fluid, promotes curricula that incorporate students' cultures and experiences, and emphasizes building advocacy and coalition-building skills. It explicitly addresses issues of social oppression and stratification, including gender and sexual injustice, by foregrounding an analysis of the different ways in which race, class, gender, and sexuality intersect to constitute students' and teachers' subjectivities and inform the formal and hidden curricula at schools. Significantly, it sees systems of racial, gender, sexual, and religious oppression as interconnected and reinforcing structures. More broadly, this approach encourages a reconstruction of cultural and societal institutions to promote democratic values and a sense of shared responsibility for societal inequities.

Critical multicultural education shares several dimensions with multicultural social reconstructionist education but extends the analysis by positioning itself as an orientation toward difference that seeks to interrogate the status quo through a historical, social, economic, and ideological investigation. Some of its key features, according to Sonia Nieto, include an emphasis on understanding cultures without essentializing them; making apparent the politics of knowledge production and transmission; encouraging discourses that challenge the status quo; problematizing a simplistic focus on empowering students of color; redefining immigration as a complicated process; and promoting a constant interrogation of teaching pedagogies and models of technocratic public education. In addition, critical multicultural education does not identify schools as the only site where learning takes place. Instead, it views schools as one of the several pedagogical sites and includes other societal institutions such as the family, community centers, neighborhoods, online media spaces, and so on, in its analysis as well. Furthermore, critical multicultural education has a global orientation, which often means that issues of social oppression are seen as intricately connected to broader global imbalances between countries in the North and south. The approach, therefore, seeks to excavate not only local but also global mechanisms that reproduce and sustain cultural differences. Scholars from a range of theoretical perspectives such as neo-Marxist, poststructuralist, feminist, queer, as well as affect theorists locate themselves within critical multicultural education.

Shenila S. Khoja-Moolji
Columbia University

See Also: Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development; Multicultural Education; Multiculturalism.

Further Readings

Banks, James A. "The Canon Debate, Knowledge Construction, and Multicultural Education." Educational Researcher, v.22/8 (1993).

Gillborn, David and Gloria Ladson-Billings. Handbook of Multicultural Education. New York: RoutledgeFalmer, 2004.

Mahalingam, Ram and Cameron McCarthy, eds. Multicultural Curriculum: New Directions for Social Theory, Practice, and Policy. New York: Routledge, 2000.

Nieto, Sonia. "Critical Multicultural Education and Students' Perspectives." In Stephen May, ed. Critical Multiculturalism. London: Falmer, 1999.

Multicultural Education Journals

Multicultural education is a curriculum field that emerged in the 1960s as a result of many factors, including the civil rights movement and the lack of balanced representation in U.S. curricula and textbooks. Christine Bennett asserts that multicultural education is a teaching and learning approach that emphasizes cultural diversity within pluralistic societies and empowers students to gain a full understanding of individuals culturally different from themselves. Leading scholars, including James Banks, Christine Bennett, Geneva Gay, Christine Sleeter, and Carl Grant, have developed various multicultural education approaches that are documented and applied in many scholarly outlets and journals. To date, there are five multicultural education journals and magazines with diversity in their focus, content, and targeted audience. These publications include Multicultural Perspectives, Journal of Praxis in Multicultural Education, International Journal of Multicultural Education, The Journal of Multiculturalism in Education, and Multicultural Education.

Multicultural Perspectives

This is the quarterly journal of the premier association for multicultural education, the National Association for Multicultural Education (NAME). Multicultural Perspectives is a peer-reviewed journal created in the summer of 1993 and is published by Taylor and Francis. It publishes articles featuring best practices in P through 16 (preschool through college completion), the nonprofit sector, and museum organizations. The journal features the following sections: Advancing the Conversations, Multicultural Windows, Creating Multicultural Classrooms, The Multicultural Library, Technology, Guide to New Resources, and NAME Regional News.

Journal of Praxis in Multicultural Education

This is a peer-reviewed journal housed in the University of Las Vegas, Nevada. It accepts manuscripts from the P through 16 community with an emphasis on the definition of praxis. This journal's manuscripts focus on research studies that show effective academic achievement practices of diverse learners from preschool through higher education. Since its inaugural issue in 2006, the journal has produced seven volumes. Manuscripts are published once or twice a year.

International Journal of Multicultural Education (IJME)

This open-access, peer-reviewed e-journal is for individuals interested in promoting cross-cultural understanding, equity, and global awareness in all education tiers. Their writings are centered around four areas, including (1) qualitative research; (2) literature-reviewed research that promotes and advances multicultural education theory and scholarship; (3) scholarship in multicultural education instructional strategies and ideas that are practical and have proven to be successful; and (4) reviews of online, professional, and children's books and visual arts resources. Beginning in 2013, IJME began publishing three times annually: April, August, and December. IJME is the successor of the electronic magazine of Multicultural Education, which published issues between 1999 and 2006 and transitioned into the current IJME in 2007. It is published out of Eastern University in St. Davids, Pennsylvania.

The Journal of Multiculturalism in Education

This scholarly journal disseminates peer-reviewed articles that integrate theory and praxis on P through 16-related multicultural areas around the world. It is an online publication housed at West Texas A & M University. To date, it has published eight volumes since its inauguration in 2005.

Multicultural Education

This magazine is an independent quarterly magazine published by Caddo Gap Press. It features articles on promising strategies, art, music, literature, personal perspectives, and resources in the field of multicultural education. It also includes book reviews and announcements on future events. Their audiences are P through 16 educators. The publication celebrated its 20th anniversary in the 2012 to 2013 academic year.

All of these journals are prominent in their own right in the P through 16 community, especially among teachers, teacher educators, and future teachers. The journals have disseminated articles that integrate theory and practices and have used these articles to advance conversations in the field.

Omobolade Delano-Oriaran
St. Norbert College

See Also: Cultural Competence, Model of; Multicultural Education; Multiculturalism; People of Color: Service Delivery, Psychological Assessment, Cultural Issues; Pluralism.

Further Readings

Bennett, C. Comprehensive Multicultural Education. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2003.
Caddo Gap Press, "News and Events." http://caddogap.com/newsevents.shtml (Accessed August 2013).
International Journal of Multicultural Education. "About the Journal." http://ijme-journal.org/index.php/ijme/index (Accessed August 2013).
Journal of Multiculturalism in Education. "Welcome." https://www.wtamu.edu/journal/multiculturalism-in-education.aspx (Accessed August 2013).
Journal of Praxis in Multicultural Education. "About this Journal." http://digitalscholarship.unlv.edu/jpme/about.html (Accessed August 2013).
National Association for Multicultural Education. "Publications." http://nameorg.org/publications (Accessed August 2013).
Taylor and Francis. "Multicultural Perspectives." http://www.tandfonline.com/loi/hmcp20#.UiS23ryE7Cg (Accessed August 2013).

Multiculturalism

Multiculturalism is an important subject that has been discussed and highlighted recently in many areas from education to politics. The reason for this fact is that many societies have now understood that some problems have arisen in different dimensions as people live together, namely from multiculturalism, and they intend to solve these problems by overcoming the problems among countries. Multiculturalism is defined in the literature as the legal and political coherence of ethnical diversity, coexistence of several cultures, modern societies covering different cultural groups, and ensuring that these different cultural groups have equal statutes. Although multiculturalism means several points of view or several dimensions, it could also be defined as the pluralism and diversity of cultures. For example, Canada, which has legalized the multicultural structure, was the first country to use this term in 1971, and although Pierre Trudeau, who was the prime minister of Canada, frequently mentioned the term multiculturalism, Canada continued with the double culturalism principle for some period. Despite this, multiculturalists defend that multiculturalism arose in the 1960s due to the cultural needs of groups that immigrated to Europe.

The word culture was a word used in its singular culture meaning until the 18th century, and today, culture addresses differentiation in characteristics such as religion, language, race, ethnical origin, class, gender, or lifestyle. In addition to that, the anthropologist Franz Boas defines culture as the patterns of belief, value, tradition, and behavior that people use in regulating their worlds and relationships with each other and are transferred from generation to generation. Consequently, multiculturalism means the coexistence of different cultures in a society. Moreover, multiculturalism means people having different religions, languages, races, and traditions living together.

Whereas multiculturalism does not consider it appropriate from the point of view of the conditions of the country to become prototypes in culture, language, ethnical origin, lifestyle, and religion, it perceives the differences that a society has as a richness and tries to establish a sociability on the grounds created by these differences. For that reason, as it is taken as a purpose by each social ideology, the main purpose of multiculturalism is to establish and survive the good society. A good society is a society that acknowledges cultural diversity as a richness and determines its policies in this direction.

There are various ways to handle the multiculturalism and its impacts at local, national, and global levels. Each different point of angle related to the subject gives a new dimension to our understanding about this complex and changing fact. Multiculturalism means the coming together, living, working, trading, and participating in the political life of people from different races, ethnical origins, religious and cultural groups on a piece of earth, as well as their social and cultural interaction and participation in political life, expressing a social diversity. Multiculturalists believe that multiculturalism teaches giving value to the citizens, diversity, and differences of a democratic society and assisting in integration with the society without breaking different cultures from their pasts. From the point of view of education, the concept of cultural diversity is as important as the concepts of identity and diversity. Furthermore, the culture is the whole of beliefs and actions that a group of people understand as the world they have constructed along with their individual and social lives. Thus, multiculturalism relates to cultural diversity and cultural differences and associates identity and diversity with multiculturalism. We are all connected to culture from physical, social, psychological, and spiritual aspects; therefore, we can change a culture, but we cannot break off from the culture. Whereas there is no escape from multiculturalism, which is defined by scholars as the celebration of diversity in daily life, there is also no escape from culture.

For example, Will Kymlicka underlines that countries that adopt the policy of multiculturalism have some responsibilities, and he states that the most widespread symbolic forms of the policy of multiculturalism comprise eight practices:

1. Ratification of multiculturalism by the constitution, regulations, and the parliament at central or regional level and at municipality level
2. Adoption of multiculturalism by school curricula
3. Inclusion of ethnical representation and sensitivity while obtaining license for public media
4. Granting of exception in clothing, regulations, laws, or lawsuits
5. Permitting double citizenship
6. Providing support to ethnical group organizations for cultural activities
7. Providing financing for education in two languages or courses in a mother tongue
8. Applying positive discrimination for migrant groups that are in disadvantageous (hard) conditions

The purpose of these eight policies specified is to catch the policy dimension that liberal, democratic countries encountered with the issues of whether to return to multiculturalism and developing multicultural citizenship models related to immigrants. It is highly significant to put multiculturalism to a historical context. In this regard, multiculturalism is a concept as old as humanity. Different cultures have always found a way to live together. For example, respecting diversity was a customary condition for many empires including the Ottoman Empire.

For that reason, multiculturalism is a concept that has different histories and origins in different countries. For instance, Canada was the first country to adopt multiculturalism as an official policy in the world together with diversity.

The government of Canada defines multiculturalism as follows: Canada considers its opinion of equality of all citizens as one of the building stones of multiculturalism. Multiculturalism ensures that all citizens are proud of protecting their own identities and of their feeling of loyalty. The feeling of acceptance gives Canadians the feeling of self-trust, ensuring them to be more open to various cultures and to easily adopt these cultures. The example of Canada demonstrates that multiculturalism encourages racial and ethnical coherence and understanding among cultures, and prohibits ghettos, hatred, discrimination, and violence.

This definition theoretically expresses a more comprehensive cultural and social significance. Recognition of diversities by laws and prohibition of discrimination and racism are a must in every country that believes in the equality of citizens. The conceptual discussions related to multiculturalism that developed in Canada brought into agenda the subjects of ghettos and violence as well as equality and human rights.

Whereas Canada is the first migration country that is registered as multicultural, it hosts groups who are ethnically diverse. In the country, multiculturalism is directed toward cultural differences, is focused on the integration of migrant populations, and is the framework of cultural identities. Racism, religion, and lingual differences are included in the concept of multiculturalism in Canada. Multiculturalism has been a part of the discussions of the identity of Canadian and of Canadian politics starting from the establishment of Canada in 1867. In the beginning, multiculturalism was directed toward bringing together the French and the English, who were two building elements, and subsequently assimilating other ethnical groups and migrants, thus organizing the relationship between the state and local people. However, it was understood that this mechanism did not operate, and the country politics was changed, taking into account the cultural, linguistic, and religious structures of individuals of different ethnical identities hosted by the country. Education has always played a key role in ensuring cultural differences. Over time, Canadian society has further adopted multiculturalism, emphasizing cultural differences and highlighting this issue more.

In this regard, Canada had an important place in the world on the issue of multiculturalism, paving the way for collective life of individuals of different ethnical origins in peace. The reason for high importance attached to multiculturalism is that it created a culture of respect in the country, integrating individuals of different ethnical origins and accelerating the process. In this regard, educational policies and state organizations put emphasis on diversity directed toward educating people having different ethnical structures and maintaining different cultures. The learning and teaching approaches in education were shaped around constructivism, respect, and multiculturalism.

The multicultural social structure of Canada is also enjoyed by many countries like the United States. In particular, the concept of multiculturalism in the United States is as old as that in Canada. The deprivation of black people of some rights that white men enjoyed accelerated the development of multiculturalism and multilingual policies in the country as well as multicultural and multilingual education that depended on these policies. Multiculturalists explain multiculturalism in the United States as follows:

> Multiculturalism is a social and political movement that considers the differences among individuals and groups not as a source of conflict but a potential source of power and renewal. It gives value to the effect that people continue their diverse experiences and backgrounds originating from racial, ethnical origin, gender, sexual orientation, and class differences and develop various viewpoints.

It tries to keep standing the ideals of equality, justice, and freedom that are at the root of the United States and adopt the respect for individuals and groups as a principle for the success and growth of the country. Many European countries have adopted multiculturalism as a state policy. For example, Bhikhu Parekh considers multiculturalism in the UK with a point of view that provides significant projections about human life and how we will create our social life.

Initially, people are embedded in the culture because they grow and live in a culturally structured world. They design their lives and social relationships according to the meaning system and importance of the culture and attach high importance to their cultural identities. Secondly, different cultures have different meanings and represent good life visions. A single culture could recognize human capacity and feeling in a limited framework and grasp only a part of human existence. Yet people need others and other cultures in order to understand themselves better and extend their intellectual and ethical horizons. Third, all cultures other than the most primitive are pluralistic and represent a dialogue that continues between different traditions and ways of thinking. These do not mean that they are deprived of internal harmony; on the contrary, the identity is pluralistic and flexible.

The multiculturalism indicated in the national policies and state policies in Australia responds to policies and programs of Australia, which entail cultural diversity, human relationships, social justice, equal opportunities, and antiracism. This order requires that all groups live together in harmony, participate in the society in a complete and effective manner, and use their skills and competencies for the goodness of economic, social, and cultural life.

In addition to this, the Australian government has emphasized the three dimensions of the policy of multiculturalism as follows: (1) cultural identity—it means the expressing and sharing by all Australians their cultural heritages including language and religion; (2) social justice—it expresses all Australians' right to be treated equally and have equality of opportunity while removing the obstacles arising from race, ethnical origin, culture, religion, language, gender, and the region of birth; and (3) manufacturer diversity—it expresses the need of all Australians to develop, use, and continue effective skills and competencies.

While defining multiculturalism, the concept of cultural diversity, which is frequently encountered, is a point that should be highlighted. In addition, the Declaration on Cultural Diversity adopted by the Ministerial Committee of the Council of Europe in its December 7, 2000, meeting, states that cultural diversity is the coexistence and exchange of different practices from cultural aspects. In the same council, various decisions were made for the maintenance and implementation of cultural diversity, such as inviting the member states to continue and encourage cultural and linguistic diversity in the new global framework inviting the Council of Europe to adopt obligations under relevant documents, and also inviting them to pay attention to sustain and encourage cultural diversity in other international areas. Today, compliance by Turkey, which is striving toward entering the European Union, with the decision to be made by the European Council within the context of cultural diversity, will accelerate the process of membership in this union.

Different from the definitions of multiculturalism that is specified, it is defined as an alternative to the understanding of assimilation, which has been widespread in the past. Multiculturalism accepts the existence of various cultures in a country. This situation does not mean the existence of numerous different cultures in the society. On the contrary, it expresses a society that creates, guarantees, and encourages the areas where different cultures may grow themselves. Meanwhile, multiculturalism expresses the formation of a public area where these societies can interact, enrich the culture that exists, and establish new reconciliation systems reflecting their own identities. As a social philosophy and policy, multiculturalism expresses the effort to create a coherent society from different ethnical and cultural groups. Accepting and valuing the diversity and not ignoring diversity or not trying to put all groups in a single basket are more accurate descriptions.

As multiculturalism has principally arisen for demolishing the understanding of assimilation, the term assimilation should be emphasized. Assimilation could be defined as the simulation of a culture that is different from the prevailing culture of the society and participated or was forced to participate in that society for any reason. Multiculturalism is an alternative for preventing the clash of cultural differences and demolishes the assimilation in question. As a matter of fact, when near history is examined, it is possible to see many country examples where the issue of multiculturalism was used to solve problems that have arisen due to cultural differences.

Many countries and researchers believe that at the core of all conflicts in multicultural societies lie misunderstandings, doubt, or lack of trust. Many people coming from different backgrounds tend to misinterpret and fail to understand the core of foreign customs, religious beliefs, or different attitudes. A quote from James Banks brings out the importance of multiculturalism as "we live in a dangerous, complex, and depressed world where there is a need for leaders, educators, and teachers who will exceed the unsurpassable cultural, ethnical, and religious borders, imagine new possibilities, find new paradigms, and perform personal transformation and visionary actions." Thus, multiculturalism, beside all, relates to developing new democratic citizenship models built on human rights ideals. This is a part of a wider revolution of human rights covering ethnical and racial diversity. Multiculturalism and training are two interconnected concepts. In addition to being up-to-date, these two concepts host issues such as cultural diversity, difference, equality, and racism. For that reason, it is misleading to think that these two concepts are different from each other. For example, students from various cultures are being trained in a school.

The basic thesis at the root of the discussion on multiculturalism and education is that multiculturalism creates new, healthy generations as social tolerance increases as a result of cultural change for both the products and ideas, thus providing for the wellness of the society and accelerating progress, thus being a successful policy. The opinion asserted by those who think otherwise is that discrimination problems or language obstacles of multiculturalism constitute the basic obstacles before creating such a policy. When the core of multiculturalism is in focus, this policy aims at decreasing discrimination and expressing the ideas openly.

In addition, multiculturalism has three different, interrelated categorical uses by researchers: (1) demographic—identifies use—it is used for expressing the existence of citizens of different ethnical origins of a multicultural society or a state; the structural differentiation in the state in fact represents the cultural diversity; (2) ideological—normative use—this is the use where the different cultural identities in the society are discussed from sociologic theory and ethical or philosophical perspectives; (3) programmed—political use—this means some types of programs and political initiatives are designed for managing ethnical diversity.

In addition to the foregoing definitions, scholars accepted the existence of ethnical diversity and that individuals guarantee to protect their own cultures by guarding their rights and keeping their values high.

Another concept that comes to mind when one speaks about multiculturalism is the concept of otherization. Otherization means the personalization of one who is not us or the exclusion of the person from his or her own group or culture. As it could be understood from the definition, in societies where such a situation occurs, persons who are included in the group "other" and have a culture different from the dominant culture are considered as victims. These persons experience big problems in using their mother tongue in particular. It is well known that the ability of one to learn his or her own language, to use and develop the language, provides for more development in the ability of a person to know and learn new things.

Multiculturalism is a concept that is included among the general principles of various religions. For example, a verse in the Qur'an, the holy book of the religion of Islam, states that "the superior of you is the one who is more afraid of God." It means that the superiority is not in color, race, or generation; it suggests that people should not be discriminated against in the shapes and values they have but be valued according to the value they have before God. It is also stated in the Bible, the holy book of Christians, that "If the first dough is divine, then the whole dough is divine. If the root is divine, branches are also divine. However, if some branches of an olive tree of good species are pruned, and you have got a share from the core of the tree that gives live after it is inoculated among a wild olive, do not be proud against the previous branches." This verse indicates that people should not use the values they have as means to claim superiority over others. Also in a verse of the Torah, the divine book of Jews, it states, "How good, how beautiful it is to live brotherly in union." It emphasizes that the brotherly life enjoyed by people constitutes a good example of a good society. As it could be seen, the divine books of three religions order that no discrimination should be made among people due to different cultural characteristics, as it has been recommended in the teachings of multiculturalism, and that brotherly living enjoyed by all people will bring them peace, happiness, and tranquility.

When the opinions of thinkers who wrote on multiculturalism and the statements in the divine books of three religions are interpreted, it could be concluded that the concept of multiculturalism is among the common beliefs of religions because the purpose of religions is to ensure that people live in peace through spiritual sanctions. Multiculturalism claims that the diversity of people and the values they have do not constitute advantages or disadvantages or targets but rather creates a society where everyone lives in peace enjoying equal rights. It could be said in this regard that, as it is in the teachings of divine religions, multiculturalism also rejects discrimination with a strict language.

Hasan Aydin
Yildiz Technical University

See Also: Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Multicultural Education.

Further Readings

Aydin, Hasan. "A Literature-Based Approach on Multicultural Education." The Anthropologist, v.16/1 (2013).
Banks, James A. and Cherry A. McGee Banks, eds. Multicultural Education: Issues and Perspectives. Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley and Sons, 2009.
Kaya, Ilhan and Hasan Aydin. The Question of Mother Tongue Education in Turkey: Challenges, Experiences, and Model Recommendations for Bilingual Education. Istanbul, Turkey: UKAM, 2013.
Kymlicka, Will. Multiculturalism: Success, Failure, and the Future. Transatlantic Council on Migration, Migration Policy Institute, 2012.
Ladson-Billings, Gloria. The Dreamkeepers: Successful Teachers of African American Children. Hoboken, NJ: John Wiley and Sons, 2009.
National Association of Multicultural Education (NAME). Multicultural Education. http://nameorg.org (Accessed December 2013).
Nieto, Sonia. Affirming Diversity: The Sociopolitical Context of Multicultural Education. New York: Longman, 2000.
Parekh, Bhikhu. Rethinking Multiculturalism: Cultural Diversity and Political Theory. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
Prato, Guiliana B., ed. Beyond Multiculturalism: Views From Anthropology. London: Ashgate, 2009.
Race, Richard. Contemporary Issues in Education Studies: Multiculturalism and Education. New York: Continuum International Publishing Group Press, 2011.
Reitz, Jeffrey G. "Assessing Multiculturalism as a Behavioural Theory." In Multiculturalism and Social Cohesion. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Springer, 2009.

Multiethnic Placement Act of 1994

The Multiethnic Placement Act (MEPA), first adopted by Congress in 1994, was a legislative action written with the goal of reducing the number of children who linger in foster care while waiting for adoption. The practice of racial matching of foster children to adoptive parents was seen by legislators as one of the factors increasing the length of stay for these children in foster care and, by extension, swelling the already unwieldy rolls of children in state custody. Proponents of MEPA sought not to eliminate but to relegate the priority of race and ethnicity considerations in adoptive placement decisions by child welfare workers. Although MEPA has been law for nearly 20 years, child advocates still struggle over its specific provisions, interpretation, and application in daily child welfare practice.

In the history of legal adoption in the United States, the practice of racial matching has stirred great controversy among advocates mutually motivated by the well-being of foster children. On one side of the issue are those who believe that it is always in the best interest of children of one racial or ethnic background to be permanently adopted into families of the same background. On the opposite side are those who've argued that it is never in the best interest of children to linger without the sense of permanency that legal adoption brings when there are caring families willing to adopt them, even if that family does not match their own racial or ethnic heritage.

Complicating this controversy is the complex history of institutionalized racism in the United States. In fact, there is well-documented history of the government encouraging the adoption of nonwhite children into the homes of white families with the intention of forcing cultural assimilation and acculturation, particularly with Native American and African American children. Over time, these practices have resulted in significant losses to the maintenance and perpetuation of the diverse cultures of American minorities.

Likely motivated by information from a Congressional study that revealed that the foster child population had reached more than 500,000 children and that African American children waited longer to be adopted, Ohio Senator Howard Metzenbaum introduced the bill that became MEPA, and President Bill Clinton signed it into law in 1994. Despite the lack of consensus among child advocates and researchers on racial matching, the bill essentially came down on the side of accelerating adoption over the practice of racial matching. However, compromises were incorporated into the bill that continue to allow race and ethnicity to be considered in placement decisions. However, it is today's law that also includes additional provisions known as interethnic provisions (IEPs).

Major Provisions

Specifically, MEPA/IEP make the following provisions: Government and federally funded adoption and foster care agencies are allowed to consider the cultural, ethnic, or racial background of a child and the capacity of an adoptive or foster parent to meet the needs of a child with that background when making a placement. However, these agencies are prohibited from delaying, denying, or otherwise discriminating when placing children on the basis of the parent or child's race, color, or national origin or categorically denying any person the opportunity to become a foster or adoptive parent solely on the basis of race, color, or national origin of the parent or the child. In addition, state agencies must develop plans for the recruitment of foster and adoptive families that reflect the ethnic and racial diversity of children in the state for whom families are needed. And finally, failure to comply with MEPA is considered a violation of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act and enforceable as such.

Criticism

Immediately upon the adoption of MEPA and IEP into law, child welfare workers criticized it for its lack of clarity and procedural guidance. Therefore, in 1995, the Department of Health and Human Services published Policy Guidance on the Use of Race, Color or National Origin as Considerations in Adoption and Fostering in the Federal Register, which was designed to help agencies comply with the law. Yet still in 1998, the Government Accounting Office issued a report to the House of Representatives validating the ongoing difficulty of agencies in consistently implementing the policy.

One problem with the interpretation of the law is that its restrictions on the practice of racial matching may seem to some child welfare workers to be inconsistent with the other federal laws and state policies related to ethnicity and placement, like the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, which encourages the practice for particular groups.

Human services scholars have also been critical of MEPA because of its lack of implementation resources and funding. In particular, while the bill encourages transracial and interethnic adoptions, no additional training or support is provided through the legislation assisting adoptive families with the unique challenges they face.

One of the strongest criticisms of MEPA stems from the research that shows that, in the two decades since the legislation has been in place, the overrepresentation of minority children in foster care in the United States has continued. Such statistics bring light to the idea that other child welfare practices, not racial matching in adoption alone, contribute significantly to disproportionality.

Finally, research has been largely inconclusive about the impact of either racial matching or transracial placement in terms of the overall well-being of children in substitute care. While evidence supports the idea that having children remain connected to their cultural heritage can serve to promote positive identity development and self-esteem, evidence also supports that children who are raised by parents of different cultural heritage can still develop a positive sense of self. And as child welfare workers continue to face the reality of high rates of abuse and neglect, large numbers of children continuing to come into state custody, disproportionate numbers of minority children filling the foster care rolls, an overall lack of available foster and adoptive parents of all racial and ethnic backgrounds, and a specific gap in numbers of available minority foster and adoptive parents, the struggle for clarity in how to best help these children achieve permanency continues.

Abigail Wyche
Northern Michigan University

See Also: Abuse and Neglect; Acculturation; Adoption Agencies and Services; Assimilation; Child Welfare Services; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Foster Care Agencies; Indian Child Welfare Act; Interethnic Adoption Provision.

Further Readings

Brooks, Devon, Richard P. Barth, Alice Bussiere, and Glendora Patterson. "Adoption and Race:

Implementing the Multiethnic Placement Act and the Interethnic Adoption Provisions." Social Work, v.44/2 (1999).

Government Accounting Office. "Implementation of Multiethnic Placement Act Poses Difficult Challenges." http://www.gao.gov/archive/1998/he98204.pdf (Accessed August 2013).

Vidal de Haymes, Maria and Shirley Simon. "Transracial Adoption: Families Identify Issues and Needed Support Services." Child Welfare, v.82/2 (2003).

Multiracial Children

It is crucial to preface this discussion of race and the issue of being multiracial with the acknowledgement that race is socially constructed. Because race is a human construct whose boundaries are mediated by history, legislation, and other social order aspects, it is crucial to recognize the importance of its definition. Race is not a biological fact but rather a socially constructed concept. It is this social aspect that is of interest and influences the identity and psychological well-being of multiracial individuals. Multiracial is defined as someone with socially and phenotypically distinct racial heritages. The term multiracial includes individuals who are biracial, as well as individuals with more than two distinct racial heritages.

Growing Population of Multiracial Children

The multiracial child population is the fastest-growing population in America. Ever since the 2000 census, which marked the first time individuals were able to mark off more than one race, individuals identifying as multiracial has steadily increased to a total of 9 million people, approximately 3 percent of the population. In fact, the percentage of people identifying as multiracial grew three times faster during the last decade than the number of Americans reporting a single race. Additionally, this is a young population with more than half under the age of 24. Estimations state that, by 2060, approximately one in five individuals will identify as multiracial. The growing prominence of multiracial individuals, such as President Barack Obama, Tiger Woods, Derek Jeter, and Ann Curry, has also led to more positive attitudes, more acceptance, and less discrimination toward multiracial individuals and mixed-raced marriages. This is particularly true in areas where interracial marriage and multiracial individuals are high such as in California, New York, and Hawai'i. Hawai'i has the largest multiracial population, with almost one-quarter of the state identifying with two or more races.

Ethnic Identity

The concept of ethnic identity measures how much individuals identify with their own ascribed ethnic group and the extent to which that identification is salient and significant to them.

A positive and strong ethnic identity is related to many mental health-related outcomes, including self-esteem, self-efficacy, and depression. Difficulty in forming this stable identity can be expressed through a range of psychological symptoms. At the milder end of the spectrum, individuals may suffer from identity confusion, with mild symptoms of sadness, while those with more severe symptoms, such as antisocial and depressive behaviors, may exhibit behavioral problems such as delinquency and substance abuse. The normative stressors to forming a stable identity prevalent during adolescence may be heightened for the multiracial adolescent. Ethnic identification in multiracial adolescents is complex. For instance, the identity may be shaped by physical appearance and is in response not only to how multiracial individuals identify themselves but also by how others may identify them. Moreover, this identification is not static, but rather, it may change over time and according to situation. The environment also plays a role; for example, the number of ethnic minorities in the community may determine whether the multiracial individual identifies with the minority group.

There are different beliefs about what is considered a healthy identity for multiracial individuals. Some argue that multiracial individuals may identify with one, both, or neither of their biological parents' heritages. Others believe it is important to integrate the multiple racial identifications into one healthy multiracial identity. As noted by the bicultural competency theory, multiracial adolescents do benefit from exposure to multiple racial groups and often learn to function in multiple cultural environments. Multiracial adolescents who acquire this flexibility often exhibit a cognitive style that gives them stronger problem-solving skills; they are adept at interpreting and responding to the demands of varying social situations and various cultural orientations. Multiracial individuals are often well versed in understanding and following the rules and norms of numerous cultural contexts; therefore, they are more proficient at interacting with various cultural groups. Furthermore, competent multiracial individuals have a broader base of social support and a strong sense of personal identity and efficacy.

Peer Groups

Conformity is often not only valued but also expected during adolescence. Multiracial adolescents are at risk for rejection by both the majority and minority groups due to differences in physical appearance and family background. The process of forming a healthy identity can be disturbed by peer rejection. Multiracial children may find it difficult to get support from peers. Some multiracial children report teasing and staring. Peer groups (cliques) are inherently dependent on inclusion and exclusion, and this is especially pronounced in junior high and high school. This potential lack of friends has important implications because not only does having friends serve as an indication of social ability, but it helps influence social, emotional, and intellectual competencies.

These additional complications may often place multiracial individuals at greater risk for delinquency and peer conflicts. Multiracial adolescents may withdraw socially and not have any friends for fear of social rejection. Or, in a desperate attempt to be part of a group, they are more vulnerable to peer pressure from delinquent groups. On the other hand, multiracial adolescents may feel more welcomed by different groups and be more capable of using their multiracial background to navigate among groups. Multiracial individuals may be more likely to have racially diverse friends and continue doing so as they get older.

Parents

Multiracial families also face unique challenges compared to monoracial families. For example, there may be disapproval and rejection from extended family, neighbors, and the community. Multiracial children may face additional conflict within the families due to differences in language, religion, and child-rearing practices. There may be conflict among siblings with respect to identity as not all siblings within a family may identify similarly. Multiracial children of divorced families may face greater difficulties in accepting and valuing the culture of both parents. Not having parents that are multiracial may affect the amount of support and understanding parents can offer their children about the multiracial experience; this is in contrast to monoracial families whose parents can draw on their personal experiences. Parents in mixed-race marriages may not have the appropriate tools to discuss multiracial identity. This may cause children to feel a sense of loneliness, confusion, and frustration. Therefore, helping their children develop a clear identity and understand potential challenges of a multiracial identity, including discrimination and questioning, is an important task for parents of multiracial youth.

Tailoring Intervention and Prevention Needs

Mental health professionals and educators need to be prepared to meet the unique needs of multiracial children and their families. To begin with, individuals need to be trained to understand the identity development process for multiracial youth and the problems that may occur. A common question asked of multiracial individuals is this: “So, what are you anyway?” This can be viewed as benign, or it may be seen as an uncomfortable and harassing question. This is a good opportunity for mental health professionals and educators to help multiracial children developing coping skills to address questions and respond to bias, discuss mixed-race heritages, and point out diversity that may exist within everyone’s families.

For example, some families may have individuals who speak different languages, have different religions, and look different. Also recognizing issues that may be unique to multiracial families and incorporating techniques when working with these families are both important; this may include resources and curriculum around multiracial individuals and families. Offering parents education about the unique challenges for their children and also tools to discuss these challenges is important. It is key to recognize that parents may feel helpless and ineffective in supporting and teaching their children about the multiracial experience. Thus, creating or being aware of support groups for multiracial individuals and families is helpful. Discussing these issues may normalize potential difficulties and help provide support not only for the multiracial individuals but their parents as well. There are also numerous online support groups and resources that can be introduced to families.

Future Directions

The process of ethnic identification in multiracial youth is scant and has not kept up to speed with the growing multiracial population. In addition to understanding the formation of ethnic identity in multiracial youth, future considerations include the within-group diversity that exists. Also important is studying the different environmental contexts such as communities of varying levels of ethnic composition and ethnic socialization within families and peers. Moreover, recognizing additional factors that intersect with identity development, such as gender, sexuality, and religion, to name a few, is crucial.

Anh-Luu T. Huynh-Hohnbaum
California State University, Los Angeles

See Also: Biracial Children; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Multiethnic Placement Act of 1994; Multiracial Individuals and Families.

Further Readings

Rockquemore, K.A. and T. A. Laszloffy. Raising Biracial Children. New York: Altamira Press, 2005.
Root, M. P. and M. Kelley, eds. The Multiracial Child Resource Book. Seattle, WA: Mavin Foundation, 2003.
Wardle, F. and M. I. Cruz-Janzen. Meeting the Needs of Multiethnic and Multiracial Children in Schools. Boston, MA: Pearson, 2004.

Multiracial Individuals and Families

Multiracial individuals and families have more than two racial heritages. Multiracial families may consist of interracially married couples and their children or monoracial couples and racially different adopted children. Some may become multiracial families via remarriage. Multiracial families are formulated in various ways, but they have many cultural needs in common. They have been exposed to cultural stereotypes such as that multiracial families tend to easily break up, that multiracial individuals are mentally confused, and so on. This entry discusses how cultural stereotypes toward multiracial individuals and families have formed in the United States and what kinds of cultural needs multiracial individuals and families have.

Stigmatization of Multiracial Individuals and Families

Multiracial individuals and families were stigmatized as socially perverted in the past. Many factors contributed to this negative view. One of them was the hybrid degeneracy theory. In the late 19th and the early 20th centuries, some scientists examined multiracial individuals' physical traits, such as the size of the skulls, skin color, and mental attribute, and so on, and they concluded that multiracial individuals were mentally, physically, and morally weak and could not function well in society. This idea was called the hybrid degeneracy theory. The theory is now found to be unscientific, but it fabricated and rooted the negative stereotypes of multiracial individuals in the United States.

In addition to the hybrid degeneracy theory, other factors that stigmatized multiracial individuals and families were the antimiscegenation laws. Virginia first enacted a law in 1662, and many other states enacted similar laws. The law banned any marriage between a Caucasian and non-Caucasian. Some states banned marriages between different non-Caucasian groups such as a marriage between Mexican Americans and Chinese Americans, but these marriages were usually tolerated because it did not threaten the purity of the Caucasian race. It is therefore pointed out that the purpose of the antimiscegenation law was to keep the Caucasian race from being mixed with other races and to maintain the white supremacy. A famous court case that denied interracial marriage by appropriating the hybrid degeneracy theory was 1869 Scott v. Georgia. In this ruling, a judge noted that interracial marriage was against nature and God, and its offspring were destined to be dysfunctional. The judge concluded that multiracial individuals and families degraded the Caucasian race, and therefore, they had to be illegal.

Law and science together contributed to stigmatizing multiracial individuals and families. There are many reports on how multiracial individuals and families were discriminated against in the United States. For example, many interracially married couples could not find a place to have their marriages officially approved because of the antimiscegenation law. If they lived in Virginia where interracial marriages were prohibited, they had to go to another state that allowed interracial marriage. Some families were harassed by neighbors by being stared at and called names, having their property vandalized and having their children bullied at school, and undergoing physical violence. Even some educational institutions such as high schools and universities prohibited students from interracial dating.

Multiracial individuals and families had difficult times in the United States because law and science did not allow their existence, and society uncritically accepted the negative views. The environment surrounding multiracial individuals and families changed when an interracial couple challenged the antimiscegenation law. The antimiscegenation law banned biracial marriages for a long time and functioned to justify the discrimination against multiracial individuals and families. However, the law was challenged by an interracial couple, Mildred and Perry Loving, in 1963. Mildred was part African American and Native American. Perry was Caucasian. They were brought up in the same neighborhood in Virginia and came to love each other when they grew up.

Because Virginia practiced the anti-miscegenation law, they went to Washington, D.C., to have their marriage approved officially and lived there for a while. They wanted to live in their hometown in Virginia and moved back. When they were back, the Virginia police arrested them late at night because they violated the antimiscegenation law. The state mandated the couple not to come back to Virginia for 25 years, but they wanted to live in their own community and started a lawsuit against Virginia. On June 12, 1967, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled the antimiscegenation as unconstitutional, and Virginia had to approve of the couple's marriage. After the ruling, multiracial individuals and families were no longer an illegal existence in the United States, and the social environment toward them has become lenient. Nevertheless, stereotypes toward multiracial individuals and families still continue today.

Cultural Stereotypes of Multiracial Individuals and Families

Multiracial individuals used to be regarded as mentally, physically, and morally weak. Multiracial families were thought to be destined to fall apart because they transgressed a social norm that families should be formed along the same racial lines. Today, people having this kind of negative view toward multiracial individuals as well as families are rare, but different types of stereotypes are made. For example, multiracial individuals, especially multiracial female individuals, are thought to be exotic, beautiful, and sexy. Multiracial individuals are an answer to the racial conflicts in the United States. The U.S. mainstream media utilize these stereotypes of multiracial individuals for their advertisements, films, TV productions, and so on. We can quite often see racially ambiguous models on flyers and actors on TV and in films now. When we consider the past that multiracial individuals were thought to be social misfits, some may think that the emergence of multiracial individuals in the mainstream media might be a favorable change.

Some researchers on multiracial individuals and families contend that having more and more multiracial individuals in the mainstream media empowers once-ostracized multiracial individuals because it increases their visibility. They also contend that multiracial stars can function as role models for multiracial individuals. They point out that multiracial individuals find it hard to find a role model in their lives. Their parents are usually monoracial, and they cannot fully function as role models for multiracial individuals. Yet multiracial stars who share similar racial heritages could be role models for multiracial individuals.

On the other hand, some researchers question if multiracial stars really function as role models of multiracial individuals. They examine multiracial individuals in the mainstream media and argue that many of these multiracial individuals have Caucasian features. This means that multiracial individuals are accepted in the mainstream media as long as they do not threaten the Caucasian standard of beauty. In addition, there are many multiracial actors in the 21st-century film industry, but the roles they play are very limited. They either play monoracial roles or superhuman roles. They rarely play multiracial roles that reflect their own racial heritages. If this is the case, multiracial individuals in the mainstream media are far from appealing to the reality of the diverse population of multiracial individuals. They fail to be role models. Researchers also criticize that the stereotypes of multiracial individuals as someone overcoming race problems are appropriated by transnational corporations. These corporations use multiracial models to appeal to the world market by delivering a message that they are against racism and embrace racial diversity. Yet researchers contend that the corporations' seemingly liberal messages through the usage of multiracial models actually disguise their capitalist desire to maximize their profits. In short, multiracial individuals in the mainstream media only strengthen the stereotypes of multiracial individuals.

Some multiracial individuals find stereotypes of multiracial individuals such as beautiful or exotic, and the solution to racism acceptable, because these stereotypes sound positive, but others find that these stereotypes do not reflect their own reality. They have their own cultural needs to resist the stereotypes society has forced on them and claim who they really are. Some multiracial individuals have started challenging the stereotypes by representing their own selves through various medium.

Cultural Production on the Lives of Multiracial Individuals and Families

Multiracial individuals and families problematize the stereotypical representations of multiracial individuals and families created by the mainstream media, and they have started representing themselves in many media such as films, books, magazines, photography, arts, theater, comedy, Internet sites, and so on. These cultural productions deal with various issues multiracial individuals and families confront every day.

Films created by multiracial individuals take up many issues. Some films interview multiracial families and show what kind of problems they have gone through. These films illustrate the experience that, when the couples marry, their relatives or friends sometimes do not accept their marriage. They also show conflicts between parents and children when the children grow up. These are common experiences multiracial families share, but they are not narrated in the mainstream media. Some films interview multiracial university students. Students tell their unique experiences growing up in multiracial families and everyday experiences at schools. Some films are animated and tell the shared experiences of multiracial families such as how they are stared at in public places and how people do not associate the family as a family.

There are many books written by multiracial individuals too. Authors talk about many issues such as sexuality, identity conflicts, problems, and resilience of multiracial families, oscillating feelings between a mother's and father's racial groups, curiosity about their ancestors' countries, war experiences, and so on. In the United States, as dating partners are usually decided along the same racial groups, it is sometimes difficult for some multiracial individuals to decide on a dating partner because they do not belong to one racial group. Some writers recount their search for cultural roots by visiting their ancestors' homeland. Some authors narrate their autobiographies as war orphans born to American military servicemen and foreign women in whose countries American military servicemen were stationed. Their narratives reveal the diversity of multiracial individuals. Some books are dedicated to children. These children's books tell stories of multiracial families in which interracial couples love each other, they are loved by relatives and friends, and of course, everyone loves their children too. The loving atmosphere of the multiracial families in books can deliver the message to children that they are an important asset to the family as well as to society and give them confidence in who they are.

There are magazines specially edited for multiracial individuals and families. These magazines take up issues pertaining to the cultural needs of multiracial individuals and families. They provide information on conferences, get-togethers, cultural events, and so on, all of which may interest multiracial individuals and families. They feature stories of multiracial celebrities, individuals, and families, and readers can experience right along with them. These magazines function not only to give information on multiracial individuals and families but also to network multiracial individuals and families. People meet other multiracial individuals and families through the information provided by the magazines. Internet sites for multiracial individuals and families have a similar function. They provide various information on multiracial individuals and families. Some Internet sites introduce history, people, and books on multiracial individuals and families to their users. Some sites offer opportunities for multiracial individuals and families to talk to one another online. The number of Internet sites on multiracial individuals and families is innumerable, and they have become useful sources for multiracial individuals and families.

Multiracial photographers are working on unique ideas. Multiracial individuals in the mainstream media tend to have Caucasian features, but multiracial individuals and families in reality are racially and ethnically very diverse. A multiracial photographer takes pictures of hundreds of multiracial individuals and shows how diverse the population is. A monoracial photographer who is a father of a multiracial family may develop an interesting idea too. He takes photos of multiracial families, some of which are made through blood relation and others through adoption and remarriage. By showing a variety of multiracial families, the photographer introduces the diversity of multiracial families. Some multiracial artists also challenge the mainstream representation of multiracial individuals and families. They incorporate their multicultural family backgrounds and racially ambiguous figures into their paintings. In this way, they demonstrate a multiracial identity that is irreducible to any racial group.

Multiracial comedians subvert the rigid racial categories in the United States by addressing their identities and families to audiences. Some multiracial comedians recount their experiences as being never identified as multiracial individuals by others. Some make fun of their parents' interracial marriage, but others find it a positive step to change race relations in the United States. Some criticize parents' racial groups that do not accept multiracial individuals. They take up seemingly taboo issues on multiracial individuals and families and make these issues something funny. They make various issues of multiracial individuals and families laughable and accessible to wide audiences.

Toward a More Tolerant Society for Multiracial Individuals and Families

Various cultural productions by multiracial individuals and families respond to the cultural needs of multiracial individuals and families. As discussed, they are still exposed to problematic stereotypes society has made of them. They have a strong necessity to represent themselves and to tell who they are to society. These cultural activities tell us the diverse experiences of multiracial individuals and families. Some multiracial families have problems in maintaining their unity, but many are stable, happy families. Some multiracial individuals have gone through difficult times vis-à-vis their identity, family, and sexuality, but they eventually overcome the problems and are confident in who they are. These cultural productions are especially valuable to the growing number of young multiracial families.

According to the 2010 census, approximately 10 percent of households are multiracial families. The number seems to be small, but it was 7 percent in 2000. The number of multiracial families grew 28 percent in just 10 years. The 2000 census also reveals that the multiracial population is larger than the monoracial population under the age of 14 in the United States. More and more young Americans interracially marry and make multiracial families. They need cultural representations that fit their own reality. The productions of cultural representations of multiracial individuals and families that are not distorted by stereotypes can empower multiracial individuals and families because they can know the pain and resilience of other multiracial individuals and families through these productions. They are also valuable as Americans in general. Without cultural productions on multiracial individuals and families, Americans would only know of them through the stereotypes the mainstream media make, and they would rarely know what multiracial individuals and families really are. The challenge of multiracial individuals and families to the stereotypes is thus to prompt the understanding of the cultural needs of multiracial individuals and families and contribute to making a more racially informed and tolerant American society.

Kaori Mori Want
Shibaura Institute of Technology

See Also: Biracial Children; Biracial Couples; Family Structure, Diversity of; Multiracial Children; Race, Social Definitions of; Racial and Ethnic Categories, U.S. Census.

Further Readings

Beltran, Mary and Camilla Fojas, ed. Mixed Race Hollywood. New York: New York University Press, 2008.

Kaeser, Gigi and Peggy Gillespie. Of Many Colors: Portraits of Multiracial Families. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994.
Kevin, Johnson, ed. Mixed Race America and the Law. New York: New York University Press, 2003.
O'Hearn, Claudia Chiawei, ed. Half and Half: Writers on Growing Up Biracial and Bicultural. New York: Pantheon, 1998.
Root, Maria and Matt Kelly, ed. Multiracial Child Resource Book: Living Complex Identities. Seattle, WA: Mavin Foundation, 2003.

Multisystemic Therapy

Multisystemic Therapy (MST) is an intensive, family-centered, community-based practice model successfully applied and tested with diverse racial, ethnic, and socioeconomic groups. MST initially focused on eliminating the antisocial behaviors of juvenile offenders aged 12 to 17. After 30 years and over 18 experimental studies, MST demonstrated that it can reduce costly, less effective out-of-home placements by as much as 50 percent, and rearrest rates by as much as 70 percent. It improves school attendance and performance, as well as psychiatric symptoms, and diminishes or eliminates substance use. Because frequent family, school, and community contacts and activities are required, clinicians work with four to seven families at a time. Model-pertinent case-specific assessment and planning documents from these efforts are updated weekly and shared with the MST supervisor, who uses these data to plan weekly coaching of a team of clinicians. This structured quality assurance greatly contributes to MST's ability to achieve targeted outcomes, usually within four to six months.

MST assessment and interventions are specifically anchored in ecological systems theory. Interactions within and between the family, school, the youth's peers, and the community may support or constrain prosocial behavior, or may maintain antisocial behaviors. With the youth and family caregivers, MST clinicians identify proximal contributing factors in multiple systems that maintain behaviors of concern. Together, they draw fit circle assessments. At the center of the circle is a well-defined (including frequency, duration, and intensity) behavior of concern. Thorough consideration of interactions within and between the family, school, the youth's peers, and the community identifies contributing factors that may maintain that behavior. These factors are drawn outside the circle with directional arrows, indicating if they shape other contributing factors and the behavior of concern. Problem fit circles serve as a map for designing interventions to eliminate specific contributing factors. Assessment and interventions are carefully designed and closely monitored by MST supervisors and consultants for fidelity to theory-based principles.

An assessment is made to understand the "fit" between identified problems and key factors from other systems shaping youth behavior. A similar assessment of the fit of the youth's successes also helps guide the treatment process. MST therapists use strengths from the youth's environment as levers for positive change. Focusing on family strengths has numerous advantages such as building on strategies that the family already knows how to use, creating a sense of hope, identifying protective factors, decreasing frustration by emphasizing problem solving, and enhancing caregivers' confidence. Interventions are designed to promote responsible behavior and decrease irresponsible actions by family members. Interventions address what's happening now in the delinquent's life. Therapists look for action that can be immediately taken, targeting specific, well-defined problems. Such interventions enable participants to track the progress of treatment and provide clear criteria to measure success. Family members are expected to actively work toward goals by focusing on present-oriented solutions versus gaining insight or focusing on the past. When the goals are met, the treatment can end.

Interventions target sequences of behavior within and between the various interacting elements of the adolescent's life—family, teachers, friends, home, school and community—that sustain the identified problems. Interventions are designed to be appropriate to the youth's age and to fit their developmental needs. A developmental emphasis stresses building the adolescent's ability to get along well with peers and to acquire academic and vocational skills that will promote a successful transition to adulthood. Interventions require daily or weekly effort by family. Intensive, multifaceted change efforts support more rapid problem resolution, earlier identification of when interventions need fine-tuning, continuous evaluation of outcomes, more frequent corrective interventions, and more opportunities for family members to experience the success that they orchestrated. Intervention effectiveness is continuously evaluated from multiple perspectives with MST team members held accountable for overcoming barriers to successful outcomes. MST does not label families as "resistant, not ready for change or unmotivated." This approach avoids blaming the family and places the responsibility for positive treatment outcomes on the MST team. Interventions are designed to invest the caregivers with the ability to address the family's needs after the intervention is over. The caregiver is viewed as the key to long-term success. Family members drive the change process in collaboration with the MST therapist.

MST is now provided in 34 states and 15 countries. There are over 500 MST teams serving more than 23,000 youth per year. These numbers continue to grow as MST is proven effective with new populations, including psychiatric disorders, problem sexual behavior of youth, and child abuse and neglect. A four-year clinical trial of youth displaying bipolar affective, thought, anxiety, depressive, and destructive impulsive behavior disorders found MST-psychiatric to be significantly more effective than emergency psychiatric hospitalization in decreasing attempted suicides. These youth spent more days in school and in their communities with improved family relations and diminished antisocial behavior.

MST-PSB (problem sexual behavior) works with youth who engage in criminal sexual behaviors, including sexual assault, rape, and molesting younger children. In three studies, MST-PSB was compared with individual therapy and community clinic treatment. With MST-PSB, only 12.5 percent reoffended, in contrast to 75 percent recidivism of youth treated by a therapist and at a cost one-fifth that of more traditional services. MST-CAN (child abuse and neglect) has been similarly studied in longitudinal, randomly assigned clinical trials. Children ages 6 to 17 showed significant reductions in anxiety, disassociation, PTSD, and behavior problems, with fewer out-of-home placements and changes of placement. Parents demonstrated significant reductions in psychological distress, child abuse and neglect, and use of physical discipline, with significant increases in social support and treatment satisfaction.

Rosalyn M. Bertram
University of Missouri-Kansas City

See Also: Child Abuse/Neglect, Victims of; Family Therapy; Gangs in Schools.

Further Readings

Cohen, Judith A., Anthony P. Mannarino, and Esther Deblinger, eds. Trauma-Focused CBT for Children and Adolescents: Treatment Applications. New York: Guilford Press, 2012.

Henggeler, Scott, et al. Multisystemic Therapy for Anti-Social Behavior in Children and Adolescents, 2nd ed. New York: Guilford Press, 2009.

Multisystemic Therapy Services. http://www.mstservices.com (Accessed March 2014).

Muslim Americans

An individual who identifies as Muslim practices the religion of Islam. The practice of Islam and application of its principles to life is commonly core to the experience of anyone who identifies as Muslim. It is considered a way of life. A Muslim American practices Islam and has either been born in the United States to a Muslim family, has converted to Islam, or has emigrated from a Muslim-majority nation and continues to practice the religion in the United States. It is estimated that 3.5 million Muslims live in the United States as of 2013. Muslim Americans have experienced a significant degree of discrimination in the United States, particularly since the terrorist attacks by the militant Islamic group al-Qaeda on September 11, 2001. Following is a description of core religious constructs that often guide behavior, an overview of common experiences shared by Muslim Americans in the United States, the consequences of discrimination, and suggested human services practices for meeting the needs of Muslim American clients.

The Practice of Islam

Perceptions of the Islamic religion by Americans who do not identify as Muslim are often distorted and incorrect. It is common for non-Muslim Americans to view the religion as Middle Eastern, violent, oppressive, and rigid. This is not surprising considering the leaders of some nations have supported the abuse of their citizens and the justification of violence against other nations in the name of Islam. Additionally, U.S. media has promoted this view through the portrayal of angry-looking Middle Eastern Muslim men and fully shrouded, submissive-looking Muslim women. However, it is documented that these are cultural and political practices of some in these nations with whom we've experienced great conflict and are not, in reality, associated with the religion of Islam. Muslim Americans are in fact from locations all over the world, and the majority practice Islam peacefully.

The American Muslim population can be disaggregated as follows: Approximately 33 percent are of South Asian descent, from Pakistan, India, Bangladesh, and Afghanistan; 30 percent are African American; and 25 percent are of Arab descent. As such, it is important for human services professionals to explore the intersecting variables of culture and religion when working with Muslim American clients. Additionally, the majority of Muslim Americans practice the Sunni tradition of Islam (85 percent), while the remaining adhere to Shi'ite, Sufi, or Nation of Islam traditions. Despite the various traditions, human services professionals can assume that there are some foundational values and beliefs shared by those who identify as Muslim American.

All Muslims believe in one God—Allah. To be Muslim means to find peace through complete submission to Allah. A primary goal for those practicing Islam is to achieve reward in the afterlife through belief in the principles and practices of Islam and through doing good deeds. Those able to maintain their beliefs and engage in good deeds throughout all of the tests and challenges of life will be received in the hereafter with reward. To guide this process, Muslims turn to prophets, including Adam, Abraham, Jesus, and Muhammad, as well as the Qur'an, which is the holy book of Muslims, and the Hadith, which contains specific details of life as recorded from the sayings of Muhammad. Found in the Hadith are the Five Pillars of Islam, which include the following: (1) Shahadah—belief in only one God, (2) Salat—commitment to praying five times per day, (3) Sawm—fasting during the month of Ramadan, (4) Zakat—service to others, and (5) Hajj—pilgrimage to Mecca.

Experience in America

Unfortunately, a lack of understanding of the culture and religion of Muslim Americans results in disproportionate levels of discrimination as compared to other religiously defined groups in the United States. Communities have been noted to block the building of mosques; mosques are vandalized and bombed more so than other places of worship; workplace discrimination against ritual dress and prayer has risen drastically; and rhetoric among some politicians feeds the false fear of Muslim Americans among non-Muslim citizens in the United States. It is challenging to elicit understanding and support of Muslim Americans when those in positions of power and decision making for our nation propagandize negativity about this culture.

Women who choose to fully cover themselves with a hijab out of respect for Allah are frequently judged as being submissive and abused. Couples in arranged marriages are assumed to be miserable despite research indicating that most in this country are quite happy due to the collectivistic nature of most Muslim American families, resulting in greater levels of support and assistance as compared to non-Muslim American families that may feel isolated within their partnerships. Muslim American men also experience discrimination. Those with long beards are frequently assumed to be terrorists and, as such, get singled out for special screening at airports. Virtually every non-Muslim American is aware of Osama bin Laden and his terrorist actions, yet very few can name antiterrorist Muslim Americans who have fought and died in the United States military. The consequences to this discrimination and misunderstanding are great.

Consequences to Discrimination and Human Services Response

The experience of incessantly being treated with contempt has led to heightened levels of depression, anxiety, posttraumatic stress, lowered self-worth, and substance abuse. For those who have immigrated to the United States, additional variables may contribute to socioemotional discord

The Islamic Center of America, the largest mosque in the United States, is located in Warrendale, Michigan. A Muslim American practices Islam and has either been born in the United States to a Muslim family, has converted to Islam, or has emigrated from a Muslim-majority nation and continues to practice the religion in the United States.

including acculturation stress, language barriers, intergenerational conflict, socioeconomic status, and marital and family conflicts. A human services professional must recognize the complexity of the Muslim American identity and explore the unique history and identity of each client. Essentially, the helper must refrain from assumptions.

Key to effective services for any diverse culture, it is imperative that the human services professional develop self-awareness of one's own biases toward Muslim Americans. Additionally, common cultural values and practices of Muslim Americans should be known. These include variables such as the important role that religion plays in their lives, the value placed on family cohesion and loyalty, participation in arranged marriages, paternalism for affairs external to the family, and maternalism for affairs within the home.

Awareness and knowledge of the values and beliefs of Muslim Americans can contribute to the application of appropriate and skillful techniques for addressing concerns. Most important is the integration of Islamic principles into human services practices with Muslim Americans. For example, reminding a client of the peace one can obtain through remembering Allah can be a useful strategy for de-escalation.

Familiarity with the Qur'an and Hadith allows for the inclusion of the written words from these books in the resolution of problems. Asking clients how they think Allah would want them to address their situations can lead to problem-solving approaches that are acceptable to the clients. Presenting problems as tests to bring them closer to Allah as opposed to punishments can be used to reframe negative perspectives. Including family members as much as possible in the helping process honors Muslim Americans' collectivistic perspective. Connecting Muslim Americans to community and national resources such as local mosques allows for additional supports. Finally, it is necessary to move beyond the individual Muslim American client and work to advocate for systemic change in which Muslim Americans are honored, respected, and protected in U.S. society.

Tammi F. Milliken
Old Dominion University

See Also: Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Immigrant Populations, Human Services Needs of; Religion and Clients.

Further Readings

Embassy of the United States: Baghdad–Iraq. "Muslims in America: A Statistical Portrait." http://iraq.usembassy.gov/resources/information/current/american/statistical.html (Accessed December 2013).

Hamdan, A. "A Case Study of a Muslim Client: Incorporating Religious Beliefs and Practices." Journal of Multicultural Counseling and Development, v.35 (2007).

Pew Research Center. "Pew Research: Religion and Public Life Project." http://www.pewforum.org (Accessed December 2013).

N

National Alliance for Hispanic Health

The National Alliance for Hispanic Health (NAHH) is a not-for-profit 501(3) organization that has, as its mission, the improvement of the health and wellness of Latinos in the United States. The organization describes itself as the nation's oldest and largest network of Hispanic health and human services providers.

The organization was founded in 1973 in Los Angeles as the Coalition of Spanish Speaking Mental Health Organizations (COSSMHO). Two years later, following the opening of a national office in Washington, D.C., the group changed its name to the National Coalition of Hispanic Mental Health and Human Services Organizations (COSSMHO). Another name change took place in 1986, with the organization broadening its mission and rebranding itself as the National Coalition of Hispanic Health and Human Services Organizations (COSSMHO). The present name was adopted in 2000.

The NAHH conducts research, operates demonstration programs, provides health-related information, and advocates with governmental decision makers on behalf of health-related issues, especially as they impact the Hispanic American community. The NAHH board of directors, in 2010, adopted the following health care principles: All persons in the United States should have affordable and comprehensive quality health care throughout their life; achieving the best outcomes for all is critical to quality health care; long-term care should be adequately addressed; mental health and physical health are both central to well-being; and health care delivery should be patient centric.

Among the organization's earliest accomplishments were mounting the first National Hispanic Conference on Health and Human Services (1976), forming the National Hispanic Committee to advise the President's Commission on Mental Health (1977), and convening the first National Hispanic Conference on Families (1978). In 1987, the NAHH played a leading role in persuading the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to improve its health data research for Hispanic populations in the United States.

Today, the NAHH operates education programs supporting diagnosis and treatment of rheumatoid arthritis; cancers of the cervix, skin, and ovaries; depression; diabetes; arteriosclerosis; and hypertension. The alliance, through Nuestras Familias, works in seven states (Arizona, California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, New Jersey, and Texas) to increase and retain enrollment in Medicaid and the Children's Health Insurance Programs (CHIP).

Proyecto Informar Capacity Development, is a six-year project funded by the Office of Minority Health and Health Disparities of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). This project provides training and technical assistance in the area of cultural competence to agencies that provide health services in Hispanic communities. Under this contract, the NAHH has conducted cultural proficiency training with the staff of state and local health departments in 23 states.

Under the Proyecto Informar FDA Hispanic Outreach Initiative, established in 2005, the Alliance adapts Food and Drug Administration (FDA) materials for use in Hispanic communities. The objective of the grant was the communication of risk and emergency public health information to Spanish-speaking consumers. In 2013, the FDA and NAHH expanded their collaboration through the establishment of a Drug Safety Communication Initiative. The program provides Hispanic consumers and health care providers with drug safety information.

The alliance also maintains two bilingual help lines. Established in 1994, the National Hispanic Prenatal Helpline/La Linea Nacional Prenatal Hispana (1-800-504-7081) answers questions about prenatal care. In 2003, the alliance started the National Hispanic Family Health Helpline/Su Familia (1-866-783-2645), which provides free health information and referral services in Spanish and English. The help lines are funded by the Centers for Disease Control.

In addition to its educational and information services, the alliance engages in research. In 1986, the Hispanic Health Research Consortium was established to coordinate university research. The consortium produced a supplement to the December 1990 issue of the American Journal on Public Health on the Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey. This nationwide survey of approximately 16,000 persons, 6 months to 74 years of age, provided data on Puerto Ricans, Mexican Americans, and Cuban Americans, groups for which sufficient data had been lacking. In 1999, the NAHH published "The State of Hispanic Girls." The study, which was funded by the Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation, and the HHS, found that cultural protective factors played a critical role in buffering Hispanic girls from risky and damaging behaviors such as delinquency, depression, pregnancy, and substance abuse. More recently, in 2007, NAHH joined with Research!America to administer the first national public opinion survey of Hispanics on health and research issues. The poll found that Hispanics believed that the United States should make a higher commitment to health and science research and that they were willing to pay additional taxes to subsidize additional medical research.

In 2008, with the support of the Merck Company Foundation, the alliance initiated the Alliance/Merck Ciencia Hispanic Scholars Program. The program, which is open to high school students in Brownsville, Texas; Elizabeth, New Jersey; and Los Angeles, California, awards scholarships to students pursuing science, technology, engineering, and math (STEM fields) college degrees. Students from these communities receive four-year scholarships worth $42,500. A second program, open to Hispanic STEM majors throughout the United States, awards one-time, $2,000 scholarships.

The organization has become an advocate in Washington on a number of health-related issues. Its advocacy efforts include support for the passage of the Disadvantaged Minority Health Improvement Act of 1990 (Public Law 101-57); advocating for expansion of the Children's Health Insurance Program, and through the Health and Environment Action Network (established in 2006); being a proponent of clean air and water in Hispanic communities; and highlighting the connections between the environment and good health. In 2010, the alliance endorsed "Reducing Environmental Cancer Risk," a report prepared by President Barack Obama's Cancer Panel.

NAHH is governed by a 10-member board of directors, which was chaired in November 2013 by Augustine C. Baca. The president and chief executive officer was Dr. Jane L. Delgado, who has led the organization since 1985. Prior to joining what was then COSSMHO, Dr. Delgado had been with the HHS (1979–1985) and the Children's Television Workshop (1973–1979). A clinical psychologist, Dr. Delgado is the author of The Latina Guide to Health (Newmarket Press, 2010). The alliance, which is headquartered in Washington, D.C., operates programs in 20 states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico.

Jeffrey Kraus
Wagner College

See Also: Border Communities; Central American Immigrants; Community Health, Racial and Ethnic

Approaches to; Community-Based Participatory Research; Cross-Cultural Knowledge; Cross-Cultural Service Models; Cross-Cultural Skills; Cuban Americans; Cultural and Linguistically Appropriate Services Standards; Cultural Competence, Human Service Providers and; Cultural Competence, Measuring and Assessing; Cultural Competence, Model of; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of; Cultural Competence, Training in; Cultural Literacy; Cultural Services; Culturally Specific Services; Dominican Americans; Hispanic Americans; Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey; Hispanic Immigrants; Language Assistance; Mexican Americans; Puerto Ricans; South American Immigrants.

Further Readings

Delgado, Jane L. The Latina Guide to Health: Consejos and Caring Answers. New York: Newmarket Press, 2010.

Delgado, Jane L. Salud: A Latina's Guide to Total Health. New York: HarperCollins, 2002.

Department of Health and Human Services and Food and Drug Administration. "Proyecto Informar: Food and Drug Administration Hispanic Outreach Initiative (U01)." (Docket No. FDA-2011-N-0012). Federal Register, v.76/124 (June 28, 2011).

National Alliance for Hispanic Health. A Primer for Cultural Proficiency: Towards Quality Health Services for Hispanics. Washington, DC: Estrella Press, 2001.

National Alliance for Hispanic Health. "About Us." http://www.hispanichealth.org/about/default.aspx (Accessed November 2013).

National Alliance for Hispanic Health. "Health Care Principles." http://www.hispanichealth.org/about/principles.aspx (Accessed November 2013).

National Assessment Governing Board

The U.S. population is becoming increasingly diverse, with 57 percent of the population expected to represent a nonwhite majority by 2060. The heterogeneous nature of the U.S. population is reflected in the U.S. education system, which includes increasing numbers of African American, Hispanic, and Asian students. Acculturation and nonnative English speakers are additional considerations, with up to 10 percent of students designated as English language learners (ELLs). Evaluating the academic progress of such a diverse population of students in a way that is fair, reliable, valid, and inclusive of all students is a priority of the U.S. government. To meet this need, Congress established the independent, bipartisan National Assessment Governing Board (NAGB) in 1988. The NAGB is responsible for setting policies related to the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP), which consists of national and state evaluations of the educational achievement of U.S. students.

National Assessment Governing Board

The NAGB consists of 26 members, each of whom can serve up to two four-year terms. Individuals are nominated to fill open positions and are subsequently appointed by the U.S. secretary of education. In an effort to represent relevant stakeholders in NAEP decision making and to minimize political influence, the board is required by law to include individuals with a range of backgrounds. Specifically, the board must include bipartisan representatives of government (e.g., governors and legislators), education-related public policy (e.g., school board members), education (e.g., teachers, principals, testing and measurement experts, and curriculum experts), and the general public (e.g., parents). Members span local, state, and federal levels. Though difficult to achieve due to the limited number of positions, the demographic diversity represented in the U.S. education system should be reflected in the characteristics of board members.

The board is responsible for making federal policy related to the NAEP, commonly referred to as the Nation's Report Card, which is a national continuing assessment of American students' academic achievement. The NAGB works closely with the National Center for Education Statistics within the U.S. Department of Education, which administers the NAEP, and the test contractors, who develop the NAEP. The board determines what will be tested on the NAEP, including which subject areas and what specific content will be evaluated. The NAGB also decides how the NAEP will be implemented, with the goal of designing tests that are reliable and valid. Incorporating experts in this process is critical to ensure that the evaluation is fair for children of diverse cultural backgrounds. Once the results of the NAEP have been gathered and analyzed, the board is responsible for providing objective information on the performance of U.S. students to elected officials, policy makers, educators, and the public. One of the NAGB's related goals is to ensure that the NAEP results reach a diverse U.S. public, and their recent efforts have included interactive reporting via their Web site and information sharing via social media outlets.

National Assessment of Educational Progress

The NAEP has provided an account of academic progress since 1969 and has been permanently instituted since 1996. National assessments, conducted in fourth, eighth, and 12th grades, assess student achievement in math, reading, writing, science, geography, U.S. history, civics, economics, art, and technological literacy (which began in 2014). State-specific assessments, conducted in fourth and eighth grades, evaluate achievement in reading, math, writing, and science. The NAEP is a nationally representative evaluation of U.S. education. As such, for each NAEP assessment, students within participating schools are randomly selected to participate. For example, the national NAEP assessments include about 10,000 students per subject per grade from about 525 schools.

Students with disabilities generally receive the same accommodations that they normally would in a standardized testing situation. Though the NAEP does not allow for all accommodations (e.g., reading passages aloud to a student), students who are allowed that accommodation in the context of their individual education plan (IEP) under the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) can be excused from the NAEP assessment. Native Spanish speakers are allowed to complete the math and science NAEP assessments in Spanish as long as their state typically offers Spanish language exams. ELL students are also typically allowed to use bilingual dictionaries. ELL status is not a valid reason for exclusion from the NAEP assessments. These regulations result in the NAEP mirroring the educational system as students generally interact with it. However, failing to fully evaluate students in special education and ELL students results in test scores that incompletely describe the academic ability of the entire U.S. population.

In 2002, a selection of large urban school districts participated in the state-level assessments on reading, mathematics, science, and writing. Today, 18 urban school districts voluntarily participate in this aspect of the NAEP, called the Trial Urban District Assessment (TUDA). Urban school districts serve a unique subset of the U.S. population characterized by low family income and racial or ethnic minority status. These demographics are represented in the public school experience of urban children and youth, who are more likely to attend schools that have large class sizes, are under-resourced, and are underachieving. Especially given the NAGB and U.S. government's commitment to closing the achievement gap for low-income, ethnic minority youth, the inclusion of TUDA in the NAEP is critical.

In an effort to make the reporting of the NAEP clear and easy to understand, the NAGB established three achievement levels: basic, proficient, and advanced. The basic level designates partial mastery of fundamental prerequisite knowledge and skills. Proficient level designation requires that students demonstrate solid academic competency in challenging subject matter. The advanced level denotes superior performance. These achievement levels, which were originally adopted by the board in 1990, were revised in 1993 based on public comments and representative stakeholder feedback, highlighting the importance of diversity among stakeholders. In addition to informing the public generally about how America's students perform in various academic subject areas, the NAEP also compares achievement data among states and provides data by student demographic group, including gender, socioeconomic status, and race or ethnicity.

Relation Between the NAEP and Other State and National Educational Evaluations

The NAEP is distinct from several related state and national evaluations. The NAEP differs from state-specific standardized tests, which are based on states' curricula and academic standards and reported at the school and individual child levels. In contrast, the NAEP provides reports at the aggregate level (i.e., no student, classroom, or school-level results are provided). Additionally, NAEP assessments are independent of those that are currently being developed for the common core curriculum. Lastly, among other requirements, the No Child Left Behind (NCLB) Act requires states to develop and administer annual standardized tests to all students in certain grades. The NCLB also requires a sample of fourth- and eighth-graders in each state to participate in the NAEP reading and mathematics assessment every other year, with the goal of providing a second, aggregate-level data set for regional and national comparisons.

Corey L. Black
Courtney N. Baker
Tulane University

See Also: Department of Education, U.S.; Educational Status and Service Delivery; Individuals with Disabilities Education Act; No Child Left Behind Act.

Further Readings

Council of the Great City Schools. "Urban School Statistics." http://www.cgcs.org/Page/75 (Accessed November 2013).

Ford, D. Y. and J. L. Moore III. "Understanding and Reversing Underachievement, Low Achievement, and Achievement Gaps Among High-Ability African American Males in Urban School Contexts." Urban Review, v.45/4 (2013).

National Assessment Governing Board. "Who We Are." http://www.nagb.org/who-we-are.html (Accessed November 2013).

National Center for Education Statistics. "National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP)." http://nces.ed.gov/nationsreportcard (Accessed November 2013).

National Center for Children in Poverty

The goal of the National Center for Children in Poverty (NCCP) is the overall well-being of low-income families and children in the United States. The center focuses on public policy designed to ensure overall health and family economic security. The NCCP is a recognized and respected leader in pioneering both state and national improvements.

Founded in 1989 and housed at Columbia University's Mailman School of Public Health, the NCCP has a three-pronged vision. The organization works to promote (1) the economic security of families; (2) resilient, nurturing families; and (3) the healthy development of children. Undergirding the efforts of this nonpartisan, nonprofit organization is the belief that more equitable and effective public policies and practices will create a more positive future for low-income children and families for both current and upcoming generations.

The NCCP develops policies and supports practices based on research findings. Building policy and practice from sound research increases the likelihood of achieving positive outcomes and making a real difference in the lives of individuals and the nation's poor and low income as a whole. Specific initiatives focus on supporting the organization's vision by (1) improving work support and pay; (2) nurturing the cognitive and emotional growth of children, especially young children; and (3) ensuring access to health care, including mental health care, for children and families. The organization's motto, "Putting Research to Work for Children and Families," underlies these goals and guides action.

Despite worldwide perceptions of economic prosperity in the United States, the reality is that many children and families live in poverty. Nearly half of the nation's children are raised in families living on the economic edge. Despite parents who work to try to support the family, struggles ensue on paying basic bills and covering living expenses such as food and health care. This lack of economic security exacts a heavy toll on families and children. The NCCP advances the belief that supporting these families and children ultimately supports the nation. That is, nurturing today's children promises a better future for the country.

The research efforts of the NCCP contribute in several ways, including policy making, service provision, and public awareness. First, sound research is needed to develop good policies. Providing such information to policy makers increases the likelihood of well-formulated decisions and subsequent policies. Second, research foregrounds existing challenges as well as provides insights into how to address them. Translating research into practice is useful to both practitioners providing services and advocates addressing social justice and social change. Third, from across multiple research endeavors and their outcomes, the NCCP can analyze trends and compare policies as well as provide compilations of statistics and facts. Such reports provide the media and other groups with information useful in educating the public about the living conditions of low-income families and children as well as their day-to-day hardships.

The NCCP's Web site houses numerous fact sheets, research reports, and useful tools. This information includes state profiles, which furnish information on policies related to early childhood welfare as well as specific information on poor and low-income children. An example of a useful tool is the family resource simulator, employed by some state agencies for planning and policy making. This simulator depicts the effects of policies on families. The Web site's Young Child Risk Calculator determines the number of young children at risk in terms of general development as well as school readiness by state. The Basic Needs Budget Calculator illustrates the amount of money necessary to cover essential needs. Users can change parameters by adjusting family specifics such as whether the family is a single-parent or two-parent one and the number and ages of children. Research Connections provides a compilation of numerous sources with information on the well-being of children. Publications can be accessed in a variety of ways, such as by topic or date, and fact sheets cover an array of areas. Research foci include a variety of topics ranging from healthy development to immigrant families and from work support to mental health.

At its inception and in its early stages, the NCCP was supported by philanthropic organizations. Today, center funding primarily comes from foundation and federal grants. A link on the Web site allows individuals to contribute to the annual fund.

Joy L. Hart
University of Louisville

See Also: Administration on Children, Youth and Families; Child and Adolescent Needs and Strengths; ChildStats; Early Childhood Development; Infant/Toddler Development; Poverty; Public Health.

Further Readings

Addy, Sophia, William Engelhardt, and Curtis Skinner. Basic Facts About Low-income Children: Children Under 18 Years, 2011. New York: National Center for Children in Poverty, Columbia University, Mailman School of Public Health, 2013.

Cauthen, Nancy K. and Sarah Fass. Measuring Income and Poverty in the United States. New York: National Center for Children in Poverty, Columbia University, Mailman School of Public Health, 2008.

Halle, Tamara, Nicole Forry, Elizabeth Hair, Kate Perper, Laura Wandner, Julia Wessel, and Jessica Vick. Disparities in Early Learning and Development: Lessons From the Early Childhood Longitudinal Study—Birth Cohort (ECLS-B). Washington, DC: Child Trends, 2009.

National Center for Children in Poverty. "About NCCP." http://www.nccp.org/about.html (Accessed October 2013).

National Center for Children in Poverty. "Home." http://www.nccp.org (Accessed October 2013).

Pungello, Elizabeth P., Kirsten Kainz, Margaret Burchinal, Barbara H. Wasik, Joseph J. Sparling, Craig T. Ramey, and Frances A. Campbell. "Early Educational Intervention, Early Cumulative Risk, and the Early Home Environment as Predictors of Young Adult Outcomes within a High-Risk Sample." Child Development, v.81 (2010).

Schlee, Bethanne M., Ann K. Mullis, and Michael Shriner. "Parents Social and Resource Capital: Predictors of Academic Achievement during Early Childhood." Children and Youth Services Review, v.31 (2008).

National Center for Cultural Competence

The National Center for Cultural Competence (NCCC) emphasizes an evidence-based approach to policy and practice in the fields of health and mental health care delivery, administration, education, and advocacy to ensure that health care systems are culturally competent. NCCC's goals are to (1) respond to the growing population diversity in the United States, (2) address health and mental health care disparities and inequities, and (3) design services and supports that take culture and language into consideration as health (including mental health) programs are structured. As defined by experts, cultural competence requires that organizations demonstrate behaviors, attitudes, policies, and structures that enable them to work effectively cross-culturally and that they incorporate these policies and practices in all aspects of policy making, administration, and service delivery.

Working through a group of national experts and consultants, NCCC provides training and technical assistance, creates tools and resources that health and mental health care providers and systems can readily use, supports organizational leaders to promote and sustain cultural and linguistic competency, and collaborates with a network of private and public entities to advance the implementation of these concepts. NCCC provides its services to local, state, federal, and international governmental agencies, family advocacy and support organizations, local hospitals and health centers, health care systems, health plans, mental health systems, universities, quality improvement organizations, national professional associations, and foundations. In addition, NCCC's online training, publications, and products reach tens of thousands of individuals each year.

NCCC, founded in the late 1990s, is part of the Georgetown University Center for Child and Human Development and is housed within the Department of Pediatrics of the Georgetown University Medical Center in Washington, D.C. NCCC's work is funded by a variety of federal government agencies (including the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, the National Institutes of Health, the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, and the Environmental Protection Agency) as well as foundations, pharmaceutical companies, and international organizations.

NCCC's Philosophy

NCCC's approach is based on the importance of understanding the dynamic demographic changes in the population of the United States and the impacts these changes are having on the provision of quality, effective health care services. As a result of immigration patterns and significant increases among racially, ethnically, culturally, and linguistically diverse populations, the composition of the U.S. population has become more diverse and complex. For example, according to recent census data, there has been a marked increase in the number of persons who speak a language other than English at home, and many of them indicate they have trouble speaking English.

Accordingly, NCCC believes that the delivery of high-quality, accessible, effective, and cost-efficient primary health care requires health care practitioners to have a deeper understanding of the sociocultural background of patients, their families, and the environments in which they live. NCCC believes that this understanding is critical to the elimination of the continuing disparities in the incidence of illness and death among African Americans, Latino and Hispanic Americans, Native Americans, Asian Americans, Alaska Natives, and Pacific Islanders as compared with the U.S. population as a whole.

Further, culturally competent primary health services can lead to more favorable health outcomes and increase the satisfaction of individuals receiving health care services. The ability of practitioners, as well as health care systems, to address these issues can lead not only to better care but also to a competitive advantage in the crowded health care marketplace and can also decrease the likelihood of malpractice and liability claims.

NCCC's Work

NCCC works in a broad and diverse set of arenas to meet its goals and mission and maintains a pool of expert consultants with relevant expertise to provide organizations with training, technical assistance, or consultation. Consultants have experience at the local, state, regional, national, and international levels. NCCC's work falls into five major categories.

Measuring and assessing cultural and linguistic competency. NCCC has developed self-assessment tools, instruments, and processes for organizations and individuals to identify their strengths and challenges in implementing cultural and linguistic competency. As requested, NCCC works with organizations that request help in self-assessment and has worked with local health centers, foundations, and national organizations to tailor tools and processes for their needs.

Influencing policy. Strong policies help guide organizations and ensure that there is consistency. The need for culturally and linguistically competent health and mental health systems has been strongly reaffirmed at the highest levels of the U.S. government, the National Academy of Science, independent commissions, and professional associations and accreditation organizations. In addition, NCCC has documented that there is a need to develop stronger policies around cultural competence in health care systems.

As a result, NCCC supports practitioners in their implementation of cultural and linguistic policies and practice and helps measure the success of practitioners and the organization in serving diverse families. A number of NCCC efforts address the role of policy in implementing and sustaining systemic cultural and linguistic competency, including a series of policy briefs, organizational assessment tools, and a process for organizations to conduct a policy audit related to cultural and linguistic competency. NCCC also collects examples of best practices that advance and sustain cultural and linguistic competency.

Contributing to the evidence base. NCCC faculty produces articles and monographs that identify and advance the evidence base about the importance of cultural and linguistic competency in the provision of health care services as well as the factors leading to successful implementation of practices. In addition, NCCC shares promising practices for implementing cultural and linguistic competency within the health and mental health fields.

Training and staff development. NCCC provides customized on-site training and professional development and assists other U.S. and international organizations to develop their own customized training materials and processes. NCCC has also developed a series of content-based modules on cultural and linguistic competency that can be placed into existing courses and curricula and has created online education, including continuing medical education for credit.

Influencing academia. NCCC publications and products are utilized in university courses targeted at health, mental health, public health, and social services professionals. In addition, NCCC faculty consult with a variety of university-based programs and departments on how to address cultural and linguistic competency in teaching, research, faculty development, community outreach and engagement, and recruitment and retention.

Stephenie Foster
American University

See Also: Cultural and Linguistically Appropriate Services Standards; Health Care, Disparities in; Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of; Cultural Competence, Professional Standards of.

Further Readings

Moule, Jean. Cultural Competence: A Primer for Educators. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Cengage Learning, 2011.

National Center for Cultural Competence. http://nccc.georgetown.edu/index.html (Accessed January 2014).

National Center for Cultural Competence. "2011 Report of Significant Accomplishments." http://nccc.georgetown.edu/documents/2010_2011_Accomplishments.pdf (Accessed January 2014).

Pérez, Miguel A., and Raffy R. Luquis, eds. Cultural Competence in Health Education and Health Promotion. Hoboken, NJ: Jossey-Bass, 2008.

National Center for Hate Crime Prevention

Within the United States, special legal considerations have been enacted targeting the prosecution and sentencing of crimes that meet the qualification to be legally labeled as a hate crime. Hate crime or bias-motivated crime laws provide further punishment and sanctions for crimes motivated by prejudice targeting social groups. However, these laws do not solve the societal problem of why hate crime occurs and how it can be addressed. Hate crimes continue to be a threat to society, as illustrated by crime statistics showing more than 7,000 cases each year in the United States. While the United States at its core embraces its diversity, extreme portions of our society continue to misunderstand, blame, or support views that contribute to hate crimes. Over the years, organizations have developed with the mission to stop or reduce hate crime by litigation, education, and public awareness.

The National Center for Hate Crime Prevention (NCHCP) is an organization dedicated to educating and training people about the causes, costs, and solutions to hate crime. The NCHCP works in cooperation with the Education Development Center, Inc. (EDC), an education and research not-for-profit organization based in Waltham, Massachusetts. As part of the EDC's Health and Human Development Division, the NCHCP represents a part of a vast resource that can help law enforcement, hospitals, workplaces, schools, and all levels of government deal with issues related to all types of violence.

As of 2010, the EDC maintains approximately 300 projects in more than 30 countries worldwide. Through the EDC Web site, the NCHCP offers several different curriculums that deal with hate crime on a law enforcement level and an educational level. These curriculums offer interactive and comprehensive approaches that lead the participants to become part of the interaction and learn by experiencing what hate crime is through examples and presentations.

The NCHCP's law enforcement curriculum, titled "Responding to Hate Crime," can be utilized on many different levels. Designed as a multidisciplinary curriculum, it was developed to provide law enforcement officials with current strategies and data on identifying hate crimes and developing strategies to investigate and reduce its incidence. It also provides strategies and data for victim assistance professionals. The curriculum is designed to increase the efficiency and resources of both law enforcement and victim assistance by helping develop methods that change the norms of the community that allow hate crime to persist, decreasing public indifference and increasing awareness. Finally, this curriculum allows law enforcement and victim assistance personnel to interact with each other, exposing both to different perspectives on hate crime and how each side deals with the ramifications of bias-based crimes.

The Overpass Light Brigade holding a message at the Sikh temple shooting memorial in Oak Creek, Wisconsin, August 7, 2012. One of the most serious challenges that hate crime prevention experts have is in educating those prone to committing hate crime. In America, young people are especially susceptible to becoming victims of hate crimes..

Broken into six individual lessons, the instructor, preferably a law enforcement official, instructs and aids participants through a series of exercises and challenges. "Responding to Hate Crime" provides a comprehensive approach to hate crime, highlighting many different aspects of it but allowing instructors a modular approach that allows class structure to be specifically designed to hone in on areas of concern to the audience being instructed as well as for limited time constraints.

Lessons are broken down with a summary page highlighting approximately how much time a lesson plan will take, what the objectives are, if there are any videos in the lesson, and instructor's notes that give quick fact access to the instructor. These lesson plans are also interactive, providing multiple facets of explanation that are built for professionals and volunteers, young and old alike. The lesson plans are versatile enough that they allow for adaptation to different types of bias crime, assuring a learning environment that reduces stereotyping.

One of the most serious challenges that hate crime prevention experts have is in educating those prone to committing hate crime. In America, young people are especially susceptible to becoming victims of hate crimes. Educators have been challenged to bring awareness and understanding to the youth of America, while at the same time dealing with the regular educational needs already required. The NCHCP, with assistance from other organizations, helped develop a program designed to assist in educating youth in hate crime awareness and deterrence.

Titled "Healing the Hate: Innovations in Hate Crime Prevention," it was developed to be used at the middle school educational level for students and teachers who are trying to bring awareness to hate crimes and how to stop them. The lessons begin by giving statistics and basic definitions of what hate or bias crimes are and what their prevalence is in school society. It breaks this down by race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, gender, and religion. It educates teachers on various types of graffiti, organized hate groups, and gestures that are linked to hate crime.

One particular aspect of hate crime that this curriculum goes into detail on is how it affects the school community at large and just how damaging hate crime can be. It instructs teachers on the concepts of secondary victimization, where members of the same group as the person who was the victim of a hate crime also suffer some of the effects associated with it, including insecurity, breakdown of trust to authority, and group identity loss.

The curriculum is also designed to provide understanding to the motivations of the perpetrators of hate crime. Breaking down offenders into typologies, the authors define them by thrill seeker, retaliatory, reactive, and mission-orientated offenders. This breakdown educates teachers and provides them with cues to watch for among students who could assist them in finding the real cause of the violence and how to prevent it.

Finally in prevention, the curriculum addresses different methods of prevention, including policy changes, developing educational programs for students, increasing the knowledge of administrators and teachers, and changing school practices. The NCHCP is a valuable resource for educating both human services professionals and providing learning modules that can be utilized to educate the public.

Joel Nadler
Ray Wetherell
Southern Illinois University Edwardsville

See Also: Department of Education, U.S.; Discrimination and Institutional Racism; Equal Opportunity and Civil Rights.

Further Readings

Gabbidon, Shaun L. and Helen T. Greene. Race and Crime. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2012.

Gerstenfeld, Phyllis B. Hate Crimes: Causes, Controls, and Controversies. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage, 2013.

Levin, Jack A. and Jim Nolan. The Violence of Hate: Confronting Racism, Anti-Semitism, and Other Forms of Bigotry. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Education, 2010.

Minow, M. Breaking the Cycles of Hatred: Memory, Law, and Repair. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2009.

National Center for Missing and Exploited Children

The establishment of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) is the story of how parents of lost children were able to move government authorities into action based on common concerns for children's welfare. The social problem of missing children became the most recognized problem of children's welfare through horror stories of lost children and the mobilization of support to monitor and resolve the problem.

Concerns for lost and exploited children grew in response to industrialization and child labor. In Great Britain, they were the basis for Charles Dickens's writings. In the United States, they became the child saver movement, the anticruelty movement, and the new social work profession from the famed Mary Ellen case that appears in social work textbooks. There is a natural parenting response to save a lost child. Hundreds of community volunteers will help search for a missing child. It is not as easy to help through policies and laws, especially if the lost child is an adolescent. Police have responsibility for runaways, while social workers service neglectful parents. But in practice, the police officers find runaways blame their parents for being thrown-away children. Caseworkers find the same adolescents are welcome at home as long as they follow the rules and refer the runaways back to the police. Officials often dodge the problem and expose the difficulty of defining what a missing child is in practice.

The late 20th century produced conditions supporting heightened concerns for children's welfare. Mothers moved into the labor force, leaving child care to others, including teachers in schools and day-care centers. The discovery of the battered child syndrome in 1962 was followed by new fears of child abuse, child sexual abuse, satanic ritual abuse, and missing children. Sociologists, such as Joel Best, studied each of these claims of threats to children as social problem construction. In this theory, a claims maker or advocate stakes a claim in reporting a troubling social condition. Through a rhetoric of social problems, the condition is linked to a horror or atrocity story that is highly emotional and mobilizes public support. The roles of the story's victims are central. The victims must be innocent, their suffering great (best for the claims if they are lifelong and debilitating), and their numbers huge. The missing child problem is presented as large, threatening, and growing, with an annual 2 million victims. These social problem claims fit the theory with numerous innocent victims. Suffering parents became leaders and spokespersons for social movements. They mobilized and organized others' fears for children into many local social movement organizations, and as the organizations' spokespeople, they influenced public policy and laws, all as the theory predicts.

By 1981, advocates pressed the federal government to create a national system to register and report missing children. The atrocity stories of murdered missing children were developed from stranger abductions. Although 50,000 such abductions were repeatedly cited in congressional testimony leading to the NCMEC, the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) reports only 105 cases of stranger murder annually. But the members of those families have high social visibility, first leading searches for their missing children, then advocating for child victim memorial laws, advocating legislation carrying the child's name such as Billy's Law and AMBER alerts. A USA Today article cited three Jacob's laws, three or more Laura's, plus Kendra's, Leandra's, Lauren's, and so on. Over the years, missing children appeared on milk cartons, were printed on government forms, were named on dozens of pieces of legislation and in news media headlines, and became America's most-recognized child social problem. Advocates urged parents to have their children tattooed or implanted with computer chips for recovery when gone missing. The emergency warning system was marshaled into giving emergency alerts for reports of a kidnapped child.

But studies have consistently demonstrated that the problem is far less significant than claimed. Most missing children are runaways or lost for a short time. Almost all abductions are by a parent or other family member in a child custody dispute. A 1988 government study provided estimated types of missing children: runaways (450,200), thrown-aways (127,100), parent abductions (163,200), stranger abductions (4,000), and abducted child murders (105). Other categories (from small lost children to older adolescents not contacting parents) were 139,100, for a total of 883,705. This disconfirmation of the claims was unexpected, and the discriminated count has not been repeated to date.

First Lady Laura Bush with Rae Leigh Bradbury in 2007 at the announcement of the future opening of the Texas Regional Office of the NCMEC. Rae Leigh was the first child to be recovered as a result of an AMBER alert.

Central for these claims makers was the atrocity story. When a legislator questioned the need for a mandated, formal report to the national system when a child had been missing for only two hours, the advocate responded with a hypothetical account of the legislator's daughter going missing and returning bloody and raped. The two-hour reporting law was enacted. The 1984 result was the NCMEC, a hybrid system: an umbrella organization for thousands of local groups, links with policing agencies, the U.S. Department of Justice, and the new reporting and registry system. Since 1984, the system has grown and adapted to its mandate to reach as many missing children as possible.

Eventually, the age range for missing children was raised from 17 to 21 years old, and a new category was created to include adult children from 21 to 24 as missing. Advocates argue for the greatest possible inclusion of cases, with similar horror stories about adolescents forced into prostitution, crime, and drugs.

Pressures to skirt rules of privacy have come from claims makers in the name of missing children. Some laws serve to increase the numbers of cases. Police departments and social agencies responsible for children are mandated to report within two hours any suspicion that a child has gone missing. This causes such results as one adolescent being reported 10 times over a two-week period by both police and social services workers from the youth's group home. The secret files of the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) are potential sources to locate parent abductors through tax returns with the Social Security numbers of missing children as dependents. In recent years, resistance to these claims has been growing. Despite the inclusion of older children and cases presumed to be missing after two hours, the numbers have been falling. A 1999 Department of Justice study found that almost all runaway children were soon reunited with their parents. Child memorial laws have run into resistance due to their cost and poorly articulated consequences. The future of the missing children problem is uncertain, although the efforts to define the problem and pass laws have led to public awareness and strengthening of child protection.

Keith R. Johnson
Oakton Community College

See Also: Abduction; Abuse and Neglect; AMBER Alert; Child Welfare Services; Homelessness; Human Trafficking; Protective Services for Children; Runaway Youth/Human Trafficking.

Further Readings

Best, Joel. "Rhetoric in Claims-Making: Constructing the Missing Children Problem." Social Problems, v.34 (1987).

Best, Joel. Social Problems. New York: W. W. Norton, 2013.

Best, Joel. Threatened Children: Rhetoric and Concern About Child-Victims. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.

Forst, Martin L., and Martha-Elin Blomquist. Missing Children: Rhetoric and Reality. New York: Lexington Press, 1991.
Hampson, Rick. "'Apostrophe Laws' Named for Kid Victims on the Wane." USA Today (June 12, 2013).
Watkins, Sallie A. "The Mary Ellen Myth: Correcting Child Welfare History." Social Work, v.35 (1990).

National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities

The National Center on Minority Health and Health Disparities (NCMHD) is a division of the National Institutes of Health (NIH), which in turn is part of the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS). The focus of NCMHD has always been on mitigating the burdens associated with major illnesses and death among racial and ethnic minorities and among rural and poor populations in the United States. It has long been understood that certain diseases and conditions hit minority, poor, and rural populations harder than all other populations, but understanding the way that minority health is impacted by those disparities has only been the subject of intensive research since 1990.

Since that time, a good deal of progress has been made in identifying disparities, but much remains to be done before disparities are eliminated entirely. The goals of NCMHD have been carried out through research, training, and information dissemination. This is done in large part through loan repayment awards that provide for government repayment of educational loans for each year a recipient spends in disparities research and in the Centers of Excellence, which carry out projects according to the needs of particular communities. The center has traditionally served as the liaison on issues related to minority health and health disparities among offices within the NIH and with other federal agencies.

The NCMHD was transformed into the National Institute on Minority Health and Health Disparities (NIMHD) by the Obama Administration's Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (P.L. 111-148), which was signed into law on March 23, 2010. NIMHD operates in all 50 states and in the American territories. Student interns extend that reach by serving in foreign countries. The institute also sponsors training programs and conferences that bring together experts from all over the world as a means of improving understanding of minority health and health disparities and identifying ongoing research and projects among the states and territories.

Understanding the impact that poverty, race, and ethnicity can have on health issues has led NIMHD to closely examine the Appalachian Mountain area of the United States, where poverty is widespread. Other research areas focus on the fact that minority and poor populations are disparately affected by human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS), cancer, diabetes, infant mortality, and cardiovascular disease.

Another area of concern deals with the fact that there are major differences in health conditions experienced by white Americans and those experienced by African Americans, Hispanics, Native Americans, Alaska Natives, and Pacific Islanders. At the same time disparities continue to exist, minority populations are rapidly increasing in the United States.

Background

The NIMHD is headed by a director who plans and coordinates all activities and research. Dr. John Ruffin, the first director of the center, continued to serve as director when the center was transformed into an institute. He began his career in the field of minority health and health disparities in 1990, when he accepted a position as the associate director of the minority health program at the NIH.

The work of the center proved to be so significant that, within two years, the Office of Research on Minority Health (ORMH) had been allotted a budget of $45 million and began working on the Minority Health Initiative. In 1993, the Health Revitalization Act (P.L. 103-43) created the ORMH within the office of the director of the NIH, and Ruffin was named to head the new department. He had an initial budget of $211 million and a staff of 35.

In 1994, the ORMH sponsored the National Conference on Minority Health Research and Research Training in Chicago. Three years later,

Capt. Cynthia Macri, Chief of Naval Operations Special Advisor for Minority Affairs, speaks with college-bound high school students about preparing for careers in science and medicine, particularly in health-related career paths. Much remains to be done before disparities in health care are eliminated entirely. The goals of NCMHD have been carried out through research, training, and information dissemination.

the Advisory Committee on Research on Minority Health was created to provide advice to the directors of both NCMHD and NIH on issues related to minority health and health disparities.

In 1999, Senator Ted Kennedy (D–MA) and Representative Jesse L. Jackson Jr. (D–IL) introduced legislation designed to turn the ORMH into the NCMHD, arguing that the office needed to have more authority to carry out its mandates than was possible at the time. By the following year, the effort had gained the support of Senator Bill Frist (R–TN), and bipartisan support proved to be crucial to passage of the bill.

That same year, President Bill Clinton signed the bill into law, creating the NCMHD. The ultimate goal of the act was to eliminate major health disparities over the course of the following decade, focusing chiefly on disparities such as higher infant mortality rates among minorities and incidences of diabetes that were twice as common among Hispanics as among whites.

Activity in the 2000s

In 2000, the Centers of Excellence were created by the Minority Health and Health Disparities Research Act (P.L. 106-525), and the program, which was then known as the Centers of Excellence in Partnerships for Community Outreach, Research on Health Disparities and Training (Project EXPORT), began operations. In 2007, the name was officially changed to the NCMHD Centers of Excellence. Within the United States, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, the centers provide ways of dealing with disparities in underserved populations. Projects involving research and training are often carried out in cooperation with academic and private institutions, focusing on issues such as breast, prostate, and pancreatic cancers; human papillomavirus (HPV); HIV/AIDS; and cardiovascular disease. Through these efforts, the number of minority groups participating in clinical trials has increased. By 2002, NCMHD had established 88 Centers of Excellence.

In 2000, the National Advisory Council of NCMHD met for the first time. That same year, NCMHD took on responsibility for the Research Infrastructure in Minority Institutions Program. The first NIH Strategic Research Plan and Budget to Reduce and Ultimately Eliminate Health Disparities was announced in 2003. Two years later, NCMHD was placed in charge of the Minority International Research Training Program, which then became the Minority Health and Health Disparities International Research Training Program. In 2005, the center established the NCMHD Community-Based Participatory Research Program.

On December 16 through 18, 2008, the NCMHD sponsored the National Summit on the Science of Eliminating Health Disparities. More than 3,000 attendees came to hear more than 300 experts speak about the efforts of NIH in the disparities field, learn about the Increase Awareness and Understanding initiative, discuss successful research models, and identify gaps in current disparities research. The summit also provided a means of establishing networks among the experts in the field. Those experts included domestic and international researchers, clinicians, policy makers, community leaders, and academics in fields that encompassed psychology, nursing, psychiatry, sociology, anthropology, medicine, and government.

Current Status

For his dedication to the field of minority health and health disparities, Dr. John Ruffin was awarded the Martin Luther King Legacy Award for National Service in 2007. In 2008, NIMHD sponsored NIH Science of Eliminating Health Disparities in order to examine state actions in the health disparities field. The following year, the institute initiated the Intramural Research Program and Career Transition Program as a means of retaining those individuals who had been trained through the loan recipient program within NIMHD. The institute also formed partnerships with the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute's Jackson Heart Study; the National Institute of Environmental Health's Sister Study; the National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases' Osteoarthritis Initiative; the National Institute of Dental and Craniofacial Research's Oral Health Disparities Research Center; the National Institute of General Medicine's Bridges to the Future Program; the Research Centers on Minority Aging Research; and the National Institute of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases' ASSK Study.

On September 27, 2010, the NCMHD announced that it had officially become the NIMHD. The change clarified NIMHD's role in the field of minority health and gave the institute additional authority to carry out its assigned functions. One of the major responsibilities of officials at NIMHD is recruiting new talent and retaining talented individuals who have been trained through the NIMHD Loan Repayment Program, which provides up to $35,000 a year to pay off education loans for qualified recipients. The loans are earmarked for health professionals with medical degrees or doctorates who conduct research in the field of health disparities or who are engaged in clinical research in nonfederal academic settings. Concentrated efforts are being directed toward encouraging these talented individuals to remain in the field of health disparities research. Through the loan repayment program, some 1,700 individuals have been trained to conduct disparities research in medicine, epidemiology, psychology, biochemistry, and health policy. Seventy percent of loan recipients come from racial and ethnic minorities or from other populations that experience significant health disparities.

Elizabeth Rholetter Purdy
Independent Scholar

See Also: Health Care, Disparities in; National Healthcare Disparities Reports; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health.

Further Readings

Benjamin, Regina. "Reflections on Addressing Health Disparities and the National Agenda." American Journal of Public Health, v.100/S1 (April 2010 Supplement).

Brainard, Jeffrey. "Federal Support Grows for Research on the Role of Race in Public Health Problems." Chronicle of Higher Education, v.47/13 (November 24, 2000).

National Institute on Minority Health and Health Disparities. http://www.nimhd.nih.gov/default.html (Accessed November 2013).

"NIH Summit: The Science of Eliminating Health Disparities." Journal of Child and Adolescent Psychiatric Nursing, v.22/2 (May 2009).

Teays, Wanda, and Laura Martha Purdy, eds. Bioethics, Justice, and Health Care. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth/Thomson Learning, 2001.

U.S. Surgeon General. "Elimination of Health Disparities." http://www.surgeongeneral.gov/initiatives/prevention/strategy/elimination-of-health-disparities.html (Accessed November 2013).

Wagner, Cynthia G. "Demography." Futurist, v.35/3 (May/June 2001).

National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System

The foundation for the National Child Abuse and Neglect Data System (NCANDS) was established in 1974 in the federal reporting system responding to Child Abuse and Neglect (CAN). Along with funds supporting the investigation of CAN, Congress required a state central registry for all cases accepted for intake. NCANDS then began to compile U.S. state statistics. These statistics are public and can be easily accessed on the Web site of the U.S. Children's Bureau. Statistical files are available for research at the National Data Archive on Child Abuse and Neglect (NDACAN). The annual report Child Maltreatment is a summary of these statistics. Over the years, the number and scope of NCANDS' statistics has grown, and they are used as indicators of child welfare. However, the validity of the data and their use as outcome measures has not been demonstrated.

When national statistics are compiled, regional- and state-level diversity must be considered and taken into account. The collection of national CAN statistics is much more difficult than it appears in the tables of these reports. When Karen Michaelis studied state CAN laws, she found that no two states had the same definition of child abuse. In fact, there were no categories that could be used to group similar definitions. This problem of definition continues. Some states register a single family; in others, each child is considered a separate case. If a child or family is reported multiple times, their case may be registered multiple times. The staff at NCANDS manipulates states' data to identify unique cases. These are children who have been reported during a year, and CAN has either been substantiated or services given. In 2011, 681,000 unique victims nationally were estimated.

The problem of defining CAN is even greater with other NCANDS data. The 42.7 percent of CAN cases classified as psychological maltreatment in Delaware lacks meaning without inquiring into the state's procedures, court systems, and how cases are reported and investigated. It is worrisome to find that psychological maltreatment in North Dakota affects 37 percent of CAN cases, while in neighboring South Dakota, only 1 percent suffer psychological abuse. In Illinois, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, only one in 1,000 cases is so classified. We can't add up the cases from these highly diverse reporting and investigative systems for an average level of psychological maltreatment. But NCANDS does just that for a meaningless "national average" of 9 percent.

In Pennsylvania, 65 percent of child CAN victims suffer from sexual abuse, while in New York, fewer than 3 percent are so classified. Some states, including Kentucky, Massachusetts, and Nebraska, report that more than 97 percent of their cases include allegations of child neglect. Yet other sates report very low percentages; Vermont and Pennsylvania have 5 percent or less. Such enormous statistical disparities among states indicate operating differences at all levels of reporting, investigating, and servicing families. Data are only as useful as the processes developing them, and those processes remain obscure. Nonetheless, NCANDS data are analyzed to assess child well-being and how well states' child welfare and protection systems are working. These data are published periodically as Child Welfare Outcomes reports. The validity of this work and its application is doubtful.

A second form of extreme variation lies within the casework itself. When Jane Waldfogel gained access to 200 CAN case files, she found that there was no way to categorize them into simple categories. Top-down categories designed by administrators and researchers miss most information in these cases.

A complementary source of data on CAN comes from surveys of caseworkers and others in the field who report cases known to them. These National Incidence Studies (NIS) of Child Abuse and Neglect provide estimates of actual child maltreatment rates in the United States and helpfully distinguish alleged actual child harm from potential harm (endangerment), which NCANDS doesn't. Neither source inquires into the root cause of CAN reports, such as poverty and inequality. Both show similar racial disparities, with African American children the most overrepresented. But social class, education, and poverty are not included in these data, and they cannot support research into the causes of CAN.

Hidden within the statistics are administrative decisions that could reveal racial, cultural, and social class disparities. New laws create new categories of CAN that are added to the state statistics. For example, laws made failure to provide a car seat for a child a CAN case. So classifications vary from state to state and from year to year within states. Variations come from publicity when a child is killed or when laws and policies are changed, and small differences in local interpretation can loom large in the resulting numbers.

These hidden differences in policies and procedures create great interstate disparities. The administrative meaning of physical abuse may be quite different from its apparent meaning, hidden even to researchers analyzing NCANDS data. Thus, in one state, physical abuse may only mean child injury; in another, it may include risk of harm or concern that the child might be hurt. This caution applies to any administrative CAN measure.

The social meaning of CAN statistics is a product of work taking place at many levels, from the frontline worker's investigations to the state legislature passing laws. When money is allocated to help combat CAN, frontline workers will strive to locate CAN in a needy family so services and financial help can be provided. CAN is many times more likely to be found in poor families than middle-class families, probably as a result of responses to family needs other than actual CAN. Definitions will be stretched and loopholes created to help families and careers.

The validity problems of CAN statistics are not unusual for administrative data. Numbers are created to make sure that the work is being done and money is being properly spent. When accounting for expenditures, there is no particular interest in adhering to logical classifications for doing research. The responsibility is NCANDS's to demand consistent definitions from the states in return for federal grants. To its credit, NCANDS is steadily improving its coverage and the detail of its data, and we can anticipate further improvement. With more detailed and consistent data, research into the causes of maltreatment and differences among our diverse population could be achieved. So far, NCANDS has fallen short of achieving coverage of families' diversity; data it does collect is inconsistent and must be treated with caution.

Keith R. Johnson
Oakton Community College

See Also: Abuse and Neglect; Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act; ChildStats; Child Welfare Services; National Center for Missing and Exploited Children; Protective Services for Children.

Further Reading

Drake, Brett, and Melissa Jonson-Reid. "NIS Interpretations: Race and the National Incidence Studies of Child Abuse and Neglect." Children and Youth Services Review, v.33 (2011).

Michaelis, Karen L. Reporting Child Abuse: A Guide to Mandatory Requirements for School Personnel. Newbury Park, CA: Sage, 1993.

U.S. Children's Bureau. Child Maltreatment 2011. U.S. Department of Human Services. http://www.acf.hhs.gov/sites/default/files/cb/cm11.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

U.S. Children's Bureau. Child Welfare Outcomes 2007–2010: Report to Congress. U.S. Department of Human Services. http://archive.acf.hhs.gov/programs/cb/pubs/cwo07-10/cwo07-10.pdf (Accessed June 2013).

Waldfogel, Jane. The Future of Child Protection: How to Break the Cycle of Abuse and Neglect. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.

National Congress of American Indians

Native American history is wrought with atrocity and abuse from the earliest days of Columbian exploration in America, from the forward attempts of physical and cultural genocide to the indirect microbial plagues brought to the shores of the continent. For five centuries, the American Indian population has faced a life of despair and near extinction. Beyond the perverse loss of life associated with the European contact, the loss of land, human rights violations, and control of natural resources robbed the American Indians of their way of life through forced assimilation practices, denial of religious freedoms, and English-only boarding schools for native children, to name a few. In the words of Jefferson Keel, the current president of the National Congress of American Indians: "We were a people before 'We the People.'" Native Americans were a self-sufficient, thriving diversity of cultures, societies, and independent governments. There are more than 560 tribes today, and to understand the current social conditions, we must understand the historical effects of Indian removal, displacement, and the assertion of reservationist logic on the Native American population that ultimately left them institutionally isolated and dependent upon governmental support and assistance.

The National Congress of American Indians (NCAI) is a nonprofit organization representing the American Indian and Alaska Native populations. The organization, founded in 1944, is both the oldest and the largest pan-ethnic or pan-Indian advocacy group joining this extremely heterogeneous population, with the goal of representing the interests of tribal governments and tribal communities and securing the future for Native American people and the country. The purpose of the NCAI is to serve as a forum for unified policy development among tribal governments in order to: (1) protect and advance tribal governance and treaty rights; (2) promote the economic development and health and welfare in Indian and Alaska Native communities; and (3) educate the public toward a better understanding of Indian and Alaska Native tribes.

NCAI founding principles include the following: (1) to secure and preserve American Indian and Alaska Native sovereign rights under treaties and agreements with the United States as well as under federal statutes, case law, and administration decisions and rulings; (2) to protect American Indian and Alaska Native traditional, cultural, and religious rights; (3) to seek appropriate, equitable, and beneficial services and programs for American Indian and Alaska Native governments and people; (4) to promote the common welfare and enhance the quality of life of American Indian and Alaska Native people; and (5) to educate the general public regarding American Indian and Alaska Native governments, people, and rights.

The NCAI is member based, and the governments of American Indian and Alaska Native tribes petition and delegate representatives that deliberate in committee their tribal goals. The attempt of the NCAI is to unify their diverse interests and determine an ultimate direction that is beneficial to the membership. Due to the fact that NCAI represents an extremely diverse group of nations, the NCAI Standing Rules of Order, Section XII, states, "Resolutions must be of a general nature to advocate the best interests of all American Indians and Alaska

American Indian children from southeastern Idaho dressed in European clothing, circa 1897. American Indians lost their way of life through forced assimilation practices, denial of religious freedoms, and English-only boarding schools for native children.

Natives. Resolutions that take one side between two conflicting tribes are not in order." Simply, the goal is "to speak with one voice to protect tribal sovereignty."

The State of Indian Nations

In the 11th annual State of Indian Nations address in 2013, the president of the NCAI, Jefferson Keel, sustained that there continues the need to protect and strengthen tribal sovereignty, emphasizing that "Indian nations are best governed by Indian people." The relationship between tribal nations and government should be a partnership based on mutual respect, mutual obligation, and mutual trust. He urges Congress to honor their constitutional responsibility, quoting the words of President Barack Obama in the 2013 State of the Union Address: "The federal government must keep the promises they have already made"; these trust responsibilities are the support of education, housing and highway infrastructure, law enforcement, and energy development. Native Americans wish to be proactive stewards of their own future.

Related Native American Issues and History

The Lakota have a word, wasi'chu/wasichu, meaning "takes the fat or greedy person." It does not refer to the white man or white race in particular but represents the motivation of individuals, corporations, and government to take and profit from Indian Country. The recent and highly controversial Cobell Settlement, formally known as Cobell v. Salazar, was finally settled after 16 years of court battle for $3.4 billion. It was one of the largest class action suits filed against the United States serving to both reclaim Native American land and reacquire mismanaged assets that were in trust with the U.S. government. The federal government is supposed to make decisions and dealings that are in the best interest of Indian Country; however, this has rarely if ever been the case, driving many tribes to revisit treaties and decisions for bias and impropriety. Many individuals and groups feel the decision represents only slight reparations for the historic wrongdoing and cumulative economic loss in this situation.

Continuing today, the profit motive puts Native American land in the crosshairs for development and natural resource extraction. For example, in South Dakota, the Oglala Sioux are attempting to defend their land against the mining of uranium in the southern Black Hills that borders their Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. The main concern is the potential pollution of their water supply; at the end of 2013, they had been unsuccessful and were continuing to protest. As well, on many Native American reservations, the presence and prospect of oil and gas deposits have urged companies to begin securing leases and drilling rights. Similarly, in North Dakota, it has been claimed that the Bureau of Indian Affairs facilitated the lease of tribal land that cost three affiliated tribes—the Mandan, Hidatsa, and Arikara—an estimated $1 billion; lawsuits are currently pending in this case.

Institutionalized racism in sports has a long history that has only been seriously addressed in the past decade. The American Civil Liberties Union reiterated the voice of many civil rights groups, including the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), proclaiming that the use of Indian mascots is in no way honoring the Native American population and continues to produce and reproduce negative images, racism, and bigotry. The Washington Redskins, a team of the National Football League, was the topic of the recent controversy, this bearing significant irony as it is the team "representing" this nation's capital. The term redskin has been redefined and deemed in reference materials as an ethnophaulism, a racial slur and derogatory toward Native Americans. Many teams have transitioned out their names and mascots with less-offensive alternatives, but the use of these mascots do continue for many professional and college sports teams. The controversy and petition continues even after civil rights organizations, governmental commissions, and the social scientific communities deem their use as insensitive, inflammatory, and offensive.

The first Thanksgiving was proclaimed by George Washington on November 26, 1789; however, it was only for that year. It was 74 years later in 1863 that Abraham Lincoln initiated the formal annual holiday. The holiday's origin was to acknowledge the nation's blessings; however, over the course of time, it became conflated with Native American imagery, stereotypes, and a hallmark example of institutionalized racism. There has been progress toward racial decompression, as 2013 marked the fifth year of Native American inclusion in the 87-year history of the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade. It was the fifth year for the Oneida Indian Nation, and they were for the first time joined by the Native Pride Dance troupe and the Cherokee Youth Choir.

John F. Kennedy wrote, "It seems a basic requirement to study the history of Indian people. Only through this study can we as a nation do what must be done if our treatment of the American Indian is not to be marked down for all time as a national disgrace."

In 2012, the United Nations (UN) for the first time initiated investigations of reservations, exploring the plight of contemporary indigenous peoples and forwarding visibility of the widespread poverty, homelessness, substance abuse, crime, and violence that plague the estimated 2.5 million Native Americans in the United States. Furthermore, the UN has endorsed Native American self-determination as a way to restore and uphold human, political, social, and property rights of indigenous people in the United States and beyond. Native Americans experience homelessness, poverty, and unemployment more than two times the national average, with thousands of households living without basic telephone service and indoor plumbing. Native American tribal nations are experiencing greater visibility and have made substantial economic and political inroads, but there is a long road toward the desired complete sovereign authority of Indian Country. The NCAI continues this mission as Indian nations diversify economically, continue to strengthen tribes internally, and lobby to gain tribal sovereignty across both national and international boundaries.

Paul E. Calarco, Jr.
Hudson Valley Community College

See Also: American Indian Movement; Antilocution; Indian Boarding Schools; Indian Child Welfare Act; Indian Civil Rights Act of 1968; Indian Health Service; Poverty; Racism, Long-Term Effects of; Reparations; Tribal Social Services; Tribal Sovereignty; United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples; Values and Ethics, Ethnic Diversity and; Voting Rights Act of 1965; White Privilege.

Further Readings

Brown, Dee. Bury My Heart at Wounded Knee. New York: Sterling Innovation, 2009.

Deloria, Vine. Custer Died for Your Sins: An Indian Manifesto. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1988.

Hoxie, Frederick. This Indian Country: American Indian Activists and the Place They Made. New York: Penguin Press, 2012.

Pevar, Stephen L. The Rights of Indians and Tribes. New York: Oxford University Press, 2012.

Roleff, Tamara L. Native American Rights (Current Controversies). Farmington Hills, MI: Greenhaven Press, 1998.

Ross, Jeffrey Ian, and Larry Gould. Native Americans and the Criminal Justice System. Boulder, CO: Paradigm Publishers, 2006.

Stannard, David E. American Holocaust: The Conquest of the New World. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

National Database for Autism Research

The National Database for Autism Research (NDAR) is a secure biomedical informatics system and research data repository developed by the National Institutes of Health (NIH) for the autism spectrum disorders (ASD) research community. In an attempt to address the differing needs of its multiple stakeholders, the NDAR leadership team aims to be inclusive in its composition, having included three parents of children with autism as well as an adult with autism.

Background

In response to intensified social concern about ASD, the U.S. Congress passed the Combatting Autism Act (CAA) of 2006 (P.L. 109-416), legislation designed to rapidly increase and improve the coordination of scientific discoveries in the area of autism research. The CAA authorized the creation of the Interagency Autism Coordinating Committee (IACC), a federal government advisory panel responsible for developing and annually updating a strategic plan for ASD research. The IACC strategic plan was originally designed to specify research opportunities that focus on the six most-pressing questions facing those affected by ASD with the aim of linking them to specific research endeavors. The first plan was finalized in 2009, and a seventh question, which mentions the need for the creation of mechanisms to encourage data contribution to NDAR (whose work originally began in 2007), was added to the IACC strategic plan in 2010.

NDAR was originally developed by the NIH with support from five institutes and centers at the NIH: the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH), the Eunice Kennedy Shriver National Institute of Child Health and Human Development (NICHD), the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke (NINDS), the National Institute for Environmental Health Sciences (NIEHS), and the Center for Information Technology (CIT). The database contains a full range of data collected by investigators of ASD and provides researchers with the infrastructure to store, search across, and analyze various types of data. Still in its early stages, NDAR interacts with data submitters to improve the submission process and works with institutional review boards (IRBs) to clarify questions or concerns. NDAR also continuously reviews access policies and procedures to make sure that research participants' privacy and confidentiality are protected.

Purpose and Funding

NDAR was developed to support and accelerate the advancement of autism research through the creation of an infrastructure that integrates heterogeneous data sets, thus giving researchers access to more quality data than they would be able to collect on their own. It was also set up to help define standard tools and policies to integrate the computational resources developed by scientific research institutions, private foundations, and other federal and state agencies that support ASD research.

To that end, it allows the longitudinal storage of all of a research participant's information generated by one or more research studies. NDAR is also currently in the process of connecting relevant repositories together through data federation, a structure that allows data to be kept in their respective locations while enabling users to search in all databases at the same time. Both NDAR and the federated repositories all use the NDAR global unique identifier (GUID) system as well as common data definitions to increase data accuracy across each individual laboratory and project. NDAR is cofunded and receives resource contributions from several institutes and centers at the NIH, including the NIMH, NINDS, NIEHS, NICHD, and the CIT.

Sources of Data

The Autism Centers of Excellence (ACE) Program was created in 2007 to foster collaboration among teams of specialists working together to address particular research problems concerning ASD in an in-depth manner. Initial data in NDAR were provided by 11 of these ACE research centers; other autism researchers then provided additional data. NDAR currently accepts high-quality research data from a number of other projects, regardless of their funding sources and locations, and is working to connect with additional relevant research repositories. Several investigators with research grants, investigators who had autism research projects funded through the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009, as well as more than 120 grantees funded by the NIH are also expected to share their data with NDAR.

In May 2012, NDAR contained more than 170,000 data records from more than 25,000 subjects; as of September 2012, the number of research participants in the database had expanded to 35,000. Data in NDAR includes demographic information, clinical assessments, imaging data, and genomics information. (The database began to receive genomics/sequencing data in 2012.) A large portion of NDAR is comprised of behavioral, intelligence quotient (IQ), and cognitive data, but the database also contains significant information concerning the impacts of environmental exposures.

Who Can Submit Data

Any researcher with research data related to ASD may apply for approval to submit data to NDAR as long as they follow the protocol outlined on the data contribution page of their Web site (http://ndar.nih.gov/ndarpublicweb/contributing.html). To contribute data to NDAR, investigators are required to format their data in line with an existing NDAR data definition or provide a new data definition that will be available for use by others. Researchers must confirm that data conforms to existing definitions by employing the validation tool, a program that ensures that naming conventions are defined, all GUIDs are properly registered, and that the reported data is consistent with the value ranges defined in the system's dictionary. All data contributed and shared with NDAR have to pass validation before being accepted for submission.

Access to Data

Although summary information on the data in NDAR is available on their home page for public use, qualified researchers can request access to data stored in NDAR and data stored at federated repositories when the data are made public. To gain access to this data, an investigator must obtain NDAR data access privileges. In order to protect the privacy of research participants, only researchers who have completed data use certification and received approval from the NDAR Data Access Committee (DAC) may access the broadly shared data in the NDAR Central Repository.

Danielle Roth-Johnson
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

See Also: Children With Special Needs; Neurodiversity; Sociology of Disability.

Further Readings

Farber, Greg. "National Database for Autism Research: Presentation at Bridging the Terminology Gap in Pediatrics Meeting." https://custom.cvent.com/D8C8BB3C1AC948688306189D2CB33111/files/9904da9c665744c1b2b919c1cddd7bbb.pdf (Accessed October 2013).

Hall, Dan, Michael F. Huerta, Matthew McAuliffe, and Gregory K. Farber. "Sharing Heterogenous Data: The National Database for Autism Research." Neuroinformatics, v.10/4 (2012).

Interagency Autism Coordinating Committee. 2010 Strategic Plan for Autism Spectrum Disorder Research. http://iacc.hhs.gov/strategic-plan/2010/index.shtml (Accessed November 2013).

National Database for Autism Research. http://ndar.nih.gov (Accessed October 2013).

"The National Database for Autism Research Announces Its First Data Release." http://phys.org/news/2010-11-national-database-autism.html (Accessed October 2013).

"National Database for Autism Research Consolidates Results." http://communities.washingtontimes.com/neighborhood/autism-unexpected/2010/jul/21/national-database-autism-research-consolidates-res/ (Accessed October 2013).

National Institute of Mental Health. "National Database for Autism Research." http://www.nimh.nih.gov/news/media/video/national-database-for-autism-research.shtml (Accessed October 2013).

Omnitec Solutions, Inc. http://www.omnitecinc.com/Capabilities/HealthResearchSupport/NationalDatabaseforAutismResearch.aspx (Accessed October 2013).

Singer, Emily. "Why It's Good to Share Your Data." http://sfari.org/news-and-opinion/conference-news/2012/international-meeting-for-autism-research-2012/why-its-good-to-share-your-data (Accessed October 2013).

Sperling, Anne J., Michael Huerta, Matthew McAuliffe, Daniel Hall, and Gretchen Navidi. "The NIH National Database for Autism Research (NDAR): Innovations in Promoting Community Science and Protecting Participants." http://www.primr.org/uploadedFiles/PRIMR_Site_Home/Resource_Center/Abstracts/Sperling_A_NIHAutismDatabase.pdf (Accessed October 2013).

Winegardner, Jean. "National Database for Autism Research Consolidates Research Results." http://communities.washingtontimes.com/neighborhood/autism-unexpected/2010/jul/21/national-database-autism-research-consolidates-res (Accessed October 2013).

National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey

The National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (NHANES) is administered annually by the National Center for Health Statistics, a sector of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). The survey provides a comprehensive snapshot of the health and nutrition status of the U.S. population. NHANES is used to identify the prevalence of disease in the U.S. population, as well as risk factors for disease. Data is also used to determine national measurement standards for weight, height, and blood pressure.

NHANES began as a result of the 1956 U.S. National Health Survey Act. The act prioritized research aimed at collecting accurate and timely information on the amount, distribution, and effects of illness and disability in the United States. The CDC conducted surveys periodically from 1974 to 1994 (NHANES I, 1974–1975; NHANES II, 1976–1980; and NHANES III, 1988–1994). Annual data collections have been conducted continually since 1999.

A nationally representative sample of approximately 5,000 people is recruited each year. Since 1974, more than 140,000 people have been surveyed. Survey participants are selected to reflect current U.S. demographics using census information. The NHANES team divides the United States into geographic communities and then further divides those communities into neighborhoods. Neighborhoods are then randomly selected. From the neighborhoods, individual households are randomly selected. Residents of selected households are then contacted and asked to participate. To achieve adequate sample sizes for data analysis, NHANES oversamples individuals in the U.S. population who are over age 60, as well as African Americans, Asian Americans, and Hispanic Americans.

Study Design and Content

The study includes both physical examinations and in-depth interviews. The research team includes physicians, dentists, and medical technicians. Physical examinations are conducted using mobile examination centers to make data collection convenient for the participants. The physical examination includes tests of blood pressure, bone density, condition of teeth, vision test, hearing test, height, weight, and other body measures, an ophthalmology exam for eye diseases, and breathing tests. Urine samples, blood samples, and vaginal swabs are taken. Researchers also take water samples from the participants' homes to test for the presence of environmental chemicals. The interview component of the study takes place in the participants' homes. Survey questions ask participants demographic questions in addition to questions about their health status, drug and alcohol use, nutrition, reproductive health, disease history, and diet. All participants receive a cash payment in exchange for participation and are reimbursed for any transportation or child-care expenses.

Results of the NHANES Survey

All of the data collected annually for the NHANES is publically available on the CDC's Web site. Interested researchers can join the NHANES LISTSERV (listserv.cdc.gov) to receive timely information about NHANES activities, products, and release dates. The NHANES is a rich source of data that enables researchers and organizations to study the nutrition-related behavior and health status of the U.S. population. For example, NHANES data have been used to examine the prevalence of hypertension among adults in the United States. The data allowed for a longitudinal study of awareness, treatment, and control of hypertension to be carried out. Data from this survey have also been used to examine milk consumption by children over time, the effects of 100 percent fruit juice consumption by children and adolescents, the prevalence of nonalcoholic fatty liver disease in the United States, alcoholic beverage consumption by adults, and the relationship between pesticide use and breast and prostate cancer risk.

The data collected are used by government and nongovernment organizations to create health and nutrition programs. Results have been used to design health interventions to improve health outcomes. NHANES data have also been used by researchers to influence policy and improve the health of the U.S. population. In recent years, the data have been used as evidence for the creation of pediatric growth charts and as evidence for the establishment of national baseline estimates for cholesterol levels and hepatitis.

Christine Skubisz
Anna Kern
Emerson College

See Also: Drug and Alcohol Screening; Eating Disorders, Cultural Aspects of; Food Desert; Food Insecurity; Food Support; Health and Sickness, Differing Attitudes Toward; Hispanic Health and Nutrition Examination Survey; National Survey of Family Growth; Nutritional Services and Assessment; Overweight and Obese Adults and Children; Public Health; Socioeconomic Status.

Further Readings

Fulgoni III, Victor L., and Erin E. Ouann. "National Trends in Beverage Consumption in Children From Birth to 5 Years: Analysis of NHANES Across Three Decades." Nutrition Journal, v.11 (2012).

Guenther, Patricia, Eric Ding, and Eric Rimm. "Alcoholic Beverage Consumption by Adults Compared to Dietary Guidelines: Results of the National Health and Examination Survey, 2009–2010." Journal of the Academy of Nutrition and Dietetics, v.113 (2013).

Lazo, Mariana, et al. "Prevalence of Nonalcoholic Fatty Liver Disease in the United States: The Third National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey, 1988–1994." American Journal of Epidemiology, v.178 (2013).

O'Neil, Carol E., Theresa A. Nicklas, Michael Zanovec, Roland E. Klienman, and Victor L. Fulgoni III. "Fruit Juice Consumption Is Associated With Improved Nutrient Adequacy in Children and Adolescents: The National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (NHANES) 2003–2006." Public Health Nutrition, v.15 (2012).

Xu, Xiaho, Amy B. Dailey, Evelyn O. Talbott, Vito A. Ilacqua, Greg Kearney, and Nabih R. Asal. "Associations of Serum Concentration of Organochlorine Pesticides With Breast Cancer and Prostate Cancer in U.S. Adults." Environmental Health Perspectives, v.118 (2010).

National Healthcare Disparities Reports

The Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality (AHRQ), an agency of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), publishes the annual National Healthcare Disparities Report (NHDR). Under a 1999 Congressional mandate, this report was first released in 2003 in conjunction with the National Healthcare Quality Report (NHQR). Together, these reports summarize health care measures to evaluate the state of health care quality, access, and disparities. Because these reports work in tandem, the NHDR cannot be presented without also discussing the NHQR. Whereas the NHQR is a comprehensive overview of U.S. health issues, the NHDR examines the same key measures but within the context of priority populations. This includes racial and ethnic minorities, low-income populations, and others with special health care needs such as the elderly and persons with disabilities or chronic illnesses. The content of the reports informs policy makers and aims to improve the overall quality of health care received by the U.S. population. Currently, the health care system distributes services inefficiently and unevenly across populations, resulting in inequalities and disparities. To improve equity, the NHDR examines these disparities to help us better understand the impact of racial, ethnic, and socioeconomic differences in health care provision and outcomes.

Measuring and Reporting Quality

The ultimate goal of these reports is to address critical issues within the health care system and give guidance in providing optimal care for all persons in the United States. In order to examine equitability of service delivery and outcomes, measures had to be established and then applied to all population groups. In addition to performance measures, an interagency work group was tasked with selecting core measures. Through the application of these measures, trends are monitored to identify areas for which health care is improving or getting worse. This group continues to work closely with AHRQ to amend the measures list according to areas where additional health care performance information is needed. Based on data analysis and trends, new measures might be added, while others might be retired. In 2012, the AHRQ made a major evaluative change. Specifically, they analyzed disparities using the full set of measures tracked in each report rather than just the core measures.

The measures are essential for tracking as well as identifying the data to be used for examining the status of health care quality. Establishing effective measures is complicated by the fact that data must be culled from three dozen different databases. This is necessary in order to obtain estimates for different population subgroups and years. Despite the data challenges, changes in health care quality and access can be tracked over time and used to inform policy makers, researchers, providers, and other segments of the care continuum of areas that are improving or declining. It is noted that data collection has improved as a result of the 1999 federal initiative, although data on underserved population are still often incomplete and inadequate. Assuming that the Affordable Care Act remains law, all federally funded health programs and population surveys will be required to collect data on race, ethnicity, sex, primary language, and disability. This data collection improvement will allow for more thorough data sets for evaluation and reporting, and ultimately, identifying priority needs for improvement.

Organization of the Reports and Priority Populations

The NHQR and the NHDR follow the same table of contents. Each report begins with and identically highlights sections that incorporate findings from both the NHQR and the NHDR. This introduction is followed by a chapter providing an overview of the methods used to generate estimates, measure trends, and examine disparities. The next chapter covers effectiveness of care in several clinical areas. These are cancer, cardiovascular disease, chronic kidney disease, diabetes, human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) and acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), maternal and child health, mental health and substance abuse, musculoskeletal disease, and respiratory disease. These services are examined with data associated with lifestyle modification, functional status preservation and rehabilitation, and supportive and palliative care. Subsequent chapters address patient safety, timeliness (of care), patient centeredness, care coordination, efficiency, health system infrastructure, and access to health care.

While the highlights sections are identical in the NHQR and NHDR, the remaining chapters contain starkly different analyses. Specifically, the NHQR tracks performance for different groups by age, gender, and geographic location. By comparison, the NHDR evaluates performance by race, ethnicity, income, education, activity limitations, and geographic location. Additionally, the NHDR contains a unique chapter on priority populations. These priority populations were specified by Congress in the Healthcare Research and Quality Act of 1999 (Public Law 106-129) and are part of a legislative mandate to collect and report data for nationwide improvement of health care. The priority populations are racial and ethnic minority groups, low-income groups, women, children (under age 18), older adults (65 and over), residents of rural areas, and individuals with special health care. This last group includes people with disabilities and people in need of chronic care or end-of-life care. While not mandated, the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) segment is also included as is subpopulation data for Asians and Hispanics where data are available.

Findings

The ultimate goal of all HHS initiatives is to improve the lives of Americans through better health care and health. Released in 2013, the 2012 NHDR is the 10th annual report allowing for a decade of tracking and data comparison. The evaluation shows that, despite concentrated efforts, health care quality and access remain suboptimal for minority and low-income groups. Findings also demonstrate that, while overall quality is improving, access issues have worsened. While these reports do not directly address social determinants of disease, the data show that racial and ethnic minorities, as well as those living in poverty, often face more barriers to receiving care. Even after gaining entry into the system, they often receive poorer quality of care. This is the result of multiple factors such as service distribution, language, and cultural divides between patient and provider. While these findings are alarming, health care researchers focused on social determinants of health are making progress at identifying problems, targeting resources, and designing interventions for better outcomes. Informed by data, these interventions can focus on specific types of services, at-risk subpopulations, and smaller-scale geographic interventions that national and state level policies cannot.

Denese M. Neu
HHS Planning and Consulting

See Also: Department of Health and Human Services, U.S.; Health as a Human Right; Health Care, Disparities in; Health Care Delivery, Models of; Health Disparities, Role of; Racial and Ethnic Approaches to Community Health; Social Determinants of Health.

Further Readings

Bilheimer, Linda T., and Jane E. Sisk. "Collecting Adequate Data on Racial and Ethnic Disparities in Health: The Challenges Continue." Health Affairs, v.27/2 (2008).

Moy, Ernest, Elizabeth Dayton, and Carolyn M. Clancy. "Compiling the Evidence: The National Health Disparities Report." Health Affairs, v.24/2 (2005).

U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. 2012 National Healthcare Disparities Report. http://www.ahrq.gov/research/findings/nhqrdr/nhdr12/index.html (Accessed December 2013).
U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality. 2012 National Healthcare Quality Report. http://www.ahrq.gov/research/findings/nhqrdr/nhqr12/index.html (Accessed December 2013).

National Institute of Mental Health

The National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH) is a federally funded agency with a mission to increase the understanding and treatment of mental illness. It is funded to provide clinical research with which to advance mental illness prevention, recovery, and cures. Mental health began to receive a great deal of attention during the recruitment of soldiers for World War II.

At that time, upon examination, approximately one in four draftees were found to be unable to perform military service because of psychiatric or neurological problems. In response, Congress established the Mental Health Act in 1946 to study the mental health needs of the country. This act established the National Institute of Mental Health, in the United States.

In 1961, the NIMH released a groundbreaking report, "Action for Mental Health," which transformed various services provided for the mentally ill. The report made recommendations to improve mental health care in the United States. The report was released at a time when there was a surplus of money in the domestic budget, and President John F. Kennedy was very supportive of improving mental health care because of his experience with a family member. This report was the beginning of an increase in the federal government's involvement in mental health care and the beginning of several federally funded federal mental health initiatives. The report resulted in the passage of the Community Mental Health Center Acts of 1963 and 1965. This legislation provided funding for the NIMH to work on the prevention, treatment, and cure of mental illness.

The NIMH receives its funding through an annual appropriations bill that is passed through the House of Representatives and the Senate and then signed by the president. For the past three decades, achieving diversity in the workforce and adding diversity to their advisory committees and in their grantee population has been a core value of the NIMH. They are interested in getting input from diverse individuals who have overcome difficult challenges because of their ability to work on complex problems with different perspectives.

Importance of NIMH

It is estimated that one in five Americans has a diagnosable mental illness and that 53 percent of adults have a condition that interferes with attendance at work or performing daily activities for several days per year. Currently, the NIMH funds are used for more than 2,000 research grants throughout the country and overseas. The NIMH has seven divisions simultaneously working on many projects, including advances in biological and neuroscience, treatment interventions, and acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS).

An important component of the NIMH is its extensive outreach program, which according to their Web site is working to "increase the public's access to science-based mental health information through partnerships with national and state nonprofit organizations" and "has a particular emphasis on reaching historically underserved populations." One of its objectives is to provide our nation with a better understanding of mental disorders and behaviors as a way of reducing misperceptions and negative attitudes toward mental illness. Advances in treatment cannot occur if misconceptions regarding mental health prevent individuals from accessing available services. The NIMH Web site contains information on many mental health conditions for the public to access free of charge.

The NIMH has numerous research training and career development programs. Its program to Enhance Diversity in Institutional Training promotes diversity in the biomedical, behavioral, clinical, and social sciences research workforce. The program is designed to provide a balanced perspective in the determination of research priorities, improve the recruitment of subjects from diverse backgrounds into clinical research protocols, and work toward addressing and eliminating health disparities. It is committed to increasing the quality of the educational and training environment for talented researchers from all racial and ethnic groups.

Patient in a magnetoencephalography (MEG) scanner, from the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH). It is estimated that one in five Americans has a diagnosable mental illness. NIMH funds are used for more than 2,000 research grants throughout the country and overseas.

Current NIMH research initiatives include the following: (1) Fast-Fail Trials (FAST) are clinical trials to study compounds for use as psychiatric medications targeted for specific areas in the brain; (2) Rapidly Acting Treatments for Treatment-Resistant Depression (RAPID) are interventions to develop therapies to lift treatment-resistant depression that will be effective in a few days instead of weeks or months; (3) Army Study to Assess Risk and Resilience in Service Members (Army STARRS) is the largest study on military personnel to identify mental health risks and resilience in an effort to assist the army to develop effective strategies to reduce rising suicide rates and to address mental health problems among soldiers; and (4) Recovery After an Initial Schizophrenia Episode (RAISE) studies treatments that will reduce symptoms and prevent the deterioration of functioning in chronic schizophrenics.

Mental illness has a significant impact on the lives of approximately one in five Americans. The NIMH has a significant role in prioritizing and continuing research for the prevention, treatment, and quality of life of children, adults, and the elderly in the United States. They are currently involved in three initiatives designed to encourage increased diversity in the scientific workforce. One of these is providing funds to institutions, so they can plan and create an infrastructure to mentor individuals from diverse backgrounds to provide new ideas for improving mental health in the United States.

Eileen Klein
Ramapo College

See Also: International Mental Health Research Organization; Mental Health Service Delivery, Cultural Characteristics of; Mental Health Services, Adult; Mental Health Services, Children.

Further Readings

Mak, W. W. S., R. W. Law, J. Alvidrez, and E. J. Pérez-Stable. "Gender and Ethnic Diversity in NIMH-Funded Clinical Trials: Review of a Decade of Published Research." Administration and Policy in Mental Health and Mental Health Services Research, v.34/6 (2007).

Merikangas, K. R., et al. "The Impact of Comorbidity of Mental and Physical Conditions on Role Disability in the U.S. Adult Population." Archives of General Psychiatry, v.64/10 (2007).

Scull, Andrew. "The Mental Health Sector and the Social Sciences in Post-World War II USA Part 2: The Impact of Federal Research Funding and the Drugs Revolution." History of Psychiatry, v.22/3 (2011).

National Institute on Aging

The U.S. network of 27 medical research institutes is known as the National Institutes of Health (NIH). These institutes are part of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), whose mission is to protect the physical and mental health of U.S. citizens. As such, the agencies within the NIH vary in their purposes and range from aiming to cure cancer, to researching alcoholism, to finding new ways to treat allergies.

The National Institute on Aging (NIA) is one of the research agencies within this network. It was founded in 1974 and is the main center for government-funded aging research in the United States. It focuses on how to provide older adults with a happy, healthy life. It also investigates common diseases and disabilities associated with growing older. Additionally, the NIA seeks to encourage healthy aging and promotes both basic and clinical research. The main campus of the NIA is located in Bethesda, Maryland; however, the NIA provides funding for research at institutions across the United States. The NIA and its affiliates publish valuable research and resources for the general public to help benefit older adults and their families.

Types of Research in the NIA

The NIA conducts research on many topics related to aging. It has both intramural and extramural research programs. The intramural research program includes both laboratory and clinical research. Among other research, gene studies using mice are conducted to examine genome sequencing, which can inform human biomedical research. It is also the starting point for two large-scale studies, the Baltimore Longitudinal Study of Aging (started in 1958) and the Healthy Aging in Neighborhoods of Diversity Across the Life Span study.

The extramural research program is made up of four divisions of research as well as the collection of partnerships between the NIA and other researchers who receive NIA funding to further health-related research relevant to older adults. The four divisions of research in the extramural research program are the Division of Aging Biology, which focuses on aging processes and age-related disease at a molecular or genetic level; the Division of Behavioral and Social Research, which focuses on research regarding social, behavioral, and economic issues as they relate to aging individuals and society; the Division of Geriatrics and Clinical Gerontology, which focuses on the relationship between disease and health outcomes during aging; and the Division of Neuroscience, which investigates the brain bases behind aging-related diseases.

Alzheimer's Disease and the NIA

The NIA is the primary research center in the United States for the study of Alzheimer's disease. It also partners with centers for Alzheimer's disease drug development around the United States and provides funding for such research. Alzheimer's disease is the most common cause of dementia in older adults, making it an extremely widespread issue for older adults' health. The NIA provides resources for older adults and their families regarding the causes, symptoms, and treatment of Alzheimer's disease. It provides videos, information sheets, and commonly asked questions regarding the progression of Alzheimer's disease.

The NIA also provides information about the funding of Alzheimer's research in the United States. It highlights economic outcomes associated with Alzheimer's disease such as how much care for individuals with the disease costs. Policy or funding changes regarding Alzheimer's disease and related diseases are immediately provided to the public by the NIA. The NIA also provides research progress reports in a reader-friendly manner, characterized by main findings associated with Alzheimer's and related diseases.

Cultural Diversity Initiatives in the NIA

The NIA has actively increased the information provided to the public and health care providers regarding diverse populations of older adults. The Minority Aging and Health Disparities initiative is a multifaceted branch of the NIA that supports research projects specifically aimed at addressing health issues associated with minorities. It also disseminates research findings related to minority aging and health. Recent articles and resources produced by the NIA have focused on cultural differences in medical care and understanding for American Indians, Latino and Latina individuals, individuals from Middle Eastern cultures, and other cultural minorities. These resources have showcased some of the common cultural differences that can have a significant impact on patient–provider interactions. The NIA has also published information regarding specific religious practices that may affect how some older adults approach health care situations. The NIA's public newsletter to increase cultural diversity and awareness of minority aging and health is LINKS: Minority Research and Training.

Research and information reported in LINKS has addressed areas of health for a variety of issues. For example, in 2007, cancer disparities in Latino communities were reported. The research provided smoking cessation information to Latino individuals. Differences in hospice care for African American and Caucasian older adults were reported in 2010. The research found that African Americans have less exposure to hospice care information than Caucasians. Alzheimer's disease research associated with the NIA has also focused on the low prevalence of Native Americans reporting symptoms of the disease, including investigation of health literacy and genetic factors. Health implications for these findings are important for carrying out the mission of the NIA to provide health care information to all older adults.

Rachel H. Messer
Oklahoma State University

See Also: Aging and Adult Services; Death and Dying, Cultural Attitudes Toward; Elder Care/Geriatric Services; Health Care, Disparities in; National Institute of Mental Health; Public Health.

Further Readings

Glaser, Vicki. "Institute Profile: National Institute on Aging." Journal of Anti-Aging Medicine, v.2 (1999).

Nagy, Catherine L., Marie A. Bernard, and Richard J. Hodes. "National Institute on Aging at Middle Age: Its Past, Present, and Future." Journal of the American Geriatrics Society, v.60 (2012).

National Institute on Aging. "National Institute on Aging Publications Catalog." http://www.nia.nih.gov/health/publication/all? (Accessed April 2014).

Rodgers, Anne Brown, and the National Institute on Aging. "Alzheimer's Disease: Unraveling the Mystery." http://www.nia.nih.gov/alzheimers/publication/alzheimers-disease-unraveling-mystery/preface (Accessed April 2014).

National Mental Health Association

Until 2006, Mental Health America (MHA) was named the National Mental Health Association (NMHA). The mission of this leading nonprofit national organization is to promote mental health, prevent mental disorders, and achieve progress to eliminate mental illness through advocacy, education, service delivery, and research initiatives. These endeavors are accomplished through a national organization and state and local nonprofit organizational affiliates that engage in similar functions to advance statewide and local mental health policies, service provision, and an improved quality of life.

There are 240 MHA affiliates organized according to several different operational models. The first is a local MHA organization that is linked to a statewide organization and the national entity. A second alternative allows local organizations to link with the national level without connection to a statewide organization. In a few states, there is a single statewide association without local affiliates linked to the national organization. All affiliates are expected to meet and apply national standards through different staffing and volunteer supports that enhance MHA network participation, undertake consumer advocacy, support organizations, participate in public policy and research, offer public education, and engage with media to support mental health. One of the greatest benefits of this 501(c)(3) affiliate structure is the flexibility to respond to diverse community needs and priorities based on sociodemographic characteristics, local service resource gaps, public mental health financing, and shifting service eligibility regulations driven through Medicaid mental health service policy coverage.

History of Organizational Advocacy

